Mahomet, one of the most artful impostors that ever lived in the world, was sensible of this, and therefore he endeavoured to transplant into his system every thing of a moral tendency which he found in the sacred scriptures. But still it was his conduct in the compiling of his Alcoran to mix things together, so as to comprehend a jumble of sentiments as should include, as proselytes to his doctrine, both Jews and Christian heretics, well knowing that the Heathen Arabians would not be averse to any thing that gratified their ambition, and satisfied their lusts.

The manner in which this work was compiled has been already taken notice of, we must now present the reader with the matter; and here it is not necessary that we should transcribe the whole, but only the leading principles, so far as contains all the doctrines in that famous system of imposture. The whole is divided into one hundred and fourteen chapters, some being long and tedious, others short and comprehensive, but to understand them properly; we shall abridge them in the manner they follow in the book, and insert every one of the sentiments upon which that false system is founded. Every chapter begins with an address to the Divine Being, constantly in the same words, but a single specimen of that will be sufficient, so that there will be no necessity for repeating any of the others.

“In the name of God, gracious and merciful: praised be God, gracious and merciful: King of the day of judgment. It is Thee whom we adore; it is from Thee we require help. Guide us in the right way, in the way of them that thou hast gratified; against whom thou hast not been displeased, and we shall not be misled.”

There is no error in this book, it guideth into the right way, those that are righteous, who believe what they see not, who make their prayers with affection, and dispense in alms a part of the goods that we have given them. Such as believe the things that are inspired into thee, in those that have been preached before thee, and at the end of the world are not ignorant, they are guided by their Lord, and shall be blessed. Misery is upon unbelievers. Whether thou reprove them, or do not reprove them, they will not be converted, God hath shut up their hearts, their ears, and eyes, and they shall suffer great torments. Many men say, we believe in God, and the day of judgment, and do not believe; they think to deceive God, and them that believe in God; certainly they deceive themselves, and know it not. God will augment the infirmity which they have in their heart, and they shall undergo the rigours of an infinite pain, by reason of their lying. When it was said to them pollute not the earth, they said, we are true observers of the law of God; notwithstanding, they were they that polluted the earth, but they knew it not.

Say not, that God hath a companion equal to him, because you know the contrary. If you doubt that I have sent my servant, come and bring some chapters like to the Alcoran, and call to witness the idols that you adore; if you are good men, if you have not done it, or cannot perform it, fear the fire of hell prepared for infidels and idolators; and declare to true believers who do good works, that they shall enjoy the immense pleasures of Paradise, wherein flow many rivers; they shall there find all sorts of fair and savoury fruits, which God hath prepared for them; they shall consider, if they be like to such as had before in the world: They shall there have wives fair and delicate, and shall dwell in eternal felicity. God is not ashamed to compare a little thing to an extreme greatness.

Such as in their heart incline to depart from the truth, do often follow their inclination, desirous of sedition, and to understand the explication of the Alcoran; but none understand its explication but God, and such as are profound in learning; they say, we believe in God, all things proceed from his divine wisdom, nevertheless none remember but the wise. Lord, cause not our hearts to err, after thou hast guided us into the right way, give us thy mercy, thou art most bountiful towards thy creatures. Lord, thou art he that shalt assemble the world at the day of judgment, at which day nothing shall be found doubtful, when thou wilt not go against thy promises, and when wealth and children shall not serve to the wicked, but to kindle the fire of hell. The infidel lineage of Pharaoh, and those that preceded him, blasphemed and abjured the law of God, but he surprized them in their sin; he is grievous in his chastisements. Say to the infidels, they shall be vanquished, and shall be gathered together into the fire of hell, that is prepared for them.

You have an example in the two troops that fought for the glory of God, they beheld with their eyes, infidels become true believers, like unto themselves; God strengtheneth with his aid, whom it pleaseth him; this shall be for example to such as shall clearly see. The love and desire of women, of children, of riches, abundance of gold, of silver and of horses, cattle, and of tillage, are pleasing to men; such are the riches of the life of this world, but the most assured refuge is in God. Say unto them, I will declare unto you things much better for them, that shall have the fear of God before their eyes: They shall dwell eternally in Paradise, where flow many rivers, with women, beautiful and lean, and all manner of content. God beholdeth them that adore him, and that say, Lord, we believe in thy law, pardon our sins, and deliver us from the torments of fire. The patient, the persevering, true believers, the obedient, the good men, such as beg pardon of God in the morning, the angels, the learned that love justice, testify that there is but one only God. The law of salvation, is a law pleasing to his Divine Majesty; no man contradicteth this truth, among such as know the written law, but through envy. He that shall not obey the commandments of God, shall find his Divine Majesty very exact to call him to an account. If the impious dispute with thee, say to them, I am wholly resigned to the will of God, with all such as have followed me. Ask of such as know the written law, and them that know it not, if they resign themselves to God, if they do, they will follow the right way; if they go astray, thou hast none other obligation, but to preach to them; God beholdeth them that adore him. Declare grievous torments to those that conceal his commandments, that kill the prophets, and injure them that instruct the people in justice; the good works that they do, shall be unprofitable to them on earth, and they shall be in the other world deprived of protection. Seest thou not a party of them that know the written law, how they were called to a lecture of the book of God, to the end they might judge with equity the differences that are among them? but many are returned to their sin: they contemned the scripture, in that they said, the fire shall not touch us, but for a certain number of days; they are deceived in their blasphemies, what will become of them, when we shall assemble them at the day of judgment, when nothing shall be doubtful, and every one shall be recompensed as he shall have merited? No injustice shall be done unto them. Say, Lord, thou possessest the kingdoms of the world, thou givest royalty to whom thou seest good; from thy hand, O Lord, proceedeth all good; thou art omnipotent; thou causest day to enter the night, and night the day; thou causest life to come out of death, and death out of life; thou enrichest without measure whom thou seest good.

The Jews conspired against Jesus, and God caused their conspiracy to turn against them, he knoweth the designs of conspirators. Remember thou, how the Lord said, O Jesus I will cause thee to die, I will elevate thee to myself, and remove thee far from infidels, and prefer those that have obeyed thee, to infidels at the day of judgment. That day shall assemble you all before me; I will judge the differences between you, and will punish the impious in this world, and in the other; none among them shall be of power to protect them, I will reward them that shall have believed in my law, and have done good works; God loveth not the unjust. I relate to thee these mysteries, and teach thee the Alcoran; Jesus is with God, as is Adam, God created him of the earth: he said, be thou, and he was: This truth proceedeth from thy Lord, of the number of them that doubt; If any one dispute with thee concerning thy doctrine, say to them, come, call together your children and ours, your wives and ours, let us assemble and address our prayers to God; I will lay the curse of his Divine majesty upon liars. This discourse is most true, there is no God, but God alone the omnipotent and wise. If they depart from his commandments, he shall well observe the unbelievers; say to them, Oh he that knows scripture! come with words alike true between you and us: Do I worship other than God? I do not associate him with any one, and acknowledge no other Lord but him; but if they turn aside from the way of faith, God knoweth them that shall pollute the earth; say to them, be ye witnesses, that we believe in God. Oh ye that understand scriptures, dispute, not the law of Abraham, to wit, if he observed the Old Testament or the gospel, they were taught after him, perhaps you will acknowledge your error. Oh ye that have disputed what ye know not! Abraham was no Jew, nor Christian, he professed the unity of God, he was a true believer, and not of the number of infidels.

The people, and particularly those that followed him, of his time, as also the prophet Mahomet, and all true believers have known the truth of his law. Part of them, to whom heretofore was given the knowledge of the Scripture they desired, seduced you from the right way, but they themselves erred, and they knew it not. O ye that know the scriptures! do not maliciously conceal the commandments of God, cover not the truth with a lie, neither willingly hide it. Many of them that know the written law, said from the break of day, believe in what hath been taught them, that believe in the law of God: Nevertheless, at evening, they were themselves of the number of infidels, peradventure they will be converted. Believe not but such as follow your own law: say to them, the true guide, is the guide of God. The knowledge that was given to you, was not given to any other, but you: If the infidels shall dispute against you, before your Lord, at the day of judgment, say to them, Grace proceedeth from the hand of God: He is bountiful, and omniscient; he pardoneth whom he pleaseth, and is altogether merciful. If thou intrusteth thy wealth to the hands of many of them that know the written law, they will faithfully restore it to thee.

I increase the wealth of infidels to augment their pain, they shall in the end feel grievous torments. God will not leave the faithful in the state that you are in; he will one day separate the good from the evil; he doth not teach you what is to come; he, for that effect chuseth among the prophets whom he seeth good. Believe therefore in God, and his prophets; if you believe in God, fear to offend him, you shall be rewarded. Believe ye that such as are too sparing, and avaricious of the wealth that God hath given them, do well; on the contrary, they do very ill, what they spare without reason, shall strangle them at the day of judgment. The inheritance of heaven and earth is God's, he knoweth all things. Certainly God heard the speech of them that said, God is poor, and we are rich; he hath said, I will write what they have spoken, and keep an exact account of the murders they have unjustly committed on the persons of the prophets; I will say to them at the day of judgment, taste of the torments of hell fire, which you have deserved. God doth not lead into darkness them that worship him. There be, that say, God hath commanded us not to believe the prophets, until their sacrifice be consumed by fire: say to them, there came to you prophets heretofore with miracles that you demanded, you had not slain them, had you been righteous; if they belie thee, know, they belied the prophets that were before thee, that came with miracles, the psalter, and the book of light. Every man shall taste of death, and your reward shall be paid at the day of judgment; he that shall depart from the fire of hell, and enter into Paradise, shall be happy. The wealth of this world is but a matter of pride, that you may be tried in your riches and persons. Hearken not to the Jews and Christians, that have known the written law before you, neither to them that believe in many gods, they offend God through their blasphemies: if you have patience, and fear God, you shall make a very good resolution. God hath accepted the speech of them that know his written law, when they promised him to preach to the people his commandments, and not conceal them; nevertheless they have condemned them, and changed them for profit of little value, and have gained nothing but misery; think not that such as rejoice of the evil they have done, and affect to be commended for what they have not done, have escaped the punishment of their crimes, they shall certainly suffer great torments. The kingdom of heaven and of earth is God's, he is omnipotent; the creation of heaven and earth, the difference of day and night are evident signs of his omnipotence; to such as have judgment. Such as have, remember God, standing, sitting, or lying down, and considered the creation of heaven and earth have said, Lord, thou hast not created these things in vain; blessed be thy name, deliver us from the torments of hell fire, thou wilt render miserable him that thou shalt thither precipitate, and the wicked shall be deprived of protection at the day of judgment. Lord, we have heard them that say, believe in your Lord, we believe in thy unity, pardon our faults, blot out our sins, and give us grace to die in the number of the just; bestow on us what thou hast promised by the prophets, and suffer us not to be miserable at the day of judgment; thou dost not contradict what thou dost promise.

If you fear to do injury to orphans, fear also to do wrong to women; marry those that please you. Two, three, or four: if you apprehend you shall not be able to entertain them equally, marry but one, or the slaves that you shall have acquired; this is most necessary to the end that you offend not God. Give to women their dowry with a good will; if they give to you any thing that is pleasing to you, receive it with affection and civility. Bestow not on fools the wealth that God hath given you for subsistence; assist orphans, give to them the garments that shall be necessary for them, and entertain them honestly; instruct them until they have attained to years of discretion, and are capable of marriage; if you believe they demean themselves, wisely restore to them their faculties, and devour them not unjustly before they be of age. He that shall be rich, shall abstain from their goods, and he that is poor, shall take with honesty, according to the pains he shall undergo for them : when you make to them restitution for their goods, take witness of your actions : God loveth good accounts. The children shall have a good part of what their father, and mother, or parents left after their death, of little or of much there appertaineth to them a portion prefixed and limited. When they divide their goods, the kindred shall have care of the poor and orphans; do good to them, and honestly entertain them. Such as fear to leave after them a weak progeny of little children, ought to fear to wrong orphans, they must fear God, and courteously entertain them. Those who unjustly devour their substance, swallow fire into their bowels, and shall burn in a great furnace. God recom-mendeth to you your children, the son shall have as much as two daughters; if there be more than two daughters, they shall have two thirds of the succession of the dead; if there be but one, she shall have the moiety, and her kindred a sixth part of what shall be left by the dead; if there be no children, and the kindred be heirs, the mother of the dead shall have a third; if there be brethren, the mother shall have a sixth, after satisfaction of the legacies contained in the testament, and of the debts.

O ye that believe in God! it is not lawful for you to inherit what is your wives by force, take not violently away what you have given them, unless they be surprised in manifest adultery; see them with civility, if you have an aversion from them, it may chance that you hate a thing, wherein God hath placed much good; but if you desire to repudiate your wives, to take others, and that you have given them any thing, take not any thing that appertaineth to them. Will you take their wealth with a lie and a manifest sin? How shall you take it, since you have approached each other, and that you have promised to use them civilly? Marry not the wives of your fathers; what is past was incest, abomination, and a wicked way. Your mothers are forbidden you, your daughters, sisters, aunts, nieces, your nurses, and your foster-sisters, the mothers of your wives, the daughters that your wives had by other husbands, of whom you shall have particular care. The daughters of women that you shall have known, are also forbidden you: if you have not known them it will be no sin; the wives of your sons are also prohibited, and two sisters: for what is past, God is gracious and merciful: Married wives are likewise forbidden you, except the women slaves that you shall have acquired. God hath so commanded you, except what is above forbidden, it is lawful for you to marry at your pleasure. If you desire women for money, and neither commit concubinage, nor adultery, give them their salary for which you shall agree, so you shall not offend God, he is omniscient, and most wise. He that shall not be able to espouse women of free condition, shall marry such women or maids, that are slaves, as shall please him. God knoweth the faith of the one, and the other. Marry your wives with the permission of their parents, and give them their dowry with honesty: If women of free condition, that have committed neither concubinage, nor adultery, secretly nor publicly, fly into second nuptials, and come to commit adultery, they shall be doubly punished, more than the daughters of love. The marriage of slaves is for them that fear whoredom: If you abstain from marrying them, you shall not do amiss. God is gracious and merciful; he is willing to teach you his law, and direct you in the way of them that preceded you; he is gracious and merciful to his people.

Such as follow the appetite of the wicked, decline extremely from the truth. God willeth that his law be a light unto you, for that man was created weak. O you that believe in God, devour not your substance among you with usury; but if you traffic, be peaceable in your affairs; slay not one another. God is merciful to them that obey him: He that disobeyeth, through malice and injustice, shall burn in the fire of hell; it is an easy thing for God to punish them. If you depart from mortal sins, I will cover your faults, and cause you to enter into paradise: covet not through envy, what God hath given to your neighbour; men and women shall have the wealth they have gained; beg grace of God, he knoweth all things. Give to your associates what appertaineth to them. We have ordained a portion, prefixed to the one and the other, in the succession of your father, mother, and kindred, God seeth all. The men shall have authority over the women; they shall have them in their keeping; they shall have in their power the wealth that God shall give them; and shall have a care of what shall be convenient to be expended for them. Discreet and obedient wives observe, in the absence of their husbands, the commandments' of God; make remonstrances to them that shall be disobedient, and remove them from your bed, chastise them.

If any one be in necessity, and eateth of what is prohibited, without a will to sin, God shall be to him gracious and merciful. They will demand of thee, what is permitted them to eat? Say unto them, it is lawful to eat all sorts of beasts that are not unclean, and whatever hath been taught you from God, touching beasts that hath been wounded by lions or dogs, eat the beasts you shall take, and remember God in blooding them: fear God, he is exact to take account. This day it is lawful that you eat what is not unclean, and the meats of them that know the written law, their meats are lawful for you, and yours for them. You are permitted to espouse maidens and women of free condition, that are of your religion, and maidens and women of free condition, that know the written law, giving them their dowry with civility; commit neither concubinage, nor adultery with them, neither secretly nor publicly, the good works of him that shall renounce your law, shall be unprofitable, he shall be at the day of judgment in the number of the damned! O ye that believe in God, when ye would make your prayers, wash your faces, your hands to the elbow, and pass your hand over your head, and over your feet to the ancles. If you be polluted, purify yourselves; if sick, or in a journey, or about to discharge your belly, or have known women, and find no water to wash you, lay hand on the sand, pass it over your visage, and wipe therewith your hands. God enjoineth you nothing irksome, but willeth you to be clean, and desireth to accomplish his grace upon you; peradventure you will give him thanks. O ye that believe in God! obey his commandments, and be true in your testimonies, take heed that no man move you to offend God, in diverting you from what is just; render justice to all, his fear inviteth you to it; have it before your eyes, he knoweth all your actions; hath promised his grace, and great recompences to the true believers, that shall do good works in this world and hath prepared hell to punish infidels. O ye that believe in God! remember his favour towards you, when some persons would have extended their hands upon you, and how he delivered you from their malice; fear him; all true believers ought to resign themselves to his will. God received the promise of the children of Israel to observe his commandments; he established among them twelve captains, and said, I will be with you when you shall make prayers; pay your tithes, believe in the prophets, defend them, and lend to me any alms; I will cover your sins, and cause you to enter paradise, wherein flow many rivers: and he among you that shall be an infidel, shall be entirely erroneous from the right path.—When they swerved from what they had promised, we gave them our curse, and hardened their heart: they have altered the words of the scripture, and abused what they had approved:

We have sent to thee the scripture written in vellum, the unbelievers have handled it with their hands, yet say it is evident sorcery and enchantment, that they will not believe therein, unless they see an angel descend to confirm it. Should we have sent an angel, they had perished by his presence, unless we had sent him under the figure of a man, like unto them, and clothed as they are. They derided the prophets and apostles, thy predecessors; derision is fallen upon such as contemned them. Say to them go through the world, and consider the end of them that abjure the law of God; say to them to whom appertaineth whatsoever is in heaven and earth? It is God's. He will employ his mercy to save you; doubtless he will assemble all of you at the day of judgment. Nevertheless infidels believe not in his unity; they consider not, that whosoever moveth by night and by day, and whatsoever is in the world, belongeth to his divine majesty, who understandeth and knoweth all things. Say unto them, require you other protection than that of God the Omnipotent, creator of heaven and earth, who nourisheth all things, is nourished by none? Say to them, I have received a command to embrace the law of salvation. Be not ye in the number of unbelievers; I fear to disobey my Lord, and fear the torments prepared for the wicked at the day of judgment: he that shall deliver himself, shall enjoy the grace of God, which is supreme felicity: If God will punish you, none shall deliver you from his punishment; if his will be to do good to you, he is omnipotent, always victorious, and hath all power over his creatures; he is most wise and omniscient. Say to them, what better testimony is there in the world than that of God? Say to them, he shall testify between you and me, to whom he hath inspired the Alcoran to instruct you: Will any among you that shall learn it, say there is any other God, but Elohim; I will not say so; there is but one God, and I am innocent from the sin you commit, in associating him with a companion equal to him; many of them that understand the written law, have knowledge of the truth of the Alcoran, their children also know it, but such as forsake their own souls, will not believe in God. Who more unjust than he that blasphemeth against God and his commandments? Certainly the wicked shall be miserable; I will assemble all of them, and say, where are the gods which you did associate with God? They shall have none other excuse, but to say, by God, Lord, we were of the number of idolators.—Consider how they will lie, and disavow their blasphemies: some there be among them that hearken to thee, we have hardened their hearts, they will not learn the Alcoran, because their ears are stopped. When they shall hear related all the miracles of the world, and shall see them with their eyes, they will not believe until they have disputed against thee.

Such as believe not in the resurrection, are wretched men, they shall be afflicted for their sins at the hour whenever death shall surprize them; they shall bear on their backs the burden of their crimes, and avouch the life of this world to be but deceit and vanity, and the life of the other to be full of felicity for the righteous; nevertheless the wicked are not converted, I know thou wilt be incensed against such as will say, they desire to obey thee, and shall renounce thy doctrine; they that contemn the commandments of God are impious, they have belied the prophets thy predecessors; the prophets endured their lies, and were patient, until we destroyed them; God declineth not what he hath promised. Thou knowest what the prophets foretold: If men abandon thee, canst thou covet to continue on earth, and to be in heaven at the same time, to cause prodigies appear, testimonies of thy mission. Had it so pleased God, he had brought them all into the right way, nor had they been in the number of the ignorant. Certainly he heareth the prayers of the righteous, that hearken to his word; he will give resurrection to the dead, and assemble them to receive recompense according to their merits. They have said, we believe not in the prophet, if he shew not to us some miracle from his Lord: Say unto them, God hath shewed you many miracles, but most of you do not understand them: the beasts that walk upon the earth, and the birds that fly into the air, are of the number of his creatures: We have not omitted to write any thing that is written in the book kept in heaven; all men shall one day appear before God, such as shall not have believed in his law, shall be deaf and dumb, and inhabit darkness; God misleadeth whom it pleaseth him, and guideth in the right way whom he seeth good. Say unto them, have you felt the punishment of God?

It is God that sendeth the winds to dissipate the rain, when they carry the clouds; we drive them charged with water, into places dry, dead, and ruined, and causeth the rain to fall there, that they may produce herbs and fruits; so will we cause the dead to arise again; perhaps men will remember the good land bringeth forth good fruits, through the permission of its Lord, and the bad land produceth only darnell. I teach my commandments to such as are not ungrateful; certainly we sent Noah to instruct men; he said, O ye people, worship one God alone: if you adore other than him, you shall be punished at the day of judgment; their rulers answered, O Noah, thou art in a great error; he replied, I err not, I am a messenger sent from God to preach his will, I give you most wholesome advice, God hath taught me what you know not: Is it strange to you, that he hath sent you his commandment by the tongue of a man like yourselves, to declare to you the torments of hell? Fear God, he will pardon your sins; but they belied Noah, we saved him in the ark, with his retinue, and drowned those that contemned our law, they were altogether blind. We sent Hod to his brother Aad, and to his retinue, he said, Oh ye people! worship one God alone, whom will ye adore, or whom fear, but God? The teachers answered, thou art in an extreme ignorance; we believe thee to be in the number of liars; he replied, I am not a liar, I am a messenger sent from God, to preach his commandments,

I give good and salutary advice, wonder not that God teacheth you his precepts by the tongue of a man like you, who declareth to you his pleasure. Remember that he left you on the earth after Noah, that he increased you in number, force, and power; call to mind his grace, you shall be happy. They answered, are we come to this, to worship one God alone, and to relinquish what our fathers adored? He said, the wrath and indignation of God shall fall upon you; will you dispute with us of the names that you and your fathers imposed on your idols! God did not enjoin to worship them, neither have you reason to do it; expect your punishment, I will expect it with perseverance.

A letter patent from God, and his prophet, to the unbelievers with whom ye have made a truce.— Travel in safety the space of four months, know, ye shall not render God impotent, and that he will lay shame upon your forehead. Advice for the people, at the great day of pilgrimage from God, and his prophet; God approveth not the actions of them that adore idols, his prophet is innocent from that sin; if ye repent, ye shall do well; if ye abandon the law of God, know, ye shall not escape the punishment of your crime; preach to the unbelievers, that they shall suffer grievous torments, except those with whom ye have made a truce, who fall not from what they have promised, and that protect none against you. Observe exactly until the prefixed time, what you have promised them. God loveth them that fear him: when the month of Heram shall be past, kill them where you shall meet them, take them slaves, detain them prisoners, and observe where they pass to lay ambush for them, if they be converted, if they pray at the time appointed, and pay tithes, leave them quiet, God is merciful to them that repeat. If the infidel demand quarter of you, give them quarter, to the end they may learn the word of God, teach them his commandments, for they are ignorant. How should they have truce with God and his prophet? if they believe neither the one nor the other, except them with whom you entered truce in the temple at Mecca? If they observe their promise to you, observe what ye promised to them; God loveth such as have his fear before their eyes; how shall they have truce with you? If they have advantage over you, they will respect neither your alliance nor confederacy.

They will speak well of you, and condemn you in their hearts: the greater part of them are iniquitous, they have preferred the riches of this world to the commandments of God, and have hindered the people from following his law, as if they knew not what they did; they bear no respect to the true believers, wherein they are exceedingly to blame. If they turn and make their prayers at the time ap-polited, if they pay tithes, they shall be your brethren in God. I teach the mysteries of faith to such as have understanding to comprehend them, if they break their promise and disturb them of your religion, kill their captains, as persons without faith, they will perhaps put an end to their impiety. Slay such especially that renounce their faith, who have endeavoured to drive the prophet from Mecca, and have begun to slay you, will you fear them? Will ye be terrified by them? It is reasonable that ye fear God; if ye believe in his law, fight them, God shall chastise them by your hands, he shall render them dishonourable, and protect you against them, he shall fortify the hearts of true believers, and expel melancholy, he pardoneth whom he seeth good, knoweth all things, and is most prudent in what he ordaineth. Think ye to be forsaken of God, and that he discerneth not them that have fought gallantly for his law, from such as have adored idols, and disobeyed the prophet.

Such as have believed in God, as have departed from the wicked, and employed their wealth and persons to fight for his law, shall have a particular degree, and a particular place near to his Divine Majesty, they shall be the more happy. God through his goodness, declareth to them, that they shall enter into delicious gardens, where they shall remain eternally; there is with God a great reward. O ye that believe! Obey not your fathers, nor your brothers, that love rather to follow impiety than the faith. Such as shall obey them, shall offend exceedingly; if your father, your children, your brothers, your wives, your parents, your friends, the wealth that you have gained, the fear of losing your riches, and apprehension of poverty, have more power over you than God and his prophet, and hinder you to fight for the faith, the commandment of God shall be executed against you, he guideth not the wicked, and hath protected you in many occasions. Remember the day of the battle of Hamin when ye rejoiced in the multitude of your men, it did not advantage you, fear made you find the place too narrow for flight, and ye turned the back as vanquished; Remember that God at that time, put his prophet and the true believers in a place of safety, and sent invisible troops to chastise the infidels, he pardoneth sins as seemeth good to him, he is gracious and merciful.

True believers will not excuse themselves from fighting or employing their wealth and persons for the law of God; he knoweth such as fear him.—They that believe not in God, neither the day of judgment, refuse to go with thee, they doubt the mysteries of faith, but shall continue in their doubt, to their confusion; had they inclined to go out against the enemy, they had arms to perform it; God contemned their going out, rendered them negligent, and caused them to remain with the sick, the women, and children; had they gone forth with you, they had brought with them more of disorder than affection to the service of his Divine Majesty; they hate you, nevertheless you hearken to them; God knoweth them that are to blame, they hateth thee heretofore, accused thee of all their mischief, until, through the permission of God, the truth appeared against their will: many of them said, excuse us, and scandalize us not, and they fell themselves into scandal and impiety; but hell is the habitation of those wicked persons; if good happen to you, they are discontented; if evil befall you, they say, they took heed to themselves, and foresaw it, and departed from you with joy: say unto them, nothing befall us, but what God hath ordained, he is our Lord; all true believers are resigned to the will of his Divine Majesty.

There is no excuse for you, ye are truly impious; if God pardon any one of you, he shall rigorously punish such as persist to offend him. The wicked teach among them impiety to their posterity, they depart from the truth; they go hand in hand, and agree to disobey God; they forget God, and God forgetteth them; he hath prepared hell for them, where they shall remain eternally; he hath cursed them, and they shall feel the torment of infinite pains. The wicked that were before you, shall undergo them like you, they were more powerful than you, they possessed store of wealth, and had many children, they possessed part of their substance, as did your predecessors; ye were plunged into impiety, as they were plunged, but the good works that they have done in this world, shall be to them unprofitable, and at the day of judgment they shall be in the number of the miserable. Have they not known the history of their predecessors, the history of the people of Noah, of Aad, of Temod, of Abraham, and the cities that were subverted.

The prophets preached to them the commandments of God, who did to them no injustice; they drew affliction on themselves, through the enormity of their crimes. The true believers mutually obey each other: they command to do what things are honest, prohibit to act what is not approved; they make their prayers at the time appointed, distribute tithes, obey God and his prophet; God shall remit to them their sins, he is omnipotent, and hath promised to them gardens, wherein flow many rivers, and an habitation full of content in Eden; he hath promised them his grace, which is the perfection of felicity. O prophet! fight against the infidels, fortify thyself against them, hell shall be their habitation; they shall swear by the name of God, that they have not traduced thee; nevertheless they have detracted and uttered words, full of impiety; they have denied to have been enriched through the grace of God, and of his prophet; if they turn, they shall do well; if they abandon the faith, God shall punish them in this world, and in the other, with grievous torments, and on earth they shall find no protector, there be of them, who have inclined to capitulate with God, and have said, if God doth good to us, we believe in him: when he did good to them, they were niggards and avaricious; they have erred and disobeyed his commandments, but he chastised them, because of their impiety, he hath imprinted it in their hearts until the day of judgment, for that they have disobeyed him, because they violated their promises, and by reason of their lies; know they not that God understandeth what they conceal in their hearts? and that he knoweth what is present, past, and future.

Be thou not astonished, neither at the abundance of their wealth, nor the number of their children, God will make use of them, to chastise them in this world, and will destroy them in their impiety.— When command was sent to them to believe in God, and fight with his prophet, the most powerful among them desired thee to excuse them, and said, leave us with them that continue in their houses, and desire to remain with the sick, the women, and little children: God hardened their hearts, and they shall never learn to trust. The prophet and believers that were with him, and fought, and employed their persons, and goods for the service of God, shall be blessed; he hath prepared for them gardens, where flow many rivers, with perfection of felicity.

Some of the Arabians came to excuse themselves of going to the war, and such as renounced God and the prophet, remained in their houses, but they shall resent grievous torments, because of their wickedness; the sick, the impotent, and those that want means to be present at the war, offend not God in abiding in their houses, provided they be faithful to his Divine Majesty and his prophet. The righteous are not obliged to do but what is in their power, God shall be to them gracious and merciful. Such as repaired to thee to fight and whom thou didst dismiss for want of courage, did not offend God; they returned to their houses with tears in their eyes, with discontent, to have wanted means to employ in the service of his Divine Majesty; the war is appointed to such as intreat thee to exempt them that are rich, and have wealth to subsist, they require leave to remain with their wives and children. God hath hardened their hearts, and they know it not; they shall come to excuse themselves, when thou shalt meet them; say unto them, excuse not yourselves, I do not believe you, God hath given us to understand your views, he and his prophet likewise hath rendered your good works vain and unprofitable; ye shall one day appear before him that knoweth what is past, present, and future; he shall cause you to remember what ever you have done, and shall punish you according to your demerits. They shall conjure you by the name of God, when you approach them, to depart from them: Depart from them, they are full of uncleanness, hell shall be their habitation, where they shall be tormented for their crimes.

They shall beseech you to love them; if you love them, know that God abhorreth them that disobey him, the Arabians, who observe not the precepts which God hath sent to his prophet: are ye more impious and ungrateful? God knoweth all things, and is most prudent. There be persons among the Arabians who account it lost money that they expend for the service of God, and protract their departure to retard yours, and make you to attend: the wheel of misery is upon them, God understandeth whatever they say, and knoweth all their actions; there are some among them who believe in God, and the day of judgment; they esteem that their expense for the service of God draweth them nigh to his Divine Majesty, and they invite the prophet to pray for them. God shall give them his mercy, he is gracious and merciful to them that obey him.— They that first arrived at Medina, the first of them that went out of Mecca, to depart from the wicked, such as were at the battle of Beder, and such as imitated them in well doing, shall enjoy the grace of God, he hath prepared for them gardens, wherein flow many rivers, with supreme felicity.

They that esteemed, that the temple built by unbelievers, to seduce the righteous, to distinguish the wicked from the good, and to observe such as had before fought against God, and against his prophet, in the temple of his Divine Majesty, swear that they desire to do well, and that their intention is most honest, but they are liars, and God shall be witness of their falsehood: make not thy prayers in that temple, make thy prayers in the temple founded on the fear of God, that is reasonable: there be persons in that temple who desire to be purified. God loveth such as have a clean soul; who is he that buildeth best, he that foundeth his building upon the fear of God, or he who layeth the foundation of his building upon the brink of a ditch of sand, which falleth and ruineth itself? They who esteem the temple built by unbelievers, to seduce the people, to be the temple of God, shall be with that temple, and with the infidels that built it, burnt in the fire of hell; God guideth not the unjust; their building shall only serve to torment them, God knoweth their designs, and is most wise: he purchaseth of true believers their souls and goods, and giveth them paradise; if they be slain, or if they slay when they shall fight for the faith, they shall have what he hath promised to them in the Old Testament, the gospel, and in the Alcoran: Who better satisfieth what he hath promised than God? Declare to them, that they have made a good purchase, they have gained the height of felicity. Such as are firm in the faith, who pray, honour, and worship God, who observe his commandments, and all true believers, shall enjoy the delights of paradise with all manner of content.

The prophet and true believers ought not to ask pardon of God for infidels, notwithstanding they be their parents, having had knowledge that they are damned, because of their infidelity. Abraham prayed not for his father, until he had professed one God alone; when he knew his father to be an enemy to God, he declared himself to be an enemy to his sin; he ceased praying for him, although he was exceedingly charitable and patient in his afflictions. God misleadeth not them that he hath put into the right way, he giveth them to understand what they ought to do, he knoweth them that deserve to be seduced and such as merit to be guided through the right way. The kingdom of heaven and earth is God's, he giveth life and death to whom he seeth good: Who except God shall protect you? he hath given his grace to the prophet, and to such as follow him in his affliction, although it wanted but a little, that the hearts of many of them inclined not to the party of the unbelievers, but he pardoned them.

O ye that believe in God! Fight against them that would cause you to be defiled in impiety, be valiant, and know that God is with them that have his fear before their eyes. When God caused to descend from heaven, any chapter of the Alcoran, some of them said, through disdain, that will increase the faith of this people. Certainly it augmenteth the faith of true believers, it rejoiceth them, and inflameth the wrath of his Divine Majesty upon infidels, who persist in their pollutions, and die in their wickedness. They know not that God trieth the good, once or twice a year, they will not be converted, it is lost time to preach to them. When God sent from heaven any chapter of the Alcoran, they beheld each other, and said, doth any one see us? They returned in their impiety, and God turned their hearts from the right way, for that they would not learn the truth. God hath sent you a prophet of your own nation, who, with passion, desireth to deliver you from your obstinacy, and is extremely affected to instruct you in the way of salvation, God is mild and pitiful towards true believers. If they abandon the faith, say unto them, God is my protector, there is but one sole God, I recommend myself to the will of his Divine Majesty, he is the Lord of the majestic throne.

God doth not aid the infidels that worship what can neither benefit nor hurt them, and say, their idols shall intercede for them; will you instruct God in any thing that he knoweth not, of what is in heaven or in earth? Praised be God, he hath no companion. Men were all of one religion before infidelity took place, and if God had not said that he would defer the punishment of the wicked until the day of judgment, he had destroyed them in this world, because of their impiety. They say, we will not believe in the prophet, if God make not some miracles to appear in him: Say unto them, God knoweth what shall be; expect, I will expect with you; when we gave them to taste of content after their affliction, they had subtilty upon our commandments: Say unto them, God is more subtle than you, his messengers shall write your subtilties; he it is that made men to travel upon the earth and sea; it is he that sendeth them a favourable wind to rejoice them in their ships; when tempest surpriseth them, they believe that the waves will overwhelm them, then they invoke God, with desire to embrace his law, and say, if God doth deliver us from this danger, we will believe in his unity, and return him thanks for his mercy; but being delivered from peril, persist in their wickedness.

O my people! You draw mischief on yourselves, you require nothing but the wealth of this world; you shall all appear before us to be judged according to your works; the life of the world is like to the rain, which we cause to descend from heaven, it causeth with mixture all sorts of herbage to spring forth, for the nourishment of men, and beasts.—When the earth is adorned with flowers, and enriched with its fruits, the inhabitants oftentimes believe they have the power to cause their production; then send we our chastisements day and night upon the earth, and render it as mown, and as if the day before it had brought no fruit. Thus do I discover mysteries to such as have knowledge to comprehend them. They beg their salvation of God; he saveth and putteth in the way of salvation whom it pleaseth him. He shall not cover the visage of them that have done good works, they shall appear without shame and dwell in paradise; where they shall remain eternally; and such as shall have done evil shall be punished after their demerits, they shall be covered with shame, and none shall be able to protect them, they shall be as if a great part of the obscurity of the night had covered their countenance, they shall be condemned to the fire of hell, where they shall dwell eternally. Think on the day, wherein we will assemble all the world, and will say to the infidels, hell shall be your habitation; where be the idols you adored: we have separated you from each other. Their idols shall say to them, you have not worshipped us, God is witness; was there any thing between us and you, that rendered us ignorant of your adoration? Are your idols able to conduct you into the right way? God guideth the people into the way of salvation. Who ought rather to be followed, he that guideth the people into the right way, or he that misleadeth them? What reason have ye to follow the evil way; the greatest part of them that follow but their own opinion, but their opinion is not conformable to the truth; God knoweth all their actions, there is no falsehood in the Alcoran, it confirmeth the ancient scriptures, and perspicuously explaineth them; there is no doubt, but it proceedeth from the Lord of the universe. They say Mahomet hath invented this book: Say unto them, come and bring any thing that resemblith it in doctrine and eloquence, and call the idols which ye adore, we shall see if you are sincere; on the contrary, they have talked of what they understood not, when they heard the exposition of the Alcoran. Thus did their predecessors; but consider what is the end of the unjust. There be among them, who believe in this book, and others that do not believe; thy Lord knoweth them that defile the earth; if they slander thee, say unto them, I will answer with my actions, and ye shall answer yours, ye are innocent of what I act, and I am innocent of what ye do.—There be persons among them that have inclination to hear thee, but art thou able to cause the deaf to hear? Should they not be deaf, they would learn nothing. Others there be, who look towards thee, but art thou able to guide the blind? Should they see clearly, they would not follow the right way; God doth no injustice to men, they do injury to themselves, through the enormity of their offences. I will cause them to rise again at the day of judgment, as if they had remained but an hour of the day in the grave; they shall know each other, and the wicked who have not believed in the resurrection shall be damned.

I will shew thee many of them whom I will chastise; I will cause thee to die before they are chastised, and they shall all appear before me to be judged; God is witness of their actions, he shall punish them according to their demerits: every nation of the world hath had a prophet sent from God, who hath judged with reason and without injustice, the differences that were amongst them touching religion: They have said, at what time shall the wrath of God appear? Say unto them, I of myself, can neither procure good nor evil, if God doth not permit it; every one hath his destiny, when the time of his destiny arriveth, they can neither retard nor advance it one hour. Have ye considered the punishment which God heretofore sent, by day, and by night against the wicked? When ye felt it, ye believed it, and fell into it headlong. It shall be said to the wicked at the day of judgment, taste eternal torment; shall you not be punished according to your demerits?

Afflict not thyself for the words of the impious, virtue proceedeth from God, he understandeth and knoweth all things; whatsoever is in heaven and in earth appertaineth to him. They who worship idols, follow but their opinions, and are liars; God hath created the night for repose, and the day for labour; such as hear his word, find therein marks of his omnipotency. They have said, do ye believe that God hath a son? Praised be God, he is most rich, and hath no need of any person, he possesseth whatsoever is in heaven and earth; you have no reason in what ye alledge; will you speak of God what ye know not? God doth not assist in this world them that blaspheme against him, he shall cause them to feel after their death great torments, because of their impiety: Instruct them in the history of Noah, how he spake to his people, and said, O people! if my abode with you, and the preaching of the commandments of God, be irksome to you, know that my support is in God; assemble your doctors, with your idols and conceal not what ye do: go whither ye will, ye shall find none to protect you, if ye contemn my instructions. I require not of you a reward for my pains; I desire to receive of none than God the omnipotent, and recommend myself to the will of his Divine Majesty.—They slandered Noah, then did we save him in the ark, and them that were with him; we prolonged their posterity on earth, and drowned the wicked; consider the end of such as heard the word of God, and contemned it. We sent to them other prophets after Noah, they made them to see miracles, and gave them most salutary instructions; but they did not believe in what they had no will before to believe.

If thou sayst to the wicked, that they shall rise again after their death, they will say, it is but witchcraft and soreery; if retard some time to chastise them, they say, there is no punishment for their crimes; but they shall not avoid it, in the day when it shall appear, and they shall feel the rigour of the pains which they contemn. If we confer riches, and health on the impious, and deprive them of them, they despair in their impiety; if we give them good after their evil, they say, misery hath forsaken them; they rejoice, and become arrogant. Such as are humble and patient in their afflictions, and do good works, shall obtain pardon of their sins, and a very great reward. Perhaps thou wilt forget to teach something of what I have inspired into thee, and be afflicted, because they say that what thou speakest shall bring thee no profit. Certainly, thou art sent only to reprove them of their sin, the Lord is omnipotent, and shall chastise them after their demerits. Assuredly, they will say, thou hast forged the Alcoran, and that it is of thy invention: Say unto them, come and bring with you ten chapters of your invention, like to the Alcoran in instruction and eloquence, and call to your aid the idols that ye adore; if they hear not your prayers, neither afford you succours, know then, that the Alcoran descended from heaven, through God's permission, and that there is but one sole God, will ye not trust in him? I will bestow the riches and honours of the earth, on many persons that affect them, and in the end they shall be confined in the fire of hell, and the good works that they shall do in this world, shall be unprofitable in the other. They who observe what God hath ordained, study the Alcoran, and believe that it proceedeth from his Divine Majesty, to teach the right way, and to obtain his mercy, as it was before the book of Moses. Such as shall believe in the Alcoran shall be happy; doubtless the fire of hell is prepared for the infidels who will not believe therein, but the greatest part of the world is incredulous; who is more impious than they who blaspheme against God? Such men shall not see his face; the angels shall say, at the day of judgment, behold them that have been impious, a curse is upon them, and upon the unjust that have misled the people from the right way, they were indeed infidels. Such men shall not escape the punishment of their crimes on earth, they shall find none that is able to protect them but God, he shall augment their pains, because they would not abandon their wickedness, neither receive the light of faith. Such as are miserable men, their idols shall not afford them succours, they doubtless shall be eternally damned: and such as shall believe in God, do good works, and be converted shall dwell for ever in paradise. The wicked are as deaf and blind, and the true believers are like those who have good sight and perfect hearing; shall they be in parallel with each other? Will ye never consider it? We sent Noah to reprove men for their sins, he said to them, worship but one God alone, otherwise I fear ye shall be chastised at the day of judgment.

The doctors of the infidels answered him, we see thee to be a man, like us, and such as follow thee are poor people, blind, and without counsel; we perceive not that thou hast any grace, that ought to prefer thee to us; contrarywise, we believe thee to be a liar. He said, Oh people! know ye not that God hath taught me what I preach to you, that he hath given me the grace of prophecy, and deprived you of it? Shall I exhort you to acknowledge his grace, seeing ye abhor him? Oh people! I require no recompence of you for my pains, God will reward me largely. I desire not to banish true believers from my company, they shall one day appear before their Lord, but I perceive that ye are ignorant. Oh people! who shall hinder God to punish me, if I abuse true believers? Will ye not consider it? I say not that I possess the treasures of God, I know not what shall be; I say not that I am an angel, I say not to them whom you contemn, that God shall enrich them, God knoweth what is in their souls; should I maintain such discourse, I should have great blame. They said, Oh Noah! we have a long time disputed together; if thou art sincere, let us see the pains which thou preachest to us; God, said he, when it shall please him, shall cause you to see them, you shall not escape them, my instructions shall be to you unprofitable; if God will prove you, he is our Lord, and you shall one day be assembled before him to be judged.

Pray to God evening and morning, and a part of the night; prayers blot out sins; it is the doctrine of preachers; be patient, and persevere, God will not deprive the righteous of their reward: He prohibited your predecessors and their posterity to defile the earth; nevertheless there were few among them that abstained; the unjust acted whatever pleased them, and were guilty before God: He shall not destroy Mecca, if the inhabitants thereof obey his commandments; and if it pleaseth him, the whole world should be of one religion, they to whom he giveth his grace, transgress not his will, his word shall be accomplished, and hell shall be filled with devils, and the wicked of all nations.

We have caused to descend from heaven the Alcoran, written in the Arabic tongue, peradventure ye will learn it. I deliver it unto thee in the Alcoran, one of the best things that I have inspired into thee. Thou wert before the coming thereof, in the number of the ignorant. Remember thou, that Joseph said to his father, my father, I saw in my dream eleven stars, the sun, and the moon, I saw them adoring me. My son, said his father, discover not thy dream to thy brothers, they will conspire against thee, the devil is an open enemy to men, thou shalt be elected of the Lord in this world, he shall teach thee the explication of dreams, he shall accomplish his grace upon thee, and upon the lineage of Jacob, as he did accomplish it upon thy fathers, Abraham, and Isaac; the Lord knoweth all things and is most wise.

The history of Joseph shall serve for example to posterity; remember thou how his brothers said, our father loveth our brother Joseph more than all of us together, he is in an exceeding great error, let us kill Joseph, and cast him into some secret place remote from us, his absence will render the face of our father more gentle towards us; after his death we will be converted. One of them said, you shall not do well to kill him, but cast him into the well, some passengers will take him, and carry him into an unknown country: They said to their father, wherefore dost thou not send Joseph into the fields with us? We will be very careful, he shall sport and recreate himself? I fear, said he, that you will neglect to preserve him; dost thou fear said they, that a wolf should devour him in our presence, and that we want strength to defend him? In the morning they led him with them, and cast him into a well. We inspired him to prophesy to them what would befall them for the mischief they acted, but they wanted knowledge to comprehend it; they in the evening returned to their father's house, with eyes full of dissembled tears, and said unto him, father, we sported, and ran who should run the best, Joseph remained with our baggage, a wolf came and devoured him; thou wilt not believe us although we speak the truth; then they shewed him his shirt which they sprinkled with blood; it is you that hath done it, said he, you shall answer it before God, he is my protector, and was patient, without lamenting.

There past that day, a caravan near to that well, who desiring to draw water to drink, let down a bucket, on which Joseph took hold to get out: they gave him clothes, led him away secretly, and sold him at a good rate for ready money; they would not kill him, in which they were honest men. He that brought him into Egypt, commanded his wife to have care of him, that he might one day be useful for their service, and be to them instead of a son. Thus did we establish Joseph in the country of Egypt, and taught him in the exposition of dreams. Thy Lord is omnipotent, but few men know him; when Joseph came to the age of manhood we gave him knowledge and prudence; thus do we reward the righteous. His master's wife became amorous of his beauty, she one day shut him into her chamber, and solicited him with love; God defend me, said he, to betray my master, and be unchaste; he was in the number of the righteous, and fled to the door; his mistress ran after him, and to stay him, tore his shirt through the back, she met her husband behind the door, to whom she said, what other thing doth he merit, who would dishonour thine house, than to be imprisoned and severely chastised? Lord, said Joseph, she solicited me; that infant which is in the cradle said, if Joseph's shirt be torn before, she hath spoken truth, and Joseph is a liar: if the shirt be rent behind, Joseph hath delivered the truth, and she a lie: then her husband beheld Joseph's shirt torn behind, and knew that it was extreme malice, and said to Joseph, take heed to thyself, and beware this act be not divulged: do thou, speaking to his wife, implore pardon for thy fault, thou art truly guilty.

The women of the city said among themselves, that the rich man's wife was amorous of his slave, and that she had solicited his love, and had erred from the right way, which she understanding, made them an exceeding fair feast, and caused Joseph to enter the parlour where they sat; while they carved their meat, they were so surprised, and entangled with Joseph's beauty, that they, instead of carving their meat, cut their finger. O God! said they, this is not a man, but an angel: then said she unto them, behold him whom I loved with so much passion:—She another time importuned him to satisfy her desire, and perceiving that he would not condescend to her will, menaced him with the prison, and to make him miserable. O God! said Joseph, I had rather be a prisoner than do what she desireth, deliver me from her malice, defend me from inclining to her lusts, and from being in the number of the wicked: his Lord heard his prayer, he understandeth and knoweth all things. This woman seeing Joseph's resolution, judged it requisite to imprison him for some time; he was put prisoner with two men, one of which told him that he had dreamed that he pressed grapes to make wine; the other said, that he dreamed that he carried bread upon his head, which the birds did eat, they demanded of him the interpretation of their dream, because he seemed to be a good man: he said to them, before you breakfast, I will interpret your dreams. I will first tell you what God hath taught me, and how I quit and abandon the law of infidels, and embrace the law of our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: we ought not to worship many gods; such as believe in the unity of God are endued with his grace, but few men give him thanks. O prisoners! who hath more power, idols, or one sole God, who is omnipotent? The gods that ye adore are but idols, whom ye and your fathers call by such a name, as seemeth good to you, ye have no reason to worship them; God doth not enjoin you this, he commanded you to worship him alone; this is the right way, but the greatest part of the world of this are ignorant. O prisoners! the one of you shall give wine to drink to his master, the other shall be hanged, the birds shall feed on his head, the interpretation that ye have required shall be accomplished. He besought him that should be saved, to remember him when he should be near to his master, but the devil caused him to lose the remembrance of Joseph, who remained prisoner the space of nine years.

How many signs be there in heaven and earth of the unity of God? yet the people believe not therein, and most of them adore idols; assuredly God will punish them at an unexpected hour, and in time which they know not. Say unto them, Behold the right way, I call to the way of salvation and light such as follow me. I return thanks to God, for that I am not in the number of unbelievers. We sent aforesome none but men to instruct the people; will not men consider what hath been the end of the wicked that were before them? Paradise is for them that are righteous, will ye not be converted? They caused the prophets to lose all hopes of their conversion, and believed them to be liars; but we protected them, and delivered from their malice such as seemed good to us, nothing shall exempt the wicked from the punishment of their pains; they shall serve for example to men of spirit. The Alcoran containeth no blasphemies, it confirmeth the ancient scriptures, and teacheth true believers the way of salvation.

These precepts are the precepts of the book sent to thee from the Lord; it is a thing most true, but few men incline to believe it. It is sent from God, who raised heaven without a prop, and without a column, that appeareth and sitteth on his throne, disposing all things. He causeth the sun and moon to move, until the day appointed; he disposeth all things at his will, and manifesteth to men the signs of his omnipotency. Peradventure you will believe in the resurrection of the flesh. He it is that hath extended the earth, raised the mountains, caused the rivers to flow, who created all sorts of animals, the male and female, and covereth the day with the obscurity of the night. These things are signs of his unity to such as consider them. He hath created many fields of divers sorts, and gardens filled with grapes, and many different fruits; he created date-trees, thick as groves and forests, and others that are scattered through the fields; some are moistened with waters, and others have a more pleasing taste.

Whatsoever is in heaven, and in the earth, the shadow of the morning, the obscurity of the evening, humble themselves before God, through force or affection. Say unto them, who is the Lord of heaven and earth, but God? who, except God shall protect you? Your idols can neither benefit, nor hurt you: Is the blind like unto him that seeth clearly? Is darkness like unto light? Shall they adore the creatures instead of the Creator? God hath created all things, and is omnipotent, he causeth rain to descend from heaven, and rivers covered with foam, to flow in the valleys. The gold, the silver, and metals, which ye melt to adorn and enrich yourselves, are like unto froth. Thus doth God teach what is profitable and what unprofitable: Froth suddenly vanisheth, and is of no utility to men; so falsehood vanisheth before truth. Thus doth God speak through a parable to them that obey him, and giveth them paradise. All the riches of the earth, and as much again, cannot ransom the infidels, they shall be eternally tormented in the fire of hell.—Who knoweth, that the truth contained in this book, was not sent to thee from God? He that doubteth is blind, men of spirit do not doubt. They who satisfy what they promise to God, who transgress not his commandments, who have his fear before their eyes, who apprehend the day of judgment, who are patient in their afflictions for love of his Divine Majesty, who make their prayers, at the time appointed, who give alms privately and publicly, and blot out their offences with good works, shall be blessed. They shall enter into the garden of Eden with their fathers, their wives and families; the angels shall visit them, salute them, and say, Behold the recompence of your perseverance, behold eternal grace. Such as shall swerve from their promise, and disobey the commandments of God, and pollute the earth, shall be accursed of God, and severely chastised; he giveth and depriveth of wealth, as seemeth good to him. The unbelievers rejoice in the riches of the earth; but those riches are of little value, if they consider them of the other world.

The chastisement of God is not far remote; desire it not before its time; praised be God, he hath no companion, he causeth the angels to descend, and sendeth his inspirations to whom it pleaseth him; preach his power and the pains of hell to unbelievers; there is no God but he, fear him, he created the earth and the heavens, he is more powerful than your idols, and created man of the mire of the earth, nevertheless he is obstinate in his pride; he created clean beasts for your use, you draw from them great emolument and advantage, to clothe and nourish yourselves; ye see their beauty when they feed, and when ye lead them to pasture, they bear the burthen, and whatsoever ye will send into cities, what ye cannot carry without them, but with exceeding great travail: God is gracious and merciful towards you; he created horses and mules, and asses to bear you; he created many glorious things of which you have not knowledge. He teacheth them the right way, who observe his commandments; had it pleased him, he had guided all into the way of his law. He sendeth you water from heaven to take away thirst, and causeth plants to bring forth, and trees that nourish your flocks: he maketh the olive trees to produce, the date-trees, vines, and all sorts of fruits. These things are arguments of his unity, to such as consider them: he created the night, the day, the sun, the moon, and the stars, that move at his pleasure, these things are signs of his omnipotency to them that are wise; he created whatsoever is on earth of divers colours, kinds, and species; he created the sea, which affordeth you fish, pearls, and other precious stones to adorn you; thou seest how the ships sail upon the waters, and divide the waves for the advantage of commerce, peradventure you will give God thanks for his favours.

He raised the mountains to make firm the earth, and to hinder it to move, he created the rivers and established ways to guide you; he made the stars to conduct you by night upon the sea, and the mountains to direct you in your way by day: Who but he could have created what he hath made? Will you never consider it? It is not in your power to keep account of your mercies, he is altogether gracious and merciful, and knoweth the secrets of your souls: The idols that ye adore can create nothing, but are things dead, without motion, and know not in what time the world shall rise again; your God is one sole God, such as believe not the end of the world, such as deny the unity, and boast of their false belief, are abhorred of his Divine Majesty; when they are interrogated concerning what God hath inspired into Mahomet, they answered, that he preached fables of antiquity, but they shall bear their burden at the day of judgment, who have seduced them from the right way, and have not known it. They that were before them were deceivers, God overthrew their habitations, the ruins fell upon them, and he chastised them when they least thought of it; he shall make them ashamed at the day of judgment, and shall demand of them where be the idols for which they disputed against true believers? Such as have knowledge of God's commandments assure that shame shall be upon the foreheads of infidels, and that the angels shall cause them to die, because of the enormity of their sins.

They will say at the hour of death, that they believe in God, and are penitent for their faults, God knoweth what they have done; he shall command them to enter into hell, where is the abode of the proud: He shall command them who have his fear before their eyes to enter the house of eternity, and the gardens of Eden, wherein flow many rivers, there shall they dwell eternally with the height of their desire. Shall the wicked continue in their sin, until the angels cause them to die, or until the day of judgment? Thus did their predecessors. God was not unjust towards them, they drew mischief on themselves through their iniquity; they were chastised, and felt their punishment which they had despised; they have said, had it so pleased God, our fathers and we had adored him: so spake their predecessors.

The Lord inspired the bee to dwell in the fields, to lodge in trees, in hives, and to eat of all sorts of fruits, it produceth honey of divers colours, that serveth for a remedy to the diseases of men; these things are signs of God's omnipotency to them that consider them. God hath created you, and shall cause you to die; there be persons among you that shall be full of ignominy in their life, to the end they may understand that God is omnipotent, conferreth benefits on some more than others. Slaves have no part in the faculties of their masters, neither are they associate with them, nevertheless they associate to God another God equal to him, and blaspheme against his grace. God hath created you men and women, hath given you children, and children to your children, he hath enriched you with the riches of the earth; will you after this grace believe in your idols, which are things inanimate, vain, and unprofitable? Will ye be ungrateful for the benefits of God? Will ye worship what can neither benefit nor hurt you? Believe not that there is another God, companion and associate with God; he knoweth what ye know not, he teacheth you a parable: A slave that is poor cannot give alms, and he who is rich giveth alms secretly and publicly, as he seeth good: are they both alike? Ought they to be put in parallel?

Praised be God; certainly the greatest part of men know not his graces, he teacheth you a parable: Behold! two men, the one was born deaf and dumb, and given in charge to his guardian, he knoweth not how to employ him, he is capable neither of doing nor speaking well, is he like to him that speaketh, that understandeth, teacheth men justice, that followeth the right way? Whatsoever is in heaven, or on earth, appertaineth to God; when he commandeth any thing, it is performed in the twinkling of an eye, yea, sooner; he is omnipotent: He it is that causeth you to come out of the womb of your mother, that giveth you hearing, sight, and sense; perhaps ye will return him thanks; see ye not the birds that fly in the air, who sustaineth them but God?—It is an evident sign of his omnipotency for the true believers. He hath given you houses to inhabit, and the skins and furs of beasts to cover you, he hath given you their hair, and wool, to furnish your houses, and enrich you; he created trees and clouds to overshadow you; made the mountains, and caves to cover you from rain; created garments to defend you from the heat of the sun, and the rigour of cold; he hath accomplished his grace upon you, peradventure you will resign yourselves to the will of his Divine Majesty, and profess his unity.

Zachary, the servant of thy Lord, remembered his grace, when he in secret prayed to his Lord, and said, Lord, my bones are become feeble, and mine head is white with age; Lord I was never rejected in my prayers, hear my petition, give me a son to succeed me, that may be mine heir, heir of the lineage of Jacob, and be pleasing to thee. O Zachary, I declare unto thee, that thou shalt have a son named John, no man hath yet been called by that name: He said, Lord, how shall I have a son, my wife is barren, and I am too old? It was answered him, the thing shall be as I have said unto thee, it is easy to thy Lord, who created thee. He said, Lord, give me some sign of the conception of my wife; he said to him, thou shalt not speak for three nights.—

Then went he out of his oratory, and made signs to the people to make their prayers evening and morning. O John! learn the scripture with affection; we from his infancy gave him knowledge, clemency, charity, piety, affection towards his father and mother, and not violence and disobedience. We blessed the day of his nativity, the day that he shall die, and the day that he shall rise again.

Remember thou what is written of Mary, she retired towards the east, into a place far remote from her kindred and took a veil to cover her, we sent her our spirit in form of a man; she was afraid, and said, God will preserve me from thee, if thou have his fear before thine eyes; he said, O Mary! I am the messenger of God thy Lord, who shall give thee a son, active and prudent: she answered, how shall I have a son without the touch of man? I desire not to be unchaste: he said, the thing shall be as I have told thee, it is facile to thy Lord; thy son shall be a token of the omnipotency of God, and of his special grace towards such as shall believe in his Divine Majesty; she became with child, and retired some time into a place remote from people, where she sustained the dolours of child-birth, at the foot of a date-tree, and said, why am I not dead? Wherefore am I not in the number of persons forgotten? The angel said to her, afflict not thyself; God hath placed a brook under thee, shake the foot of this palm, and the dates shall fall, gather them up, eat and drink, and wash thine eyes, say unto them that thou shalt meet, that thou fastest, and hast made a vow not to speak to any one until thy fast be accomplished.— Her parents met her while she bare her infant, and said unto her, O Mary! behold a strange thing; O sister of Aaron, thy father did not command thee to do evil, neither was thy mother unchaste: she made signs to her infant to answer them; they said, how shall the infant in the cradle speak: then her infant spake, and said, I am the servant of God, he hath taught me the scripture, hath made me a prophet, blessed me in all places, and commanded me to pray unto him; he hath recommended to me purity through the whole course of my life, and to honour my father and mother: he hath not made me violent or malicious; praised shall be the day of my birth, the day that I shall die, and the day of my resurrection.

Remember thou what is written of Enoch, he was a just man, and a prophet, and we took him up to an exceeding high place. God gave his grace to these men, among the prophets of the lineage of Adam; among them whom we caused to embark with Noah; among those of the lineage of Abraham and Israel; and among those that we assembled and guided into the right way. When the miracles of the merciful were related to them, they fell prostrate, and adored him with tears in their eyes; their posterity forsook their footsteps, abandoned the law, and followed their own appetites; but they shall be precipitated into hell, except such as shall be converted, and do good works, they shall enter into paradise, and no injustice shall be done to them, they shall enter into the garden of Eden; what the merciful God doth promises is infallible; they shall hear nothing in paradise that shall displease them, they shall hear the salutation of angels, and morning and evening shall have what they desire; such is the paradise that God giveth to his creatures that have his fear before their eyes. I descend not from heaven, but by the permission of the Lord, he is master of our actions in heaven and earth, and of whatsoever is between them, he hath not forgotten thee, worship him, and persevere in thy adoration, knowest thou any person that is named like him? Man saith, what shall I die and rise again? He considereth not that God hath created him of nothing; I will one day assemble the infidels and devils, I will cause them to appear at the gate of hell upon their knees, and will cast upon them all manner of misery, because they have increased their impiety towards their Lord. I know such as deserve to burn in hell, they shall be thrown thither headlong, this is a most just sentence pronounced by the Lord. I will save the righteous, and forbid infidels to fall on their knees before idols. When the unbelievers and many of the faithful heard my commandments preached, they said among themselves, that they were in a better way than their neighbour; how many have we destroyed before them in past ages, more rich than they, and hypocrites like unto them? Say unto them, God prolongeth the life of the erroneous, that they may know their errors, and learn the knowledge of the pains prepared for them; they shall understand who shall be the most miserable, and who shall have been most weak in their faith, and least affectionate to the service of his Divine Majesty; God shall increase their faith, who shall follow the right way; and such as be obedient to him shall enjoy his grace.

They say, certainly Mahomet hath dreamed what he speaketh, he hath invented it, and is a poet, we will not believe him, unless he shew some miracle, as did the prophets that were before him: we have laid waste many cities, because their inhabitants were incredulous; we sent before thee but men who were inspired of us; enquire of them, to whom heretofore was given the knowledge of the written law, if ye know it not. They were men that did eat and drink, and were mortal; we effected what we promised to them, we preserved them with such as believed, and destroyed the incredulous; we have sent you a book to instruct you, will ye understand it? How many infidel cities have we made desolate?

How many new people have we established in their place? When they felt our punishment, they fled; fly not, and return to what hath delighted you, return into your houses, peradventure ye will yet covet the riches of the earth: They said, misery is upon us, we are to blame: Thus did they talk, until they were destroyed. We have not created heaven and earth, and whatsoever is between them to sport with; had it been our will that they should have scoffed on earth they should scoff likewise in heaven. On the contrary, I oppose the truth to falsehood, to confound it, and in effect it doth confound it.— Misery shall be upon you, because of your blasphemies: whatsoever is in heaven and earth, is God's; the angels are not ashamed to worship him, they praise him day and night, and exalt his glory without blasphemy. The infidels worship gods made of earth; have they power to create any thing: Were there in heaven and in earth another God, they would not accord; praised be God, Lord of the universe; what the infidels relate is untrue. He asketh no counsel when he will do any thing, as do men; will they worship any other God but him? Say unto them, produce your arguments, behold what we have to speak unto you, behold our reasons, and those of our predecessors; Certainly, the greatest part of them are ignorant of the truth, and go astray. We inspired into all the prophets which we sent, that there was but one God that ought to be worshipped. They said, believe ye that the angels are the sons of God? Praised be God; on the contrary, they are his creatures, he loveth them, they speak not but after him, and obey what he commandeth them, he knoweth all their actions past, and future, they pray for no man but through his permission, and fear to displease him. Who among them will say, I am God, instead of God? He shall be cast headlong into the fire of hell; thus do I treat unbelievers. Know they not that the heavens and the earth were shut up? We opened them, and gave life to every thing, through the rain which we made to descend; will they not believe in my unity? We created the mountains to hinder the earth to move, we made therein ways large and spacious for our creatures, we covered it with the heaven, and have exempted it from falling, nevertheless they despise our commandment. There are those who dispute of the Deity with ignorance, and follow the will of the devil, voluntary and obstinate: It is written, he shall seduce them that obey him, and shall conduct them into kell. O ye people! If ye doubt the resurrection, consider how we created you of the dust of the earth; with a little water sprinkled upon the dust, with congealed blood, and a little flesh entirely, and not entirely formed. I form in the wombs of women what seemeth good to me, at the time appointed. I cause you to come forth children, then I give you life, and make you to arrive to the age of virility; some die young, and others live to extremity of age, to the end they may learn to live well. Consider the earth, dry, dead, and barren, when we shall cause rain to fall, it shall change the face, shall produce and nourish its fruits of all sorts, fair and pleasing: Because God is truth itself, he raiseth again the dead, and is omnipotent. There is no doubt but the day of judgment approacheth, and that God will cause the dead to rise again. There be men that dispute of God without knowledge, without reason, without authority, and go astray from the way of his law; they shall be full of ignominy and shame in this world, and shall feel in the other, the pains of hell. God doth no injustice to his people. There be who adore him with scruple, if good befall them, they persevere to adore him; if evil, they return to their impiety, and lose the riches of earth, and the riches of heaven: These two losses are exceeding great, they invoke idols instead of God; they invoke what can neither benefit, nor hurt them; such prayers are by ways, far remote from the commandments of God; they worship that which doth rather mischief, than advantage them.

Certainly God shall make the true believers, that do good works, to enter into gardens wherein flow many rivers; he doth what seemeth good to him. He that is angry, that God giveth succour and protection to Mahomet in this world, and in the other, let him tie a cord to the beam of his house, and hang himself; he shall see if his choler will be allayed. God hath sent his Alcoran, as heretofore he sent his other scriptures; it containeth his commandments, clear and intelligible; it guideth into the right way whom it pleaseth him: He at the day of judgment shall judge the differences that are between the faithful and infidels; between the Samaritans, the Christians, and idolators; he is omniscient. Seest thou not that all that is in heaven, and on earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, the mountains, trees, and beasts, adore him? Many worship him with zeal, but many likewise merit to be punished.

None shall esteem him whom God shall despise; he doth as seemeth good to him. These two contrary parties, the believers and the infidels, have disputed of the Dicty; but the infidels shall be encompassed with flames of hell, they shall have shirts of fire, boiling water shall flow in upon their heads; the fire shall burn what is in their bellies, and shall roast their skin, they shall be beaten with clubs of iron; when they think to go out of this fire, they shall enter further into it, and be eternally tormented. God shall cause the true-believers, that have done good works, to go into gardens, wherein flow many rivers; they shall be adorned with bracelets of gold, and pearls; they shall be clothed with silk, and enjoy eternal felicity, because they have professed his unity; and the infidels shall suffer great torments, for that they have hindered the people to embrace the faith, and visit the temple of Mecca, which God hath established to be therein adored by all the world: He that shall be solicited to visit it, and shall enter it, with design to return to his impiety, shall be severely punished.

Depart from the pollution of idols, beware of bearing false witness, and be obedient to God. He that saith, God hath a companion, is like to him that fell headlong from heaven, whom the birds devoured, and the wind cast into a remote place, full of miseries. He that shall reverence the signs of the power of God, will not doubt of his law, and shall be rewarded for his good works at the time appointed, if he visit the old temple of Mecca. We have given to all nations of the world a law to offer their sacrifices, and to return thanks to their Lord for having given them advantage above all sorts of beasts. Your God is one God, obey his commandments, proclaim a great reward to them that are obedient to him, to them that tremble with fear when they hear mention of his name, that are patient in their adversity, that pray at the time appointed, and dispense in alms some part of the wealth that we have given them. We have created the female camel for a sign of our unity, she shall be profitable to you in this world. Remember to pronounce the name of God when ye shall sacrifice her, standing on her feet, when she shall fall dead on the ground, eat of her flesh, if it like you, and give to eat to such as shall require it. We have made her subject to you; peradventure you will be thankful to me for this grace. God promoteth before him, neither the flesh of this beast, nor the blood, but only the good works that ye perform.—He hath thus subjected it, that ye may exalt it, and give him thanks for having guided you into the right way. Proclaim to the righteous, that God will remove far from them the malice of the wicked; he abhorreth traitors, and the ungrateful. Declare to such as fight against infidels, to repair the injury they have done them; that God is sufficiently powerful to protect them. When they were driven from their houses without reason; they said, God is our Lord. Had not God stirred up the people against each other, the convents of the religious, the churches of the Christians, the synagogues of the Jews, and the temples of the believers, had been ruined, through the multitude of the wicked and their malice. The name of God is exalted in the temple of believers, and therein is his law defended and protected.

O ye that are true believers, follow not the footsteps of the devil, he will enjoin you to vice and sin; had not God gratified you with his mercy, not any among you should have been purged from that imposture; but God purified whom he seeth good, he heareth all, and knoweth all your intentions.—The most rich and powerful among you have not sworn to do no good to their parents, the poor, or to them that fight for the law of God, nevertheless they do it not to them, and flee them; desire they not that God should pardon them? He is neither gentle nor pitiful but towards true believers. They that accuse of immodesty, women chaste, innocent, and faithful, shall be accursed in this world, and shall suffer great torments at the day, when their tongues, their hands, and their feet, shall testify against them; shall God pay to them what shall be due unto them without injustice? and they shall know that God is truth itself.

The wicked women shall speak as the wicked men, and the wicked men as the wicked women:—The good women shall speak as the good men, and the good men as the good women: the good are innocent of the imposture of the wicked, they shall enjoy the grace of God, and the treasures of paradise. O ye that are true believers! enter not into another's house without permission, if ye salute them that dwell there, ye shall do well; peradventure ye will be mindful, if ye find none of the house enter not without permission, if they speak to you to return, ye shall return, it is better than to stay at the door. God beholdeth all that ye do, ye shall not offend God to enter into houses inhabited, if ye have affairs there, God knoweth all your intentions.

Speak unto the true believers, that they contain their sight, that they be chaste, that they do good, and that God knows all their actions. Speak unto the true believing women, that they retain their sight, and that they be chaste, that they suffer nothing of their beauty to be seen, but what ought to be seen, that they cover their bosom and their visage, that they permit them not to be seen but by their husbands, their children, the children of their husbands, their brothers, their nephews, their sisters, their women, the daughters, maid servants, and slaves by their domestics, that are not capable of marriage, by children that regard not the beauty of women, and that they move not their feet, to shew they are well shod. Implore pardon of God, peradventure ye will be hippy; many maidens of your own religion, the daughters of the righteous, or your slaves, if they be poor, God shall enrich them with his grace, he is most liberal and omniscient. Such as have not means to marry, shall live chastely until God hath given them means: Such as have desired to marry their slaves, shall have power to pass a contract of marriage, if they know them to be wise, and shall give part of the wealth that God hath bestowed on them, despise not your wives that are chaste, to commit whoredom; if ye desire good in this world, if ye contemn them, God shall be to them propitious and merciful; we have sent to you these precepts, clear and intelligible, like to them that were taught your predecessors, to be preached to the righteous: God illuminateth the heaven and the earth, as the lamp that is in the lanthorn of chrysal, fed with oil of the blessed olive.

Those that believe not in the resurrection, have said, the angels are not descended from heaven, we have not seen God, they are become proud, and are fallen into an exceeding great error, but the wicked shall one day be without comfort, when they see the angel, they shall cry, help, help! We will set before thine eyes all the sins that they have committed, the good works which they shall think to have done, shall be like to dust, which the wind carrieth away, and the blessed shall enjoy a most certain good, they shall hear of nothing but what concerneth them. When the heaven and the air shall divide themselves, and the angels shall descend, then shall the truth appear, and the merciful shall reign; that day shall be tedious to infidels, they shall bite their fingers, and say, would to God I had followed the prophet and his people! O misery! Would to God I had not contracted amity with such an infidel, he seduced me from the right way, he hindered me to believe in the Alcoran which God sent, certainly the devil hath tempted men. Then shall the prophet say, Lord, such as have followed me, have obeyed what is written in the Alcoran, and infidels have rejected it, we have appointed an enemy among the wicked, to every prophet of them that were before thee, but it sufficeth thee, that God guideth thee. The infidels have demanded, if the Alcoran was sent all at once; I have so done to confirm the truth in thy heart, I have sent it piece by piece, they shall not shew thee any thing like unto it; I have instructed thee in the truth, clear and intelligible; the incredulous shall be confined in the fire of hell, and be most miserable. Certainly we gave Moses the book of the law, we sent with him his brother Aaron to assist him, and said unto him, Go both of you, and preach unto infidels, we will destroy them unless they be converted. Such as believe in God, and do good works, shall enjoy the delights of paradise, and the wicked shall be chastised according to their demerits. Praise God, pray unto him evening and morning, praise is due to him in heaven and earth; pray unto him before the sun set, and at the hour of noon: He maketh the dead to come out of the living, and the living out of the dead; he causeth the barren earth to revive, and grow green after its death; in like manner will he cause you to arise again, and come out of your sepulchres; it is a sign of his omnipotency to have created you of earth, to have given you flesh and bones, and to have created the woman of the rib of the man, to dwell with him; he hath commanded you to love mutually, and to exercise charity among you, these things are signs of his omnipotency to them that consider his grace. The creation of heaven and earth, the diversity of tongues, the difference of your visages, and of your colour, the night created for repose, and the day for travel, the lightning that terrifieth the people, and which through rain causeth the earth again to flourish, are signs of his omnipotency: It is a token of his omnipotency to sustain the heaven and the earth; ye shall come out of your sepulchres when he shall call you; whatsoever is in heaven and earth obey him; he causeth men to die, and to rise again; he alone is God in heaven and earth, is omnipotent, and knoweth all things. He speaketh to you in a parable, drawn from yourselves, your slaves; are they your companions? Do they equally partake with you in the goods which God hath given you? How then will ye say, that God hath a companion equal to him? Thus do I unfold his mysteries to persons that have not knowledge to comprehend them; certainly, the wicked have followed their appetites with ignorance; who shall guide him whom God shall cause to err? He shall find no protector; embrace the law of salvation, God hath established it, that men may observe it; it admitteth no alteration, but the greatest part of the world are ignorant of it: Fear God, make your prayers at the time appointed; be not like to them that say, God hath a companion; neither like to them that are at present in the number of heretics, and were before as ye are; every sect is pleased in his opinions, when any evil befalleth them that call upon God, and are converted: Nevertheless some of them return to their adoltry; after the reception of his grace, they are ungrateful, they shall a while be tolerated, and in the end they shall, too late, understand their error: Have we taught them reason and arguments, that prove that I have a companion?—The people rejoiced when we enlarged to them our graces; and became desperate when evil befel them; see they not that I give, and take away wealth, as to me seemeth good. This is the token of my unity to such as obey my commandments.

Give to your neighbour what appertaineth to him, and particularly to the poor, and true believers, if ye desire to see the face of God; such as shall do it, shall be blessed. The money which ye put to usury increaseth in the hands of men, God shall not suffer it to prosper; the alms which ye give shall make you to see the face of his Divine Majesty, and shall be doubly restored to you. God hath created you, he enricheth you, and causeth you to die and rise again; can your idols do as much? Praised be God, he hath no companion; disorder appeareth in the earth, and in the sea, because of the iniquities of men: peradventure they will be converted, when they shall feel punishment of their crimes: Say unto them, go throughout the earth, and consider the end of your predecessors, the greatest part of them were idolators; embrace the true law before the day cometh when none shall be heard; that day shall the wicked be separated from the good, the impious shall give an account of their impiety, and such as shall live well, shall enjoy the joys of paradise, the grace of God shall be their recompense; God abhorreth idolaters. It is a sign of his omnipotency; he sends the winds to bring you rain, and make you taste the fruits of his grace; the ship runneth upon the water through his permission, for the advantage of your commerce; will ye not be thankful to him for his benefits?

There be ignorant persons that dispute of the Deity without reason; when it is said unto them, do what God hath appointed, they answer, we will do what we saw done by our fathers. They consider not that the devil calleth them and their fathers to the pains of hell. He that obeyeth God, and doth good works, fasteneth him to the strongest knot, and will have a care of him at the hour of his end. The impiety of the wicked ought not to afflict thee, they shall be one day assembled in our presence, to be chastised; I will shew them all that they have done, I know what is in the hearts of men, I will prolong a while their punishment upon earth, and precipitate them in the other world, into the fire of hell. Hast thou not demanded of them, who created heaven and earth? They said, it is God; say unto them, therefore, praised be God; nevertheless, the greatest part of them are ignorant. Whatsoever is in heaven and earth is God's, he hath no want of the world, praise is due unto him in all that he doth; if all the trees of the world were pens; and the sea ink, they could not comprehend the effect of his omnipotency, he is omnipotent, and knoweth all things.

From this abstract of the Alcoran it will appear, that in many respects the Mahometans have been grossly misrepresented, and indeed this has been already taken notice of by lady Wortley Montague, Picart, and several others. That it is a jumble of morality and heresy, cannot be doubted, and, as respecting the sacred scriptures, we find truth and falsehood mixed together, so it is not possible it should be the work of one man; nay, there must have been many concerned in it, and those of opposite sentiments. The errors relating to the Old Testament are the traditions of the Arabians; for as they were descended from Abraham, by Ishmael his son, so they preserved many traditions, all which we find in the Alcoran; those parts which insist so much on the unity of God, seem to have been composed by Jews, who have always accused the Christians of worshipping three gods. The last part which falsifies the history of the New Testament, must have been written by the Nestorians, and some other Christian heretics.

The last observation to be made here is, that in all the accounts we have of the state of established religions, we find morality enjoined even in such as have the most ridiculous ceremonies; the reason is plain, because God has implanted so much fear in the hearts of men, that they are ashamed of setting up a complete system of immortality. The worst sort of people we read of were the Adamites, in the third century of Christianity, but as Mr. Bayle says, they were only a handful and soon dwindled away.

Thus it is, with great caution we should read accounts of the Turks by those travellers who have had but few, if any, opportunities of seeing them. They are not fond of writing, consequently they never publish any thing concerning their religious ceremonies. Few are permitted to go into their churches or mosques, but notwithstanding all their caution, yet they sometimes will permit persons of rank. Lady W. Montague, was in one of them, and Mr. Hanway held a conference with one of their priests. La Motte is very particular in describing their mosques, and Picart had the best information communicated to him, so that we have sufficient materials to furnish a more full account of this religion than has hitherto been published, and therefore we shall proceed to their ceremonies.

Circumcision comes first to be considered, it being the first ceremony of a religious nature. They seldom circumcise their children till they are six or seven years old, but this any parents may dispense with, for they sometimes baptize them at four years old, and sometimes not till nine or ten.

The day of circumcision is a day of joy for all the relations of the child. He is carried on horseback, with kettle-drums and tabors sounding, dressed in his best attire, followed by his school companions, who pronounce aloud some passages of the Alcoran. He is taken to the mosque, where he is circumcised, by cutting off part of the skin from the fore parts of the privy members.

When a grown person is become a convert, he is led out through the town on horseback, carrying in his left hand a dart with the point turned towards him, signifying that he will be put to death if ever he apostatizes from his new religion. However, these ceremonies differ in different parts; for at Algiers, all the renegado Greeks are circumcised and led about the town in the midst of a guard of barbarians with drawn scimitars, to let them know they are to be put in pain if they shew the least inclination to return to Christianity. Boys have a name given them on the day of circumcision, but this custom is like the other, subject to some variations. In Persia, the father gives what name he pleases to his child as soon as born, holding him in his arms and presenting him to God, after he puts salt in his mouth, and gives a name with a blessing. When a child dies before circumcision, they break the fore-finger before they are buried, and this they imagine makes an atonement to God for the want of the ceremony. Many of the Turks differ in their sentiments concerning the efficacy of circumcision, some looking upon it as not absolutely necessary to salvation, while others entertain as strong notions of its necessity, as the Roman Catholics do of baptism. Others think this ceremony confers grace and piety, and that God will not hear the prayers of one that is not circumcised; and yet, for all these differences in opinion, they seldom dispute concerning religion, which is much to their honour.

The Mahometans frequently adopt children, which custom is in some respects almost universal over the east. When the children of princes, and great lords are born, the moment of their birth is kept very secret, to avoid charms and witchcraft, and to prevent the astrologers from casting their nativity, and foretelling bad events. Nay, so blinded are they with this senseless notion, that although they know that the astrologers cannot tell one circumstance relating to themselves, yet they believe they have power over others. But the Mahometans are not the only people who are biased by frivolous fears and ill-grounded hopes. When a child is adopted, his nominal father takes off his own shirt and makes the boy pass through it, and this they call Akhrat.

Whether their children are their own or only adopted ones, they are at great pains in bringing them up, so as to prevent all manner of deformity; for they have a notion that a pure soul will not lodge in a deformed body. This is the reason so few people have any deformities in their bodies in Turkey, and their conduct in particular, ought to be attended to by all those among us, who have the care of bringing up children.

Polygamy, or the having a great number of wives, being one part of the Mahometan religion, it is not improper to observe, that in all those countries where it prevails, the people are far less numerous than where one man has but one wife. The practice of polygamy diverts the minds of the parents from doing that duty they owe to their children. It creates jealousies among the women, and if the husband is not of a tyrannical nature, he must be unhappy in his mind. To this may be added, that the favourite

Their marriage ceremonies are in high esteem amongst them, but it is not celebrated by a priest, nor considered as an act of religion. They look upon it in a civil light, which is the case in many eastern nations. The parties go before the Cadi, or civil judge, and the man declares that he has bound himself to take the woman. This being done, the Cadi repeats an exhortation to them and their relations, concerning the marriage state. The husband instead of receiving a marriage portion with the bride, gives her one, and this he is obliged to do before the judge. The wife promises to be obedient to her husband, and then she is carried home in a sedan, under a canopy, accompanied with relations, friends, slaves, and music. It is reckoned among the women, that they should be admitted at least once in the week to their husband's bed, and on failure of this, they may demand it on Thursday in the week following, and even go to law about it with their husbands. If any are so bashful as to neglect this public way of obtaining justice, they endeavour to find out some other way of recompensing that loss.—When boys or girls are set free from tuition, they are taken before the judge, who asks, "Whether the devil has jumped upon his body." To which he replies, "More than once." The reason is, they believe that the devil jumped upon our first parents in the form of a serpent, and first created in them carnal desires.

The Mahometans are allowed to lay with their female slaves, and here it must be observed, that they may marry women of any religion, the tenets of which are written. All the children, whether by wives or slaves, equally inherit their father's substance, if by will or otherwise the father has made them free, for want of which the children of slaves, remain as such to the eldest son of the family.

They never marry their relations, unless they are removed eight degrees, or generations. In order to prevent divorces as much as possible, the husband is not to take the woman again. When a husband accuses his wife of adultery, and does not prove it, he is to be bastinadoed. But notwithstanding this strictness, yet there is a way to get over it. Thus when there is neither proof nor witnesses, the husband swears five times what he alleges is true, and to the last oath adds a curse, wishing he may be cursed by God and man if he lies. On the other hand, the woman is believed if she swears as often, and adds to the last oath a prayer, that God would destroy her if her husband speaks the truth. This method is of a horrid nature, for it opens a large field for gross perjury, for both cannot be right.—If the adultery is fully proved, the husband may put her to death, which is done by sewing her up in a sack full of stones; but they are so cautious in their amours, that they are seldom detected. As for the adulterer, he is condemned to ride on an ass with his face to the tail, having on his head a crown of the guts of bullocks, and a neckcloth of the same, and at last is bastinated on the soles of his feet, and on the loins. If a husband suspects his wife, and she consents to part from him, he generally sends her away peaceably, and indeed it very seldom happens that any of them are put to death.

When the grand seignor intends to marry his daughters to some of his men, this is done from motives of jealousy, which the emperor conceives of their power, and is frequently a prelude to their ruin. Thus when he is apprehensive of the too great power of a bashaw, he makes him marry one of his sisters or daughters, under pretence of doing him more honour; but instead of being greater, he becomes the most abject slave to the pride and tyranny of a woman, who treats him like a footman, yet he dares not reprove, nor seem to undervalue this token of his master. He must devote himself wholly to her, and renounce all other wives and slaves, who might be the means of leading off his affections.— If he has already a sweet-tempered wife, and children by her, he is obliged to turn them out of his house, and every person who might be displeasing to his sultana, yet unknown to him.

If before the wedding she sends to ask him for money, jewels, rich furs, or any thing else, he sends them as presents with cheerfulness, or at least he must seem to do so. He is likewise obliged to settle upon her what dowry the match-makers think proper to appoint. This dowry being stipulated before a judge, he is led by two black eunuchs to the sultana's apartment, where he thanks her for the honour conferred upon him; when he enters the room she hastily draws a dagger, and haughtily demands who made him so bold as to approach her. He answers with the most profound respect, and shews her the grand seignor's orders for the wedding. She then rises up, receives him mildly, and allows him to entertain her with more familiarity.— Then an eunuch takes his slippers, and sets them at the door, as a token that he has met with a favourable reception.

A few minutes after the bashaw makes a low bow down to the ground, and drawing back, makes a speech to testify how happy he thinks himself for the honour she intends to do him. This being over, he stands silent in an humble posture, with his hands across his breast, till she orders him to bring her some water. He obeys readily, and kneeling before her, presents her with a cup, prepared for the purpose. She then raises a red veil, embroidered with gold and silver flowers, which had covered her face, and drinks. Her women immediately bring in a low table, on which are set a couple of roasted pigeons, and some candied sugar on a plate. The gallant desires her to eat, which she refuses, till he has made her some rich presents.

This he complies with, overcomes her modesty, and sitting down to the table, she graciously receives from his hand the leg of a pigeon, and having eat some, she puts into his mouth a piece of sugar, rises up, and returns back to her place. All the company withdraw, and leave the bashaw and the sultana alone for the space of an hour, that he may converse freely with her. Then his friends come with instruments of music playing, and invites him to the anti-chamber, where he spends the night with them, in drinking and diversions. The sultana does the same in her room with the ladies.

At break of day, the princess being tired, pretends to be sick, and goes to lay herself down in bed, which is richly made, being embroidered with gold, and perfumed, and every way fit for the ceremony. One of the eunuchs gives notice to the husband by a sign, and introduces him without noise to the bed-chamber. He puts off his upper garment, kneels for some time at the foot of the bed, and the ceremony ends.

The mourning for the dead begins with such cries and lamentations made by the women, as publish the death to the most distant neighbours. In Africa, besides these customary cries and howlings, they daub their faces with soot and oil, in which much blacking has been steeped, then thirty or forty women with dishevelled hair, and some of them tearing and scratching their flesh with their nails, or with needles, enter upon the necessary preliminaries of a funeral. The custom of making loud cries and lamentations for departed friends, of rolling in the dust, or covering one's self with ashes, is of great antiquity in the east, and not much altered among the inhabitants of those countries, from what it was in the times of the patriarchs. A long black cloak, with black clothes, are the outward tokens of the sorrow of a child, a brother, a husband, or a wife, or for the death of parents.

Widows mourn longer for their husbands, and this is complied with whether the sorrow be real or feigned, in the same manner as we frequently see those whom we meet in a church, on some solemn occasion, seemingly praying and repenting to all outward appearance, with much contrition and marks of piety, lest they should be considered as Atheists. We are told by Thevenot, that those Turkish women give over crying, when there are no witnesses of their tears, being hired for that purpose: which is the same as we have already taken notice of among the Greeks. The mourning lasts several days, and if he was a person of rank, it is renewed annually for several years together.

In order to prepare for the burial, the corpse is washed and shaved; frankincense is burnt about it, to expel the devil, and other evil spirits, which, as the Mahometans and several other people believe, rove about and hover over the dead, as much and as frequently as about the living. This part of the ceremony being over, the body is put into a burial dress without seams, that it may, as they pretend, kneel with less difficulty, when it is to be examined in the grave; for they believe, that when it is interred, an angel is sent to examine it.

The coffin is covered with a pall, preceded by several Imams, of whom more afterwards, who pray, and are followed by the relations and friends of the deceased, with the women who lament and shed tears. At the grave, the corpse is taken out of the coffin and put into the ground, and the women stay there to cry. They make a difference between the graves of the Persian Mahometans, and those in Turkey; for in Persia, a board is put over it slanting, so that one end of it touches the bottom of the grave, and the other leans against the top of it.—The Turks place a stone at the head of the corpse, for the convenience of the angels, who are to examine the deceased, and this civility they believe, will make them more indulgent.

The palls are different, and the coffins variously adorned, according to the state and condition of the deceased, to distinguish him as a priest, a soldier, rich, or poor. All their burial places are near the roads, to put travellers in mind to offer up their prayers for the dead, for which they will obtain a blessing. For this reason, those who build a bridge, or some other public structure, from motives of charity, are also buried in or near them. So many large stones are set up in some of their burying places, that towns might be built of them. After the funeral, the friends of the deceased come several days successively to pray at the tomb, beseeching God to rescue him from the torments of the black angels; and calling the dead by his name, say unto him, "Fear not, but answer them boldly." On the Friday following, which is the sabbath of the Mahometans, victuals and drink are set down at the grave, and any person going past, may partake of them. This custom of setting down victuals at the graves is very ancient, for we meet with many instances of it in scripture.

The Persian Mahometans have strange notions, namely, that the angel who presides at the birth of children, mixes some earth with the matter of which they are formed, and introduces it into the mother's womb at the instant of conception; from whence they conclude, that every one must endeavour to die in the same place from whence the angel took that earth. But they have a more rational custom founded on principles of humanity, which is, that whoever meets a funeral procession must join the company till the corpse is interred. The same Persian Mahometans have retained in their mournings, the ancient ceremony of tearing their clothes to testify their grief; and what is much more commendable, they give alms seven days together. But, for the satisfaction of the reader, we shall point out the differences between the Persian and Turkish Mahometans in their funerals, for the Mahometans have been for many years divided into two parties. Thus the Turks say there is only one prophet, whereas the Persians admit of two. Ali, the son-in-law of Mahomet, is considered by the Persians as a great prophet, and the friend of God; for when the confess their faith, they say, "There is but one God, Mahomet is his prophet, and Ali is his friend."—On the other hand, the Turks say, "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his friend." Mr. Hanway heard criminals in Persia repeat the first of these confessions at the place of execution, and they repeated no more.

At the first signs of an approaching death, lamps are lighted up, and set on the terrace, or flat roof of the house, and this puts the neighbours in mind to pray for the sick person. Imams, who in Persia, are called mollas, or priests, are sent for; they preach repentance to him, mentioning such sins as they imagine he has been guilty of. To each sin mentioned, he answers I repent, and when he has lost his speech, the Alcoran is read by his bedside, till he gives up the ghost. This is soon testified to the whole neighbourhood, by excessive outcries and lamentations. The relations and other friends, rend their clothes from the neck to the girdle, tear off their hair, scratch their faces, strike their breasts, and shew all the signs of sorrow and despair, but the women exceed all bounds of moderation in their grief, with a mixture of long complaints, and affecting speeches, addressed to the deceased.

As soon as the person's breath is departed, a messenger is sent to inform the cadi, or judge, that such a person is dead. The message is delivered to the judge's porter, who says to the messenger, "May your head be sound, and goes to the judge to get him a sealed piece of paper, by which he gets leave to have the body washed. The paper costs nothing, but the porter who delivers it has some perquisite, more or less, according to the rank and abilities of those who desire it. This paper is carried to the mandalour, or body-washer, which is an office he alone can enjoy, nor can any perform it but himself, or some others appointed by him. The design is to know exactly what number of persons have died, and of what diseases, which office is necessary in all countries, lest any should be taken off in a violent manner, and the delinquent not brought to justice.

The mandalour sends men to wash the corpse of men, and women to wash the women; the washer takes off the clothes from the corpse, and receives them as his perquisites, for no one can touch a dead body, without being defiled. In every town there are washing places, situated in the most distant parts of it. Ispahan, for instance, being divided into two parts, has two mandalours, and amongst their washing places is one very large, in a back court of the old mosque, twenty steps under ground. This ceremony of washing in those places is only for the poor, for the rich are washed at home, in a bason, covered with a tent, lest any one should see the corpse. When it is washed, all the openings are carefully stopped up with cotton, to keep the noxious vapours within it.

This being done, the body is put into a new linen cloth, on which those who can afford it cause some passages of the Alcoran to be written. In the reign of Abbas II. Sarontaky, the grand vizer, was murdered, and the linen wrapped round his corpse had the whole of the Alcoran wrote upon it with gum. But to return to the common burials.

The body being washed, is placed in a remote part of the house, and if it is to be carried to a distant burying ground, they put it in a wooden coffin filled with salt, lime, and perfumes, to preserve it. No other embalming is used in the east, nor do they take it out, for that practise seems to them unclean and barbarous. Persia being a hot, dry country, the bodies are soon put into their coffins, otherwise it would never be possible to do it, because they swell immoderately high in eight or ten hours. Their funerals in Persia are not attended with much pomp. A molla brings the coffin from the next mosque, but it is only an ill-contrived, clumsy box, made up of three boards, with a cover that turns by a peg. The corpse is put into it, and if the deceased was poor, it is carried off without any farther ceremony. The bearers only go with it, very fast, and almost running, pronouncing slowly the words, Alla, Alla, that is, God, God. But it is very different with the rich.

In the funeral of a person of quality, the ensigns, or banners of the mosque are carried before the corpse. They are long pikes of different sorts: some have at one end a band of brass, or copper, which is called the hand of Ali, others have a half moon, others the names of Mahomet, of his daughters, and of his first twelve lawful successors, done in cyphers. There are still more poles carried, at the tops of which are fixed some brass or iron plates, about three inches broad, and three or four feet long, but so thin, that the least breeze of wind makes them bend. To them are tied long slips of taffety, which hang down to the ground. These bearers are followed by five or six horses, with the arms and turban of the deceased.

Behind the Alcoran is carried, divided into thirty parts, all wrote in long characters, each letter being an inch big. Each of the great mosques have such an one, and these parts are carried by the young students who are bringing up for the priesthood.— They read it aloud, and so quick, that the whole is read over before they come to the grave.

At the funerals of women, a pall supported by four sticks is placed over the coffin, and these are their highest forms of splendour at funerals. The neighbours, or servants of the deceased, carry the corpse, no bearers being appointed to perform that last duty. They do not bury any in their mosques, for although the bodies are cleansed and purified, yet every thing they touch is considered as defiled. In small towns in Persia, the burying grounds are on the sides of the highways without the gates, to afford a moral instruction to the living; but in great towns situated on a dry soil, several of these repositories of the dead are to be seen, so that we find a vast difference between them and the Turkish Mahometans. The graves are smaller in Persia than in other countries where the Mahometan religion is professed, being only about two feet broad, six in length, and four deep. On the side next to Mecca, they dig a slanting vault, which is as long and as broad as the first grave, and into this they thrust the corpse without a coffin, with the face towards the place where Mahomet was born, and place two tiles to cover the head from the earth, when the grave is filled up. If the deceased was rich, or a warrior, his turban, bow, and quivers full of arrows, are all placed beside him, and the vault is plastered up with tiles. The Sabicks, who pretend to be descendants of Mahomet, have no earth thrown upon them, their graves are only covered with a stone, or brick, or that sort of hard brown marble known in Persia.

At the end of each, tomb-stones are erected, with a turban, if it is a man's grave, but plain if a woman's. These tomb-stones ought not to exceed four feet in height, though commonly they are not above two. The inscriptions on them do not declare the names or qualities of the deceased, but consist of some verses out of the Alcoran. The common people begin to visit the grave at the end of eight days, particularly the women, who seldom fail; the burying grounds are most commonly full of them from morning to evening; for no sooner do some go away, than others return in their room. On some particular festivals they bring their children along with them, and lament the loss of their friends with cries and tears, beating their breasts, tearing their hair, scratching their faces, and repeating several discourses they heretofore had with the deceased.— Every now and then saying, “Soul, spirit, whither art thou gone? Why do not you animate this body? And you corpse, what occasion had you to die?— Did you want gold, silver, clothes, or tender treatment?” Sometimes they are comforted and led away by their friends, and sometimes they leave cakes, fruits, and sweetmeats, as an offering to the angels, guardians of the graves, to engage them to be favourable to the deceased.

People of quality generally bury their relations near the tombs of some of their saints; for the Mahometans have saints as well as the Roman Catholics. They are seldom carried to Mecca, that being at too great a distance, but are interred near the sepulchre of those who were the disciples of Ali, the great prophet of the Persians, but some of them are at a vast distance.

Whilst they prepare themselves for this long journey, the coffin is put into some great mosque, where vaults are made for that purpose, which are walled up to keep the body from being seen, and they do not take it out till every thing is ready to carry it off. The Persians believe that such corpse suffer no alteration; for, say they, before they putrify, they must give an account to the angels, who stay at the grave to examine them. The funeral procession never goes through a town, for this would be a bad omen, as they think. “The dead must go out, but not come in.”

The mourning lasts forty days, but none of the mourners wear black clothes, for that is looked upon as a devil's colour, and a hellish dress. Loud cries and lamentations, whether feigned or real; sitting as if they were almost dead, with a brown gown, or one of a pale colour; fasting eight days, as if they were to live no longer; but during this mournful time, some of their friends come to comfort them. On the ninth day, the men go to the bagnio, have their heads and beards shaved, return their visits at the sepulchre, and then the mourning abroad ends, but at home the cries are renewed more than twice a week, particularly on the return of the day when the person died. Their cries gradually decrease till the fortieth day, when they utterly leave them, and the deceased is seldom more heard of. This, however, is only the case with the men, for the women are not so easily comforted, the state of widowhood in the east being generally for life. The motives for consolation alleged by the Persian Mahometans on the death of friends or relations are rational, and grounded on the best principles of philosophy.— They compare this life to a caravan, or company of travellers, all come at last to the caravancera or inn, yet some arrive soon and others late. In support of this notion, we have a most beautiful story in one of the Persian historians, which Mr. Addison has inserted in the Guardian.

A caravan happening to stop one evening at a town in Persia, where a deputy prince had his palace, an aged dervice, a sort of Mahometan monk, having by mistake gone into the palace instead of the caravancera, or inn, laid himself down to rest.— He was soon discovered by the guards, who took him before the prince. The prince, with all the vanity of an eastern sovereign, asked him how he could have the assurance to come into his palace. The dervice modestly replied, I thought it was a caravancera, but if not, to be so good as tell me what it is, for I did not mean to offend?

It is my palace, (said the prince;) And whose was it before you got possession of it? (said the dervice) The king's my father. And whose will it be after your death? Undoubtedly it will go to the prince my son. Ah sir, added the dervice, that palace, which so often changes its master, may well be considered as a caravancera.

Such are the funeral ceremonies of the Turks in general, and likewise of the Persian Mahometans. We may discover in both many marks of heathenism and Judaism, nay, some of them seem to have descended from the patriarchal ages. But that is not the topic we would now insist on, it is of a far more important nature, namely, why so much honour shewn to the deceased, and why so mean as to employ feigned mourners when no real ones can be found? It is not yet one hundred and sixty years since a sovereign prince in Europe, at the funeral of his father, refused to put on black, and the reason he assigned was, that he was not a hired but a real mourner. But as for the first, the respect shewn to the deceased has been already treated of in the course of this work, namely, that it inspires sentiments of humanity, because the deceased bore the image of God. But the second, why hire artificial, nominal, disinterested mourners? The answer is obvious.

There is a strong propensity in man, to appear superior to what he really is. Thus it frequently happens that men make provision for the interment of their bodies in pomp and splendour, who never paid any regard to their immortal souls. The ingenious herald may deck the hearse, and adorn it with the noblest achievements; the undertaker may, in the most solemn pomp, convey the body to the clay cold grave, a funeral oration may be repeated, setting forth the deceased as one of the most exalted characters of the human race, while the soul itself, the grand immortal part, is standing before an awful tribunal.

Vain waste of praise, since flattering or sincere,
The judgment day alone will make appear.

There are no books in the world tell greater truths, or greater lies, than tomb-stones.

About forty-seven years ago, a very rich man was buried, who had committed every crime that degenerated nature was capable of, and the inscription on his tomb-stone makes him rather more than a saint. A lady of high rank, and the great grandmother of a noble and virtuous duke lately deceased, died, and was buried the same week, and on her tomb-stone is nothing but her name and age.

Let all just respect be shewn to the bodies of our friends and fellow-creatures, but let us never tell God idle tales. Let funerals be conducted with such decency as shall make an impression on the minds of the spectators, but let us never run into those extremes, which are first absurd, and then ridiculous.

Besides these two general divisions of the Mahometans, there are several smaller sects who are considered as heretics. These are numerous, but they may be distinguished into two sorts; the orthodox and the heretical. The former are called by the general name of Somites or Traditionalists, because they acknowledge the authority of the Sonna, or collection of moral traditions of the sayings and actions of their prophet.

The Somites are subdivided into four chief sects, viz. 1. The Hanifites. 2. The Malekites. 3. The Shaffaites. 4. The Hanbalites.

The heretical sects are those which hold heterodox opinions in fundamentals, or matters of faith. The first controversies relating to fundamentals began when most of the companions of Mahomet were dead: for the continual employment of war, during the infancy of this religion, allowed the Arabs little or no leisure to enter into nice inquiries, and subtle distinctions. But no sooner was the ardour of conquest a little abated, than they began to examine the Alcoran a little more nearly: whereupon differences in opinion became unavoidable, and at length so greatly multiplied, that the number of their sects, according to the common opinion, was seventy-three.

These several sects were compounded and dis-compounded of the opinions of the four chief sects, viz. 1. The Motazales. 2. The Safatians. 3. The Kharejites. 4. The Schiites.

The Motazales were subdivided into several inferior sects, amounting, as some reckon, to twenty, which mutually charged each other with infidelity: the most remarkable of these were,

1. The Hodejians. 2. The Jabaïans. 3. The Hashemians. 4. The Nodhamians. 5. The Hayetians. 6. The Jahedians. 7. The Mozdarians. 8. The Basharians. 9. The Thamamians. 10. The Cadarians.

The chief sects of the Safatians were, 1. The Ascharians. 2. The Moshabbelites. 3. The Keramians. 4. The Jabarians. 5. The Morgians.

The most remarkable among the sects of the Kharejites were, 1. The Waidians. 2. The Schiites.

The principal sects of the Schiites were five in number; the most remarkable were, 1. The Gholaites. 2. The Nosairians.

These are principal sects into which the professors of Mahometanism were very soon subdivided. Innumerable other sects have since sprung up amongst them, which it would be tedious to enumerate.

As success in any project seldom fails to draw in imitators, Mahomet having raised himself to such a degree of power and reputation by acting the prophet, induced others to imagine they might arrive at the same height by the same means. His most considerable competitors in the prophetic office were Moseilama, and Al Aswad. Moseilama pretended to be joined in commission with Mahomet, and published revelations in imitation of the Alcoran. During the few months which Mahomet lived after the setting up of this new imposture, Moseilama grew very formidable: but Abu Beker, Mahomet's successor, sent an army against him; and the false prophet was slain in battle, and his followers dispersed. Al Aswad set up for himself the very year before Mahomet died; but a party sent by Mahomet, broke into his house by night, and cut off his head. The Mahometans call these two false prophets the two liars. Arabian history furnishes us with a great number of other such impostors, who have arisen at different times since the establishment of Mahometanism.

The extent of the Mahometan religion is very great, as will appear from the nations and princes professing it. There are,

In Asia. The Turks. The Arabians. The Persians. The Great Mogul. The kings of Visapour, Golconda, and Malabar. The Great Cham of Tartary. The Kingdoms of Sumatra, Java, and the Maldives.

In Africa. The Turks. The people of Tunis, Tripoli, &c. On the coasts of Barbary, the kings of Fez and Morocco.

Here we are to take notice, that, excepting the grand seignior, the king of Persia, the Arabian princes, and the Cham of Tartary, all the rest have Pagan idolators for their subjects in general; Mahometanism being professed only by the princes and great men. It has been said, but we will not vouch for the calculation, that if we divide the known regions of the world into thirty equal parts, the Christians will be found to be in possession of five, the Mahometans of six, and the idolators of nineteen. So that the Mahometan religion is of somewhat greater extent than the Christian.

This however, is no proof of its authenticity, seeing Paganism, even of the grossest sort, prevails over many more nations in the universe than Christianity and Mahometanism put together. If the truth of any religion was to be judged by the number of its professors, then the following things would be established.

First, God did injury when he destroyed the old world; for they were all of one opinion except Noah and his family.

Secondly, God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, there being but three persons saved; and all those destroyed were of one opinion, and guilty of one abominable practice.

Thirdly, the Jews were a handful of people compared with the rest of the world, and yet they were the chosen people of God.

Lastly, when the apostles preached the gospel, all the world, except the Jews, were heathens.

In all these religious sects, the Mahometans use the same religious ceremonies, but they observe different festivals, as will appear afterwards. At present we shall only take notice of their priests, whom they call Imams. The Imam is the head of their congregations in their mosques. The word signifies leader, or governor, and is applied likewise, by way of eminence to him, who has the supreme authority both in respect to spirituals and temporals. There are subordinate Imams in each town, who represent the chief Imam, but only with respect to religion. When the Imam of the Mussulman religion is mentioned without distinction, it is always restrained to the rightful and lawful successor of Mahomet, the fountain both of secular and sacred jurisdiction.—The caliphs took the title, and performed the functions of the Imam, and were so zealous of this character, that sultan Almamun, coming one day into a mosque, took it ill, because a private person read the public prayers, looking upon it as an encroachment upon his authority.

The Mahometans are not perfectly agreed concerning the dignity, and some of the circumstances of this office. Some hold the Imamate to be settled by divine right, like the Aaronical priesthood, in one family; others think it is not so unalterably tied to genealogy and descent, as to hinder its passing from one family to another; and they say, that an Imam may be deposed for vicious conduct, and his office conferred on another. The Schiites, or disciples of Ali, maintain, that this privilege belongs to the family of Ali, exclusive of all others, Ali being sole heir to Mahomet. Hence they own no person for the head of religion, who cannot prove his descent in a right line from this first Imam. There are Imams belonging to particular mosques, who are in the nature of our parish-priests. They officiate in the public liturgy, in which they pray for their prince, and make a sort of harangue to the people. One of the functions of the caliphs was, to execute the office of Imam, every Friday in the chief mosque, where he resided; and, when he could not officiate himself, he delegated some person of distinction.

The supreme head of the Turkish clergy is the Mufti, who resides constantly wherever the grand seignior keeps his court. He is in Turkey what the pope is among Roman Catholics, with some particular differences. Thus the pope will not acknowledge himself subject to any power whatever, whereas the Mufti, under the grand seignior, considers himself no more than the second person in the empire. Again, when they are consulted concerning cases of conscience, the Mufti gives his opinion in a very modest manner, accompanied with this restriction, "God knows what is best," a sure proof that he does not esteem himself, nor is he esteemed by others as infallible. On the other hand, every one knows that the pope pretends to infallibility, and Roman Catholics believe he is so.

The Mufti has great authority in the grand council of the empire, or, as it is called, the divan, and great regard is paid to what he says. The Persian Mahometans had likewise their high-priest in former times, whom they called Sedre, an Arabic word, which signifies the inward part of the body, but was used by them as a term of high dignity, and he was the supreme judge in all ecclesiastical affairs in Persia, and even of such civil causes as had any connection with religious ones; but that office has been abolished some time on account of the wars that have long raged in Persia.

The mosques in Persia and Turkey, are very like our parish churches, and the Imams are in the manner of our priests or clergy, but as has been already observed, there are different orders of them. They say their prayers aloud at the appointed times? and every Friday they read some verses of the Alcoran; sometimes they preach, which consists originally of exhortations to obey every thing in the Alcoran, but now they divide their subject in the same manner as the clergy do with us. But preaching in Turkey is not confined to the clergy or Imams, for on some grand festival, the Hodgians, who are doctors and lawyers, likewise preach; as the Mahometans do not distinguish so much as we do between the church and state.

With respect to their monks, they are extremely numerous, some of them living in convents, and others in lonesome solitudes to be still more retired from the world, abstaining from all sensual pleasures, profound enemies to faction, and seemingly dead to many of the pleasures of this life. They are generally called dervices, which word in the Persian language literally signifies a very poor man. They are allowed to marry, and may leave their orders whenever they please, which is more than is granted to the Christian monks.

The Mahometans assign a reason for this part of their conduct, in granting such an indulgence to the monks, which does them the highest honour, namely, that men are too inconstant to remain long in the same dispositions. Had the Romish clergy attended to this, they would not have been charged with so many crimes as have been imputed to them. Men were formed for society, and it is inconsistent with nature that the other sex should be separated from them.

The chief dervices are called Mavelovites, who profess patience, humility, moderation, and charity. There are several degrees of them, and the lower observe an exact silence before the superiors, with eyes cast down, the head leaning on the breast, and bending their bodies forward. They wear the coarsest shirts, and the most austere have none, but put next to their skin a brown waistcoat of woollen cloth, which reaches below the calf of their legs.—This stuff is made at Cagna, in Natolia, the place where the chief of the order resides. They sometimes button this vestment, but more frequently walk with it open to the waist, where they tie it about them with a leather girdle; and to shew their fidelity to God, and appear more holy than others, they mark their breast with a hot iron, and practise many other austerities, too numerous to be described.

There is no doubt but they believe that such austerities are more likely to gain the favour of heaven, than the most fervent prayers of other Mahometans, who are regular in their lives, and modest in their dress, without singularity. But to go on with the deception of these Turkish monks, who swarm in vast numbers, particularly in Asia, and who are less or more esteemed according to the notion the people form of their sanctity.

Their shoulders are usually covered with cloth, their heads with a whitish cap of camel's hair, in the form of a sugar-loaf, but has some resemblance to a turban, from the line wrapped round it, and they go bare-legged. Although dervice is the general name given them, yet we find they are divided into many classes, each of which has some name to distinguish it by.

The first of these are called Santons, and are a most wretched body of men. They go bareheaded, and with naked legs, half covered with the skin of a bear, or of some other wild beast, without shirts, having only leather girdles round their waists, from which hangs a bag. Some of them have about their bodies a piece of copper, in the form of a serpent, bestowed upon them by their doctors as a mark of their learning. In sentiments they are a sort of libertines or epicureans, and are dangerous to all societies, whether religious or civil; for they pretend that all actions are indifferent, which opens a wide entrance to the greatest disorders. They carry in their hands a kind of club, as our mountebanks do their rods, and indeed they are no better than quacks and cheats, for they sell relics to bigots, such as the hair of Mahomet, and frequently pieces of earth, said to be brought from Mecca.

Another order of these dervices are called Edhemites, but these are only to be found in Persia, chiefly in the province of Chorazau. They lead a hard mortified life, and fancy themselves illuminated, their minds being heated by their austerities. Such fanatical notions may be found in other climates, as well as in hot countries. However, this much is certain, that in all countries we find men who are willing to be esteemed more religious than others.

They never begin public prayers among the Mahometans, without first purifying themselves, nor do they enter a mosque without pulling off their shoes, a practice of great antiquity, and undoubtedly founded on the words of the Divine appearance to Moses, "Put off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Although they abhor image worship, yet, as soon as they go into their mosques, they bow reverently to the place where the Alcoran lies, then lifting up their eyes to heaven, stopping their ears with their thumbs, and behaving with modesty and humility. Their prayers are directed to God alone, as being the only lovely, the only worthy to be adored; the only master and enchanter of the hearts and thoughts, and the only one who can forgive and shew them mercy. They reproach themselves with not having paid him all the veneration due to his eternal majesty.

The prayer, of which this makes a great part, may be seen in the beginning of our extract from the Alcoran, and it contains no idle repetitions or dark sentences, as too many others do. It is remarkable, that all the accounts we have of ancient nations, and in all that experience has taught us of the moderns, we find that every religion had, and still has, its festivals. It was therefore necessary that Mahomet should improve on this plan; for, besides one day in seven, he instituted several solemn festivals. This was done, not only from motives of policy to keep his people together, but also from a principle of religion, that God should be worshipped in a more solemn manner at one time than at another.

The first of their festivals is called Bairam, celebrated in the tenth month, called Siewal, and has some affinity with our new year; for at that time the Mahometans wish all manner of good to each other. The Bairam is published at the first sight of the moon of this month, or if the weather is cloudy, so that it cannot be seen, they hold it on the next day; for in that case they suppose the moon is changed. The diversions then are numerous; huts are set up in the streets, so contrived, that those who sit in them may swing in the air, being posted faster or slower, and these seats are adorned with festoons. They have also wheels, on which people are alternately at the top, middle, and bottom; a common emblem of fortune, the changes of which, though so often described in prose and verse, still overtake us when least expected.

The next feast or fast is the Rhamadan, which continues for two months. As the Roman Catholics have their carnival and Lent together, so this solemn season, among the Turks includes both. It is a mixture of devotion and debauchery, for it begins with a carvinal in the following manner, according to Thevenot, who was an eye witness of it.

The twelfth of June, (says he) was the Turks carnival, or beginning of their fast, and it is called the night of power, because the Mahometans believe that in that night the Alcoran came down from heaven. After sun-set, all the lamps in the streets are lighted, but chiefly in that called Bezar, a straight, long, and broad street, through which the procession marches, and ropes are hung every ten steps, to which are tied iron hoops and baskets holding each thirty at the least. All these being in a direct line, furnish a fine prospect, and give an amazing light. Besides these, all the towers of the mosques are illuminated, and an almost innumerable company of people crowd the streets, accompanied by some of those monks, or devices, called Santons.

Being informed that the moon had been seen, and that this is the night appointed for the solemnity, about two in the morning the Santons begin the march, with clubs in their hands, and each of them holding a taper, accompanied by other men carrying lights. The Santon-devices sing and howl like madmen. Next come several men on camels, with all sorts of martial music, and these are followed by others in masquerade dresses, on foot, carrying long poles, at the end of which are large iron hoops, filled with squibs and fire-works, thrown amongst the mob. Next to these ride the upper servants of the beys, with their hand guns. The procession is closed by some more of those monks called Santons, who dance, sing, howl, and make a most horrible noise, not much unlike that made by wild beasts.—The whole is composed of a parcel of scoundrels met together, but still it is comical and diverting.—This is the carnival of the Turks, which, although included as part of the Rhamadan, yet is really a festival by itself.

longer, and, during that time, no man must, from sun-rising to sun-setting, put any thing into his mouth; but then they are permitted to eat and drink during the whole of the night, and they may eat and drink any thing except wine. All persons are obliged to be present at them, otherwise he would not only be considered as an unbeliever, but also be in danger of losing his life.

The last festival is the Dalhaggai, and in former times, the people were not permitted to go out to war during it; they were not even to punish a murderer, or any other criminal; but better sense has now got the place of enthusiasm, and such silly notions are disregarded. This feast is spent much in the same manner as the Rhamadan; and when we reflect on the time thus misemployed, it will appear that the Turks do not devote above one half of their time to labour. But then there are several circumstances, which contribute to render them indolent. And these are, the little regard paid to commerce, the foundation of wealth, a divided offspring, among whom they hardly know how to leave their fortune; and the insecurity of property, the government being at all times able to deprive them of it.

The Persian Mahometans have their feasts peculiar to themselves, namely, the first day after their Lent, the sacrifice of Isaac, and the martyrdom of their great prophet Ali. To these three festivals, they have added another, but it is rather of a civil than a religious nature; for it is a feast of compliments at the beginning of the new year, like Christmas with us, and lasts only three days. It is called the royal or imperial new year, to distinguish it from the real new year, which the Persians begin on the day of Mahomet's flight from Mecca.

As for their Lent it contains nothing at all remarkable, any further than that the people observe a vast number of ridiculous ceremonies, much more so than those observed by the Turks; some of them whip themselves, others go barefooted over sharp stones, and some others crawl upon their hands and feet. They eat but one meal in twenty-four hours, and drink nothing but water.

The festival, or rather solemn mourning, in memory of the martyrdom of the children of Ali, is very solemn indeed. Aly, or Ali, married Fatima, the daughter of Mahomet, by whom he had several children, two of whom were killed in battle, fighting for the dignity of the caliph, which in that age, was the same as mufti is at present. The anniversary of those heroes, prophets, or by whatever name they may be called, is celebrated with much solemnity. Some of the people daub themselves all over with blood, in memory of their tragical end: others black their faces, and roll out their tongues, with convulsive motions of the body, rolling their eyes, because the Persian legend says those two brothers suffered so much by drought, that they became black, and their tongues came out of their mouths. It is probable, they received these ceremonies from the Phœnicians and Syrians lamenting the death of Adonis, which was afterwards practised by the Grecians, who were colonies settled by the Phœnicians, and received their laws and religion from them. Some bury themselves in a rock, and remain a whole day in that posture, having their heads covered with an earthen pot. Others are no less ridiculous, having drums beating and colours flying, in memory of the battle in which the heroes were slain; hearses are carried about, with the images of the deceased, and the people jump, dance, and sing around them. Undoubtedly these are absurd follies, but there are many more to be met with in the world.

Another devout ceremony on this occasion, is to preach a sermon in memory and honour of the two brothers. An enthusiastic preacher mounts the rostrum, and delivers an allegorical discourse, with all the antic ridiculous arts of a mountebank. He generally harangues two hours, and omits nothing in his power to draw tears from the audience. The women play their parts, beating their breasts, crying and lamenting, to excite others to imitate their sorrow. And this is all the benefit reaped from outward marks of humble grief, which seldom works sincere and lasting conversions. Such passionate, religious, tender affections, seldom last longer than the sermon; and then give place to passions, desires, and follies of another nature, and pointing to very different objects.

The next feast is that of the sacrifice, which Abraham intended to have made of his son. And here it is necessary to remark, that neither the Turkish or Persian Mahometans, nor indeed any of the followers of the false prophets will allow that Isaac was the eldest son of Abraham; but that he was born long after Ishmael, whose mother Hagar, say they, was the lawful wife of the ancient patriarch, Sarah being no more than a concubine. But notwithstanding all that, they treat Isaac with great honour and respect, he being one of the sons of good old Abraham. In memory of the sacrifice of Ishmael, (not Isaac, say they) wherever the Mahometan religion is professed, a vast number of people meet in the most public parts of the cities; if in Constantinople, the grand seignor puts himself at the head of the multitude, attended by all his great officers of state, and surrounded by his janizaries, or guards. Many eunuchs, richly dressed, walk behind him. The whole road, from the seraglio to the mosque of Mahomet, whither he intended to go, is lined with an incredible number of people; and the foreign ambassadors are suffered to accompany him as far as the door of the mosque, but not further, unless the sultan grants them his royal permission. They return back in the same manner, and this is repeated once every year, in memory of Abraham's carrying Ishmael to Mount Moriah, for they will not allow that it was Isaac. They treat Isaac, however, with great respect, as indeed they do all the Old Testament saints, for they only consider the Mosaic and Christian dispensations as abolished in consequence of the wickedness of the people to whom they were given.

There have been several accusations brought against the speculative doctrines of Mahomet, the principal of which we shall now take notice of, and enquire whether they are true or false; and would have it considered, that nothing ought to be imputed to him, besides what is found in the Alcoran.

And first, it has been asserted, and is confidently believed by many, that he has denied souls to women, and that they shall not have a place in his paradise. Let us consider this accusation with impartiality; were we to judge of Mahomet's belief of the future state of women, from the regard he had for them in his life, we would not only believe that he allotted them a paradise, but that he even assigned them the most beautiful places in it. It is true, there is a passage in the Alcoran which seems to countenance the accusation where it is said, "Women shall not be with them in paradise;" but it does not say, women shall not be in paradise at all.—Most probably the meaning of the words are, that as women had separate apartments among the Arabians, so they will have the same in heaven. This is altogether consistent with the rest of his notions, for his ideas of a heavenly state were all formed upon corporeal things here below. This answer would be sufficient, did it rest only on conjecture; but what can be said against positive evidence; Mahomet expressly says in his Alcoran, chap. xi.—"Whoever shall believe and do good works, whether man or woman, shall enter into paradise." He says in several parts of the Alcoran, that men shall have most beautiful women, but he never insinuates that these women were to be created for the purpose; for as he allowed a general resurrection of the human race, so he grants they shall all have most glorious bodies, except unbelievers. As for the silly opinion that women do not go to mosques, nothing can be more ridiculous; for there is a place allotted for them in all their places of worship, but where they cannot be seen by men, to preserve the purity of their hearts, and the sanctity of the place, and because many of our travellers never saw them, so they concluded that they are not admitted.

It has been asserted, that Mahomet ordered all his followers to visit his tomb at Mecca, once in their life-time, otherwise they would not be admitted into paradise. This assertion is denied by all the best travellers whoever yet visited the east, for throughout all the Turkish dominions, there are not more pilgrims go to visit the tomb of Mahomet, than do to visit the church of Loretto in Italy. They cannot travel there except in caravans; and as the distance is sometimes near a thousand miles, so few, except those of a high rank, can go. Nay, it is often dangerous to travel, even in caravans, where there are not above two thousand men; for the wild Arabs, although Mahometans themselves, often lead them astray, till they get them into the desert, and then they rob and plunder them.

The truth is, there are three sorts of people visit Mecca, first, devotees, who go thither from motives of religion, and these are generally such as have nothing else to do. Secondly, merchants who go there to sell, or exchange their goods, and although there is no doubt but these merchants worship at the tomb of the prophet, yet they have other objects in view, namely, riches, as the reward of their industry.—Lastly, gentlemen, from many parts of the world, particularly from Europe, who travel into Arabia, not only to see this celebrated tomb, but likewise to Mount Sinai, with many other curiosities.

The last thing we shall take notice of as imputed to Mahomet, is the doctrine of divine predestination in the most absolute sense of the word. That the Turks are predestinarians cannot be denied, nay, it is acknowledged that they are the most obstinate fatalists in the world, and by trying a few legendarian tricks, they pretend to know what will happen to them. How far any Christian divines have carried the doctrine of absolute predestination, is not our business at present to inquire into, it will naturally come in another part of this work. If some who have had the benefit of a liberal education, and the use of the sacred scripture, have raised this doctrine more high than what was warrantable, then we need not be surprised that men who never heard the sound of the gospel should do so. Hobbs, an Englishman, carried it as high as the Mahometans do at present, if not higher; for he makes God the author of sin, by insisting that all men's actions, even the worst, are absolutely necessary, because the decree appointing them was absolute. Upon the whole, fatality is not a new doctrine, for it was embraced by the Greeks and Romans, and perhaps by the Arabians, among whom Mahomet was born.

We shall conclude our description of Mahometan festivals, with an account of some superstitions practised by the common people. The Indian Mahometans have a feast called Choubret, by Thevet, which begins with fear and sorrow, and ends with hope and joy. On this day they commemorate the examination of the souls departed, by the good angels, who write down all the good actions they have done in this life; while the bad angels write all the bad ones. This they believe is perused by God, and for that reason are afraid, and say a few prayers, examine themselves, and give alms.—But flattering themselves that their accounts will be cleared and wrote down in the book of life, they end the solemnity with illuminations and bonfires, treating and making presents to one another.

Besides the pilgrimage to Mecca, before-mentioned at large, the Mahometans have several others to the tombs of their saints, and those saints have each of them a proper legend. Now all these pilgrims are held in veneration, more or less, as the people stand affected in regard to such devotions. But nothing comes up to the respect paid to the pilgrims of Mecca: They are absolved from all sorts of crimes committed before; they even have leave to commit new ones: For says our author, "They cannot be put to death according to law, they are looked upon as incorruptible, irreprouchable, and perfect saints in this world." Such fanatical opinions are not confined to Mahometans, we have seen examples of them in the last age, amongst pretended Christians; and they are means of leading the people, and keeping them in those dispositions. Some of these pilgrims, as we are told, wilfully put out their eyes, lest they should be profaned by worldly objects, after the glorious sight of the holy places at Mecca. Even the children born in that devout voyage are reputed saints; and it is looked upon as so meritorious to contribute to stock the world with such elect, that the women are generally willing, and charitably offer themselves to the pilgrims to be their help-mates in that good deed.

We shall give our readers some notion of Mahometan saints, and of the honour paid to them by the example of Ali, the first martyr for the Persian faith. They paint him with a two pointed scimitar, and the face covered with a green veil, whereas other saints have a white one: Our author does not give any reason for this difference, he only says, the white veil is to shew that the glorious and wonderful features of a saint's face, are not to be conceived or painted. This veil has some affinity to the rays of glory about the heads of our saints, and still more to the nimbus, or cloud, which covered the heads of the ancient heathen gods. A chief article of the Persian belief is, that Ali is the vicar of God. Some of their doctors have even raised him above the condition of human nature, and by their indiscreet devotion, given a sanction to this common saying; I do not believe that Ali is God, but I do not think he is far from being God. We shall make no odious comparisons; such mad expressions are deservedly censured by all judicious and truly devout persons, who have a right idea of the Supreme Being. Besides Ali, there are many other saints cotemporary with, or who lived after him; some of these are held in veneration with all Mahometans, others only with the Turks or Persians, or Indians, or Arabians. Miracles are said to have been wrought by them, and the legends, composed of their lives for the edification of Mahometans, who visit their tombs, and perform their devotions there, yet says Chardin without any direct invocation; however he owns at last, that they venerate and call upon the saints, because it is the will of God it should be done.

The disciples and followers of Ali esteem the pilgrimage to the tomb of Fathme, or Fatime, as little inferior to that of Mecca. She was the daughter of Mouza-Calem, the seventh schismatical successor of Mahomet, in the opinion of the Turks. Without entering into an account of her pretended miracles, or of the devotion shewed in this pilgrimage, we shall only take notice, that one of the preliminaries of this ceremony, is to kiss thrice the threshold and silver grate of the monument. A molla attends there day and night, and directs the pilgrims to repeat word for word some prayers, in which she is called the lady and mistress of the soul and heart of the faithful, the guide of truth, a spotless virgin, &c. The tomb is enlightened with a great number of silver lamps, the devout Mahometans make their offerings in silver or other things, which are deposited in a trunk, and taken out from thence every Friday, to be distributed amongst the mollas; and the whole ends in a gratification to the priest, who introduced the pilgrim; and for the further sum of half a pistole, obtains an authentic attestation of his having performed that devotion, &c.

The whole Alcoran is read at the tombs of the saints, and of the dignified Mahometans, and mollas are hired to comply with this duty day and night.—Something like it is done in other countries, but comparisons are odious, and often carried too far. We shall set before our readers other practices which Christians of all denominations will censure as superstitious. Besides the exact account kept of the number of letters in the Alcoran, no one is allowed to touch it, without being purified; and for this reason, says Chardin, when persons of a different religion are to be sworn before judges, it is not done upon that book, in which the Persians find seventy thousand miracles; that is, as many as they reckon words in it.

They have also a great notion of astrology, charms, amulets, talismans, &c. making use to that purpose of the verses of the Alcoran, and of the Hadiths. This will not seem strange to those who know that the Mahometan doctors believe the Alcoran to be a treasure of mysteries hidden from men; and that it contains innumerable secrets which are to be found out only by the different combinations of the words and letters of that precious book. Yet some more scrupulous, maintain those mysteries and secrets are not to be pried into; that the subtilities of the commentators are criminal; and that, at the coming of the last Imam, (by this expression they mean the last day) all their works will be condemned to be burnt, or thrown into the water, to shew those authors did not understand this book. Several ancient and modern comments on the bible deserve the same fate.

Their superstition about eclipses is not so common as heretofore, yet that phenomenon still affects the common people, chiefly when accompanied, or followed by particular events. This is grounded on the opinion of the Persian doctors, who, as Chardin informs us, hold that the privation of that light is a punishment inflicted by almighty God, who gives that commission to the angel Gabriel. However, that superstition is very much spread in the east: They believe likewise that what we call the shootings of stars, are so many darts thrown by angels against the devils who are at that time endeavouring to get back into heaven from which they have been expelled. It is likewise asserted that the Turks, Persians, and Mahometans of the Indies, use blessings and other prayers, and superstitious ceremonies to protect their houses from the assaults of evil spirits. The author of the military state of the Ottoman empire said he had seen talismans and superstitious billets used in order to preserve the grand vizier's tent.

They are also, as already hinted, superstitiously charitable to beasts. Ricaut says, "That they buy birds shut up in cages, in order to set them at liberty, that they buy bread to feed dogs who have no masters, and think it a less crime to refuse giving alms to a starving Christian, than to a dog wandering about the streets." A cruel and inhuman tenet, yet the too common effect of party spirit! We are also assured, that they have a kind of religious veneration for camels, and look upon it as a crime to overburden them. "They are thus respected says the same author, because they are very common in the holy places of Arabia, and carry the Alcoran at the pilgrimage of Mecca. I have even taken notice, says he, that those who take care of that beast, use the froth, which comes out of his mouth after drinking, and devoutly rub their beards with it, saying at the same time, Hadgi-baba, O father pilgrim." The usefulness of the cows has made the Indians worship them; the same reason has influenced Mahomet to propose the camel as an emblem of God's wisdom, and Solomon in his Proverbs, sends us to the ant to learn wisdom.

Having said thus much concerning the religion of Mahomet, having treated of it both in a speculative and particular manner, we cannot close this article without attending to some things which we hope will be of service to the reader. We have seen some of the heathen practices, we shall see more of them presently; we have attended to Christianity in its uncorrupted state, to Judaism both ancient and modern. We have seen the rise and progress of popery, and we have beheld with concern, the present forlorn state of the Greek church. Indeed such a variety of subjects have presented themselves to our view, that we are lost in astonishment to behold the corruption of human nature. But painful as the task is, we must endeavour to go through with it.

The Mahometans are neither heathens, Jews, nor Christians. They are not heathens because they do not worship images; nor Jews, because they reject the law of Moses; nor Christians, because they will not receive the gospel. What then shall we call them? The answer is obvious. They are objects of compassion, who, having been led astray by an artful impostor, still continue to believe his lies.—Many opportunities have occurred to make the gospel known to them, but all such valuable intentions have been protracted for the following reasons.

First, the Jesuits who sought to make them converts to popery instead of Christianity, carried along with them large cargoes of beads, images, and wafers, which the Mahometans despised. They told the Jesuits that they abhorred image worship, and as for beads, they were only play-things for children. They said their wafers were no gods, for there was but one God, and Mahomet was his prophet. The Jesuits told them, that unless they had their bodies oiled over in six different places before they died, they could not enter into the kingdom of heaven.—To this the Mahometans replied, that if they were to be rubbed over with nasty oil, they must be bathed clean before they went into paradise. But leave your oil, your beads and wafers, and come and talk to us as rational creatures, then perhaps we may believe you. This, however, was what the Jesuits would by no means comply with, and rather than forget the beads and the oil, they contentedly returned home to their own country.

Secondly, The Christian merchants who have traded into Turkey, and been well acquainted with the Mahometans, have been too much intent upon acquiring riches, ever to bring the people over to the belief of the Christian faith. A gentleman lately deceased, who resided many years in the Levant, told us on his death-bed, that British consuls were restricted from meddling with any thing of a religious nature. There is no doubt but this is true, but then why should the truth be concealed? Is it for fear of punishment? Then there is an end of all religion; for those who love temporal interest more than they do truth, are not worthy of being the disciples of any religion whatever.

Upon the whole, there can remain no doubt but God has appointed a time when these people will embrace the gospel, and fly into his temple as doves do into their windows, and for that happy period we wait with longing expectation.

RELIGION IN TARTARY.

HAVING given an accurate account of every thing relating to the Mahometans, we shall now return to the heathens, who of all others are the most numerous in the world. The Tartars are almost an infinite body of people, and in ancient times were called Scythians, who worshipped Mars, the god of war, under the figure of an old rusty sabre, and to this sabre they annually offered vast numbers of bullocks, sheep, and oxen. They also offered horses and prisoners whom they took in war, and in whose blood they dipped their garments.—These ancient Scythians, whom we now call Tartars, sent out colonies into many different parts of the world, and nations were peopled by them. They carried their religious ceremonies along with them, and some remains of them are yet to be found.—

At present the people called Tartars are so numerous, and divided into so many hordes or tribes, that there is no certainty to be had of every thing relating to them. Corbin says they acknowledge but one God, the Creator of all things, both visible and invisible, who rewards and punishes men according to their good or bad works in this world; but, continues he, they never pay him any act of divine worship. Here, however, seems to be an error; for they have many images, and these they adorn in the most gaudy manner, with every thing the country can afford. They consider them as beings who are to protect them from all manner of harm, to be the guardians of their flocks, whom they offer up partly to them in sacrifice, and they likewise offer up to these idols, part of the first morsel they eat in the morning. They burn the bones of the beasts which they offer in sacrifice, because they are not permitted to be broken, and when any stranger comes amongst them, they and their effects which they bring with them, must pass between two fires in order to be purified. They are strictly enjoined not to put a knife into the fire, nor even to touch it with the knife, nor to cleave any wood near it with a hatchet. They also pay a particular respect to the whip with which they lash their horses, and before they drink, they take their cup or glass, and first pay their obedience to the fire, air, water, and the dead; turning themselves to the four corners of the earth. If the fire be the object of their devotion, their eyes are directed towards the south; if the air, towards the east; if the water, towards the west; and to the north, when they adore the dead. Every house has its guardian idol, and at the feet of their beds they place the skins of kids stuffed with wool, and a little image, with its face towards the wives and daughters side, for their particular guard and protection. The side for the wife is on the east, and the husband's on the west, and under the wife's is placed the udder of a cow, which is a symbol, denoting that it is the woman's province to attend milking of cows. On the husband's is a mare's tail, denoting that it is the duty of men to take care of the breed of horses.

The Mongolian Tartars acknowledge but one God, the author of life and death, yet hold it lawful to serve and adore him various ways. Mangu-Chan, in Purchas, justified this plurality of worship, by comparing the Supreme Being to a hand, with a variety of fingers. The Tartars, according to Mark Paul, acknowledge a Supreme Being, who inhabits the heavens, and to him only make their devout addresses for those invaluable blessings, wisdom, health, &c. Their household god, Natagay, or Itogay, who has a wife and children, is the next object of their esteem and veneration. The former is placed at his left hand, and the latter before him. He is the guardian of their families, and presides over all the products of the earth. No one presumes to go to dinner till he and his whole family are first served. Their entertainment principally consists in having their mouths very plentifully greased, and the fragments of their repast are thrown out of doors, for the accommodation of some unknown spirits.

This is the sum and substance of what we find most remarkable in the account of our ancient travellers. We shall now consult the moderns. The Mongolian Tartars, Calmoucs, and others, according to them, have, properly speaking, no other god but their Dalai-Lama, which signifies, as we are informed. Universal Priest. This sovereign pontiff of all the Tartarian idolators, and whom they acknowledge as their god, resides towards the frontiers of China, near the city of Potala, in a convent, situate on the summit of an high mountain, the foot whereof is inhabited by above twenty thousand Lamas, who have their separate apartments round about the mountain, and, according to their respective quality and function, are planted nearer, or at a greater distance from their sovereign pontiff. The Dalai-Lama never concerns himself in the least about the temporal affairs; neither are they taken notice of by any of his Lamas, but are entirely left to the discretion of two Chans of the Calmoucs, who furnish him from time to time with whatever is requisite for the honourable support of himself and his whole household. This Dalai-Lama has been called Prester-John, without knowing precisely what countryman he was. The term Lama, in the Mongolian language, signifies priest; and that of Dalai, which in the same language implies vast extent has been translated into the language of the northern Indians, by Gehan, a term of the same signification. Thus Dalai-Lama and Prester-John, are synonymous terms, and the meaning of them Universal Priest.

We have already mentioned, that the Dalai-Lama assumes the Deity, and is looked upon as immortal by all his admirers. Thus have we given the best account of this grand Lama, from the extracts of the missionary fathers quoted by Kircher; and the reader, by what follows, will be able to reconcile these two passages together. There two monarchs, one temporal and the other spiritual, at Lassa, which some say is the kingdom of Tanchuth, or Boratai, or Barantola. The spiritual monarch is the grand Lama, whom these idolators worship as a god. He very seldom goes abroad. The populace think themselves happy if they can by any means procure the least grain of his excrements, or drop of his urine; imagining either of them an infallible preservative from all maladies and disasters. These excrements are kept as sacred relics, in little boxes, and hung about their necks. Father le Compe imagines Fo and the grand Lama to be one and the same Deity; who according to the idea of these Tartars, must for ever appear under a form that may be felt or perceived by the senses, and is supposed to be immortal.

He is closely confined, adds he, to a temple, where an infinite number of Lamas attend him with the most profound veneration, and take all imaginable care to imprint the same awful ideas of him on the minds of the people. He is very seldom exposed to view, and whenever he is, it is at such a distance, that it would be morally impossible for the most quick-sighted person to recollect his features.—Whenever he dies another Lama, who resembles him as near as possible, is substituted in his stead; for which purpose, as soon as they perceive his dissolution draw nigh, the most zealous devotees and chief ministers of the imaginary god, travel the whole kingdom over, to find out a proper person to succeed him. This pious intrigue is carried on, says he, with all the dexterity and address imaginable: and the deification of the Lama, if we may depend on the veracity of father Kircher, was first owing to the extraordinary trust and confidence which these people reposed in their Prester-John. They flocked round about the monarch from all parts, to listen to his wise counsels and decisions, as they would to an oracle. At this very day every body goes, rich and poor, in pilgrimage to this deity's palace, in order to receive his benediction, and to pay him divine adoration. Near his feet is a basin, into which the devotees throw their voluntary oblations.

In all this they behave exactly like the Japanese towards their Dairi, or sovereign pontiff. We have already observed, that this Dairi is a kind of deity; that his clergy preach up to the people the transmigration of the Dairi's soul who goes, into the body of his successor. The remarks we shall make hereafter with respect to the Kutuchta, or usurper of the Dalai-Lama's authority, will fully justify this comparison. Let us suppose, therefore, that these whimsical and extravagant tenets flow from one and the same fountain; and it is much more natural to think so, than to trace the worship of the grand Lama, and his imaginary divinity, from some corrupt ideas of Christianity, formerly impressed on the minds of these people by the Nestorians: since there is no manner of resemblance between them.—The author of the conference which is maliciously supposed to be held between a Tartar and a Roman Catholic, does not offer to make any comparison between the Dalai-Lama and the Pope. The latter, indeed, styles himself infallible, and acts likewise in the capacity, if we may be allowed the expression, of a vice-god; but no one ever carried the point so far, as to ascribe to his holiness, whilst living, the honours of a formal deification. If there be any one ceremony relating to the Roman pontiff, that carries the appearance of divine worship in it, and sets him, in that respect, on a level with the Dalai-Lama, it is that kind of solemn and pompous adoration which is always paid him at his first accession to the pontificate. As to the rest, who knows but that the immortality of the Dalai-Lama may amount to no more, in effect, than that established custom in France, which maintains that her monarch never dies. Since a new king is immediately proclaimed after the decease of the old one, and no court of justice, or public office whatever is shut up, or in the least interrupted in their usual proceedings, and in all of the royal authority to support them; and, in want of probability, the religious authority is preserved after the same manner amongst the Lamas. The immediate substitution of one pontiff in the room of another, may possibly establish a continuance of the vice-deity in Tartary, which would be impracticable amongst other nations.

It is much more probable, that the religion of these Lamas is rather a branch of the Indian doctrines, than any relic of Christianity. Were the Tartars more honest, and not so illiterate, we might entertain a more adequate idea of the articles of their belief. The populace, for the generality, have no notion of any of their religious dissertations, which are written either in the Tanchutian, or any other language; but, as to what relates to divine worship, pin their faith entirely on the sleeves of their Lamas. All that can be learned, in short, from them, are a few old legendary stories, and a few ceremonies.—Their knowledge extends no further; as to the Lamas themselves, the principles of their religion are so dark and mysterious, that it is impossible to draw any conclusions from them. All that we can find, is, that they lay down the three following maxims, as rules for their general conduct; viz. to reverence the deity, to injure no man, and to give tribute to whom tribute is due. But, however, were we to examine into the lives and characters of these Tartars, we should find them very deficient in the practice of these important articles. Let us now take a transient view of their notions with respect to the Deity. They assert that they worship but one God only, who, notwithstanding, is intimate with, and discloses his secrets to the Dalai-Lama, for the edification of the people. Their images are representations of their Deity, and some favourite saints, which are exposed to public view, in order to remind the people of their duty towards God, and of those virtues which they ought constantly to practise.

To this visible god, this Dalai-Lama, of whom we have been speaking, we must add some kings, who have been deified, as well as he, but not till after their decease. Han, king of Tanchuth, became immortal, by virtue of his extraordinary clemency, and just administration; he died in the odour of sanctity, and was received amongst the number of the gods. And Deva, another king of Tanchuth was deified, on account of his eminent virtues. Manipa, the goddess of these people of Tanchuth, has nine heads, which form a kind of pyramid; and she is also represented under a human shape. A bold resolute young fellow, prompted by an enthusiastic rage, like him who cries Amoc amongst the Indians, and drest in armour, runs round about the city, upon some certain days in the year, like a mad-man, and kills every one he meets, in honour of the goddess. This young enthusiast is cuffed Phut, or Buth; and by such outrageous sacrifices as these, the devotees imagine they oblige the goddess, and ingratiate themselves in her favour.

These Tartars also observe the superstitious custom of erecting several trophies on their highest mountains, for the preservation of themselves and their horses, and pay them even divine adoration.

The Calmoucs and western Mongols pay the same respect to their sovereign pontiff, styled Kutuchta, as the other Tartars do to their Dalai-Lama. Formerly the Kutuchta settled on the borders of the river Amur; but at the present he encamps, for the generality, with a body of his faithful followers, round about the river Orohon. He was once the sub-delegate, or deputy of the Dalai-Lama, for the administration of all religious affairs amongst the northern Tartars; those people being too far distant from the usual residence of the Dalai-Lama. In process of time, this Kutuchta made a division in the church, set himself up as independent, deified and immortalized himself at the expence of his old master. The divinity of Kutuchta is at present so firmly established in the minds of his followers, that should any one scruple to believe it, he would be looked upon by his companions with the utmost horror and detestation. According to the accounts of another author, the schism of Kutuchta is no ancient innovation. "Not many years ago, says he, the Dalai-Lama established the Kutuchta as his vicegerent, or suffragan over the northern people of Mongal and Ajuka, who were formerly under the jurisdiction of Contais and Buchary." This vicegerent taking the advantage of the distant residence of the sovereign pontiff, set himself up as the spiritual head of all the people. He encamps sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another; but is always surrounded with a numerous body of life-guards. He carries with him, also, those idols which are in the highest repute, and pitches separate tents for their peculiar service. When this imaginary deity decamps, his faithful devotees flock from all parts with their families, to meet him and throw themselves in his way, in order to procure his heavenly benedictions; but it seems, they must pay for them if they have them. There must be, says our annotator, a valuable consideration. The chief magistrates, and other persons of distinction among them, continues he, are the only persons who dare approach his sacred person. When he gives them his blessing, he clenches his hand, and lays it upon their forehead, having a chaplet in it at the same time, made after the same fashion as those of the Lamas.

The Kutuchta never exposes himself to public view, but on some particular days; and then it is done with all the pomp and magnificence imaginable, and he never marches but with the sound of trumpets, and the beat of drums, or at least of instruments of music, which among the Tartars are equivalent to them; for we would not absolutely insist upon our own terms. He is carried in procession to a tent, covered with Chinese velvet, and open in the front, and there he seats himself cross-legged on a throne, erected on a large square eminence, covered with velvet, in the midst of a large quantity of cushions, ranged all round the pontiff, but at an humble distance, and below him, for the immediate service of the Lamas.

In these solemn ceremonies the sister of this sovereign pontiff, for the generality, sits at his right hand, and officiates in the capacity of a Lama: and she is also shaved, as a mark that she belongs to the priesthood. We are informed by the other relation, that on each side of the pontiff-god, or vice-deity, there are two idols, which represent the divine essence; that the other Lamas sit on each side, on the floor upon cushions, from the throne, or eminence, whereon the grand pontiff is seated, to the very entrance of the pavilion; and that in this attitude, or situation, they have a book in their hands, in which, to all outward appearance, they seem to read to themselves with decency and devotion; but whether these particulars are true or false, it is morally impossible for any one truly to determine. As soon as the Kutuchta is seated, all their instruments of music cease; and the whole assembly first prostrate themselves to the ground, and then burst out into loud acclamations, in honour of the Deity, and into exalted encomiums on their Kutuchta. All the Lamas in general throw some odoriferous herbs into their censers, and therewith first perfume the idols, then their sovereign pontiff, and afterwards the whole congregation of the faithful. As soon as this ceremony is over, each individual Lama deposits his censer at the feet of the pontiff, and their principal or superior, takes seven several china cups full of milk, honey, tea, and brandy, and makes an oblation of them to the idols. Then he takes seven other cups filled with the same ingredients, and presents them to the Kutuchta, and all these oblations are attended with the loud acclamations of the whole assembly, who repeat with fervency some certain words to this, or the like effect, viz. Our Kutuchta is a shining paradise. The Kutuchta first tastes of the free-will-offering himself, and then distributes the remainder among the heads of the several tribes. After this he withdraws, the trumpets all the while sounding, and the drums beating, in the same pompous and solemn manner as they did at his first appearance.

We are further informed, that the Chinese policies contributed very much towards the dedication of this Kutuchta, and privately fomented the schism of these Tartars: but as this is foreign to our present purpose, we refer the reader to our account of religion in China. To the idea of immortality, which these people entertain of their Kutuchta, another is added, which is altogether as whimsical and extravagant, and no doubt as deeply imprinted on their imaginations as the former, viz. That after the Kutuchta has grown old with the decrease of the moon, he renews his youth at the change of the same planet. The whole mystery of this fantastical notion consists in the holy father's suffering his beard to grow from one new moon to another, and never shaving himself, but at her first appearance; at which time he dresses himself with all his splendour, paints his face, and besmears it all over with white and red, as is customary amongst the Tartars. As to the notion of this grand pontiff's immortality, the origin and foundation of it is this:—All these Tartars hold the Metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls; and this received opinion induces them to imagine, that the soul of the expiring Kutuchta enters, immediately after his decease, into the body of his successor; or, at least, that the soul of the latter receives all the operations, and is endowed with all the powers and faculties of the soul of the deceased. For which reason, he who is intended to be the old pontiff's successor, must constantly attend him, that the soul of the holy father may qualify the young one, if we may be allowed the expression, for his approaching godhead; that the young soul may every day have familiar converse with the old one, possess all his qualities, and become, as it were, the very same.

The Oriental Mongals, distinguished in the accounts we have of them by the name of the Tartars of Niuche, of the eastern Tartars, &c. neither worship the Dalai-Lama, nor the sovereign pontiff of the Chinese: but their worship, as we are informed, is a medley of both, reduced to a few nocturnal ceremonies, which, in reality, have more witchcraft in them than religion. The Tartars who, in Isbrand's account of them, are called Daores, and who are a branch of the Orientals, assemble themselves together at midnight, both men and women, in some commodious place, where one of them falls prostrate on the ground, and remains stretched out at his full length, whilst the whole cabal make a hideous outcry to the doleful sound of a drum, made on purpose for the celebration of that particular ceremony. At the expiration of two hours, or thereabouts, the person thus extended, rises as it were in an ecstasy, and communicates his visions to the whole assembly. He is perfectly apprized during his trance, of what misfortunes will befall this man, and what undertakings that man will engage in with success. Each word he utters is listened to with the utmost attention, and deemed as sacred as that of an oracle.—

All their religious worship, however, does not absolutely consist in this; for they have their particular sacrifices as well as others. There is a small mountain on the frontiers of China, which is looked upon as holy ground, and the eastern Tartars imagine their journeys will prove unsuccessful, if, as they pass by, they neglect to consecrate some part of their apparel to this sacred mountain. They hang these oblations, therefore, upon the boughs of birch-trees, with which that mountain abounds. There are plenty of all sorts of shirts, gowns, furs, caps, &c.; in short, such a variety of old clothes, that travellers, who have no notion of the sanctity of the place, are apt to take it for the Rag-fair of the neighbouring Tartars. In all probability this custom is the same as that of erecting trophies on the mountains, which we have already spoken of, upon the testimony of James Kircher. But be that as it will, no one must presume to touch any of these old consecrated cast-off clothes; and should any person be so audacious as to steal away the least insignificant rag whatever, he would be looked upon as an abandoned sacrilegious villain.

But to return, and come to Siberia: the Jekutzes, who are inhabitants of the parts adjacent to Lena, pay divine honours to their dead, after they have hung up and dried their skeletons in the air, and adorned them with necklaces made of glass. The Jekutzes seem to acknowledge the existence of a God, who is their creator and preserver, and the all-wise disposer of good and evil. They have an annual festival, which they celebrate every spring, with abundance of solemnity; that is, by kindling a large bonfire, which must be kept up as long as the festival lasts, and abstaining the whole time from all kinds of liquors, they being destined only for libations, which consist in pouring their common drink eastward into the fire; and in this ceremony there seems to be a kind of religious adoration paid to that element. There are some Calmunes-Barabinski, who have a clumsy wooden idol for their god, dressed like a Merry-Andrew, in a party-coloured coat.— This idol is locked up in a cabinet, when they are indolent and inactive at home, but they take it along with them when they go a hunting, or coursing in the fields. On those public occasions he is carried in procession in an open chariot, which is kept for that particular purpose, and the first beast they meet with is sacrificed to his honour. If the chase has proved successful, the idol, at their return, is placed in his nich, at the very summit of a hut, which is adorned from top to bottom, before and behind, and on each side, with marten-skins and sable-skins, the spoils of the chase; and these hang there till the weather entirely destroys them. It would be looked upon as profanation, and an act of sacrilege, to make use of them on any common occasion, or sell them to strangers, who might employ them to their own use.

The Tonguses, who are inhabitants of almost all the eastern parts of Siberia, practise the same kind of idolatrous worship. Whilst we are speaking of the Lanas of the Tartars, it would be an unpardonable omission to take no manner of notice of the Schamman of these Tonguses. They acknowledge a God, the creator of all things; but never make their applications to him in times of distress, whether public or private, but to some particular wooden idols, of a foot and a half long, carved only with a knife; which are treated with veneration or contempt, according as they give their adorers occasion either to expostulate with, or applaud them.

The Burates seem to pay divine adoration to the sun and moon; at least, as we are informed, they will admit of no discourse about any other deities. They celebrate, however, a kind of sacrifice, twice or thrice a year, which consists in driving stakes through their he-goats and sheep whilst they are alive, and planting them before their tents. They keep constantly bowing their heads to these victims, till they expire. They have their priests likewise, whom they murder, without the least provocation, whenever they think proper, alledging no other reason but this, that it is necessary for you to go into the other world to be our intercessors, and pray for us. After this, they inter these victims, and furnish them with money and apparel, for their better accommodation in the other world. They shew a peculiar veneration for a certain high mountain, on the borders of Baikal. There they frequently perform their sacrifices and administer their oaths to such as are to give them information on any affairs of importance. The party to be sworn is conducted to the summit of this mountain, and there pronounces the form with an audible voice, and they are assured at the same time, that if he be perjured, he shall never get down again alive.

The Wogulzes, as well as the Tonguses, entertain some idea of a God, who created all things.—They acknowledge, likewise, the resurrection of the dead, and believe, that the wicked will then be punished, and the righteous be rewarded. Their public worship consists in assembling themselves together, once a year, about autumn, to sacrifice in an adjacent wood one beast of every species. After which, they hang up their skins on the most beautiful trees in the forest, and prostrate themselves before them. This annual festival concludes with regaling themselves on the flesh of their sacrifices; after which they return home, and think themselves discharged from all religious duties for the current year.

The Circassian Tartars are reckoned as Mahometans and Greeks, there being several of both those persuasions amongst them: idolatry, nevertheless, has a prevailing power over them. When any person of distinction amongst them dies, they sacrifice a he-goat, hang up his skin upon a high pole in the middle of the town, and come one after another to pay it divine adoration. This skin is never taken down till some other person of distinction dies; and then they put up a fresh one in its place. J. de Luca, in his account informs us, that they sacrifice rams, and call those victims Curbans; and moreover, that the places where they are made, are deemed so sacred, that the most arrant thief amongst them will never venture to touch the least thing that is carried to them. He adds likewise, that there are bows, arrows, and scimitars, hung on the trees in these sacred places, as public testimonies that they have performed their vows. But, in all probability, this is no more than a repetition of the same story.

If we turn our course towards the north, and north-east of Asia, we shall find several nations so little known that it would be difficult to give any tolerable account of them; for which reason we shall not trouble the reader with an insignificant list of their barbarous names. We are informed in general, that they pay a kind of divine honour to the sun and moon; as also to some particular idols, or rather logs of wood made round, on the top whereof, there is a knob, cut something like the resemblance of a head, with a nose, mouth and eyes, but all after an unpolished and grotesque manner; for sculpture is an art they are but little acquainted with. These idolaters, we are further informed, have two sorts of idols, public and private: the former are revered by the whole body of the people; the latter are made by particular persons, and the objects only of devotion in that family to which they respectively belong. Their sacrifices consist in rabbing the mouths of their idols with the fat of fish, and presenting them with the warm blood of some beast, fresh killed in the chase.

The Ostiaks, who inhabit the southern parts of the Samoides, from the Irtyz and Oby to the river Jenitza, have likewise two sorts of idols: so that in all probability it is a received custom all over Tartary. This, in the main, does not differ from the practice of all other known idolaters, who never failed to add to their public gods, their lares and guardian deities. Their public idols are, for the most part, placed on the tops of the most agreeable mountains they can find, or in the middle of their forests, in small wooden huts, with commodious apartments contiguous to them, wherein they deposit the bones of such beasts as have been sacrificed in honour of those idols. They have no stated days or hours for the regular performance of their sacrifices. They only supplicate their gods when they stand in need of their assistance; but the priests, indeed, use their utmost endeavours to make the people shake off this shameful indifference. These priests have no regular ordination; every ancient house-keeper, we are informed, has sufficient authority of his own to exercise the priesthood.—And accordingly the worship of their public idols is somewhat more regular, as it is instituted by an authority more ancient, and better known. These idols they are peculiarly fond of, and the good old men recommend them to their children. Their sacrifices consist in the fat of fish, and in beasts of various kinds. The victim^a is exposed in the presence of the gods, with its legs tied; and after that the celebrant, or officiating priest, says before them, in the warmest terms, the petitions of their humble supplicants.

During this kind of prayer, one of the assistants stands with his bow levelled at the victim; and as soon as the priest has concluded, and struck the beast upon the head, he discharges his arrow, and another thrusts a stake through his body. After this, they take it by the tail, and drag it along three times, into the presence of the idol. The blood is preserved in a vessel consecrated for that particular purpose, some part whereof is used in sprinkling the idol's hut, another part is drank amongst them, and the idol's mouth is besmeared with the remainder. It is almost an universal custom amongst the Tartars, to hang up the head, feet, tail, and skin of the victim upon some particular trees; to regale themselves with the flesh, and to sing before and after their solemn entertainment. After this, they rub the idol's mouth a second time with the remaining fat of the sacrifice: They frequently pay the same deference and respect even to their domestic idols. The ceremony being over, the whole assembly shout for joy, and wave their sticks in the air, in honour to the soul of their idol, which, according to their notion, returns home after it has assisted at its own festival. From whence it is plain and manifest, that how savage and stupid soever they are represented to be, they are not so senseless as to imagine, that a stock or stone is absolutely the object which they ought to adore.

The bear has likewise some part in this divine worship. As soon as they have killed the creature, they pull off its skin, and hang it, in presence of their idol, up on a very high tree; and afterwards revere it, and amuse themselves with doleful lamentations, as if they repented of the impious deed.—They ridiculously plead, that it was the arrow, not they, that gave the fatal wound; and that the feathers added wings to its unhappy flight, &c. This extravagance is grounded on a received notion amongst them, that the soul of this beast, roving about the woods, from one side to the other, will take the first opportunity to gratify its resentment, in case they do not take timely care to appease its wrath, and make it some suitable reparation.

By the description of the idols of the Ostiaks, we may plainly discern, they bear some affinity to the Talismans; and we have informed our readers more than once, that it is very probable the infinite number of ancient idols in general owe their rise to the Talismans, unless we are more inclined to believe that the Talismans themselves were originally idols. One of those of the Ostiaks, we are informed, was a brazen goose, with her wings extended, whose peculiar province it was to take care of their geese, ducks, &c. and protect them from all disasters.—Another very remarkable idol is that which travellers have described under the denomination of the Old Man of Oby. His devotees oblige him to change his place of residence once every three years, and transport himself over the Oby, from one place to another, with abundance of solemnity, in a vessel made for that particular purpose. This Old Man of Oby is the guardian of their fishery. He is composed of wood; his nose, which resembles a hog's snout, has an iron hook in it, to denote, that he drags the fish out of the sea into the Oby. His eyes are made of glass, and his head is embellished with a pair of short horns. When the ice dissolves, and the river overflows her banks, the Ostiaks flock to him in a body to make their joint requests that he would be propitious to their fishery; but if the season does not answer their expectations, they load him with a thousand reproaches, and insult him after the most shameful manner; but, on the other hand, if they prove successful, the god, by way of retaliation, is allowed his share in the booty. He has the very first fruits of their labour; for before they presume to touch one dish themselves at their general feast, they rub his snout with some of the choicest fat. After their entertainment is over, they conduct the soul of the god back again, by beating the air with their cudgels. But, on the contrary, if the season has proved bad, or if they have met with any disappointments, they not only revile him, as we have before observed, but they strip him naked, and whip him, and throw him into the dirt, as an old, impotent, despicable deity. Those half-savage people treat their gods just as our children do their jointed dolls. We have somewhere before observed, that even some polite nations have been so whimsical and extravagant, as to make devotion and resentment by turns succeed each other: these devout infidels are much like gamblers, who curse and bless their fortune in a breath, and can never refrain treating her with blandishments or invectives, since it affords them a kind of consolation, and gives a vent to their passion.

As to the Samoides, they are idolators as well as the Ostiaks, but much more savage and unpolished. They adore the sun and the moon, to which they add some idols wrought in such an artless manner, that one would scarcely imagine they had any intention to resemble the human species. These idols are kept in their proper huts, or somewhere near them, or else hung upon their choicest trees; and they acknowledge according to De Bruyn,* one Supreme Being, called Heya.

The Czeremissian Tartars acknowledge one God, who is immortal, and the author of all good, and hold that there are evil spirits, or demons, who are the professed enemies of mankind, and take delight in tormenting them as long as they live; for which reason they offer up sacrifices to them in order to appease their wrath, and tempt them if possible, not to injure them. They take particular care to go in pilgrimages to a place, which the above-cited traveller calls Neimda, and to perform several other acts of devotion to their honour. There they carry their oblations to those malignant beings, and never presume to go empty-handed; being fully persuaded that those who are so imprudent as to carry nothing with them, will infallibly pine away, and die at last of some lingering distemper. The sacrifices which are peculiarly devoted to their deity, are either oxen or horses. The manner of roasting the flesh of one of them is this: They first throw large slices of it into a dish with one hand, having a bowl full of metheglin, or some liquor of the like nature, ready in the other; and then cast both together into a large fire, made before the skin of the victim. This skin is extended upon a pole, which is laid cross-ways, and rests between two trees. They implore this skin to present their humble petitions to their god, and be a mediator for them, and sometimes make their addresses directly to it. The sun and moon, as being the authors of the products of the earth, are likewise the objects of their divine adoration. These Tartars always perform their religious ceremonies near some rivers of rapid streams.

This is all that can be said, with any exactness and appearance of truth, relating to the religion of these almost savage nations. It is no easy task to clear up the accounts of some of our ancient travellers, and to justify their remarks by those which we find in the writings of the moderns. The ignorance of the former with respect to geography, their variations of the names of some countries they describe, and the imperfect and inaccurate accounts they have given us of the religion of these people, have all contributed towards this unhappy confusion. The moderns, though somewhat more exact, are notwithstanding chargeable with being too careless and remiss. It would be a fruitless attempt to search for the religion of the modern Tartars amongst the ancient Scythians. Such a learned enquiry would be attended with nothing but mere conjectures. The ancients themselves had but a very imperfect idea of the Scythians, and all we know is, that they confound several nations under that name, as we do under that of other of the Tartars; that these Scythians were Nomades, or Strollers, all over the countries, like the Tartars their descendants; that both the one and the other are people situated in Europe and Asia, to the north of Persia and the Indies; and in short, that the ancient Scythians spread themselves very far towards the east, as well as the modern Tartars.

The Lamas, who are the regular priests of the greatest part of Tartary, have their heads as well as their beards shaved; nor are these the only characteristics or marks of their dignity; for they wear a yellow hat, and a yellow gown, with long sleeves, which they tie with a girdle of the same colour.—In their hands they carry a yellow chaplet, which they are perpetually tumbling over, because, according to their rules, they ought to pray without ceasing. According to the same laws they ought to live in a state of celibacy, and devote themselves to the constant practice of all good works. There are nuns, we are informed, of this order of Lamas, who are subject to the same law, and obliged to observe the same vow.

The priests of the Tonguses have a principal or superior, whom they call Schamman, and devote themselves wholly to the study and practice of the black art; whereas the Lamas know little or nothing of it. The Schamman, in the exercise of his magical operations, observes the following strange method. After he has gone through his preliminary penances he puts on a kind of robe or covering, composed of divers pieces of old iron, some in the form of birds, others in that of beasts and fishes; and all are hung together by rings of the same metal. He puts on stockings of the same materials, and gloves likewise of the same sort, made in fashion of a bear's paw. He claps on iron horns likewise upon his head. Thus equipped, he takes a drum in one hand, and a little wand, embellished with the skins of mice, in the other; leaps and capers about, crossing his legs sometimes this way, and sometimes that, observing at the same time the tune, and accompanying it with the most hideous outcries. In all these movements his eyes are stedfastly fixed on a hole at the top of his hut; and as soon as ever he discerns a black bird, which, as is pretended, perches on the roof, and vanishes in a moment, he falls upon the ground in a kind of a trance, and continues for about a quarter of an hour entirely deprived, to outward appearance, of all sense and reason; and when he comes to himself, he resolves the queries of those who consult him.

The priests of the Samoides, who are likewise magicians, when any one consults them, put a rope round their necks, according to De Bruyn, and tie it so tight, that they fall down as if they were dead. When they foretel any future event, the blood gushes out of some part of their faces, and stops again as soon as they have finished their prediction. Our author, by the rest of the description, seems to intimate that there is no material difference between these people and the Schammans, and other priests of the Tartars. We have already observed, that the Burates, when any one is to take a solemn oath, carry the party to a high mountain, and there makes him swear with an audible voice, assuring him at the same time, that if he proves perjured, he will never get down again alive.

The Ostiaks display all their instruments of war before the party who takes the oath, to intimate, that if he forswears himself, some one of those weapons, shall infallibly, in a few days, be the instrument of his absolute destruction. The Tonguses clear themselves of any crime laid to their charge, by the death of a dog; thrusting a knife into his left thigh, and cutting him open to the very mouth; and after this they suck up every drop of his blood.

The Ostiack takes his oath upon a bear's skin, spread upon the ground, whereon are laid a hatchet, a knife, and a piece of bread, which is tendered to him. Before he eats it, he declares all he knows relating to the matter in question, and confirms the truth of his evidence by this solemn imprecation:—"May this bear tear me to pieces, this bit of bread choke me, this knife be my death, and this hatchet sever my head from my body, if I do not speak the truth." In dubious cases, they present themselves before an idol, and pronounce the same oath with this additional circumstance, that he who takes the oath, cuts off a piece of the idol's nose with his knife, "If I forswear myself, may this knife cut off my own nose in the same manner, &c.

The Mongals and Calmoucs give themselves but very little trouble with respect to the degrees of consanguinity, in their marriage engagements, for they make no scruple of lying even with their mothers. The issue of such incestuous matches are looked upon as legitimate, and have a right of inheritance, as well as any others: but in case they be the children of a Chan, or some other person of distinction, he who is born in honourable wedlock is preferred before them. It is insinuated, that if the son spares his mother, the father is not so scrupulous with regard to his daughter, and they give this reason for their conduct: A woman is like the earth; and both the one and the other ought to be cultivated. They should never lie fallow; for nature had the same view in the formation of them both, with this difference only, that the culture of one is vain and fruitless after a certain number of years.—They are not ignorant, that a soil, however exhausted, harassed and worn out, will by extraordinary care and artful management, become as fruitful as ever; but as for women their age is irreparable, they are lands but of short duration, they ought therefore never to lie neglected, as long as they are able to produce any crop. This is a specimen of the Tartars manner of reasoning; and in conformity thereto, they take particular care to find out young wives, for after they are forty years of age, they look upon them only as governments of their families, or even simply as their domestics, and the major part of the savage Americans observe the same custom. The other Tartars are as regardless of the degrees of consanguinity, as those we have already described. Some of their most conscientious indeed will never marry either their mothers-in-law, or their sisters; but the Czeremissian Tartars make no scruple with regard to the latter. We have nothing more material to add, but that after a child is six months old, they give it the name of such object, whatever it be, as first presents itself before them.

There is nothing very remarkable in the courtship and amorous adventures of these people. Love with them, and such like them, is neither constrained nor polished; and the women, who, doubtless, have no idea of any state superior to their own are as contented with their lot, as the rest of their sex are in other countries. The want of knowledge, and a narrow imagination, constitute the greatest part of human happiness in this world; and if so, they whose reason is bounded by their grossest bodily necessities, are much more happy than other people. But to return to the Tartarian gallantry: Their courtship of the young ladies consists in the purchase of them. Amongst the Ostiaks, the gallant sends one of his friends to his mistress's father, in order to agree about the price; and when the bargain is actually made, the intended father-in-law covenants to surrender and yield up his daughter at the expiration of a certain term therein limited; and during the whole courtship, the man must not, on any account whatever, presume to visit his mistress. If he pays his respects to her father and mother, he goes backward into the house, not presuming to look them in the face; and as a farther testimony of his esteem and submission, turns his head on one side whenever he speaks to them. At the expiration of the term of his courtship, the father according to his contract, surrenders his daughter to his son-in-law, and at the same time recommends them to a happy union, as the fundamental article of wedlock; but what the Ostiacs may mean by that expression is a nice point to determine.

The Ostiac, as a trial of his wife's honour, cuts a handful of hair off a bear's skin, and presents it to her. If she be virtuous she accepts of the offer without the least reluctance, but if she be conscious of her own inconstancy, she ingeniously refuses to touch it, whereupon her husband immediately puts her away, and that is all the ill consequence that attends her illegal amours, and besides she has the liberty to marry whom she pleases after such separation.

This ingenious confession of their wives is owing to their dread of being torn to pieces by the paws of the very bear, the hair of whose hide is made use of as an experiment to prove their chastity or falsehood. This bear, according to their notion, revives at the expiration of three years, in order to devour the bride, who is perjured and inconstant. This punishment of their infidelity is so moderate and easy to be borne, that it is scarce worth their while to prevaricate, in order to shun it.

The mourning of children for their parents amongst the Tartars, in general, consists in weeping over them for several days successively; and during all that time they are obliged to abstain from all manner of amusements, and from the society of women for several months. The child must inter his father or mother with all the funeral pomp and solemnity his circumstances will admit of, and pay his usual respects to their respective tombs, which must be attended not only with tears, but loud lamentations. These people as well as the Indians, Chinese, &c. make provision for their dead, and supply them with variety of apparel. The Wogul-hes extend their charity to their very dogs; they inter them honourably, and erect a little hut on purpose for them, in order to preserve their memory. There is no other testimony of their respect omitted in commemoration of them, but that of making their formal lamentations round their mausoleums. The Tonguses hang their dead upon some particular trees, and there leave them till they have nothing but skin and bones remaining, when they inter them.

The Jekutzes also hang up their deceased relations in the very same manner, and when their skeletons are perfectly dry, adorn them with coral, and little pieces of painted glass. Afterwards they carry them in solemn procession round their houses, and revere them as idols.

The Ostiacs either bury their dead, or hide both them and their bows, arrows, implements of household furniture, and provisions in the snow, out of the very same principle as others do, who are habituated to these customs. A widow, to testify her unfeigned sorrow for the loss of her dearly beloved husband, takes an idol, dresses it up in the good man's clothes, lays it in the bed with her, and effects to have it always before her eyes, in order to aggravate her grief, and bring her departed husband to her remembrance; and can any thing be more natural? Our European widows would behave much after the same manner, did they care their deceased husbands' pictures, kiss them, ask them a thousand endearing questions, and weep over them; and indeed some of them have been known to take up every individual thing wore in his lifetime, and blubber over every piece. The widows of the Ostiacs kiss the idols of the deceased husbands, and honour them as partners of their beds for a whole year together; and then they are looked upon as incumbrances, and thrown neglected by in some corner of the house; then there is no mention of their old bed-fellows, and the time of their mourning is accomplished. The Samoides, according to De Bruyn, hang their deceased infants that have not attained the age of one year, upon trees; but inter between two boards, such as are of a more advanced age; and drown or otherwise make away with their relations, who are superannuated, infirm, and entirely a burden to themselves and all about them. Near the place where they bury their dead, they hang up their fire-arms, their hatchets, their hammers, and in short, all the other implements which they made use of whilst in the land of the living.

It is remarkable that all these people in Tartary, notwithstanding their difference in many fundamental articles of religion, yet agree in believing the transmigration of souls. Some are of opinion, that the real souls transmigrate from one body to another; while others only imagine that the faculties transmigrate to animate another body. These last, in all probability, only imagine that there is an emanation of virtues: because they confound the body and soul together. There is something like this to be met with even so near us as France. Thus when a priest reputed for his sanctity dies, or any other person of uncommon merit, the people bring their children to the bed-side, to hover over his face in order to catch the last gasp of his breath, that they may become partakers of his fame and virtues.—Nay, they carry their superstition much farther: for they set open all their doors and windows that the soul may have an easy passage.

To meet with such notions and practices among the ancient heathens is not at all surprising, because ignorance of the true God leads to idolatry, and idolatry creates absurdities. Nor is it surprising to meet with such notions and practices among the modern Tartars, who are far more barbarous and brutal in their manners than most of the heathen nations of old: but to meet with it in France is really surprising. A polite people to be slaves to superstition! Yes: But let us remember, that the learned are deists, and the ignorant enthusiasts.— Nothing less than divine grace can set bounds to human imaginations; nothing less than the power of God can keep human nature under proper restraints. The imagination roves from one object to another, and generally, consistent with its own capriciousness, fixes upon the worst.

What has been here advanced may, with great propriety be applied to the heathen nations in general, but to none more properly than the Tartars. They are a numerous body of people, they are divided into a vast number of clans or hordes, and each tribe has something in its religion differing from the others. In their natural lives they wander from one place to another, without a settled habitation; and in their different forms of religion they wander from all that is truth; some of them worship devils, some images, and some are so ignorant that they have hardly any notion of the Supreme Being. Here the pious reader will be affected, when he hears so many of his fellow creatures, ignorant of the gospel of Christ, and strangers to the covenant of promise, are destitute of the peace of God which passeth all understanding, having no views of a future state, no hopes of a blessed immortality.— To all this may be added, the many horrid barbarities daily committed by those of one horde or another, and all this is owing to the want of true religion in the soul, which, when properly cultivated, refuses itself throughout every part of the conduct.

As nothing has been attempted by the Christians in Europe towards the conversion of these heathens, and as we have reason to believe, that previous to the second coming of Christ all the world will embrace the gospel, so we may rest satisfied that some great event yet waits to be accomplished. How, when, or by whom as the instruments, this important event will be brought about it is impossible for us to say, or even to form any conjecture. But from what we know of the goodness of God, we have reason to believe it will take place; and as for the means to be used in conducting it, let us rest satisfied, that the judge of all the earth will do right. In the mean time, let us study to make a proper use of those inestimable blessings we enjoy; for from those to whom much is given, much will be required.

RELIGION IN LAPLAND.

DR. Smollet, in his ironical manner, calls the inhabitants of Lapland the sag-end of the human creation, which illiberal and invidious expression seems to arise from not considering, that these people have the same rational faculties as others, and only want the means to improve themselves. Now under such circumstances, let us seriously ask, whether these people are the objects of laughter and ridicule? Are they not objects rather of pity, especially when we consider that our ancestors were once as ignorant as they, and probably more barbarous. Nay, barbarity is not so much as imputed to the Laplanders, even by those who take a savage pleasure in ridiculing them for what is not in their power to prevent. That they are slaves to superstition is not denied, but that superstition never leads them to any thing of a cruel or barbarous nature. Secure in their simple huts, they live without giving offence to each other; and if they have but little knowledge, they have but few sins to account for. The author of this thinks it no small pleasure to have been some years acquainted with a native of Lapland, who is now one of the most ingenious artists in London.

In his early youth he was brought from his native country to Stockholm, in Sweden, where he had the benefit of a liberal education, was baptized, and studied the theory and practice of music. From thence he came to England, and now resides in London. His ingenuity in the art he professes, his affability in conversation, sweetness of temper, and, above all, his unfeigned piety, has created him many friends, but not more than his merit entitles him to. Thus we find that it is only owing to the want of cultivating the rational faculties, that the natives of such inhospitable deserts remain in a state of ignorance. Let those sovereigns who claim a supremacy over them, send some men of piety and virtue to instruct them in the principles of learning and religion, and then they will be equally useful and polite as the rest of their subjects.

Lapland consists of a vast extent of land running from the westerly extremity of Norway on the north, to the easterly extremity of that part of Russia, which is in Europe. During one half of the year, the country is entirely frozen over, and in some parts there is a total darkness during four months, there being no light but what proceeds from the moon. But the transparent light of the moon upon the snow, makes partly an amends for this deficiency; and the poor natives, when they want to visit each other, are drawn on sledges by rein deer over the mountains of snow and ice. Such is the state of this country in general, which leads us to consider their religious sentiments and ceremonies.

The natives of Lapland, excepting a few who live in the southern parts, are heathens, and gross idolators. Their chief god is Thor, the same as was worshipped by the Anglo-Saxons, and in memory of whom we call one of the days of the week Thursday. This idol is represented as a warrior, placed on a pedestal like the square table of an altar, raised about three feet high, about a bow-shot from their houses, and surrounded with pines to give it the air of a sanctuary.

Subordinate to this deity, or rather idol, is Storjunnarr, who acts as vicar, or viceroy to Thor.—They believe that it is in and through his mediation that all temporal blessings are bestowed, and it is him who is the protector and guardian of all the beasts of the field; and consequently it is to him they make their applications for success in their pursuit of the chase.

Storjunnarr is a kind of domestic deity, or household god, for every family has an image of him.—They believe that he often appears personally among them, and he is represented under the figure of a square stone, without any sculpture upon it; for they content themselves with such rough unpolished stones as they find on the mountains! and they imagine that it is Storjunnarr who directs them in their search. This stone god is frequently supplied with a large family of children, that is, they place a vast number of small stones around him, one whereof is his wife, and the others his children and domestics.

Their next deity in order is called Beywe, or the sun; but there is nothing particular in the adoration they offer up to him. He is likewise represented under the form of a great stone, without any sculpture upon it, and the oblations they offer, consist of their victuals and drink, part of which they pour down upon the stone.

Wirchu-Archa, is a female deity, and called by them the god of old women, and is only an artless stone like the rest; but besides these they worship several spirits, angels, and devils; and likewise the souls of their departed relations. They believe with the Tartars, that souls pass from one body to another; but of this ancient doctrine they have very confused notions. No doubt but they learned it originally from the Tartars, from whom it appears they are descended.

They have a number of impostors among them, who pretend to know magic, by which they delude the ignorant, and make them believe whatever they please. In all their sacrifices, they offer rein deer, for that being the creature most useful to themselves, they imagine it will be the most acceptable to their gods. Sometimes, indeed, they sacrifice other animals, such as dogs, cats, hens, and chickens; but before they offer any of these sacrifices, they use the following ceremony to discover whether or not it will be acceptable.

After they have tied up the victim behind their hut, they strip off some of the hair from under the neck of the animal, which they fasten to one of the rings of a drum, appropriated for that particular service, and which one of their priests beats, while the whole assembly of the people sing a short prayer. If the bunch of rings to which they fastened the hair of the victim, and which before was immovable, should turn about in an instant, and point to their god Thor, they look upon it that the sacrifice is acceptable to that god. But on the contrary, if the bunch of rings remain fixed and immovable, notwithstanding the motion of the drum, they present the victim to another god while the drum is beating, and the people singing a second prayer or hymn. In all their devotions they pay much regard to the season of the year, but autumn is that to which they pay most regard, probably because the fruits of the earth are then ripe, and they are about shifting themselves home to their huts.

At this time they erect a new statue to their god Thor, and afterwards cut the throat of a rein deer in his presence, and smear the statue all over with the blood and fat of the victim. When this ceremony is over, they inter the remains of the victim in the same place. Besides this idol they are obliged to erect another every time they sacrifice a rein deer, and all these images being ranged together behind their huts, they cut the throat of the victim and offer it up in sacrifice. The victim is in general a rein deer of the male kind, which they sacrifice by thrusting a knife into its heart. The blood that flows is preserved in a bowl, and they smear it all over the head of their god Thor, and draw several strokes on him in the form of crosses. Behind the idol they place the horns and bones of the rein deer's head, and before him a small box made of birch wood, filled with little slices of flesh, cut off from every part of the victim's body, with some fat preserved underneath it. The remainder of the flesh is preserved for the use of the family.

When they offer sacrifices to Storjunnarr, they run a thread through the right ear of the victim, and observe all the ceremonies already mentioned, with this exception only, that the sacrificing priests takes the horns and bones of the head and neck of the victim, as also the claws and feet, and carries them to a mountain, devoted to the honour of Storjunkarr, for whose service the victim was slain.—As soon as the priest rises, he approaches the sacred stone, stands uncovered, and makes a profound reverence before it. After this first act of devotion, he besmears the stone all over with the blood and fat of the victim, deposits the horns by the idol, ties his tail to the right horn, and to the left a red thread run through a plate of pewter, with a bit of small silver.

Sometimes they celebrate festivals in honour of their Storjunkarr, and then they sacrifice some animal in the idol's presence which they dress in their own way, and every one eats a part of it. But what they eat must be of the flesh that is upon the head and neck, and they leave the skin extended on the place, where it lies for many years together. Sometimes, when the mountain is steep and difficult of access, they offer up their sacrifices at the foot of it, and afterwards take a stone dipped in the blood of the rein deer, and make an attempt as if they were going to throw it up to the top of the mountain.

They revere the image of this idol in the same manner as they do that of Thor, but as it is only a helpless stone, so there is no more required than to remove the old idol, and replace another of the same shape. They range the branches of young trees around the idol, and this ceremony is observed twice in the year, namely, in the middle of summer, and in the middle of winter. If when they place these boughs or branches, they find that the stone which is the object of worship, can be easily removed, then they imagine that their god will be propitious to them; but when they find it heavy and ponderous, they imagine that the god is displeased, and they dread the effects of his vengeance. In such an unhappy case, they study all the ways they can think of, to appease his anger, and avert his judgments, and from that moment engage to make him new oblations.

These Laplanders never sacrifice to the sun any other animals besides the rein deer, but they observe all the ceremonies already mentioned, except that they run a white thread through the right ear of the victim, to denote its being devoted to the service of the sun, and except also that in their other sacrifices they make choice of birch trees, in this they use only willows. With these willows they form two circles, about the circumference of half a tun, and round them hang little slices of flesh which they cut off from every part of the victim. These they afterwards deposit on a table behind their huts, as also the principal bones of the victim disposed in a circular form.

As to the souls of their departed relations, they never make any images of them, but testify their veneration for them by particular sacrifices. On such occasions the priest beats a drum, in order to know whether the idol is pleased with the sacrifice. As soon as they imagine that the idol is satisfied with the victim offered to him, they take out the heart, liver, and lungs, dip them in the blood of the victim, and bury them before the altar. This species of idolatry is very ancient; it was practised by the Greeks and Romans, by the heathen nations who overthrew the Roman empire, and even to this day we may find many remains of it among the inhabitants of those nations, where knowledge never yet came.

With respect to spirits, or aerial beings, of whom they worship many, they have no images, but pay their adoration to them under trees, planted near their houses. This act of devotion consists in offering up a sacrifice to these spirits, about the latter end of December; and this is introduced with abstinence and fasting, at least from all flesh meat, and if any is provided for them, they give it those whom they suppose have none. All the fragments left at the feast, are put into a box made of birch, and this box is hung upon a tree behind the house, for the subsistence of such spirits as rove about on the mountains and in the forests.

It is difficult to say from whence this species of superstition took its origin, because it seems to be peculiar to the people in this part of the country; but then it is necessary that we should consider that there are some differences to be found in the worship of all heathen nations. All arose from this single circumstance, namely, neglecting the true God, and setting up their own images in the room of his commandments.

The Laplanders are so much addicted to superstition, that they adore the first object that presents itself to them in the morning. They never suffer their wives to go to the door first, lest there should be a rein deer, for in such cases they would be obliged to go a hunting all the day. Every house, every family, have their own peculiar deities; they have places erected for them, and as their priests are numerous, so they are never at a loss for some of them to officiate. Whether in sacrifice, or by any other means, a drum is always used, for they believe there is something magical in the sound of that instrument. Indeed this is not in the least surprising, because all the northern nations made use of drums in their religious sacrifices, and transmitted them to their camps and to their battles. Such is the origin of drums, and although they make at present a distinguishing figure in our armies, yet they were no more original than implements of superstition and idolatry.

There are some other particulars in which the Laplanders differ from all the people we know of in the world. They believe that there are two Supreme Beings, but so gross are their notions, that they believe one of these beings to be mortal, and the other immortal. The mortal being they believe dies in consequence of any person breaking wind backward against him, and then he is succeeded by another who reigns till he meets with the same misfortune. On the other hand, the immortal being resides always in heaven, and is not affected by the passions of men, he is indifferent about their wants, and unconcerned about their condition in this world. And is not this epicurianism in the highest degree? Indeed we are of opinion, that notwithstanding what has been said against Epicurius, as a moral philosopher, yet he was not the father or author of those sentiments which bear his name. If he was, why should we find them among heathen nations, who never knew any thing of literature? Does an ignorant Laplander know any thing of Epicurius or Lucretius? No, they never heard of their names, and yet they have imbued all their notions. From what source does all these flow? The answer is obvious. The corruption of human nature has sunk so deep, that it has contaminated the minds of the whole race of human beings. All mankind are extremely fond of knowing more than has been revealed to them, and therefore they are apt to form the same notions of God as of themselves. This is the fundamental error in all religious dispensations, it is a poison which runs through the whole body; but having said so much by way of digression, we shall now proceed with our narrative.

All religious ceremonies are less or more conducted by beating of drums, and it is very remarkable, that these people never undertake any thing, not even so much as common diversions, without first consulting the drum. But it is obvious to every one's observation, that these drums are not all exactly of the same fashion, and the reason of it may possibly be, because some of them are more adapted for magical operations, and more mischievous than others. There are two appendixes, which are absolutely necessary to render these drums complete, and fit for use, and they are the mark and the hammer. The former points out the the thing, or secret enquired after, on the painted figures of the drum, and the latter is made use of to beat with. What they call the mark is a large copper ring, to which they fasten several others of a less size, which make a large bunch altogether. The fashion of those rings however, frequently varies. One of them is made of a very thick plate of copper, about the size of a crucible, with a square hole in the middle, and with little brass chains, which hang down instead of rings, and meet together in a circle. The other is a brass ring, with a small round plate of brass hung to it by several small chains, and the hammer or stick, with which they beat this drum, is made of a rein deer's horn. The Laplanders do not aim at making a great noise with their drums, but are chiefly solicitous, as we have before observed, about the motion of the rings, that according to their position, they may form a right judgment of such secrets as they want to have revealed.

These Laplanders have such an extraordinary veneration for their drum, that they will not permit a maid that is marriageable so much as to touch it.—When they remove from one place to another it is the last utensil that is carried off the premises, and after every one of the family is departed, they are peculiarly careful in the conveyance of it to their new apartment. It is given in charge to the husband, as his peculiar province; for the wife must not presume to meddle with it, and they always find out on this occasion, some by-way, very different and distant from the high road. They are apprehensive, that if any one, but more particularly a married woman, or a marriageable maid, should by accident go the same by-way, within three days after the drum has past, she would either die upon the spot, or some fatal disaster would befall her. A brass ring however, presented in a solemn manner, for the service of the drum, makes an atonement for any such misfortune. The Laplander in all his magical consultations with the drum, must be upon his knees, and so must all who attend him; the consequences whereof are, as we are informed, surprising and supernatural; but as they want due confirmation, the best way will be to suspend our belief.

The drum which is peculiarly appropriated to magical purposes, is somewhat different with respect to its form, from those made use of on other occasions. That part of it which may properly be called the handle is made like a cross, and divides it into four equal parts. This drum is embellished, for the generality, with the claws and bones of such beasts as they have hunted down in pursuit of their game. When they make use of it on any magical occasion, their usual practice is this: In order to know, for instance, the transactions of any foreign country, one of their operators beats the drum in the following manner: He first lays a large quantity of brass rings linked together, with several small brass chains upon that particular place where the sun is delineated. Then he beats the drum in such a manner, with his horn, hammer, or stick, that the rings are put in motion. During this action, he sings very distinctly a song, which in the language of Lapland is called Jouke, and all the natives that are present, both men and women add their respective songs, which are distinguished by the name of Duvra. The words which they utter are so distinct, that they nominate the very place, of which they want some secret intelligence.

After he has beat the drum for some considerable time, he raises it to his head, and then drops instantly down upon the ground, like one fast asleep or in a trance. His senses are all lost, his pulse ceases to beat, and he is in short a dead man to all outward appearance; from whence it has been thought that the soul of the magician actually abandons his body for a time, and, through the assistance of some invisible spirits, is conveyed to those very countries, of which they want such intelligence as before-mentioned. Whilst the officiating Laplander is in this situation, this state of insensibility, he is, notwithstanding, we are told, in such extremity of pain, that the sweat runs down his face, and all over his body, and mean while the whole assembly continue singing, till he returns from his reverie to his perfect senses. For should they cease, or endeavour to awake him by the least touch imaginable, the magician, as we are further told, would inevitably die; and in all probability, that is the reason why they take a more than ordinary care at such a time, to prevent flies, or insects of any other kind from settling near him. When he is perfectly awake, and come to himself, he gives a full account of the informations he has received, and answers all interrogatories of the whole assembly.

The duration of this ecstatic slumber is very uncertain; but it never lasts, at the most, as we are informed, above four and twenty hours; the conjuror, however, let him recover his senses sooner or later, always produces some token of the thing or country inquired after, as an undeniable testimony of his supernatural abilities.

What has already been said is sufficient, we presume, to give the reader an adequate idea of the use which these Laplanders make of their drum. We shall only add, therefore, this cursory remark, that their physicians likewise make use of it, to discover the cause and quality of their patients' distempers; that is to say, whether they are the mere results of chance, or of nature, and to find out the best ways and means they can to appease their gods on all such occasions. We must not, however, omit one thing, which is very remarkable; that is, if the rings of the drum turn from the left to the right, it is looked upon as a propitious omen, being conformable to the course of the sun, which is the great dispenser of the various blessings of nature, and the inexhaustible source of all agreeable objects. But, on the contrary, if they turn from the right to the left, as their course is the reverse of that of the sun, it portends some fatal misfortunes, malignant distempers, or the plagues of poverty and distress.

There is something very particular in their sale of the winds. The Norwegians, northern Laplanders, and such as reside on the borders of the Bottnic gulph, sell them to travellers and sailors. The secret of this magical commodity consists in a rope with three knots, which they dispose of to their customers at the very best price they can get. As soon as the first knot is untied, a gentle breeze arises; at unravelling the second, the wind blows brisk, and swells their sails; but storms and tempests fill the skies when they venture to undo the third; they are no longer masters of their vessels, and shipwreck is their inevitable portion. This secret, as Scheffer assures us, depends entirely on the nativity of the magician. He has an absolute power over that particular wind, which blew the moment he was born; so that one is lord and ruler of the east wind, and another of the west, and as they have the secret power to set a ship a sailing, so likewise can they stop it when under sail.

The Laplanders, likewise, as we are informed, make use of some certain magical javelins, which they throw at their enemies to annoy them, and by this act of fascination, they are able sometimes to afflict their adversaries with very violent distempers; but if their hearts fail them in the personal execution of such injuries, they will at least do all the mischief they possibly can by proxy, and make dreadful havoc of their flocks and cattle. Most authors, indeed, have omitted this particular circumstance; but they all agree that there are some familiar spirits, or imaginary demons, whom these northern people call Gans, employed by them to accomplish, as far as they are able, all their private schemes of malice and revenge.

The instrument called tyre by these Laplanders, is another of their magical machines, which, according to our historians is, to all outward appearance, nothing but a ball about the bigness of a walnut, or a small apple, and composed of the down of some particular animal. This little machine is round and smooth, and so light that it seems to be perfectly hollow. It is a motley, or party-coloured commodity, yellow, green, and grey, but mostly of a yellowish cast; and the Laplanders, as we are informed, set them to sale, and look upon them, as it were, animated, and so far capable of action that the purchaser can send them where and to whom he pleases. The motion of this tyre is like that of a whirlwind, and its mischievous effects, however personally intended, falls always on the first animal that obstructs his way.

We shall close this article with a short detail of their superstitions relating to the chase. In the first place then, we must take notice that they are very observant of lucky and unlucky days; that in order to discover the one, and avoid the other, they consult their drum; and that when they are determined to pursue their game, they always go through a back passage, contrived for that purpose, lest they should meet with some woman or other at the street door, which they look upon as an unpropitious rencounter.

The hunting of the bear is accompanied with such extraordinary formalities, that one would imagine they paid a peculiar regard to that savage creature. As soon as they have opened the chase, by the consultation of their drum, according to the custom observed on the occasion, he who has discovered the bear's hold, marches at the head of a numerous train of huntsmen; without any other weapon of defence but a long staff, with a brass ring on the top of it: and after him follows the drummer. Each individual assistant has likewise his particular province assigned him. After they have killed the desperate savage, they sing a kind of triumphal song over him, and therein congratulate him on his death, and return him thanks for having done them no mischief. After this, they whip him with a bunch of rods, and then carry him to a cottage, prepared on purpose for his reception, where they flay him, cut him up, and dress him. The whole train of huntsmen attend the sledge or carriage in which their prey is extended, and sing during the procession, a song suitable to the occasion, wherein they beg of him not to resent the ill treatment he has met with, or injure those who are any ways instrumental to his ruin, and the rein deer which drew the sledge must be employed no more on any occasion whatsoever, all that year. The wives assemble themselves together at the cottage above-mentioned, and there wait the return of their husbands, who at their first arrival, desire them in a chanting tone, to chew the bark of an alder-tree between their teeth, and spit it in their faces. Every huntsman, when the bear is lodged within the cottage where it is to be dressed, is obliged, according to custom, to repair to another commodious apartment adjacent to it, where their wives are, who having their mouths full of alder bark ready chewed, discharge it in their faces, that they may seem at least, as if they are besmeared with the blood of the savage monster. Here it is that the wives regale their husbands with the products of their toil and fatigue.

There are several other circumstances in the description of their bear-hunting, which we shall purposely omit, and content ourselves with such only as are very singular. All those who are concerned in the chase, or come in at the bear's death, are obliged to abstain from the conversation of their wives for the three days next ensuing; and the principal or captain of the band, for five. The skin of the beast is hung upon the top of a tall pole, and the women shoot at it with their bows and arrows. Every one is very ambitious of hitting the mark, since she who first succeeds is the most honoured and respected. This piece of dexterity is looked upon as the happy presage that her husband will be the foremost in the chase of the next bear. It is this woman's province likewise, according to Scheffer, to take several pieces of stuff, and fasten as many crosses upon each of them as they have conquered bears, and to hang these trinkets about the necks of all such as were assistants in the chase, who are obliged to wear them for three days together; that is, till the setting of the sun on the last day. A cross made after the same manner is hung about the neck of the rein deer, which drew the bear from the forest to the cottage. In all probability the intercourse which these Laplanders have had with the Christians, induced them to look upon these crosses as preservatives against the demons, or geni of the forest, who, perhaps, may resent all indignities offered to their savage subjects.

As the chief riches of the country consist in their abundance of rein deer, so the young woman whose parents possesses most of these animals, has the greatest number of gallants. Rein deer are the absolute property of the young persons of both sexes, it being customary for their parents to make them presents of them as soon as they are born. A Laplander, in the choice of his wife, has an eye particularly to her wealth, and in this he acts in the same manner as the people in other nations. The lover never courts his mistress himself, but employs an old woman as match maker, in the same manner as in China, Tartary, and other nations. Some skins of wild beasts, and feathers of curious fowls, are sent as presents to the intended bride, and after some formalities are over, the bridegroom is permitted to visit the bride's relations. If he is permitted to speak to his mistress, it is esteemed a very great favour, but this seldom happens till after several visits to the parents.

At the first interview they salute each other with an affectionate kiss, and a sanguine squeeze of their noses one against the other, which is an essential point, the neglect of it being looked upon as a declaration of coldness and dislike. Their marks of love are heightened by the presents the gallant brings with him, which, among other things, consists of rein deer tongues, of which they make delicious feasts. The young woman, who is surrounded by her relations, pretends, either through shame or modesty, to decline his favours; but at the same time gives him a private signal to withdraw, and, when alone, with pleasure accepts of them all.—From thence forward, the young Laplander thinks himself entitled to greater liberties, and gives a full loose to his passion. He begs the favour of his mistress to let him sleep by her side, or in other words, to lie with her; but if she is not amorously inclined, she throws his presents on the ground with disdain. It is some considerable time before all the preliminaries are settled, because the girl's relations are seemingly loth to give their consent, which is all artifice, and the pure result of an avaricious disposition. For the gallant, during the whole time of the courtship, is daily making them some valuable presents, in order to ingratiate himself into their favour, and obtain their consent, and they are cunning enough to know that there will be but few presents after their marriage.

When all parties are absolutely agreed, a certain day is appointed for the celebration of their nuptials and the bridegroom must bring along with him more presents, some for the bride and some for her relations. The marriage ceremony consists in the priest's striking a flint with steel, and the bride and bridegroom light tapers at it. Then they walk home to their huts, and the bridegroom is obliged to serve his father-in-law a whole year after the marriage, and then he takes home his wife and her fortune.—When a woman is pregnant, they pretend to know whether she will have a son or a daughter, and this they do by consulting the moon. When a star appears above that planet, it indicates the birth of a boy; and when a star appears near and seems to go before it, it is a happy presage that the child will be healthy, robust and active.

Scheffer tells us, that when a native falls sick, he sends for one whom he imagines most skilful in the use of the drum, who, in order to restore him, first offers up a rein deer as a sacrifice to one of their idols; then he beats the drum, and falls down in either a real or imaginary trance. He continues in this inactive situation about an hour, and during that time, those who are present sing the magician's song, which restores him to his senses. He rises up, takes his drum, and clapping it close to his ear, beats softly upon it. Afterwards he stands for some short time like one in deep contemplation, and then relates all that was delivered to him while in a trance.

When a man dies, his whole family leaves the house; for they have a notion, that the soul of the deceased hovers round the corpse. They generally bury the bodies of their dead in gloomy caverns, the mouths of which they stop up with stones. They put into the cavern beside the dead, a hatchet, a steel, flint, and a tinder-box; and the reason they give for this strange ceremony is, that as the deceased will want light, so he may strike it when he pleases. We are assured that the ancient Danes and Saxons, before they were converted to Christianity, buried warlike instruments along with the dead, of which many have been dug up in different parts of Britain; and probably, this was the practice of all the heathen nations in the world.

In Lapland the hatchet is laid beside the deceased, that in case he should meet in his way with briars and thorns, or boughs of trees to obstruct his passage through the thick forests, he may cut them down; for they believe that no person after death can be admitted into heaven, unless he fights his way into it. This notion of their's seems to proceed from the nature of the climate where they live; their nights being long and dark, they imagine the dead meet with the same inconveniences in their way to heaven. At their funerals they kill the rein-deers which drew the body of the deceased to the grave, and make merry over their corpse, in memory of their friend being removed out of a world of grief and sorrow. They have one more custom relating to their dead, which is singular enough. They pour brandy over the face of the corpse, and dance round it, singing their funeral songs in praise of the deceased.

When they take an oath, they wish the devil may come and fetch them away, with their wives, children, and rein-deers, if they perjure themselves. They have confused notions concerning the creation, of the world; and whenever they see the moon eclipsed, they believe that planet is attacked by some malicious devils, and on such occasions, they think it their duty to give her all the assistance they can. In this emergency, they take their arms and shoot at her, and continue to do so till the eclipse is over. When it thunders, the Laplanders imagine that God is chastising the devils, and that they, in order to escape his vengeance, take shelter under the bellies of their dogs; for that reason, as long as the thunder continues, they keep those creatures shut out of doors.

When they sit down to eat, they invoke their idols to bless their provisions for their use, and they gather up all the bones of the rein deer, and throw them into their marshy grounds. This they look upon as absolutely necessary, because if neglected, the rein deer would become indolent and inactive. They ascribe to their witches a power to augment the coldness of the weather; but then none are duly qualified for this operation, but such as have been born in winter. These women take a little human figure made of snow, and besmeer the head of it with their spittle, coloured red with the juice of the alder-tree, the bark whereof they chew in their mouths when they set themselves about performing this operation.

When they are disposed to allay the excessive cold, they take the skin of a bear and hang it out in the air all night. The Laplander, as soon as he rises, takes a bunch of rods and whips this skin; for they imagine that the cold abates in proportion to the blows. In this operation they make use of several magical terms, and for the same purpose cut the skin of a fawn into small pieces, and throw them into the fire, repeating a form of prayer.—They take particular care when they have visitors, that no person shall walk in the house before another who is going out of it, and that no one shall cross the room in any part of it, but the void space between the fire and the company. Should a woman stride over a man's legs in order to get by him, the unmanly action would create a world of mischief. But we need not think much of their superstitions, seeing that were we to relate all the superstitious in our enlightened nation, we might fill a volume.

With respect to such of the Laplanders as profess Christianity, they are not numerous; they are either Greeks or Lutherans, but neither of them are well grounded in the principles of religion. As for those who are Greeks, it is not much to be wondered at; for their religion, like that of the Roman Catholics, is not calculated to convey any sort of knowledge. As for the Lutheran ministers, it is well known that they are faithful in the discharge of the pastoral office in the countries where they are born, nor do we find they are remiss in Lapland; but probably either they have not salaries adequate to their labours, or which is more probable, having no company to converse with, they become melancholy and long to return to their own country.

Such is the present state of Lapland with respect to religion, and melancholy as their conduct may appear, yet they are not worse or more superstitious than some who have better advantages. The only way to bring them over to the belief and knowledge of Christianity, is to get some of their young men to settle a few years in Sweden and Denmark; there they might be educated in all sorts of useful learning, and some of these might be ordained ministers, others school-masters. If this was done at the public expense, the youth in general would emulate each other, their manners would be civilized, and towns being erected among them, they would become fond of society.

MODERN RELIGION OF THE GAURES.

IN our account of the ancient Persian religion, we have related what these people believed and practised, but as the Mahometan religion has made a vast difference in many things throughout that extensive empire, we shall now proceed to give an historical narrative of the Gaures, who although few in number, yet remain in a body together. And this will be found the more necessary, because it will naturally lead us to explain with greater precision and certainty the religion of the heathens in Africa. Persia indeed is far from Africa, but still there is some affinity to be met with in the religion of all the ancient heathens. They differ indeed in many things, but they all agree in the worst of things, namely that of opposing the truth.

These people boast of a perpetual succession of their religion without any interruption; and though many persons may be apt to imagine this a mere romance, it is nevertheless strictly true and matter of fact. The religion of the Magi has existed almost ever since the flood; and although it may have been exposed from time to time to divers heresies and persecutions, and though, since the establishment of the Mahometans in Persia, it is reduced to a very small body of faithful members, it would be an act of injustice and partiality to rob them of the glory of maintaining their tenets with unshaken resolution even in the blackest storms that ever threatened to overwhelm them. If the Gaures have lost their temporal jurisdiction, they can still boast an uninterrupted succession in the priesthood, a regular and uniform liturgy without the least variation since Zoroaster's time, and an inviolable attachment to the doctrines which he established.

The Gaures are inviolably attached to the reformation of Zoroaster, and they acknowledge a superior principle to those two before-mentioned of good and evil, whom the Persians, after they had swerved and deviated from the religion of their forefathers, established, as the sole author of light and darkness. The Gaures conceived, that by the intermixture of these two principles, God created every being in nature. A very celebrated author is of opinion, that Zoroaster borrowed that idea from the Jews; and this observation, in all probability, is very just. We shall only make this cursory remark, however, that this great reformer, foreseeing the difficulties attending so mysterious and incomprehensible a point, maintained, that though all things were good which God created, yet darkness or evil inseparably attended them, as shadows do corporeal substances. God could not possibly, according to his nature, produce any thing but good, but evil resulted from those productions, as a privation of good.

Zoroaster was no stranger to the account which Moses had given of the creation, and of the fall of the angels, and our first parents; but if it be granted that he had read these remarkable occurrences in the books of Moses, it must likewise be allowed, that he made, either wilfully or through ignorance, some very considerable alterations. As for instance, he asserted, that the world was created at six several seasons, each consisting of a certain number of days, viz. the first of forty-five, in which God created the heavens; the second of sixty, wherein he formed the waters; the third of seventy-five, in which he made the earth; the fourth of thirty, which were employed in the creation of the vegetable world; the fifth of fourscore, which were spent in the formation of all manner of living creatures, man only excepted; the sixth and last, of seventy-five, in which he created our first parents; but some authors give us a quite different account of this creation.

The Gaures likewise hold, that as the world was to be increased and multiplied by two persons only, God graciously determined, that Eve should every day bring a pair of twins into the world; and that during the term of one thousand years, death should have no dominion over her seed; that the devil tempted our first parents, in order to render them odious in the eyes of their creator; that God, being conscious of the malice of the spirit of darkness, did not think convenient totally to suppress this evil, but took the following measures to check the malignant influences of it. He constituted a select company of angels to be the guardians and protectors of his creatures. Hamul was made inspector of the heavens; Acrob superintendent of the angels; the sun, moon, earth, waters, man, plants, and all living creatures of what nature or kind soever, had their particular guardian angels. But notwithstanding all these prudent precautions, evil increased, men grew wicked and perverse in all their ways, and God sent therefore the waters of the deluge at once to extirpate them, and all their impious race. The devils are put in opposition to the good angels; whose several names and functions are registered at large in Hide; but we shall not trouble the reader with a transcript of his catalogue.

The Gaures are exceedingly religious, and never mention the Deity but with all the circumspection and reverence imaginable. They allow him all the same glorious attributes as we do; they look upon him as the sovereign judge, and bountiful rewarder of all mankind; just, merciful, and ready to pardon. Both the angels and devils of whom we have been speaking, are the ministers of God; the one for the administration of good, and the other of evil.—These Gaures likewise are of opinion, that each individual person has both a good and evil genius constantly attending him. It is farther a received notion amongst them, that the influence of a certain general light is infused, if we may be allowed the expression, after an extraordinary manner, into some particular persons who are the favourites of the Almighty.—It is this light, according to them, that renders some men conspicuous for their deep penetration into all the arts and sciences, and forms the geniuses of such as are born to sit at the helm of state; and we may add, helps them to bring about the various revolutions that overset whole empires, and likewise to excite the same confusion in the minds of men.

This is doubtless no absurd notion, nor is it any ways extravagant to imagine, that this light sometimes diffuses itself after such a profuse manner, on some certain number of persons in a family, that its favours seem partially bestowed on them, to the manifest detriment and disadvantage of the rest.—This is indisputably a very judicious remark, though not to be accounted for by physic or astrology. Any person that will give himself but the least trouble imaginable to reflect, will easily perceive, that there is a certain quantity of merit, as well as of temporal advantage, allotted for distinct families. Kingdoms likewise are after the same manner permitted to be formidable and powerful, to flourish, and be masters of the arts and sciences to the highest perfection for a time, and then again, are reduced to an apparent declension. And indeed all things in nature as well as the human species, have their proper seasons for their increase, maturity, and decay.

It is impossible to keep off the revolutions of the last mentioned period of decay, and the emperor Augustus, and Lewis the Great, king of France, who were so exactly alike in their lives and governments, are incontestible proofs of the truth of this assertion. The Gaures have a kind of veneration and respect for cocks, on account of their waking them so early in the morning, and reminding them, by their crowing, of the duties of the ensuing day. Their books recommend them to the favour and affection of the faithful. These testimonies of their esteem for this particular animal, were transmitted to them, in all probability, by the traditions of the ancient Persians.

The primitive Persians, as we have already observed, made use of no manner of temples, as thinking them places too circumscribed, and below the dignity of the Supreme Being; but when they were inclinable, in imitation of the Jews, to preserve their consecrated fire, it was absolutely necessary that they should admit of their Pyreums. Zoroaster, not satisfied with those he found already introduced, erected a considerable number more wherever he went. These consecrated fires are at present much in vogue amongst the Gaures, and preserved with so much care and precaution, that they are called idolaters, and the worshippers of fire, though without the least ground to support the ungenerous accusation. For they pay no adoration to the material fire, although they make use of that element in the celebration of their divine service. It is the Deity alone whom they adore in the presence of the fire, as the true symbol of the Divine Majesty. Though fire, according to the Gaures, is the purest of all the elements, yet they look upon it only as one of God's most perfect creatures, and it is, as they imagine, his favourite habitation. When they pray, they neither make their addresses to Mithra, nor the sun, nor fire, but to God alone; many instances whereof are produced by the learned doctor Hyde above quoted, from whence we may very readily infer, that the imputations of idolatry are as rash and groundless in Asia as they are in Europe.

Zoroaster enjoined his disciples to adore the Deity with their faces towards the sun and the consecrated fire. It was the mode of worship amongst the ancient Persians, says the French translator of Dr. Prideaux's history, and this institution preceded the reformation of Magianism. When the Persians drew near to their consecrated fires in their divine service, they always approached them from the west side, because by that means their faces being turned to those, as well as the rising sun, they could direct their worship towards both at the same time. This form of worship was directly opposite to that of the Jews. For the holy of holies, wherein was inclosed the symbol of the divine presence, which lay on the propitiatory, or mercy-seat, being at the west end of the temple of Jerusalem, all such as entered therein to worship God, had their faces turned that way. That was the point towards which they constantly directed their divine worship; but that of the Magi being the rising sun, they always worshipped with their faces towards the east.

The Gaures, according to Lord, are obliged to turn towards the sun at their morning and daily service, and at night towards the moon. For these two planets are not only the two bright luminaries of the heavens, but likewise two of God's witnesses opposed to Lucifer; that is to say, the devil, or principle of evil. The priests are obliged to watch day and night to maintain and repair the consecrated fire. But it is absolutely necessary that it be rekindled after the purest manner that can possibly be devised; for which purpose they frequently make use of a steel and flint, or two hard sticks, which, by continual friction, will in time take fire. Sometimes likewise they kindle it by the lightning which darts down from heaven on any combustible matter; and sometimes again by those Igues fatui which frequently arise in marshy grounds; or else by common fire, in case it is pure and undefiled, or with such as the Bauians make use of to kindle the funeral piles. But they have one other method still, as noble as it is pure; and that is, by collecting the rays of the sun into the focus of a burning glass.

They are strictly enjoined not to touch this fire with sword or knife, and they are obliged to feed it with the purest kind of wood, without the least kind of bark upon it. They are not allowed to blow it with their mouths or a pair of bellows, for fear of the least profanation; which was formerly punished with immediate death; and that rigorous treatment for such offences continued till the destruction of the Magian monarchy by the Mahometans. The priests themselves never presumed to approach these consecrated fires without a piece of fine linen over their mouths, to prevent their breath from polluting these sacred flames, and this precaution was always observed whenever they drew near them, or when they read or repeated that form of prayer which might properly be called the service of the fire.—The Magian priests, who were the proper celebrants, performed this ceremony with such an humble and lowly voice, as not to be heard, or at least understood by the congregation. It was a kind of whisper, not unlike that practised by our Roman Catholic priests when they read low mass.

The language in which this office is wrote, is at present as unintelligible to the Gaures as the Latin to some of our illiterate Europeans. When their sovereign pontiff approached these consecrated fires, he was washed from head to foot, perfumed and dressed in a vestment as white as snow. After this he prostrated himself to the very ground before the flames, and said his prayers with bitter sighs and groans; which are well understood by the devotees of all religions. These ardent acts of devotion, the affectionate respirations of his soul, were all addressed to the Deity, to him he offered up his prayers, extracted from their sacred scriptures, and in short to him alone he made confession of his sins.

These customs are all observed by the Gaures at this very day. Their religious devotion, according to Lord, is introduced by the Distoore's seasonable exhortation to the people; the sun and substance whereof is as follows, viz. That the celestial fire having been delivered by God himself to Zoroost, (Zoroaster) their wise legislator, to whom he declared, that it was an emanation, or part of his own infinite virtue and excellence, they ought to look upon it as sacred and divine, and the proper object of their profoundest veneration, as being a portion of the divine essence, since it is of the same substance and they ought to love and regard every object that bears any resemblance of it, as the sun and the moon, who are God's two awful witnesses, who will testify against them, if they contemp or neglect that worship, which has been enjoined them. After this, he exhorts them to ask pardon and forgiveness of God, if, in their daily use of fire, they should by accident, let fall the least drop of water into it, or, by any inattention, carelessness, or otherwise, be guilty of any impure action with regard to that element.

vened or assembled together by the tinkling of a little bell. But the Gaures in Persia are not allowed to give any such public notices; for which reason they meet together without any ceremony at the stated hours; and then, according to the custom observed by the Armenians of Zulpha, are convened only by five or six strokes on a plank with a hammer. In their temples, instead of a fire they have nothing but a burning lamp. Although during divine service these devotees have their mouths and some part of their faces covered, they must keep, notwithstanding, at an awful distance from their consecrated fires: But as to the priests, they may approach them in such a manner as to be able to officiate without the least inconvenience to themselves, or profanation of the fire.

The little twigs or switches which we have already mentioned, are looked upon as an essential branch of the rites and ceremonies observed in their religious worship. These rods are cut off with abundance of formality from one particular tree, which the Persians call a Hawn; and very much resembles the Tamarisk. If no such tree however can be found, they have immediate recourse to the pomegranate-tree. The knife made use of on this occasion must first be sanctified by a very careful ablution, and by several prayers pronounced in a low voice to the praise and glory of God, and of the sacred fire. These rods or twigs are deposited in a case or box made for that particular purpose: and whenever they read or pronounce any of the prayers contained in their Zend; or whenever they engage in any other religious exercise whatsoever, a proper quantity of these twigs must be taken out, and laid ready before them; for these sacred instruments are as essential to them on such solemn occasions, as to our Catholic devotees their chaplets or set of beads. The number of them however, is not fixed and determined. Some prayers require thirty-five, and others only twenty four. Five only are sufficient for an ejaculatory grace before their meals, but as they are of no further service after the prayer, they must be devoted to the flames.

Though the Persians had a peculiar veneration for the fire, yet they paid likewise such an extraordinary respect to the three other elements, that some ancient historians have charged them with paying divine adoration to them all. This accusation, however, is groundless and unjust. All their care and circumspection in former time was, and still is, to preserve those pure elements from the least stain or pollution. They look upon them as sacred, the principles and seeds of all things being, as they imagine, comprised in them; and for that reason they constitute distinct conservators for each of them, whose peculiar province it is to preserve them from any intermixture or profanation. This purity is the principle whereon the Gaures have grounded their ceremonies with relation to the dead. The water, however, is the element next in repute amongst them to the fire. A scarlet and deep yellow are their favourite colour; and they may make choice of them before any other in every thing they wear, as being, in some measure, emblems or representations of the fire. For the very same reason likewise a ruby, a carbuncle, and a garnet are much more valuable in their esteem than any other precious stones whatever. Notwithstanding this peculiar regard of theirs for scarlet, &c. it is undeniably true that their priests are obliged to be dressed in white during their celebration of divine service.

The Gaures have their guardian angels for every month and day throughout the year, and to them they direct their prayers, according to the forms laid down in their rituals; but in such a manner as relates only to every one's particular functions. Here seems to be something of a contradiction, because it has been already taken notice of, that they acknowledge but one God. The truth is, like all other heathens although they acknowledge but one Supreme God, yet they at the same time address their prayers to subordinate beings, whom they consider as mediators and intercessors for them. This was the practice with the Greeks of old, as well as the Romans; and we may add, that it is the practice with the Roman Catholics, otherwise, "Why do they pray to saints to intercede for them with God?"

New-year's day is a grand festival with them, as well as with the people in other nations. They likewise keep six festivals in commemoration of the six days' work of creation, and each of these last five days successively; and besides these they have a great number of lucky and unlucky days, being, like most other heathens, very superstitious. These Gaures likewise commemorate their dead once every month throughout the year, and on such occasions they provide an elegant entertainment, in memory of their deceased friends and relations. This monthly feast is instituted and kept up by order of an express injunction in the sadder or liturgy of the Gaures, namely, remember the souls of your departed fathers and mothers.

The first day of every month is set apart for divine worship, and so on, the eighth, fifteenth, &c. in the same manner as one out of seven is kept by the Jews, Christians, and Mahometans. The sermons preached on those days consist chiefly of moral precepts, and exhortations to the people to observe strictly the rites and ceremonies of their religion.— In reading their prayers they resemble in their tone of voice, the Jews in their synagogues, and many of their ceremonies are similar. In singing they likewise resemble the Jews, and probably this must be owing to some of the Jews remaining among them, after the rest returned to Jerusalem, and rebuilt the city and temple under their captain Zerrababel.

They keep several fasts, and a sort of abstinence for five days successively after each of them, so that great part of their time is spent in rites and ceremonies. On all festivals, each person carries a part of what he eats to the temple, as an offering to the fire, and this is done in order to procure a blessing from heaven upon the fruits of the earth, and such other things as serve them for a subsistence.

It is probable, they learned this custom from the Banians, who reside near them, for it has no affinity with the ceremonies of the ancient Persians. On the mornings of their festivals, they repair betimes to their sanctuaries or temples, which are but mean huts, and take their victuals along with them. The rich distribute some part of their plentiful store among the poor, and all eat sociably in common together, like brothers. Their devotees never fail going once every day to worship the sacred fires, in one or other of their temples, and their they confess their sins to the priest, much in the same manner, says Dr. Hyde, as is practised in the church of Rome. Those who live too far distant from any of these places set apart for public worship, content themselves with performing their acts of devotion before their own fires at home: and for this purpose every Gaure brings home once in the year, a lighted lamp from the sacred fire, in the temple next to where they reside, and keep it continually burning.

Bodily purity is much attended to by them, for in that respect they are as scrupulous as the Jews or Mahometans; for they refuse to eat or drink with any person who is not of the same religion with themselves. Whether the Gaures are ambitious or not, of making proselytes, like the professors of most other religions, does not appear from any of the accounts we have of them; but has no temporal advantages are to be derived from this profession, consequently they are but few in number; and Mr. Hanway tells us, that they are a poor despised people, who live in remote parts, and are very cruelly treated by the Mahometans. But notwithstanding all this poverty and many hardships which they suffer, yet they have the same love of ambition as is peculiar to other people; for they have their high priest and all subordinate ones, and the election of these is carried on with the same intrigues as in other countries where the emoluments are worth seeking after. None however, can be admitted to the priesthood but sons of priests, and this is one of the reasons why all their priests are obliged to marry. All their priests wear long beards from the chin, but they shave their cheeks, and if they have whiskers they cut them short. Their cap terminates in a point, and the laps of it hang down to their neck. Their hair is generally long, and they are enjoined never to cut it, except when they go into mourning for a deceased relation. When they perform divine service, the priests hold a cloth before their mouths, that the people may not see their lips move.

Their upper garment is of a reddish colour, but they are poor wretched rags, such as we would not take up in the streets. It falls down from the neck to the calf of the legs, and is bound round their waists with a sash of camel's hair. This sash or girdle is consecrated by the high-priest, and considered as containing many virtues. Every faithful Gaure is obliged to take care of his girdle, for if he should lose one, he must neither eat, drink, nor sleep, till he has purchased another of one of the priests, who have always some to dispose of. They imagine that he who loses his girdle, loses all the blessings inherent in it, and they have a proverb, "A man without his girdle is without his blessing." They begin to wear it when they are from twelve to fifteen years of age, for at that age they think they can comprehend all the principles, and practise all the duties of their religion.

The laity are enjoined to be very strict and precise in their department, and to perform the duties required of them with diligence and application.— Shame and fear, according to the Gaures, are the basis and foundation of all virtues. They are commanded strictly to examine and weigh every thing they propose to undertake, and put nothing in execution till they are fully convinced of its justice and equity. They are likewise obliged, when they go out in a morning, to return God thanks for the creation of all those animals, of what nature or kind soever which they see in their way, but their priests are subject to still greater austerities.

Besides the obligations they are under of being perfectly acquainted with all the principles in their religion, and all the rites and ceremonies used in divine service, they must abstain from every sort of carnal lusts or desires, and keep themselves pure, both before God and man. Thus they are not to tell lies, because God is truth; nor are they to be too curious, lest they should pry into things beyond their comprehension. They must not touch any thing that is impure and polluted, and they are to oblige all those whom they marry, to promise that they will not deviate from their religious principles; to attend constantly on divine worship, to habituate themselves to the practice of patience, to be of a just, affable disposition, and imitate as far as in them lies, the perfections of the Deity, who is for ever merciful and gracious to the whole human race, notwithstanding their many sins, iniquities and ungrateful provocations.

They have likewise an ordinance of a very peculiar nature, by which their high-priest is prohibited from touching any secular person, but more especially one whom they reckon a heretic, or infidel. He is obliged to wash himself, and to put a hand to all his own necessary affairs, either as a mark of his humility and condescension, or for the better preservation of his bodily purity. He is to abstain from every thing that is superfluous, to spend part of his revenues in alms-deeds and other works of piety, and to avoid all manner of extortion in collecting his tithes. He must habituate himself to the practice of contemplation, study, and reflect on the precepts of his religion without the least intermission; to reprove the vicious, and to stand in awe of no being, however illustrious and potent, but God himself.—To conclude, he is under the necessity of taking care that the sacred fire never goes out, and to see that no person offers to profane it.

As the people are extremely poor, so they are obliged to use many expedients in order to support their priests, who, at the best, are but a miserable set of beings. Every devotee is obliged, on the twenty-fifth of April, to extinguish his lamp, and pay the priest about the value of sixpence of our money to have it re-kindled from the sacred altar. The sun and the consecrated fire, which the Gaures believe to be the visible symbols of the divine presence, bear some affinity to that fire which the ancient Jews made use of on their altars, erected for their sacrifices, and which continued till the first destruction of the city and temple. Indeed, the sacred fire in the Jewish temple, was always considered as an emblem of the Deity, although no divine honours were paid to it.

Neither the Jews of old could, nor are the Gaures at present permitted to put any but pure clean wood on these fires. There must be no bark upon the wood, nor any defilement whatever. Indeed, the strong conformity between them may serve to show, that some of the heathens, particularly in Persia, borrowed ceremonies from the Jews, which they did not understand.

At present their priests are not permitted to have any more than one wife, unless she proves barren, and in that case in order to have children, they may take another, but not without the consent of the first. The Gaures are proud and ambitious of nothing more than that of having a numerous issue, and this they call adding numbers to the faithful; for, according to their notions, such an increase of their stock will be looked upon as meritorious at the day of judgment, provided they are born in wedlock.

All their marriages are performed in their places of public worship, where the priest joins their hands, prays with them, and gives them his benediction.—It is a received notion among the Gaures, that the marriage state is the most honourable in the world, especially when they have children. All their marriages are performed before the sacred fire, and when the parties have joined hands, the bridegroom gives the bride some small pieces of money as a pledge of all his temporal substance being her's. They are ordered by their religion to marry very young, and the women whom they take to be wives, must be of the same sentiments with themselves.

The Gaures never circumcise, but wash their children, which is a kind of baptism or ceremony practised by them for the purification of the soul.—The new-born infant is brought to the temple, and presented to the priest before the sun and the fire. The priest having taken an exact account of the time when the child was born, he then calculates what is to happen to him in this world. As these impostors must be often deceived, one would naturally imagine that such circumstances would open the eyes of the people, and lead them off from deception; but the great misfortune is, that where the mind is once bewildered with superstition, all hopes of reformation are lost, and even the sly tricks practised by artful impostors, are considered as the quintessence of truth.

The parents having declared the name of the child, the priest pronounces it aloud, and then pours some pure water upon a certain piece of wood, called holm. In the next place he sprinkles the infant with the consecrated water, and prays that it may be the means of its purification. He then dips the child all over in the water, which concludes the whole of the ceremony.

When the infant attains to seven years of age, it is brought to the priest to be confirmed, as being then qualified to be admitted into their temples.—The priest asks the youth a few questions, suitable to the occasion, and teaches him a few prayers, which the child must retain in his memory, and repeat them, holding his mouth over the sacred fire, with a cloth before both it and his nostrils, lest his breath should convey any sort of pollution. As soon as he has finished his prayers, the priest gives him some water to drink, and the rind of a pomegranate to chew in his mouth, as an internal purification. To conclude, he bathes him in a tub of water, and afterwards binds his girdle on him; but according to Hlde, the latter part of this ceremony is not performed till the child arrives at years of maturity.

When a Gaure is dying, his friends send for a priest, who standing close by his ear, prays for him, and commends his spirit to the living God. A dead corpse defiles the person who touches it, for which reason none of the priests must come within ten feet of it. They never bury their dead, because they imagine it would profane and pollute the earth. They have round towers erected of stone, and thither they carry their dead on biers; within the tower is a staircase with deep steps made in a winding form, and when the bearers are got within, the priests scale the walls by the help of ladders; when they have dragged the corpse gently up with ropes, they then let it slide down the stair-case. During the first three days after the body has been thus disposed of, the people firmly believe that the devil is on his watch and seeks all opportunities to torture and torment the soul, which therefore, wings her way with all possible speed towards the celestial regions; in hopes to escape the tyranny of that malicious enemy of mankind, and fiend of darkness. For this reason, the friends and relations of the deceased meet together at morning, noon, and night, to beg of God, in the most ardent manner, to pardon and absolve him from all his sins. On the fourth day the soul is fixed in the place appointed for it, either of happiness or misery, and it is therefore on this fourth day that the priests prognosticate the future state of the deceased. The method used by these impostors is rather singular, and different from any thing we have hitherto taken notice of in our accounts of other heathen nations.

The party deceased, being laid under the walls of the sepulchre, with eyes turned towards the heavens, the vultures are permitted to come and peck at his face: the first part they generally attack is the eye, and if they seize at once upon the right, the corpse is intantly carried to a white tower, as a proof that the soul is in heaven; but on the contrary, if the vultures peck at the left eye, then the body is carried to a black tower, it being their opinion that the soul is in a state of punishment. However, they are not uniform in this, for Ovington says, that before they expose a dead carcase to the birds of prey, they lay him decently on the ground, while one of the relations goes round the village to try if he can allure a dog to follow him. He does all he can to bring the animal as near as possible to the corpse, for they imagine that the nearer the dog comes, the nearer the departed soul is to everlasting happiness. But if the dog cannot be tempted to approach it, then it is considered as a bad omen, and they almost despair of his ever entering into happiness.

When the dog has performed the task assigned him, two priests, standing about ten yards distant from the body, repeat a form of prayer half an hour in length, but they hum it over in such a manner as hardly to give themselves time to breathe. During the whole of this ceremony, the corpse has a piece of paper fixed to each ear, and hangs over the face about three inches below the chin. As soon as the prayers are over, the corpse is carried to the place allotted for its reception, and all the company follow it two and two, with their hands devoutly closed. They are enjoined not to speak a word, because their sepulchral monument is a place of silence and repose.

We cannot conclude this account of these idolaters, without taking notice of one sentiment they embrace, which indeed is in some measure peculiar to all the heathen nations we have treated of, namely, the immortality of the soul. Strange, that from one extremity of the world to the other, even the most unenlightened nations should believe the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and yet many of those who have been brought up under the joyful sound of the gospel should deny it. This will rise in condemnation against them, and they will be convicted at the tribunal of the great judge of all the earth, for trampling upon knowledge. We are surprised still more, that there should be none but learned men in the world so abandoned, but learning without grace and the fear of God, becomes a real curse instead of an useful blessing.

The above instances of those who have the benefit of the gospel dispensation, will be in the end a dreadful aggravation of their guilt. Our Saviour said it would be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah at the day of judgment, than for the unbelieving Jews. And if this is to be the case and condition of those Jews who lived under a law of carnal ordinances, how then shall those escape who trample under foot the blood of the son of God, who crucify him afresh, and put him to open shame. How dreadful the consideration, that men, brought up by their parents in the purity of the Christian doctrine, should attempt to establish a system which even an ignorant heathen would shudder at. And yet there are men of no small abilities, who have attempted to prove that the soul of man is mortal. By such doctrines being believed, the hedges of morality and genuine piety are broken down, and the flood-gates of profaneness set open.

By this, many unthinking young persons, who otherwise might have been an honour to their parents, and the comfort of their declining years, have forgot the fear of God, despised religious duties, plunged themselves into diseases and death, and been hurried down to damnation in multitudes.

Melancholy as this subject is, its importance obliges us to dwell upon it; could those unhappy materialists, of whom we have been speaking, be brought to acknowledge their own weakness, and their own wickedness, there might then be some hopes of a reformation, but in the mean time we may lament the shocking condition of human nature. Well might Dr. Watts say,

Backward with humble shame we look

On our original;

How is our nature dash'd and broke

In our first father's fall.

To all that's good averse and blind,

But prone to all that's ill;

What dreadful darkness veils our mind!

How obstinate our will!

These reflections do not arise from any suggestions of a gloomy mind, but really from a concern the author has, as far as his weak abilities will permit, to promote the best interest of his fellow-creatures. He is not so sanguine in his hopes, as to imagine that it is in his power to stem the torrent of infidelity, but he is sensibly touched when he finds some men calling themselves ministers of the everlasting gospel, and at the same time attempting to establish deism itself. This they evidently do, when they tell us, that there is no immortality of the soul, nor a future state of rewards and punishments. Thus they are worse than the most illiterate heathens, and even the deists laugh at them. They hate the cross of Christ, they despise the gospel; so that we may apply to them what Dr. Young says:

And is there, who the blessed cross wipes off,
As a foul blot from his dishonoured brow?

If angels tremble, 'tis at such a sight:

The wretch! they quit, desponding of their charge;
More struck with grief or wonder who can tell.

Upon the whole, while we look upon the evidence of the heathens as a collateral proof of the truth of our holy religion, yet we have a higher authority to trust to, namely, divine wisdom itself. Christ said to his disciples, "Because I live, you shall live also." And we may venture to affirm, that as he became the first fruits of them that slept, so our bodies shall be raised up at the last day, and being joined to our precious and immortal souls, shall both together enjoy eternal happiness.

DIFFERENT RELIGIONS IN AFRICA.

IN ancient times this country was considered as a third part of the terrestrial globe, and it may be properly called a peninsula; for was it not for that small tract of land running between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, it would actually be an island. It is remarkable that in ancient times there were many Christians here, who had fair and flourishing churches, and here some of the most eminent Christian fathers resided; among these were Cyprian, bishop of Carthage; Austin, bishop of Hippo, and Tertullian the famous apologist. These African churches continued to flourish till about the middle of the seventh century, when the Arabians, under their caliphs, established Mahometanism in many parts, such as Egypt, Morocco, Algiers, &c. but at present the greater number of the inhabitants are idolaters. But here we find it impossible for us to inform the reader, from whence these modern idolaters derive their worship; for it bears no manner of affinity to that of either the Greeks, Romans, or Egyptians; and there is so little of the ancient religion of the Ethiopians, Nigritians, &c. preserved in it, that it would prove a very difficult task to trace from those remains the idolatry of their descendants.

Strabo has transmitted to us the following tenet^s and religious ceremonies of the Ethiopians. "They acknowledge, (says he) one Immortal and Supreme Being, who is the first cause of all things, and believe in another god, who is immortal, nameless, and wholly unknown. They look upon their patrons and benefactors, and their most illustrious personages as deities. And they are of opinion, that kings in general are the guardians of all the inferior orders and degrees of men, and that particular persons are the protectors of their peculiar favourites. There are some persons amongst those who dwell under the torrid Zone, that are looked upon as perfect Atheists, because they detest the sun, and curse that radiant planet as often as it rises, on account of its excessive heat, &c." Herodotus assures us, that the Atlantes, who are inhabitants of the Lybian deserts, curse the sun likewise, because he burns them, and parches up all their country. Purchas makes the ancient Africans pay divine adoration to the sun, and to the fire; and they consecrated, says he, divers temples in honour to both, and maintained their fire, in the same manner, and with the same care and circumspection, as the ancient Romans; but this assertion has no authority to support it. He adds, that the Africans of Lybia and Numidia, offered up their sacrifices and addressed their prayers to some particular planets; and one part of the negroes worshipped Gugliuino, that is to say, the Lord of Heaven. Their Pagan superstitions were afterwards improved by embracing the Jewish rites and ceremonies, which they religiously observed for a long time, till they were converted to the Christian faith, from which they apostatized soon after, and sunk into the vile impostures of Mahomet. If therefore we may rely on the veracity of Purchas, who has given us this account, the footsteps of Judaism, Christianity, and Mahometanism, are in all probability, still discernable in their idolatrous worship. It is probable likewise, that the Hottentots, who reside in the remotest parts of Africa, observe the Jewish ceremonies at this very day; for the German historian, who has given us in folio, a long account of the Cape of Good Hope, and the several countries inhabited by those people, affirms it for a positive truth; nay, it is possible, were we inclined to produce learned quotations from the Greek and Roman authors, we might be able to reconcile the ideas of the ancient and modern Africans; but such curious researches would seem so much the more needless and impertinent, as it is impossible to determine, in this case, what would be agreeable to, and hit the taste of the reader.

Nigeria.*

This Nigritia comprehends the several dominions of Gaulato, Genchoa, Tombut, Melli, Sousos, Madigna, and Sanfara, and the kingdoms of Senegal, Gambia, &c. Some of these Nigritians embrace the Malometan religion. Those of Gaulata, we are informed, pay divine adoration to fire; and as for the rest, they cannot properly be said to profess any religion at all. The inhabitants of Senegal, and the parts adjacent, pay their respects to the moon with loud acclamations, and their religious worship is celebrated in the hollow trunks of the most spacious trees, and the idols, who preside in these temples are honoured with divers oblations, which, for the generality, consist in beans, peas, herbs, and all sorts of grain; but sometimes indeed, they sacrifice the blood of beasts. This worship of theirs is under the direction and management of a kind of priests, who dispose of several little leathern purses amongst these negroes full of pieces of paper with mystic charactes drawn upon them, of equal force and virtue as these of amulets and abraxas.— These priests, as we are informed, contract no affiance with the laity; and they are expressly enjoined not to marry any woman whomsoever, out of the sacerdotal tribe.

We are informed, likewise, that these negroes acknowledge the unity and omnipotence of the god-head, and circumcise their children, when they are about six or seven years old. But all the accounts we have of these African countries, are in reality very lame and uncertain, and full of contradictions. However, if we may give any credit to them, the inhabitants of Nubia were formerly Christians, and at this very day some antique footsteps may be seen there of Jesus Christ, and several of the saints.— They baptize with a hot iron; or, more properly speaking, they make an impression on some particular part of the body, with that instrument, as an equivalent to baptism. The inhabitants of Gambia, and the parts adjacent, have retained a faint and imperfect knowledge of Jesus Christ, whom they call Nabe, and of whom they say, that he was the son of Mary, and a great prophet. If it be true, they are indebted to the Mahometans for that idea of him.

The negroes of Kasamanse worship an idol, by them called China; and their priests, whom they call Aracani, carry it in procession on some certain days in the year set apart for that solemn purpose. Their standard or banner, is a kind of white silk scarf, on which are painted several dead men's bones, and ears of rice. After the procession is over, they deposit the god within the hollow of a tree, and there make him oblations of honey, and such other good things as they see convenient. This idol, or god of theirs, called China, is represented, it is said, in the form of a faggot, or bundle of sticks bound together.

The worship of the people of Madigna is a medley or composition of idolatry and Mahometanism. Their Bexerins, who are their priests, are very much addicted to the practice and study of magic, and the grand Bexerin, who is, as it were, their sovereign pontiff, resides in the metropolitan city of that kingdom; and all the priests keep seminaries of superstition and magical knowledge. They distribute some particular billets amongst their pupils and the people, which are, they pretend, infallible preservatives from all manner of dangers and disasters. Some of them are so ignorant, or wicked, as to refuse ascribing the blessings which they receive to God's goodness: for say they, if he was really good and gracious, he would never suffer his creatures to be at such trouble and fatigue to attain them.

All these negroes in general are polygamists, and even part with their wives whenever they think proper. They are under no manner of restrictions in this particular, and act without the guidance of reason in every point relating thereto, but in having no conversation with a wife that is with child. The inhabitants of Sierra Leona have in all their cities or borough towns, a kind of boarding-school or monastery, situate at some distance from the common dwelling-houses, where the young ladies that are marriageable, are educated for about a year, under the care and conduct of a venerable old gentleman, who is a person of rank and distinction, as well as unspotted character and reputation. At the year's end, they are released from their confinement, and permitted to appear, dressed in their best attire, at their public ball or assembly. The relations of the young ladies likewise accompany them to this matrimonial market, where there are always a crowd of young gentlemen present, to enquire into their character, and survey them, whilst they are dancing to their Moorish music. After they have taken the necessary precautions, they make choice of such as they fancy, and pay not only a valuable consideration to their parents for them, but gratify their old superintendent for his extraordinary care and expence in their education.

The negroes of Senegal and the Jaloffes, accompany their dead to the grave with the beat of drum, at the head of their funeral train, and all the relations, both men and women, follow the corpse.—When they inter their dead, they bury with them all the implements and utensils they made use of when living, and afterwards close their graves, and erect a kind of monument over them. The materials of the house, in which the deceased resided, is, for the generality, devoted to this particular service, and a white flag, or standard in case he was a warrior, is always set upon the top of his monument. These negroes entertain a notion with respect to such as are professed drummers, which is very remarkable. They imagine, that the ground where they are interred immediately loses its native virtue, and becomes barren; and that if they should throw them into a river, or the sea, the very fish would be infected, and rendered incapable of spawning. In order to prevent such fatal inconveniences, if we may rely on the veracity of Dapper, they bury them in the hollow trunks of their largest trees.

These funeral rites and solemnities naturally lead us to the notions which these negroes entertain with respect to their serpents. As they are fully persuaded, that their friends and relations are metamorphosed into these reptiles after their decease, they cannot be induced by any means whatever, to injure, or kill any one of them, though never so dangerous and destructive: They firmly believe, that some person or another in their neighbourhood, would infallibly die upon the spot, where such an animal should lose its life. Several of the negroes have the art of charming these venomous reptiles, and will venture to handle and play with them without any manner of fear or reluctance. These magicians, likewise, can, by their fascinations, heal such persons as have had the misfortune to be dangerously wounded by them. In short, they charm their very horses, imagining that by virtue thereof, they shall run no manner of risque in riding them, and that in war they will deliver them out of the hands of their enemies. The ancients ascribed much the same virtue to the Psylles, who resided in those parts now called Barca; but notwithstanding this pretended conformity, and the vouchers which our historians produce of spells or charms for soothing these reptiles, and rendering the malignity of their poison ineffectual, it is very probable the surprising influences of such fascinations, may be reduced to some secrets in nature, to which at present we are perfect strangers.

The natives of Gambia bury their dead, with all their gold and valuable treasures, and he who has the richest grave, is in their opinion the happiest man. When the king of Guinella dies, twelve officers, dressed in party-coloured robes, proclaim, by sound of proper instruments, his majesty's decease to all the people; whereupon they all surround the corpse robed in white, and proceed immediately to the election of a new sovereign. They bathe or wash the deceased all over, then take out his bowels, and burn them in the presence of the god of their country, but preserve his ashes however, and embalm his body. About a month afterwards they solemnize the pompous funeral, and bring perfumes from all parts for the purification of the corpse. Six persons, dressed in white silk robes, carry him to the grave; and during the procession there is a melancholy concert of Moorish music, both vocal and instrumental. The whole train of attendants, except such as are princes of the blood walk on foot, and they indeed are mounted on horseback, dressed all in white, which is the usual mourning with them as well as the Chinese.

All his wives, most faithful friends and domestics, and even his favourite horses, are sacrificed at the grave, in order to attend him to the other world.—We have no such instances of loyalty amongst us: neither is it to be supposed, that their subjects are sanguine rivals in this case, and make all the interest they possibly can, to procure the honour of attending his majesty in this solemn expedition; for many of them take care to abscond when they find his majesty's death approaching. Our accounts add moreover, that these his unhappy companions are treated with uncommon barbarity even before they are sacrificed. But be that as it will, these savage Moors are not half so heroic and intrepid as our ancient Gauls and Germans were, who never swerved from their loyalty, nor started at the apprehensions of attending their sovereigns to Vahalla; that is, to the other world. The latter, on the contrary, were so concerned, lest they should not arrive soon enough at those regions of bliss, where they might carouse and indulge themselves without any of the anxious cares that pall the enjoyments of this life, that their grandees took care to ride post thither; and for that reason their horses were killed afterwards and buried with their masters. Is it not very surprising that Christianity, which gives us such a delightful prospect of a future state, should not be able to wean us from our violent, or at least, too fond hankering after the present? Can so pure and holy a religion produce effects so inconsistent with the scope of our wise legislator? From whence can it possibly proceed? It must doubtless arise from this, that Christianity promises nothing but spiritual advantages; and promises of that nature have not power sufficient to influence even the teachers and propagator of them. For, in general, they are shocked at the apprehensions of death as much as any other persons, and in all probability more. It is possible, they may be more sensible than others of the intricacies that attend religious maxims.

The natives of Beni and Sousos, add to their hideous outcries and lamentations sundry presents, which when they go to a funeral they carry with them, and divide into three parts or shares; one whereof is appropriated to the king's service, another to the relations of the deceased, and the third to the party deceased himself, with whom it is buried. For the generality, they erect a hut on this occasion, at some small distance from the grave, in which the relations of the deceased meet together, in order to ask him what troubles and sorrows he meets with in the other world, and to offer up their sincere and hearty prayers to Almighty God to release him from all his afflictions. As to the kings and grandees of their country, they take care to bury them with all the secrecy and precaution imaginable, and frequently conceal them even in the bosom of their deepest rivers, that no person whatsoever shall be able to extract, or run away with, the immense treasures which are buried with them.

They bury the kings of Sierra-Leona in the high-roads; because such as in their life-time have acted in a public capacity, and been possessed of the most important posts, ought, according to the notions of these negroes, to appear in public likewise, in some measure, after their decease.

Religion of the inhabitants of the Coast of Guinea.

well acquainted with the inhabitants. Happy had our merchants been as assiduous to promote the knowledge of Christianity, and the eternal happiness of immortal souls, as they have been to procure riches, by means that no man can justify. This melancholy subject has been considered in a proper point of view by Mr. Granville Sharp, a gentleman as much distinguished for his learning, as for the most unblemished character, universal benevolence, and unaffected piety. He considers it in a light which no one ever did before, namely, that as Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians for their oppressions of the poor, so the continuing of the slave trade, and even encouraging it, would bring down the divine judgments upon sinful nations. In vain do they pretend that these people are used as well in the West-Indies as at home. This has nothing to do with the argument, for we must insist that no mortal has a right to deprive his fellow-creatures of liberty, except for crimes. But are these poor Africans, when brought to the West-Indies, instructed in religion? No, it is industriously concealed from them. Nay, it is not long since they were bought and sold in England, like beasts of burden. No encomiums can be too great on Mr. Sharp, who brought the matter to the fountain-head of the law, and obtained a solemn judgment, that no slave can live in England; that every foreigner, whether an African, or from any other part of the world, is free the moment he sets his foot on shore in this country. We with pleasure may add further, that the Court of Session in Scotland has lately given judgment to the same import as in England.

We thought these things necessary to be premised, in order to make the reader better acquainted with these people, and their religious sentiments; for some of them observe the ceremony of circumcision, without assigning any manner of reason for their conduct, which, perhaps, may be grounded on mere necessity. But should some certain customs be added to it, which are in vogue with their neighbours, such as presenting the choicest of their fruits to a particular god, called Belly, and to the souls of their relations; refraining from eating beef or veal, or any kind of shell-fish, we may visibly discern the footsteps of Judaism, and the paganism of the ancient Egyptians. This hint, we presume, is sufficient for such to draw conclusions from, as are fond of reconciling the most distant conjectures.

Purchas has collected abundance of curious observations relating to the religion of these people, and their rites and ceremonies. Notwithstanding they have no books, no scriptures, nor even any civil laws for their political government, yet it is certain, they are not destitute of all religion. They dedicate and set apart Tuesday for the worship of their Fetiches, as we do Sunday to the service of God.

This day of rest is very strictly observed in the exercise of dancing, &c. and this is likewise their day appointed for the circumcision of their children.— There is one of their Fetiches, it seems, whom they acknowledge superior to all the rest. When any one asks them what notion they entertain of the Deity, they answer, that he is black like themselves; and that instead of being their bountiful benefactor, he acts like a tyrant and an oppressor. To this our historian replied, in the language of a missionary, that God is white like us, is good and gracious, and has done great and marvellous things for us: that he descended from heaven to earth for our sakes, and was crucified by the Jews for our salvation; that after the dissolution of these our earthly tabernacles, our souls shall take their flight to the celestial regions. But all this seemed mere cant and jargon to these negroes, who chiefly opposed the Divine Providence, alledging that they were no ways indebted to the Deity, but to the earth, the waters, the planets, &c. for the many blessings they enjoyed; and it is no wonder at all to hear them talk in this strain.— If we will but give ourselves the least time to reflect, we may easily discern the weakness and insufficiency of such arguments with the negroes; especially on the absurdity of insisting on the whiteness of the God of the Christians, in opposition to the black Deity. Could no better way be found out to confute the negroes, than by recommending a God to them of another colour from their own?

The Fetiches are the particular deities of the negroes; and every one has a different sort, according to the direction of their Masoucki, that is, according to Ovington, who is an historian of veracity, the priests of Guinea. They ascribe their good fortune, and happy deliverance out of all evils, to these Fetiches; and were they not so illiterate as they are, one would be apt to imagine, that they had copied the Talismans of the eastern nations, which, by virtue of their characteristics, had an influence over the works of nature, and could prevent an impending storm of rain or hail, that hung over their heads, or any other event that they saw pernicious to them. But, in all probability, their Fetiches are much the same as the Manitous of the northern Americans, which bear a very near affinity to the Genii of the ancients, particularly the Fauns and Sylvans.— These negroes pay them all the testimonies of the profoundest respect and veneration imaginable; and a glass of palm-wine is poured out to their honour, and has the precedency in all their public entertainments.

There are some particular birds, as also the sword-fish, which they look upon as Fetiches; and their trees likewise bear the same venerable denomination, and some of them are accounted the guardians of their hill and mountains. They perform their sacrifices at the foot of these trees, and they are fully persuaded, that should any one presume to lop off one of their branches, he would be the immediate cause of the total destruction of all their fruits.— Whenever they consult these trees, as oracles, they tell us the Fetiche, or the devil, perhaps, assumes the shape of a black dog. Sometimes he does not condescend so far as to make his personal appearance, but delivers his answer invisible to human sight. The high mountains that have been struck with thunder, and such hills as are exposed to the same fate, are looked upon as the habitations of some of the Fetiches. The blacks never presume to approach them without some oblations in their hands; and they sprinkle palm-wine, and strew millet, and divers other grains all round about them.

There are some particular stones likewise like our land-marks, which are reckoned amongst the number of Fetiches; and as they are made use of for that very purpose too, there is a great resemblance, in our opinion, between them and the god Terminus, or the Terminal-Stone of the Romans. But some carping critic, perhaps, may start an objection here, and ask, why we should not rather compare them to those stones which they erected on their high-roads for the direction of travellers? but, be that as it will, they place Fetiches before their doors, and these titular deities are made in the form of grapples or hooks, which we generally make use of to shake our fruit-trees. The Negro priests fasten these to the stone Fetiches before-mentioned, which they tell us are as ancient as the world itself, and afterwards dispose of them to the people, at the best price they can get for the preservation of their houses. Thus much for their larger Fetiches; but they have several besides of a smaller size, which they carry about them, consisting of bangles of little or no value, and which the priests sell to the blacks after a formal consecration of them in their way. These they wear sometimes about their necks, and sometimes under their arm-pits; and these they pray to constantly night and morning; to these they present the choicest morsels of every thing they eat; and dress them, in short, in the gayest attire they can possibly procure.

On that day which answers to our Sunday, the blacks assemble themselves together in a spacious square, in the centre whereof is a sacred tree, called the tree of the Fetiche. At the foot thereof they set a table which is embellished below with boughs wreathed in the form of crowns. The table is covered with palm-wine, rice, millet, &c. in order to drink and eat after their service is over, in honour of their Fetiches. The whole day is spent in dancing and capering round the tree of the Fetiche, and in singing and drumming upon divers instruments of brass. The priest frequently sits near the centre of the place before a kind of altar, on which he offers up some sacrifices to the Fetiches; and some men women and children sit promiscuously round the celebrant, who reads or pronounces a kind of homily to them. At the conclusion, he takes a whisp of straw, twisted hard, which he dips into a pot full of some particular liquor in which there is a serpent. He either besmears or sprinkles the children with this holy water, mumbling over them a certain form of words, and he observes the same ceremony with respect to the altar, and afterwards empties the pot; and then his assistants close the service with some inarticulate unintelligible sounds, loud acclamations, and clapping of hands. On this solemn day they wash their faces and bodies with more care and pains than on any other; for they practise ablutions. They wash themselves every morning, and afterwards draw white lines upon their faces, with a piece of earth like chalk, or lime, as acts of devotion, performed in honour of their Fetiche. The priest, attended by two women, frequently repairs to the tree of the Fetiche, in order to accomplish his magical incantations; and the foot whereof there appears, as we are informed, a black dog, who answers all his interrogatories.

This is the nature of the oracles, and if, for instance, the king is divested of his prerogative, or defrauded in his customs, he has recourse to the tree, which he looks upon as his Fetiche, and he presents it with something to eat and drink, as a kind of oblation. The priests approach the tree afterwards, in order to intreat it in the most solemn manner, to resolve their queries. In order to succeed in these important inquiries, they erect a small pyramid of ashes, in which they plant a bough of the tree; after that they take a pot full of water, drink a draught of it, and then sprinkle the bough. This ceremony is attended with a certain form of words, mumbled over amongst themselves, which, in all probability, are very mysterious. Having proceeded thus far, they sprinkle the bough a second time, and besmear their faces with some of the aforesaid ashes, and soon after this, as they assure us, the Fetiche, or the devil, delivers his final answer.

Villault de Bellefond has given us a description of another sacrifice of these blacks, dedicated to one of those evil, or mischievous Fetiches, which we have already mentioned. I saw, says he, a man and woman at the door of a certain house in one of their cantons or provinces, who had killed a chicken, and were draining its blood upon some leaves which they had strewed upon the ground; and when the blood would drop no longer, they cut it all in pieces, looked wishfully at the leaves, and turning one towards the other, kissing their hands, cried out, "Mecusa, Mecusa, Mecusa; be propitious to us, be propitious to us." I would not interrupt them during the ceremony; but after all was over, I begged they would inform me of what they had been doing. The Fetiche, they said, of that district, had most sorely beaten and abused them, and that therefore they had been providing some victuals for him, in order to appease his vengeance. This Fetiche was nothing but a tile, wound round with straw. I broke the tile, and planted a crucifix in the room of it. The author of this narrative served all the Fetiches in the same disrespectful manner, and substituted crosses in their room, after he had convinced the blacks that a chicken so sacrificed, was not food for any mortal, as they faintly imagined. He exhorted them, also, if ever this Fetiche should attempt to molest them again, to take some little crucifixes, and kiss them, and then make the sign of the cross; and many of them listened to his wholesome admonitions, and exchanged their Fetiches for crosses.

Our zealous traveller resolved to push the reformation he had thus happily begun, still further. I got a guide, says he, to conduct me to their Fetiche major, which was erected on a plain, and set apart for the celebration of their sacrifices. This idol was a large stone covered with earth, which I first cleared off, and then broke about five hundred hooks or grapples which were about it; after this, I applied myself to one of their priests, and asked him whether he had any Fetiches to dispose of. He replied, that I had one, meaning one of the aforesaid hooks which I had taken away, and that he expected to be paid for it. I prevailed on him to go with me to the before-mentioned Fetiche major; and when he perceived that I broke it down, he immediately assembled all his fellow priests together, and informed them of what I had done; who unanimously cried out, that it was the greatest miracle in the world that I was not struck dead upon the spot. In order to make you ample restitution, said I, I plant here this cross, and if any one of you presumes to touch or approach it, unless with awful reverence, and on your bended knees, he shall die that very moment. They ran back howling to their respective apartments, in the utmost disorder and confusion. It must be supposed, that this zealous reformer added more instructions to his outward performance, without which, the blacks would have added profanation to idolatry, and looked upon crosses as more formidable Fetiches than their own. What other idea could this ignorant and idolatrous people entertain of two pieces of wood, the innate virtues whereof are perfectly unknown to all the world, but Papists.

Their priests follow no manner of employment, but are entirely maintained and supported by their lay-blacks, who are as benevolent and liberal to them as they possibly can be, in order to ingratiate themselves into their favour, and be remembered by them in their prayers. In return for their civility, they sell to these blacks such Fetiches as they have blest, or consecrated, by a solemn touch of the tree of the Fetiche. The dress of these priests according to the description given of it by Villault de Bellefond, very much resembles a coat of armour, made of serge, or coarse linen. They wear a scarf round their waist, embellished with little parched bones of chickens, which, says he, bear a very near affinity to the little shells or trinkets of the pilgrims of St. Michael. The other parts of their body are entirely naked, and they wear garters about their legs, made of the bark of the tree of the Fetiche.

As to their ceremony of taking a solemn oath, we shall give an account of it in the words of the author before quoted, who was an eye-witness of the solemnity. A Moor, that had been taken in custody, on suspicion of theft, was brought before the Moorish general, in order to take his solemn oath, and eat up as they call it, his Fetiche. I had a great inclination says he, to see this ceremony; and in the first place I observed that a slave brought in a large bunch of thorns and briars in a basket.— These prickles are covered with leather, and in the middle of them was a small quantity of tallow, wax, feathers of parrots, bones of boiled chickens, the feathers of their own country bird, called the Fetiche, &c. all which mixed up together, compose a Fetiche, which they are obliged to eat; and if they do not burst, they are dismissed and looked upon as falsely accused. One of their priests, who was then present, declared he had made it the strongest he possibly could, and told the Moor, that if he proved perjured, he would die the moment he swallowed down his Fetiche. The oath consists likewise in drinking a draught of a particular liquor, extracted from several drugs and herbs, which are an essential part of the Fetiche. They have also another ceremony, which is sometimes practised for the attestation of a truth; and consists in dashing their foreheads against the feet, breast, and arms of the person who demands satisfaction, pronouncing withal a particular form of words three times successively; and clapping their hands, stamping with their feet upon the ground, and in fine, leaving their Fetiches upon the very spot.

When the negroes of Cabo de Monte enter into any treaty, they cut the throats of several hens, or chickens, drink up part of the blood of them, and present the cup to the other party; afterwards they order the fowls to be dressed, with which they regale themselves and their new allies. To complete and cement this happy union, they share the bones, which are carefully preserved on both sides, as a memorial of their contract; and when at any time a rupture happens on either side, they who are aggrieved send their bones to the others, to intimate that they have forfeited their honour, by a shameful neglect of their engagements.

When the negroes, who live between Cabo Formoso and Ambosine, take an oath in order to acquit themselves from any scandalous imputation, they cut or scarify one of their arms, and afterwards suck the blood out of the wound. In order to procure success in their fishing, and ingratiate themselves into the favour and affection of their Fetiche, they throw rice, millet, and divers other grains into the sea; and in hopes of finding a plentiful store of gold, they allure him with sacrifices, which consist in strewing divers sorts of eatables all round their mountains, and their consecrated trees. After their seed-time is over, they burn the brambles which they find in their fields, with abundance of solemnity.— This ceremony consists in singing, dancing, and pouring palm-wine into the fire, in honour of their Fetiche; and the anniversary of their king's coronation is one of their most solemn festivals. This day is called the festival of the Fetiches, and his majesty invites all his court to a sumptuous entertainment; and they, as an acknowledgment of the favour, make him several very considerable presents. The festival opens with sacrifices, and concludes with all manner of riot and licentiousness.

The creation of a peer, or nobleman, is likewise another very remarkable holiday. Such young gentleman, in order to discharge himself from his so-called, is obliged to make a present to all the nobility in general, of a dog, a sheep, and a cow; and the festival opens with a elegant collation. The populace resort in crowds to the place appointed for the solemnization of it; some either beating their drums, or jingling their bells, and others armed with their javelins and bucklers, having their faces and bodies besmeared all over with yellow paint. Thither also the peer, thus to be created, is carried in state, seated in a kind of litter, with two slaves crouched under his feet, and attended by several young negroes of distinction. A little page carries a chair for him to sit on, when he is obliged to speak upon any particular occasion; and the nobility who go thither to congratulate him on his happy advancement, take a wad of straw, and lay it under his feet, which is looked upon as a testimony of the profoundest veneration and respect. The court ladies likewise pay all due honours to the spouse of this new created peer: as for instance, they dress her to the best advantage, adorn her head with little golden Fetiches, hang a gold chain about her neck, present her with a horse's tail, to make use of as a fan, which they besmear all over with white paint, and throw salt into her lap. When the whole assembly are seated in the order generally observed amongst them, a cow is introduced in triumph by abundance of nobility dancing and singing in the procession. The beast is afterwards fastened to a stake, and surrounded by a multitude of blacks, who beat their drums, and play upon divers instruments of Moorish music; whilst others, more sprightly and active, dance, and divert the company with their warlike exercises.

The ladies likewise amuse themselves much after the same manner; for it is their peculiar province to attend the new created peer and his spouse to their chariot, and air them, throwing flour in their faces as they go along; and in the evening they conduct them home in abundance of pomp and grandeur. In short, the festival concludes with the sacrifice of the cow, which is divided amongst the whole assembly, the new-created peer and his wife only excepted; for should they partake of the least share of it, they would infallibly die at the year's end.— However, they carry the head away with them, and after they have painted it with sundry colours, adorn it with little Fetiches, and hang it up in their house, as a public memorial of their dignity and advancement. Moreover, the Moorish nobility never fail to celebrate likewise the anniversary of their admittance. On that day the head of the cow is dressed in the most elegant manner, and exposed by every one to public view. They have another festival-day, on which the nobility, to distinguish themselves from the populace, paint their bodies all over with white and red streaks, and hang about their necks some little garlands, wreathed with straw and a variety of greens.

Villaut de Bellefond assures us, that the negro women hang round the necks of their infants, little trinkets of gold, strung with the shreds of the Fetiche-tree, in order to secure and protect them from all disasters. And moreover, adds he, in proportion as they advance to the age of four years, they twist round their legs and arms several little sprigs wreathed circular, like rings, which they purchase of their priests, as preservatives against all misfortunes. Purchas, on the credit of some travellers, tells us, that they dress the bodies of their little children with bandages made of bark which they embellish with a variety of Fetiches, being firmly persuaded, that after such prudent precautions, the devil can touch no part of them; and besides, they look upon them as highly serviceable to supply their want of strength. It is also a common custom amongst them to circumcise both sexes, and this ceremony is performed with abundance of solemnity, when their male children are about sixteen years of age. At such times they make bonfires, and sing and dance at the celebration of this joyful festival. But above all, the negroes take peculiar care to be furnished with a sufficient quantity of provisions of all sorts, that the foul fiend or evil spirit may have wherewithal to regale himself, and not to be at leisure to incommode, or injure their children; but this is doubtless all artifice and priest-craft.

As to their nuptial ceremonies, we shall in the first place give an extract from Bellefond. As soon as their young men are able to get their livelihood, their parents, says he, begin to think of settling them in the world, and finding out such wives as may be most suitable to their inclinations. If both parties approve of each other, the maiden is demanded in form, and the parents meet together, attended by a priest, who presents them with several Fetiches, and make the most solemn protestations before all the company then present, of love and constancy to her intended husband; after which they reciprocally join hands. The bridegroom, however, binds himself by no farther obligations, and the whole ceremony consists in nothing more than what is here mentioned. Although polygamy is in vogue amongst them, the wife thus married is looked upon as the only person who has a legal right and title to her husband; and, moreover, if we may credit our traveller, the husband cannot take a second wife, without the free consent of the first. His supernumerary wives are, properly speaking, no better than concubines, and only lie with him alternately, according to their priority of marriage; but this lawful wife lies with him three nights successively.

The young man's father gives him no manner of portion; he has nothing to trust to but what he earns by his own industry and application to business, and depends entirely on his own ingenuity for the support of his family. The young woman's portion seldom amounts to more than six or seven crowns, or thereabouts. Sometimes, indeed, there is an additional present of a young slave, to wait on the new-married couple; and as soon as the true and lawful wife begins to grow old, the favourite concubine assumes her place. From that time, the former becomes a mere domestic servant, takes care of the house only, and concerns herself about none of her husband's other affairs all the remainder of her days.

Adultery is punished by a mallet, or an amercement; and if the wife proves unchaste, she is immediately divorced. If she is only suspected, she is obliged, in order to clear her innocence, and justify her conduct, to swear solemnly by her Fetiche, and eat a small quantity of salt, or drink a small portion of a particular liquid. She never presumes, however, in case she is conscious of her guilt, to take such oath, firmly believing, that the Fetiche would resent the affront, and destroy her that very moment for her perfidy and profaneness.

As to their funeral solemnities, they wash their dead, and lay them afterwards in a kind of coffin, made either of ozers, the bark of trees, or bulrushes; and this coffin is, properly speaking, no better than a large basket. The relations, friends, and neighbours of the deceased repair to his house, and there with sighs, sobs, and tears, beg of him to declare the true cause of his departure. After that, they dance and sing several doleful ditties; then take a solemn tour round his house, and make a hideous noise with their frying-pans and kettles. During this ceremony, a female friend goes a begging from house to house, in behalf of the deceased, and purchases, with the voluntary contributions so raised, an ox, or a sheep, for the priest, who attends on this occasion, in order to oblige and gratify the particular Fetiche, who is to usher the deceased into the other world. The priest, after he has sacrificed the beast, thus presented to him on behalf of the deceased, sheds its blood in honour of all his Fetiches, which are after this ranged all in order, close by one another, the largest in the centre, each furnished with his bumper, and adorned with corals, beads, and feathers. At the same time, his near relations kill a hen, with the blood whereof the priest sprinkles all these Fetiches, and his wives or relations dress this fowl, and serve it to them in form. After this the priest puts on a collar, composed of particular herbs, and begins his magical incantations, by muttering a parcel of obscure mystic terms; then he takes some water, or palm-wine in his mouth, and squirts it upon the Fetiches. In the next place, he takes a small quantity of those herbs whereof the collar is composed, and moulds them into the form of a little ball, which he passes and repasses twice or thrice together through his legs. During the performance of this ceremony, he pays his respects to the old Fetiches, and after a solemn manner, takes his leave of them. He continues to squeeze and mould the residue and remainder of the herbs between his hands, and after he has mixed them with the tallow and grease of the old Fetiches, throws the whole into one large mass or lump, which he dashes against his own face, and afterwards divides it into small parts or parcels, which he strings upon the bark of the sacred tree, and distributes amongst the company; the remainder of the mass is interred with the deceased, and looked upon as the guardian Fetiche that attends him on his journey to the other world.

After all these preliminary ceremonies, the deceased is exposed for half a day to public view, having his head muffled up, and his hands spread open. Afterwards the women convey him to the grave, the burial of the dead being their peculiar province, and their female neighbours follow the corpse, which is carried after the manner here described. The men never attend the funeral, unless the party deceased is to be conveyed to some other town; for they are extremely ambitious of being buried where they were born; and in that case, the men wait on him rank and file. As soon as the corpse is arrived at the burying ground, they make a grave for it about four or five feet deep, and there they lay him, and cover him up so close and so carefully with wood, that not the least dust of earth can possibly touch him. His favourite wife throws his Fetiches over him, lays the greatest part of the implements, or tools, of his trade or occupation by his side, and if there was any thing besides which he had a peculiar regard for, that is generally added to oblige him.—All things thus adjusted, the assistants walk in procession round the grave, and with hideous lamentations take their last farewell of him, and when the corpse is deposited in the grave, the women that interred him, crawl over it backwards and forwards: after this, they rise and return home, where they spend the remainder of the day in drinking and other agreeable amusements. Over the tomb they erect a little pent-house, and no one ever offers to meddle with the provisions or presents which are made the dead, and laid with them in their graves, except their sextons, and such persons as are employed in their interment, who are allowed to take from thence their customary fees, and they furnish their dead with a new stock of provisions once a year.

When the king dies, they expose him to public view for several days together; and during all that time, they wait on him with the same attention and respect, as if he were alive: But when he begins to smell and be offensive, some of his slaves convey him away and inter him in some secret place, with all his Fetiches, his fire-arms and other warlike trophies, and such provisions as they see most convenient. Whilst these slaves are thus privately employed in the interment of his majesty, the populace make it their business to murder several women, maids, boys, and slaves to accompany their deceased monarch in his journey to the other world. They are cut off, however, according to custom, by surprise; that their untimely death, we presume, may seem the less terrible and shocking to them. The bodies of these his new attendants are buried with him, and their heads are stuck upon poles round his Mausoleum, while two guards stand centinels to secure his funeral properties and provisions.

They pretend to protect themselves with the Fetiches, and large brass collars as thick as their arms, which they imagine are capable of charming or warding off the blows of their enemies. Every individual person, man, woman, or child, rush into the field of battle, for it is an established custom among them to leave the house empty on such emergent occasions. Nay, when they are apprehensive of bloody engagements, they set fire to all their towns, villages, and habitations, under the specious pretence, that by such means they shall deprive their enemies of the advantages they might reasonably expect of their proving victorious, and to prevent their soldiers from thinking of, or longing for home. They sell as slaves, all those whom they take prisoners, and they eat the dead bodies of their enemies whom they kill in battle. All crimes, let them be of ever so atrocious a nature, may be compounded for the payment of a small fine; but if the person cannot pay that, his head is cut off and his body quartered. All these parts of the body are given to the relations of the deceased, who boil the head, and put it up near their Fetiche or idol, and the women having bathed the quarters with their tears, bury them in their garden.

These people are, perhaps, sunk as low into idolatry as any we have yet mentioned, nor is it enough to say they are ignorant of the true God; for even with respect to their own idols, they have the most unworthy notions. They ascribe to them no other attributes than such as are even degrading to human nature, and far beneath the dignity of a man. How can they imagine, that an inanimate being can supply their wants, alleviate their afflictions, inspire them with knowledge, preserve them through life, or make them happy in eternity? The most accomplished man in the world must know himself to be a dependent creature, and consequently must look to some Superior Being, as an object of worship. But here we find men paying divine adoration to what they trample on in the streets, what is tossed about from place to place,—but this is a god!

We shall conclude this article in the words of St. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, who was himself a native of Africa, and suffered death for the gospel. "Idolatry is the mother of all debauchery, to throw a snare not only before Christians, but even to corrupt moral heathens. It flatters them with false promises, amuses them with false hopes, and seduces them by a kind of bewitching magic. The devil is the author of it, who, in order to give it a more promising appearance, joins with it such lewd entertainments as are agreeable to the senses, but destructive to the soul."

These people are, perhaps, in some things more superstitious, more ignorant, and more barbarous than any we have hitherto mentioned. It is true, they acknowledge one Supreme Being, but at the same time, they worship many subordinate ones. Nay, it is even asserted, that they worship the devil, but this, we imagine, is nothing more than what is common to those heathen nations, where it is believed there are two principles, one good and one evil. This notion seems to have taken its rise from the consideration of virtue and vice in the world. This induced some Epicurean, or rather Atheistical philosophers to set up two gods, the one in opposition to the other; and we are sorry to find that too much of this prevails even among those who bear the name of Christians. These considerations naturally bind us to draw a veil over the weakness of these people, and to pity their ignorance, because they have not an opportunity of being better acquainted with what relates to their eternal happiness.

All of these people have their Fetiches, and a priest, who is a sort of a father confessor, and who at all times undertakes to give them advice concerning any thing of a doubtful nature, which he does by consulting their oracle.

To carry on the deception as much as possible, the priests pretend that their idols, or Fetiches, speak to them audibly, and for that purpose they have a pipe fixed to the idol, and to it they apply their ear, after they have offered up sacrifices. They have some faint idea of the day of judgment, and they imagine that the souls of the deceased take cognizance of every thing below, and for that reason they offer up to them their most solemn vows, prayers, and oblations.

Whenever they pursue the chase, or engage in any undertaking whatever, they take particular care to make some sort of oblation to the souls of their deceased relations. They also make sumptuous entertainments in honour of the dead, especially of their nearest and dearest kindred, who are the protectors, in their opinion, of their families; for to speak in their own language, every soul is the guardian of its own relations, and it is for that reason that their kings never enter upon any projects till they have first invoked the souls of their ancestors.

They imagine that these souls or spirits, generally reside in the woods, and such as are afflicted either in body or mind, resort to those solitary retreats, and there most humbly implore their aid and assistance. As for temples or chapels, or indeed any structures for public worship, they have none. All their public meetings for worship are in the woods next adjoining to their huts, and there they offer up their sacrifices, and make their oblations to the spirits of the deceased.

All these heathens practise the rite of circumcision, and indeed it seems to be universal throughout Africa, but they have no fixed time for performing the ceremony. Some do it while they are infants, and others not till they are getting towards years of maturity. Every family has its own particular Fefetiche or idol, and their priests attend them as often as they think proper. When a negro is fallen sick, he sends for his priest, who is called the Fetissero, who offers up some sacrifices in his behalf, sprinkles the Fetiche belonging to the family with the blood of the victim. In general, their sacrifices are offered up once every six months, and on such occasions the priests, who are the most arrant impostors in the world, pretend to make the people believe that the idol speaks to them, and gives them a gracious answer. As for the dead, they are of opinion that none but those who die in battle will ever be raised again, and this notion is inculcated in order to make the men regardless of danger, and strangers to fear.

The natives of Biafara offer up all they have, even their most darling infants, to the devil; and they are extremely addicted to the study and practice of the black art, and all magical incantations; flattering themselves, that by those mysterious operations they can influence the elements, and all the products of nature. When we talk here of the devil, we do not mean that evil spirit; which our Christian divines treat of; but a thing, a being, a spirit only, which we are at a loss to define, or give any adequate idea of; but in all probability it may be the sole object of some people's worship, and frequently it is no more than a chimera of their priests' invention, or a strong impulse, or a delusion of their own disordered imagination.

We shall here amuse our readers with one particular custom, which is as idle as it is extravagant; and, in all probability, extremely painful. The natives of Rio-Real, and the parts adjacent, as also the negroes of Ardra, decline the ceremony of circumcision with respect to their females, as well as several others amongst the Africans, but have substituted another in the room of it, which is much more incommodious and uneasy. About the time that their daughters arrive at the age of matrimony, they lodge a small wooden instrument, plentifully stored with emmits, within their pudenda, which they frequently shift, lest in time those little insects should lose their innate quality, and not be able to sting with that pungency as required. This severe kind of probation continues for near three months, nor is left off till they have qualified them for the marriage bed. As to the mysterious circumcision of the negro women, we shall treat of it hereafter in another paragraph.

The negroes of Cabo de Monte, and the parts adjacent, have nothing very remarkable in their nuptial ceremonies, except that the presents which a young lover makes to his mistress, are looked upon as an earnest, and give him a kind of right and title to her. For instance, if a virgin is too young, and not altogether marriageable, her lover may retain her by proper presents. If he has none to give her, he may work for her, build her a hut, and manure her ground for her. In case his mistress is independent of any of her relations, and perfectly disengaged, it is customary for the gallant to invite her to his own house, and for her to accept the offer, though with abundance of seeming modesty and reluctance: after which she grants him the last favour for ten or twelve nights together, before she insists upon the present which is to bind their engagement. If a son proves the result of their amorous interviews, the father provides for him; if a daughter, she is left entirely to the care and conduct of the mother.—Such love adventures as these prove of no ill consequence, are no manner of prejudice or disappointment to the fair sex; for, maids or not maids, they never fail of finding husbands. What a world of noise and confusion should we prevent, were we licensed to carry on such a free trade; were we entrusted for a week or a fortnight together, with such staple commodities, by way of probation, before we struck an absolute bargain, and paid down the purchase-money!

If the lover, after trial, finds his mistress to his taste, and for his turn, he makes his applications to her parents in form, and sends her some suitable presents. She accepts of them, in case she approves of her bed-fellow, and if not, returns them directly.

The naming of an infant is performed with abundance of solemnity; and the ceremony is generally performed betimes in the morning, when the child is about eight or ten days old, accompanied with vocal and instrumental music. The celebrant takes the child from the mother, and lays him on a shield or buckler, in the midst of the whole assembly, who are all armed in form. Then he puts a little bow into his hand, and makes an harangue of about half an hour long, according to the best of his knowledge, and the established principles of the negroes, on the duties required of the nominee, in order hereafter to be a happy man, and a man of honour. After this exhortation is over, he returns the child into its mother's arms; and the nomination of a daughter is performed much after the same manner, though not with equal solemnity. The woman, who is the celebrant, takes the girl, and lays her on a mat, in the midst of the whole female assembly, and puts into her hand a ladle, which they make use of to stir their porridge; and after that, she makes an harangue according to their principles, on the duties of a good housewife.

Some of the natives of the Golden Coast are addicted, notwithstanding they are indulged in polygamy as well as their neighbours, to strolling abroad, and lying with strangers. In case they are detected, the affair is with ease accommodated, by paying the injured wife some trivial amercement; though should she, on the other hand, chance to trespass, and prove false to her husband's bed, she would run the risque of being divorced, or sold for a slave.—The courtship of these people is not very ceremonious. The young man asks the question, and seldom meets with a repulse; if he is not a slave, or does not forget his nuptial presents, which consist only in a few worthless baubles. She is conducted to her husband's house in the evening, and there a bridegroom is nominated to be her guardian, and to lie for about eight days between the new-married couple, to give a check to the violence of the bridegroom's passion, till in time they become better acquainted.

Now we are upon the topic of matrimony, we shall make bold to mention one particular ceremony, which, though there is very little religion in the case, it is true, cannot so properly be introduced in any other place. Every village amongst the negroes, maintains two or three common women; whom they instal, or put in possession of their posts, in the presence of a very numerous assembly. The candidates are exposed to public view, and seated upon a mat; in the interim the oldest of them cuts the throat of a fowl, and lets the blood trickle down upon her head, shoulders, and arms; and then solemnly promises upon oath, to oblige any townsman whatever with her favours, upon reasonable terms; after this, she admits one of the company to her embraces, and then goes and washes herself, with one of her comrades. The ablution ended, she resumes her post, and is rubbed all over her arms, breast, and shoulders, with white chalk; and to close the ceremony, two young fellows take her upon their shoulders, and carry her in triumph all over the town. After that, she is obliged for eight days together to sit in public upon her mat, and there recommend herself to the generosity of her gallants.

The courtiers in the kingdom of Benin, are not allowed to cover their nakedness, nor marry without his majesty's licence and consent, first had and obtained. The privilege of raiment entirely depends on his royal pleasure: and whenever he confers that favour, he obliges them with a wife at the same time. Neither do the wives ever dress themselves without the husband's permission, who, when they grant any of them that favour, take up their lodging with them. A widow, that has a son, must never marry again, without his consent; nay she absolutely becomes his servant. If any one makes his addresses to her, with her son's knowledge and approbation, the gallant always engages to settle the youth, and find out a wife to his inclinations. Parents never marry their daughters before they are duly qualified; and after their nuptials concern themselves no farther about them. We omit several other customs, as being, in our opinion, not worth observance; but they have one notion, however, that is very particular. To be brought to bed of two children, is by them accounted perfectly scandalous, and as they are fully persuaded, that twins are the result of their wives incontinence and loss of honour, they not only discard one of them, but sometimes, as we are informed, make away with and destroy it. What hard thoughts would they entertain of a superfetation? and how would they asperse and stigmatize such women as have sometimes three at a birth?

We shall now come to their funeral solemnities. The negroes of Cabo de Monte in the first place weep and lament over a dead friend, and mingle the commemoration of some of his most laudible actions with their tears. After this testimony of their respect, they wash his body, curl his hair, dress him, and in order to make him stand upright, tie him fast behind, and under his arms. They furnish the deceased with a bow and arrow, and adorn him with all the gayest things he was possessed of in his life-time; and in that attitude each of them makes him some suitable present. The relations and friends sit on their knees all round about, with their backs turned towards him, having their bows in their hands, drawn with such violence, that they seem in danger of being broke. This ceremony, say they, declares, that they are prepared to take revenge on such as might any ways have been instrumental to his death. When they put him in the grave, they bury not only the presents that are made him, but some of his most valuable effects along with him. If a prince or a nobleman dies, they bury a sufficient quantity of slaves with him, to attend and wait on him in the other world. Their mourning consists in making a solemn vow, and binding it with an oath, to fast about eight or ten days together. If some very valuable friend happens to die, whose loss is a more than common concern to them, they sometimes hold it for a month. During all that time they neither caress their wives, nor have any familiar converse with the female sex: They wear no coloured clothes; they shave their heads, and lie upon the ground. When the term of their fasting is expired, they discharge themselves of their vow, by repeating the same ceremony they observed at first, that is to say, extending their hands in the presence of a Fetiche; and after, they make a sumptuous entertainment in honour of the deceased.

When any one is suspected to have died an unnatural death, they neither weep over the corpse, nor wash it, nor dress it, till their jealousy is removed, and the fact cleared up. For, say they, should we mourn over it first, it would be impossible to find out the unhappy cause; since the spirit whom we should consult on this melancholy occasion, would then be silent, and resolve none of our queries. In order to discover the fact in such cases, they take a small piece of the deceased's garment, the parings of his nails, and a lock of his hair, all which they bind up together, and cover them over with the dust of some particular red wood. After this, they fasten this little packet to a stick, the two ends whereof are laid upon the heads of two men. Then one amongst them, whom they look upon as the best orator, takes two iron implements; as, for instance, two hatches, or the like, and striking one against the other, conjures the dead person to disclose whether his death was the result of violence, or a decay in nature: if the latter, the spirit who actuates or influences the two men, compels them to bow down their heads; if the former, to shake them. They continue in the same manner to ask him further, in order to be fully satisfied what he died of, if the dose or potion that was given him, was too strong for his constitution? if he was poisoned? who administered it? and the like. In short, when they have discovered, as they imagine, the malefactor, they charge him with the fact, and make him swallow down, fasting in the morning, the quantity of three or four cups full of a very strong liquid, extracted from the bark of some particular trees. This draught, they say, infallibly kills the party accused, if guilty; if innocent, he instantly throws up every drop of it. Sometimes there is a spell, or charm, laid upon the spirit, which prevents him from giving an answer to all their interrogatories; and, in that case, they apply themselves to some magicians, to remove the fascination, and then they proceed to the experiment above described.

After the decease of a father, the eldest son takes possession as heir of all his effects; and in case he has younger brothers, undertakes to be their tutor; and he is entitled to both, even before he is twenty years of age; but he is obliged, however, to testify his abilities before the king in the following manner: he repairs to the usual place where they practise the art of shooting, in the midst of a crowd of his relations, with his father's bow in his hand, and his quiver at his back. He grounds his bow as an able archer, and in that attitude asserts, that he thinks himself capable of making a proper use of the arms his father had left him. After this formal declaration, he gives a specimen of his art, and then makes a kind of an harangue, wherein he assures his majesty, that he will maintain his family, defend the rights and privileges of his brothers, and take care, as far as in him lies, of all their lands and effects, &c.

In the more remote parts of Guinea, beyond the Kingdom of Benin, there is nothing very remarkable in the funeral solemnities of the negroes, except, that after the decease of one of their heroes or commanders, they hollow a tree, and impale a youth alive in it in order to be his slave and attendant in the other world. Such as die at Benin, are always accompanied by a considerable number of slaves. As soon as the corpse is laid in the grave, they dance and sing over it for seven or eight days together, and sometimes take the body up again, in order to honour it with a fresh sacrifice of beasts and slaves. As to their king, when he dies, they dig a grave for him of an uncommon depth, in the centre of the court, and there inter him; and his courtiers are all ambitious of attending him, but that honour is reserved only for his peculiar favourites. When they have selected their compliment, they bury them alive along with him; and afterwards a large sepulchral stone is rolled over the grave. The first of these favourites that die, is always commemorated with the greatest reverence and respect. To conclude, the new king orders an elegant entertainment to be made for the populace upon the monument, which is the ceremony of his coronation; and is often attended with the massacre of several of his subjects, in honour of his accession to the throne.

There never was any one religion whatsoever that had not a particular set of mysteries, which none but a few select devotees could ever attain to. In order to arrive at that pitch of perfection, there have always been such extravagant ceremonies to be observed, as were sufficient to surprise, blind, shock, and even confound the inferior class of devotees.

Fastings, penances, and a thousand austerities, have been for the generality the preludes, if we may be allowed the expression, to those mystic ceremonies, and every person of experience well knows, that the imagination of a devotee is all on fire, especially while he is learning what he considers as a sacred mystery. This is evident, from the accounts we have of the initiation of the ancients, and we have frequently taken notice of this in our accounts of the religion of the idolators in the East-Indies.

The regeneration of the negroes of Cabo de Monte, is of the same nature and degree. In order to have a familiar intercourse with spirits, and be admitted into their refined society, the candidate must die and be born again. The mysteries of such assemblies are concealed and hid from the eyes of women and children, nor are any strangers admitted. If the person thus qualified should indiscreetly reveal any of these divine secrets to a friend whom he loved ever so much, or thought he could confide in, the spirits, they believe, would resent the discovery, and would inevitably destroy the one for his indiscretion, and the other for his curious and impertinent inquiry.

The ceremony of this initiation is solemnized but once in twenty, or twenty-five years, and the negroes in their common discourse about it, talk, for the generality, in the language of enthusiasts. All we can make of this ceremony of their dying, is, that it must consist in some abominable rites that they are ashamed of, otherwise, why should they keep it so concealed? Perhaps it is similar to some of those abominations, so frequently mentioned in the Old Testament; nay, that it is so, there is strong reason to believe, because their idols have similar names to those of the Canaanites. Thus they call their regeneration, or that of dying and being born again to a new state of existence, by the name of Belli-Paaro, which undoubtedly is the Baal Peor of the heathens. Now it is well known that there were many horrid abominations committed in the temple of Baal Peor, for it was from him that the Greeks, and after them the Romans borrowed their shameful god Priapus, which leads us to consider these African mysteries as truly abominable, and not fit to be mentioned.

The marks, or signatures of this regeneration, or Belli-Paaro, are several long slashes down the neck and shoulders, and such as are favoured with these barbarous marks pretend to much more knowledge than their neighbours. They sit as judges both in civil and in criminal causes, and as for those who are not yet in the state of regeneration, they are reckoned among the number of the profane, impure, and illiterate, incapable of giving a just judgment in any thing of importance, and unworthy of being admitted into any public assemblies, civil or ecclesiastical. But secret as they keep this mystery, yet something relating to it has transpired which we shall here lay before the reader.

By the king's special command, they make choice of some private commodious place in the woods, that abounds with olives and other fruits, and in short is stored with all sorts of herbs in such plenty, as are fit for the subsistence of the human species. To this sacred solitude their youth are conducted but with reluctance: for they think it a melancholy circumstance to encounter with death. Before they set out, they give away all their effects to their friends and relations, intimating thereby, that they renounce all the vanities and pleasures of this life. They are accompanied by several old devotees, who have been many years initiated, and these reside among them in the grove as their superintendants and instructors. They inform them of all the customs and ceremonies which must be religiously observed; they inure them by frequent exercise to a particular violent dance, that shakes them prodigiously, and they teach them some pieces of poetry, abounding with encomiums on their Belli-Paaro.—All these candidates or probationers receive a new name at their regeneration, and the ceremony or initiation lasts at least five years, so that it may be considered as a course of liberal education. The king himself honours them with his presence several different times, and then it is that they are publicly examined.

As for the young ones, they are not permitted to stir out nor appear among the profane; for such are in their opinion, all those who have not been regenerated. The parts adjacent to this grove for three or four miles round, are looked upon as sacred, and no profane person must presume to enter therein. The women are all excluded, and if by any accident they should happen to enter within these bounds, they must sing as loud as they are able to raise their throats; were they to neglect this, they believe that the evil spirits would run away with them.

After the candidates have been fully instructed in this mystery of regeneration, their tutors conduct them to some private places, where women are permitted to attend them; and this is the first time they have an opportunity of speaking with those of that sex. It is here likewise that they are instructed in all things relating to morals and politics, for which reason these groves may be called the academies or colleges of the negroes. At their dismissal, they affect to appear as persons just come into the world and in some sense it may be said so, for they know neither father nor mother, nor any friends nor relations; for to forget all things past, is the first consequence of this new life. They pretend to remember nothing of their past life, and they are all dressed in feathers, with a cap made of the bark of a tree, which hangs over part of their faces, with small jingling bells at their feet, and a set of leopard's teeth hung round their neck for a collar.

Thus equipped, they resort to public assemblies, to practise their solemn dances, and perform before a multitude of people, that which in a more particular manner is devoted to the service of their Belli, and was taught them by their tutors in the groves, during the time of the regeneration. This is so essential an accomplishment, that such as are so unhappy as to be incapable of performing it rightly in public, are treated with all the marks of ignominy and contempt. At the conclusion of the dance, the tutors call the pupils by new names, and then introduce them to their relations.

The power and authority which is granted to such persons as are thus initiated, is the result of policy and superstition blended together, which have at all times been made use of to keep the people in awe. When they are inclined to make a public prohibition of any thing, they practise a kind of magical operation by virtue of a stick drove fast into the ground, at the top whereof hangs a bundle of reeds. But what makes them the most formidable to the people is, their delivering over such as transgress their orders to the power of the evil spirits; and this artifice consists in hurrying the delinquents away with much bustle and noise, by some of their attendants and creatures, whom they have at their back. They bear such an absolute sway over them, and keep them in such profound ignorance, that no person dares presume so much as to look, or make any enquiries, when these imaginary spirits seize such as are found guilty, lest they should fall into their hands themselves, and be in the same manner hurried away into the groves, and there be left to perish. Such are some of their mysteries, and here by the way we may observe, that in all false religions, the priests endeavour to keep the people in ignorance: and what is still more remarkable, that even these poor negroes who go almost naked, have the art to study priestcraft, and impose upon their fellow-subjects.

When they would make a discovery who has committed a murder, they pour a particular liquid upon the arm or thigh of the person suspected, but before the liquor can be used, it must be boiled, and the supposed criminal's name is mentioned as soon as it begins to rise. The moment in which the liquid begins to boil, they address their imaginary spirits in the following words, "Is the party on whom I pour this water guilty or not? If he is, may it scald him and shrivel up his skin." If it has not that effect, the party suspected is absolutely discharged, and accounted innocent.

The negro women have also their particular mysteries, which bear some analogy to those we have already mentioned.

The mothers take their daughters into consecrated groves, and commit them to the care of a sort of priestesses, who at first treat them with a dish of chickens, and this is considered as a kind of treaty; for they are called, "The chickens of alliance."—After this the young virgins have their heads shaved and are instructed to sing and dance. When the time of their education is expired, they are all dressed in the bark of a particular tree, and their relations carry them abundance of trinkets, that they may appear as fine as possible when they make their public entry into the town where they reside, at which time there is an elegant entertainment provided for them, accompanied with music and dancing, and many other sorts of diversions peculiar to the country.

The initiations here described, are universally practised by all the natives of Guinea; and therein the footsteps of the mysteries of the ancients may be easily discerned. There is a great conformity also between them and the initiation of the new world, for it is well known, that the ancients looked on theirs, as the entrance into a new life; which is the very same idea as that of the Americans and negroes. It is likewise well known, that the ancients thought the spirit and essence of religion were included therein, and that such as were unregenerated, saw nothing but the shell, as it were, or external part of it. In them were comprised the true interpretation of the grounds and principles of their religion, and the maxims of their morality.—Every body knows, in short, that such as were initiated, entered upon their regeneration with retiring from the world, and with divers austerities, fastings, and penances; all which were required to be religiously observed by the probationer or novice. These several trials were also to be accompanied with an absolute freedom and disengagement from all sensual objects; and when the soul was in that happy state of indifference, that nothing terrestrial could influence or affect it, they thought it qualified for the participation of the most sublime mysteries of religion.

As soon as the young virgins of Brazil arrive at the age of maturity, they are mortified to that degree, that we may term their unhappy situation, with propriety enough, a state of martyrdom. In the first place they either burn or cut their hair off their heads as close as they possibly can. After this, they oblige them to stand upright on a flat stone, whilst their flesh is slashed and mangled with a sharp ivory tooth, from their shoulders to their waist, cross-ways, in such a violent manner, that the blood trickles down from every part. The agonies which these poor girls are in, are visible enough, by their various contorsions and grimaces; but their modesty obliges them to conceal their torture as much as possible, and not one of them dares to vent a sigh, or shed a tear. After this they daub the wounds with the dust and ashes of a wild gourd, which is as strong a corrosive as gun powder; inasmuch, that the marks can never be erased. After this, they bind their arms; and in short, their whole bodies, with a cotton fillet; hang the teeth of a particular beast round their necks, and lay them so low in their hammocks, that nobody can see them. They are there confined for three days together at least, without being able to stir, and are not allowed to speak, eat, nor drink, during all that time. At the expiration thereof, they are taken down, in order to have their bandages taken off, and then they are obliged to stand again on the flat stone before mentioned, on which they underwent their first severe mortifications, that their feet may not touch the ground. After that, they are to be put to bed again, where their whole diet consists in a few boiled roots, a little meal and water, and no other refreshments whatsoever. In this low condition are they kept till their second purgation: at which they are slashed and mangled again from head to foot, in a more barbarous and inhuman manner than before; then they are carried to their hammocks once more, but not so closely confined for the second month, nor obliged to undergo such severe abstinence as before; but, however, they are not suffered to appear abroad, to converse with any of the family, or do any manner of business, but card or spin cotton. The third month they besmear them all over with a black ointment, made up with a particular oil; and after this they begin to go abroad and appear in the fields.

Every town has a kind of a pest-house, situate at about an hundred yards distance from the rest, called Bournamon, into which all the women in general, maids as well as wives, are obliged to withdraw, and exclude themselves from all manner of society till their purgations are perfectly ceased; after which, they are at liberty to return to their families again, as soon as they think convenient. Their daily provisions during those times are brought to them, with as much care and precaution as if they were infected with the most malignant distemper. They durst not, notwithstanding, conceal their natural infirmity by any manner of means, when it comes upon them; for it would be inevitable death, should they be discovered to dress any victuals for their husbands at such a conjuncture. Accordingly, they are obliged to eat of the Fetiche, and take a solemn oath, that they will declare their infirmities to their husbands, and voluntarily withdraw to their Bournamon, as soon as ever they are conscious of the least pollution.

Religion of Congo, Angola, and of the Jages, or Gauls.

The king of Loango, a particular province of Congo, is in some measure the object of his subjects divine adoration, who honour him with the attributes or titles of Samber and Pongo, that is to say, the Deity, and for that reason they look upon him as an omnipotent being. The populace, nay, the grandees of his kingdom, being fully persuaded that he can bless them with rain at his pleasure, make their public addresses to him once a year, with abundance of solemnity and with presents in their hands, for that intent. A day is by him appointed for the celebration of this ceremony; at which time they pay him the most solemn homage, and entertain his majesty with a trial of their skill in archery, and with a Moorish, or rather Ethiopian concert of music. After their adorations are paid, the king lets fly an arrow into the air; and the day is spent in all the demonstrations of public joy imaginable, especially if the rain happens but to descend ever so little upon them; and we may reasonably suppose, that these people, as well as other nations, make choice of such times as are likely to be most favourable, and give a sanction to the miracle they petition for.

His majesty, moreover, is, as we are informed, a profound magician; he orders and requires the divine worship of two idols, one called Mokisso, the other Checocke. The former, to whom they give the additional title of Gombery, is served and attended by an old sorceress, whose appellation is Ganga Gombery. She is the Pythian priestess of Loango, but like Triphonius of old, she delivers her oracles in subterraneous caverns. There is a chapel erected in the high road, which is consecrated and set apart for the service of Checocke, wherein stands a little black image, or representation of him, in which he sometimes condescends to communicate himself at midnight to his favourite devotees. Such nocturnal honours are attended with raptures, and enthusiastic agitations for some hours. Every sentence that such persons utter under their inspirations, is looked upon as an oracle, and the solemn declaration of the divine will and pleasure of the Checocke. All artificers, fishermen, and magicians, look on this idol as the peculiar object of their divine adoration; and one branch of their worship consists in clapping their hands.

Besides these two idols, they people of Loango have several household, as well as rural gods, whom they worship and adore under divers extravagant figures; and each idol has his peculiar district and employment. Such as preside over the fruits, the corn, and other products of the earth, are nothing more than scare-crows, or bug bears, composed of bones, feathers, horns, hoofs, and skins of beasts, &c. Notwithstanding all these ridiculous instances of idolatry, they acknowledge a Supreme Being, whom however, they neither concern themselves about, nor any ways regard; which neglect proceeds either from their profound ignorance, or a notion which many others entertain as well as they, viz. that God governs the world by his deputies, or vicegerents, to whom alone, by consequence, mortals ought to make their immediate addresses, as it is customary for us to make our applications to some favourite minister of state, for such favours as we are ambitious of obtaining from the prince upon the throne.

The formal manner in which the king of Loango generally drinks a glass of liquor, may be reckoned with propriety enough, amongst the number of their religious customs. The officer, who attends him on that occasion, has a little bell in his hand, which he tinkles on the delivery of the cup, and turns his head another way; and at the same time, all such other persons as are present, prostrate themselves before him, and hide their faces, till the ceremony is over; for it is no less than death for any one to see his majesty drink; so extravagant and fantastical is the veneration which this princely god exacts from his subjects! Moreover, he eats by himself in a withdrawing room, set apart for that particular purpose; and when he rises from table, he either knocks or rings a little bell, and then departs without any farther notice or ceremony whatsoever; which superstitious custom is grounded on an idle notion the negroes entertain, that his majesty would inevitably die that moment he was seen to eat or drink by any of his subjects. Yet who knows after all, but this custom was first established with a political view, and that the assassination of some prince at his table was the original cause of its institution?

Whenever any of these blacks have white children, a circumstance however, which but seldom happens, this king of Loango orders them to be brought up, and instructed in the black art, and the ministry of their idols. These priests have a peculiar privilege to make whatever they take a fancy to, their own property; and the veneration and respect which the people entertain for them is so great, that they never thwart or oppose their inclinations.

There is an idol in the province of Matambo, called Miramba, whose priests are all sorcerers or magicians; and this image stands upright, directly over against the temple dedicated to his peculiar service, in a basket made in the form of a bee-hive. To this deity in particular they apply themselves for success, when they go out a hunting or fishing; and for the relief of all such as are indisposed. It is before him likewise, that a person, who is charged with the commission of any crime, is obliged to plead his cause, and clear his innocence. In the first place, he falls down on his knees before Miramba, and then, embracing the god with the profoundest veneration, pronounces these words, "Behold Miramba! Thy servant is come to justify himself before thee." In case he is really guilty, and is impiously perjured, he falls down dead upon the spot. The devotees preserve with care, and carry always about them some little images of this Miramba in small boxes, which may be looked upon, with propriety enough, as the relic cases of these negroes; and sometimes they wear a Miramba about their necks, or on their right arms. Miramba always marches at the head of their armies; and he is presented with the first delicious morsel, and the first glass of wine, that is served up at the governor or king of Matambo's table.

The natives of the king of Bamba worship an animal with two legs only, a long tail, and a pair of wings; an animal in short, like a dragon, according to the description we have of that imaginary creature; and as it is but seldom to be met with, it is on that account, in all probability, looked upon and revered as a Deity. The blacks of the province of Congo, the Bramins and other neighbours of the Anzicans, worship the sun and moon, which they represent, we are informed, under the figures of a man and a woman. They have several other little deities, however, which they likewise worship, but the sun, and his consort the moon, for that is the notion they entertain of these glorious luminaries, are always their principal deities.

In the island of Quantalla there is an idol made of their current coin, to which the natives make voluntary oblations of their most valuable effects; which all persons are strictly enjoined not to touch on any account whatever. They let them lie till they decay through time and putrefaction, in an enclosure, fenced with ivory palisadoes, and one priest alone receives the free-will-offerings of the devotees, and presents their homage to the idol.— This vice-gerent of his, industriously conceals from every body the secret avenues which lead to the deity; for he never goes twice the same way. This wondrous precaution of his, in all probability, is no more than a piece of priestcraft to animate the zeal of the people, whom he thus keeps ignorant of the god whom they adore.

In short, the people of Congo pay divine adoration to dragons, serpents, goats, and tygers, as also to a vast variety of birds and plants; being in all appearance like the ancient Egyptians, whose religion principally consisted in symbols, or hieroglyphics. The people of Congo have likewise several images and figures, made both in stone and wood, which seem to bear a very near affinity to the Fetiches and Talismans before-mentioned; but as they acknowledge a Supreme Being, it must be supposed, that they look upon these idols as inferior deities, though worthy of the esteem and veneration of mankind, on account of their relative power, and their easy access to that Supreme Being. But be that as it will, the images of these idols are certainly honoured with the respective names of the divinities they represent, and receive the vows of their respective votaries, as their deputies or vicegerents.— The Gangas, or priests, when they visit their sick, present them with these images, which they set before their eyes, in order to restore their health, and excite their fervour and devotion. There are some of these negroes, however, who are so rational in their conduct as to abstain, with the utmost precaution, from the worship of a plurality of gods, and invoke only the Supreme Being, whom they distinguish by different appellations, that is Deuscata, the only God, and Desu, the God of heaven.

consist principally in their genuflections, prostrations, and as we have before observed, applauses, or clapping of hands. To these, however, we must add their prayers, vows, and sacrifices; as also some particular gesticulations, which are the peculiar signatures or characteristics of humility and devotion, and their priests are all sorcerers and magicians. The art of divination, or prediction by birds, is particularly studied and practised by the natives of the kingdom of Angola. Their flight and various cries are presages, as they were amongst the heathens of antiquity, of future good or bad fortune.

The Mokissos, or Petiches of Angola, are composed either of wood, or stone; some few whereof are erected in temples or chapels, but the much greater part of them in the public streets, or high-ways. They have various denominations, according to their respective employments. To them they make their vows, and to them they offer up their sacrifices, either to appease their anger, or obtain their benediction. Some of these Mokissos are made in the form of four-footed beasts; and others like birds. They, in short, are their oracles; but not the only ones these idolators of Angola consult: They have a religious dance which fully answers that purpose; though, in all probability, it consists in nothing more than the art of throwing themselves into enthusiastic raptures, through the violence of their agitations. It is in this situation that the first inspired dancer talks in a sublime and spiritual language to his audience, and is listened to with as much attention as an oracle. We shall have occasion elsewhere to return to the religious dances of these barbarians. The Mokissos, of whom we have been speaking, are subordinate beings, who is called by the natives of Angola, Zamban-Pongo, and acknowledged to be the god of heaven.

In the province of Miambo, those who solemnly devote themselves to the service of Maramba are shut up by the Gargas, in a close dark apartment, and there obliged to spend considerable time in the strictest abstinence. After this retirement, they are likewise directed to observe a profound silence for several days together, and not to violate this injunction on any occasion whatsoever, not even the hardest treatment possible, which they generally meet with, in order to try their patience. When the term of this penance is expired, they are introduced into the presence of their idol, and there undergo the painful operation of two incisions, which are made on their shoulders in the form of a crescent. After this, they are sprinkled with the blood that trickles down from their wounds, which completes the ceremony of their consecration to Miramba, to whom they are solemnly engaged to be ever true and faithful, and always carry about them one of his images. After this solemn dedication, they must not presume to taste some particular provisions; which are not however, prohibited alike to all; some being forbidden to eat one thing, and others another. This is the ceremony of the the initiation of their youth of both sexes, as soon as they are twelve years of age.

The idolators of Congo describe their gods as subject to various passions, who, if we may credit their account of them, look down with a jealous eye on the partial adorations of their votaries.—When a negro imagines that he lies under some more than ordinary obligations to one particular idol, he worships it with an uncommon zeal and veneration; erects statues, and consecrates images to that favourite deity; which partial respect of his is not only resented, but severely punished by some other god that thinks himself neglected: The devotee is sure to feel at the long run, the dire effects of his indignation, which obliges him to consecrate some image in honour of him in order to appease his resentment: But this is not all; for if any other god interposes, and demands a share of his respect, he is by no means to be slighted; so that the devotee is frequently compelled to consecrate a far greater number of images than ever he intended. Such are the ideas which the negroes of Congo entertain of their religious duties, for we may credit such authors as have given us a description of those countries.

It is the peculiar province of one of their Gargas to consecrate these images in the presence of the whole family, friends, and neighbours of the devotee; the ceremony whereof is somewhat mysterious; for the votary is obliged to be duly prepared for it, by retirement for about a fortnight into a little palm-tree hut, and by a profound silence for nine days. After this preparation, the Garga, the devotee, and a numerous train of his neighbours and relations, repair to a spacious plain, where, being all ranged round a drum, the Garga sounds forth the praises of the Mokisso, and the whole assembly dance to the martial beating of a drum, in honour of the new idol. At the close of the second or third day, the devil begins visibly to actuate and possess the devotee. After that the Garga mutters some particular mystic terms, and stains his own temples, the corners of his eyes, and his breast, with red and white spots. In the same ceremonious manner, he paints the devotee, whose possession is now conspicuous, by the various contortions of his body, the rolling of his eyes, his wild grimaces, and convulsive agitations. We are fully assured, that in these enthusiastic transports, he handles and eats fire, without the least damage or inconvenience; but the most surprising circumstance of all this is, that the devil oftentimes transports the person thus possessed, to some solitary desert, where he is detained for three hours together, without any one knowing what is become of him. The magician and his relations, therefore, search diligently all over the country in hopes to find him, they conduct him home with abundance of formality; but find him so prodigiously fatigued with his possession, that he is scarce able to stir a limb.

It is reasonable to suppose, that by long retirement, and some particular potions which the devotee is obliged to take, his imagination is artfully wrought up to such enthusiastic raptures, and violent emotions, as induce the whole assembly to imagine, that the devil actuates and informs him: The quack sophistry of the magician, the solemn beat of the drum, and the excessive movements of the dance, finally complete the disorder of his distempered brain. And if it is true, that the consecration of those images is, for the generality, the result of a solemn vow, made in sickness, adversity, or old age, what can possibly contribute more to a perfect possession, and to make a finished madman of the poor visionary? But what shall we say with respect to the fire which the person so possessed eats without any manner of inconvenience? The answer is very obvious, that it is all artifice and legerdemain; but so well couched, as easily to impose upon the ignorant, unthinking negroes, in the same manner as our ancestors were formerly deluded by their ordeal trials.

During the time that the devil actually possesses the negro, he is asked to what solemn obligations he means to tie him, which, when he has publicly declared, a ring or bracelet is immediately put upon the negro's arm, and as often as he takes an oath, or makes any positive affirmation, his veracity must not be called in question, provided he swears by his bracelet.

The obligations, or religious duties of the negroes are innumerable. There is not one amongst them all that does not solemnly engage to abstain from some particular sorts of fruits, herbs, plants, &c. They lay themselves likewise under voluntary restrictions, both public and private, with respect to their wearing apparel: As for instance, the men are obliged to wear the skin of some particular beasts round their waists, which must hang down so low as to cover one half their thighs; and always to wear a cap, or something of the like nature upon their heads; or at least a head-band round their temples. On the other hand, the women go with their heads and hair always uncovered. The following custom is still more singular and remarkable: If any one sits upon a bed-side, in which there are two persons of different sexes, though legally married, he becomes polluted; and the master of the house must exhort such delinquent in a friendly and charitable manner, to go directly and purify himself. His clothes are accordingly laid before the fire, and the party who officiates as purificator, pursues the ceremony by hooking his little finger with that of the left hand of the party polluted: Thus united, both lift up their hands above their heads, and turn themselves round. After this, the purificator takes two implements made of iron, which he clashes one against the other three or four times successively, and then blows in the palm of his own hand, as well as that of the person whom he purifies. During these formal grimaces, and gesticulations, he utters a dozen mystic words, which completes the purification. A person who has any illegitimate issue is obliged to abstain from the breath of a buffalo, or wild ox; but is acquitted from that penance, and acquires a just title to his children, by being duly married. All these religious rites and ceremonies are confirmed and established, by an habitual dread of being severely punished by their Mokissos, who seldom or never fails to chastise such as neglect the observance of them.

Singing and dancing are two fundamental branches of the religious worship of the negroes; for it is at the celebration of those solemnities, the spirit actuates and possesses their Gangaas, and for the most part, those who dance with them. It would be tedious, if not impertinent, to describe all their follies and grimaces, which in many respects very nearly resemble the ecstasies and transports of the ancient soothsayers.

The sovereign pontiff, or supreme head of the hierarchy of Congo, is called Chitombe. He is revered after a very singular manner, and is looked upon as a deity, or at least as a being somewhat more than mortal. He is presented with the first fruits of all the products of the earth, and there are solemn supplications made to him for his spiritual benediction on their harvest; and accordingly he always blesses the seed and ground, before they presume to sow it. If he does not perform this ceremony himself, he does it at least by delegation of his vicars or assistants. This Chitombe also keeps up a sacred fire, at which some considerable quantity of brands are kindled, and afterwards distributed amongst the soviess or governors of the provinces, who receive them with all the testimonies of the most profound veneration and respect, and are incapable of exercising their public authority till they are possessed of them. The people are so far prejudiced in favour of this their Chitombe, or sovereign pontiff, and pay him such awful homage, that they will not acknowledge or obey their soviess unless they wait on his holiness for his heavenly benediction, and pay their obedience to this visible god, before they enter upon their respective posts.

This submission of their soviſes is as humble as can be imagined.

They attend the levy of their Chitombe, and there prostrate themselves before him; and the people who accompany them, prostrate themselves also at the same time, imploring his holiness to receive their governors under his patronage and protection. After this, the pontiff sprinkles water and dust upon these Soviſes, and extending them on their backs, walk over them backwards and forwards several times, treading upon their breasts, and making them swear in that humble posture, that they will always remain dependant on and be irrevocably subservient to his orders and decisions. If the Chitombe in the celebration of this ceremony should boast of his walking upon the Aspic, or treading the Basilisk under his foot, one should almost be tempted to believe that he had copied this haughty and imperious ceremony from the life of one of our popes. There are some, however, who in all probability will question the veracity of the missionary who has published this description, and the reflection which he immediately subjoins, gives good grounds for such suspicion. It must be allowed, to speak of him in the most favourable manner, that he was not conscious of the consequences that might be drawn from a reflection so foreign to the purpose.

But to proceed with our narrative. Should the Chitombe prove guilty of the most flagrant crime imaginable, no person whatever has any power to judge or correct him. It would be to no purpose there to appeal to a future council. When his duty requires him to visit his diocese, there must be a general preparation, by strict abstinence from all unlawful pleasures, to receive him. Such as are married, must even refrain from the conversation of their wives, whilst he is taking a review of his flock, and contribute by their exemplary temperance and chastity, towards the preservation of the spiritual pastor. Moreover, the negroes are of opinion, that should their pontiff die a natural death, it would prove of fatal consequence to the whole race of mankind: for which reason, when they think him past all hopes of recovery, his successor is empowered to strangle him, or dispatch him in such decent manner as he thinks most proper.

Their Negombo, though less revered and respected than their Chitombe, is, notwithstanding, extremely valued, and at the same time looked upon as both a priest and a prophet. He not only professes to foretell future events, but ascribes to himself an innate virtue or power of healing all manner of diseases. He is always sufficiently provided with a vast variety of medicines, the virtues whereof are so deeply impressed on the minds of the negroes, that the miscarriage of the magician, or his prescriptions, is always imputed to the patient. We need not, however, travel so far as Congo, to meet with instances of prejudice, and prepossession equally extravagant.

The priest, who assumes the title of Negosei, must always have eleven wives, each of whom is honoured with the denomination of some particular Mokisso. They burn straw in the presence of these idols, and their worshippers take peculiar care to hang their heads over the smoke; because it is a received opinion amongst them, that the more they suffer themselves to be blacked and besmeared therewith, the more they ingratiate themselves into the favour and affections of the idols. Such as meditate revenge on their enemies, make their applications to the Negosei, who cuts off some locks of their hair, and after he has bundled them up together, throws them into the fire. The magician in the mean while pronounces some formal imprecations against the enemy particularly mentioned, and against his whole family. The Nepindi styles himself the master of the elements, and pretends to overrule and controul the thunder, lightning, storms, and tempests. In order to render his power conspicuous, he erects large heaps of earth contiguous to his habitation, and after he has finished the usual sacrifices and magical operations, a little animal, say they, creeps out at the foot of one of them, which raises itself by slow degrees, and at last takes its flight towards the heavens. Then thick clouds darken the skies, and thunder, lightning, and rain, immediately ensue.

There is a sect of negroes at Congo, who celebrate their mysteries in particular dark and retired places, and are called by father Cavazzi the Nequiti. Every person that is inclined to become a member of this society, is obliged to walk to and fro so often on a rope, that at last he falls down by virtue of an enchantment, or rather the artifice of some member or in short, through the giddiness of his own head. But be that as it will, as soon as he has fallen down, he enters into an ecstatic fit, and is carried into their public assembly; when he comes to himself they oblige him to swear, that he will never abandon or forsake their fraternity. Such as violate this engagement, are sacrificed to their titular gods.

The priest, or Gauga, who is likewise styled Mutinu, and assumes the title of King of the waters, makes the negroes believe, that he extracts from thence infallible remedies, and antidotes against the most malignant distempers. He causes all such as are afflicted with any maladies, to assemble themselves together on the banks of a river, into which he throws an empty pitcher, muttering at the same time, a number of mystic words. The next moment he draws it out full of water, wherein the pretended remedies, which he distributes amongst the spectators then present, are all included. But to what purpose should we expatiate any further on the magical operations of these negro priests, since the account we have already given, will furnish the reader with an adequate idea of their power, which, in reality consists in nothing else but the tricks and artifices of empirics and impostors.

The province of Sondi has a Chitombe peculiar to itself, and he resides on the summit of a mountain. He wears his hair very long, embellished with divers trinkets, which are the objects of these negroes veneration. They pay him such a profound respect, that they never presume to speak to him without prostrating themselves before him with their faces to the ground. It is accounted an act of the highest presumption to look this venerable pontiff in the face, unless by a peculiar condescension he gives them that freedom. When he appears in public, every one bows down before him with devotion, and when he goes abroad, a wooden idol is carried before him on a kind of litter.

The Gangas have their respective posts or offices assigned them; and Amobundu is the guardian of their corn, through the aid and assistance of a Mokisso, or Fetiche made of clay, and feathers, which he buries in the middle of such fields as are under his protection. Amoloco restores such to their former state of health, who had lost it by virtue of any magical incantations; for it is a received opinion amongst the natives of Congo, that no person is either sick or dies, but by virtue of some magic charms, or fascinations. We shall in the sequel of this dissertation, treat more amply of the fatal consequences that attend this notion; for Molongo foretells their good or ill success in all distempers. Nconi and Nezali have the influence or power of healing the sick, Negodi cures the deaf, Nesambi cleanses the lepers, Embingula charms the slaves, and makes them attend him by blowing a whistle; and lastly, the Gauga-Metambola, if we may depend on the veracity of Cavazzi, raises the dead by his magical incantations. The idolators of Angola pay an equal regard and veneration to their Gangas; for they imagine that their life, health, fortune, and the preservation of all their effects, are dependent on them; and they have an order of magicians, called Chibados, who always dress themselves in woman's apparel.

In our dissertations on the religious customs of Guinea, we gave a description of their trial or experiment of the Quoni, and that which is generally made use of at Congo by the Imbondo, or Bonde, is of the same kind. The prisoner is obliged to drink a stated quantity of the juice of this root; and if he be able to make water freely after he has taken the draught, he is cleared and declared to be innocent; but if he has the strangury, and falls down after it, it is looked upon as an incontestible evidence that he is guilty, and as such, he is instantly condemned to die, without the least hopes of pardon or reprieve. This public experiment is made before the king, or the Moni-Boma, who acts as judge in these criminal causes. There is a fee or duty to be first paid to his majesty; after which the judges, the prosecutors, and their relations meet together in some large square, or public high-road, where the prisoner, with all his friends and relations also attend. The latter are all seated by one another; for if the party charged and suspected, undergoes the experiment with success, his relations, friends, and acquaintance, must submit to it in their turns, till the Imbondo has made a discovery of the prented malefactor.

Another author adds, that as soon as the prisoner has drank this Imbondo, the judge rises and throws a small rod or wand at his head; at the same time making use of the following form of words, which doubtless amount to an imprecation: "If thou art guilty fall down; if innocent, stand up, and make water." After this, he cuts the Imbondo, into several small pieces, and throws them on the ground. All such as are suspected, are obliged to walk on these bits of the Imbondo, and such as have the misfortune to fall in the experiment, are looked upon as absolutely convicted. Notwithstanding the many frauds and abuses that are committed on these occasions, the negroes lay a prodigious stress on the practice and observance of these experiments. Nay, though they have been sufficiently convinced of the deceit and folly of these trials, it is with them, as with many others, the imposture, even after it is detected, is still carried on with success.

A king of Macoco, being very desirous to discover whether such experiments were really effectual, and might be depended on or not, pretended one day that some rogue or other had stole from him a considerable quantity of fine shells, which are the current money of the country. Two of his domestics were strongly suspected, and immediately taken into custody, who underwent with courage and resolution a very strict examination. The king, who resolved with seeming resentment, that he would try to discover the truth, if possible, ordered that they should undergo the customary trials, and charged the priest who was to preside over this affair, to use his utmost endeavours to do him justice, and find out the malefactor. The dose was accordingly prepared, but made so strong, that it had the same effect on the innocent, as it would have, as they pretend, on the guilty only. The persons prosecuted, were immediately condemned, and hurried away in order to be punished according to their demerits; but the king, who was then present, starting up, discovered ingeniously the stratagem he made use of before the whole company, and ordered the judge to be instantly executed, in the room of his innocent domestics.

The negroes of Congo are very strict in the observance of their oaths; but if, however, they should accidentally at any time break them in the heat of their passion, it is customary for them to make a kind of confession to one of their Ganga's, and ask his absolution. If the oath has been thus rashly violated but once, a single confession is sufficient; but if the crime has been aggravated by a frequent repetition, the delinquent must humble himself several ways before he can procure his full and free remission. The Ganga reduces some particular roots to powder, which he encloses in a phial, and thereupon pronounces several imprecations against the person who is perjured. After this, he orders the penitent to prostrate himself on the ground, and from the bottom of his heart to renounce and detest his sins; which done, he raises him up, and presents him with a glass of water. This salutary potion being drank with a contrite heart, the sinner returns home perfectly pardoned and absolved; having first made the Ganga some grateful acknowledgement for his spiritual consolation. Sometimes this Ganga anoints the tongue of the person perjured with the oil of dates, and accompanies the unction with sundry imprecations.

We shall close this article with the ceremony which these people practise before they enter on any warlike expedition. Curious, and fond of knowing the consequences of the approaching engagement, they put a vessel full of water, and several other ingredients, upon the fire, which must all be first consecrated and duly prepared by a Ganga. As soon as the pot begins to boil, they enter upon their magical incantations, which, as they imagine, irresistibly attract the titular genius of their enemies, and oblige him to plunge himself into it. In this painful situation they confine him for some considerable time; but when he has done sufficient penance, as they conceive, and that the torments he has endured must indisputably have humbled him, ask him several questions relating to the success of the ensuing war. Whether he gives them any express answer or not, we are not informed; they always conjecture, however, that they shall either conquer or be conquered, from the peculiar fermentation of these magical ingredients, and in all probability the genius never gives them any other satisfaction or reply.— Sometimes, also, we are informed, they set an empty pot upon the fire, and when it is red hot, turn the bottom upwards, and hovering over it, receive the heat, which, they imagine, inspires them with an invincible courage. A prepossession of this nature may often, in all probability, meet with the desired success, and numberless instances of the like nature might be produced from the history of all ages; but it would be impertinent, and foreign to the purpose, to quote them in this work.

Notwithstanding the Portuguese have introduced Christianity amongst the natives of Congo, yet they have not been able to abolish and extirpate the practice of polygamy. The negroes, as well Christians as idolaters, have not only several wives that are free-women, but a number of concubines also, that are slaves. The former live in a separate apartment from their husbands, but the principal, or governante, has the superintendance of the whole family, and is allowed a deputy to aid and assist her.

When one of these wives proves false and inconstant, or is barely suspected, her husband discards her, without the least disgrace to any party; nay, the woman herself quickly finds out another partner with abundance of ease; and as to their concubines, who are their slaves, they buy them, for the generality, when they are very young: Sometimes they bargain for them whilst the mother is with child, who, in case she be brought to bed of a boy, is obliged to procure the purchaser a girl in his stead. In short, they marry by way of trial, according to the custom of several people on the coast of Guinea. This is the purport of what we judged most material and worthy of observance in our author before quoted, but we are farther assured, that they are so courteous to any friend and acquaintance, or any stranger, that accidentally pays them a visit, that one of their wives is always devoted to his service.

We shall now proceed to a more particular detail of their customs: As soon as their daughters attain the age of maturity, their heads are shaved all over except on the foretop, on which is purposely reserved a little tuft, like a crown. After that, their admirers begin to view them with transport, and are very importunate in their addresses to them. If a young virgin violates her chastity before she is conscious of her natural purgations, both she and her gallant are obliged to undergo a trial, something like what the French call the Congres, in the presence of the king and all his court. A wife there is under an extravagant subjection to her husband, and if we may rely on the veracity of some authors, those who have the most liberty in Lovango, or Congo, are much more passive and subservient than any of our meanest domestics. Nay, the king's consorts themselves in this country are perfect slaves, and obliged, however whimsical it may appear to work for their daily subsistence. These wives are locked up, and live like nuns, till his majesty is graciously pleased to make choice of one of them to be the partner of his bed; but notwithstanding this plurality of wives, neither the king nor his subjects, are strangers to the torments of jealousy. When the latter are apprehensive of their wives inconstancy and ill conduct, they immediately put them away; but the former are more severe in their resentments, and death is the sure consequence of infidelity. Nay, they carry their groundless jealousies to such an extravagant pitch, that whenever any of their wives prove with child, they are constantly obliged to drink of the Imbondo, in order to give a public demonstration of their virtue, and unspotted honour. If they should have the misfortune, as abundance of innocent persons have, to be deemed guilty by such trial, there are no hopes of mercy for them; they are ordered to be burnt, and their imaginary gallants to be buried alive, without reprieve. Such is the cruel fate of the concubines of these sovereigns! But the lady whom they call the macuuda, enjoys a special privilege at Lovango; for she is one of the most ancient matrons of his late majesty's seraglio, who is elected regent of the kingdom, or, more properly speaking, the superintendant of the actions of the prince upon the throne. This macuuda, who is styled the mother of the king, may have as many admirers as she pleases, and grant them the last favours, if she thinks convenient. Moreover, she sits as president in their councils, is guardian to the prince, and has an unlimited power and authority to pardon any malefactor, though he be ever so notorious.

The king's own mother, his sisters, and all the negro ladies of the loyal family, have the same privilege. So far are they from punishing them in cases of incontinency, and breach of their conjugal engagements, that they severely correct their husbands, in case they prefer other mistresses; it is no small misfortune, in short, for a man in that country to be married to one of the royal family.

The king of Congo's principal consort is styled Mani-Mombanda; that is, sovereign of the wives, for whose service there is a public assessment made, which is very singular and remarkable. On her wedding night, every bed throughout the kingdom is surveyed by proper officers, and rated in proportion to their respective dimensions. This queen lives in an apartment of the royal palace, with her maids of honour, who have free liberty to spend their nights abroad with his majesty, or such other of the court as they think proper; this indulgence is owing to the coquetry of their royal mistress, who studies all the ways she can to oblige them.

As the profession of Christianity at Congo appears to be superficial and insignificant, we shall pass it over, and proceed, for the amusement of our readers, in the description of their nuptial solemnities. It must be acknowledged, indeed, when they enter into the state of matrimony, they observe the form prescribed by the Catholic church; but from what we have already related, and what we have still farther to offer on that topic, it is demonstrable, that they pay very little, if any, regard to her laws and institutions. As for instance, in case there be three brothers, all of the same family, and one of them happens to die, the other two divide his concubines between them, share and share alike. Again, in case one of those two should depart this life, the survivor claims them all as his right and property.— And after his decease, the next heir, though it should be a son, we are informed, comes into the peaceable possession of the whole stock.

The women of Lovango are as subservient to the men as our cattle are to us; and all of them in general, in the month of January, are obliged to make their personal appearance at the king's palace, in order to be employed in the sowing and manuring of his lands. The men likewise give their attendance along with them; and each of them is provided with proper arms for his service: not with intent, however, to work themselves, but to chastise such women as are indolent and remiss in their duty, and in short, to be their superintendants and directors. As for the rest, they spend their time in such amusements as they think most proper. This Lovango is situate in one of those unhappy climates, where the men are perfect strangers to that complaisance, that tenderness and indulgence which we naturally have for the soft sex. It must be acknowledged, indeed, that the women have sufficient grounds for complaint, on account of their ungenerous treatment; and yet, in all probability, they think themselves happy, and never murmur or repine at their abject condition.

Dapper assures us, that when the young maidens of Congo begin to be tired of that heavy incumbrance their virginity, they withdraw into a particular solitary place, dressed to the best advantage, according to the custom of their country; that is to say, their skins plentifully anointed with fat, and beautifully varnished, and their cheeks, and such other parts as are for the generality exposed to view, besmeared with red paint. In this gloomy apartment they reside for about three weeks, or a month, and there is no doubt, though our author is silent, and leaves us to our own conjectures, they very seldom, if ever, return without finding some good natured person or another, who is ready to take their burden off their hands. But be that as it will, they there make choice of such young active sparks as endeavour most effectually to ingratiate themselves into their favour by such particular services, and such soft endearments, as are usual before marriage; and in this particular the blacks agree with the generality of mankind.

A wife, after she is brought to bed at Angola, has no conversation with her husband till the infant begins to cut his teeth; and there is another custom in vogue there, which is universal, indeed, throughout all the barbarous nations, and at this day practised among the Jews, and that is, the husband and wife live apart during the periodical fluxions. Moreover, the wife must not presume to touch any one thing the husband eats, and neither lies in his house, nor approaches his bed; not to mention the marks and signatures whereby she is obliged to distinguish herself from those that are in a perfect state of health and free from pollution. Amongst other characteristics, or tokens, she wears a string about her head during the whole time of her purgations.

Circumcision is universally practised, where the Christian religion has not prevailed; and at Angola, as soon as ever they discern that the infant has cut his first tooth, they dress it up as gaily as possibly they can. Its friends and relations dandle it about from house to house, to collect all the presents they can possibly procure for it. In those countries which are still idolatrous, as soon as an infant is brought into the world, a priest is instantly sent for, who lays it under some particular solemn obligations; which, in all probability, ought to be looked upon as preservatives against the numberless casualties to which the life of man is daily exposed; or some religious vows and duties, by the observance whereof, the people imagine they ingratiate themselves into the favour and affection of their deities. The priest takes particular care to confirm and establish this notion, which is so naturally imbibed by the generality of mankind, and so beneficial and advantageous to all the sacerdotal profession in general. He mutters accordingly some certain mystic terms, as prescribed in their rubric, and afterwards imposes such obligations upon the child as he thinks most convenient; and what he determines is listened to, and regarded as the voice of an oracle.

We shall now proceed to their funeral solemnities; for all the prejudices and prepossessions espoused by these people, there are none of more fatal consequence, than the notion so generally received, that there is no such thing as a natural death, and that the decease of all persons whomsoever, is the pure result of the charms and fascinations of their enemies. The magicians, in their opinion, raise the deceased, transport him to some solitary desert, and there make him work like a slave.—They take peculiar care to feed them with fresh meat only; for should the dead man taste the least grain of salt, he would grow outrageous, and pursue the murderer with the utmost rigour; and by virtue only of this groundless and foolish persuasion, the death of one man is generally accompanied with the untimely fall of many that are innocent. The natives of Lovango begin their inquiries relating to their dead, with spells and incantations, which consist principally in leaning hard upon a knife, in the presence of one of their Gargas, and in rubbing their hands together with all their might; and during these operations they enter upon their interrogatories. Such a person, say they, is dead and buried; was he bewitched? or did his Mokisso take away his life? If upon this query, the person that makes the experiment has not power to command his hands, it is accounted an incontestible proof that his friend's death was the result of some malicious enchantment; and from this interrogatory they run on to another, and the enquiry always concludes with the trial by the Imboudo.

These natives of Lovango are very much divided in their opinions, with relation to the state of the human soul after its departure from the body. Such as are of the royal family maintain a kind of metempsychosis, and imagine that the souls of those who depart this life enter into the bodies of their children; others believe them mortal; but the greatest part of them think they become titular gods; in the firm belief whereof they erect little chapels, contiguous or adjacent to the places where they died; thither they resort to pray to them, and make an oblation, before they sit down to their meals, both of what they are to eat, and what they are to drink. Chicocke, of whom we have already made mention, is the guardian of their dead; and his statue, composed of wood, is erected at some small distance from their burying-ground. He takes effectual care that no magician clandestinely removes the deceased, or insults them, or compels them to work, hunt, or fish. Who knows but this guardian god has deserved the great confidence which the negroes repose in him, by as natural an effect, as that with which Horace reproaches his fig-tree Prapus? Perhaps it were not impossible, if due enquiry was made, to find miracles of this nature in some parts of Europe.

These people bury their dead with all their clothes on; and the poorer sort apply themselves to such as are men of substance to assist them in defraying the necessary expences of their funerals. At the decease of the king of Congo, all persons are strictly enjoined not to mourn for his death, notwithstanding the melancholy news is solemnly proclaimed by the sound of a kind of cornet, throughout the whole kingdom. As to the rest, the pompous funeral of a prince is solemnized after the manner of the Roman Catholics; but such as never were proselytes to Christianity, or are only such in outward appearance, strictly follow the rites and ceremonies of their ancestors. They inter with their dead, a considerable part of their effects, several valuable presents, and various sorts of goods; and as this custom has been universally observed by all idolatrous nations, both ancient and modern, it would be needless, if not impertinent, to produce instances to confirm the truth of it. At the decease of a grandee, his favorites, clients, and slaves, carry their extravagance infinitely beyond what is practised in common, and besides the costly presents and foreign commodities which are buried with him, they furnish him with domestics to attend his royal person, and with several young ladies for his amusement in his journey to the other world, who either through compulsion, or the prepossession and artifice of their priests, are strenuous rivals, and contest the honour of being buried alive with their deceased monarch.

There are several religious customs likewise observed at Lovango, that are equally remarkable.— Their funeral solemnities are always accompanied with floods of tears, and incessant wailings; and as soon as they have carried the corpse out of the house, they dance all round about it, and during that solemn ceremony, weep most bitterly, and fill the air with most hideous lamentations. At proper intervals they very demurely ask the deceased a thousand impertinent questions; such as, whether he decamped, or removed his quarters, for want of the conveniences of life, and the like. And though the deceased never obliges them with an answer, they always ascribe his decease to some dissatisfaction of one kind or another. This funeral concert, and these melancholy interrogatories, continue for some hours; after which, they collect every individual thing the deceased is to carry along with him, and when his bag and baggage are all packed up and ready, they remove the corpse and his effects with as much precipitation as if they had stole them.— One moiety, or half part of his aforesaid effects, is allotted to be buried with him; the other is hung up and exposed to public view on poles planted round his sepulchre; but to prevent any clandestine conveyance of them away by necessitous pilferers, they either cut into rags, or tear to pieces, such goods as are thus exposed. In the evening they renew their weepings and wailings, and continue these outward demonstrations of sorrow and concern every evening for six weeks together, without intermission.

Their degree of mourning varies in proportion to the quality of the person deceased; and when a grandee dies, their lamentations are more vociferous and noisy than ordinary, and their attendance to the grave more solemn and numerous; for the people assemble themselves together from all the adjacent towns on such a public occasion. The magicians exert their skill to the utmost, and leave no charm nor enchantment whatever unpractised, in order to restore a sick grandee to his former state of health; not but the people too use their utmost endeavours likewise to prolong his days, but there as well as here, it is grandeur that is the principal attraction, and it is out of a self-interested view of being well rewarded for their pains, that they are thus diligent and attentive. There is no question, therefore, to be made, but that such as are well versed in magical operations, are lavish of their most secret and valuable preparations, when the lives of such men as are thus honoured and esteemed are in apparent danger.

They hover round the corpse, which is either extended on a couch, or supported in a sitting posture, by one of the company, and sometimes, indeed, he is raised by proper supporters, artfully disposed under each arm. In one of these situations, his head is shaved, his nails are pared, and his body washed, anointed, and painted red; and his nearest kindred, that is, his male relations, seat themselves at a small distance from the corpse; for the women, who have their tears always at command, and are by nature qualified to excite the passions, are employed, by their violent transports and agitations, to affect the whole assembly. They dance, or rather fly about, like persons distracted, from right to left, in the utmost confusion; but in their intervals they sing encomiums on the deceased, recite all his virtuous actions, and trace his genealogy; and this, in short, is his funeral harangue. To conclude, they bury some part of his patrimony along with him, and all the valuable effects which his relations and friends have collected together for his more commodious settlement in the other world. The usual place appropriated for the burial of their blacks is generally called the Kiengha; where on each respective grave are arranged, in decent order, the bow and arrows of the deceased, his wooden platter, his cup, or rather calabash, for the convenience of his drinking, when he thinks proper, and a sufficient quantity of pipes and tobacco for his smoking, &c.

The same solemnities are observed for their kings, but with much greater pomp and magnificence; for they embellish the body of the deceased with the usual regalia, according to the dignity of these black princes. He is seated in a chair of state, erected in a vault, reserved for the peculiar reception of such illustrious personages, with the representations, in wood or clay, of such as were his favourites when alive. Before him are ranged a sufficient quantity of kitchen furniture, or utensils, which were made use of at his majesty's table; such as cloths, napkins, &c. A considerable number of slaves are sacrificed, or rather murdered, for his peculiar service, who are buried near him, or in some separate vault, in order to revive with, and wait on his majesty in his journey to the other world; for they entertain some idea, though a very confused and imperfect one, of the resurrection of the dead. It was customary, in former times, to buy twelve beautiful virgins alive with the king of Congo, and these young ladies were all so loyal as to offer up their lives a willing sacrifice to the service of their mo-monarch. With warmth and zeal they disputed their title of precedence, and each one was fond of stepping foremost, and intercepting her competitors.— They dressed themselves as gaily as was possible on these tragical and solemn occasions, and their relations supplied them handsomely with all sorts of furniture, and all the conveniences of life, which they thought proper for their accommodation in the other world. This custom, however, we are informed, is at present abolished, as repugnant to the principles of natural religion; and one branch of their funeral solemnities is reduced to an elegant entertainment only, which is renewed for eight days together, on the monument or sepulchre of the deceased monarch. Whilst they are partaking of this regal banquet, they have their intervals, in which they indulge themselves in all the demonstrations of the deepest sorrow and concern, which, in our opinion, may justly pass under the denomination of a religious custom.

There is but very little difference between the funeral solemnities observed at Angola, and those of Lovango and Congo; for they wash their dead, comb them, shave them, wrap them up in a kind of shroud, and afterwards lay them on a small earthen bier. The deceased is always dressed after the most elegant manner they can possibly devise, and several beasts at the same time are sacrificed, and their blood spilt in honour of their departed friend. In the kingdom of Matamba, the corpse is covered over with rosin; and thus embalmed, or more properly speaking, besmeared all over, deposited in a deep grave, and guarded by slaves till perfectly reduced to dust and ashes. This precaution is taken, as we are informed, against the natives themselves, who are inclined to plunder these graves, and mangle the bodies of their dead countrymen, in order to carry away their limbs clandestinely, and hoard them up as sacred relics, which are more or less valuable according to the reputation of the deceased.

The relations and slaves, when they go into mourning, shave their heads and besmear their faces with oil, and divers kinds of powder, which serve instead of glue, to fasten the various feathers which at such times they stick about them. To hear their hideous outcries and lamentations, one would imagine that sorrow and affliction had deprived them of their senses; but if we may rely on the veracity of our author from whence we extract this account, they do not so much as shed one single tear. We shall close this topic with an agreeable story enough, relating to the widows of Congo. They entertain the notion, that the souls of their departed husbands reanimate their bodies, unless due care be taken to keep them at an awful distance; and such a re-animation would be an absolute bar to any new alliance. To prevent, therefore, so direful a disaster, they make their applications to one of their priests, who plunge themselves several times in some rapid streams; after which, as they lie under no fearful apprehensions of their return, they boldly venture on their second baptisms.

It is surprising how such notions should ever enter into the human heart, or that those who are endowed with rational faculties should stoop lower in their actions than even the animal creation. All is owing to ignorance, and well might the prophet say, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." The fundamental principles upon which the civilization of mankind is built, consists in knowledge, and upon this foundation a superstructure of politeness, humanity, benevolence, and piety, is formed. To all this we may add, that an attention to these things makes way for the reception of the gospel; for although the promulgation of the gospel does not depend on human means, yet God has commanded those to be used, and therefore men are not to slight them, but use them in a proper manner.

Religion of the Guaguans,

These people inhabit the kingdom of Matamba, and we are assured both by Purchas, an Englishman, and Father Cavazzi, an Italian, that they not only eat the flesh of their enemies, but even carry it about to sell as we do butchers' meat. However horrid and unnatural this may appear to some, who have not had an opportunity of visiting foreign countries, yet we can see no reason to doubt the truth of it. Some of the American savages eat their prisoners, and it is but a few years since some Englishmen were killed, and eaten in an island in the South Seas. But to proceed with our narrative:

The chief god of these people is called Quisango, and represented under the form of a giant twelve feet high. This idol is shut up and circumscribed within an inclosure made of elephants' teeth; each being embellished with the scalp of some slave, or captive, that has been sacrificed in honour of this blood-thirsty deity. But there are oblations made him besides these, such as libations of palm wine, with the blood of goats, deer, and other animals.

The person who is at the head of this system of false religion, acts both as high priest and as general of their forces. His hair, which is exceeding long, is adorned with some particular shells, by them called Bamba, which they have a peculiar veneration and respect for, and round his neck he wears a collar composed of other curious shells, but not of such value as the former. At his girdle hangs a chaplet, the beads whereof consists of the eggs of the ostrich. Such an extraordinary chaplet as this is, perhaps, cannot be found in any other part of the world; for many of the beads are as large as the crown of a hat. The priest wears a small vestment round his waist, falling down low enough to cover what modesty requires to be concealed. As for his body, it is embellished with a variety of figures delineated after an inelegant and artless manner. In other respects, their chieftain is besmeared all over with red and white paint, composed partly of the blood of dead men, mixed with the fat. A piece of brass, about an inch in length hangs down from his nose; and two others from his ears. He has commonly about twenty or thirty wives, one of whom carries his bow and arrows, another waits on him when he is disposed to drink, and presents him with his cup which they call calabass. When he takes it, they all fall on their knees, clap their hands, and sing till he has finished his draught.—Some of the wild inhabitants of Florida, observe the same customs at this very day.

Before the sovereign of Guagua enters upon any military expedition, he offers up a solemn sacrifice to his idol, before the sun rises, at the celebration whereof, two magicians attend; one at his right hand, and the other at his left, about forty women of distinction round about him, each of them having a wild horse's tail in both hands. Thus equipped, they sing a solemn service, accompanied with playing on different instruments, according to the manner of their country. In the midst of the congregation, or assembly, there is a large fire, with an earthen vessel hung over it, in which is contained a certain composition, wherewith they paint their temples, foreheads, breasts, and bellies, at the same time observing sundry ceremonies, charms, and incantations, which continue till the sun is set. After this the magicians present the general with the cafengola, which is a kind of hatchet, and at the delivery of it they exhort him to be resolute and courageous.—Accordingly he gives them what he thinks an uncontested proof of his valour, by raising up his hatchet, and hacking down a youth presented before him for that purpose. Having laid the youth breathless on the ground, four slaves likewise meet with the same untimely fate; two of whom are massacred on the spot, and the other two are put to death by his assistants. This human sacrifice is attended with the sacrifice of ten cows, ten goats, and ten dogs. The blood of these victims is poured forth in honour of their idol, but the flesh is reserved for the repast of the assembly, which solemn feast is concluded with loud acclamations and other testimonies of public joy.

When his troops are assembled together, he delivers a very pathetic harangue, and then orders them to march. These declarations, delivered in order to animate the soldiers, are spoken in an elevation of voice, with such energy, grace, and dignity, as may stand in competition with those orations we meet with in the accounts of the ancient Grecian worthies. The captains follow the example of their intrepid generals, and thus these barbarians inspire the private soldiers with a savage brutal ferocity. If any private soldier discovers the least marks of cowardice, or inclination to desert and run away in the heat of an engagement, he is instantly cut in pieces, and eaten up by his companions. All such as are taken prisoners of war, are eaten either sooner or later. Those who are lean are reserved to be fattened, as we do with our cattle, but sometimes they content themselves with selling them as slaves. However, they neither kill nor eat their captives till they are at years of maturity, but are particularly indulgent to such male prisoners as are very young; for they naturalize them and train them up in the practice of their own inhuman and barbarous customs.

They put a collar round their necks, as a badge of their captivity and never take it off till they have produced before the general, the head of one of their enemies. Then they are made free, and honoured with the title of Gongo, which signifies a soldier, or warrior. They try the courage of their young captives, by shooting an arrow directly over their heads, and he that starts, or discovers the least signs of fear, is killed immediately and eaten. They are not to be naturalized without the strongest, and most signal proofs of their courage, and even then with initiation; for those who refuse to comply with it are treated with the utmost abhorrence. This ceremony consists in drawing out four of their foreteeth, two from the upper jaw, and two from the under; they likewise bore their ears and noses, making very wide holes in them. And here it may not be improper to relate something concerning an Amazonian princess who once reigned among them. The history of the ancient Amazons is well known. They inhabited some part of that extensive country, anciently called Scythia, but now Tartary. One of their queens waited on Alexander the Great, and we are told that heros was very intimate with her, perhaps she granted him every favour.

This African princess, whom we shall now give an account of prohibited the education of any male child within the limits of the kingdom, but strictly enjoined all parents to murder them, or expose them to the wild beasts as soon as they were born. She ordered all such children as had been preserved to be disinherited, and branded with a particular mark. She permitted the women to marry with their prisoners of war, to whom in consequence of that alliance, she granted all the privileges of the state, and this was done in order to preserve the breed of females. She charged all women who were with child, on pain of death, to avoid being delivered within the bounds of her kingdom, lest they should pollute the ground. If in disobedience and contempt of her commands, any male child should be accidentally preserved alive, she strictly forbade the reception of him into her kingdom, unless two of his first teeth were first drawn; but when it happened that the upper fore teeth came down over the others, then he was instantly put to death.

She constituted and appointed proper judges, with other inferior officers, to see that these her laws were duly respected and executed; to put to death such women as should happen to conceal any children, and to oblige every young person to learn the rites and ceremonies of their religion. That these laws might receive the greater sanction, it was necessary to persuade the people to believe that they were the statutes and ordinances of their ancestors; that by the observance of them they would become a terror to their enemies; that their power and authority ought to be confined and established by such examples as might demonstrate a solemn renunciation of that fondness and affections so natural to parents, and which is visible among savage beasts.

Here we may observe what power can do when united with that false fear of the deity called superstition. They imagined upon the implicit faith of their sovereign, that they should so far ingratiate themselves in the favour of their idol, as to obtain the privilege of being invulnerable, if they had the courage to murder their children, and besmear themselves with their blood. The princess herself was the first promoter of this unheard of barbarity, for she murdered her own son, and had his body beaten into a powder, with which she rubbed her body all over, to set an example to the wretched deluded people. How long this monster of barbarity reigned, does not appear, but probably not long, for barbarous and savage as the people were, yet it cannot be supposed they would suffer these things any great length of time. But we should add a remark here concerning the ancient Canaanites, whom Joshua destroyed. The deists have objected that Joshua had no right to invade their country and destroy them. It is in vain for us to tell them, that Joshua was commauded by the Almighty to extirpate them, for that they do not regard; we must answer them on other principles. These Canaanites had been guilty of the most horrid unnatural crimes, similar to those we have been treating of; and therefore it was but justice that such wretches should be extirpated from the earth. Supposing an army of European Christians were to see such unnatural barbarities committed, as those we have just mentioned, would not every man present think it is duty to punish the cruel perpetrators of them? Certainly he would, and human nature knows no punishment for murder, but that of taking away the life of the murderer. But to return to the subject:

As for the nuptial ceremonies of these people, they have nothing very remarkable in them, being so cruel and ignorant, many of them herd together like beasts, without any regard to age, sex, or decency; some of them, particularly the Jages, who inhabit the province of Ansiko, never bury their dead, but either eat them or bury them alive. They wash their bodies clean when they intend to bury them, and carry them to the grave in a sitting posture, and their wives, if they have any, are buried along with them. The ceremony concludes with cries and dreadful lamentations, which last several days.

We have already, in the course of this work, had occasion to lament, that so many of our fellow-creatures are ignorant of the knowledge of Christ, but what shall we say of those Africans, who are worse than the wild beasts of the field? Does it not serve to shew, that mankind are not what their ancestor was when he came from the hands of his maker: nay it appears from what is related here, that he is capable of any thing, let it be ever so absurd, ridiculous, cruel, barbarous, or unnatural, which clearly proves our nature to be corrupted. Unless those things are granted we shall never be able to account for the practices of many of our fellow-creatures, who, even in whole national bodies, commit, or rather live in, and establish, crimes shocking to be mentioned. Hence we may conclude, that although there are many things of great value to be met with in the writings of the Greeks and Romans, yet we find they were most shockingly corrupted in their morals, when the gospel was first preached among them. From this it appears plain, that nothing but the gospel can cure our spiritual infirmities. We shall conclude the present article with the following passage from a sermon of the late Dr. Coneybear, bishop of Bristol:

“It hath been related alrady, (says his lordship) that sin was brought into the world by our first parents, from whence there is derived down to us, a depraved and corrupted nature. Hence both our intellectual and moral powers, have been greatly impaired, and as, in many instances, we know not what we ought to do; in others, when ignorance may not be pleaded, there is a remarkable backwardness, and even perverseness of the will. These evils must be remedied in some degree, otherwise no advantage can be made of the pardon which God, for Christ's sake, offers. For it is unreasonable to expect this should extend to any but those who embrace it by a religious return to God.” Sermon I. vol. 1. page 22.

Mr. Kolbens, a Dutch gentleman, who resided some years at the Cape of Good Hope, and visited many of the African kingdoms, is of opinion, that there is a manifest conformity between the Cafres and the Jews. In order to support his argument, he enumerates several customs practised alike by both. The Cafres make abundance of oblations, and regulate the time of their festivals by the full and new moons. They have no conversation with their wives during particular seasons, and always use purification. They frequently make use of unleavened bread, and abstain from all sorts of salt meat.— They practise the ceremony of circumcision, or something similar to it, and they eat nothing that is strangled, nor any fish without scales. They never admit women into their councils, and are allowed to give their wives a bill of divorce, even on the slightest pretence.

He observes several other rites and ceremonies similar to those of the Jews, such as giving the names of animals, hills, mountains, rivers, trees, fruits, herbs, and, indeed every thing in nature, to their children, instead of the names of their parents or relations. But all these arguments made use of by this Dutchman to establish his favourite system, have no weight at all, as will appear when we consider the following things. Their using unleavened bread has no conformity to any custom practised by the Jews, because these Africans never knew how to make bread till they were taught to do so by the Europeans. With respect to their divorcing their wives, it will appear to the reader, from several of the former parts of this work, that many other heathens do the same, and circumcision is common in almost one half of the known world.

But he imputes to them in common with other authors, that they starve their relations to death when they are past their labour, which is contrary to every thing in the law of Moses. He says they are expert at the chase, but in that he should have compared them with the Hottentots, rather than the Jews. We agree with this author, that there is no improbability that these idolatrous Africans were descended from the Phœnicians, who went from the south of Asia, in ancient times, and carried along with them their own rites and ceremonies. However, be these things as they will, we shall now proceed to give an account of the principles and ceremonies of their religion.

They have some faint notion of the universal deluge, for they have a tradition transmitted down from father to son, informing them, that their ancestors, issuing out of a door or window, established themselves on this spot of the earth, which they now inhabit, and instructed their children in the art of agriculture. They also add, that their parents' names were Noh and Hingnou, and both these may relate to Noah and his wife, for his wife's name is not mentioned in scripture. All our travellers are very contradictory in their accounts of the religion of these people, because they are divided into clans, tribes, and hordes, and all these have different notions. However, from all these accounts we see no difficulty of collecting the truth, because several reputable writers have inquired into them, and we cannot see any reason to doubt their veracity, especially as these accounts have been approved of by the Royal Society.

They adore one Supreme Being, though their notions concerning him are very dark and confused.— They kill several cows and sheep in honour of their idol, and make voluntary oblations of their flesh and milk, as grateful acknowledgements of all his mercies from time to time; for they imagine that he alone sends them rain, sun-shine, and all the returns of the seasons. They seem to have little or no idea of a future state, and yet they have many good qualities, which should secure them from the contempt usually thrown out upon them. They are, in many respects, honest and charitable to one another. They look upon theft and idolatry as capital crimes; and such as are found guilty of them, are immediately put to death.

But notwithstanding this, every man has free liberty to marry as many women as he can maintain, although few of them indulge themselves with any more than three. A German missionary and a Protestant, asked one of these Cafres concerning his belief of the Deity, and received the following sensible answer:—"Let him that cannot believe there is a God, survey the heavens, the earth, and every object round about him, and then let him deny the existence of a Supreme Being, if he can." We have some reason to believe, that the zealous missionary dressed up the Cafre's words, and therefore it is best to consider them in the middle latitude, especially as the Jesuits have represented them as downright Atheists.

It is certain, that the Dutch have the best opportunities of being acquainted with these Cafres, or Hottentots, because no other Europeans have any settlement at the Cape of Good Hope. For many miles up the country, the Dutch have Protestant churches established, and as their ministers are men of sense and gravity, we ought at least to pay some regard to the accounts they have given us.

Kolben says, that they call the invisible God Gounia Ticouoa, a term that means the captain of the gods. They are far from being uniform in their religious rites and ceremonies, on account of their being divided into so many clans, or hordes, which they call cralles. The truth is, there is no constancy in any of the notions entertained by the barbarians throughout the whole world. All is ignorance and confusion, and we seek in vain for a guide to direct us; which circumstance alone should more and more endear to us Divine Revelation. The Cafres, or Hottentots, who reside all round the Cape, pay their adoration to the moon, by dancing to her honour when she changes, or when she is at the full. This religious ceremony lasts all night, and is performed with abundance of noise, hurry, and confusion. They shout, clap their hands, direct their eyes upwards, with abundance of seeming devotion, and then they mutter some words, which none can understand but themselves. Sometimes they run into vaults, where they clap their hand, and repeat several ejaculations. All this is performed during the night, while the moon is in her splendor; and they frequently prostrate themselves on the ground, then rise up again, and gazing at the moon, with loud acclamations, make the following address to her:—"We thy servants salute thee. Give us store of milk and honey; increase our flocks and herds, and we will worship thee." During this ceremony, they mark their foreheads with red paint, a practice common among the savages in America.

It appears, that like some of the rest of the Pagan Africans, they worship a being, who, according to their imaginations, can neither do them any good nor any evil. And what is still more remarkable, they worship another being inferior to this, whom they believe can do them much injury, unless his anger is appeased. This being they imagine frequently appears to them under the most tremendous form, somewhat resembling the ancient satyrs of the Greeks; and when they are asked how they can believe in such absurdities, so inconsistent with the divine attributes; their answer is to the following import:—"We follow the traditions of our ancestors, whose first parents having sinned against the grand captain, they fell into such a neglect of his worship, that they knew nothing of him, nor how to make their addresses to him." This may serve to shew, that however ignorant they may be in other respects, yet in this dark tradition they have some faint notion of the fall of man, which indeed is acknowledged by all the world, except some letter learned men among ourselves.

They pay also a religious adoration to a kind of May-bug. At the sight of this insect (for, according to their notion, it always portends some good to the family, and obliterates all the sins of those who belong to it) they sing and dance to its honour, and strew all round about it, and indeed about the whole house, the powder of a certain plant, which they call Buchu, and the herb Spiraea. At the same time, they sacrifice two sheep to this diminutive deity.

This ceremony is distinguished by a term that signifies regeneration. If this insect should fortunately crawl upon any one of the family, it is a strong indication that such person is become a new creature; he is looked upon as a venerable saint, two sheep are sacrificed for his service, an ox is slaughtered to his honour, and he is dressed with the intrails of the beast.

The Omentum is first well powdered with Buchu, and then clapped recking hot about his neck. This collar he must wear night and day, till it rots off; or at least till another May-bug relieves him, by settling upon some other regenerated person belonging to the house. As to the flesh of the ox so sacrificed, the men regale themselves with it as soon as it is dressed; but the women, who are present at the entertainment, are allowed to touch nothing but the broth. If, on the other hand, this sacred insect settles on a woman, these Hottentots immediately canonize her: In that case, the women regale on the flesh of the ox, which is sacrificed and dressed in honour to the female saints, and the men have no right or title to any thing but the broth. They take all the care imaginable to prevent the Europeans from hurting this their favourite insect. All the misfortunes that attend it, inevitably draws down so many calamities on themselves and their cattle.

They have several solitary places which they look upon as sacred; more especially their hillocks, and little spots of ground adjacent to their rivers, which are, as they imagine, and as our German author expresses it, the abodes of some particular saints; but we have good grounds to surmise, that they think the souls of their departed ancestors reside in these holy habitations; and in all probability, there is some conformity between this notion of theirs, and that of the ancient idolators, who established the mansions of their Nymphs, Fauns, and Sylvans, near fountains, rivers, hills, and forests. But be that as it will, the Hottentots never travel over such holy ground, without performing some act of devotion as they go along; which principally consists in cutting a few comical capers, and singing to themselves some extravagant cullogium of the sacred inhabitant. If they look on him as a more venerable saint than ordinary, their religious ceremonies are more solemn and of longer duration. In that case, they stop to clap their hands and hum over their divine airs with more attention and a better grace. In short, such as see through this rude and unpolished deportment, in which the difference between our conduct, and that of these savage nations, principally consists, must acknowledge, that both act in a manner upon the same principles.

Every cralle has its peculiar captain, priest, and physician: Of these latter there are sometimes two; and sometimes also the women turn doctors, and prescribe to their neighbours. The physician is elected by the elders of the cralle. His office or employment is not hereditary; for when he dies, they proceed to the choice of another; and in case there be no person duly qualified for that important post in their own cralle, they make a farther enquiry for some able and experienced person to fill that vacancy. This honourable employment is conferred by the hottentots upon none but sober, discreet men; men of an advanced age, at least near fifty; for otherwise the people will not confide in their care, or regard their prescriptions. These physicians, we are informed, have very few patients that die under their hands; but if such a misfortune should attend them, they have a reason always ready at hand for such a miscarriage. The patient, say they, was indisputably bewitched; a circumstance sufficient at all times to support the credit and reputation of their faculty.

We proceed now to the Furi, who is the spiritual physician of these Hottentots, and whose function is also elective; he is inspector general of their manners, customs, and religious ceremonies. Whether he has the same dexterity and address as his countrymen the physicians, or not, or the artifice and quackery of the Boias, and all such as officiate as priests amongst the savages, we are at a loss to determine; but in all probability, how unpolished soever these Furis may appear to travellers, they have their manner of insinuation as well as others of their profession. The fees of these physicians, both civil and spiritual, consist in the presents which are made them: sometimes of a lamb, and sometimes of a sheep; and the dignity of both functions entitles them to a free participation of all the public entertainments of the cralle.

We shall now amuse our readers with a short account of their manner of initiation, and admission into their civil society, which is far more whimsical and extravagant than any hitherto mentioned. The Hottentots cut out the left testicle of all their male-children as soon as they are nine or ten years old at farthest. For which reason father Tachard, speaking of these people, calls them a kind of half eunuchs. They are not, however, indispensably obliged to fix this operation to the age before mentioned; since some persons more advanced in years are thus castrated; but none under eight. The introduction to this ceremony is their tying the arms and legs of the patient very fast; and moreover, they kneel upon his breast, that they may command him at pleasure and at the same time prevent him from seeing an operation which amongst us would be submitted to with the utmost reluctance, and, in all probability, be looked upon as a diminution of our manhood.

The operator having thus secured his patient, takes out his lancet, makes the proper incision, takes away the testicle proposed, and artfully conveys a little ball of the same size, composed of sheeps' fat and the powder of Buchu, into the wound, and then closes it up. This Lythotomist is always one of the spiritual directors before-mentioned, and master of the ceremonies in their respective cralles. As a preliminary of this operation, some of the Hottentots kill a sheep for the entertainment of the company at the close of the ceremony. One circumstance we had like to have forgot, which is very material, and ought not to be omitted. The patient immediately after the operation, is very plentifully anointed all over his body; and to complete the initiation, the reverend doctor honours him with a plentiful profusion of his urine; and then leaves him extended at his full length upon the ground. But as soon as the tormenting pain he has been put to, begins to abate, he must crawl, as well and as soon as he is able, to a little hut erected for that purpose, where he is ordered to continue for three or four days together. The entertainment provided on this occasion for the assembly, is a sheep as before-mentioned; but both the person initiated, and the women then present are obliged to abstain from tasting the least morsel of it.

The reason which some give, though without the least foundation, for the observance of this ridiculous custom is this, that the Hottentots become thereby more sprightly and active, and better qualified for the chase. On the contrary, there are the traces of religion conspicuous in this practice. The sheep that is killed and eaten, exclusive of the women, is manifestly a kind of sacrifice. The time generally fixed upon for this operation, is when the person to be initiated attains the age of maturity; and the peculiar care which the women take, not to have any familiar conversation with such as have not undergone it, is a strong argument likewise, in our opinion, that there is a kind of religious mystery in this operation. There is another reason, pleasant enough, given for the observance of this practise, viz. That the women are thereby secured from having twins. But be that as it will, we are credibly informed, that no young fellow must presume to marry till he has thus parted with one of his precious stones.

Another custom which is very singular, is the reception of a youth, who has attained the age of maturity, into their civil society. No young person is permitted, till after this ceremony is complied with, to keep company with those who are already admitted members, or indulged so far as to eat even with his own father; and he who neglects to procure his admission, when he comes of age, exposes himself to the contempt and ridicule of all his countrymen. For the solemnization of this ceremony, one of the elders of the cralle convenes a general assembly, who form themselves into a circle. Every member supports his body upon his knees, in such a manner, as that his posteriors may not rest upon the ground? The youth who is to be admitted does not enter as yet into the august assembly, but plants himself at a modest distance in the same attitude with the rest. The principal or elder, opens with a short harangue, which turns directly on the business of the day; after which he asks the consent of the whole assembly for the admission of the young man. Upon their general approbation, he advances towards the youth, and very gravely does that to him which Raucune did to the merchant, with more spleen but less formality. However, before such aspersion, he acquaints him, in as comprehensive terms as may be, that from henceforth his actions ought to speak the man, and that he is now no longer under his mother's eye, and that he must take care by his prudent deportment to merit the honour he has obtained, of being entered a member of their assembly. During the whole time of this aspersion, the young man, who receives it with all the testimonies of the profoundest veneration, bathes his body all over with the holy water sprinkled upon him. The ceremony concludes with the celebrant's hearty congratulations of the young man, in the name of the cralle, and his friendly wishes for the prolongation of his life, and the increase of his family. After that they are regaled with a whole sheep at the expence of their new member, who, notwithstanding, is not permitted to taste a morsel till the whole assembly have first eaten what they think convenient.

When one Hottentot insults another, and treats him with opprobrious and abusive language, he robs him, according to their notion, of his honour. The party injuring, therefore, must take care to redeem his credit, by presenting his companions with a fat sheep for an entertainment; who partake of it at his expence, but allow him the fat to anoint his body with, and the guts for his decoration. Should he refuse to make this peace-offering, which doubtless is looked upon as a purification, the party insulting would be abandoned, and become the object of universal contempt. From hence it is plain, that the point of honour is quite another thing with the Caffres than what it is with us, though it all tends indeed to the same end, with this difference only, that the Hottentots are so wise, as not to cut one another's throats to gratify their resentment.

When they have defeated their enemies, or destroyed a considerable number of wild beasts; when they are recovered from tedious fits of sickness, or escaped some imminent danger, they solemnize a festival, after their country fashion, on account of their good success. The first ceremonious act on these occasions is the erection of a hut in the middle of the cralle, which, as it denotes in their opinion, the regeneration or purification of the builders, the materials ought to be all perfectly new, and never made use of in any previous fabric whatsoever. The foundation is always laid before sun-rise. The women and such youths as have not been admitted amongst the men, cut down the boughs and branches of trees, and collect a large variety of flowers for the decoration of their new hut; and then they kill a lamb or a sheep for their public entertainment. Who can tell, but that this ceremony we are now speaking of, is much the same thing as our dedication of a church? And it is very probable, that the erection of this hut is equal to our acquittal of a solemn vow for the foundation of a chapel.

They observe the same ceremony at their settlement in any new habitation; but before they remove from their old places of abode, they offer up the customary sacrifice, or make the usual oblation. Should there be a murrain among their cattle, they employ themselves in sacrifices for three days together, to avert the judgment; and if, after such solemn acts of devotion, the contagious distemper does not cease, or at least visibly abate, they generally decamp, and remove their cralle to some other place, in hopes to find more healthful pasture grounds, which they sanctify, however, before they enter upon them, in the manner before described. Moreover, they make their cattle pass through the fire, by way of purification, which they receive, as they pretend, by tradition from their ancestors; which, in their opinion, is a sufficient justification of their conduct. A Hottentot, who was a man of better sense than the generality of them are, assured the author from whom we extract this account, that it is a charm or preservative against wild dogs, which would otherwise devour their flocks, and prove more destructive and injurious to them than even the tigers or the lions. Before such purification as aforesaid, they are obliged to drain their cows as dry as possible, and give the milk to the men to drink, without presuming so much as to taste one drop of it themselves.

These barbarous illiterate people are of opinion, like the rest of their neighbours, that the living are daily exposed to the misfortune of being charmed, and the dead of being raised by magical incantations; and every transaction which surpasses their weak comprehension, is looked upon by them as the result of sorcery and fascination. The most regular effects of nature they ascribe to the irresistible force of magic, and can by no arguments, how cogent soever, be prevailed upon to swerve from their established notions on any new emergency. But why should we so loudly inveigh against the perverseness and obstinance of a people, who have for so many ages been deprived of all the advantages of a liberal education, when we have flagrant instances much nearer home, of persons who are confirmed in as great stupidity, and are infinitely more inexcusable! A managed horse, that had been taught a few surprising pranks, was condemned to die for his too profound learning not many years ago, as an impious practitioner of the black-art, by that supreme judge of the Roman faith, the court of Inquisition. The Greek Testament also was looked upon by those very judges, whose ignorance was their only plea, as an infamous magical dissertation. The Cafres ascribe all their distempers to the spells or charms of their enemies, and by consequence, such physicians as they apply to for relief, must be adepts, as it were, in magic. Nay, the patient's cure consists in nothing more than a stronger enchantment to repel a weaker; and for the generality, however, they try the effect of purification, before they enter upon such supernatural expedients; and their first operation, therefore, is the sacrifice of a fat wether; after that the doctor very gravely examines the omentum of the victim, strews the powder of Buchu very plentifully over it, and then hangs it reeking hot about the neck of his patient, with this formal declaration: You are enchanted, it is true, but I will engage you shall be well again in a short time; for the charm you lie under is but weak, and will easily be dissolved. The patient is ordered to wear this collar, till it rots off his neck; but if this prescription proves ineffectual, the physician enters on a new scheme, exerts all the skill he is master of another way, and has recourse to the secret virtue of a variety of simples, or medicinal herbs, which he collects in some remote and unfrequented places.

From their magical practices, and their confirmed notion of spirits, we may rationally conclude, that they entertain some confused idea of the immortality of the soul, a future state, and the resurrection of the dead. For, in short, it seems impossible, that they should have any conception of the dead returning to life, without believing that souls are immortal. Yet, if the Hottentots have any notion of a future state, it is very imperfect and obscure; since one of them was so impertinent, or rather ignorant, as to ask a traveller, "If there were any cows, oxen, and sheep in Paradise." But as to the resurrection, according to our notion of that doctrine, there are not the least footsteps of it to be discerned in any of their dissertations. A few rambling expressions dropped accidentally, or borrowed from the Christians, and collected and refined by travellers, are not sufficient to fix and determine the sentiments of any barbarous nation.—

It is very remarkable, that if we regard with attention, the arguments which the greatest part of the idolators of Africa, India, &c. make use of, we find, that all their funeral solemnities owe their rise to this notion: That the soul, though immortal, being material, is subject to the same inconveniences as attend the body, and that, by consequences, she has occasion, even after her separation, for the same accommodation of life, as when united to the body here on earth. The Hottentots, being fully satisfied in their way, of the necessities of the dead, abandon the huts which they resided in when living, and remove none of the household goods they were possessed of, that at their return, they may have no occasion to rove about for new habitations, or to seize clandestinely on their survivors.

When a woman that is with child draws near the time of her travail, two or three grave matrons of her friends and acquaintance look after and nurse her till her pains come on; then the husband is obliged to withdraw; or if he should unfortunately be present, he must purify himself; that is, sacrifice two wethers, or two lambs, in the manner before mentioned. In case she proves difficult to be laid, they prescribe a decoction of milk and tobacco, which has a wondrous good effect on these Africans, notwithstanding the medicine would be as fatal as poison to our European ladies. If the infant happens to be still-born, it is accounted a sore disaster, and a general affliction; but a still greater in case it be a male; and after its interment, the father purifies, or rather sanctifies himself, according to the usual custom. The hut he resided in is pulled down, and the ground abandoned to the sole use of the unfortunate infant, and a more propitious spot is fixed upon for a new habitation.

A new-born infant is laid directly on the floor, upon the skin of some beast or other, and there besmeared all over with cow's dung, by way of purification. In this blessed pickle it is exposed to the open air, without the least shelter from the injuries of the weather. This ordure, when dried by the sun, comes easily off, without any pain or prejudice to the infant. After this, the good women take some particular leaves, and squeeze out the juice of them betwixt two stones. With this liquid they wash the young child all over, in order, as they imagine, to make him robust and hardy.— After this ablution, they anoint him sufficiently with mutton or lamb fat, and then well dust him with the powder of Buchu. The former, they say, not only makes his limbs strong and supple, but secures his skin from receiving any impression from the excessive heat of the sun; the latter is made use of principally as an ornament, or kind of dress, though it is allowed at the same time to have an innate corroborating virtue.

The fortune of twins is very precarious. If however, they both prove boys, their lives are not only preserved, but the joy of the whole cralle is considerably augmented. The father and mother are congratulated on their extraordinary abilities; and it frequently costs the former a sacrifice of two or three oxen. If on the contrary, the infants should happen to be girls, they meet but with a very cold reception; and the poorest sheep in the flock is looked upon as a sufficient sacrifice for such increase of their family; and in case either of them appears infirm, or too feeble and tender; if the mother has not milk sufficient to supply them both; if, in short, the father should be unwilling to bear the expense of their education, they either are dropped, without any reluctance in the open fields, or half buried, or tied to the branch of a tree. If the twins prove of different sexes, the male infant is always preserved, and the female exposed, unless she can be reared without any prejudice or inconvenience to the former; so hard is the lot of the weaker sex! The ancients, it is well known, treated them with the same barbarous partiality; nay, the Greeks and Romans themselves, though so wise, and a people polite, never scrupled to expose them, when their circumstances were narrow, and they could not well bear the expense of their education. We have already given the reader an account of the customs of the Chinese and Japanese hereupon.

We have before mentioned the names which the Cafres or Hottentots give their children, and we may add, that the husband is obliged to retire from his house, during the whole time of his wife's lying-in; and if he violates this established law, he must purify himself, by making the usual oblation. As soon as her time is expired, and he has free liberty to revisit her, he anoints himself all over, and dusts himself with the powder of Buchu. At his first entrance into the house, he takes a pipe of Dacha, without saying a word, and observes a profound silence, till the smook begins to intoxicate his brains, and makes him gay and wanton; in this merry mood he flies into the embraces of his impatient spouse, and it is easy to conceive the good effects of such an amorous encounter.

A gallant and his mistress are obliged, before they enter into any solemn contract, to ask the consent of their nearest relations, or, in default thereof, to consult their most faithful friends; at least, it is absolutely necessary, that the approbation of both the fathers should be first procured. Before that, there is no familiar intercourse, no ground to suspect the least correspondence between them; nay, they are so cautious of their reputation, we are informed, in this particular, that some more refined and polite people than they are, might blush at their prudent deportment. As soon as a young Hottentot has cast his eyes on the dear object of his affections, the fathers on both sides, and several other relations, assemble themselves together, and the young lover entertains the whole company with their darling Dacha. When the smoke of this their tobacco begins to exhilarate their spirits, and make them gay, the parents come to the point in hand, and make their proposals.

The father of the intended bride consults for a minute or two with his wife before all the company, and then frankly declares either his free assent to, or absolute refusal of the match. In case of the latter, they all rise immediately, and go home without any further ceremony; but in case the intended bridegroom is approved of, he is addressed in the following manner: Sir, take the girl, she is at your service. Upon this, he is allowed to speak freely to his mistress, and make as warm declarations of his passion for her as he thinks proper; and herein consist all the preliminary engagements; consummation immediately ensues. But in case the young virgin happens to answer his passion with coldness and disdain, he must win the heart of his cruel beauty by force of arms, and fight all his rivals, till she relents, and submits to his superior power. It may justly therefore be said of these Cafrian gallants, that they make love like true sons of Mars, with sword in hand.

As to the public entertainment at the solemnization of their nuptials, the bridegroom treats the whole company with one, two, three, or more oxen, according as his circumstances will admit of the expense. All the guests in general anoint themselves with the fat of the beasts, and then cover themselves all over with the powder of Buchu, in which all their fiery principally consists. But the women who are, for the generality somewhat more vain and affected, not only anoint themselves, but paint their foreheads, cheeks, and chins, with large spots, and strong streaks of scarlet, or some other colour that nearly resembles it. This assembly of friends and relations divide, and form themselves into two circles. In that of the women, the bride sits at a small distance from the rest; and the bridegroom follows her example, and sits apart from the men. After this the principal, or head of the cralle, whose peculiar province it is to celebrate their nuptials, walks round about three times successively, making the same solemn aspersion on each of them as we have already described, when a youth is admitted into the state of manhood; and this aspersion is attended with a kind of nuptial benediction.

many wives as their circumstances will well admit of: but immediate death, however, is the inevitable consequence of either adultery or incest. The offenders are bound hand and foot together, and thrown into a grave, where they are left in that helpless condition four and twenty hours. The next day, the gallant is hung on the arm of a tree, and there demolished and mutilated limb after limb.—The woman, bound as aforesaid is according to Dapper, surrounded with a large heap of dry faggots, and burnt alive. They dislocate the knees of such as are guilty of murder, and fasten them to their shoulders, and leave them to expire in that merciless painful situation. From all which austere proceedings, it manifestly appears that these barbarians notwithstanding their invincible ignorance, have preserved some regard for virtue and justice.

They have their formal divorces likewise, when they see convenient; and a widow as we are informed, cuts off a joint of one of her fingers, whenever she marries a second husband; and in case of more continues the like operation, beginning at the little finger. Each joint thus cut off, is a pledge or compliment which she is obliged to make to her new partner; and if to this barbarous and inhuman testimony of their affection, we should add the toils and fatigues they undergo in all their family affairs, which are their peculiar province, their abject condition, their slavery and passive obedience, which oblige them to work in the woods, and provide for their husband, without tasting of any thing but their fragments or remains, it must readily be granted, that either the motives to marriage, or the ideas which those entertain who have never tasted the inexpressible pleasure that attends that state, are impetuous and beyond all resistance. We are willing to grant both, since the most experienced widows themselves with pleasure support the galling yoke.

It is remarkable, that the Cafres, at least those who go under the denomination of Hottentots, eat no swine's flesh, nor fish without scales; from whence it is generally concluded, that these barbarians are the descendants either of the Jews or the Mahometans. But be that as it will, they have no other authority, but tradition, for the observance of that custom, or that other of the men's abstaining from sheep's milk, hares, and rabbits. The women, on the other hand, are enjoined not to taste one morsel of any thing that has blood in it; and as to such beasts which die through age or infirmity, they eat them without any scruple or reluctance, like the ancient Troglodites. The men never eat with the women; and the principal occasion whereof is the apprehension which the former lie under of being accidentally polluted through the periodical courses of the latter. For the men are strictly enjoined, by tradition, or otherwise, not to have the least intercourse or familiarity with women in that condition.

They sing and dance to the music of their Gongsom; as also to another instrument made in the form of a pot. The former is made in the shape of a bow, of a peculiarly solid and substantial wood, the string whereof is the small gut of some animal, like those we make use of for our violins. At the top of this string is fixed a quill, through which they blow, and at the same time hold the tip or extreme part of the string in their mouths, that the sound so formed by their breath in the quill, may by that means, affect the string, and that the concord, if we may be allowed the expression, which there is between them may make that sound still more melodious. When they are ambitious of making their Gongsoms more musical than they generally are, they take half a cocoa-shell, scooped very clean and neat, and dispose it in such a manner on the string, as that by moving it higher or lower, it shall create a variety of tones or modulations; which strike the ears agreeably enough, even of those who are good judges of far better music than that of the Cafres. They make use of another musical instrument, in the form as we have before observed, of a pot, or if you please, one of our kettle-drums; which as it is covered with a lamb-skin, braced tight, makes much the same sound as that martial instrument, but the women beat this drum with their hands. When they have occasion to cross any river or running stream, they never fail to wash themselves either before they plunge themselves into it, or at least as soon as ever they are arrived safe on the farther shore, and this ablution is always attended with capering and dancing; which ceremonious movements, in all probability, are grateful acknowledgements to the Supreme Being, for their deliverance from the perils and dangers of the waters.

As long as their ancient people are in a capacity to do any manner of business, they encourage them to proceed, support them under their infirmities; nay, charitably relieve them if there be any visible hopes of their maintaining themselves for any time without being burthensome to their friends and acquaintance. Notwithstanding the shameful treatment which the women in general meet with, notwithstanding they are universally despised by these barbarians, yet the same patience and forbearance is exercised towards them, how old, disagreeable, or infirm soever they may be, provided they can but cut their wood, or gather their roots and pot-herbs. But for those who are so far advanced in years, so infirm and feeble, that they are incapable of all manner of work, and of giving any hopes of future advantage from their labour, they take an effectual method to discharge themselves of the incumbrance, by an action which they look upon as charitable, though we should account it, and not without good reason, very barbarous and inhuman.

They erect a hut at some distance in the fields for such an ancient and useless invalid, and after that, convey him on the back of an ox, to his last habitation. The whole cralle, in a very formal manner, attend him on this occasion, and after having left him some small pittance to subsist on for a few days, they take their last farewell and never concern themselves about the poor unhappy creature any more. The best fortune after that which can possibly befall him, is to be speedily devoured by some savage beast.

The rich as well as poor, when old age has rendered them thus useless and decrepit, meet, we are told, with the same merciless treatment. The Thoglodites however, were, if possible, they say, still more inhuman. Those ancient savages of Africa, straggled their disabled old men that could not travel, with a cow's tail; but not till they had refused to be their own executioners. A formal exhortation accompanied the dispatch of the poor wretches; for they looked upon the murder of a man, when life became a burden to him, as a deliverance from all his troubles. They accounted such as were fond of life when they could no longer enjoy the sweets of it, as very unhappy. On this established notion they charitably dispatched all sick persons, whose maladies, in their opinion, were incurable. We beg leave to make this cursory observation, that this deportment, how barbarous soever it may appear to us, and which no doubt in reality, was such, was founded nevertheless on a specious principle of humanity, and with intent to free their fellow creatures at once from all their sorrows and afflictions. As to the cure of their distempers, they sometimes make use of some particular simples, the extraordinary virtues whereof, we are informed, they are well acquainted with. At other times they have recourse to unction and friction; for which purposes they make use of the same fat wherewith they anoint and polish their skins; sometimes again they try the effects of unction with the same grease wherewith they anoint and varnish their bodies, or of incision and scarification; the method whereof is this. They take an ox's horn, which is so smooth, and so well polished at the point, that they can apply it directly, and press it likewise as hard as they see convenient, on the proper part of the body. After this, they make several incisions on the flesh, which, by the violent pressure of the horn, is so numbened, that the patient is insensible of the operation. This is repeated sometimes for two hours together, till there is some visible amendment. The time, however, is shorter or longer, according as the incisions are deep, or the constitution of the patient will enable him to bear them. During the operation, he is laid upon his back, and if he finds no relief, they have recourse to a potion, extracted from some medicinal herbs; and if after all these artful applications, the patient's pain continues, they then try the force of friction, which, if it meets not with the desired success, it is followed by a fresh scarification.

We shall take no notice of their method of bleeding, since there is nothing in it particular, or worth our attention. They heal any infectious bite, or unevened wound, by antidotes, which they very artfully prepare, and oblige the patient to swallow down a proper quantity, and at the same time make an external application of it, particularly near the heart. This operation is performed by incision.— They pour a sufficient quantity of their antidote into this fresh wound, that it may incorporate with the blood by virtue of its circulation, of which doubtless they have some notion, though they are not duly qualified to talk in such a philosophical manner, as we are on so curious a topic. They make use of friction and unction, when any bone happens to be dislocated; as also a violent agitation of the part or member so dislocated; and keep it in perpetual motion till it is replaced in its natural socket. The Hottentots, and indeed all the natives of Cafraria, shave their heads and beards, as a public testimony of their sorrow and concern for the loss of their near relations; but this custom is only complied with by such as are in but mean circumstances, and incapable of offering up so much as a sheep by way of sacrifice, or purification.

In order to discover whether a patient will die or recover, they take a wether, or an ewe, which they skin alive, and then let loose, permitting it freely to take its own course. If it never attempts to run away, it is a bad symptom, and the patient's life is despaired of; in that case they resign him to the will of fortune, for they prescribe no more remedies after that, but let him eat and drink whatever his own inclination prompts him to. But if the ewe or wether, after it is flayed, frisks away, they look upon it as a happy presage of his amendment.

When a patient is given over, they have no recourse on that account to the Supreme Being, nor any act of devotion whatsoever. They content themselves with flocking round about him, and waiting for his dissolution; but however, they flatter the poor man, though just expiring, and give him hopes of finding relief, either from some sovereign medicine, or irresistible charm. For that is the name, we have already observed, which they give all the medicines prepared by their own physicians, or those prescribed to them by the Europeans. When the sick man is thought to be giving up the ghost, the whole assembly weep, howl, and make such hideous lamentations, that the patient sometimes is restored by virtue of the shocking sounds. Let what will be the cause however, he must offer up the customary sacrifice in case he recovers. If the patient be a man, those friends and acquaintance only that are men, partake of the flesh of the victim, and the women sup the broth; on the other hand, if the person thus restored be a woman, the men only sup the broth, and the women eat the flesh.

To conclude, when the patient is actually expired, they devote one quarter of an hour only to their lamentations; but they are so extravagantly clamorous and noisy, that they may be distinctly heard at a prodigious distance. The whole cralle sob, groan, and howl to an excessive degree, and moreover their expressions of sorrow are accompanied with such extravagant distortions, and such a violent clapping of their hands, that a man must stop his ears, or be stunned with the tumultuous noise. We know no instance to be given of such an external noisy way of mourning, except that of the women of Languedoc. Without entering into the sincerity of either, the latter are, in their demonstrations of sorrow, as in all other things in general, ostentatious, vain, and conceited to the last degree. Such as are not acquainted with their hypocritical deportment, would really imagine, by the seeming violence of their turbulent passions, that like the Ephesian matrons, they would bury themselves alive with their deceased husbands; and, in all probability, Petronius, when he wrote that celebrated story, copied it from these notorious originals. But to return to the mourning of the Cafres. It is one very happy circumstance, says our German author, to whom we are indebted for all the particular circumstances of these their funeral solemnities, that this excessive sorrow continues but a quarter of an hour; for every one contributes towards the speedy interment of the dead, and cheerfully makes use of any thing that he has in his own house, that will be serviceable, and testify his last respects to his departed friend.

In the first place, the principal, or head of the cralle, dispatches several Cafres to prepare his last lodgings for him, and particularly to take care so to order matters, that when he is laid in the ground, the wild beasts shall not be able to grub him up, and devour his carcase. Whilst these are performing their good services abroad, those at home bend the corpse double, lay his arms across his breast, and his head upon his knees; or, to give you a more clear idea, they set the deceased in the very same situation he once lay in his mother's womb. In this attitude they wrap him up tight in the very skin which he wore in his life-time; and always bury him within six hours after his decease. Three or four bearers, who are nominated and appointed for that purpose by the principal of the cralle, take him on their shoulders, and convey him directly to the place of his interment. They have one custom with relation to their dead, which is very remarkable, and that is, they never carry the corpse out of the house through the usual door-way, but break down a passage for that particular purpose backwards, directly over against it. Our German is of opinion, that this ceremony owes its rise to the awful ideas they entertain of departed souls.—For they imagine, says he, that they are mischievously inclined, and apt to injure the living as they go along, destroying their cattle that are left all night on the spacious green, which is situated in the centre of the cralle. In order therefore to prevent any such disaster, they cause the deceased to be carried out of that part of the house which fronts the fields. Whilst the corpse is thus upon the removal, the relations of both sexes form themselves into two circles, and, according to custom, as near the door-way as possible. The men howl on one side, and the women on the other. Every one gives a loose to his sorrow, and it is difficult to determine, whether the male or female circle is the most extravagant.

As soon as ever the corpse is carried away, they immediately shut the house up close and abandon it for ever, for fear any who come in should accidentally meet with the soul of the deceased. The whole cralle attend the funeral to the place of interment, but without any regularity or decorum. However, to make amends, if we may rely on the veracity of our German traveller, they walk along like perfect antics, and are more extravagant in their gestures and grimaces, than can possibly be conceived. After that they deposit the corpse in a vault, which they either cover with large cumbrous stones, or entire trees, to prevent the beasts of prey from coming near it. As they return home, they repeat their noisy lamentations, their extravagant gesticulations and grimaces, and the name of the deceased without intermission, as if they would recal him from the grave. However, this is not all. At their return to the cralle, they seat themselves round about the house of the deceased, and renew, with some regularity, their weepings, wailings, and grimaces. Nay, sometimes they set apart eight days successively for this mournful solemnity; especially if the deceased was well beloved by his friends and relations. About an hour after the return of the company, the principal or elder of the cralle, rises, and very gravely obliges them all with the above mentioned aspersions, for their good offices to their deceased townsman. This first aspersions is succeeded by a second, which the reader will imagine, we presume, not so fulsome and preposterous, and more conformable to the practice of some other nations. This venerable old gentleman strews the ashes, which he has collected with his own hands out of the house of the deceased, over the heads of the whole assembly. The first aspersion, so inconsistent with decency and good manners, has no other foundation than its antiquity, for the observance of it. This ceremony, however, is peculiar to themselves; in this they are perfect originals; whereas in the second, there are the visible footsteps of a custom religiously observed in times of sorrow and affliction by all the eastern nations. In short, some of the most disconsolate carry the point still farther, and add cow-dung to their mourning in dust and ashes.

The day after the interment the whole cralle decamps; every one packs up his bag and baggage, and pulls down his tent, or little cottage. There is not one single edifice left standing, but that of the deceased; which they leave behind them; as also the furniture and other appurtenances thereunto belonging, in order that if he should accidentally think proper to return, he may find his own apartment ready for his reception without which precaution, he might possibly resent his ill treatment, and seize upon their new habitations; and before they decamp, they take care to purify themselves, by offering up some animal, great or small, for a sacrifice, according as their circumstances will permit. Being arrived at the place appointed and agreed on for pitching their tents again, and settling at least for awhile, they purify themselves a second time. The flesh of the victims is made use of for an entertainment, as it is on all the other public occasions before-mentioned. The nearest relations to the deceased, as for instance, his children, are obliged to wear the cawl of the victim, especially if it be a sheep, for a collar round about their necks. That is their usual mourning for one so near a kin. We have already observed that such as are in mean circumstances, and incapable of offering up any sacrifice, by way of purification, sit down contented with shaving their heads and beards, as a public testimony of their affection and concern.

Such is the account we have of these people called Hottentots who reside near the Cape of Good Hope. Some of them have been converted to the Christian faith by the Dutch ministers. Those who visit the Cape town, are very civil and obliging. Many of them are employed as labourers, and they are faithful in keeping safe whatever is committed to their care. This may serve to shew, what good effects would flow from preaching the gospel in its simplicity, without an unnecessary ridiculous load of ceremonies. The Dutch clergy are, in general, a very pious laborious set of men; and it would be much to the honour of the States General to have a school for the education of youth in the Cape town. There the sons of the better sort of Hottentots might soon be educated, and sent to preach the gospel of Christ to their poor darkened countrymen.

Christ came in the flesh that he might destroy satan's kingdom; and he has left it incumbent on all his followers, to propagate the knowledge of his name as far as their influence will reach. The Dutch have been long blessed with the light of the gospel, and the most grateful returns they can make for such an inestimable favour is to teach it to the heathens. Indeed, it will be an aggravation of their guilt if they do it not. Nay, we may venture to affirm, that all those who know the value of the Christian religion, will wish to make every one equally happy with themselves. And what happiness is so great as that of promoting the interests of precious immortal souls. To bring them from darkness to light, and from the power of satan to God. What amazing progress has been made in the highlands and islands of Scotland within these thirty years: Nay, what vast progress has been made in converting many of the American savages; and both these good works have been conducted by societies in this kingdom. Of this the Dutch are not ignorant, and let them take an example from our benevolent countrymen, who, for their compassion for souls of their fellow-creatures, will receive the approbation of Christ at the last day.

The inhabitants of this kingdom are all idolators for although they acknowledge God as the creator of the universe, whom they call by different names, according to the qualities they ascribe to him, yet they have several idols, and in particular, they adore a certain virgin, whom they distinguish by the title of Peru. They have some particular days in every month which they consider as more solemn and holy than others. The anniversary of their sovereign's birth day is always kept as a sort of festival, and to that we may add, the awful homage and profound reverence which they pay him, by lighting up a great number of fires. That these people have not in every place a settled form of worship, will appear evident to every one who considers that some of them worship one idol and some another.

That they should pay divine honours to their sovereign, will not appear very strange, when we consider that the Romans, who boasted of their superior knowledge, actually worshipped their emperors. As for their lighting so many fires on their sovereign's birth-day, it is done as a mark of their respect, homage and allegiance, which is expected from every subject. The king orders his inferior officers to deliver to the people throughout the whole of his dominions some wood for that purpose every year, so that the fuel costs them nothing. Every subject is under the indispensable necessity of extinguishing the fires in their houses, during the time that they light those in honour of the king.

It is at this time that all the taxes are paid to the king, and probably were it not for that, he would not be so liberal in distributing the fuel. Thus these ignorant princes in Africa, who are little better than savages, can extort money from their subjects with the same facility as the most cunning of our accomplished European monarchs. But notwithstanding, it is certain, that like the ancient Persians, they consider fire as a sacred element. For they never would be so superstitiously attached to it in honour of their sovereign, were it not that they consider something in it as endowed with Divine power, perhaps as one of the qualities of the Supreme Being.

When the king encamps at any place, a hut, or tent, is immediately erected, wherein a fire is kindled, and kept burning with all the precaution imaginable. And here it may not be unnecessary to observe, that the sophis of Persia had always some sacred fire carried before them; and we have taken notice in our accounts of the Gaures, that all the Oriental nations testified the most profound veneration, for this their favourite and sacred element. The only reason we can, from the best information, assign for this regard shewn to fire is, its being considered as an emanation from the sun, and the vast benefit it is of to mankind.

They always bow their knees when they approach their monarch, and never speak to him in a standing posture. No person must speak in his presence but when he puts the glass to his mouth to drink, all the spectators make loud acclamations by shouting and huzzaing. These acclamations are echoed throughout the whole of the place where he resides, and the news is soon communicated to the neighbouring villages. This is carrying flattery and adulation to a large height indeed; but it must be observed, that all those people who live in warm climates, are, in their political notions, little better than slaves.

Like the inhabitants of many other heathen nations, both the king and his subjects are slaves to superstition, and repose an extraordinary confidence in dreams and charms. The king has a building erected, in which he hangs up all the bodies of such malefactors as have been executed. And, horrid to mention, such dead bodies are never buried while any radical moisture remains in them, which is received in a vessel appropriated for that purpose.— From this distillation they compose a sovereign elixir for his majesty's use, which in their opinion is not only an infallible preservative against the power of magic, but also an invaluable medicine to prolong life.

In this country, the young virgins go naked till they are married, except that they cover those parts which the women of all nations conceal. When they are married and have children, they cover their breasts, and wear such other dresses as are fashionable among them. And ignorant as these people are, yet they have convents like the nunneries in Roman Catholic countries, but these are only for the young women to reside in till they are married.

Polygamy, or a plurality of wives is allowed here, but there is always one who is superior to the rest, according to the custom of many other nations. No virgin is permitted to marry till her mother, or some other woman has declared that she is capable of having children. Seduction is little known among them, for they marry extremely young. As for their old women, they pay but little regard to them; for like those of many other countries, they value women no longer than the bloom of beauty remains.

When these people are engaged in war, they never wash themselves till peace is concluded, and probably this custom is the result of a solemn vow, an engagement which they voluntarily lay themselves under, out of a laudable concern for the honour and welfare of their country. There is another ceremony observed among them, some footsteps of which may be traced in ancient history, and that is, the making eunuchs of their prisoners, and making presents of the spoils taken from their enemies to their wives, who are proud of wearing such things, as glorious signatures of their husbands' conquests. This practice very naturally reminds us of that remarkable circumstance in the sacred history of king David, that Saul would not acknowledge him as his son-in-law, till he had produced as a nuptial present, an hundred fore-skins of the Philistines. Josephus, who has altered several parts of the sacred history, to conceal some of the practices of his countrymen, tells us, that instead of one hundred fore-skins, it was six hundred heads of the Philistines that David presented to Saul.

As for the funeral solemnities of these people, they differ but little from the rest of the heathen Africans. They preserve, with the utmost care, the bodies of their deceased, and for eight days successively pay them a kind of adoration. On such solemn occasions they dress themselves in white, and set before the deceased a large quantity of provisions, spread on a table in a very decent manner. After this, they implore his benediction on his sacred majesty the king and themselves; and then they sit down and regale themselves on the dainties. Afterwards the body is carried out for interment, either in the woods, or in some other obscure place.

To conclude, the last custom of a religious nature that we shall take notice of, is the oath they take on the most solemn occasions. When a man is charged with being guilty of a crime, and the evidence against him is not full enough to convict him, he is obliged to take a medicine to clear his innocence. If he vomits it up, he is declared guilty, but if it digests upon his stomach he is considered as innocent, and consequently acquitted. This custom once prevailed among many of the heathen nations, and it does so still in some parts of the world besides Africa. The custom, however, is very barbarous; for the truth convicting criminal should never be sought out any other way than by voluntary evidence.

RELIGION OF THE INHABITANTS OF AGAG, TOCOCKA, AND QUITVE.

IN treating of these people we shall not enter into the controversy, whether they are subject to the king of Monomotapa, or whether they have princes of their own. Perhaps their form of government is often changed, as it is among all other barbarians in the world, and it is needless to form conjectures when we have no authority to support them.

They have, according to Purchas, a confused notion of one Supreme Being, whom they call Moutungo, but they never implore him for any favours, and consequently they never return him any praise. When they are labouring under any afflictions, whether public or private, it is to their sovereign that they make the most humble supplications for redress. To him they pray for all the blessings of Providence, which may serve to point out, that they are most gross idolators. A long and tedious drought is mostly followed by impetuous showers, and so in all the other changes of the seasons; and the people who are easy and incurious, imagine that their monarch works all these marvellous things for them, without ever enquiring any farther.

This king of theirs is for ever surrounded by a parcel of sycophants, composed of poets and musicians, who make it their whole study to persuade him that he is a god. They sing eulogiums in praise of him, and in their compositions bestow on him all the pompous epithets and swelling titles their imaginations can suggest. They style him lord of the sun and moon, and king of the earth and sea, and as in all probability they imagine that every action, whether good or evil, which approaches nearest to a pitch of perfection, deserves the character of great and magnificent, they call their monarchs the grand magician, as we do our princes' illustrious conquerors. These are very favourable appellations with them, and they likewise call their sovereigns robbers, which to them convey no bad idea, seeing plunder and robbery is the very profession, the very employment of these savages.

They offer up prayers to the souls of their deceased relations, so that we may naturally conclude they believe the immortality of the soul; and thus much is certain, that they have the most awful and tremendous notions of the devil, whom they call the inveterate enemy of all mankind. As they believe the immortality of the soul, one would naturally imagine, that they give their assent to the acknowledgement of a future state of rewards and punishments; and yet we are told, that they have no notion of hell, but flatter themselves that after their decease they shall all enter into paradise, where they shall indulge themselves in all manner of voluptuousness with their wives and children. We have, however, some doubts of the truth of what is here advanced; for the most illiterate heathens make a distinction between virtue and vice, and consequently they must believe there is a future state of rewards and punishments, whether for a time or for eternity.

They are perfect strangers to any genuine account of the creation of the world; for according to some travellers, they believe it to be eternal, but this certainty cannot be true, for those who believe that the world had not a beginning, will hardly be brought to believe that it will ever have an end. All their religious ceremonies are regulated according to the will of the prince, and the first day of every month is a holiday. Most of their festivals are held in memory of their deceased and dearest relations, and these are a sort of deities worshipped by them.— They have implicit faith in some particular oracles, which, as they pretend, have the power to reveal to them the knowledge of future events.

It is proper we should here observe, that the ancient idolators, of whom we read so much in the histories of Greece and Rome, did not worship their departed relations indiscriminately: No, these divine honours were paid only to the virtuous, in order that after their decease, they might become mediators between the Supreme Being and the whole race of mankind. To this may be added, that it was done to stimulate the living to the practise of virtue.

In their trials of prisoners, they have several ceremonies, but their oaths in general consist in making the accused person swallow a strong dose of physic, and according to its operation they form their notions of his guilt or innocence. When he takes the medicine, several dreadful curses are pronounced, to induce the prisoner to tell the truth. And if these maledictions and the medicines have no extraordinary effects on the prisoner, he is declared innocent, and acquitted. On such occasions, the prosecutor's goods are all confiscated, and he with his wives and children are all sold as slaves.

They have another form of trial, not much unlike the fiery ordeal in ancient times in our country of Britain. These Africans call it Noqus, and it is a kind of trial by a hot iron. The iron is made hot, and the person is obliged to lick it. If he burns his tongue, it is an indication of his guilt, but if otherwise, he is declared innocent. They have several other sorts of ceremonies in the administration of oaths, but they are so much similar to some of those already mentioned in our account of Congo, that it is altogether unnecessary to repeat them.

All their wives are obtained by purchase, and the mau who has the greatest number of handsome and accomplished daughters, is esteemed the richest.— If the purchaser makes any objection to the young woman after she has been with him some time, he returns her to her parents, and receives back some part of the purchase money; after which, they dispose of her to the next person who bids most. With respect to such women as are poor, they are a sort of slaves for life, for their husbands domineer over them in the most cruel and tyrannical manner. The mean degrading manner in which the female sex are held in this country, where they are bought and sold, points out that the passions of the men are mean, low, vulgar, and selfish. Love is of a spontaneous nature, it cannot be purchased; it flows as it were imperceptibly, and thus it is distinguished from gratitude, which is a purchased duty, because it commands a thankful return.

Such as are very old and infirm, are treated in the same manner as the Caffres or Ho'tentots, near the Cape of Good Hope; that is, they are totally abandoned, and their death is hastened on as fast as possible. It is true, they extend their charity for some of them so far, as to convey them into deserts, but there they are left either to starve, or be devoured by wild beasts. Nay, the poor helpless wretches, conscious of their approaching misery, beg to be dispatched out of the way, without being torn in pieces by wild beasts.

The burial of their dead is left entirely to the will and discretion of those who survive, and, indeed, they are generally interred in a very decent manner. They put into the grave some different sorts of provisions, to support the deceased during his journey to the other world. Some earth is then thrown over the corpse, and the chairs and bed of the deceased are piled over the grave. They are so superstitious as not to touch, on any account whatever, such chairs or beds, or indeed any thing that has touched the dead body. Their mourning continues eight days together, from the rising to the setting of the sun; and that time is spent in dances, songs and howlings. The mourning being over, they eat and drink in honour of their departed friends and relations, it being customary on such occasions to consecrate all whom they know.

At the first appearance of the new moon, in the month of September, the king, who is the visible God of the country, sets out from Simbaoe, his capital city, attended by a grand retinue. He then repairs to the top of a particular hill, which is the place where their kings are buried, and there performs nine days' devotion, to the memory of his illustrious ancestors. As soon as they are arrived at the place, they open the ceremony with a most elegant entertainment, and there intoxicate their brains with a liquor which they call Rombo. After their days of joy and festivity are ended, two more are spent in grief and sorrow, and on the last of these days, they imagine that the soul of the last deceased king, enters into the body of one of the courtiers.

The person falls down, and rolls upon the ground, and the devil, by his mouth, delivers himself in an unknown tongue; but soon after he comes to himself, grows more gentle and tractable, and talks in the language and style of the late king. His imperial majesty, imagining that he perfectly recollects his predecessor, approaches and salutes him; and immediately the whole assembly retreat, and testify their respect at an awful distance. His majesty being thus alone with the demoniac, consults him as an infallible oracle, on all his affairs of any importance, both public and private.

As soon as this oracle has delivered such answers as he thinks convenient, the devil withdraws, and the poor harassed demoniac, as we are informed, for the generality sits down contented all his life after, and thinks himself sufficiently recompensed for all his fatigue by having had the honour of such a miraculous conference with his royal master. This intrigue, in all probability, is owing to the delusion and imposture of some person who professes himself an able magician, and that is all we can say of it with any certainty. It is well, known, by the bye, that a thousand instances may be produced from the ancients of pretended spirits that have been raised by their necromancers on the like occasions.

When the king dies, his wives poison themselves the moment he expires, in order to die with, and wait on him in his progress to the other world.—As soon as his soul is departed, he is instantly conveyed to the sepulchre of his ancestors, and his successor the next morning takes possession of the royal dignity, and all the concubines of the deceased. He then exposes himself to public view, but in such a manner, that a curtain conceals both him and his wives from being discerned by the populace. He is immediately proclaimed throughout the kingdom, in order that the nobility and gentry may recognize his authority, and pay him homage. This ceremony is performed with all that passive obedience and abject deportment which is so conspicuous all over the east, and so agreeable to their imperious monarchs, who look upon themselves as deities, or at least as something more than human, when they see their subjects creeping and cringing, with such awful fear, at the footstool of their thrones, and addressing themselves with all humility to their persons, without presuming to lift up their heads, and look them in the face. Thus the subjects of Africa pay their submission and allegiance to their monarch, who graciously condescends to answer them, but still behind the curtain, which, however, is soon after drawn, and then his majesty obliges them with a full view of his sacred person. Every one immediately claps his hands, and rends the air with loud acclamations: in a few minutes the curtain conceals him again, and the nobility and gentry withdraw, cringing and crouching in the same abject and submissive manner as when they came. The whole city celebrate the festival of his happy accession to the throne, and testify their joy with loud huzzas, and a vast variety of their country music.

The next day his imperial majesty causes a proclamation to be made of his accession to the throne by proper officers, who at the same time give a general invitation to all persons whomsoever, without distinction, to see their new sovereign break the bow. This ceremony is sometimes observed when there are several competitors or candidates for the royal dignity; and there are divers instances of the like royal contentions to be met with amongst the ancient inhabitants of Europe and Asia.

with this ceremonious act, in order to give the people a specimen of strength and uncommon abilities. There are so many instances that may be produced from the ancients, to demonstrate that such as were appointed to be sovereigns and rulers over the people, were by them required to have a larger share of strength of body, as well as sagacity and penetration; than the generality of mankind, that it would be needless, if not impertinent, to quote them. We shall content ourselves therefore with extracting one shining example from the annals of France, to prove that the French gave into the same notion, and expected to find in their princes the very same accomplishments. Pepin the Short, perceiving himself the object of contempt amongst a particular set of his courtiers, who, on account of his figure, which was both thick and low, entertained but a mean idea of his personal abilities, invited them, by way of amusement, to see a fair battle between a bull and a lion. As soon as he observed that the latter had got the mastery of the former, and was ready to devour him, "Now, gentlemen, says he, who amongst you all has courage enough to interpose between these bloody combatants? Who of you all dare rescue the bull, and kill the lion?" Not one of the numerous spectators would venture to undertake so dangerous an enterprise; whereupon the king instantly leaped into the arena, drew his sabre, and at one blow severed the lion's head from his shoulders. Returning without the least emotion or concern to his seat, he gave those who had entertained but a mean opinion of him to understand in a jocular way, that though David was low of stature, yet he demolished the great Goliath; and that though Alexander was but a little man, he performed more heroic actions than all his tallest officers and commanders put together. David, though he met with the like contemptible treatment from Saul on the very same occasion, was, notwithstanding, remarkable for his strength, and was numbered amongst the valiant men of Israel. He says himself in one of his psalms, that by the strength of his arm he broke a steel bow asunder. Mr. Le Clerc, indeed, in his annotations, seems to intimate, that this expression is only a poetical hyperbole; yet there are other commentators, in all probability, to be met with, who give this passage quite another gloss, who look upon it as real fact, and a public testimony which David was willing to give the people of his extraordinary abilities.

When the Quiteve understands there are several rivals, and that his title is precarious, he must make all the interest he is capable with the wives of the late monarch; for he alone, whom they admit into the royal palace, is his true and lawful successor.—To get possession by force, would be of no manner of service; for all acts of violence, in that case, are repugnant to the laws of the land. The competitor, whoever he be, forfeits all his right and title to the crown, that is guilty of such rash proceedings. The best method therefore that he can take to maintain his claim, is to make his court to, and ingratiate himself as much as possible in the interest and favour of the ladies before mentioned.

We have already observed, that a considerable number of the king's wives are their own voluntary executioners the moment he expires. There is also, we are assured, a numerous retinue of their grandees selected to attend him, under pretence that he has occasion for their service in the other world; and the successor, for the generality, makes a shrewd choice of such as he has just apprehensions would be factious and disaffected to his government. Formerly the king himself, they say, was not exempt from that barbarous and inhuman law, whereby it was enacted, that all such as were afflicted with any incurable distempers, should hasten their death by violent means. In that case their kings themselves submitted to their fate, as soon as they had nominated and appointed a person whom they best approved of to succeed them. Any conspicuous deformity, crosses, misfortunes, adversity, or, in short, the loss of two of their fore-teeth, obliged them to the like voluntary submission. A king, say they, should have no natural imperfections. If it is his misfortune, had not he much better quit the world with disdain, and fly to another, where he will be for ever free from all infirmities?

In process of time, however, their monarchs grew more in love with life, and protested against such false principles, how heroic soever they might seem to be at first view. One of them preferring the certain enjoyment of this life before the hopes of absolute perfection in the next, caused a proclamation to be issued out, that though he had the misfortune to lose one of his teeth, he was determined to live for the good of his subjects, and wait with patience for the day of his dissolution. Several particular days are instituted and appointed by this prince for the royal diversion of hunting, on which alone the lion is allowed to be run down; which presumption is at all other times looked upon as a capital offence, because the Quitese is dignified and distinguished by the honourable appellation of the Grand Lion.

These people never engage in any affair of importance, till they have first consulted whether they shall meet with success, by lot, with a kind of dice, or by some mystic lines or characters traced out upon the ground. Notwithstanding sorcery is prohibited on pain of death, or at least on the confiscation of their wives, children, and liberty itself, yet they have a strong propensity that way. Adultery and theft are subject to the same penalties as the practice of magic.

When the king has any negotiations to transact with his neighbours, he nominates and appoints four ambassadors for that particular service. The first only represents his sacred person, and must be treated with the same dignity and respect as his majesty himself; the second is called the king's Mouth, and it is his peculiar province to declare the purport of his commission; the third is the king's Eye, whose business is to inspect, and pry into all that passes; the fourth and last is the king's Ear. He is obliged to listen with the utmost attention to all that is said on one side and on the other, and to make an impartial report thereof to his royal master.

In this account of these people, are so many instances of the dreadful depravity of human nature, that we are frequently lost in amazement, and were they not attested by the most respectable authority, we could not give any credit to them, but to doubt of them after such evidence, would be an equal instance of madness, as if we were to assert that the Roman Catholic religion is not professed in Italy. Unworthy notions of the Divine Being, imaginations of his corporeal existence, lead to barbarity in practice; for whenever we consider God as holy, pure, just, merciful, and good; when we consider him as infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, we are led to consider what sort of service is due to him, what he expects from us the most acceptable, and which will civilize our manners here, while it prepares us for everlasting happiness. But what can be said of those poor creatures who know no better, who are left to their own wild imaginations, and even think worse of the objects of their worship than they possibly can of themselves. As we are commanded to pray for all mankind, so we should never forget these benighted creatures in our addresses to the throne of grace. God approves of his creatures wishing for the happiness of each other, and when in that instance we discharge our duty, we are to rest satisfied, leaving the event to divine wisdom.

All that we can learn of these people is, that they are idolaters. As to their nuptial rites and ceremonies, they are much the same as their neighbours; the following circumstance excepted, which is very singular and remarkable. The bridegroom procures a friend to carry him upon his back to the place appointed for the solemnization of his marriage, and this friendly service must be done at one stretch; for if he rests, it is looked upon as an impropitious omen, and the wedding must be deferred till another opportunity. Sometimes the match is entirely broke off without any further ceremony on the like unhappy disaster.

As to their funeral solemnities, they as well as all those of whom we have been before speaking, furnish their dead with a variety of provisions, and they erect two stones, one at the head and the other at the foot of the grave, and rub them with sandal. They are mightily addicted to dreams; and although the credulity of those ignorant people is for the generality imposed upon, yet they cannot be persuaded by any means to deviate from this their favourite superstition; but there is no occasion to travel as far as Sofola to find out people of the same stamp and disposition.

Some particular Cafres, who reside in these parts convey their dead into a cavern, which abounds with a vast number of crocodiles, in order that the souls of the deceased may enter into these animals, and purify themselves by that means. They have such a peculiar veneration for these crocodiles, that they leave proper provisions for them at the mouth of their dens, which are looked upon as holy ground. We have reduced this article into as small a compass as possibly we could to avoid tautologies, and numberless absurdities, which a long detail thereof would inevitably lead us into. It is no difficult task to make a collection of the numerous contradictions which are to be met with in the accounts of travellers on this topic; but it requires a world of judgment to distinguish what is true from what is false.

Indeed these people are not numerous, and in most of their religious ceremonies, they differ but little from the Hottentots, and some other African nations, whose religions we have already given an account of. The English gentlemen, who were sent over by his present majesty a few years ago, to collect plants near the Cape of Good Hope, were informed by the Dutch clergymen, who attended them during an eight day's excursion they made up the country, that these people were amongst the most barbarous of all the Hottentots, and so unsocial, that they had little or no connections with the rest of the nations around them; but an old Hottentot, who had embraced the Christian religion, assured them, that they buried alive all those aged persons who were unable to procure themselves a subsistence. This may serve to shew, that they are destitute of bowels and compassion; and what is still more, they imagine that such barbarous actions are acceptable to the idols, or rather the devils whom they worship. This indeed has less or more been the effect of idolatry in all ages and nations, which is a striking evidence that politeness, humanity, benevolence, and all other social virtues can only be found where the human mind is enlarged with true knowledge, and adorned with real piety. Every thing else leads to barbarity, and even adds to the deformity of that nature which is already so much corrupted.

Religion of the people who live on the coasts of Quilimanca, Loranga, Quiungo, and as far as Cuna, towards the borders of Sofola.

Those who reside near the first river, are some part of the ancient Troglodytes. Some of these people have no idols; and if they have, there are several of them, we are informed, that worship but one God, and acknowledge his Divine Providence, his goodness, and the immortality of the soul, and they believe, also, the existence of evil spirits.—But all this notwithstanding, does not prevent them from blaspheming the Deity, if their affairs run counter, and give them the least provocation. They observe some particular festivals and days of abstinence with extraordinary strictness; but the next day they always make themselves amends by excessive drinking. They debauch themselves with the heady liquor of maize, and a kind of sweet wine, made from their own country fruit. Sombaza is inhabited by Mahometans and idolators, and there is so trivial a difference between the religion of these people, and the others before mentioned, that it is not worth our observation. The king is, as it were, a kind of visible god, who assumes to himself an absolute power here on earth, and they carry fire before him when he takes the field.

The people of Melinda testify an unexampled veneration and respect for their sovereign, and they carry him on their shoulders, and prostrate themselves before his litter, without preseming so far as to look him in the face. Several officers, plentifully provided with the most exquisite perfumes, march before him; and for fear he should meet with any disaster upon the road, the moment he sets out from his royal palace, they cut open a young hind, the intrails whereof their idolatrous priests very curiously examine, in order to find the good or ill success of this expedition. The people rend the air with loud acclamations of joy, and their most beautiful women present themselves before his Moorish majesty, some singing his eulogiums, and others offering up, or burning their perfumes before him.—When they are upon any important debate, they always take care to cut open a hind, and make the curious inspection before mentioned. His majesty is obliged to walk three times successively over the hind, and the priest after such incision, practises several magical experiments, in order to ascertain the success. These people are, for the generality, addicted to the practice of magic, which principally consisting in some certain charms, and being accompanied with a dance which is very tiresome and fatiguing, affects at least one of the company then present, who, in this situation, discovers the secret they want to have revealed.

They indulge themselves in a plurality of wives, and on the wedding-day, two or three female neighbours, or relations of the bridegroom, march out at the head of a numerous train, and betimes in the morning, attend at the door of the bride's habitation, and there dance and sing, till the whole company men and women, have made the usual marriage presents, which principally consist in maize and flour. Before the testimonies of their respect are paid, the female dancers are presented with a handful of maize, and have their left eye and cheek dusted over with flour. The day concludes with joy and rejoicing, and in the evening, the bridegroom conducts his partner to his own house, which closes the ceremony. The young maidens, on the borders of Quizungo, when they are on the point of marriage, depart from their habitations, and repair into some barren field, there to bemoan themselves for the space of an hour on the prospect of resigning their virgin honours. This ceremony is observed in the day-time before a great number of friends and relations, who come to visit them on this occasion. At night they return home, and as soon as ever the new moon appears, the marriage feast begins, and the next morning the damsel is delivered to her lover, who takes her to his warm embraces without any further ceremony.

Their mourning is accompanied with long lamentations, and with weeping and wailing as loud as ever they can stretch their throats. They cover their dead, or rather wrap them up in black swaddling cloths. They bury them with their fire-arms, their equipage, and all other proper accommodations for their journey. The mat on which the person deceased lay, the chair or stool on which he sat, and the utensils or implements of furniture which he made use of in his life-time, nay, his very habitation are all burnt immediately after his interment. The loss however, as is presumed, does not amount to any considerable value; for these people are not ambitious of erecting any pompous and magnificent fabrics. The same customs are observed by the major part of the inhabitants of this coast, and it is a fundamental article with them, that the living must not touch the dead, nor any thing belonging to them, for such action would be an immediate pollution; and this unfortunate person must not re-enter his house, nor have any intercourse or familiar converse with his countrymen, till he has first washed and purified himself. The ashes of every thing burnt about the dead are collected together, and thrown into their graves with them, and their mourning continues two hours a day for eight days together. However, about midnight, one of the company sets the tune to their lamentations, and the whole assembly strike up immediately in the same melancholy key. In the morning they visit the grave, in order to supply the deceased with proper provisions. Those who undertake this friendly office dust their left eye and cheek with flour, in the same manner as at their nuptial ceremonies. They mutter some certain words over the graves of their dead; but whether they pray to them for success in their harvest, or requests to have them in remembrance, we are at a loss to determine, for they never wash their faces till the time of their mourning is expired.

On the coast of Melinda, and the parts adjacent, the young men, nay, the boys of seven or eight years of age, wear about six or seven pound weight of clay round their heads, till they have given some visible proof of their valour in war, or in single combat, and they are obliged to produce some tokens of their victory, and some effects of their neighbours. They are under the same indispensable obligation, as the natives of Mono Motapa, to produce some undeniable testimony of their conquest and courage. Such a certificate must be had; and, doubtless, such peremptory injunction, and the scandal those lie under, who are indolent and inactive, and neglect the duty incumbent on them, are irresistible motives to the frequent practice of bold and heroic actions.

We shall conclude with this cursory observation, that there are a set of notorious, despicable fellows, between Angola, and Mono Motapa, who are addicted to Sodomitical practices, and are a scandal to their sex; by gratifying the inordinate lusts and passions of their brutal companions. These effeminate debauchees, in all probability, are species of the Floridan Hermaphrodites.

Religion of the Ethiopians and the Gauls.

Notwithstanding they live under a Christian government, there are numberless idolators in this extensive empire. They are vagabonds and barbarians says Ludolphus, who profess no religion, are under no legal restrictions, nor subservient to any king.— They are, in short, a kind of Troglodytes, and their language is very confused, rough, and unpollished. These barbarous people are reckoned amongst the number of the Cafres; but besides these, there are the Agawas, who inhabit the highlands of Goiam, the Gonguas, the Gafates, the Gauls, who in all probability, are the Gnaguas, or Jages, whom we have already described, and several others too tedious to enumerate. We shall begin with the Gauls.

They have no idols, no outward form of divine worship; at least, no customs, wherein there are any visible prints, or footsteps of religion. They make no distinctions between the heavens, and the Supreme Being, the creator and preserver of all things. Though it is he, as they say, who comprises all things within his own infinite immensity, yet they pay him no manner of adoration. However, they are, we are informed, very tractable, and might with ease be made proselytes to the Christian faith. The natives of Zender worship idols, or devils, and are extremely addicted to the practice and study of the black art; as to the others, we have nothing to offer concerning them that is worth the reader's attention.

The Gauls observe the ceremony of circumcision, and indulge themselves in a plurality of wives.— Their young men are not permitted to cut off their hair, until they have signalized their courage in some warlike expedition, in the death of an enemy, or in the chase, by hunting down and killing some savage monster. It is not the heads of their enemies that they produce as testimonials of their valour, but some other very remarkable member, which the reader will readily discover, when he is informed, that they must give ocular demonstration of the slain person's sex. These honourable and distinguishing marks of their prowess are hung up as trophies, at the head of their camp. Once in eight years they elect a new general or commander, who is obliged to notify his accession to the government, by an irruption on some of the Ethiopian territories.

The natives of Zender hunt all round their woods; in order to find out a king, or ruler over them, amongst the savage beasts, who by the prevailing influence of his incantations allures them to him, as Orpheus did of old, by the melody of his music.— None but the grandees, or nobility of the kingdom, have any right or title to elect a prince after the death of his predecessor. In order to find out his haunts in the forest, they take a bird of the eagle kind for their guide, who by his cries discovers the mighty hero that is to be their sovereign; and there have been people much more polished and refined, who have relied on as precarious guides for the just object of their choice. Darius, king of Persia, the first of that name, had the good fortune to be elected king, for no other reason but that his horse neighed before any of those belonging to his rivals, and competitors for the crown, who had unanimously agreed after the death of Smerdis the impostor, that he whose horse neighed first, should be elected king without further ceremony. But to return to the king of Zender.

That innate modesty, or rather that established rule amongst these savages, which induces him to conceal himself, obliges him to oppose those who are ambitious of electing him; and he carries the ceremony so far, as to fight with and wound them, if possibly he can. For which reason the electors are obliged to treat him roughly, to provoke and torment him, in order to bring him to compliance, and accept of the crown; but he must not suffer himself to receive the least wound from any of his importunate electors; for in that case, he is looked upon as altogether unworthy of that high dignity; nay, his subjects, we are informed, are permitted to murder him in case he happens to be wounded in this affected opposition and resistance. But be that as it will, even after he has submitted to his electors, he is once more subject to the insults of those who meet him on the road, and who endeavour by force to mount him on their shoulders, ambitious of the honour of conducting him to his throne. This regal seat, we may easily imagine, is none of the most pompous and magnificent; nor is his palace any thing more than a thatched house, or at best, than a common tent or pavilion.

The islanders of Socotora or Beduins, copy after, and are successors or descendants of the Troglodytes; for like them, they reside in caverns, and hollow rocks. There are some authors who have attempted to palm them upon us for the converts of St. Thomas. However, they have no knowledge, we are credibly informed either of Jesus Christ, or of the Christian religion, though it is true, indeed, they seem to pay an extraordinary veneration to the cross, and deposit it on their altars.

They worship the moon as the parent and cause of all things; and when they have been afflicted with a long series of dry weather, they make their earnest applications to her for a supply of water, in the following extraordinary manner. They make choice of one of the assembly, whom they inclose and shut up, as it were, in a kind of circumvallation, from whence he must not presume to stir, on pain of death. This devotee thus confined, is obliged to make his humblest addresses to the moon for ten days together, to implore the blessing of her refreshing showers. If it be matter of fact, that they cut off the hands of such devotee, in case, at the expiration of the term before mentioned, the moon should reject his prayers, and withhold her rain, we may with ease conceive, that the zeal of this devotee is as warm and conspicuous, as that of any other professors whomsoever, who, on the like emergent occasions, implore the assistance and mediation of the celestial beings, with the most surprising austerities, and under the galling yoke of the most barbarous and inhuman discipline: But we are not sufficiently apprised of all the circumstances that attend this extravagant and cruel ceremony, to be able to discourse upon it, without being liable to mistakes.

At some particular seasons, and before some remarkable fasts, the observance whereof is very strictly enjoined, the elders, or principals of the island assemble themselves together, and offer up an hundred bucks, or goats, as a public sacrifice; and this is a kind of hecatomb. To these superstitious rites they add several Christian ceremonies; such as the celebration of Christmas, which they keep holy threescore days successively, by the observance of a kind of fast or religious abstinence from milk, butter fish and flesh. In short, they are so rigid and severe, that should any one unfortunately be discovered to neglect and break this ordinance, the penalty for the first offence, would be the loss of two fingers from his right hand; for the second his hand itself; and for the third his arm.

They have a number of Moquamos, a term they distinguish their temples by; and these Moquamos are very small and low. They have three little doors, and in order to enter any of them, a person must be obliged to stoop almost to the ground. In each of these chapels stands an altar, on which are deposited a cross, and several sticks formed like flower-de-luces, which have something of the resemblance likewise of the cross. Every chapel has its peculiar head, principal, or priest, called Hodamo, who is annually chosen, and the signatures or marks of his function are a staff and a cross which he must not presume to give away on any pretence whatsoever, or suffer any person so much as to touch it, on pain of loosing one of his hands. The usual time set apart for divine service in these chapels is, when the moon sets or when she rises; and the visible marks, or external testimonies of their devotions are, for instance, the striking three times a day, and thrice every night, a stated number of blows on a long staff, with a shorter one; and afterwards the taking three tours all round the chapel, and turning themselves thrice round at every tour.—This ceremony is accompanied with an oblation of some odoriferous wood, put in an iron bason, that hangs by three chains over a large fire. After that, the altar is incensed three times, and the doors of the temple as many; and the devotees make the most solemn vows, and supplications to the moon, with exalted voices, not only within, but all round the yard or sacred inclosure. They implore her protection, and beg that she would vouchsafe to confine her favours to them alone. During this part of their divine service, the Hodamo sets on the altar a lighted taper made of butter, the use of all other fat being prohibited; and they always take particular care to have a vessel in the chapel full of butter. But not for that purpose only; for they besmeer their crosses, and staves, which they make use of in their religious ceremonies, with this favourite grease.

On some certain days of the year they make a solemn procession round the temple, at which public times they constitute one of their principals, or chief men in their country, to carry the most cumbersome sacred staff. After the procession is over, they cut his fingers off, and put a smaller staff into his hand, which, by virtue of some mystic marks, serves him as a huckler and defence from all manner of insults; not to mention those singular honours which are paid him on account of his being possessed of such a sacred implement; and that odour of sanctity which the opportunity of carrying it in procession confers upon him. The reader no doubt very clearly discerns, by the account we have here given, what a monstrous medley there is of Mahometanism, Christianity, and Paganism in this religion. They have also borrow'd, as some authors pretend, several of their rites and ceremonies from the Nestorians.

After the relation of so extravagant a religion, the reader may well expect to hear of a variety of idle and ridiculous customs. They marry as many wives as their circumstances will permit them to maintain, and put them away again at pleasure; that is, they dismiss them without the least formality whatsoever. They exchange also their partners, and take in others for the time limited and agreed on; perhaps till absence has whetted palled appetites.—But nothing surely can be more singular and remarkable than the method a father takes to assign or turn over his child to his friend or acquaintance. When he is disposed to discharge himself of such an incumbrance, he nominates this or that person to be his guardian; and such father, by adoption, is obliged to maintain and bring the boy up as if he was his own. Children thus transferred, are called the sons of fire and smoke; because these poor barbarous creatures, observing that the procreation of children is the natural result of that union to which the indulgence of their sensual appetites alone inclines them, determine, after they have gratified their passions, to transfer and make over the fruits of their labour to some other person; and for that purpose, he who is so disposed, kindles a large fire in his cavern, and throws some particular green wood upon it. As soon as it begins to rise, he runs out of his cottage or cave, and proclaims, as loud as he cau stretch his throat, that the child with which his wife is pregnant, is the right and property of such a neighbour. He accordingly brings up the child thus presented to him, and pays the like compliment to some other acquaintance.

There is no manner of difference, in the opinion of these islanders, between a dying person and one actually deceased. For which reason, such as lie at the point of death are carried directly to their graves; and their nearest and dearest relations perform this last friendly office for them; and those who are thus expiring, having, as we reasonably suppose, shewn the like indulgence to others, never murmur at such treatment, or think it any ways cruel or unjust. As soon as they perceive their dissolution drawing nigh, they call their relations round about them, in order to exhort them not to renounce the religion of their forefathers; nor to have any familiar intercourse or correspondence with strangers, and to avenge them of their enemies. Nay, sometimes the person thus giving up the ghost, produces a long list of those who have injured him, with the particular causes of his just resentment.— Having thus vented his spleen, he departs this life with all the calmness and serenity imaginable. This is generally the lot of those who are ignorant, and incapable of serious reflection, and they sink into the arms of death without the least reluctance or concern, when life becomes an incumbrance. And so do all such as are afflicted with any incurable distemper, plunged in inextricable difficulties, or harassed with implacable persecutions.

They observe the ceremony of circumcision, and if any one should reside amongst them that has the misfortune not to be circumcised, he would have his hand cut off as soon as he was discovered; and his own wife, on such an occasion, would make no scruple to betray him. An uncircumcised person must not presume to enter into any of their moquamos, or temples; and as to the perpetration of any particular crimes, the delinquents are punished by their hadomas, according to the nature and enormity of the offence. A thief, though pursued, is secure if he has the good fortune to fly for refuge into the moquamo, and find there upon the spot some friend who is willing to be his guardian and protector; such person is looked upon as godfather to, or surety for the criminal. But if no such friend appears in the temple, he is dragged away from his asylum, and his hand is immediately cut off. The greatest act of complaisance that is practised among these Beduins, is to kiss the shoulder of the person whom they intend to honour, and the same ceremony is observed in several provinces of Abyssinia.

To what we have already remarked, we beg leave to add, that, if we may rely on the veracity of some missionary Jesuits, there is abundance of Judaism comprised in the religion of these people. These fathers, however, ought to have descended to particulars; for there are no Jewish rites and ceremonies, as we can find, in vogue with the Beduins, but that of circumcision. These Jesuits, moreover, add in their narration, that the Beduins are strictly enjoined not so much as to touch or taste any hens, or other fowl, of what species or kind soever.— Another relation assures us, that they obey the evangelical law; that St. Thomas converted them to the Christian faith; that they are very tractable, and fond of being instructed; and that they are well affected to, and have a peculiar regard for, the Catholic religion, and the ceremonies of the Romish church. This relation adds also, that these islanders have a peculiar veneration for the cross, that all of them in general wear it about their necks, and in conclusion, that they make use of the Chaldee language in their divine service.

It is surprising that the Jesuits should so far attempt to impose upon us, as to make those who have no better information believe, that professed heathens are well affected to Christianity. The imposition might indeed have been still carried on, had it not been for the most exact accounts that have been brought us, both by English and French navigators. That there were once churches in many of those parts cannot be doubted, but that is no reason why there should be any remains of Christianity left, it being inconsistent with the people's being gross Pagans. We are assured, that the Christian religion was in the early ages after, or during the times of the apostles, propagated in many countries where paganism now prevails; but whenever men abuse the benefits conferred upon them, and slight the offers of grace and mercy, God may, in his infinite wisdom and justice, remove the light of the gospel from among them, and suffer heathen darkness to overshadow them.

It is the unhappy condition of fallen nature, never to know the value of any thing till deprived of it, and this is not confined to religion alone, it is to be met with under all circumstances of life, whether the persons are high or low, rich or poor. Thus the voluptuous person does not know the benefit of health, till by a continual round of debauchery, he has rendered himself incapable of enjoying it. He may indeed wish for the return of that which he little regarded while he had it in possession, but in vain does he even wish for it for his emaciated body mocks the power of medicine, and he sinks down on a sick bed, a poor, helpless creature, without any person being able to administer to his comfort.

In the same manner, those who have been favoured with the gospel, and make an improper use of such an inestimable blessing, may probably wish for them when taken from them. But God in his infinite wisdom knows, that were they to receive it again, they would turn like the dog to his vomit, and like the sow to her wallowing in the mire.—There is no doubt but God has times and seasons fixed when he will look down in compassion on the heathen nations, and once more visit them with the light of the gospel. But these times being unknown to us, we should rest satisfied that every thing will be conducted by unerring wisdom. The Jesuits, however, should never have amused us with idle tales, because nothing can appear more beautiful than the truth, when told in its primitive simplicity.

Religion of the islanders of Madagascar.

We have already taken notice, that there were once Christians in this island, and that there are still some faint remains of that religion to be found. The Christian religion, like a refreshing shower, spreads its influence far and wide; men flocked under its shelter; the darkness that had long clouded the human mind was removed; light sprung up in its room, and those who were before without God in the world, became the willing captives to the preaching of the gospel. But this is too melancholy a subject to dwell on, and therefore we shall proceed to give the best and most authentic account of these islanders that could be procured, and although we do not dwell on the marvellous, yet we shall adhere to the truth.

Although they are all Pagans, there are, notwithstanding, the prints or footsteps of Mahometanism and Judaism to be visibly discerned amongst them. They acknowledge one God the creator of all things, and they honour and revere him, and speak of him with the profoundest veneration and respect.—Though they have no idols or temples, yet they offer up sacrifices to the Supreme Being. However to ingratiate themselves into the favour of the devil, they compliment him with the first morsel of their victuals; and so make him a partner with the Deity. From whence it is evident, that these islanders acknowledge two principles, the one good and the other evil. This notion was transmitted to them by the natives of the continent, who in all probability, had it from the inhabitants of Asia. But be that as it will, those of Madagascar acknowledge that God created the heavens, the earth, the spirits, and all living creatures, and according to their account, there are seven heavens. They are of opinion, that God is the cause of all good; and the devil, on the other hand, the author of all the misfortunes that attend mankind. For which reason they fear him, make their oblations to him, and even with respect to their sacrifices, give him the preference before the Deity. It is a principle, as we have before observed, which we find for the generality true, that mankind are not so vigorous in their pursuit after that which is good, as they are cautious how to avoid that which is evil.

Dian-Manauh is also the object of their divine worship. He is the god, or vice-deity of riches, and by consequence bears a very near affinity to the Plutus of the ancients. Gold is the symbol or hieroglyphic of this divinity. Upon seeing it, they take it directly in their hands, and hold it above their heads, with all the veneration and respect imaginable, and then salute it. Nay, there are several of them, who, conscious of having committed some particular sin, dip a piece of gold in a cup full of water, and then drink it up, imagining, that by such religious act, their sin is pardoned and forgiven.

They are of opinion, that there are divers orders of the genii, or spirits; that some of them govern and direct the motion of the heavens, stars, and planets; that others have dominion over the air, the meteors, the sea, and all mankind. The doctrine relating to the genii was maintained and supported by all the ancients. We have already shewed, that it is a received notion this day amongst the idolatrous nations, even amongst those of the north of Europe, and those of the new world.

Besides these genii, they admit of another order of spirits, who are as invisible as the former, but assume a body whenever they think proper, and appear to those whom they love and respect. These spirits are both male and female: they intermarry, have children, and stand in need of the necessary supports of life, and yet partake not of the infirmities of our nature. However, they die, and are punished or rewarded after their decease, according to their good or bad conduct in this life. These spirits foretel future events, and perform abundance of surprising things, which bear a very near resemblance to what our ancient writers of romances ascribe to the fairies. They imagine, likewise, that there are hobgoblins, phantoms and ghosts. They stand in great awe of the Saccare, that is, the devil, and all the other evil spirits, which they distinguish under different denominations. The Saccare, if we may believe what they assert, appears to them in the form of a fiery dragon, and frequently enters into, and possesses them for fifteen days together. In order to deliver themselves out of his clutches, or at least to relieve them under their misfortunes, they take a javelin, or long spear in their hands, and dance and caper about, wreathing their bodies into a thousand antic and ridiculous postures. All the whole town dance to the beat of drum, round about such persons as are so possessed, observing the same gesticulations as they do, under pretence of affording them, by that means some comfort and consolation.

They have some knowledge of the fall of man, the terrestrial paradise, and the flood; but their ideas thereof are clouded and obscured by a multitude of ridiculous fables. The same misfortunes attend them with respect to some other ideas, which their ancestors might probably have borrowed from the true religion; but by insensible degrees have been most shamefully corrupted. They are of opinion, that the devil is the author of sin, and the corruption of human nature. Their faith, as to this particular article, is comprised in a kind of apologue, the sense and meaning whereof is, that the devil had seven children, who committed so many outrages upon earth, that mankind implored the Deity to deliver them from this perverse and wicked generation. God heard their supplications, and these seven children established seven capital sins in the world: theft, licentiousness, lying, gluttony, murder, pride and laziness.

They have their feasts and fasts, which are solemnized without any regularity, sometimes at one time and sometimes at another, as occasion offers. They meet together with their whole family very early in the morning, and then regale themselves with a small quantity of rice, and after that fast till midnight. In this interval they employ themselves in rehearsing and singing the heroic achievements of their ancestors. At midnight they refresh themselves and pay their respects to the devil and the Deity.— They then wash, but more particularly their feet, and chew betel; after which, they lay themselves under some particular vows and obligations, with relation to some particular circumstances, which are of the utmost importance to themselves. One thing which is the most remarkable in their feasts and fasts, is, that they sacrifice an ox, and sprinkle the whole assembly with its blood, and then make their children lay their hands upon it, imagining that such ceremony will preserve them the ensuing year from all distempers. The sacrificator cuts the victim all in pieces, and throws the first on his right hand, saying, this is the devil's portion; after this, he takes another piece, and throws it on his left hand, saying, This is devoted to the service of the Deity; and to conclude, they take a small quantity of the hair of the victim, and tie it round their necks, pronouncing at the same time some mysterious words three times successively.

It seems, likewise, according to the account of the author before quoted, that these islanders practise a kind of libation, in honour of God and the devil, before they drink; and that they offer up their sacrifices of thanksgiving on their prospect of a plentiful harvest. Their rice being ready to be gathered in, they sacrifice a black cow, and throw one part of it into the field, pronouncing at the same time a short form of thanksgiving, and during the continuance of these festival days, they never shed any human blood; but in case any person commits a crime that merits death, he is sentenced to be drowned. In order to have the honour of sacrificing any of their victims, they are obliged to learn a certain prayer, and pronounce some particular words over the instrument, lifting up their eyes at the same time to heaven, which is a lively expression of the intent of the sacrificator. They are likewise so scrupulous in this particular, that they would rather die with hunger, than partake of any beast whatever, slaughtered by a Christian.

They moreover offer up sacrifices when they take possession of any new house, when they are any way indisposed, when they marry, when their wives lye-in, and when any of their friends and acquaintance are buried. Before they depart this life, they make a thorough confession of their sins. Such persons as are advanced in years, and draw near the time of their dissolution, make so general a confession, that they take particular care to mention each individual sin one after another. After this, they order a sacrifice to be made of several oxen, for the expiation of all their transgressions; and all this is accompanied with a solemn benediction on their whole family, and an exhortation, as is customary with old people, and men just dropping into their graves, to lead better lives than they have done before. The confused and imperfect idea which they entertain of Noah, Abraham and Moses; and of David and Jesus Christ; their circumcision, observance of the sabbath, their fast and confession, and their scruples, which we have already mentioned, are all incontestible demonstrations that their religion is a corruption of Christianity and Judaism, intermingled with Mahometanism, idolatry and superstition.

They expose such children as happen to be born on Tuesday, Thursday, or Saturday, or in the month of April, or in their Lent; the eighth day of the moon; or in short, in any hour that is overruled by any malignant planet. The ceremony of their circumcision is for the generality performed in the month of May, in the presence of the friends and relations of those who are to be circumcised, and a bull is the usual fee for every infant so circumcised. Several days preceding this ceremony, the vigils only excepted, are spent in a variety of amusements, and concluded for the generality, in riot and excess; for it is looked upon as an honour to be drunk on such occasions. The circumciser himself makes one among them in these public diversions, but the vigil of the festival is not attended with such intemperance and excess. Fathers and mothers suspend the legal pleasures of the marriage-bed, and prepare themselves for the celebration of this ceremony with their children. The mothers lie by them in the lapa, which is a hut, or cottage, which their relations erect, and consecrate by the performance of some particular ceremonies therein, a month before the intended day of circumcision. The prohibition of love enjoyments does not extend to the relations only of such as are to be circumcised; but all maids or wives, married men or bachelors, who are conscious of having indulged themselves in such sensual pleasures, must not presume to draw near to, or be present at this holy ordinance; for these people imagine, that should any person so defiled profane that religious ceremony, the blood of the prepuses of such as should be circumcised would never stop, and that certain death would be the fatal consequence of such a presumption. Another superstitious custom of theirs is never to wear any thing red about them on these solemn occasions.

On the day appointed for the circumcision, all those who are to be present at the operation, bathe themselves betimes in the morning, and turning themselves towards the east, beating their drums and sounding their country cornets, pronounce some particular form of words, the sense and signification whereof we are at a loss to determine. The celebrant or operator, makes a short prayer, adapted to the solemnity of the day, and the whole congregation being assembled together at the lapa, about ten in the morning, the drums begin to beat to give notice of the approaching ceremony; and the circumciser having a skein of white cotton thread twined about his waist, and another about his left arm to wipe his instrument clean with, approaches the children. Thereupon, each father takes his own child into his arms, and altogether make a kind of procession round the lapa, going in at the west door and coming out at the east. After this they walk again in procession before the oxen, that are appropriated for the sacrifice on this solemn occasion, and are laid on the ground with their four feet bound fast together. Each infant, in the next place, touches the right horn of every beast with his left hand, and sits down a moment or two on the backs of these victims. After these processions are over, the circumciser cuts off the childrens' fore-skins, and the uncle, or nearest relation of each respective child, takes the prepuse and swallows it down in the yolk of an egg. This relation stands in the capacity, as it were, of godfather to the child, but the foreskins, however, of such as have no relations, are thrown upon the ground. The circumciser having thus performed his office, the sacrificator cuts the throats of as many cocks as there are children circumcised, and lets the blood of the fowls trickle down on the mutilated part,

Such women as draw near the time of their travail, confess all the sins they have been guilty of during their pregnancy, to some female confidant; and moreover our author assures us, invoke the virgin Mary, in hopes that she will lend her aid and assistance at a time of need, and contribute towards her safe and speedy deliverance. They are obliged to watch the proper times and seasons for erecting their houses, cutting timber, covering their roofs; and when the building is finished, they wait for the moon, and some propitious hour for the consecration, or the dedication of it, which they call Missavatsi. The proprietor invites all his friends to come and grace the ceremony with their presence, and each of them makes him some present or another, more or less valuable in proportion to his circumstances. They take three formal tours all round the tenement, and the whole company, after such procession, enter into the house, congratulate the proprietor on this joyful occasion, and wish him all the success and happiness in it that he can wish for, or desire. This ceremony is accompanied with the oblation of one or more heifers, the flesh whereof is distributed amongst the company, and intended as a friendly entertainment.

These islanders are all polygamists, and what is very singular and remarkable, is, to have a plurality of wives is expressed in their language by a term which signifies to create enemies; because several wives of the same husband cannot have a natural love and affection for one another, and this is no doubt as demonstrable an axiom as any in all Euclid. Moreover, their wives, we are informed, act without any thought or discretion before, as well as after marriage; for they exceed the bounds of all such as would conceal their vices, and have not the least regard to decency or good manners. The repeated lewd practices of a lascivious woman with one or more young fellows, are looked upon only as so many specimens of their dexterity and address; and in short they will never marry a man till they have divers undeniable proofs of his strength and manhood, withall to be well assured, that he will never degenerate or grow indolent, but be the same man to the very last.

Adultery is looked upon as a robbery, and fined and assessed as such; but no disgrace attends the payment of such amerciamient. The children of a wife that is brought to bed after she has been divorced from her first husband, are his property; at least if she does not return him his taque, that is, the purchase-money which he advanced on the day of marriage.

which they brought with them into the world, or through their vicious familiarity and converse with other men. But be that as it may, these half-men, these liberthans, whom they call Tsecats, act inconsistently with their sex, dress in women's apparel, and allure young fellows by artifices, endearments and presents, to their unnatural embraces.

We have already mentioned, more than once, divers instances of the like obscenity and uncleanness; for we cannot clothe it in softer terms, at least if we judge of it in the light it presents itself to us at first view. The only plea or excuse that can possibly be made for such a course of life, is that which those islanders have found out for it; who assured our author, that these Tsecats were a people who, from their infancy, had made a solemn vow out of love to the Deity, to continue in a state of celibacy all their lives; that women were the objects of their aversion; that they avoided, with the utmost precaution, all familiar converse with them; and that they were guilty of no immodesty in their caresses of those of their sex. This correspondence of theirs, in all probability, may be much of the same nature with the Athenosera, which father Fitau speaks of, and of which there are several instances to be produced from the ancients.

We have made mention but very cursorily, of the exposition of their children; a barbarous custom too much practised and tolerated amongst the ancients. The Ombiasses, who are the astrological physicians, and in all probability, the priests also of the natives of Madagascar, authorise and give a sanction to this irregular practise by their pretended knowledge and skill in casting the nativities of such children as are just come into the world, or even of such as are but in embryo, and just conceived, and this they do by their false predictions and observations of the planets, on such occasions. This barbarity however, is not, always without exception; for some parents, after they have thus exposed their children, engage their slaves or relations to bring them up; and in such case those children belong to their respective guardians. Others perform their fals for such children as are born under a malignant planet, and on that account have deserved exposition: that is, offer up their sacrifice for them of cocks, or some other living creature, by way of expiation. After this, they confine him for half a day within a hen-coop, in order to accomplish their purification, and free them from the malignity of some dangerous constellation, or the fatal influences of their unhappy star.

Without these necessary precautions, the child might be a parricide, a thief, and the most profligate and abandoned vagabond in nature.

Willful miscarriages, or abortions, are very common in this island; but how should we expect them otherwise amongst a people, who are so ignorant and unpolished; since such expedients are too often practised by the Christians themselves, who have much more light and knowledge of their duty than these barbarians? But such is the effect of the crime which reduces the female sex to this extremity; it expose them to the everlasting contempt of mankind, which is more shocking to loose women, than the loss of their virtue and integrity. We shall conclude with one more custom, as barbarous and inhuman as the former. When a woman dies in child-bed, they bury the new-born infant with its mother; for, say they, is it not much better the babe should die, than not to have a mother to nurse and bring it up.

In the first place, they wash their dead, and then dress them as agreeably as the circumstances of the person deceased, or of the relations who survive them will admit of. Their usual decorations are collars of coral, gold medals, and gold ear-rings. They furnish each of their dead with seven pagnes, that is, vestments made of cotton, which are worn from the waist downwards, that he may have a sufficient change of suits. After he is thus duly washed and adorned, they wrap him up in a large mat, in order to convey him to the grave: but before the performance of this last friendly office, all the relations, acquaintance, and slaves of the deceased, flock round about the corpse, to mourn over it in form, and as there is a large candle placed at his head and another at his feet, he may with propriety enough, be said to lie in state. Whilst those before-mentioned are drowned in tears, there are other persons present, who are employed in beating a kind of drum, to the sound whereof both the married women and maidens join in a solemn dance, and then take their turn to mourn over the deceased.— Their sighs and tears are mingled with his praises, and repeated lamentations for his loss. We must not omit making mention of the many questions which they ask him with respect to his decease; questions in fashion with divers other nations, which principally consist in enquiring of the deceased, whether he wanted the necessaries, and even the conveniences of life; in short, whether he was easy and contented or not, in his state and condition. These interrogatories are repeated till the evening, and then they slaughter several heifers, which are intended both as a sacrifice and a funeral entertainment.

The next day they put the corpse into a coffin, made of the stumps of two trees, dug hollow, and artfully joined together, and then carry it to the grave, which is made in a wooden hut, erected for that purpose, and dug six feet deep. There they inter the corpse with a sufficient quantity of provisions in a basket, some tobacco, a chafing dish, an earthen porringer, some pagnes, or changes of raiment, and several girlcs. When all the matters are thus far adjusted, they shut up the hut, and plant a large stone, about twelve or fifteen feet in breadth as well as height before the door; and then sacrifice some living creatures, and divide them into three equal parts or shares; one for the devil, another for the Deity, and the remainder for the deceased. It is customary to hang the heads of the slaughtered victims upon stakes, planted round this mausoleum, and for several days together after his interment his kinsfolk send him in plenty of provisions, pay their respects to him, nay, offer up divers oblations to him, and consult him about their own private affairs. In sickness or adversity they apply themselves to him by the mediation of an Ombiasse, who making a small breach or hole in the hut, conjures up the spirit of the deceased, and implores such assistance as he thinks he may reasonably require of him, by virtue of that intimacy and friendship which the deceased pretends he has contracted with the Supreme Being.

When a person of distinction dies at a considerable distance from his family, his head is cut off, and sent home to the town where he was born; but as for his corpse, it is interred in the place where he died, be it where it will. The men are shaved and go bare-headed on these melancholy occasions; but the women are allowed hats or caps.

Their physicians, whom our author calls Ombiasses, are astrologers, and, in all probability, also priests, soothsayers, and magicians; for all these qualifications centre in one man, amongst several idolatrous people both ancient and modern. The medicines which these Ombiasses make use of are principally decoctions, or broths made of physical herbs and roots; but besides these natural means, they make use of billets, or notes written in particular characters and hang them round their necks, or tie them to the girdles of the patients in order to charm and suspend their agonizing pains. They draw several figures, and make use of abundance of astrological projections, either to find out when the patient will recover, or know what medicines will prove the most effectual and convenient for him. To all this quackery, they add the consultations of some Aulis, of whom we shall presently give a farther account, and make use of some Talismans.

There are several orders of Ombiasses; but without entering into a detail of their hierarchy, as Flacourt calls it, we shall only observe, that in their different subordinations, they seem all to be subservient to one sovereign pontiff. They have public schools or seminaries in this island, where all such as are desirous of being numbered amongst the Ombiasses, or the priesthood, are instructed in all the arcana of their sacred profession. There are some of them who boast more particularly of their knowledge of, and judgment in the aspects of the stars, and influences of the planets. They have several dissertations on the efficacy and prevailing power of every individual day throughout the month.

The secret virtue of their notes or billets, which they prescribe as restoratives to their patients, consists in writing some mystic characters on a piece of paper, and afterwards washing off the ink. The patient is directed to drink the water with which such operation is performed; and if he is not restored immediately to his former state of health, it is wholly owing, they imagine, to his neglect of some formality required; so that the Ombiasse is secure, and never suffers in his reputation through an unexpected disappointment.

The Aulis bear a very near affinity to those airy beings which are generally called Familiar Spirits; and these Aulis are enclosed in little boxes, embellished with a variety of glass trinkets, and crocodiles' teeth. Some of them are made of wood, and fashioned like a man; and in each box they put a sufficient quantity of powder of some particular roots, mixed with fat and honey, which they replenish from time to time as occasion requires. They wear these Aulis at their girdles, and never venture to take a journey or voyage without them. They consult them three or four times a day, and converse with them freely, as if they expected some suitable answers from them but in case they meet with a disappointment, or an answer that thwarts their inclinations, they load them with all the opprobrious language they can think of.

The method generally used in their consultation of these Aulis is to take a nap, after a familiar intercourse with them for two or three hours, and the purport of the dream, which strikes the imagination of the person during his slumbers, is looked upon as the oracle's reply.

The Mirdzi are girdles embellished with a variety of mystic characters, and these superstitious islanders ascribe a peculiar virtue to them. These unintelligible marks or signatures are the hand writing of some of their Ombiasses, who embrace the opportunity of some particular days in the year, and some propitious hours in those days, for the composition of them. Moreover, they are obliged to sacrifice a considerable number of oxen of a particular colour; from whence it is evident, that there is a great conformity between these Aulis of theirs and the Talismans; but be that as it may, they preserve them with the utmost precaution in their respective families, and transmit them down from father to son, as a valuable inheritance. These islanders have their mercenary poets, who sing the heroic exploits of their grandees, and intrepid warriors. Their poetry is, for the generality, instructive and sententious, after the manner or style of the easterns; but however, they do not scruple to compose a variety of gay madrigals, or love sonnets, on some particular occasions.

They have various ways for the administration of their oaths; and when they lay a person under the most solemn engagements, they oblige him to eat a small quantity of bull's liver. In some parts of the island they sprinkle their witnesses with water, who imagine, that if they should depose a falsehood after such aspersion, some heavy judgment would immediately overtake them. In order to discover a thief, or any other delinquent, they touch the tongue of the party suspected seven times successively with a red hot iron; and if no pain attends the frequent repetition of this trial, he is acquitted, as we are informed, and declared not guilty. Sometimes the prisoner is obliged to eat bull's liver, and a particular root which is poison, and the same, in all probability, as is made use of on the like occasions in Guinea, and at Congo. Sometimes, likewise, they oblige the party suspected to plunge his hand into a pot of scalding water, and take up a stone that lies at the bottom for that purpose. But may not these customs, after all, which we call trials, be only so many different methods of putting such criminals to the rack, in order to extort from them a confession of those facts whereof they are accused?

They swear by bull's liver for the ratification of a peace, and on the day appointed for the conclusion of it, both parties appear in arms, on the banks of a river. Each of them slaughter a bull, and mutually exchange a morsel of the liver of their victims, which is eaten in the presence of their respective deputies, or envoys, accompanied with this solemn oath or imprecation, May the liver which we have eaten burst us, if we violate our engagements! If one army reduces the other to the necessity of suing for a peace, the vanquished party only eat the liver, which is admitted as an oath of their fidelity and allegiance to the victor.

Their Timbouchem is a compact, or obligation, by virtue whereof they become indebted to one another; and the form of it is this: an islander kills some well-fed beasts, divides it into as many shares as he thinks proper, and then distributes them.—Such as receive any part or portion thereof, are obliged to deliver the proprietor a calf at the year's end.

Their warlike discipline consists principally in ambuscades, and falling on their enemies by surprise. They send out their scouts or spies all round about, not only well furnished with weapons of defence, but fortified with spells, charms, poisons, and enchanted billets. The maids and married women dance all night and day, as long as the war continues, imagining, that thereby they inspire their soldiers with strength and courage.

Though we have already given several instances of their superstitions, yet this that follows is more remarkable than any before mentioned, and the result of a precaution which we could never have expected from women, who are, we are informed, so dissolute and abandoned. They are honest, and on their guard, whilst their husbands are engaged in the field of battle, because they are fearful lest their amours should prove of ill consequence to them when abroad, notwithstanding they shew so little affection or regard for them when at home. Whether this circumstance is real fact or not, we shall not determine; for who would pretend to justify all that travellers relate for truth? but this at least we venture to say with safety, that our ladies are not so prudent and cautious in the absence of their spouses.

Thus we have given the best collection we could meet with of the religious ceremonies of these islanders, and of some other customs which seem to be established on a religious foundation. All of them, however, may not be practised with equal strictness, nor after the same manner, throughout the island, since it is inhabited by several petty nations, each of whom observe some ceremonies peculiar to themselves.

Indeed we may add, that in all heathen nations there is so little difference, that we only change the name of the circumstance, and the fact will remain just as it was before. What does it signify to the man who is seriously inquiring after truth, whether one heathen nation is remarkable for worshipping images, or another for paying adoration to the vilest reptiles? The question before us is, Is the person who makes such things the object of his adorations, seeking after truth, or has he formed right notions of the Divine Being? Has he considered God as such an one as himself, or has he formed the most unworthy notions of his attributes? This much is certain, that whenever we repeat that petition in the Lord's prayer, "Thy kingdom come," we should at the same time wish and equally pray that the kingdom of grace may be established in the hearts of men, and that the accomplishment of the kingdom of glory may be hastened. Jesus, the once humble but now exalted redeemer of a lost world, suffered for our sins and rose again for our justification.—Can we then imagine that the goodness of God will not extend those beneficial consequences to all the sons of men; surely God will do so; for as is his justice, so is his mercy.

It is not our business at present to enquire who were the first inhabitants of this part of Africa, for all that we can say with certainty is, that these people were formerly idolators, or, as a certain traveller expresses it, acknowledged no other God than nature, and he adds, moreover, that they spilt no blood, not so much as that of beasts, for their sacrifices. They were very superstitious, and their wives lived in common, and they had two kings, one living and the other dead; the latter they placed in a standing posture, in a cavern, with a staff in his hand, and a pot of milk by his side, for his subsistence in the other world. At present, the Guanchos are the remains of these ancient islanders; and in all probability observe privately some part of their ancient customs. But be that as it will, they still mingle so much superstition with their veneration and respect which they pay to their ancestors and their sepulchres, that no strangers presume to visit them without their permission, on the hazard of their lives.

They sometimes embalm their dead; but the composition which they made use of on such occasions, and by virtue whereof they preserved their dead from putrefaction for several ages, was a secret known only to some particular families, who were strictly enjoined to have no intercourse or correspondence with the rest of the islanders; and their priests were always some branch of these families.

After they had embalmed their dead, they sewed them up very neatly in buck-skins, well dressed and prepared. These Canaries were known to the ancients by the name of the Fortunate islands; and they were of opinion, that the virtuous resided there after their decease.

Here we shall conclude our description of all the African idolators. We have related the whole with all the care and impartiality imaginable, and in order to testify to our readers that we would not in the least impose on their credulity, we have all along quoted the authors from whom we made our extracts. As we were thus confined from any invention of our own, we thought ourselves obliged to embellish our dissertations with several additional hints and observations, in which very frequently we have spoken our minds freely, and laid ourselves under no manner of restraint. The work, however, is not without its defects; and we are so conscious of them, that we heartily wish it more complete, more correct, better composed, and better digested throughout the whole. We are not so happy as to be numbered amongst those, to whom God, according to father Garasse, has given the satisfaction of being contented with their own compositions, as an equivalent for the contempt and censure which they meet with from the public. However, we flatter ourselves that we have advanced nothing that is idle and extravagant, or inconsistent with common sense, which is at least a tolerable plea in an age wherein the profession of compiling or composing books is so much discouraged and condemned.

Having said thus much concerning the different heathen systems of religion in Africa, we shall conclude with our earnest wish and sincere desire that these people may yet be brought to the knowledge of the truth. The goodness of God is great, and his mercies are infinite; when the sons of men forget him, he often looks down with compassion upon them. As his infinite mercies extended to them when in a lost condition, at the time of Christ's appearance in the flesh, so there is reason to hope the same compassion will still prevail; and while we form proper notions of God, we shall never have reason to distrust him. Indeed, those who trust in God, are, for the most part, sure of his favour, at least as far as it will be for his own glory and their good. And what trust can equal our waiting with patience for the conversion of the heathen nations? The heart of the sincere Christian is troubled sometimes to behold so many of his fellow-creatures sitting in darkness, and in the region and shadow of death, but considering the divine promise, he rests satisfied, and often exclaims in those beautiful words of the poet, with which we shall conclude this article:—

Unshaken as the sacred hill,
And firm as mountains be;
Firm as a rock, the soul shall rest,
That leans, O Lord, on Thee.

RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT OR SAVAGE AMERICANS.

IN treating of these people, we have called them ancient and savage, by which we mean all such as were, or still are, idolatrous. And this is the more necessary, because, that ever since the discovery of America by Columbus, so many Europeans have settled in different parts of that vast continent, that taking the whole together, they exhibit, as it were, a new world. People of all religions are to be met with here, and even these people, in almost all provinces, differing from each other in sentiment, yet live in unity together as brethren. Most of these religious sects will come in under the article of Protestants, so that we shall say nothing of them at present, but to proceed to inquire into the population of America, and then to describe the religious ceremonies of those heathens which either once did, or still do, inhabit it.

It is very probable that the colonies which first settled in America came thither by land, and that if any happened to come by sea, it was owing to chance rather than design. Several learned men have been of opinion, that America was peopled by the Phœnicians and Carthagénians; and they ground their conjectures on the long voyages those people used to make, who, fitting out very considerable fleets, used to send them beyond the straits of Gibraltar, the Canary Islands, and those of Cape Verde, known to the ancients, as it is believed, under the name of the islands Gorgades. It is true, indeed, that the islands of Cape Verd are the nearest land to America; but this does not prove the Phœnicians had visited the American coasts; for as to the cruizings of those Phœnicians beyond the Gorgades, they might probably have been made towards the south, rather than towards the west. We in that case should therefore look into the southern parts of Africa for those unknown lands, which the ancients tell us the Phœnicians had discovered. On the other hand, if it be true that the Antilles were known to them under the name of the islands of the Hesperides, and that the voyage to Gorgades and to the Hesperides, which is not now above twenty-five or thirty days sail, might have taken them forty, (which is but a short time considering their little experience) we shall find that no other people than the Carthagénians could have been able to undertake such voyages. The situation of their country, and the talents they had for trade, might probably have excited them to rove up and down that great expanse of waters between Africa and America, having first settled a pretty regular correspondence between Cadiz and the Cassiterides, now called the Azores. If all this were true, we might probably suppose that the Carthagénians and the other Phœnicians, who were settled in Spain and Africa, had carried people to the Azores, the Antilles, and from thence to the continent of America. And then, after having sailed several hundred leagues, from the coasts of Africa to the gulph of Mexico, it is not impossible but that those mariners might have attempted another as far as the main of the land.

Yet we may naturally suppose that some Phœnician or Carthagéniian sailors having been thrown on the coast of America by a storm, necessity had forced them to settle there, and that they there lost their language, and the little knowledge they might have had of the arts and sciences of their country. What makes this more probable is, that sea-faring men have in all ages been very ignorant, and but a degree above barbarians. The Peruvians had anciently some footsteps of those involuntary voyages; and the first Spanish writers who have collected the scattered remains of their history, make mention of certain people came from that part of their empire which lies towards the sea, and that they afterwards made a conquest of their country.

Tradition made the above-mentioned writers consider these men, whose original appeared so extraordinary, as so many giants; and, indeed, it is not unlikely they were such, since we are assured, that bones of a prodigious size have been dug up about Puerto Viejo, and in the valley of Tumbes. We have many learned men in the world, who, in the height of their raptures for this discovery, would consider these giants as the posterity of the children of Anak, of whom mention is made in Denteronomy, and would bring the Lord knows how many far-fetched conjectures, to prove that the poor Canaanites, whom Joshua drove out of their dwellings, had fled to Peru for refuge. But to be serious: It is hardly possible to make a voyage of even a few leagues, with their Bales, Pieroques, and Canoes; neither have the Asians, the Africans, or Europeans, ever had courage enough to venture over a wide extended ocean in such weak vessels; and as on the other side it does not appear that the Americans were ever acquainted with any other kind of shipping, we may naturally suppose, that if chance did at any time throw unhappy wretches on a desert coast of America, in an age when mankind had little knowledge in the building of ships, such persons were soon forced to forget their former customs and manners, and to comfort themselves for this loss, by the propagation of their species in those regions into which fortune had thrown them against their wills.

In reality, it is more natural to suppose that the first colonies which settled in America came thither by land; by this means we avoid the difficulties that might be started concerning the passage of wild beasts thither.

However, it is impossible to fix the æra when this happened, which perhaps may be as old as the flood, where the Peruvians have preserved some idea:— This is the only footstep remaining among them relating to remote antiquity; for in all other respects the Peruvian annals scarce comprehend the history of four centuries; and then what are these annals? only Guappa's or Quappo's, that is, certain strings with knots in them to point out the several transactions; and notice will be taken of them in the sequel of this work. But before we come to a decision with respect to the original of the Americans, it may be proper to examine whether affinity which some pretend to find between the manners and customs of the Americans and those of the Phœnicians, may reasonably induce us to conclude, that the former are descended from the latter. We shall not take notice of the affinity that has been found between the custom of living in huts, and that of roving from place to place. The Americans in this respect resemble as much the Nomades, the Arabians, the Scythians, &c. as the Phœnicians.

The comparison that might be made of the idolatry of those nations, would also hold with that of other nations of our hemisphere. The following affinity, could it be proved, would deserve our notice infinitely more; we mean that of languages. But without affecting a great depth of erudition in this place, which our etymologists are generally so lavish of, we shall content ourselves with saying, that a dozen words, whose sound and signification are the same in the language of two distant nations, are hardly sufficient to prove that they are both descended from the same progenitors. However, if it were true that the Carthagenians, after their discovery of the Hesperides, had known the continent, they might probably have left their language with some of their people behind them; and this language might have been so far confounded with the American tongues, as to remain only in twelve words. Let us endeavour to maintain this kind of paradox, though to speak the truth we are almost persuaded that the American settlements were first made by land, and that the Phœnician language was in process of time so much corrupted in Africa, that it degenerated to a meer jargon, mixed with the Lybian and other wild languages of the neighbouring nations. Secondly, this language thus degenerated, being carried into America, by a small number of people, who settled there, must naturally have been soon lost, so that small remains of it must have been left.

The reader may probably look upon this as the mere product of our fancy; but if it be duly considered, it will not appear altogether improbable.—In the whole, what man of learning will dare to assert, that the languages of those countries which lie nearest Africa, are not mixed with Punic, with Lybian, or even broken Cantabrian words? Who is able to boast his having so thoroughly studied the genius and etymology of the American languages, as to be able to affirm, that there are not some foot-steps of the African idolators, and of those places the Carthagenians possessed in Spain, to be found therein? These conjectures might have been carried much farther, had not the languages of the Antilles been lost, after the Spaniards destroyed the inhabitants of those islands.

Some authors are of opinion, that the Americans owe their original to the dispersion of the ten tribes of the Israelites. It is true, indeed, that some traces of the Jewish religion had been found at Jucatan, and the coasts of the South-sea; as for instance, a kind of circumcision, which we might with great probability impute to the necessity, so far from being forced to ransack the Jewish religion upon that occasion. Emanuel de Moraes, a Portuguese, who had travelled many years in America, has endeavoured to prove that the Jews and Carthagenians are the common parents of the Americans. We have just now quoted his opinion with relation to the migration of the Carthagenians into foreign countries. Here follows his reason to prove that of the Jews into Brasil. The Brazilians says he, marry only into their own families, in like manner as the Jews married only into their own tribes. Both of them call their uncles by the name of father, and their aunts' mother, their cousins' brother, &c. both of them pass a month in deep mourning, and wear gowns that descend to their feet. But these affinities are of little weight, some of them being forced and the rest entirely false. But we shall leave the reader to his private opinion.

The great Grotius thinks that the Americans of Panama came originally from Norway. The Norwegians went first into Iceland; from Iceland they went into Greenland by the way of Friesland; from Greenland they spread themselves into Estotiland, which is a part of the main land of North America, and from thence they sent colonies to the Isthmus of Panama. We must own that there is one circumstance which seems to prove that the inhabitants of Panama, and Mexico, are originally of the north; and that is the traditions of the Mexicans, who formerly declared to the Spaniards, that their ancestors came from that quarter. As to Estotiland, we are told there is a city in that country, that goes by the name of Norumbegue, which still preserves in its name some marks of the passage of the Norwegians. But unhappily for this opinion there are not the least foot-steps remaining of any city in the north parts of America; and the natives of the country, if we except those who live in the cities built by the Europeans, from what can at most be called but small villages, made up only of a few houses. Besides, all that Zeni, who first discovered Friesland and Estotiland, relates of his discoveries, appears altogether romantic, and as fictitious at least as the discovery of the Terra Australis by Sateur. De Laet in his dissertation on the original of the Americans, seems to have thoroughly refuted the reasons which Grotius alludes to prove that the inhabitant of Mexico and Panama are originally from Norway.

As to the Peruvians and other nations of the south part of America, Grotius has pretended to prove they came originally from China. The sprightly and penetrating genius of both those nations; their common idolatrous worship of the sun; the hieroglyphic characters of both; and above all the voyages of Mancoapac, who came from beyond the seas to people Peru, and made himself the law-giver of its inhabitants; all these appeared reasons sufficient to induce him to maintain his opinion.

To this De Laet answers. That the Peruvians were never such skilful artists as the Chinese, and that the most excellent pieces of handicraft of Peru, are greatly inferior to those of China; but to this we must justly answer, that no consequence can be drawn from hence, why the Peruvians should not be descended from the Chinese. The Peruvians would not have been the first people that had degenerated from their ancestors. He adds, that before the coming of the Spaniards among them, they were wholly ignorant of the use of sailing vessels: and that it is very unlikely the Peruvians should have wholly lost all remembrance of their country, and the art of sailing; particularly if we consider, that because of the winds which generally blow from the east under the equinoctial, it is easier to go from Peru to China, than from China to Peru.

The Chinese Junks are no way able to cross the vast sea which lies between China and Peru, besides it was much more natural for the Chinese to send people into Mexico, as that country lies much nearer to China. The adoration which the Peruvians pay the Sun, has no manner of affinity with the idolatry of the Chinese, who do not worship that planet; whereas it is adored by several nations of the north parts of America; from whence it is very natural to believe that the Peruvians came by the Isthmus of Panama. It is surprising that Grotius should tell us, that those people had the use of writings; since the Inca Garcilasso tells us expressly in his history that they were ignorant of that art. Mancoapac was not a Chinese; for the Peruvians said that he was born of a rock, which they shew to this day near Cusco.

It must be confessed that the original of the Americans is hid in great obscurity; but it would be otherwise, had this people been less barbarous and savage in their infancy, or had they afterwards known the methods which those of our hemisphere make use of to transmit their history to posterity; but America does not furnish one single monument to this purpose.

Those people minded only the present moment, and never troubled their heads with the time past, or that to come; a custom which still prevails among such savages as inhabit countries not yet frequented by the Europeans. But let us not be too partial in our own behalf: Are we very certain of our own original? Do we know that of the French, the Spaniards, and the Germans? Would it not be impossible to trace the original of the first inhabitants of Europe? All the difference we may find between the Americans and ourselves, is, that Christianity has fixed the Æra of our histories, and has forced us as it were to leave to the discussion of the critics, the fictions and prodigies of paganism that preceded it. The ages of European idolatry are an inexhaustible fund of fictions and conjectures, which the Greeks and Romans themselves have not been free from, as has been already observed; since the true history of the Greeks is not to be traced higher than the first olympiad, and that of the Romans than the foundation of their city. We shall now give our conjecture with respect to the original of the Americans. It is very probable that America was as populous a few centuries after the deluge as it is at this time; after which states and kingdoms were soon formed: however this was done progressively, according as families separated, and the children themselves becoming parents of a numerous progeny, were obliged to quit their native countries. These separations gave rise to states, in which ambition and a desire of superiority might even in those ages have had some share. Nevertheless, it is probable that Asia did not send out any colonies, till after having been forced to drive out such young people as were capable of subsisting by themselves.

But these settlements were very easily made in those times: Husbandry was then the only employment; mankind then spent their lives in leading their flocks to pasture; and it is by the opportunities which rural occupations gave to people whose passions were as yet but in their infancy, that the first conquests were made in Asia, and the sending out of the first colonies. A shepherd who was at the head of a numerous family, master of several flocks, and who found himself well settled in Chaldaea sent one of his children or dependants, several leagues off, with a detachment of oxen, asses, and camels.

The flock went gently on, grazing in their passage, and insensibly drew farther from the true owner. In the mean time, the detachment grew more numerous; and from this flock there sprung another. The shepherd who at first was no more than a deputy, became himself the master and father of a family. He then also separated part of his wealth, and gave it to that son whom he intended should settle in a foreign country, or to some dependant that was going further off. We presume that in this manner an hundred years was time sufficient to people Europe, Asia, and Africa, very considerably, and an hundred more to people the continent of America. Let us suppose for this purpose, that at the flood, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, had each twelve children, and that these children were fit for marriage about fifteen or eighteen years after the flood.

It is very probable, that after they had been married twelve years, they might see a posterity of four hundred and thirty-two persons. In this manner Noah might have been at the head of above five hundred descendants in the space of thirty years; and if we then suppose that every one of Noah's great-grand-children had ten children, these four hundred and thirty-two persons might have begot four thousand three hundred and twenty children in ten years time. All this might have happened in the space of half a century; so that multiplying them always by ten, and leaving an interval of about twenty or twenty-five years between one generation and another, Asia, Europe, and Africa, might have been peopled with four hundred and thirty-two millions of inhabitants, an hundred and fifty years after the flood. We think this could not be disputed were we only to have regard to the ordinary methods of propagation. It is true, indeed, that we suppose every head of a family to have had ten children, when probably several of those chiefs might not have had so many. But then how many do we see in our days who have more than ten, and if we consider what bishop Burnet has told us concerning Messieurs Troughin and Calandin of Geneva; the former of whom at the age of seventy-five, had one hundred and fifteen children, or persons married to his children that could call him father; and the other at the age of forty-seven, had one hundred and five persons, who were all his nephews or nieces by his brothers or sisters:—If therefore, in these two instances, it will be found that our computation is modest enough, for an age when poverty and the cares of life had not yet destroyed man's vigour, nor reduced him to the necessity of refraining from marriage, the lawful method of propagation, for fear of not being able to support his family. But although the increase of our species had for one hundred and fifty years been much less than we have supposed it, and that only four hundred millions of people had come into the world; nay farther, though we were still to subtract thirty millions from that sum, for the immature or violent deaths, diseases, and wars, which in all probability were not so bloody in those ages as they have been since, it is very natural to think that some millions might detach themselves from the remaining three hundred and seventy millions in order to seek their fortunes in America. And though we afterwards suppose that propagation may have been very much prejudiced by reason of the fatigues they laboured under in their voyage, and from the change of climate, we shall nevertheless find that ten or twelve millions of people may have been able to furnish America with forty millions of persons in fifty years time. What is here advanced ought to be looked upon as a paradox, nor should any difficulties be raised with respect to our calculation; difficulties which are founded only on the length of man's life in our days. Mankind in those ages had not invented all those pernicious arts, which at the same time that they shorten life, do also lessen propagation.

The rural life which mankind led in the first ages, the indolence of the Americans, which has been continued from father to son to the latest posterity and the tranquillity of that people, unperplexed with those cares which now prey upon us, were incapable of ruining health or of making men grow old before their time. But we will not pursue any farther a subject that would carry us to too great lengths. It is sufficient for our purpose that we have proved the possibility, and even the probability that this part of the world began to be peopled about an hundred and forty years after the flood, and some years after the confusion of tongues at Babel.

These colonies passed over into America, from the north of Asia, by the way of Tartary; there are several reasons which induce us to be of this opinion, First, father Henepin relates, that four savages came off ambassadors to the Issatis and Nadouesans, while he was among them. They came from a country above five hundred miles to the westward of that place, and had been four moons on their journey. They added, says he, that their country lay westward, and that we lay eastward with respect to their country; that they had journeyed on continually during all that time, except that which they employed in sleep, and in hunting for their subsistence. Father Henepin concludes from thence, that there is no such thing as the straits of Anian; for these savages assured us, says he, that they had not crossed any great lake, for that is the name they give to the sea. They told us further, that all the nations with whom they were acquainted, that live on the west and northwest of the Issatis, have not any great lake near the wide extended countries, but only rivers, which come from the north, pass through the countries of those people who inhabit near the confines, on that side the great lake lies, which in the language of the savages signifies sea. These people undoubtedly inhabit the north part of California, and extend perhaps to the frontiers of eastern Tartary, Japan, and the land of Jesso.

It was necessary to be the more explicit upon the first peopling of America, because this argument has been laid hold of by deists, in order to prove that the whole human race did not descend from one man and one woman. To take notice of what Voltaire has said on this subject in his philosophy of history, is altogether unnecessary, for that author, (as lord Lyttelton justly says) is the most superficial historian that ever took a pen in hand. A vain, airy, volatile disposition, a love of gaiety, and a fixed hatred of every thing serious, induced him to take up every idle prejudice, and palm those upon the public as truth. Inaccurate in all his enquires, and lazy even to a proverb, he has mixed romance with historical facts, and in his writings formed a real monster. But lord Kames, a late judge, has gone further, and attempted to prove, that there must have been many men created originally, because of the different colours of the human species.

His lordship is a respectable writer, for although there is reason to believe that he has conceived some prejudices against the scripture history, yet he has too much good sense to oppose any thing that tends towards traducing moral virtue, and religious obligation. He has penetrated deep in the nature of things, and so far from being attached to his own opinion in opposition to any thing that had the appearance of truth, he actually revoked his sentiments concerning the freedom of the human will, in consequence of having read the late president Edwards' celebrated work on that subject. The truth is, in all the ancient histories we are led into doubts, nor have we any we can with safety depend on besides the sacred scriptures.

Historians relate with gravity the story of Regulus, others doubt its existence, and yet there is nothing at all surprising in it, when we consider the temper and genius of the Roman people. Xenophon gives us an account of the death of Cyrus very different from what we read in other authors concerning that illustrious hero, and where is the truth to be found.

The objections made by lord Kames against the truth of the scripture history, in consequence of the variety of complexions found in the world, is too weak to be used by a gentleman of his understanding. It is well known that the influence of the climate will at all times change the colours of men, and this in a few succeeding generations, will make it totally opposite to what it was before. We might here mention a particular book written by his lordship, wherein he has, without design, established this principle, and we are extremely sorry to say, that great talents and consistency are not always found united.

It is acknowledged by Christians, that the scripture history is a supernatural revelation, so that they give themselves no manner of trouble concerning any cavils about it; but even allowing that we were obliged to abide by a heathen, or any sort of human testimony, yet the discovery of America might be accounted for on the rational principles. This we have in some measure attempted already, and therefore we shall at present go on to describe the ceremonies used by the idolators in that part of the world, beginning with Florida, and extending our enquires into the other parts, till we come to speak of the Protestant religion in every part of the known world.

The inhabitants of Florida are idolators and acknowledge the sun and moon for deities, whom they worship without offering them either prayers or sacrifices. However, they have temples; but the only use they make of them is to bury their dead, and to lodge the most valuable part of their wealth in them. They also set up the spoils of their enemies at the gates of these temples, by way of trophies, and this is all the account the Luca Garcilasso de la Vega has given us of the religion of the Floridans. We may justly compare them to those idolatrous nations of antiquity, who worshipped whatever they thought odd or surprising, if it be true that the Floridans were so superstitious as to adore a pillar, which captain Ribaut had erected upon an eminence, with the arms of France, when he discovered that part of North America. They offered sacrifices to it, crowned it with flowers, and dressed it up with garlands and festoons; and in a word, they omitted no kind of homage.

The Floridans worship the devil under the name of Toia, or rather that evil principle whom they set up in opposition to their Supreme Deity. Firmly persuaded that it is impossible for this last principle to do them any hurt, because of his great innate goodness, and they only bend their endeavours to appease the other, who they say, torments them in a very grievous manner. The devil makes incisions in their flesh, terrifies them in visions, and from time to time appears to them, to force them to sacrifice men to his honour. In case the devil does not give himself the trouble to act on these occasions, the priests have nevertheless the interest of the people too much at heart, to be wanting in the duty they owe him. We may therefore with great probability suppose, that they themselves are the evil genius, and that they more than make up for that imaginary malice which the fear of the Floridans causes them to ascribe to it.

Another author has given us the following account of the religion of the Floridans. They adore one sole creator of all things, to whom their great pontiff offers sacrifices; but they do not think the affairs of men deserve his care, and they say, that he commits the government of this lower world to subordinate and inferior Deities; or in other words, that he leaves it to the administration of good and evil spirits, to whom the priests of an inferior order offer sacrifices and other devotions.

The savages that inhabit about the mountains of Apalache worship the sun, as author of life and creator of nature. One would think they had preserved some footsteps of the flood; for they say, that the sun having retarded his ordinary course for twenty-four hours, the waters of the great lake Theomi overflowed in such a manner as to cover the tops of all the highest mountains, that of Olaimy excepted; which the sun preserved from the general inundation, because of the temple he had built thereon with his own hands, and the Apalachites afterwards consecrated as a place of pilgrimage, where it was usual for them to pay their religious homage to that planet, and all such as could shelter themselves in this place were preserved from the deluge. The four and twenty hours expired, the sun recovered his first strength, and commanding the waters to retire back to their just limits, scattered the vapours which they spread over the earth. It is in acknowledgement for this memorable deliverance, that the Floridans, called Apalachites, have thought themselves obliged to worship the sun, and here follows the manner how they adore him, and the particulars of that worship.

We shall begin with the worship of the Apalachites. Their religious service consists in saluting the rising sun, and singing hymns to his praise, and they pay him the same homage every evening. Besides this, they sacrifice to him, and offer solemn perfume in his honour, four times every year, on the mountains of Olaimy. But as they do not offer any bloody victim to this planet, because they look upon it as the parent of life, and think that he who bestows it on creatures, can scarcely delight in a worship that deprives them of it, we can hardly give the name of sacrifice to the offerings which they make it, since they consist only of perfumes which they burn, as presents which they make the priests, and in songs which they sing in honour of the glorious planet of the day.

On the eve of the festival appointed for the offering of perfumes, the priests withdraw into the mountains, the better to prepare themselves for this solemn act of the day following; and the people are satisfied if they get there before day-break. Fires are burning all night upon the mountain; but the devotees dare not approach the temple, or rather grotto, which is dedicated to the sun. The jounaus, or priests, only are allowed access to the religious edifice, and it is to them that the devotees intrust their gifts and oblations, which the jounaus afterwards hang on poles, that are affixed on each side of the gate, where they remain till the ceremony is ended; after which they distribute them according to the donor's will.

The moment the sun begins to shine, the jounaus sing forth his praises, by falling several times upon their knees; after which they throw perfumes into the sacred fire that is lighted before the gate of the temple, and these two acts of worship are followed by a third no less essential. Then the priest pours honey into a stone made hollow for that purpose, and which stands before a stone table; and scatters about the stone a considerable quantity of maize, half bruised and cleared from its chaff. This is the food of certain birds, whom the Floridans tell us sing the praises of the sun, and whilst the priests are burning the perfumes, and sing to the honour of that planet, the people prostrate themselves and pay their devotions. The ceremony concludes with sports, dances, and diversions, and the most essential part of the festival ends at noon. Then the jounaus surround the table, repeating their songs and acclamations; and when the sun begins to gild the edges of the table with his rays, they throw all the perfumes they have left into the fire. The ceremony does not quite end here: after the last oblation of perfumes, six jounaus chosen by lot stay by the table, and set at liberty six birds of the sun, which they brought in cages, in order that they might act their part in the ceremony. After the mysterious deliverance of these birds follows a procession of devotees, who come down from the mountains with boughs in their hands, and go to the entrance of the temples, into which they are introduced by the jounaus. Lastly, the pilgrims wash their hands and faces with the sacred water. Such is the description of this ceremony, which we have borrowed from an author who had extracted it from the relations of two Englishmen.

The temple consecrated to the sun, and to its worship, by the Floridans of Apalache, is a spacious grotto, made by nature in the rock, on the east side of the mountain. We are told that it is two hundred feet long, and of an oval form; that the arched roof rises an hundred and twenty feet in height, and that there comes in light enough by a hole which goes quite through the top to illuminate the grotto.

Garçilasso, in his history of the conquest of Florida, gives a description of another temple of the Floridans of Cofaciqui, which seems to have been used only as a burying-place for the great men of the country. The Spaniards found in those temples great wooden trunks and chests, that were placed round the walls on benches two feet from the ground.

In these trunks dead bodies were laid, which were embalmed in such a manner, as not to cast forth an offensive smell, and there were also lesser chests, and reed baskets very curiously wrought. The little chests were filled with men and women's clothes, and the baskets with pearls of all sorts: for the temple of Talomeco was the burying-place of the Caciques of the country; and the description which Garcilasso has given us thereof, justly merits to be inserted in this place. "The temple of Talomeco, which is the burying-place of the Caciques, is, says he, above an hundred paces long and forty wide; the walls are of a height proportionable to it, and the roof is very much raised, to supply the defect of the tiles, and to give the greater slope to the waters. The roof is made of very slender reeds split in two, with which the Indians make very handsome mats, that are like the rush-carpets of the Moors. Five or six of these carpets, laid one upon another, keep the rain from piercing through, and the sun from coming into the temple; in which particular they are imitated by the common people and neighbours, who employ their mats to the same use. Upon the roof of this temple, a variety of shells of different sizes are set, and several fishes ranged in a very beautiful order. But it is scarce possible to think whence they were brought, since those people live so far distant from the sea, unless we suppose they took them out of the rivers with which that province is watered.

All the shells are placed inside out, to make the greater show; always setting that of a large sea snail between two little ones, with spaces between the several pieces, filled with several strings of pearls of different sizes, like so many festoons, fastened from one shell to the other. These festoons of pearl, which reach from the top to the bottom, heightened by the lustre of the mother-of-pearl, and of the shells, look wonderfully pretty when the sun shines upon them. The gates of the temple are proportionable to the bigness of it, and at the entrance of it are twelve gigantic statues made of wood. They are represented with so savage and threatening an air, that the Spaniards stood a considerable time to view them; and indeed those figures were worth the admiration of ancient Rome. One would imagine that those giants had been set there to guard the door; for they make a lane on both sides, and lessen gradually in bulk. The first are eight feet high, and the rest something less, decreasing gradually in height like the pipes of an organ.

They have weapons answerable to their stature; the first on each side have clubs set off with copper, which they hold lifted up, and as it were ready to fall on those who should be so bold as to enter in; the second have pail-axes; and the third a kind of oar; the fourth copper-axes, the edges of which are made of flint; the fifth stand with their bows bent, ready to let fly the arrow. These arrows are very curiously wrought, the tips of which are made of a piece of stag's horn, very nicely wrought, or else of flint-stone whetted as sharp as a sword. The last have very long pikes tipped with copper at both ends and stand in a threatening posture like the rest; all after a different but very natural manner.

The top of the walls in the inside of the temple, is adorned agreeably to the outside of the roof; for there is a kind of cornice made of large sea snail shells, ranged in very good order, with festoons of pearl between them, hanging from the roof. In the space between the shells and pearls, is seen in the hollow place which joins to the roof, a great number of feathers of various colours, set in a beautiful order, and besides this order above the cornice, there hangs from all the other sides of the roof several feathers and strings of pearls, all held together by imperceptible threads, fixed at the top and bottom, in such a manner that those works seem ready to fall every moment.

Under this ceiling and cornice, and round the temple on the four sides, are two rows of statues, standing one above another, the one of men and the other of women, of the size of the people of the country. Their several niches which are made only as an ornament to the wall, join to one another, which would otherwise have been too naked; and all the men have weapons in their hands, on which are rolls of pearls, each consisting of four or five rows, with tufts at the end, made of very fine thread of various colours, but the statues of the women have nothing in their hands.

At the foot of these walls are set wooden benches very well wrought, on which the coffins of the lords of the province, and those of their families are placed. Two feet above those coffins, the statues of the persons buried there are set in niches in the wall, and they represent them exactly as they were at the time of their deaths. The women have nothing in their hands, but the men armed.

The space between the images of the deceased persons, and two rows of statues which begin beneath the cornice, is filled with shields of different magnitude, made of reeds so strongly interwoven, as not to be penetrated by a cross bow, or a gun; and these shields are all garnished with pearl and tufts of several colours, which make them much more beautiful. In the middle of the temple are three rows of boxes or chests, set on benches separated from one another. The largest of these chests serve as bases to the lesser, and these to the least; these pyramids consist generally of five or six chests. As there is a space between the several benches, the passage is left clear, so that one may see every thing that passes in the temple.

All these chests are full of pearls, the largest pearls are in the greatest chests, and so in proportion to the least, which are filled with nothing but seed pearl. These were in such prodigious quantities, that the Spaniards affirmed, that nine hundred men, with three hundred horses, would not have sufficed to carry away at once all the pearls deposited in that temple. However, this will be found not so extraordinary, since we are told that the Americans of this province, deposited every individual pearl they had met with in several ages together, in those chests. And hence we may infer, that had the Spaniards kept all the gold and silver which they have brought from Peru in their hands, they would by this time have had enough to cover a great number of their churches. They also found a great number of shanmy, or wild goat skins of different colours, besides several sorts of skins with the hair dyed of different colours: several gowns of cats, martens, and other skins, which were all as well dressed as they could have been in Germany or Muscovy.

Round this temple, every part of which was very neat and clean, was a great store-house, divided into eight halls of equal bigness, which were a great ornament to it, and the Spaniards went into them, and found them filled with military weapons. In the first were long pikes tipped with very fine copper, and set off with rings of pearl, which go three or four times round. That part of the pike which lies on the shoulder, is adorned with shanmy of various colours, having tufts of pearls at the end of it, which make them much more beautiful. In the second hall were clubs like those of the giants, set off with rings of pearl, and adorned up and down with tufts of different colours, set round with pearls. In the third were pole-axes, embellished like the rest; in the fourth were a kind of spears, set off with tufts near the iron and the handle; in the fifth were a kind of oars, adorned with pearls and fringes, and in the sixth were very beautiful bows and arrows. Some were armed with flint stones, sharpened at the end like a bodkin, swords, iron pikes, or points of a dagger with a double edge. The bows were enamelled with several colours, shining and garnished with pearls in several places; and in the seventh hall were bucklers made of wood and cow hides, brought from far, adorned with pearls and coloured tufts. In the eighth were shields made of reeds, finely interwoven and set off with tufts and seed pearls.

Some savages of Florida sacrifice their first-born to the sun, or rather to their sovereigns; at least it is certain, that this cruel ceremony is performed in presence of one of those princes or Caciques, whom they call Paraoustis. Whilst the mother of the infant covers her face, weeps and groans over the stone against which the victim is to be dashed to pieces, and the women who accompany her sing and dance in a circle, another woman stands in the midst of the ring, holding the child in her arms, and shewing it at a distance to the Paraousti. This woman dances in the same manner as the rest of her companions, singing at the same time the praises of the Paraousti. After this the priest, surrounded with six other Floridans, dashes out the child's brains; but we are to observe, that the victim must always be a male infant. The same savages offer to the sun, with great solemnity, the representation of a stag; and chuse for that purpose the skin of the largest stag they can meet with. They first stuff it with all kinds of herbs; then adorn it with fruits and flowers, and lift it to the top of a high tree, with its head turned towards the rising sun. This ceremony is performed every year about the end of February, and is always accompanied with prayers and songs, which are chanted forth by the Paraousti and one of the principal jounas at the head of those devotees. The Floridans beseech the sun to bless the fruits of the earth, and preserve its fruitfulness, and leave the stag's skin hanging on the tree till the year following.

They have another remarkable festival, at which the people assemble under the direction of a Paraousti, in order to go and pay their devotions to Toia. Travellers not knowing what Toia was, at once gave it the name of the devil, and we have already observed, that Toia is the evil principle. Be that as it will, this ceremony appears to be an act of contrition, or deep sorrow of mind, by which they imagine they shall obtain the favour of that idol.—The Floridans meet together in a large open place, which the women adorn and get ready the day before the ceremony. The assembly is no sooner drawn up in a ring, but three jounas, painted from head to foot with various kinds of colours, present themselves in the midst of it with drums, dancing and singing to the sound of them, making extraordinary wry faces, and throwing themselves into a thousand fantastic shapes. The assembly answers in chorus to the music of the priests, who have no sooner danced up and down three or four times, but they suddenly quit the diversion, and fly to the woods. It is there they consult Toia; and this mysterious flight interrupts the devotion, but the women continue it during the whole day with tears and howlings. These cut and slash the arms of the young girls with muscle-shells, and throw into the air the blood which streams from the wounds, as a homage due to Toia, invoking that idol thrice. Two days after the jounas return from the woods, where they had withdrawn themselves to consult it, and dance upon the very same spot which they had left so suddenly.—The dance concludes with an entertainment, for as they had fasted three days, it would have been almost im possible for them to have continued any longer without eating: but they were indispensibly obliged to fast, since the gods reveal themselves with greater freedom to such as observe that duty. The brain, on these occasions, is not clouded by those vapours which arise from food, and is more susceptible of the impressions of enthusiasm.

Their priests, like those of the other American nations, are likewise physicians, as also the Parousti's counsellors and ministers of state. They carry themselves under this tripple character with gravity and modesty, and are surprisingly abstemious. Before their promotion to the priesthood, they are obliged to submit to a very long discipline under the direction of other priests, who instruct them in the mysteries of religion, and prepare their minds, as it were, for the reception of those ideas which they are to instil afterwards into the people. They are trained up in fasting, abstinence, retirement, and in a deprivation of the pleasures of sense; but then its austerities are softened by visions, and an intimate correspondence with the Deity. This is the account that travellers give of it, which, whether it be exact in every particular, we shall not take upon us to determine. However, we are not to doubt but the old priests tell their young fry that they must at least appear thoroughly convinced of the holiness of a vocation, which invests them at one and the same time with power both over body and soul; and this discipline continues three years.

They hang at their girdles a bag filled with physical herbs, and other medicaments; which is also the custom of the Virginian priests. They are pretty well skilled in the particular uses of medicaments, and the properties of simples. They also employ vomits, sweating and laucing, and they do not wipe away the blood which runs from the wounds, but suck it with their mouths, and often through a straw or reed. The Floridans are of opinion, that it is impossible but the breath and touch of the medico-priests must be of service to the sick. A modern writer informs us, that the priest mumbles over certain words on these operations, but if all these medicines are of no effect, the bath is prescribed; and if that fails, he sets the sick person at the door of his hut, with his face turned towards the rising sun; when the medico-priest earnestly entreats that planet to restore the sick man to his health, by the gentle influence of its light; and this is the last refuge of both patient and physician.

These priests are clothed in a mantle of skins, cut into pieces of unequal bigness; which dress is sometimes made in the form of a long gown, and in this case they tie it about them with a leather girdle, at which the bag hangs in which they put their medicaments. They go with their arms and feet uncovered, and wear a fur cap made like a cone, and their heads are often adorned with feathers, which they wear instead of a cap.

The Floridans are of a very revengeful temper, which is also peculiar to the rest of the American nations. The former, to stir themselves up to vengeance, hold certain assemblies, in which one of them is placed by himself at a distance: then another rises up, and taking a javelin in his hand, strikes the former with all his strength, the wounded person not offering so much as to flinch; after this the dart is presented to others, who all strike him till he falls down wounded to the ground. This being done, the women and young people raise him with tears in their eyes; give him casina to drink, which is the common liquor of their warriors, and convey him to a hut, where they again weep round him. The women and maidens get ready some medicaments to heal his wounds, the assembly at the same time drinking, rejoicing, and singing the brave exploits of their ancestors, and stirring up one another to revenge. The whole solemnity is a commemoration of the death of their countrymen; and the wounded man is, in their eyes, an image of all the ill treatment they have met with from their enemies; and this spectacle inspires the whole nation with an irreconcilable hatred.

Before their marching out to war, they hold a council, in which the Jonanas give their opinion; and nothing is there resolved upon, till they have first been made privy to it, and also consulted the oracle of their idol. The fumes of the casina contribute no less than the oracle to their taking those desperate resolutions, which are the only ones they are sensible of, but none except the warriors are allowed to drink casina, nor they neither, till after having first given proofs of their valour.

Before they set out upon their expeditions, the Parousti turns himself towards the sun, conjuring it at the same time to be propitious to him, when taking water in a wooden porringer, having first broke out into several imprecations against the enemy, he throws the water up in the air in such a manner, that part of it falls down again upon the warriors, crying aloud, at the same time, "May you in like manner shed the blood of your enemies!" He then takes some water a second time, which he throws upon the fire that stands by him, and addressing himself to the same warriors, "May you, says he, destroy your enemies as speedily as I put out this fire!" Both these ceremonies are accompanied with hideous cries and pathetic wry faces.

Those of the Jonanas whom they consult upon the fate of the expedition, are altogether as whimsical; for the pretended magician lays himself upon a shield, in a posture which it would be needless to express. He recovers himself out of that unnatural posture, after having continued a quarter of an hour in the most violent agitations, made the most frightful wry faces, and thrown himself into as violent distortions as the highest convulsions could have occasioned. Then the god leaves his minister, who now grown frantic, rises up, goes to the Paraousti, and acquaints him with the result of the spiritual conference; relates to him the number of his enemies, the manner of their encampment, and the success of the expedition; of all which we are assured they give a perfect account.

They scalp their enemies in the same manner as other nations of North America, and hang the legs and arms of their slain upon poles set up for that purpose. An assembly gathers round those poles to hear the curses which a Joutza pronounces against their enemies; and three men kneel before the priest, who has a little idol in his hand. One of these beats three times with a club upon a stone, and answers the priest's imprecations, during which the other two sing to the noise of their gourd-bottles.

Such women as have lost their husbands in war, implore the assistance of the Paraousti, and present themselves before him with eyes full of tears: A surprising testimony of the love they bare him! Whether this grief be real or feigned, we are not to doubt; but these tears are of great service in stirring up the revenge of the warriors. Their hermaphrodites, whom we before observed to live a very odd kind of life, are employed in carrying their burthens and provisions for war; and they also make use of them to carry their sick and wounded. These hermaphrodites wear long hair like women, and are very much despised by their warriors.

The Floridan women above-mentioned are not satisfied with shedding tears at the king's feet, to excite him to revenge the unhappy deaths of their husbands, but weep and groan over their graves; and as a testimony of their conjugal affection, these disconsolate widows cut their hair quite off, and scatter it over them. Some people, who are so silly as to believe that a husband's death merits an eternity of affliction, would cry out that they would never alter their condition; but such are greatly mistaken, for they, as well as our widows, have their stated times of widowhood. The Floridan women are not allowed to marry again till their hair is grown as long as it was before, that is, till it descends below their shoulders.

They inter their Paraousti in the most magnificent manner possible; for the sepulchre is surrounded with arrows with the points fixed to the ground; and over it is placed the cup which the monarch made use of in his life-time. They spend three days in tears and fasting over the grave, by way of honouring his memory, and the Paraousti, with his allies, benoan his death with the same solemnity, for they shave their heads as a testimony of their affliction. In fine, hired she-mourners lament his death thirty every day, viz. in the morning, at noon, and at night for six months together; and they burn every thing that belonged to him in his life-time; and observe the same ceremony at the death of their priests.— They burn them in their houses; after which they set fire to the house and every thing that is in it; and we are told, that the Floridans, after having burnt those sacred bodies, beat the bones to powder, and a year afterwards give them to the deceased's relations to drink. The Floridans of those provinces which Ferdinand de Soto visited, burned living slaves along with their monarchs, to wait upon them in the other world.

The inhabitants of Apalache embalm the bodies of their relations and deceased friends, and leave them almost three months in the balm. They are afterwards dried with aromatic drugs, wrapped up in rich furs, and laid in cedar coffins, which the relations keep for twelve moons at their own houses: They then carry it to the neighbouring forest, and bury it at the foot of a tree. But they shew a greater regard for the bodies of the Paraousties; for they first embalm them, and then dress them up with all their ornaments, set them off with feathers and necklaces, and afterwards keep them for three years together in the apartment where they died, all which time they lay in those wooden coffins above-mentioned; at the expiration of which, they are deposited in the sepulchres of their predecessors upon the side of the mountain of Olaimy. They are let down into a cave, the mouth of which they stop with great flint-stones, hanging on the branches of the neighbouring trees the weapons they made use of in war, as so many testimonies of their bravery. It is further said, that the nearest relations plant a cedar near the cave, which they dress with care in honour of the deceased, and whenever the tree dies they immediately plant another in its place.

The Apalachites believe in the immortality of the soul, and that those who have lived a life of virtue are carried up into heaven and lodged among the stars; but they fix the habitation of the wicked in the precipices of the high mountains of the north, among the bears, and in the midst of ice and snow. The other nations of these wide extended countries believe also that the good shall be rewarded and the wicked punished after this life. They call heaven the high world, and by way of opposition, the lower world, that which shall be the eternal habitation of the wicked. Cupai, that evil genius, whom the rest of the Floridans call Toia, and we the devil, reigns in this latter place.

tion of souls; and whenever any of them die, they bury provisions and some utensils along with them for their use.

We shall take notice of one custom of the Floridans of Hirriga, which has some relation to that of the Apalachites. These savages bury their dead in forests, and they lay their bodies in wooden coffins covered over with boards, which are not fixed to one another, but held down only by the weight of some stones or pieces of wood, which they lay upon the coffin; and as the province of Florida abounds with a great number of wild beasts, they appoint slaves to guard the bodies.

The Indians of Florida generally marry but one wife, who is obliged to be true to her husband, upon pain of being exposed to a shameful punishment, or even of being put to a cruel death. The great men of the nation dispense with the custom which allows but one wife to the common people, for they marry as many as they please; but then one of them only is looked on as the lawful wife, all the rest being considered as concubines. The offspring of the latter do not enjoy an equal portion of their father's wealth as the children of the former do.

The Apalachites do not marry out of their families, and among them parents often make a match for their children from their infant years, who ratify what they had agreed upon when they come to age.—They are allowed to marry in any degree of consanguinity, next to that of brother and sister.

The latter give to their male children, the names of the enemies they have killed, of the villages to which they have set fire, or of such of their prisoners as have died in war. The girls bear the names of their deceased mothers or grand-mothers, for they observe never to let two persons of the same family go by the same name. Both boys and girls are under the mother's direction till twelve years of age, after which the father undertakes the education of the boys.

We are assured, that husbands have no commerce with their wives from the time of their breeding till after their lying-in; and they are even so scrupulous as not to eat any thing they may have touched during the time of their child-bearing.

The Floridans who inhabit near Panuco, do not marry young, and nevertheless we are assured, they are scarce maids by the time they are ten or twelve years of age. The women of the Lucayan islands wear a cotton apron for modesty sake; and their young women wear them as soon as they are fit for marriage.

The Floridans of Carolina make use of hieroglyphics and emblems to record their events. They take care to instruct their children in every thing which relates to their families and their nation, in order that the history of them may be transmitted to the latest posterity. They erect a little stone pyramid in those places where a battle has been fought, or a colony settled; and the number of the slain, to that of the founders, or of those who first inhabited the place on which these pyramids are erected as seen by the number of stones.

Before we conclude this account of the ancient Floridans, it will be necessary to take notice of the present state of the country, because a remarkable change has taken place in some parts of it. In 1761, Spain declared war against England, and the consequence proved fatal to them, for many of their most valuable settlements were taken.

At the peace of Versailles, 1763, the English obtained possession of Florida, or at least some part of it, and ever since some of our British subjects have been settled there. This has opened a way for the civilization of the people, and missionaries have been appointed to preach amongst them.

These concurring circumstances have opened a way for the making of new discoveries, and it is not to be doubted, but that as soon as peace is restored, this colony of ours will be the means of conveying, to many of the heathens in America, the knowledge of the gospel. This indeed, is one of the great ends Protestants should always have in view, when they make settlements among the heathens. If the papists spared no pains to propagate their superstition, why should Protestants be remiss in seeking to make the purity of their divine religion known?

No excuse can be pleaded for such a neglect, because it is wilful, and proceeds from our not setting a proper value on the precious immortal souls of our fellow-creatures. Who can read the accounts we have already given of these Floridans without horror? And what man, who knows the benefits of Christianity, would not desire to see them equally happy with himself? For this purpose, let a few of our luxuries be retrenched, that we may have an opportunity of laying up treasures in heaven, by diffusing the knowledge of the gospel among the most remote nations. God has given us the means, and he will exact from us an account of the use we make of them. It is necessary, therefore, that we should attend carefully to these things, because the neglect of them will not only be an injury to those who are in want of our assistance, but it will also aggravate our guilt, because we were destitute of bowels of compassion to those who, of all others, stood the most in need of our assistance.

Religion of the savages of Hudson's Bay.

Hudson's Bay is so far to the northward of America, that were it not for the trade we have established there, it would be difficult to give a proper account of it. Its territories are supposed to join to those of Russia or Siberia, but an exact discovery of this has never yet been made. It is true, some have attempted it, but we may venture to affirm, that till government gives a proper premium to the adventurers, few will undertake to go through the danger attending it. This, however, we shall leave to providence, in directing the councils of princes, and just observe what the religion of the people is at present, who have not embraced Christianity.

The savages near Hudson's Bay, have very dark confused notions of religion, for they have a variety of different gods, or rather idols, and address them according to their fancies. Indeed, the licentious vagrant lives of these savages, prevent them from attending to any proper notions of religion, or of the true God. They are not amenable, however, to the good or ill fortune that happens to them, for like the Manchians in the primitive times of Christianity, they seem to adore two principles, the one good and the other evil. They believe the sun to be the good, and the moon the evil principle, which has some affinity with the opinion of the ancients, who ascribed evil and pernicious effects to the moon.

These savages whom we are writing of, seem to consider the sun as the sovereign of the universe, for they offer him tobacco instead of incense, and this is what they call smoking the sun. This ceremony is performed in the following manner:—

The chiefs of the families assemble by day break, at the house of one of their principal men, where the latter lights the tobacco, and offers it to the sun, and waving it with his hands according to its course, till it comes to the points from whence it first began; he addresses his prayers at the same time, to the sun, imploring his protection, beseeches him to direct him in his undertaking, and recommends all the families of the district or canton to his care.—After this, the chief smokes the tobacco, and then gives it to every one in his turn.

It may not be improper in this place to give a description of the instrument used by them in their religious smoking, which they call the Calumet.—It is a kind of very long pipe, made of red stones, adorned with the heads of wood-pickers, and of a kind of ducks that perch upon trees. The heads of those birds are of the finest scarlet colour in the world, and all their feathers are extremely beautiful. In the middle of the tube, or body of the Calumet, they hang or fix certain feathers taken from the wing of a bird which they call Kibon, pretty much resembling an eagle, and they always incense the Calumet before they begin any warlike expedition. But we have a still more accurate description of this instrument called a Calumet, by father Henepin, a learned Jesuit, who visited those parts, and resided there several years.

He says it is a great large smoking pipe, of red, white, or black inarble, pretty much like a battle-axe, with a very smooth head. The tube, which is above two feet and a half long, is made of a strong reed or cane, set off with feathers of all sorts of colours, with several mats made of women's hair, variously interwoven. To this they fix two wings, which make it resemble, in some measure, the words used by ambassadors among the ancients when they concluded a peace. They thrust this reed through the necks of teards, or tears, which are birds speckled with black and white, and about the big-ness of our geese, or through the necks of the above-mentioned ducks.

These ducks are of several different colours, and every nation both make and adore the Calumet in what manner they please, or rather according to their own ancient usages. The Calumet is a passport to all those who remove from one place to another, and being a symbol of peace, they are universally of opinion, that some signal vengeance would befall the person who should presume to break the faith of it. It is the seal of all public undertakings, of all important affairs, and all sacred ceremonies. But to return to the other religious ceremonies of these people.

The ceremony of smoking the sun is never performed but on the most extraordinary occasions, for in common things they address their prayers to some small images which they carry along with them, and which are commonly given them by their jugglers. Some of them imagine that the storms are raised by the moon, who, in their opinion, sometimes lodges in the bottom of the sea.

To pacify her, therefore, they sacrifice to her the most valuable things they have in their canoe, and throw every thing into the sea, not excepting even their tobacco. This sacrifice is preceded with singing, and certain other ceremonies which are efficacious in driving out this evil spirit. In all this there seems to be but little difference between them and the ancients, for they are far from being so barbarous as the Floridians already mentioned.

To know the issue of any affair, they address themselves to their jugglers, who pronounce their oracles with great ceremony, and in a manner that is artful enough. The juggler fixes poles in the ground, and thereon raises a circular hut, which he surrounds with the skins of caribons, or other animals, leaving a hole at the top wide enough for a man to pass through. Here the artful juggler shuts himself up alone, where he sings, sheds tears, tumbles up and down, torments himself, invokes, breaks out into imprecations and exorcisms. He then receives an answer in a thundering voice; all which is consistent with the notions the heathens in general form of the Divine Being.

This makes them believe that their gods must always deliver their answers to their prayers in a thundering voice; nay, they imagine that no answer can come from the gods, unless it, in some measure, less or more, disorders the laws of nature. This would be undoubtedly true; but what these infatuated people believe to be the voice of the Supreme Being, is no other than a trick contrived by their jugglers to impose on the people, and support their own authority.

As soon as the noise is heard, the juggler's enthusiasm breaks out in a murmuring noise, like that of a rock falling, when all the poles and stakes are shaken with so much violence, that one would imagine all was coming to the ground. It is in the midst of these sacred agitations that the juggler pronounces the oracle, than which nothing can be more artful, for he takes the opportunity of the people's minds being disordered by fear.

In their marriage ceremonies they are very different from the Floridians. They marry as many wives as they can maintain, and nothing is more common than to find four or five sisters married to one man. She that has the first child enjoys several privileges which the others do not, so that she is considered as the head of the family next to the husband. This is generally the case wherever polygamy is tolerated. The moment a savage becomes in love with a woman, he reveals his passion, and in order to obtain the end of his wishes, he gives an entertainment to her relations. He makes her father some presents, and no sooner has he obtained the parents' consent, than he takes her home without any farther ceremony. They never marry with an intention of binding themselves to each other for life, for they cohabit together no longer than they are pleased with each other. This practice prevails throughout most of the other nations in North America, of which we shall take some farther notice afterwards.

They bury their dead with as much pomp as possible, they dress them, paint their faces and bodies with different colours, after which they lay them in coffins, made of the bark of trees, the outsides of which they make smooth with light pumice stones. They then set up a pallsade round the tomb, which is always raised seven or eight feet from the ground.

They also make entertainments for their dead, very suitable to their own manners and customs in other respects. Every thing is sad and mournful, suitable to the circumstances of the occasion. The relations of the deceased keep a deep silence, and will not allow dancing and singing. All the guests make presents to the parents and other relations of the deceased, which they throw at their feet, saying, at the same time, "This is to cover him, this is to make a hut for him, this is to surround his grave," and so on they mention other necessaries.

We must not conclude this article without taking notice, that many of these people are more civilized in their manners since the English established a company to trade there. This shews the great advantage of commerce, and the proper use that should always be made of it; namely, to polish the minds of a rude ignorant people, that they may enjoy the benefits of society, and the blessings of religion.

Religion of the Caribbee islands.

These islands, like the rest of America, were unknown to Europeans, or at least they were unfrequented by them, till the time of Columbus, in the latter end of the fifteenth century. It was found, that at that time, there were many inhabitants in them; but they were all idolaters. It cannot be ascertained, whether by some accident or other these islands, or some of them, might not have been peopled before the continent of America, but perhaps, upon a nearer inspection, the contrary will appear more probable.

It is almost established as a maxim that America was, for the most part, peopled from the continent of Europe, and if so, it must have been from the more northerly parts. The only objection to the contrary is, that some learned men have asserted that colonies were sent from Africa, but of this we have treated already at large, so that it will not be necessary to resume the subject.

It is sufficient for us that it was found inhabited by many people when Columbus first discovered it, and knowing the near affinity that the northern parts of Russia, have with the northern extremity of America, we are naturally led to rest satisfied, that the continent of that vast territory was peopled before the islands.

It was no difficult matter for the natives of the continent to go over to the islands in their canoes, one of which is now to be seen in the British Museum. These canoes are very curiously constructed, and capable of conveying people in an easy manner, from one place to another, where the voyages are not long. It is probable, that the situation of islands in sight of each other, first furnished men with the idea of navigation, and from building small canoes they came at last to construct large vessels.—The violence of a storm might drive them out of their course, and providence might direct them to an unknown shore.

We have been the more particular in our conjectures concerning the origin of these people, because we, as British subjects, have at present a very near connection with some of them. The avarice of the Europeans has extended so far, that whenever a war takes place, one or other of these islands become the properties of new masters. It is to this circumstance that those people have been so long kept in a state of ignorance; for the Roman Catholics have left nothing undone to make them superstitious devotees to the worship of saints and images, and Protestants, who attempted to convert them to a rational and spiritual religion, found all their designs frustrated, in consequence of the ambition of princes, who commenced wars against each other before such a salutary end could be answered. We shall therefore proceed to consider what these islands were when the Spaniards invaded them, what they are still considered under the notion of idolatry; and what they are at present in consequence of the extension of commerce, and the connection they have with trade.

The Spaniards have destroyed the greatest part of these islanders, and the rest of the Europeans, who copied after them, have not treated them much better; but still none of them have been able to deprive those unhappy savages of the liberty of exclaiming against their injustice, and the cruelties they have suffered under the government of their new masters. You have driven me out of my habitation, says the Caribbee, which you had not the least right to do, neither can you have the least pretensions to it.—You are continually threatening to turn me out of the little that is left me; must then the poor Caribbee be forced to take up his habitation in the sea with the fishes: Your own country must certainly be very miserable, since you quit it to turn me out of mine; and whence is it that you take so much pleasure in tormenting me? Ambition and avarice have almost obliterated in our minds all the maxims of the gospel. Our conquests will indeed have one specious pretext, viz. that of winning over the souls of the Americans to Christ; but then a converted Indian will answer, “Why do you not therefore consider me as a brother, since Christianity sets mankind in a state of freedom, and at the same time that it exhorts us to humility, fills our minds with a spirit of tenderness and humanity; a spirit which you have never once breathed with regard to us? To this we make no other answer, than that our interest calls for their subjection; that we want slaves to cultivate our land; that we have dispossessed these savages of them in order to improve them, and to search into their bowels for wealth, of which they were wholly ignorant; and so great is our infatuation, as to imagine that these venal motives suit with the gentle spirit of Christianity. But surely this cannot surprize us, when it is to be considered that some have endeavoured to justify the cruel havock which has been made of the Americans by principles drawn from religion; and have fancied the behaviour of the Israelites towards the Canaanites gave a sufficient sanction to these barbarous proceedings!

The almost total extirpation of the Caribbees gave occasion to this digression; they seem to have been destroyed with a more violent spirit of fury than the rest of the Americans; and one would think that their conquerors, in order to palliate their inhuman butcheries, had endeavoured to make them pass for the most unnatural monsters, who had neither law, nor religion; and, in a word, who had nothing human about them but their shape.

If we may believe Rochefort, the Caribbees so far from worshipping a Deity, have not so much as any word to express it by; so that whenever we speak to them concerning the Supreme Being, we are obliged to make use of a great deal of circumlocution, to give them an idea thereof. They consider the earth as a kind parent that nourishes her creatures; but they do not understand what we mean by divine essence, or the other mysteries of religion. The same is related of the greatest part of the Americans; and it is probable they confuse these barbarians with too great a multitude of ideas and arguments. They are for having them comprehend the Deity at once in the same manner as we do, and require them to believe at the first word, and on their bare word, a set of people who declare certain mysteries to them, of the truth whereof they themselves were not convinced till after long experience, a continual course of study, and a multitude of reflections; to all which, a catechism taught them in their youth, had led the way, the better to prepare their minds for imbibing the principles of the Christian faith. If it be true, that these savages have not capacity enough to understand abstracted subjects, we ought before all things to polish their minds, form them to reflection, and make them men before we go about to make them Christians.

The Caribbees acknowledge a good and an evil principle, and call them Maboia. Rochefort tells us, that they believe there are a multitude of good spirits, and that each savage imagines he has one to himself, to whom they give the name of Chemen. Other travellers tell us, they say Louque or Looko was the first man, from whom all mankind are descended; that he created fishes, and rose again three days after his death, and afterwards ascended into heaven. That after Louque's departure, the terrestrial animals were created. They believe that the earth and sea were created, but not the heavens.—They have also some idea of the flood, and ascribe the cause of it to the wickedness of mankind in those ages. Maboia, they say, is the author of eclipses; and that notwithstanding their firm persuasion of the power and malice of this evil spirit, they nevertheless pray to it; but then it is after a very irregular manner, without having any fixed time or place for that purpose; without once endeavouring to know him; without having the least distinct idea of him; without having the least love for him; and, in a word, only to prevent him doing them any harm.—Whereas they say, that since the good principle is kind and beneficent, it were needless to pray to it. And the savages mentioned in the preceding articles have the same sentiments. They are of opinion that the sun presides over the stars, and that the latter are Chemens, who are supposed to superintend over meteors and storms. We are not to omit, that these savages have their heroes, or rather demigods, who are now stars and Chemens.

They offer Cassave, and the first of their fruits to their Chemens; and sometimes out of gratitude make a feast to their honour. Rochefort tells us, that these offerings were not accompanied with either adoration or prayers, they placing them only at one corner of the hut on a table made of rushes and of Iatanira, a tree which grows in that country. Here the spirits assemble to eat and drink those oblations; a proof of which is, that the Caribbees assure us, that they hear the vessels in which the presents had been laid, move up and down, as also the noise which the mouths of those gods make at the time of their eating.

The same author relates, that they make little images resembling the form under which Maboia reveals himself to them, in order to prevent his doing them any harm. They wear those images about their necks, and pretend that it gives them ease; and that they fast and slash themselves for his sake. We are obliged to observe in this place, that Rochefort, father Labat, la Borde, and some others, both Protestants and Roman Catholics, unanimously declare, that these people are tormented with the evil spirit, who beats, scratches, nay, even wounds them in a most cruel manner, in order to force them to execute all his injunctions with the utmost exactness, and all which may be true for what we know. We have already observed, that the North Americans are also afraid of being tormented by the devil; and shall find in the sequel of this work, that those of South America are exposed to the same persecution. Father Labat assures us, that the power of this angel of darkness has no manner of ascendancy in those places where a cross is set up; and Rochefort informs us, that the devil has not the power to torture the savages when they are in the Christians. The savages, whenever the grand adversary of mankind begins to afflict them, run as fast as possible into the next Christian house they meet with, where they find a sure asylum against all the assaults of that furious assailant; and he adds, that baptism infallibly preserves those savages from the devil's blows. From these two authorities received from persons whose principles are so very different, we may, however, draw this inference, that the devil is equally afraid both of Protestants and Roman Catholics.

They have an infinite number of omens and superstitions, two of which only shall be mentioned.—They pretend that bats are Chemens whose office it is to watch during the night. They often preserve the hair or the bones of some of their deceased relations in a gourd-bottle, which they consult upon occasion; and their Boias, whom we are going to mention, make them believe that the spirits of the deceased acquaint them with the designs of their enemies.

These Boias, who are the medico-priests of the Caribbees, have each their particular genius, whom they pretend to conjure up by humming over certain words, and the smoke of tobacco. They never call upon this genius or demon but in the night-time, and that too in a place where there is neither fire nor light. We are that these Boias are wizards, and have the secret of killing their enemies with charms which they employ against them.

The old Boias make all their candidates to the priesthood go through a pretty severe discipline; for the novice is obliged from his infancy to abstain from several kinds of meats, and even to live upon bread and water in a little hut, where he is visited by no body but his masters, who make incisions in his skin. But they do not stop here; for they give him tobacco-juice, which, as it purges him in a violent manner, frees him, say they, from all terrestrial uncleanness, and prepares his mind for the reception of the Chemen. They then rub his body over with gum, which they afterwards cover over with feathers, in order to make him exact and diligent in his consultations of the genii, and ready to obey their orders. Nay, they teach him to cure the diseased, and to conjure up the spirit.

The Caribbees ascribe their diseases to Maboia; and as those people are observed to be of a very melancholy cast of mind, we may probably suppose that the nocturnal apparitions of the devil, and the torments which he inflicts upon them, are in reality no more than the chimeras of a brain very susceptible of the impressions of fear. We may ascribe part of the magical operations of the American priests to the same cause; for to impute them all would be going too far. Whenever they are desirous of knowing the issue of any illness with which they are troubled, they first lay the offering intended for Maboia upon a Matoutou, and then send for a Boia in the night-time, who immediately orders the fire to be put out, and turns out all those persons of whom he has the least suspicion. After this he goes into a corner, where he orders the patient to be brought to him, then smokes a leaf of tobacco, part of which he bruises in his hands, and snapping his fingers at the same time, blows what he had rubbed into the air. The odour of this perfume brings the Chemen, who answers the demand of the Boia; when the latter draws near to his patient, feels, presses, and handles several times successively that part where the pain lies, if it be an outward one; pretending at the same time, to draw out that which occasions it, and often sucks it. These savages also make use of the bath and fancing. If this consultation with the spirit does not give the patient any ease, the Boia physician resumes his priestly function, and after having given the patient some consolation, to prepare him for his journey to the next world, he declares to him that his god, or, if the reader pleases, his devil, is desirous of his company, and to deliver him from the miseries of this life.

If the sick person recovers, they make a feast in honour of Maboia, and set victuals and drink for him upon a Matoutou. The Cassave and the Ovicou, which they present to him, continue all night upon the table, and as, to speak with these savages, the spirit eats and drinks only in a spiritual manner, every thing they had set for him over night is found untouched in the morning. The Boia takes possession of these oblations, and the Caribbees look upon them with so much awe and veneration, that none but their old men and the chief persons of the nation are allowed to touch them. When the feast is ended, they black the patient with juniper apples, which make him as ugly as the devil himself. They have frequently feasts, or rather drunken entertainments, and it is in this manner they solemnize the return from an expedition, the birth of their children, the time appointed for the cutting off their hair, and that of their beginning to go to war.—The holding a council of war, the felling of any wood or grove, the grubbing up of a piece of ground, the building of a canoe, are all considered as solemnities. They call these feasts assemblies, or drunken entertainments.

They observe a fast upon their arriving at the state of puberty, and their being made captains, upon the death of a father or mother, wife or husband; this last article is very surprising after what has been before observed of the little affection which we are assured a husband has for his wife, and, as we may naturally suppose, a wife for her husband. If that saying be true, that friendship always meets with a reciprocal return, and that according to the maxim of count de Bussi Rabutin, all those who love are sure of being beloved, it may on the other side be as true, that hatred will be repaid with hatred. The Caribbees also fast after having killed an Arouague, that is, an enemy. They have no stated time for holding their assemblies of war, and as to all those of another kind, we have already observed that they eat, drink, and get drunk in them; to which we shall add, that in these they cut one another to pieces in cold blood.

Whenever they are about making war, some old woman draws up the whole design, and makes a speech to the company in order to stir them up to revenge; and when she sees that by the strength of her harangue, and of the Ovicou, which is their drink, the assembly begin to give manifest tokens of their being inspired with rage and fury, she then throws into the midst of them some boiled limbs of those they had killed in war; after which, a captain seconds the old lady, and makes a speech upon the same subject.

Their manner of making war is to come upon their enemies by surprise, and to fall upon them in ambuscade. They cover themselves all over with boughs and leaves, and mask themselves with an Indian cane leaf called Baliser, by making a hole for their eyes to look through. Thus equipped, they stand up close to a tree, and wait till their enemies come by, in order to beat their heads to pieces at one blow with their boutou, or club, or to shoot them with their arrows after their having passed by. Whenever they fall upon a house that is covered with leaves of cane-sticks or palm-trees, they set fire to the roof, by showering down arrows upon it, to which they tie an handful of cotton, which they light just when they let fly.

Their arrows are always poisoned, and they are full of little notches, which make so many tongues, very neatly wrought, and cut in such a manner as not to hinder the arrow from penetrating, but from coming out again without widening the wound considerably; or by driving it back to the opposite part to draw it out by making a fresh one. They always make two cuts in that part where the reed is grafted at the sharp end, in order that when it is entered into the body, the rest of the arrow may fall, and at the same time leave the poisoned end in the body. They treat the prisoners of war much after the same manner as the Canadians do theirs.

The Caribbees are jealous of their wives, and a bare suspicion of their having violated the fidelity they owe their husbands, gives them a power to kill their wives without any further ceremony. The husband is not liable to be called to an account for an affair of this nature, because the women of these islands are their husband's slaves; and notwithstanding the rigour of their slavery, we are nevertheless assured that they obey with so much exactness, silence, sweetness, and respect, that their husbands are very rarely obliged to remind them of it: an example worthy the imitation of some Christian wives, who are daily instructed from the pulpit, but to no purpose, in the duties of obedience and conjugal fidelity. This doctrine will probably be inculcated to them as long as the world stands, but will have as little effect upon them as the preaching of the gospel has with regard to the Caribbee. In fine, the female world are here such complete slaves, that a woman is never known to eat with her husband, or even in his presence. Their young girls, about twelve years of age, wear the apron, which is the characteristic of modesty and chastity; and in the Lucayan islands, when a woman knows by certain natural symptoms that her daughter may assume the name of woman, the relations meet together and make a feast: after which they give her a cotton net filled with herbs, which she wears afterwards about her thighs, for before she went stark-naked. It is true, indeed, that nakedness does not make any impression upon their senses; and we are assured they have so much virtue as to say, that when they are naked they are to be looked upon only in the face. We are also told, that when a young maiden is of an age fit for marriage, she is obliged to live for ten days together upon dry Cassave; if in this time she does not die with hunger, it is a proof that she will be a good house-wife.

Such young Caribbee women as are marriageable, are not allowed to have any commerce with their young men, for their mothers never suffer them to go out of their sight. Nevertheless, says father Labat, a young woman very seldom lives to that age, without being singled out before by some young savage, who considers her the moment he has made his declaration as his future wife, till she may be of an age of being so in effect. Among these savages, relations are permitted to marry with one another, a woman not being allowed to refuse her kinsman; they often pitch upon them when they are but four or five years of age. A brother does not marry his sister, nor a son his mother. Rochefort assures us, that they look upon this crime with horror; but that they allow so general, so extensive a liberty, with regard to all the other degrees of consanguinity, and the plurality of wives, that a man often marries three or four own sisters, who at the same time, are either his nieces or cousin-germans. They reason thus, that as they have been brought up together, they will therefore love each other the more, and preserve a greater harmony. But here their notions differ greatly from ours; and we must not forget a very whimsical custom. It sometimes happens that a Caribbee shall before-hand demand the offspring of a woman with child, provided it be a girl; which if they grant him, he marks the woman's belly with Rocou: and as soon as the girl is seven or eight years of age, he goes to bed to her, in order to inure her to the sports of Venus.

A father upon the birth of his first-born son withdraws from society, and keeps a very strict fast for forty days together; and another traveller adds, that the husband goes to bed, and acts the part of the lying-in woman; but he neither gives us the origin or reason of this custom. Here follows another that is altogether as whimsical: The time prescribed for fasting being expired, they pitch upon two young Caribbees to slash his skin, and to cut and back his body all over. They then rub the wounds with tobacco juice, after which they seat him in a chair painted red. The women bring in victuals, which the old men present to the wounded person, and feed him as we do a child; and in like manner they pour drink down his throat, holding his neck at the same time; and when he has done eating the old men present him with two pieces of Cassave, which the poor tortured father holds in his hands. The ceremony is performed in a large open place, during which he gets astride upon two Cassaves, which he is afterwards obliged to eat. We may very well suppose them to be bloody; for they then smear the child's face over with blood, which they say contributes to the making him courageous; and the more patient the father is, the more his son will be valiant. But this is not all, he is obliged to abstain for six months together from various things, every time any of his wives are brought to bed.—The moment the child is born, he is bathed in water, and if it happens in the night-time, the father bathes himself also; then the mother begins to flatten the infant's forehead, and to squash its face, which they think an addition to its beauty; and we may naturally suppose, that the education they bestow upon them is of a piece with the rest.

They name the child about a fortnight after its birth, which they take from some of the ancestors of their family, from some tree or other object that is agreeable to them; in a word, from any thing that pleases or strikes their senses. The child is named with form and ceremony? and has its sponsors, who engage to see it properly educated according to the custom of the country. They bore a hole in the child's ear, in his lower lips, and between his nostrils. They put threads into these holes, to which pendants hang dangling; but they delay the ceremony, in case the child be too weak to go through it.

All these savages have a great number of superstitious notions, and ridiculous ceremonies, founded upon lying wonders and marvellous stories. Their priests like all the others among the savages of America, are also physicians, and before they undertake to cure a patient, they consult the oracle of their idol, and when the artful impostors imagine the distemper to be incurable, they do not use any medicines. However when they think there is no sort of danger, then they use their medicines and charms, and when the patient recovers, the whole honour and merit are ascribed to them.

Some of the tribes of these people chuse their chief who is to govern them while they are at table, and they elect him who is the greatest drunkard. This general or chief, the moment he is chosen, puts his two hands over his head, and while he continues in this posture, a long harangue is made to him with regard to his duty, which being done, they make a trial of his courage, by whipping him till the blood follows the strokes. Before their priests are ordained to their sacerdotal office, they are obliged to go through a very severe probation, which like many more of their customs, is both absurd and ridiculous. They bruise green tobacco leaves, and pressing out the moisture, fill up a quantity of it in a vessel, equal to one of our common drinking glasses, and give it him who is to be received priest or boya, and he is obliged to swallow it all down. In their marriages they have no other ceremony besides that of making a formal demand of the young woman from her parents. He receives her in triumph, and conducts her home to her own hut, where an entertainment is provided for the relations. When their children are born, they put them into a sink of mud, where the innocent creatures are obliged to remain upwards of four hours, till they have invoked their idols to be propitious to him. Barbarous as their practises may seem, yet it does not come up to that of the Greeks and Romans, with whom it was common to expose their children, and desert them totally, leaving them to perish. Whereas, these savages we have been treating of, only expose their children for a short time, and the healthiness of their constitutions generally saves them.

When their relations die, they hang up their carcases in their huts, and adorn them with feathers and necklaces after all the flesh is rotted off. In some places they burn their dead, and the women drink in liquor the bones of their husbands reduced to powder; and thus, says a very learned author, (Mr. Pi-cart) they bury with their own bodies all that was dear to them in this world. One would naturally imagine that such practices must flow from a very strong natural affection; but these savages have their own notions of fashion as well as we. Both husbands and wives know the nature of formal mourning, and just as it is among us Europeans, she who appears the most affected for the loss of her husband, procures another the sooner. Some of these savages make great rejoicings on the death of their relations, and the men get drunk while the wife of the deceased howls as if she was going distracted. They always kill some of their slaves, whom they imagine will accompany the deceased into the other world, and they believe in a future state of rewards and punishments; a sentiment that was never perhaps, denied till the present age in which we live. And by whom has this fundamental and leading doctrine, in natural and revealed religion, been denied? Was it by heathens? No; for the most barbarous, the most unenlightened heathens believe in it. Was it by professed deists? No; the deists pride themselves in opposing Christianity, because (say they) all the ancient heathens as well as the modern believed, and do believe the doctrine of future rewards and punishments; and they believed this without the assistance of a supernatural revelation.

The truth is, attempts have been made to overthrow both natural and revealed religion, by men well acquainted with human learning, and whose very characters, as professed preachers of the gospel, naturally led them to stand up in its defence against the attacks of its enemies. Our Saviour foretold, that a man's greatest enemies should be those of his own household, and we have lived to see this literally fulfilled. These men pretended to belong to the household of faith, and yet have denied the leading principles. But never let such notions distract the minds of pious, humble Christians. As the whole frame of the Christian religion is built upon a plan consistent with the divine attributes, and suitable to the state of fallen nature, so it carries along with it the marks of infinite wisdom, unbounded mercy, unchangeable love, affective grace, and everlasting glory.

And will God suffer his own image to be trampled upon? No; he will support his church for the sake of his son, who shed his blood to restore unhappy creatures to his favour, and although the wicked and the impious may blaspheme, yet the glory of Christ's kingdom will bear down all manner of opposition, men shall be blessed in him, and all nations shall call him blessed. It was declared by our Saviour, that the gates of hell should never prevail against his church; and by gates is meant rulers, for judges of old sat in the gates of the city to administer justice, as they still do in some of the eastern nations of Asia. Now there is not a name that can be found so proper for those men, who under the name of Christians have actually attempted to make us believe there is no immortality, there is no name, we say, so proper for them as that of infernal judges.

But as the church was purchased by the death of Christ, so the Almighty power of God will support the kingdom of his glorious son.

God shall exalt his glorious head,
And his high throne maintain;
Shall strike the pow'rs and princes dead,
Who dare oppose his reign.

Religion of the Savages who inhabit the river of Amazons.

These people are all idolaters, and in many respects there is but little difference between them and those whom we have just now mentioned. They have a vast variety of idols, and they ascribe to them as many qualities as they please. They believe that some of them preside over the waters, and these are represented with fishes in their hands. There are others for seed time, and others again who inspire them with courage in war. They say that their deities came down from heaven, purposely to dwell among and assist them, but they do not pay them the least worship; they carry them along with them in a case or have them in any place till they want their assistance. Hence, upon their going out to war, they hoist at the prow of their canoes, that idol in whom they repose the greatest confidence, and under whose auspices they look for victory. They have the same custom when they go a fishing, and on this occasion they hoist the idol whom they believe presides over the waters.

This practice is in all respects similar to what was observed by the ancient Greeks and Romans, who had their titular Deities for every one of their undertakings. When they went on voyages, the mariners invoked Neptune as the god of the sea, and images of him were carried along with them. But still they had sometimes the figures of other deities upon their ships; for we read that when the apostle Paul and his companions were sent prisoners to Rome, the ship in which he sailed had for her sign Castor and Pollux, Acts xxiii. 11. Here we may observe, that the Roman Catholics, in conformity with the heathens of old, have their titular saints just in the same manner as the heathens had their deities. Anthony, for instance, is the saint to which mariners address themselves in all cases of danger, and when they return home, they hang up in one of their churches something in honour of him, in consequence of the deliverance they have met with.

These savages of whom we have been treating, divide the government of nature among their gods, or idols, so as to give every one his share. They never pray to them, but in cases of necessity, and perhaps in this case, there are too many Christians who follow the same practice. All the idols whom they worship, are considered as subordinate to one Supreme Being; but of that being they have very confused notions. They stand in great awe of their priests, and hold them in the utmost veneration.— They have a particular house, or rather hut, for the celebration of their ceremonies, and this is to them, what others call a church, or a temple. Their priests address themselves to their gods, and receive answers from their oracles. Their priests have a great authority over the poor deluded people, whose minds being left in a state of darkness, they can practise upon them what tricks they please. They also apply to them, as casuists, for the solution of their doubts; and here they act just in the same manner as some of those who call themselves Christian divines. The Roman Catholic priest is lord of the consciences of all his people, so that he may direct them to every purpose he thinks proper; and perhaps there are too many among our Protestant clergy, who assume the same dictatorial power. But here we find, that the glory of doing what was never commanded in scripture is not wholly their own, for the heathens claim an equal share along with them. Perhaps the heathens have a much better right to it than themselves, for as it was originally their property, we cannot see with what justice the Romans rob the heathens of it. Christ never taught them to do so, either by precept or example; nor is there a single passage in the whole of the New Testament, that gives authority to ministers to solve cases of conscience, except where moral duties are concerned, and there indeed it is easily done; for there is an everlasting difference between right and wrong. But to proceed:—

When these savages go to war, they apply to their priests for assistance against their enemies, and the first thing the priests do is to curse them. This has such a striking similarity to what is related concerning the history of Balaam, that we wonder how any person who has read civil history, can doubt the truth of divine revelation.

In the most early ages of the world, when one nation declared war against another, the first thing they did was, to appeal to their gods that their cause was just, and the priests being satisfied with what they declared, went to the borders of their territories and pronounced a solemn curse on those who had violated the public peace. Something of this nature is still to be found among some of our modern princes, who never declare war, without first endeavouring to make their neighbours believe, that they are not the aggressors. But besides pronouncing their curses upon the enemy, these priests present the soldiers with poisonous herbs and arrows, and other weapons.

When their priests die, they have such veneration for every precious relic belonging to them, that they preserve their bones, and lay them on the same cotton beds on which they used to repose when alive. Some of them keep the bodies of their deceased relations in their houses, in order to have a perpetual memento mori before their eyes. Others bury the bodies in large graves, together with every thing belonging to them in their life-time; but they all celebrate their obsequies for several days together, and this time is spent in drinking and weeping to excess. They believe in the immortality of the soul; but then it must not be supposed that they have any other notions of it, than as a corporeal substance. This is owing to the corruption of human nature, which induces men to reject what they cannot comprehend and this is, perhaps, the source of all the errors that ever yet took place in the world. Vast discoveries have been made in astronomy, during the present age; but the one half of them are no better than probable conjectures; the others are doubtful, and involved in obscurity. In philosophy, and in physics, vast discoveries have been made; but what man will say that human knowledge is complete? Men, however, should by all means endeavour to divest themselves of pride, to be ready at all times to acknowledge their own weakness, as well as their ignorance.

The foundation of all our happiness, all our honour, and all our glory, whether in time or eternity, must be laid in humility. The wisest man that ever lived in the world, says, "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." And Christ, who was greater than Solomon, says, "He that exalteth himself shall be abased, but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

Were men once to be brought acquainted with their own weakness, their own ignorance, and their own unworthiness, compared with the rectitude of the Divine Being, they would not nourish growing doubts in their minds, concerning the truth of the Christian dispensation.

We shall conclude this article in the words of the celebrated Shakespeare, which he puts in the mouth of the great Cardinal Wolsey, when he was taking leave of lord Cromwell.

"Cromwell! I charge thee, fling away ambition;
 "By that sin fell the angels; how can man then,
 "The image of his maker, hope to win by't?
 "Love thyself last: Cherish those hearts that hate "thee;
 "Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
 "Corruption was not more than honesty.
 "To silence envious tongues, be just, and fear not;
 "Let all the ends thou aim'st at, be thy country's "Thy God's, and truth's: Then if thou fall'st O "Cromwell!
 "Thou fall'st a blessed martyr: Serve the king.—
 "And pry thee lead me in;
 "Here, take an inventory of all I have,
 "To the last penny; 'tis the king's. My robe,
 "And my integrity, heaven is all
 "I care now call my own. O Cromwell! Crom"well!
 "Had I but serv'd my God, with half the zeal

"I serv'd my king, he would not, in mine age,
 "Have left me naked to mine enemies."

Religion of the Brasilians.

When these people were first discovered by the Europeans, they had neither temples nor monuments erected to any deity whatever, a circumstance in which they differed much from the Peruvians and Mexicans. And even at present they have but dark confused notions concerning the creation of the world, for they regulate their time by moons only. However, it appears that they have some faint notions of the Deity; for they often lift up their hands towards the sun and moon, in token of admiration. They have some notions of the universal deluge, for they relate, that a very powerful foreigner, who bore the most violent hatred against their ancestors, caused them all to perish by a violent inundation, two persons only excepted, whom he preserved, in order that they might propagate a new race of beings, from whom they are descended. Here we have the outlines of the truth, although obscured by fable, but even that obscurity in some measure, points out the truth.

They are very much afraid of the devil, whom they call Agneian, and yet do not pay him the least worship. They are equally afraid of thunder, which they suppose to be under the direction of one of their gods, called Toupan; and when they are told to worship the god who created thunder, they answer that it is very strange, that god, who is a being of so much goodness, should make use of thunder to terrify mankind.

They pay a great veneration to a certain fruit, about the bigness of an ostrich's egg, and shaped like a great gourd, which they call Tamaraca; but some travellers have corrupted the word, and call it Maraca. When the priests go on their visitations, they always carry this fruit along with them, and oblige the people to worship it with great solemnity. They fix these fruits at the end of a staff which they stick in the ground, then dress them with beautiful feathers, and order the inhabitants of the villages to carry their victuals and drink; for (says the priest) this is well pleasing to them, and they like to be entertained in this manner. The chiefs of their tribes, and the fathers of families go and offer part of their provisions to these Maracas; and it is considered as a very great crime for any one to take away what has been consecrated to these idols. The priests assure their votaries, that the spirit pronounces its oracle, by the mouth of the Maraca, so that here we have an instance of fruit speaking. They look upon these Maracas as domestic gods, and therefore every one is obliged to have one in his house, so as to consult it on every occasion; but they are of no service to them, unless purchased of the priests.

The essential parts of their festivals consist in dances and songs, the subjects of which are, their glorious achievements in war, and are also of use in transmitting to posterity, the memories of their warlike heroes. One of the greatest of these festivals, is that of butchering their poor miserable prisoners, who have the misfortune to be taken from their enemies in war. Having put these wretches to death under the most excruciating tortures, they then sit down and feast on the flesh. This is horrid enough, and such as human nature shudders back at the thought of; but still it is too true to admit of the least doubt, there is no exaggeration in the least, and to dispute it would be to say, that all our voyagers and travellers, many of whom were men of integrity, told nothing but falsehood.

All their Boias, or priests, are fortune-tellers, and interpreters of dreams, which knowledge they make the people believe the devil communicates to them. The Boia consults the oracle in a hut built for that purpose, where a virgin of about ten or twelve years of age, prepares a hammock for him, with a good quantity of provisions. The priest, or Boia, who is obliged to abstain for nine days together, from all commerce with women, washes himself before he goes to bed, and there consults the spirit, who is so good-natured that he never fails to answer his prayers; but it is proper to observe, that he is always alone when he consults the spirit.

These savages, in the Brazils, never marry any of their relations, within those lines of consanguinity, which we call incest; so that it seems they have, at least in that instance, some traces of morality among them. The moment a youth is considered as fit for marriage, he is allowed to look out for a wife; for they never consider whether he has means sufficient to support a family, or conduct to guide himself through the world. Formerly a young man was not permitted to marry till he had killed one of the enemy; but now, when a young savage has placed his affections upon a young woman of his own tribe, he addresses himself to her parents, and asks their consent to marry her. These savages are unacquainted with all our preliminaries of marriage, for there is no such thing among them as a declaration of a mutual passion, nor any amorous intercourse. If the young woman's relations give their consent, he is from that moment her husband, for the ceremonies afterwards are but trifling.

Polygamy is in as much esteem, among them as in any parts of Asia, and although the women frequently live together in harmony, yet their tyrannical husbands have a right to put them away whenever they please. When a woman is delivered of a child, there are many ridiculous ceremonies observed; for if it is a boy, the father lays down beside it a bow, an arrow, and a knife, exhorts it to bravery and courage, and concludes by naming him after the object that makes the greatest impression on his mind. The girls are brought up in domestic affairs, and generally married very young.

These people have some faint notions of the immortality of the soul; for they believe that when a person dies, his soul goes to reside in paradise, behind their high mountains. When a person is taken sick, one of his relations throws himself with so much violence upon him, as almost knocks out what little breath he has remaining. If the sick person dies in the evening, the following night is spent in mournings and lamentations, and the neighbours of both sexes are invited to join in the mournful solemnity.

When the patient expires, they wash and comb him, after which they wrap him up in calico, and if it be one of their chiefs, in his hammock, adorned with all his feathers and other ornaments.— They lay him in a kind of coffin, but in such a manner as not to let any earth touch the body, and they carry him provisions every day, in order to prevent his dying with hunger, after he is dead; nay, they believe that he wears himself so much with dancing in the other world, that he is glad to return to earth to get a little refreshment.

It appears evident from what we have related of those people, and indeed of all other heathens whatever, that the knowledge of the one true God, and life and immortality were never brought to light till the promulgation of the gospel, and this should teach us, above all things, to set a proper value upon that more than inestimable blessing.

Religion of the people who inhabit near the River La Plata.

The river La Plata, that is, the river of Plate, is perhaps the largest in the universe, and an inexhaustible source of wealth to the Spaniards. It was in this river that the famous Sir Francis Drake destroyed a vast number of ships belonging to the Spaniards, and brought into England an enormous load of plate. There are vast numbers of people inhabiting near the banks of this celebrated river, but the Spaniards do all they can to keep other Europeans ignorant of them. However, we have learned as much concerning them as is necessary to give us an idea of their religious sentiments.

mies as so many trophies in certain houses, which seem to have been designed for religious worship, and others adore the sun and moon. Some of these nations, at the new or full moon, make certain incisions with bones, to which they give an edge, and use them instead of knives. Those of Tucuman have some notion of a Deity, and have priests among them who act the part of sooth-sayers, upon which Coreal makes the following just reflection: "I am of opinion, says he, that wherever there are priests, there must necessarily be some shadow of religion, and that the one is always relative to the other." However, the dispute does not relate to the true signification of the word religion, but to the idea only. The other savages of Paraguay and Uragha, that is, those whom the Jesuits have not civilized, do not differ from these Tucumans in these particulars. Their priests are also physicians, as in other places, and cure their patients by sucking the diseased part, or by the smoke of tobacco. They admit an universal spirit who pervades matter, and acts on all parts of it; but this is too philosophical for savages. Let us rather say, that they imagine every thing is formed with its peculiar genius or spirit, which flows from their gross ignorance; though after all, it is certain, that some very polite nations, both ancient and modern, have supposed the immediate action of an universal spirit, and that of genii upon earthly bodies. Agreeable to this notion, we are assured, that the savages in question address invocations to these genii, and some worship a pretended invisible tiger.

Such as are candidates for the priesthood or physic, are obliged to fast often, and for a long time together; must have fought several times against wild beasts, particularly tigers, and at least have been bit or scratched by them. After this, they may be raised to the priesthood; for they look upon tigers as almost divine animals, and the imposition of his holy paw is as honourable among them, as the receiving the doctor's cap in the university of Salamanca in Spain. Afterwards, the juice of certain distilled herbs is poured upon their eyes, and this is the priestly anointing; after which, these new priests know how to calm the spirits of all beings, animate, or inanimate; hold secret intelligences with those spirits, and share with them in their virtues.

There are other medico-physicians superior to the above-mentioned, whose office extends no farther than to calm the spirits, and receive their oracles.—They never attain to this supreme dignity till after having practised physic for a long course of years; they are also obliged to fast for a whole year together, and their abstinence, says the relation of the Moxes, must exhibit itself by their pale and wan countenances. At certain seasons of the year, particularly at the new moon, they assemble their people on some hill at a little distance from the town. At break of day, all the assembly march to that place with a deep silence, but the moment they arrive at the halting place, they break out into hideous cries, say they, to mollify the hearts of their deities. The whole day is spent in fasting and confused noises, and, towards the evening, they conclude with the following ceremonies. The priests begin by cutting the hair, which among them is a token of great joy and gladness, and cover their bodies with red and yellow feathers; which being done, they have great vessels brought them, into which they pour the liquor prepared for the solemnity; this they receive as the first fruits offered to their idols, of which they drink moderately, then give it to all the people, who quaff it off to great excess, and the whole night is spent in drinking and dancing. One of them sings the song, when all of them drawing round him in a circle, begin to draw their feet after them in cadence, and to loll their heads from one side to another with a careless air, at the same time throwing their bodies into very indecent postures; and the warmth of their piety and religion, is judged by the distortions into which they throw themselves.

Some other nations, who are all confounded under the name of Moxes, in the relations of the Jesuits, worship the sun, moon, and stars, and others pay adoration to rivers. Some always carry about them a great number of little idols, made in a very ridiculous shape. Every act of piety and religion flows from a principle of fear, and among so great a number of people, to whom the missionaries and Spaniards have given the name of Moxes, they, says the author of that relation, have not been able to discover but one or two nations who employ any kind of sacrifice. Their medico-physicians, enchanters, or quacks, prescribes also to their sick, but we do not hear that they take their degrees like the priests of Paraguay: Be that as it will, when the former are sent for to the sick, they mumble certain-superstitious prayers over them, promise to fast for their health's sake, and to smoke tobacco a certain number of times every day. But it may be a question whether they really do it as sincerely as they pretend to do? They also suck the deceased parts, which is a prodigious favour; after this they withdraw, but upon condition, however, of being liberally rewarded for their services.

Their marriage consists in the mutual consent of both parties, and in some presents which the bridegroom makes to the bride's father, or nearest relation. The consent of those who contract it, is looked upon as nothing; and they have another very whimsical custom among them, viz. that a wife may live where she pleases, and her husband is obliged to follow her up and down. If they have but one wife, it is because they can get no more, for they favour polygamy both by custom and inclination, and always put it in practice whenever they have an opportunity to do it. They look upon the incontinence of women as a most enormous crime; and if any of them happens to run counter to her duty, she is looked upon as an infamous creature, and a prostitute, and is liable to be put to death.— If men are unjust in any thing, it is certainly on this occasion; for why are not women allowed to punish the lewdness of men? Or at least, why do we not indulge a sex whose frailty is the daily subject of our ridicule, to divert themselves at the men's expense, who are vastly more frail than women? forgetting twenty times a day at their feet, their so much boasted strength of mind, and sacrificing all that is most valuable to their charms.

The women prepare the liquor which their husbands drink, and take care of the children. They have the barbarity, whenever a woman dies, to bury her little children with her, and in case she happens to be brought to bed of twins, she buries one of them, and the reason she gives for it is, that it is impossible to nurse two children well together. They have a very obscure idea of the immortality of the soul, and bury their dead with very little ceremony. The relations of the deceased dig a grave, whither they attend upon the body with a deep silence, which is interrupted by nothing but sobs; and as soon as the body is laid in the ground, they divide between themselves the things it was wrapt in. Father Sepp tells us, in a letter of his published in the eleventh collection of curious and edifying letters, That some people of Paraguay cut off their own fingers, and afterwards their toes, according as their relations go off the spot. A man is very unhappy in that country who has a great many old relations, for he runs the hazard of being mutilated very young: But then we may ask father Sepp, if he himself was an eyewitness to that unaccountable mutilation.

The truth is, the Jesuits in all their accounts of these people, consider particular practices as general rules; and thus because there really are some such enthusiasts among these people, who cut off their fingers and toes, so they have told us that they all do so. There are many women in the East Indies, as has been already taken notice of, who burn themselves along with the dead bodies of their husbands; but this is so far from being an imposed law, that no one is obliged to do it.

Indeed, when we consider the nature of the Spanish government, and the bigotry of the people, we need not be surprised that these savages have remained so long in ignorance. The heathens see nothing in the Romish ceremonies, except a few gaudy genteel ornaments; and probably the man of reading and experience, will pay little regard to the difference subsisting between rudeness and politeness in religion, so as both consist of idolatry.

Religion of the Peruvians.

Peru was long a celebrated empire, and if we may believe some writers, silver and gold were in as great plenty here, as the basest metals, nay, even as coals are with us. But what we have to treat of are their religious sentiments.

The Peruvians, before their being governed by their Lucas, worshipped a numberless multitude of gods, or rather geni. There was no nation, family, city, street, or even house, but had its peculiar gods, and that because they thought none but the god to whom they should immediately devote themselves, was able to assist them in time of need. They worshipped herbs, plants, flowers, trees, mountains, caves; and in the province of Puerto Viego, emeralds, tigers, lions, adders; and, not to tire the reader with a numeration of the several objects they thought worthy of religious worship, every thing that appeared wonderful in their eyes, was thought worthy of adoration.

These ancient idolators of Peru offered not only the fruits of the earth and animals to these gods, but also their captives, like the rest of the Americans. We are assured that they are used to sacrifice their own children, whenever there was a scarcity of victims. These sacrifices were performed by cutting open the victims alive, and afterwards tearing out their hearts; they then smeared the idol, to whom they were sacrificing, with the blood yet reeking, as was the custom of Mexico. The priest burnt the victim's heart, after having viewed it in order to see whether the sacrifice would be agreeable to the idol. Some other idolators offered their own blood to their deities, which they drew from their arms and thighs, according as the sacrifice was more or less solemn; and they even used, on extraordinary occasions, to let themselves blood at the tips of their nostrils, or between the eye-brows. We are, however, to observe, that these kinds of bleeding were not always an act of religious worship, but were often employed purely to prevent diseases.

Such was the state of idolatry all over Peru, when Mango-capac, the law-giver of that vast empire, taught those savages the worship of the sun and the Supreme God, under the name of Pachacamac.— Before we make any reflections on that new religion, we must inform the reader, that Mango-capac and his wife were the children of the sun, and that they both received a commission of equal import from that planet, to teach and humanize the Peruvians.— They set out from Titicaca, and guiding themselves with a golden rod which the sun had given them, and which was to sink in the earth when they were come to the place where they were to settle by the command of that planet; they accordingly travelled northward, having continual instances of the virtue of this golden rod, which at last sunk down in the valley of Cusco; and it was here they took a resolution of fixing the seat of empire. Immediately this offspring of the sun employed spiritual weapons; the brother and sister began to preach their father's religion, and made a great number of proselytes, who possibly might have been as much won over by the novelties of the equipage, and the advantages of the new religion, as by the force of inward conviction. The boldness of these missionaries, their surprising vocation, the ideas of power and superiority which they infused into the minds of those gross and brutish people, raised them undoubtedly a considerable number of followers in a little time; among whom; the new law-giver was particularly careful of making choice of the ablest and most skilful, for the better establishing his authority, which he afterwards enlarged by conquest, and at last abolished the ancient religion, commanding, says the Inca Garcilasso, all his subjects to worship the sun. This Inca Mango-capac, not satisfied with making a reformation among his subjects in things relating to the Deity, also gave them excellent political laws, and founded such wonderful institutions as might justly be compared to the most boasted among the Europeans.

The last words of that monarch merit our utmost attention. He above all recommended to the Peruvians, the worshipping of the sun as their god and father. It must necessarily have happened, says the Inca Garcilasso, that Mango-capac having a perfect knowledge of the stupidity of this people, and the great need they had of being instructed in the duties of morality, judged it would be proper for him to feign that he and his wife were the offspring of the sun, and that their father had sent them from heaven. The better to possess the Peruvians with this opinion, he appeared among them in a splendid manner, and distinguished himself particularly by the largeness of his ears, which were of so incredible a size, that we could never have believed that circumstance, had it not been seen in his descendants.

In this manner the ancient law-givers made an advantage of the favourable opinion their people had of them; and some of them have even had artifice enough to make a merit of certain pretty remarkable defects, both of body and mind. The long and repeated retirements of Numa Pompilius, during which he was probably seized by violent fits of melancholy, and the ecstasies of Mahomet, are well known. And as Mango-capac, continues Garcilasso, corroborated the fiction of his genealogy by the great advantages he procured his subjects, they really believed him to be the offspring of the sun, and that he was come from heaven to assist them.

These would almost persuade us, that they were guided by a more exalted principle than that of nature, were we not certain that several ancient legislators exhibit as shining examples of the force of natural truths.

The virtuous Mango-capac was soon after deified; his subjects raised altars to his honour, and to his successors after him; not but they were persuaded that those Incas were mortal men, but they had paid them these honours out of gratitude for the favours they had received from the posterity of the sun, whom, we are told, they worshipped only.

In order to make this system of religion appear less absurd and ridiculous, we must suppose that they considered their Incas in the same light as the ancient Greeks did their heroes, and the Romans, Romulus, and some of their emperors. They might imagine that the children of the sun, became the titular divinities of the kingdom, and that in recompence for the virtues they had practised in this mortal life, they enjoyed the privilege of being the depositaries, as it were, of their prayers, as also of presenting them to that planet. However, the Peruvians denied, pretty strongly, the consequences which might have been drawn from their practice.

Garcilasso relates, that the above-mentioned people, in process of time, built temples to the sun, and embellished them with ornaments of prodigious value; but they did not pay the same honours to the moon, for though they looked upon her as both wife and sister of the sun, and even as mother of the Incas, we yet do not meet with one single instance of their paying any worship to that goddess, or their having sacrificed on her altars, or erected temples to her glory, though at the same time they had her in the utmost veneration, so far that they call her the universal mother of all things; but their idolatry went no farther. They called thunder and lightning, the executors of the sun's justice; and in that quality they were honoured so far, as to have an apartment allotted to them in the house of the sun at Cusco. But this is no consequence of their having been ranked among the number of the gods, as a Spanish historian would persuade us they were, so far from it, that if a house, or any other place happened to be struck with thunder, it was so much detested by them, that they immediately stopped up the door with dirt and stones, in order to prevent any one's ever entering into it; and if any thunder happened to fall in the country, they always pointed out the place with stakes, or such marks, in order to prevent any one's walking over it. In a word, they give the epithets of unhappy and cursed to those places, and added, that the sun sent down those curses upon them, by the mediation of thunder, which they considered as his lackey, and the minister of justice.

Notwithstanding they adhered so zealously to the worship of the sun, yet the most knowing among the Indians acknowledge a soul of the world, or rather first mover of matter, called by them Pachacamac, which Garcilasso tells us signifies expressly, he who animates the world. He adds, that their veneration for this word was so great, that they did not dare to utter it; but in case they were forced to do it any time, they always pronounced it with the greatest tokens of submission and respect, shrugging up their shoulders, stooping their heads and bodies, lifting up their eyes towards heaven, and on a sudden casting them on the ground; laying their hands extended on the right shoulder, and kissing the air.—They paid a considerable part of this worship to the sun, and even to the Incas, nevertheless Garcilasso relates, that they had in reality a much greater veneration for Pachacamac than for the sun. They acknowledged, that he alone animated and continued the universe; but then, as they had never seen him, they considered him as the unknown God, or rather an invisible and immaterial Being. From an answer which the Inca Atahualpa made, one would be apt to think, that the word Pachacamac was one of the sun's attributes. The Peruvians took the character of Cupai to be directly opposite to that of Pachacamac, and whenever they were obliged to name him, they used to spit upon the ground, in token of their mortal aversion for that wicked being. They only paid a bare respect to the moon, in quality of the sun's wife and sister; and they honoured the stars, whom they said were the women, or maids of honour to the house of these planets.

Here follows the account that Garcilasso gives of the Huacas or Guacas, which seems more just and rational than what Purchas has cited in his collections, upon the authority of several Spanish authors. Garcilasso informs us, that the word Huaca signifies idol and sacred things; such were the representations of the sun; the offerings they made him, such as the figures of men, birds, quadrupeds, in gold, silver, and wood; not excepting rocks, trees, stones, caverns, temples, and tombs, which God sanctified either by his presence or his oracles. They also give the name of Huacas to the genii; to the heroes ranked among the immortals; to all such things as were most beautiful and excellent in their kind, and even to the misshapen and monstrous. The Spaniards, continues Garcilasso, who were ignorant of these various significations, imagined that the Indians took all those things to which they gave the name of Huacas for deities, and likewise fancied that the Peruvians worshipped hills and hillocks under the name of Apachitas, for want of knowing that the corrupted word Apachecta, which often signifies, he who causes to support or surmount some difficulty, expressed, in the Laconic way of speaking, used by the Indians, the following kind of blessing: Let us return thanks to him who has enabled us to support the fatigue we have undergone in walking up this hill.

These prayers were offered up to Pachacamac, whom they then worshipped mentally, for having assisted them in this fatigue. When they were got to the top of the hill, they laid down their burthens, in case they carried any; and after having lifted up their eyes to heaven, they cast them down on the ground, and gave the same tokens of adoration as they used with regard to Pachacamac. Moreover, they repeated the dative Apachecta two or three times over, and afterwards used, by way of offering, to pull up the hairs from their eye-brows, and whether they tore them up or not, they always blew them in the air, as if they intended to wait them to heaven. They had also a custom of putting an herb called Cuca, in their mouths, which they threw into the air, in token that they offered all their most precious things to Pachacamac. They were even so foolishly superstitious as to offer him splinters of wood, or even straws, in case they could not meet with any thing better, or some flint stone; and for want of these, a handful of earth. Large pieces of these offerings were seen upon the tops of the hill. They never looked up to the sun when they performed these ceremonies, because they did not then worship that planet, but Pachacamac.

The Incas, and the Peruvians their subjects, used to sacrifice several sorts of animals in honour of the sun. They also offered him cocoa, corn, rich clothes, and a liquor made of water and maize.—They always presented the last offering to the sun, in the following manner: When they were very dry, they first fell to eating, and afterwards dipt the tip of their finger in the vessel into which the liquor was poured, and this being done, they lifted up their eyes to heaven in a very submissive manner; shook that finger on which the drop hung, and offered it to the sun, as an acknowledgement for his goodness in providing drink for them. At the same time they gave two or three kisses to the air, and this oblation being made, they all drank as they thought proper. Every time they entered into their temples, the chief man in the company laid his hand on one of his eye-brows, and whether he tore off any of the hairs from thence or not, he blew it into the air before the idol, as a mark of its being an oblation. They paid the same adoration to trees, and to all such things as they imagined a divine virtue had made sacred and religious.

of Cusco, because of its being founded by Mangocapac, and we shall observe that heathen Rome had anciently the same reverence paid to it by its inhabitants. At Cusco was that wonderful temple of the sun, the beauty and riches whereof surpassed imagination; we shall transcribe the description which the Inca Garcilasso has given us thereof. His words are as follows: The high altar of this pompous edifice stood eastward, and the roof which was made of timber, and very thick, was thatched over, they having no tile or brick among them. The four walls of the temple, to consider them from the top downwards, were all covered over with plates of gold. On the high altar was made the figure of the sun, which was also represented on a gold plate, twice as thick as those above mentioned. This figure, which was made of one continued piece, was represented with a round face, surrounded with rays and flames, in the same manner as our painters usually draw it. It was of so prodigious a breadth, that it almost covered one side of the wall, on which nothing was represented but that idol: the reason of which was, because this was the only one those Indians had, either in that or any other temple; nor did they worship any other deity than the sun, whatever some writers may affirm to the contrary.

On each side of the image of the sun, the several bodies of their deceased monarchs were ranged in order, according to the course of their respective reigns, and so embalmed, the manner of which was a secret, that they seemed to be alive. They were seated on thrones of gold, raised on plates of the same metal, with their faces looking towards the bottom of the temple; but Huana-capac, the best beloved of all the sun's children, had the peculiar advantage above the rest, of being placed directly opposite to the image of that planet; and that, because of his having merited adoration during his lifetime, and for having practised the most exalted virtues, and discovered qualities worthy the greatest monarch, from his very infancy. But upon the coming of the Spaniards, the Indians hid those bodies with the rest of the treasure; and notwithstanding the strictest search had been made after them, they are not yet found.

This temple had several gates, which were all covered over with plates of gold, the chief of which looked towards the north, as it still does to this day. Moreover, round the walls of this temple was a plate of gold, in the shape of a crown or garland, and above an ell broad. On one side of the temple was a cloister, built in a quadrangular form, and in its highest enclosure a garland of pure gold, an ell broad, like the above-mentioned. Round this cloister were five great square pavilions, or houses, covered over in the shape of a pyramid. The first was built for the habitation of the moon, the sun's wife, and stood the nearest to the great chapel of the temple; the doors and inclosures of it were covered with silver plates, its white colour denoting that it was the apartment allotted to the moon, whose figure was painted like that of the sun, but with this difference, that it stood upon a silver plate, and was represented with a woman's face. It was here these idolators came and offered up their prayers to the moon, whom they imagined to be sister and wife to the sun, the mother of their Incas, and of their whole posterity. In quality of this last, they gave her the name of Mama Quilca, or Mother Moon, but without offering any sacrifices to her as to the sun. On both sides of this figure were the bodies of their deceased queens, ranged in order, according to their antiquity. Mania Oello, mother to Huayacapac, had her face turned towards the moon, and from a peculiar advantage, was placed above the rest, because of her being the mother of so worthy a son.

Next to the mansion of the moon, was that of Venus, the Pleiades, and those of all the other stars. They gave the name of Chasca to the planet Venus, by which her long and curled hair was signified.—Venus was, moreover, greatly honoured, because they fancied her to be the sun's page, saying, that she sometimes went before, and at other times behind him. They also paid great reverence to the Pleiades, because of their wonderful disposition, and their appearing to be equal in magnitude. The others in general were called the moon's waiting-maids, and for this reason they have an apartment assigned them near their lady, in order to be at hand whenever she wants them, because they imagined that the stars were fixed in the sky for the service of the moon, and not that of the sun, since they are visible in the night only. This apartment and its great gate were covered over with plates of silver, like that of the moon, and its roof seemed to represent the sky, being adorned with stars of different magnitudes. The third apartment next this last was sacred to thunder and lightning.

The two last were not considered as gods, but as the sun's lackeys, and they had the same idea of them, as the ancient heathens had of thunder, which they looked upon as an instrument of Jupiter's vengeance. For this reason, their Incas assigned an apartment, ceiled with gold, to thunder and lightning, which they fancied were the sun's domestics, and consequently reside in his house; and they did not represent either of these images in relievo, or on a flat surface, and that because they could not copy them from the life, they chiefly studying nature in all their images; but they honoured them under the name of Yllapa. The Spanish writers have not yet found out the signification of this word; for some of these have endeavoured to draw a parallel between their idolatry and our holy religion, in this respect; but they have been prodigiously mistaken in it, as well as in several other particulars, wherein they have sought, though with less foundation, for symbols or signs of the blessed Trinity, by giving such an explication as they thought proper, to the names of the country, and ascribing a belief to the Indians which they never had, as has been already shewn in another place.

The fourth apartment was sacred to the rain-bow, because they found that it owed its birth to the sun. This apartment was all enriched with gold, and the rain-bow was represented after the life; on plates of this metal, with all its variety of colours, on one of the faces of the building, and this phenomenon was drawn so prodigiously large, that it reached from one wall to the other. They called it Cuychu, and had it in very great veneration; and whenever it appeared in the air, they immediately shut their mouths, and put their hands upon it, imagining that were they to open it ever so little, their teeth would infallibly rot. The fifth and last apartment was that of the high priest, and of the other priests, who administered in the temple, and who were all obliged to be of the royal blood of the Incas. This apartment, enriched like the rest, with gold from top to bottom, was not used either for eating or sleeping, but as an apartment for giving audience, and to consult about such sacrifices and other things as related to the service of the temple.

We must not omit a very remarkable circumstance, which is, that in the temple of Cusco, there were the several gods of those nations whom the Incas had conquered. These were there served and adored in the presence of the sun, but their worship was conditional. They were first obliged to worship that planet in quality of the great god, upon which consideration, they were permitted to serve the other deities; and such was the state policy of the Incas, who did not make a dreadful havoc of men's consciences, by terrifying them with sword and halber. On the contrary, they were of opinion, that some regard ought to be paid to the religion of a vanquished people, and justly perceived that it would insensibly die away at the sight of a worship, which, as it was less absurd, was at the same time supported by the royal authority; nor were they mistaken in their conjectures, for the worship of the sun was more and more received, and would have rooted out that of their strange gods, had not the empire of the Incas been destroyed by the Spaniards. But we shall drop these reflections, and leave the reader to draw such conclusions as he shall judge proper, from what has been already mentioned.—We shall not describe the pompous temple at Titicaca, but refer the reader to their other ceremonies. This was one of the most solemn ceremonies of the great feast of that planet, which was kept in June, and is a proof of what we before advanced, viz. that Pachacamac was one of the attributes of the sun, that resplendant fire, which was anciently worshipped by the Persians and Chaldeans. The Peruvians asserted, that in this solemn feast they particularly worshipped the father of light, as being the sole, supreme and universal god, whose light and virtue gave birth and nourishment to all worldly beings. They also solemnized it as a public acknowledgment that the sun was the father of the first Inca, and of all his posterity.

The festival opened with sacrifices, and they said it was not lawful to use any fire in those sacrifices, but that which was presented them by the sun's own hand; for this purpose they made use of a great bracelet, called Chipana, like those which the Incas wore on their left wrists, with this difference, that that which was worn by their chief priest was larger than the rest. They had instead of a medal, a concave vessel, about the bigness of half an orange, very smooth and glittering. They placed directly opposite to the sun, and in a certain point where the rays which shot from the vessel were collected; and applied to it instead of a match, a little cotton lint, which immediately took fire from a natural effect. With this fire thus lighted, and given by the hand of the sun, they used to burn their victims, and roasted all the flesh which they eat that day.

After that, they took some of the same fire, carried it to the temple of the sun, and the house of the virgin's elect, and there it was preserved all the year; and its going out was considered as a very unlucky omen. In case the sun happened not to shine out the eve before the festival, on which day every thing was prepared for the sacrifice that was to be made on the morrow, and consequently if there were no possibility of getting fire that way, they then took two little sticks, about as thick as one's thumb, and half an ell in length, made of a wood called Vyaca, very like cinamon, and these, by being rubbed together very hard, had several sparks of fire drawn out of them which set fire to the match. Notwithstanding that this was a very good way of striking fire, they nevertheless, when necessity forced them to use it in the sacrifices which were made on their festivals, discovered a deep affliction, and looked upon it as a very ill omen, saying, that the sun must necessarily be very angry with them since he refused to give them fire with his hand.

The chief captains of the empire, and the Curacas or Caciques, always assisted at this festival: These, when they were prevented from administering at it in person, either by very urgent affairs, or extreme old age, used always to send their sons or brothers, accompanied with the noblest of their relations as their proxies. The Inca, in quality of son to the glorious planet of the day, always opened the festival; nor could he be prevented from so doing, unless war called him another way, or he was obliged to make a progress through his empire.—All the nobility of the empire went in procession to present their oblations to the sun, and the Curacas appeared in a most splendid, but very whimsical dress. Some of these had robes, adorned with gold and silver plates, and garlands of the same on their caps, and others were dressed in lions' skins.

After these there advanced others, whom, with regard to their dress, we shall take the liberty of comparing to angels, they wearing the wings of a bird to which they give the name of Cuntur. These wings were speckled black and white, and sixteen feet long from end to end, and those who adorned themselves with the feathers of these birds, did it purely to shew they were descended from them.—The Yuncas used to disguise themselves with certain frightful masks, by which means they made the most hideous figures that fancy could possibly paint. To see the apish tricks and distortions they made in those assemblies, one would have taken them for mad men; and to make themselves appear more completely so, they used to make a confused noise of dissonant instruments, such as flutes and drums, holding torn skins in their hands, and with these they used to play a thousand silly tricks. After these Curacas there advanced others dressed in a different manner, and each nation carried the weapons used by them in war, such as bows, arrows, lances, javelins, long and short hatchets, to fight either with one or both hands.

There were others also who wore ornaments, on which were represented the glorious actions they had performed in honour of the sun, and of their Incas; and others again were attended by a great train of servants, who played on atables, and blew on the trumpet. In a word, every nation appeared there in as much pomp and splendor, and with as great a train of domestics as they could possibly procure; they all endeavouring to rival their neighbours in grandeur and magnificence. They always prepared themselves for the solemnity of this festival by a most strict fast, eating nothing every third day but a little white raw maize, with certain herbs called Chucani, nor ever drank any other liquor but water. During this time, they abstain from all commerce with their wives, nor were fires made in any part of the city.

After this fast, on the eve of the feast of the sun the Inca priests, whose office it was to perform that sacrifice, spent the night in getting ready the sheep and lambs which were to be sacrificed; and they also prepared the victuals and drink that were to be presented as an oblation to the sun: These several affairs were settled, after they had first taken a pretty exact account of the number of the people who were assembled at the festival; for not only the Curacas, the ambassadors, their relations, their domestics and subjects, partook of these oblations, but likewise all the nations in general who were then present at the solemnity. On the same night the women of the sun were employed in kneading a kind of dough called Cancu; and this they made in little round loaves, about the bigness of an apple. We are to observe that these Indians never made their corn into bread except at this solemn feast, and another called Citua, and then they never eat more than two or three pieces of it; for their common bread was called Gara, which was a kind of pulse; and the corn of which it was made was either baked or parched. None but such chosen virgins as had devoted themselves to the sun, in order to be his wives, were permitted to knead the dough of which that bread was made, particularly that which was eaten by the Incas and those of the royal blood, or to prepare the other viands which were to be eaten on that feast; because on that day the sun's children did not eat their father, but rather the sun gave a banquet to his children. The common people were waited on by a numberless multitude of other women, who prepared their victuals, and took a vast deal of care in working up the bread which was made for their use, and was always of the finest flour. They were not allowed to eat any of it except on this solemn day, which was the greatest of all their festivals, for they thought this bread to be of a very sacred nature.

On the most solemn day of the feast, the Inca appeared in public, accompanied with his relations; when he went with all his train to the great square in Cusco, and there waited barefooted till such time as the sun should rise, during which he looked attentively towards the east. The moment he saw it appear upon the horizon, he fell prostrate on his knees, and opening his arms directly opposite to his face, kissed the air. The Curacas and other of the nobles of the empire stood at some distance, and worshipped the sun in imitation of the Inca, and the princes of the blood. Then the Inca rose up, the rest continuing still upon their knees, and took two great golden vases, filled with drink, and at the same time he, in quality of chief of the sun, lifted up one of those vases, and shewing it to the sun, invited him to drink. The Peruvians were persuaded that this planet pledged the Inca and all the princes of the blood.

After the Inca had invited the sun to drink in this manner, he poured all the liquor that was in the vessel dedicated to the sun, which he held in his right hand, into a golden tub with ears, whence the drink diffused itself as from a spring into a pipe that was curiously wrought, and which reached from the great square to the house of the sun. When that was done, he drank a little of it, as his portion, out of the vessel which he held in his left hand, and at the same time the rest was divided among the lucas, by a little gold or silver vessel which each of them had brought with him. In this manner they insensibly emptied the Inca's vessel, the liquor whereof, according to them, was sanctified by his hand, or that of the sun, whose virtue is communicated to them. All those of the royal blood took a draught of this liquor, but they gave the Curacas the drink which the sun's wives had made, and not that which they believed to be sanctified.

This ceremony ended, which was no more than a prelude to a quaffing-bout, they marched in order to the house of the sun, when all, the king excepted, pulled off their shoes and stockings at two hundred paces distance from the gates of the temple. Then the Inca and his relations entered it, as being the sun's legitimate offspring, and prostrated themselves before his image. In the mean time, the Curacas, who thought themselves unworthy of entering his temple, because they were not related to him, stood without in a great court which was before the gate; and the very moment the Inca had, with his own hand, offered the golden vessel, with which he had performed the ceremony, the rest gave theirs to those Inca priests who had been nominated and dedicated to the sun; for they only were allowed to execute that office, and not even those who were related to the sun, unless they were of the priesthood. When the sacrificers had offered the vessels of the Inca, they went all to the door, to receive those of the Curacas, who all walked according to their respective ranks, and in the order of time they had been reduced under the empire of Incas. Besides their vessels, they also presented to the sun several gold and silver pieces, representing in miniature, but very naturally, various kinds of animals, as sheep, lambs, lizards, toads, adders, foxes, tigers, lions, birds of all kinds, and every thing that grew in their respective provinces.

The offering being ended, each of them returned in order to his place, and at the same time the Inca priests were seen advancing forwards with a great number of lambs, barren ewes of all colours, for they are naturally speckled in this manner, like the Spanish horses. Out of all these beasts, which belonged to the sun, they took a black lamb; the Indians making choice of that colour preferably to any other, particularly in their sacrifices; because, according to them, it had something divine in it. To this they added, that a black beast was generally so all over the body, whereas a white one has commonly a black spot upon its snout, which they looked upon as a blemish, and for this reason their kings were generally dressed in black, and their mourning habits were of a mouse colour.

The first sacrifice which they made of a black lamb, was in order to obtain happy or unhappy presages of the solemnity of their feast; for these people in every important action, whether in peace or war, always sacrificed a lamb, when they took out its heart and lights, in order thereby to judge whether or no their obligation would be agreeable to the sun; if the war in which they were going to be engaged, would be happy or unsuccessful, and whether the earth would yield an abundance of fruits that year. But we are to observe, that they always sacrificed different animals, according to the nature of the presages which they were desirous of obtaining by that means, as lambs, sheep, barren ewes; for they never killed any but what were so, nor eat their flesh till such time as they were past bringing forth young. In these sacrifices they took the lamb or sheep which they had marked out for slaughter, with its head turned eastward, without tying its feet together; but three or four men held it with all their strength, to prevent its stirring. They then ripped up its left side, the beast being still alive, and thrusting in their hands, took from thence the heart, the lights, and all the rest of the harslet, which they were obliged to pull out entire, without tearing the least part of it.

They were as superstitious at least as the Greeks and the Romans in inspecting the entrails of their victims, and this is manifest from that passage of the history of the Incas above cited. When the lights, after being just taken out, were found still panting, it was looked upon to be so happy an omen, that all other presages were considered as indifferent or of no consequence; because, said they, this alone sufficed to make them propitious, how unhappy soever they might be. After they had taken out the harslet, they blew up the bladder with their breath, then tied it up at the end, or squeezed it close with their hands, observing at the same time how the passages, through which the air enters into the lungs, and the small veins which are generally found there, were swelled; because the more they were inflated, the more the omen was propitious.— They also observed several other particulars, which it would be a difficult matter for us to relate.

They looked upon it as an ill omen, if while they were ripping up the beast's side, it rose up and escaped out of the hands of those who held it down, and they also looked upon it as ill boding, if the bladder, which generally joins to the harslet, happened to break, and had thereby prevented the taking it out entire; or if the lights were torn, or the heart putrified, and so on.

ficed victim; this they distributed among all persons who were present at this solemnity, viz. to the Incas, and afterwards to the Caracas, and their train, according to their respective ranks. After they had been thus served up with meat, bread (which Garcilasso calls Cancu) was given them. They were then served with other kinds of victuals, all which they used to eat without drinking; the Peruvians not being allowed to drink at meals. They never drank till these were over, but then they would drink as copiously as any of the European nations.

They also had other festivals, and that to which Garcilasso gives the name of Cita, was very remarkable, and might be looked upon as a general lustration or purging by sacrifice. The design of this lustration was, to cleanse the soul from those pollutions which it contracts with the human body, and to preserve the latter from the diseases to which it is exposed. These people always prepared themselves for it by fasting; were obliged to abstain from all commerce with women, and fast for twenty-four hours.

The Peruvians, the night after the feast, used to knead pieces, or balls of Cancu, in a very devout manner; laid them in earthen kettles, and parboiled them till such time as the Cancu was collected into one great lump. Of this they made two sorts, one was mixed with blood, which they drew from between the eye-brows and nostrils of young children. All those who had fasted, washed their bodies before day-break, and afterwards rubbed their heads, their faces, their stomachs, shoulders, arms, and thighs, with the above-mentioned dough, in order, said they, by this purification, to drive away diseases and all kinds of infirmities. The purification being ended, the oldest person of the highest quality in each family, took some of the above-mentioned dough, rubbed the door of his house with it, and left it sticking, to shew that his house was purified. The high-priest performed the same ceremony in the palace, and in the temple of the sun, whilst his subalterns or deputies purified the chapels and other sacred places. The moment the sun began to appear, they began worshipping it, and an Inca of the royal family presented himself in the great square at Cusco, magnificently robed, having a lance in his hand, adorned with feathers of various colours, and enriched with a great number of gold rings; which lance was also used for a standard in war time. This Inca went and joined himself to four others, who likewise were armed with lances, which he touched with his own; and this was a kind of consecration. He then declared, that the sun had made choice of them to drive away diseases and infirmities; upon which these four ministers of the sun immediately set out to execute their orders: They then visited the several quarters or districts, upon which occasion every body came out of their houses, shook their garments, and rubbed their heads, faces, arms, and thighs. Such were the ceremonies which they thought purified them; and the whole was accompanied with great acclamations of joy. The ministers of the sun took away those evils which the people had just got rid of, and drove them to five or six leagues distance from the city.

The night following, the above-mentioned Incas ran up and down with straw torches, after which they came out of the city, and this nocturnal lustration was of service in driving out those evils to which the people are exposed in the night time, as that of the lances had been serviceable in repelling those of the day. They threw into the river in which the people had washed themselves, those half burnt torches, and whenever any pieces of them were found by the water-side, they would run away from them as if they had been infected with the plague. These feasts concluded with rejoicings, intermixed with prayers, thanks, and sacrifices to the sun.

But this account we have given of the religion of these people, is only consistent with what state they were in when the Spaniards first invaded them. For before that time, there were many other religious sentiments embraced, and therefore in this article we shall only give a transient account of those nations whose idolatry the Incas destroyed in order to establish their own. Those of the valley of Rimac afterwards called Lima, worshipped the idol Rimac under the figure of a man, who answered such questions as were asked it, like the ancient oracles of Greece. Rimac is as much as to say, He who speaks, and this idol was lodged in a very magnificent temple, which, however, was not so pompous as that of Pachacamac.

They also worshipped Pachacamac, but offered no victims to his honour; and so great was the veneration they bore him, that they did not dare to once cast their eyes up to him. Their kings and priests always walked backwards wherever they entered his temple, and came out of it in the same manner, without so much as once lifting up their eyes towards the idol.

The Autis, a people who inhabit towards the mountains of Peru, worshipped tigers and adders, and also the herb coca. They put all their captives to death without the least mercy, but with this difference, that a prisoner of no distinction was immediately put to death, whereas a man who was thought worthy of that fatal honour, was sacrificed with great solemnity; for which purpose he was stripped naked, then they tied him to a great stake, and afterwards slashed his whole body with knives and razors, made of a flint stone, ground very sharp. They did not immediately tear him to pieces, but first cut the flesh from off the most brawny parts, such as the calves of the legs, the thighs, and buttocks, after which, their men women and children smeared themselves with the blood of these unhappy wretches, and devoured them before they were dead. The women used to rub the tip of their breasts with their blood, and afterwards gave their children the blood of their enemies to suck, mixed with the milk which nature had given them for the sustenance of those little creatures. These inhuman wretches called this bloody execution a religious ceremony, and ranked all such as had suffered death with courage, or rather with a savage bravery, in the number of their gods, and lodged them under the huts on the tops of their mountains, but such as smk under the violence of their tortures were thrown among the carion.

The savages of the province of Manta worshipped the sea, fishes, tigers, lions, and several other wild beasts, as also an emerald of a prodigious size, which they used to expose to public view in their solemn festivals. They used to slay their prisoners of war, and after having stuffed their skins with earth and ashes, hung them up as trophies on the gates of the temples of their idols. We shall wave a farther description of these absurdities, since they would only tire the reader.

They relate, that a man of extraordinary shape, whose name was Choum, and whose body had neither bones nor muscles, came from the north into their country; that he levelled mountains, filled up valleys, and opened himself a passage through the most inaccessible places. This Choum created the first inhabitants of Peru, giving them the herbs and wild fruits of the field for their sustenance. They also relate, that this first founder of Peru, having been injured by some savages who inhabited the plains, changed part of the ground, which before had been very fruitful, into sand, forbid the rain to fall, and dried up the plants; but that being afterwards moved with compassion, he opened the springs, and suffered the rivers to flow; and this Choum was worshipped as a god, till such time as Pachacamac came from the south.

Choum disappeared after the arrival of Pachacamac, who was much mightier, and metamorphosed all the men whom Choum had created, into wild beasts. The Peruvians had some knowledge of the flood; but as it would be a difficult matter to draw any thing accurate from the account they give of it, we shall not take any notice here of the great veneration they paid to the rainbow; their superstitious opinions concerning comets; the predictions which they drew from dreams; nor of the opinion they had that the sun at his setting used to plunge himself into the ocean, where it lost its light and heat, both which it recovered after having passed under the earth, which they placed on the surface of the waters, and that it afterwards rose in the morning through the gates of the east. Hence we may judge of the nature of the human mind, when uninformed of certain things, and whether the people of all countries are not disposed to receive the same impressions of superstition.

Indeed there is great difficulty in getting quit of superstition, after a person has arrived at years of maturity; for a long persuasion of the truth of any thing sinks deep into the mind; and to use the old proverb, "Custom becomes second nature." In all addresses to people to induce them to leave superstition, and embrace the truth, we ought to be extremely cautious; for those who are too precipitate in attacking prejudices, generally run those whom they attempt to convert into a disbelief of every thing, which commonly lays the foundation of deism.

We shall conclude this article of their religion with the notion they had of eclipses. Whenever the sun was eclipsed, they imagined he was angry with them, and looked on the disorder, which, said they, appeared in his countenance, as a manifest proof of it. When the moon was eclipsed, they fancied it was sick; and when totally, that it would infallibly die; that then it would fall from the sky, that all would be destroyed, and the world be at an end. In order to prevent these misfortunes, they, the moment the eclipse began, made a prodigious noise with horns, trumpets, and drums. They tied dogs to trees, and whipped them unmercifully, in order to make them bark so very loud, that the moon, whom they now thought was now fallen in a swoon, through the violence of pain, and who loved those creatures, because of the signal services they had formerly done her, was forced to awaken at their cries.

None but the Incas, who were of the royal family, were admitted to be priests of the sun; but those who were Incas by a special grant, that is, had been raised to that honour for their merit, were allowed to officiate in the inferior services of religious worship. We have already mentioned the sacrifices which the priests made to the sun, to which we will now add, that they did not always sacrifice in the same place, but frequently in the court of the temple of the sun; but that the sacrifices of the chief feast of the sun were performed in the great square at Cusco. The priests were obliged to enter the temple of the sun bare-footed and bare-legged.

They always chose one of the king's uncles or brothers for the sovereign pontiff, in default of which they were obliged to elect a legitimate relation of his. The priests had no habit peculiar to their order, but in all those provinces where the sun had a great number of temples, none but the natives, and such as were related to the chief man of each province, were allowed to exercise that religious employment. The chief priest, who was something like a bishop among them, was obliged to be an Inca. And in order that they might conform themselves to their metropolitan in their sacrifices and ceremonies, their Incas were always elected as superiors in times of peace and war; but they did not remove the natives, to prevent their having any room to say they were despised, or treated in an arbitrary manner. The chief priest told the people the things he had consulted the sun about, and what the latter had commanded him to declare to them, according to the doctrine of their religion. In a word, he declared those things to them which he had discovered by auguries, sacrifices, and such like superstitious as prevailed among them; and they give their priests a name which signifies to guess or divine.

There were several apartments in the house of the sun, appropriated to the priests and domestics, who were all, as we have before observed, Incas by special grant; for no Indian, though of ever so great quality, was allowed to enter into it, unless he was an Inca; neither were the ladies suffered to go into it, not even the kings' wives or daughters. The priests administered in the temple in their turns weekly, which they consulted by the quarters of the moon, during which they abstained from all commerce with their wives, and continued in the temple day and night. All the time that the priests and ministers of the religion of the Incas were performing their respective functions in the temples, in which they administered weekly, as was before observed, they were maintained out of the revenues of the sun. This was the name they gave to the produce of certain lands, which they gave to that planet as his demesnes or inheritance, which generally include about a third part of the lands of each province.

These people had also nuns among them, who devoted a perpetual virginity to the sun. They were so very scrupulous upon this head, that they always made choice of girls under eight years of age, to prevent their being imposed upon. They were particularly cautious with regard to those virgins of the religious house at Cusco, they being designed for the sun's wives; for which reason none were admitted in that convent but the daughters of the Incas of the blood-royal, which was not mixed with that of strangers. The most ancient among these were chosen as abbesses. These had the direction of the younger; taught them all kind of needle-works, instructed them in divine service, and had an eye to their infirmities: Their confinement was so close, that they never had an opportunity of seeing either men or women; nor had they either turning box or parlour in their convent.

We are assured that these injunctions were observed with the utmost exactness, and that the law by which those who broke the vow they had made to the sun their husband was punished, was inexcessibly rigorous. Garcilasso says as follows upon that head. If among so great a number of religious, any one of them should happen to violate her chastity, there was a law, by which it was enacted, that the nun so offending should be buried alive, and her gallant hanged. But as the putting to death of one man only was thought vastly disproportionate to so great a crime as that of violating a maiden devoted to the sun their god, and the father of their kings, it was moreover enacted by the same law, that not only the person offending should be punished, but also his wife, children, servants, relations, and all the inhabitants where he resided, not excepting the babes who suckled at the breast. For this purpose, they razed the city and paved it with stones, by which means every part of it remained desert, cursed, and excommunicated, as a testimony of that city's having given birth to so detestable a wretch. They likewise endeavoured to hinder any one from treading upon that ground, and even beasts if possible. This law, however, was never put in execution, because no one ever happened to be guilty of this crime in that country.

They had convents, like those of Cusco, in all the chief provinces of the empire. In these they admitted maidens of all ranks or degrees, whether of the royal blood and legitimate, or bastards and of foreign extraction. They sometimes admitted into them, which, however, was a very great favour, the daughters of such lords as had vassals under them, not excepting those of the meanest citizens, provided they were beautiful: for upon that condition they were educated, in order to their becoming one day the daughters of the sun, or the Incas' mistresses, and were superintended with as much care as the women dedicated to that planet. These, like the rest, had young women to wait upon them, and were maintained at the king's expence, in quality of his wives. Moreover, they, as well as the virgins of the sun, generally spent their time in spinning, and in making robes or gowns for the Inca, who always distributed part of them among his relations and the Curacas, as likewise among the most renowned generals, and such as he was desirous of distinguishing by his favour; which was both looked upon as just and seemly, since those habits were wrought by his own and not by the sun's wives, and were made for himself, and not for his father.

macunas like those of Cusco, but with this difference, that these were always legitimate children of the royal family, and were obliged to spend their lives in those convents, to all which conditions the wives of the sun were obliged to submit; whereas in the other convents of the empire, they received maidens of all ranks and conditions, provided they were beautiful, and virgins of unsullied chastity; they being devoted to the Incas, to whom they were delivered up at first asking; and these were allowed to keep them as their mistresses, in case they happened to be agreeable in their eyes; and these convents were in reality so many seraglios, like those of the east. Such as attempted to violate the honour of the Incas' wives, were punished with as much severity as those who debauched the virgins devoted to the sun; for the law had enacted in this manner, because the crime was equally enormous.

Such young women as had been once pitched upon for the king's mistresses, and had had any commerce with him, were not allowed to return home without his leave, but attended in the palace in quality of ladies of the bed-chamber to the queen, till such time as they were permitted to return back into their own countries, where they received the utmost civilities, and were waited upon with a religious respect, because the people of their country thought it a great honour to have one of the Incas' wives. As for such nuns as were not chosen by the king for his mistresses, they remained in the convent till they grew in years; and after the king's death, his mistresses had the title of Mamacuna bestowed upon them by his successor, because they were appointed governants of his mistresses, whom they used to instruct, as a mother-in-law would teach her step-daughters. We should not have related these several particulars, which seem fitter for an episode in romance, than to embellish the religion of a people, had not the Peruvians considered every circumstance which relates to their sovereigns, as so many religious rites, or ceremonies.

There were several other ladies of the blood royal, who led a retired life in their own houses, and made a private vow of chastity without entering into any convent. If at any time they went abroad, it was only to visit their nearest female relations, when they were either indisposed, in labour, about cutting off the hair of their eldest children, or about giving them a name. These women were so conspicuous for their chastity, and the strictness of their lives, that they were honoured with the peculiar title of Oello's, a name which was sacred in their idolatrous religions. These ladies were obliged to be sincerely chaste, and not disguise it with a false varnish; for if ever the least trick or artifice was discovered in their conduct, they were either burnt alive or thrown into the lion's den. A widow never stirred out of her house during the first year of her widowhood, and seldom married again if she had no children; and if she had any, she spent her life in perpetual continence, and never entered a second time into the married state. This virtue gained them so universal an esteem, that several very considerable privileges were granted in their favour; and there were many laws and statutes, by which it was expressly enacted, that the widow's lands should be ploughed sooner than those of the Curacas, or even of the Incas.

Before we conclude this article, it will be proper to take some notice of their confessions and the penance that followed after it. Persuaded from reason and the convictions of conscience, that the sins of mankind do necessarily draw down evils and the avenging arm of heaven, they imagined themselves bound to expiate their crimes by sacrifices and penances. There were confessors established in all parts of the empire, who always imposed a chastisement proportionable to the greatness of the sin, and there were also certain women who had a share in this religious function. In the province of Collasuyo they employed charms for the discovery of sins, and sometimes discovered them by inspecting the intrails of victims; for he who conceals his faults was beat with stones. They confessed themselves on all those occasions where the divine assistance is immediately necessary; but the great and solemn confession was made whenever the Inca was sick. The Inca confessed himself to the sun only, after which he washed himself in a running stream, addressing it in these words: Receive the sins which I have confessed to the sun, and carry them into the sea. Their penances consist in fastings, oblations, withdrawing into the most desert part of the mountains, scourgings, &c. and now we shall proceed to the marriage ceremonies.

We shall begin this part with the marriage of such as were either nearly or distinctly related to the Incas, of which Garcilasso gives the following account:—The king caused to assemble annually, or every two years, at a certain time, all the marriageable young men and maidens of his family, that were in Cusco. The stated age was eighteen or twenty for the maidens, and twenty four for the men; for they were never allowed to marry younger, because, said they, it was fitting the parties should be of an age requisite for the well governing their families, and affirmed that it was mere folly to dispose of them sooner in marriage.

When the marriage was agreed upon, the Inca set himself in the midst of them, they all standing one by another; he then called them by their names after which taking them by the hand, he made them promise a mutual faith, which being done, he gave them into the hands of their parents. Then the new-married couple went to the house of the bridegroom's father, and the wedding was solemnized for three or four days or more, according as the nearest relations judged proper. The young women who were married in this manner, were afterwards called the lawful wives, or the wives given by the hand of the Inca; a title which was bestowed purely to do them the greater honour. When the Inca had thus married his relations, the next day the ministers appointed for that purpose married the rest of the young men, sons to the inhabitants of Cusco, in the same order, according to the division of the several districts, called Higher and Lower Cusco.

The relations furnished the moveables or utensils of the house, every one bringing something; and this they performed very punctually among themselves, and never made any sacrifices or other ceremonies at the weddings. The governors and Curacas were, by their employments, obliged to marry the young men and maidens of their provinces in the same manner. They were bound to assist in person at those weddings, or solemnize themselves in quality of lords and fathers of their country.

The corporations of every city were obliged to provide houses for their new-married citizens, and the nearest relations to furnish them with moveables. They did not allow the inhabitants of one province or city to marry with those of another, but were all obliged to marry among themselves, and with their own relations, like the ancient tribes of Israel; which was done to prevent their nations and families from being blended and confounded with one another. They nevertheless excepted sisters. All the inhabitants of the same city, or of the same province, called themselves relations, in case they were of the same nation, and spoke the same language.

To which let us add, that they were forbid to quit their province or city, or to go from one district to another, because they could not confound the De-enria which had been established by the citizens; besides, their corporations regulated the houses, which they were not permitted to do more than once, and that only in their own districts, and with the consent of their relations.

The heir to the crown used to marry his own sister, in imitation of the sun and the first Inca. For, said they, since the sun took the moon his sister to wife, and had married their two first children together, it was but reasonable the same order should be observed with regard to the king's eldest children. They also added, that the blood of the sun must be mixed with that of men; that the succession ought to devolve on the heir both of the father and mother's side, and that otherwise he lost his right; for they were very exact with regard to the succession to the crown. The elder brother was lawfully heir to the crown, and married his own sister; but in default of an own sister, he married that woman of the blood-royal who was nearest related to him, whether she was his half-sister, his cousin, his niece, or his aunt; and this she-relation might inherit the crown in default of male issue, as in Spain. In case the king's eldest sister brought him no children, he married her second or third sister, till such time as some were born to him.

This wife was called Coya, that is, queen or empress, and these kings, besides their lawful wives, usually kept several mistresses, some of whom were aliens, and others related in the fourth degree of consanguinity and even beyond. They looked upon those children which they had by their relations as legitimate, because they were of their own blood; but those whom the Incas had by the aliens, were considered as bastards; for notwithstanding the respect that was shewn them because of their royal extraction, they yet did not revere them as much as those of the royal blood: these they worshipped as gods, but honoured the others as men.

Purchas relâtes, on the testimony of the Spanish writers, that the bridegroom used to go to the house of his bride, and put her on the Otoia, a kind of shoe. If the bride were a virgin, the shoe was made of wool; but if a widow, it was made of a kind of reed. The royal habit of the Incas requires a particular explication; for which purpose we shall borrow the description of it from the author of the history of the Incas. The Inca generally wore a kind of twist about his head, called Lauta, of about an inch wide, and made almost in a square form, which went five or six times round his head, with a coloured border that reached from one temple to the other.

His habit was a waistcoat that reached down to the knee, called by the natives Uncu, and by the Spaniards Cusma, which is not a word of the general language, but rather of some particular province. Instead of a cloak they wore a kind of sirtout called Yacola. The nuns also made a kind of square purse for the Incas, which they wore as it were in a sling, tied to a twist neatly wrought, and about the breadth of two fingers. These purses, called Chuspa, were used only to hold the herb Cuca or Cocoa, which the Indians generally chew. This Cuca was not then so common as in our days; for none but the Inca was allowed to eat of it, his relations and certain Curacas excepted, to whom the king used to send yearly several baskets full, by way of present, which was looked upon as a very great favour.

From their marriages, &c. we pass on to those customs which relate to their children, and the education they gave them. The Incas always made great feasts, and extraordinary rejoicings at the weaning of their eldest children; because the right of seniority, particularly of males, was had in great esteem by the Incas, and after their example, by all their subjects; but few rejoicings were made at the birth of their daughters or younger children.

They weaned their children at two years old, and cut off their hair which they had brought with them into the world; never touching them till that time, nor did they give the name by which they were to be called. When this ceremony was to be performed, all the relations met together, and he who was chose godfather first cut the child's hair with his scissors, (if we may give that name to certain razors made of flint stone,) which they employed for that purpose, the Indians being unacquainted with those scissors used among us. After the godfather, the rest cut off some of the child's hair in their turn, according to their age and quality; which done, they all agreed upon giving it a name, and then offered it their several gifts, some giving clothes, others cattle, others weapons of several kinds, and others gold and silver drinking vessels, which however, were presented to none but those of the royal extraction, for the common sort of people were not allowed to use them, unless by a special grant.

The presents being made, they all drank copiously otherwise the festival would have been good for nought, and danced and sung till night. This lasted for three or four days, according to the quality of the child's relations. They observed almost the same ceremony at the weaning of the heir to the crown, and also cut off his hair, if we except that this was a royal solemnity, and that the high priest of the sun was always chosen for his godfather.— On this occasion all the Curacas of the kingdom assisted personally, or by their ambassadors, at the solemnity, which held for twenty days together, and made rich presents to the prince, such as gold, silver, precious stones, and the most valuable things of their respective provinces.

As subjects love to imitate their princes, the Curacas, and in general all those of Peru, made likewise great rejoicings on these occasions, according to their rank and quality: and this was one of their most solemn festivals. They were extremely careful not to bring up their children too tenderly, and this was generally observed from the king to the beggar. The moment the child was born, it was washed with cold water, and then wrapped up in swaddling clothes, which they repeated every morning, after having left the water in the dew the greatest part of the time. Moreover, when the mother was for feeding her child in an extraordinary manner, she took water in her mouth, and squirted it over all his body, the crown of the head excepted, which she never touched. When those people were asked why they did this, they answered, that they did it to insure their children to cold and toil, and strengthen their limbs. They never swathed their arms till they were upwards of three months old, saying, that it would weaken them: And they generally kept them in a cradle, which was a kind of bench with four feet, one of which was made shorter than the rest, purposely that they might be rocked with greater ease. The bed in which the child lay, was a kind of coarse net, in which the babe was wrapped on both sides of the cradle, to prevent his falling out.

Mothers never took their children in their arms, not even when they gave them suck; for, said they, they would always be for staying in them, were they to be used to it, and then it would be a difficult matter to confine them to their cradles. However, whenever they thought proper to take them out of it, they used to make a hole in the ground, and set the child upright in it breast-high; they then swathed them with old clouts or rags, in order to make them lie the softer, and at the same time gave them several play-things to divert them with, but never once took them in their arms, though they were the children of the greatest lords in the empire. When a mother wanted to give her child suck, she used to lay herself down upon it, but never give it suck above three times a day, viz. at morning, noon, and evening; nor would she ever give it the breast but at those times, and would let it equal rather than suffer it to get a habit of sucking all day long. All the women of that country did the same, and the reason they gave for it was, that it made them nasty and subject to vomiting, that they became gluttonous when they grew up, and that the beasts themselves furnished them with an example, who never suckled their young but at certain times of the day, and not all night long. The greatest lady in the empire brought up her children herself, and never gave them to another to nurse, unless forced to it by some great indisposition; nor had she any commerce with her husband all the time she suckled it, for fear of spoiling her milk, which might throw the child into a consumption.

As the child grew up, they strengthened its body by labour and exercise, after which it was put under the direction of the Amautas, who were the Peruvian philosophers or doctors. These Amautas regulated the manners of their youth, instructed them in the ceremonies and precepts of religion, in the laws of the empire, and the duty which man owes to his fellow-creatures. The minds of children were cultivated almost from their tender infancy; at six or seven years of age they always had some employment assigned them, which was always suited to their years. In fine, the care they took to shun idleness and indolence, was such, as might justly put nations infinitely more knowing than themselves to the blush. Nor were they less careful of flying from luxury, still more dangerous than idleness, whose only aim is to flatter the senses, and administer fuel to vanity, to awake in us a sense for pleasure in proportion as it decays in us, and which keeps the spirits in a perpetual hurry, even to the last gasp, notwithstanding its inability to produce the least fruits from all its labours, or even to discover one single mark of it.

Religion of those Savages who inhabit Canada and its Neighbourhood.

The Jesuits have related many things concerning these people, which might have passed for truth had it not happened that great part of that country was in 1763, given up to the English, so that we have now the most uncontroverted accounts of every thing relating to them. That they are all idolators is not saying that they are any worse than the inhabitants of other heathen nations, and it must be acknowledged that in some things they are not so horridly gross and abominable as those in Africa. But then they are divided into so many different clans, tribes, hordes, &c. that in some particulars they differ much from each other. Of all these we shall proceed to give an account from the best and most respectable authorities.

In several of these nations, they worship the sun and as soon as they perceive day break, they waft the first cloud of smoke that comes from their calumets toward that object, at the same time mumbling over a few words, as their first morning prayers.—They afterwards smoke towards the four quarters of the world. Some of them paint their bodies over with the figures of wild beasts, to make them appear the more terrible to their enemies, which practice is of great antiquity, for we find it was practised by the ancient Britons.

In other parts of this vast extensive country, the savages believe the world to have been created by a woman, who, together with her son, presides over it. They say that man is the principle of every thing good, and woman the principle of every thing evil. They further believe, that the woman who created the earth, being big with child, fell down from heaven, and dropped on the back of a tortoise. It will appear evident to every unprejudiced person, that we have here the outlines of the Mosaic history of the fall of man, and although blended by fable, yet not more so than what is related by the Greek and Roman poets.

Others of these savages are of opinion that the world was created by a spirit, and that one Misson restored it after the flood. They tell us, that one day as Misson was hunting, his dogs lost themselves in a great lake, which happening to overflow, soon spread itself over all the earth.

Those savages who inhabit near the source of the river St. Lawrence, believe that a woman hovered sometimes in the air, and at last fell down on the back of a tortoise, that mud gathered round the tortoise from the sea and formed the earth.

However, as this woman did not delight in solitude, a spirit descended from above, and finding her asleep, drew near to her, that the result of this was, she became with child, and was delivered of two sons who came out of her side. When those children were grown up, they exercised themselves in hunting, and as one of them was a much more skillful hunter than the other, jealousy soon occasioned discord, and the unskillful hunter, who was of a very savage temper, treated his brother with so much cruelty, that he left this world and ascended to heaven. This notion of theirs seems to relate to the two sons of Adam, Cain and Abel.

They have some idea of the flood, and they believe that the world began at that time. They say that Michapous, whom they look upon as a supreme being, first created the heavens, and afterwards created all the animals that were on floating woods and groves. With these he made a bridge, but foreseeing that all these creatures could not live long in that state, and that his work would be imperfect, unless he took care to secure them from misfortunes, and from being starved; and having at that time command only over the heavens, he addressed himself to Michinisi, the god of waters, and would have borrowed some land of him in order to settle his creatures on it, but Michinisi was not willing to comply with his request.

Thus disappointed, Michapous sent the beaver, the otter and the rat one after another, to search for land at the bottom of the sea, but none of them brought any thing except the rat, who had in her mouth a few particles of sand. Michapous kneaded this sand into a leaven, which swelled to a great mountain. The fox was ordered to walk round this mountain; but it was so large that he soon became weary, and the Michapous enlarged the mountain into a large terrestrial globe. Some of them are of opinion, that men sprung originally from the putrified carcases of beasts, and we find Virgil embracing the same notion concerning the origin of bees.

A steer of two years old they take whose head,
Now first with burnish'd horns begins to spread:
They steep his nostrils, while he strives in vain
To breathe the free air, and struggles with his pain.
Knock'd down, he dies; his bowels bruis'd within,
Betray no wound in his unbroken skin.

Extended thus, in his obscene abode,
They leave the beast, but first sweet flowers are strew'd:

Beneath his body, broken bonfis and thyme,
And pleasing Cassia, Just renew'd in prime.
The tainted blood in this close prison pent,
Begins to boil and thro' the bones foment;
Then wondrous to behold, new creatures rise,
A moving mass at first, and short of thighs;
Till shooting out with legs, and jump'd with wings,
The grubs proceed the bees with pointed stings.

These savages tell us farther, that some of the animals having quarrelled among themselves, Michapous killed them, and a man rose from the putrefaction; and this new man invented the bow and arrow, which he employed against the beasts. It happened one day, that one of them being separated from the rest, discovered a hut, where he found Michapous, who gave him a wife, and prescribed the several duties to be observed between them.—Man had hunting and fishing allotted him for his part, and all domestic affairs were committed to the wife. From these men proceeded, and they lived in felicity together, having power over the wildest and fiercest beasts; but as they began to multiply, so they were obliged to look out for new countries to hunt in. At length discord and jealousy began to arise among the hunters, and this they consider as the origin of wars.

We have been the more particular in our account of those different opinions concerning the creation of the world, because lord Kames has, from those differences inferred, that there is not, in the whole world, any certain accounts to be depended on.—His lordship was of a very different opinion when he wrote his essays on religion, but alas! in his advanced years, he has changed his sentiments.—Some of these savages have temples erected to the sun, one of which is described in the following manner.

It is surrounded by a high wall, and the area within the wall serves for a place for the people to walk in. Upon this wall a great number of spikes are set, on the sharp ends of which they fix the heads of their enemies, and likewise those of the most notorious criminals.

Over the front is laid a great log of wood, raised high, and surrounded with hair, and garnished with scalps as so many trophies. The inside of the temple is painted with a vast number of figures, and in the middle is a sort of fire, a place which serves them for an altar. Two priests dressed in white, burn these logs, while the congregation are offering up their prayers. There is a closet in the wall which they call the tabernacle of God, and two eagles with extended wings hang on it, looking towards the sun. Their prayers are three times a day, viz. at sun-rising, noon, and sun-setting.

The Canadians give the name of great spirit to that Supreme Being, whom they also call Quiticli Manitou, and to whom they celebrate grand sacrifices.

They not only believe in the Supreme Being, but likewise in the immortality of the soul; and they consider all souls as emanations from the universal father of spirits. This notion is the same as we find embraced by the Greeks and Romans, and, indeed by almost all nations in the world, except those who are called Materialists; but happy for mankind their numbers are but few. But although these savages adore but one Supreme Being, yet, like other heathens, they have their idols, that is, they have images by which they represent the Divine attributes and operations. This propensity to idolatry among them needs not to be wondered at, when we consider, that they are followed, in some measure, by some who call themselves Christians.

The subject matter of all their hymns, is the praise of the beauties of the works of nature: the goodness of the Supreme Being; their victories, and the defeat of their enemies. The women address speeches to the rising sun, and present their children to him at the same time. From all this it appears, that these people are far from being Atheists, and probably it may be a doubt whether there is an Atheist in the world. Seneca, a heathen, says, that although men may in words deny the being of God, yet their hearts condemn the thought; and it is certain, that without a firm persuasion of the existence of an almighty power, man would be more miserable than the beasts in the field. For man has hopes or fears of something hereafter, whereas the beasts have none.

We are assured that it is a very difficult matter to convert these people to the Christian religion which can only be ascribed to two causes: first, the superstition of the Roman Catholics, whose ceremonies are in some measure, as ridiculous as their own; and secondly, to the want of human learning. It is necessary, however, to observe, that in consequence of these people being now subject to Great Britain, though still governed by the French laws, many improvements have been made; but of this we shall speak more largely afterwards.

In their marriage ceremonies they differ but little from the savages who inhabit Hudson's Bay. When a young man falls in love with a girl, he makes a formal demand of her from her father, or the nearest relation then living.

When they are come to an agreement, the young man's father assembles all his relations, and declares to them his intention of bestowing his son in marriage, and his relations bring as many things to the hut as they can offer, as presents for the young savage.

His mother carries part of the goods to the young woman's hut, and, at the same time, the bride's mother declares to her daughter, that she has married her to such a person, meaning the young man already mentioned. The maiden must not make any objection, for that would be dishonourable. Every one gives something towards the bride's portion, but one of her relations always lays with her before her husband goes to bed.

There are several other particulars that might be mentioned concerning their marriages, but being of a civil nature, they have no connection with this work. We shall only observe, that the husband has a right to put his wife away if she is barren; but then they are obliged to give her proper notice, that she may provide herself with a new husband.

In Canada, when a husband and wife are determined to part, they bring into the hut where the marriage ceremony was performed, all the little pieces of a wand used on that occasion; and these they burn, without hesitation, which completes the divorce without any manner of dispute. When they imagine a woman to be past child-bearing, they never pay their addresses to her; for they look upon the fraud and design of marriage to be that of propagating the human species, and certainly this was its original design. Thus we find that the Jewish women were considered as objects of reproach when they had no children; and something of that nature is to be found in all nations in the world.

In all nations where those people whom we call savages live in a state of nature, they are not much afflicted with disorders, except such as are rather the effect of the climate than the effect of gluttony. And as they have but few diseases, so we should naturally imagine they could have but little occasion for physicians; for it may be said in the words of the poet,

The first physicians by debauch were made;
Excess begun, and sloth sustain'd the trade.
By toil our first forefathers earn'd their food,
Toil strung their nerves and purified their blood:
But we their sons, a pamper'd race of men,
Are dwindled down to threescore years and ten.
Better to hunt in fields for health unbought,
Than see the doctor for a nauseous draught.
The wise for health on exercise depend;
God never made his works for man to mend.

But notwithstanding these salutary rules, yet we find, that even those savages who live in a state of nature, have their physicians, or rather impostors, for they deserve no better name; their jugglers or mountebanks pretending to cure all manner of diseases by charms, spells, and enchantments; but then we may consider that few of these diseases are inveterate. Sweating is one of the methods used by them, and another of their methods is too curious to be passed over in silence.

They make a hot bath, into which the patient goes stark naked, along with others as naked as himself, whose business it is to rub him. This bath they cover over with the heads of wild bulls, flint stones, and pieces of rock made quite hot. The patient thus shut up in the bath, is obliged to keep in his breath every now and then, and while the juggler is singing as loud as he can bawl, those who are along with him in the bath also sing in concert.— They cure diseases of the legs and thighs by lancing the parts infected, with a knife made of stone or iron. These incisions are afterwards rubbed with bear's grease, or the fat of some other wild beast; and to expel the poison of serpents, they have a variety of charms. All those who act as physicians are also the priests, and they undergo a long probation, the manner of which is as follows: They shut themselves up in a hut during nine days, and are allowed no other subsistence than water. The novice holding a kind of bottle in his hand, full of pebble stones, with which he makes a continual noise, invokes the spirit, intreats him to speak, and to admit him into the number of spirits. The whole is accompanied with the most terrible howling, cries and agitations both of the body and mind, and he foams at the mouth like a madman.

As soon as this ridiculous part of the ceremony is over, he comes out of his hut, and boasts of his having conversed with the spirit; and having received from him the power of healing all sorts of diseases. Father Heimepin adds, that nothing can be more dreadful than the cries and distortions of those jugglers, at the time of their practising their pretended enchantments. It is certain, that they carry on the deception with great skill and cunning, but in general the tricks they perform are too ridiculous to gain the esteem of any man of common sense. And to this may be added, that most of their pretended cures are rather the effect of chance, than any way owing to their knowledge of the human frame.— However, they are acquainted with the virtues of several physical herbs, which undoubtedly was the first way in which all diseases were cured.

When the juggler visits the patient, he asks him a great number of questions, promising, at the same time, to root out the evil spirit. He immediately withdraws to a little tent for that purpose. Here he sings, howls, and dances like a madman. He then sucks the patient's wounds, and drawing some little bones out of his mouth, tells him he has taken them out of his body. He then tells him to be thankful under his sufferings, as it will be in his power to cure him. The juggler then demands his fees, and when he is paid, he sends several young men to hunt the elks and other deer. And here it may be necessary to observe, that many of the tricks practised by our quacks in Europe, are as ridiculous as any of those we have now mentioned. It frequently happens, that when the juggler finds he cannot cure the patient, he gives him something to dispatch him, and then tells his relation that the spirit has revealed to him that he is incurable. This supports the credit of the impostor, and ensures to him his fee, which is all he has in view. And is this not like the conduct of many of our European doctors, who amuse the relations of the patient while they are killing him according to the rules of art.

The juggler sometimes endeavours to persuade the patient that he is bewitched, and on such occasions, stretches his body upon a floor covered with beaver skins, or of the skins of some other beasts. The juggler then feels every part of the patient's body, till he comes to the place affected, and then he pronounces his charm which has the desired effect, because the disease instead of being real was only imaginary.

Although these savages believe in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, yet they have but confused notions concerning it; for they believe that souls transmigrate from one body to another; and as we have frequently occasion to mention these notions we may once for all observe, that because they could not account for the apparent unequal distribution of rewards and punishments in this life, and not having proper notions of a future state, they believed that the souls of the wicked went into other bodies to be tormented.

They bury their dead with great pomp and ceremony, for they dress them, and paint their faces and bodies with different colours, after which they lay them in coffins made of the bark of trees, the outside of which they make extraordinarily smooth, with light pumice stones. They then set up a palisade round the tomb, which is always raised seven or eight feet from the ground. Their women wear mourning for eight years together, during which time they are not permitted to marry; but in this there is nothing extraordinary, because among these savages a widow seldom obtains a husband. Several of these people solemnize festivals in honour of the dead, and on such occasions they take the bones out of the graves, and put them into new ones lined with beaver skins.

Hunting is considered by these people as a religious exercise; and a few days before they set out to hunt the bull, their old men send out some young ones to view the place where the chase is to be.—

When the hunters are got there, they dance and sing according to the custom of the country, and at their return they expose for three days successively, several great kettles filled with feathers. During these three days, a woman of distinction walks in procession with a cauldron on her back, before a great number of hunters. The company is headed by an old man, who with great gravity carries a piece of cloth by way of standard or ensign. Before a young hunter goes to the chase for the first time, he is obliged to keep a religious fast, to which he prepares himself with the utmost care and attention that is generally observed by those who go through a state of probation in any order whatsoever. This fast continues three days during which time the novice is obliged to daub his face over with black, and this he imagines to be an homage he owes to the great spirit.

When they swear in their courts of judicature, they dip their heads in the blood of the victim that is to be offered up in sacrifice, and rub part of it over their foreheads. This they do as an appeal to the Supreme Being, that they tell the truth; and consequently were they to tell a falsehood, they would look upon themselves as condemned to eternal perdition; and this may serve to shew, that divine wisdom has impressed on the minds of the most unenlightened heathens, an obligation of telling the truth.

Such was the state of those savages when the French first settled among them; and those who were not converted to Popery, embrace the same sentiments even to this day. It is certain, that it was the design of the legislative power of Britain to convert these savages to Christianity; but unsurmountable difficulties presented themselves. First, when Canada was ceded to the English, the civilized part was inhabited by bigotted Roman Catholics, and the priests of that religion are always assiduous in making converts; on the other hand, the missionaries sent from Britain, were obliged to be extremely cautious, because by the treaty of capitulation, the civilized part of the Canadians were to enjoy the free exercise of their religion.

Missionaries from Britain could not therefore expect much success, and an act passed in this country, confirming all the privileges which these people formerly enjoyed, whether of a civil or religious nature. But still our society for the propagation of the Christian religion did not stop at these difficulties. Four missionaries were sent over to Canada, and are maintained there to this day, at the rate of two hundred pounds a year each. When we consider the troubles that have been in that part of the world, we need not be surprised that the labours of the missionaries have not yet been attended with the desired effect.

Secondly, another object the society had in view was, to convert the savages, but here many difficulties lay in their way. They were ignorant of the language spoken by the people, consequently they could not communicate their sentiments to them.—Probably these difficulties would have been got over, had not the war broken out; and it may be naturally supposed, that the Romish priests in Canada would rather wish to see the savages continue in a state of heathenism, than be made acquainted with the Protestant religion. All those who are members of false religion, are inveterate enemies to those who practise Christian duties. From the whole we may draw this conclusion, that nothing will ever, under the dispensation of the British government, bring about the conversion of these savages, but the pious lives of our missionaries. Let them only consider that they are accountable beings; let them consider that they were not born for themselves, and then they will go cheerfully on with the work committed to their care; they will enlighten the heathen nations, and join in immortality with those souls of whose conversion they were the instruments.

Religion in California.

It is much to be lamented, that notwithstanding the many discoveries lately made in commerce, in the extension of trade, and the knowledge of navigation, yet we are still left in ignorance concerning the religion, or even the civil customs and manners of the people of California. This is still the more to be wondered at, when we consider that many of our navigators have visited that country. One thing indeed, must be observed, that seamen are bad historians, and therefore we must take our accounts of them from such authors as are of the highest reputation for their integrity. The form of their government is such as discovers that they are not totally ignorant of those circumstances that conduce to the maintaining of order and regularity. But nevertheless, the little religion they seem to have, is vastly odd and fantastic, but still they are not, so far as we can learn, very superstitious. Great adoration is paid to water, because, say they, it contributes towards promoting the growth of corn and other food, as the proof of its being the only support of life.

Their dress consists mostly of figures made of rabbit skins, whimsically daubed over. In this manner, the king of the country consents to be daubed also; but it will be asked, what has all this to do with religion? The answer is obvious. These people know nothing of religion, for they observe so many ridiculous ceremonies, that all sentiments of an intellectual nature are alienated from their minds. As they worship idols, so they have temples erected to their memories, where they perform what they call their sacred devotions. They imagine that it is here that the devil comes to divert himself whenever he is forced to ramble from one place to another. But here we must not be too precipitate in our judgments, because travellers are apt to relate things from bare hearsay, without knowing any thing of the nature of them. The Jesuits who visited the country, imagined that the only way to ingratiate themselves into the affections of these people, was to make them believe they came from the sun; for by an evasion, they thought they might easily substitute the sun of righteousness in place of that luminary which gives light to the world.—Some Indians who suspected the truth of this mission, asked why these messengers had not been sent from the sun before? To which it was answered, he was too young. This answer was suitable enough to a savage, and the conclusion of the conference was that they acknowledged him to be the son of that planet. This pretended son, in order to increase the number of the faithful, raised a wooden cross, and commanded his companions the Spaniards to adore it, as an example for the imitation of the infidels. To these he prescribed the time and manner of adoration, and as we may take it for granted, that he worshipped the rising sun in the morning, they were to worship the cross at the same time.

In their marriage ceremonies they have very little remarkable, any farther than that they are of a very mercenary nature. The young man gives a certain sum of money for the bride, who is considered as an article of commerce. When the parties are agreed, the relation of the bridegroom goes to the house of the bride's parents, and makes a formal demand of her. He mentions what money, or other things he has advanced as purchase-money, and they give their approbation in consequence of their being satisfied.

These preliminaries being settled, the bride is conducted home in triumph, and there is a feast prepared for her and all the family relations. Polygamy is permitted among these people, for they are allowed to marry as many wives as they can support, but they are not to discard them on every frivolous pretence. Indeed, the nature of conjugal duty is not considered as very sacred in this country, because there are some crimes committed that ought not be named. However, thus much we may take notice of, that the men in this country, if they are rich, keep a great number of boys dressed in women's clothes; what use they make of these boys needs not be mentioned, but we are only surprised to find that savages should commit the same unna-

Is not this shocking!—Shall those who are called polite, be more addicted to unnatural crimes than savages? Yes; and to the dishonour of mankind, and the disgrace of human nature; where learning is cultivated—vice generally increases. And is this owing to learning? No: It is owing to the abuse of it. The corruption of human nature is such, that men seldom make great progress in learning, without, at the same time, dishonouring themselves by an attachment to all those vices which are a dishonour to their characters, and make them even more contemptible than the beasts that perish.

When we consider the antiquity of this horrid crime, its extension among the heathen nations, the encouragement it still meets with in Italy, and the progress it has made in Great Britain, we are lost as it were in astonishment to discover that passion which gives rise to it. Indeed it is a just and very pertinent observation of archbishop Fenelon, That notwithstanding all the pretended politeness of the Greeks and Romans, yet as to mortal virtue and religious obligations, they were no better than the savages in America! But to proceed with our narrative.

When any of these people die, the whole village is in an uproar, for the women meet together and scream out in the most hideous manner. They tear their hair, and throw ashes over their upper garments, to make the people believe they are sincerely in earnest. The body of the deceased is washed and laid out, after which they carry it out to a funeral pile erected in the neighbourhood.—Here a great many hymns are sung in honour of the deceased, reciting all the heroic actions of his life, and these songs are attended with a great number of gestures.

This part of the ceremony being over, a great number of aromatic herbs and flowers are brought to the funeral pile, and when the priests have mumbled over a certain number of prayers, fire is set to the pile and all the materials are consumed along with the body of the deceased. They do not burn the bodies of the women along with their husbands as is done in the East Indies, from which circumstance we may learn, that all heathens are not equally barbarous. There is one circumstance which must not be omitted relating to these people, and that is, adoption.

Men who have no children of their own, in order to perpetuate their names and keep up their family distinctions, make choice of the son of a slave, whom they educate as their own, give him their name, and at their death, leave him in possession of their whole fortune. This piece of mean, vulgar, pride was much attended to by the ancient Romans, and it was common among them to have as many adopted sons as real ones. Perhaps it was owing to this, that the Romans have been so frequently accused as destitute of natural affections. A parent may be a man of humanity, he may do many things to relieve the wants of his fellow-creatures, but still notwithstanding all that, he cannot consider the child of another as his own. It is certain, however, that this prevailed in ancient times in Asia, and it is easily to be accounted for.

Polygamy, as it makes wives cool and regardless towards their husbands, so it makes fathers forget the duty they owe to their children. The man who has more wives than one, has not a sincere friend in the world, and the parent who has children by different wives, is, in general, partial to those descended from favourites.

Mr. Gray says,

—A favourite has no friend.

Had the poet reversed the words, and said, that favourites are generally spoiled in the education, perhaps he would have acted more consistent with his character as an able writer; but this we may venture to affirm, that wherever polygamy exists, the parent can never do his duty to all his children. His affections are as it were divided; he loves his offspring, but he is obliged to offend his favourite wife, if he is not partial to her children instead of the others.

We shall conclude this account of the religion of California, by observing, that if our modern navigators had been as assiduous in promoting the interests of these savages, as they have been in giving us a description of the country, they might have procured immortal honour, and brought everlasting glory to their country. But why should we look for that in some men, who deny a particular providence? Bold and intrepid they go out on voyages, paying no regard to death or eternity. They laugh at every thing that is serious in religion, and boldly assert, that Divine providence has no concern with the affairs of this lower world. Such is the effect of abused talents, such is the use that is too commonly made of human learning. But still let it never be forgotten, that those who love religion, will at all times endeavour to make every one as happy as themselves; for the exercise of real knowledge is to do good to all those who want our assistance.

Religion of the Virginians.

In treating of the religion of the Virginians, we do not mean those British subjects now settled in that part of America, but the ancient savages, and particularly those who still inhabit the back settlements. These Indians are so tenacious of every secret relating to their religion, that it is considered as sacrilege in any one to reveal a single secret of it.

When the English first settled here in the reign of queen Elizabeth, they found a temple about thirty feet long and eighteen broad, and there was a hole in the roof to let out the smoke. The gate of the temple was at one end, and at some distance on the outside, stakes were set up quite round it, the tops of which were painted, representing men's faces.— They did not find one window in all the temple, nor any place for the light to enter in at, except the door, and the hole in the chimney. At the end, over against the door, there was a separation made of matting, worked very close together, which inclosed a place about ten feet in length, and which did not let in one single ray of light.

The English adventurers were at first afraid to prevail upon themselves to enter into this place, but at last they did, and found in the middle of the inclosure, a place surrounded with stakes, at the top of which were great shelves, from whence they drew these mats that were rolled up and sewed together, on one of which some bones were laid, and on another the Indian weapon of destruction, called a tomahawk. They had tied to one of these tomahawks, the waddles of a turkey-cock painted red, and the two longest feathers of his wing hung at the end, tied with a string of about five or six inches in length, having a notch at the top for the setting in of the head. In the third mat was some inlaid work, which they took for the idol of the Indians. Underneath was another board, not half so long as the former, and which they fastened with pieces of wood, that, being set in on every side, stood out about fourteen or fifteen inches from his body, and which are round the knees of the image to bend.

The Virginians have several names for this image, but he is in general represented with a pipe of tobacco in his mouth, and what is more surprising, he really smokes, but then there is a priest artfully placed behind him, who, unseen by the worshippers, lights the pipe. The darkness with which this idol is surrounded, prevents the ignorant worshipper from seeing the priest who carries on the deception; for were they once to look in, they would no longer pay any worship to inanimate beings conducted by knives. And here we have a beautiful allusion to many passages in the sacred scriptures, where idolatry is compared to darkness, and the truth or true religion to light. Lord King justly observes, that by darkness is not only meant the ignorance of the heathen nations concerning divine things, but likewise those numerous abominations which were transacted under the covert of real darkness, and some of these are such as ought not to be described.

These Virginians, like many other heathens, worship the sun; and at day-break the devotees of both sexes go out fasting to their idol temples, and wash themselves in a running stream. The ablution continues till the sun appears, nor do they suffer their children of ten years of age to omit this religious duty. As soon as the sun is above the horizon, they offer him tobacco. They consider all nature as entirely under the direction of their idol, which is much more to their honour, although idolators, than to the reputation of those who call themselves Christians, yet blasphemously deny a particular Providence.

Whenever they go on a journey, they then burn tobacco to the sun, in order to obtain his assistance. When they cross a lake or river, they throw tobacco into it, in order that the spirit who presides in such place, may grant them a safe passage. And when they return home from hunting, from war, or from any dangerous employment or enterprise, they offer up the best part of their spoils to their idols. Many of the ancients observed the same customs, and even at present, not only among the Roman Catholics, but even among the Protestants, the colours and standards taken in war, are put up as trophies of victory in the most celebrated churches. And why all this formality? And why should the sentiment so universally prevail? The answer is obvious. There is a principal implanted in the human mind, that leads men to consider themselves as dependent on some superior being. They hereby acknowledge that it was to him they were indebted for the victory obtained; and, as a grateful return, they dedicate to him the most valuable of the spoils taken from the enemy.

These savages have but a confused notion of the creation of the world, but they all acknowledge that there is a Divine Being, to whom all their gods or idols are subject. They say, that this Being leaves men entirely to the freedom of their own wills, while he himself continues in a state of indolence, out of which all the worship they offer him is not able to recover him. This system being entirely that which was embraced by the followers of Epicurus amongst the heathens, and the Sadducees among the Jews, we shall not say any thing concerning it, because it is a bold attempt to set aside the utility of public and private worship; for if God does not take notice of the actions of men in this life, then the whole bounds of religion are removed; there is no motive to duty; there is nothing to restrain us as mortals from committing the most horrid, the most unnatural crimes.

But that the reader may have a just notion of the sentiments of these people, which are the same with those of Lucianus, we shall here present him with what Lucianus has written on the subject.

How the vast mass of matter, nature, free-
From the proud care of th' meddling deity,
Doth work by her own private strength and move,
Without the trouble of the gods above;
For how good gods can those that live in peace,
In undisturb'd and everlasting ease,
Rule this vast all, their labouring thoughts divide, Twist heaven and earth, and all their motions guide:

Send heat to us, the various orbs controul,
Or be immense, and spread o'er all the whole?
Or hide the heavens in clouds, whence thunder thrown,

Does beat their own aspiring temples down.
Or through vast deserts breaks th' innocent wood,
Mother to the bad, but strikes the just and good.

All we shall here add is, that those who have been the most irreligious in this world, formed their notions upon the inequality of rewards and punishments. Were all the wicked to suffer just punishments in this life, and all the virtuous to be rewarded, what occasion would there be for a future judgment? In many cases God has shewn himself to be at the head of divine providence, but not in all; to convince men, that however hardened they may be in wickedness while in this world, yet there may be a time, or a period, when the mask of hypocrisy will be laid aside, nay, it will be stripped off, and the daring sinner will stand as a culprit at the bar of infinite justice. On the other hand, the oppressed virtuous man should rest satisfied in this that God will be his friend at the last day, notwithstanding all the sufferings he may have been subjected to in this world; for it is an established maxim both in natural and revealed religion, that the upright judge of the universe, will not deceive his creatures.

Peter Williamson, who published the account of his captivity among those Virginian savages in 1758, has given us a particular description of their priests, who are at the same time, a sort of vagabond quack doctors. They use a vast number of spells and charms; and although they are no strangers to the efficacy of herbs in curing many diseases, yet they are such amazing impostors, that they make their patients believe that they cannot be cured till they have invoked the assistance of one of their idols.— This is a mystery of iniquity indeed, but not more than is to be met with in other heathen nations.— When they have been successful in war, they come home loaded with spoils, and having collected the whole tribe together, they light a fire and dance in a confused manner round it. Their priests partake of this solemnity, dressed in their sacerdotal habits, and these priests begin the song. Nothing can be more terrible than to behold their solemnities? for they roar out and make such a hideous noise, that even wild beasts would be afraid of them.

When they go out to war, every one carries a hatchet or tomahawk in his hand, and when peace is concluded the hatchet is buried; probably it is owing to this custom that so many hatchets have been dug up in Virginia, some of which are now to be seen in the British Museum.

We are assured that the Indians in Virginia look upon marriage as a very solemn act; and that the vows they then make are solemn and inviolable.— The husband and wife may live separately if they cannot agree; but divorcees are looked upon as scandalous. As for their children, they plunge them into cold water the moment they are born, and they educate them much after the same manner as the Canaries and other savages of North America, from their earliest infancy, till they arrive at years of manhood.

These savages believe in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but still they seem to have very odd notions concerning it. They look upon the separate state of departed souls as an habitation beyond the mountains, and into those unfrequented mansions, they imagine the soul retires after death. This may serve to shew, that although these people are barbarians and savages in their manners, yet they retain the first principles of natural religion. This will for ever remain as an eternal scandal to those who have denied this leading sentiment.— Whether their notions concerning the immortality of the soul are of a corporeal nature or not, is not easily known. This probably was the reason why the heathens have run into so many gross notions, concerning things of the utmost importance.

The last thing we shall take notice of, is, what should always come last, viz. an account of their preparations for death, and their funeral solemnities. When a person is taken sick, he sends for the priest, who comes and mumbles over him a great number of words which no person understands but himself.

They beat drums so as to stupify the patient, and when he expires, they say that he would have lived longer had he not been guilty of some unpardonable crimes. This is undoubtedly a very good juggling trick, and the character of the priest is supported although the patient dies.

In their funeral rites and ceremonies they differ but little from the other savages in America. When a person dies they wrap up his body for one day in linen cloth, or in the skins of beasts. Next day they cut the flesh from off his bones, and burn it in the fire. They then prepare for the funeral, and the women make a dreadful howl round the corpse. They make a wooden coffin in which they put the body, and then it is carried to the place of interment.

The body is laid in the grave, which is generally in one of the woods, and there another howling begins, which continues for several days without intermission. They sacrifice some sheep and goats in honour of the deceased, and what will perhaps seem very surprising, they rejoice that they have been delivered from all the afflictions of a tumultuous world. The women dress themselves in white, and the men are dressed in the most sumptuous manner, according to the custom of their country. When they have deposited the body, they sing several mournful elegies, and they have an entertainment provided for them. This is just what the Greeks call a dirge, and what we commonly call a funeral solemnity. They remember annually the deaths of their friends; all which may serve to shew that these heathens are not such strangers to natural religion as we are too fondly apt to imagine.

With respect to this part of south America, we are well acquainted with it, our connections with the people have been great, and therefore we can with the greater clearness, give an account of their religious sentiments. That their religious sentiments are much the same with those we have already mentioned in our account of Peru, will appear from comparing them together. The Peruvians adored the sun, and so did the inhabitants of Hispaniola. The grand object of worship among the heathens was the sun, and therefore we need not be surprised that so many persons were addicted to it. From what motives the heathens were led to adore the sun, is not our business to inquire, but we shall now proceed to give an account of the religious sentiments of these people at present. Indeed we may naturally imagine, that the worship of the sun was in such honour and respect among idolators, that they looked upon every person who found fault with it as no better than a blasphemous. This, however, is a dangerous notion; for nothing can be considered as an object of worship but what is recorded as such in Divine Revelation.

These people were actually guilty of offering up human sacrifices, and their merciless hearts were deaf to the cries of innocent children. We are sorry to say, that in the course of this work, we have had occasion to point out these crimes. Let them be ever so horrid in themselves, yet they are of great antiquity; they were practised among the ancient Canaanites, and if any regard is to be paid to history, they were common even among the ancient Britons. However, not to enlarge upon things remote from the subject, we shall only take notice, that as these people offer sacrifices to the sun, so they naturally expect some favours from him. Not that they have any reason for doing so, but only because superstition having laid hold of their minds, they do not chuse to quit the favourite object. It is true, that they have temples to the sun, but they are poor mean structures; for what they were in former times is entirely out of the question at present, which, however, we shall have occasion to take some notice of afterwards, and in the mean time we shall proceed to consider their mode of worship, duties, articles of marriage ceremonies, vows, solemn engagements, treaties of war and peace, their priests, religious obligations, attending upon their festivals, the manner in which the sick are healed on a death bed, their funeral rites, and what they observe in honour of the deceased, which increases according to the nature of his quality.

The religious worship they paid their idols or demons, had something remarkable in it; for the Canquies always caused the solemnity of it to be proclaimed by heralds, and used on the day appointed for the ceremony, to walk in procession by beat of drum, at the head of the subjects of both sexes, who were dressed in their best clothes, but (strange to imagine) the maidens went naked. The whole company went afterwards to the temples of those false gods, who were there represented in a very grotesque manner, and much in the same manner as our painters represent the devil.

The priests used also to worship these idols, and pray to them with so much zeal, or rather with so many cries and howlings, as must necessarily terrify a company of poor wretches, who had not cunning enough to find out the trick which those insidious priests concealed under their pretended devotion.—It was then they presented the oblations of the devotees to their gods, which were partly cakes brought by women in baskets, adorned with flowers; after which, as soon as the priest had given the signal, they danced and sung the praises of the Zemes, whom we have already mentioned under the name of Chemens, and offered their cakes. The whole concluded with the praises of their ancient kings, and with prayers for the prosperity of the nation.—The priests used to divide these cakes into several pieces, and distribute them among the men, and they were obliged to keep them a whole year in their houses, because they were considered as sacred, and antidotes against several sorts of disorders, as well as common accidents.

When the procession was got to the door of the temple, the Guagua, who was at the head of it, set himself down at the entrance, and all the people went in singing, and passed as it were in review before him. When they were got to the idol, they thrust a little stick down their throats, in order to make them vomit, for they were obliged to present themselves pure and unsullied before their god, and with their hearts as it were on their lips.

Their Zemes revealed themselves to the priests, and these priests acted their parts so well as to make the people believe that the idols spoke to them, which was, in all respects, consistent with the tricks practised by the priests among the Greeks and Romans of old. If the idol danced and sung, it was a good omen, but if he discovered a sorrowful air, the people were sad and dejected, gave themselves up to grief and tears, and fasted till there were some hopes of their being reconciled to their gods.

The account they give of the origin of mankind, is whimsical enough, and such as does hardly deserve a place in this work, were we not under the necessity of relating all their religious sentiments.—Men, say they, came out of two caverns of a certain mountain, and out of one of them came those whom we may call the good, that is to say, the flower and choicest part of human kind; and from the other, the most vile and worthless part of them. The sun, greatly enraged at this, turned him into a stone, who keeps the opening of the mountain, to prevent the birth of mankind, and metamorphosed those new created beings into frogs, toads, &c.

This notion is as ridiculous as some of those of the ancients, who believed that men sprung from oaks. Nay, what was still more ridiculous among these people in Hispaniola, they believed that the sun and moon both came out of caves. These caves were in such high reputation, that the people went annually in procession to them: for who would not visit the place where the object of their worship was born. These caves were embellished with pictures in the Indian taste, but before they entered, they always paid their devotions to two devils, who stood centinels at the gates; or rather to the figures of two devils, for we must not believe they were spirits, as all devils naturally are.

Polygamy, or a plurality of wives, was allowed by the laws of the country, for men were permitted to marry as many women as they could support.—As this custom was in every respect inconsistent with natural and revealed religion, so it must have led to the commission of unnatural crimes. There are some passions that no human laws can restrain nor bring into proper subjection; for shut nature out at the door and she will come in at the window. The Spaniards were sensible of this, and therefore they made a pretext of it to put many of those poor idolators to death, under the most execrating torments. This was not the way to convert these poor people to Christianity, as will appear from the following plain, artless anecdote.

An old Cacique, of the province of Nicaragua, discoursing with a Spaniard, who attended upon one of these first conquerors, spoke thus to him:—

“Tell me, Christian, what you understand by Christianity? The Christians feed upon our provisions, lie with our wives, are idle, gamblers, and blasphemers; are mischievous, continually craving gold and silver; are abusive, and irreligious at mass; quarrel and fight with one another; on the whole, I take them to be a set of wicked wretches.”

There is perhaps more good sense and real truth in the words of this heathen, than can be found in thousands of volumes, written in defence of Christianity; for how can a heathen believe any doctrine to be true, while he, at the same, beholds with the utmost detestation, the person who teaches it, acting inconsistent with what he recommends to others. The Spaniards had no other object in view, when they invaded those countries, than that of acquiring riches, and those riches have actually been, in some measure, the ruin of their dominions in Europe. The importation of gold and silver from South America into Spain, has thrown the people of that country into a languid state of lazy indolence.

Instead of employing the people in the useful arts of peace, by promoting arts and manufactures, they have actually sent their millions of gold to other European nations to obtain in return the necessaries of life. This has brought dishonour upon them, and we may venture to affirm, that if ever the Spaniards become equally brave as their ancestors once were, they must relinquish their conquests in South America, and be content with the enjoyment of those possessions they have in Europe, which are indeed very extensive.

It is in a manner needless to mention that these people believe the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments. This sentiment being universal among the heathens, we shall therefore only add, that the manner in which they inter their dead, shews their firm belief of it, and they look upon it as the most comfortable notion that can be embraced.

As they believed that the sun was the Supreme Being, so they interred their dead at that moment of time when that glorious luminary first made its appearance above the horizon, and the face was always towards it. If this does not point out a faint notion of the general resurrection, we know not what can. As the faces of the deceased were laid so as to front the rising sun, so it must have been in consequence of a fixed belief that the sun would one day raise their bodies. It is in a manner impossible to account for it on any other principle, for why all this care concerning the dead, if they were to perish for ever. The more we look into the practices of the heathen nations, the more we are in love with the gospel, which has removed the clouds of darkness from before our eyes, and laid open a path leading to everlasting happiness.

We have already taken notice of the first population of America, so that it is needless to enlarge further on that subject. We have no doubt but the inhabitants of Mexico offered human sacrifices, for although the Spaniards have related many things against them, which perhaps may not be true, yet this seems to be indisputable. But let their practices be ever so barbarous (and barbarous undoubtedly they were) yet this will in no manner whatever vindicate the Spaniards for committing such horrid acts of cruelty as they confessedly did. The heathens harboured only false notions of religion, or rather idolatry, offered human sacrifices to their idols, and the Spaniards, guided by a false zeal, extirpated thousands of people because they were idolaters. The case before us is not what had these Indians done, but merely how they ought to have been treated by Christian adventurers. It was the duty of the Spaniards to have convinced them of their errors, but not to have let loose the fury of a coercive power upon men, who were rather objects of pity than of punishment. Indeed the Spaniards had no right to punish them; for although Joshua did so to the Canaanites of old, yet that has no application to the present argument. Joshua had a divine commission, and that was what the Spaniards could not pretend to; unless they give that name to the commission they had received from the pope. The truth is, the Spaniards only wanted their money, and therefore they did not pay any regard to the highest duties of moral obligation, but like some English adventurers in the present age, they murdered their thousands and ten thousands, that they might have an opportunity of aggrandizing themselves.

In the capital city of Mexico were eight temples, equally magnificent, and built pretty near alike; but there was one which excelled the rest in bigness and its prodigious extent, so that a city containing five hundred houses might have been built in the court of it. This edifice was a long time the centre of Mexican idolatry, and therefore we shall give a particular description of it.

The worshippers first entered into a large quadrangle, surrounded with a great stone wall, where the figures of several serpents struck terror into the beholders, particularly at the front of the first door, which was filled with these figures, under which some very mysterious signification was concealed. Before their arrival at this gate, there stood a kind of a chapel, which was full as terrible. It was built of stone, raised thirty steps, having a terrace at the top, on which several trunks of great trees, all lopped of an equal height, were planted on a level at equal distances, on which poles were laid from tree to tree. On each of these poles hung the skulls of several unhappy wretches who had been sacrificed, whose number could not be related without terror.

The four sides of the quadrangle had each a gate, exactly facing one another, and looked to the four cardinal points. Four stone statues were placed over each gate, which seemed to point out the way, and to command those to return back who were for going thither with an irreligious heart. These were considered as porter gods, upon which account they were saluted at going in. The apartments of the sacrificing priests and masters were built in the inside of the wall of the quadrangle, together with some shops that went round the whole, which however took up but little room, its extent being so vast, that eight or ten thousand persons used to dance in it at ease, on their most solemn days.

In the centre of this quadrangle, a great stone edifice was erected, which in fairweather was seen to the tops of the highest buildings in the city. It always lessened in bigness upwards, till it formed a half pyramid, three sides of which were shelving, and the fourth supported by a staircase. It was a most sumptuous pile of building, according to the rules of architecture used in that country. It was four hundred feet high, and built so strong, that its top which was flat, was a square, forty feet on each side, and was finely paved with squares of jasper stones of all kinds of colours. The pillars which surrounded it in the form of rails, winded like the shell of a snail, and both sides of it were faced with black marble. On the two sides of the rail or balustrade where the staircase ended, two statues supported two ancient candlesticks. At some distance from this was a stone of green colour, five feet in height, sharp bottomed, and here the unhappy wretch who was to be sacrificed, was laid on his back, when they ripped up his bosom and took out his heart. Above this stone, and opposite to the staircase, was a large strong chapel, the roof of which was of curious wood, under which their idol was seated on a very high altar, with curtains around it.

We have hitherto touched on the sacrifices offered up by these people in a general cursory manner, and therefore it is necessary that we should now be a little more explicit, wishing sincerely that what we are going to relate had never happened, though the regard we have for truth obliges us to mention it. These bloody sacrifices among the Mexicans, were performed in the following manner.

The victims were led to the altars, which might have been justly compared to so many charnel houses, or burying grounds. There they were closely guarded by some Mexican soldiers, who waited till such time as the poor victims should be put to death. To heighten their agitated misery, they were presented with the sight of thousands of their fellow creatures, who had been sacrificed before them. A priest holding an image in his hand, approached towards them, crying out, at the same time, there is your god. This done, they withdrew, going off from the other side of the terrace, when the victims were immediately brought upon it, this being the place appointed for the sacrifice. Here it was that the six servants of the priests slaughtered the victims, two of these took the victims by the feet, two others held his arms, a fifth held his head, and the sixth ripped open his stomach, whence they tore out his heart and held it up still smoking to the sun, after which turning himself towards the idol, he threw the heart in his face.

The victim being thus dispatched they threw the body down from the terrace to the bottom, and we are assured, that they not only sacrificed all the captives they took in war, but actually feasted on them.

They never sacrificed less than forty or fifty of these poor wretches at a time, and those nations who bordered on them, or were subject to them, imitated this bloody mode of worship. On solemn occasions it was the duty, or rather the office of the high-priest of the temple, to rip up the victim's stomach, and this he did in such a dexterous manner, that it surprised all those who saw him, except his own pupils, who were very expert butchers.

It was a custom among them on certain festivals, to dress a man in the bloody skin just reaking from the body of one of their victims, and we are assured that some of their greatest princes and governors thought it no dishonour to have the skin wrapped about them, so as the person sacrificed was a gentleman, or a person of rank. However, when a poor person was wrapped in the skin, he ran up and down the streets like a madman, demanding charity from all he met with, and those who refused to comply with his request, he was sure to knock down. This bloody masquerade continued till such time as the skin began to corrupt, and then the vagrant returned home to his own house, in order to indulge himself in all sorts of voluptuousness.

It was always their custom before they sat down to eat or drink, to offer the sun some part of the victuals of which they were to partake, and they had many other ceremonies, which although as ridiculous as any we have mentioned, yet were not more so than many of those practised by the learned Greeks, and by the political Romans.

Like all other barbarians who embraced false religions, their penances were extremely severe. The priests were considered as they are in some Christian communities, as mediators between God and men, so that here was an absolute power lodged in the priest, and when this solemn penance was to be performed, it was the custom of the people to meet at midnight in the temple of the idol, when one of them used to call the rest together for their devotion, with a kind of horn, of which there is now one in the British Museum, and while the horn was sounded, another was employed in moving the idol.

Then one of the priests let a little blood out of the ankle of the penitent, by pricking it with a thorn or a stone lancet. After this, he rubbed his temples and ears with this blood, then went out and washed himself in a certain fountain or running stream, which from all these circumstances put together, was called, "The water of blood."

These Mexican priests observed a very rigorous fast, extending sometimes to seven days together, and this was always previous to their solemn festivals. During these fasts, those who were married abstained from all commerce with their wives, and possibly there might have been some sort of nominal merit in this, had it been built on a rational foundation, but this was laying such a restraint on human nature, as was inconsistent with the order of God. To this may be added, that during these fasts, they were guilty of crimes too odious to be mentioned, so that we shall pass them over in silence.

All these Mexican priests were possessed of great revenues, and by their knavish tricks they made the people believe they were entitled to them. Happy, had this principle never diffused itself among Christians who profess to be the followers of a poor despised carpenter, and whose disciples even procured a subsistence by their labour, but priests and gospel ministers are two different sorts of people, and with respect to the former it may be justly said.

The priests of all religions are,
And will be still the same;
And all, though in a different way,
Are playing the same game.

But besides these priests, the people of Mexico had their vestals or nuns. All these were dressed in white, as an emblem of innocence; but alas! experience has shewn that no robes with which the human body is clothed, can alter the state of corrupt nature, or give innocence to the soul. Here nuns were forlorn, they are among the Roman Catholics, admitted into their convents so early in life, that they do not know how far the power of human nature will operate upon them. These were under the direction of a governess or abbess, whose office was to keep the temple clean, and the young nuns dressed the sacred meats that were presented to the idols. They were at midnight to administer to the gods, and to examine certain articles, which the rules of their order obliged them to observe. Above all, they were bound to preserve their chastity un sullied, the violation of which was punished with death.

This contrivance was not, indeed, to be perpetual, since as they were sent to the convent only to fulfil some vow, which their parents had made to their gods, they were allowed to marry after a certain term of years. It is even probable, that this abbess, or matron, might superintend a kind of nunnery, where young women were brought up in the same manner as they are at our boarding schools; for those young ones were taken from under their care as soon as their parents thought proper.

They had also a seminary for the education of boys, who were admitted into it when they were about seven or eight years of age. During the time these boys were living in the convents, they were confined down to a certain number of rules, much like the novices in the popish convents. These youths used to have the tops of their heads shaved, and the rest of the hair cut so short, that it scarce covered their ears, but it fell as low as their shoulders behind, except when they used to tie it up in a kind of tuft behind. They wore a linen vestment, and lived in the most exemplary manner. Under them were several sorts of novices, whose business it was to cleanse all the vessels belonging to the temple; but these, in consequence of their merit, often rose to the highest dignities.

These natives of Mexico had many festivals, but all of them were attended with the most horrid, and bloody sacrifices. Indeed, it seems to have been a maxim among these people, that the god whom they worshipped, or rather the idol, should be just such an one as themselves. Barbarous, cruel, and unfeeling, their own corruptions pointed this out, and so far were they from forming benevolent notions of the Divine Being, that they actually became so corrupt as to imagine that he would take pleasure in human sacrifices.

On all their festival days, the priests, like a parcel of abandoned villains, employed some wretches to submit to be flogged, in order to make the deluded populace believe they were sincere penitents. In this, there is nothing at all strange, for the author of this actually saw at Antwerp, in Flanders, June 1736, several wretches, hired by the Roman Catholic priests to whip themselves, under the stale pretence that they were real penitents. Thus we find that popery and rogishness go hand in hand together, and we can plainly see that the former was borrowed from the latter.

There was one god or idol the Mexicans paid much regard to, whose name has not been transmitted to us, but he is represented as a great hunter. There is nothing at all surprising in this, because the savages of all nations were hunters; so that they ascribed qualities to those who made the most distinguished figure. Hunting was, indeed, partly a religious exercise in former times, for as the subsistence of individuals depended on the chase, consequently it was natural for the heathens to thank their idols for what success they had obtained. There is no such thing as acknowledging a Supreme Being, without ascribing to him qualities suitable to his nature, and in every respect consistent with his attributes in the moral government of this world.

In their marriage ceremonies, the priests have great influence; for they settle every thing even of a civil nature. The marriage contract is searched into, and the husband has a right to turn away his wife if she has no children. In such cases she is obliged to have her marriage portion returned.— There is something in this altogether consistent with natural equity, for the man who parts with the object of his desires, ought to give up all things connected with her.

When their children are born and purged from their natural impurities, they are brought to the temple of their idols, and a name given them by the priest. The priests then wash the children all over, and deliver them to their parents. They have several other ceremonies, but these are of such a similar nature with what we have already mentioned in our description of the different religions in the other parts of America, that we shall not take any further notice of them.

In the funeral ceremonies, they have nothing at all remarkable, any farther than those in Hispaniola; for indeed there is such a similarity, that one would naturally imagine all these people were of one and the same original. As they believe in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, so they pay great respect to their deceased relations. The women dress themselves in white, which seems to point out, that the deceased has been purged from all his impurities, and that all his sins have been forgiven. The body is carried out to a piece of ground, set apart for that purpose, and it is there deposited in the midst of all his friends and relations. Mourning and lamentations are made for the deceased several days together, but these are rather artificial than real.

The face of the deceased is laid so as to be opposite to the sun, which shews that their notions were the same with those who inhabited Hispaniola.—They set up stones at each end of the grave, testifying their respect for the deceased, and it was common for them to strew the grave frequently with flowers. This ceremony was generally performed once in the month, during one year, but after that time, the mourning ceased. Upon the whole, thus much is certain, that these Mexicans were a barbarous people, who had no human feelings, otherwise they would never have seen their fellow creatures butchered in such a manner; but this may serve to shew that where divine relation is not known, men are the most miserable objects in the world. Left to struggle with the corruption of their own nature, they sink under it, and die martyrs to those passions, which if properly cultivated, would have promoted their everlasting happiness.

Religion of the savages who inhabit near the isthmus of Darian

In giving an account of these savages, we are under the necessity of taking notice of one of the most important events that ever happened in Britain. In 1603, on the death of queen Elizabeth, James VI. king of Scotland ascended the throne of England, so that the two crowns were united; but to the great misfortune of both countries, a proper union did not take place, for each nation had its separate parliament, and they had opposite views and interests, so there were continual wranglings between them. The Scotch, naturally brave, but proud, haughty, and poor, followed their sovereign into England, and as the event of an union had been long wished for, so forged prophecies were invented, some of which were taken notice of by lord Hales. Among these, the following knavish one may be mentioned.

When Hempe is come, and also gone.
England and Scotland shall both be one.

This Hempe was considered as some great person, whom no one could give any account of, and yet the meaning was neither less nor more than the following:

H. Henry VIII. E. Edward VI. M. Mary I. P. Philip her husband, and E. Elizabeth, so that the whole mystery is developed, and the knavish prophecy understood, as having been written after the events took place.

From that time forward, at different periods many proposals were made for bringing about an union, and although locality pointed out the propriety of such a scheme, yet national pride on both sides prevented its taking place. At last, in the reign of king William, the merchants of Scotland obtained a charter, to establish a settlement on the isthmus of Darian, and it is amazing to think what hopes the people in that part of the country formed to themselves of the advantages that would arise from this scheme. All ranks of people contributed towards promoting it, and a large fleet was fitted out. Here, however, national jealousy took place. The English merchants did not wish to see the commerce of Scotland extended so far, and therefore they used all the means they could think of to obstruct it. It is not our business to enter into national disputes, but thus much is certain, that almost all the Scottish adventurers were ruined, and the factory they had established was reduced to nothing. This created much murmuring in Scotland, and had it not been that we were then engaged in a war with France, which united all parties at home, the effects might have proved fatal. The people of Scotland, in revenge for the injuries they imagined the English had done them, refused to wear English manufactures, and in this unhappy condition both nations continued till the accession of queen Anne, 1702.

Each country had a particular object in view, the English parliament wanted the parliament of Scotland to ratify the act of settlement, which appeared the more necessary for two reasons, first, because it would prevent disputes for the future between them; and secondly, because it was not probable queen Anne would ever have any more children.—On the other hand, the people of Scotland objected, first, that were they to acknowledge the act of settlement, they ought to have proper security for the establishment of their religion; and secondly, that their losses at Darian should be made up to them out of the English treasury.

Here was a large field for the politicians to display their skill, and although ministers of state are not always virtuous men, yet divine goodness can, and often does, bring good out of their contentions. It was after much dispute, agreed upon by concessions on both sides, that an equivalent should be paid by England to recompense the Scots for their loss at Darian, and to secure their religion, the sovereign was to take an oath the moment he succeeded to the crown, and actually before he was proclaimed.

Upon these principles, the union of the two nations was brought about, which, if properly improved, must be for the mutual advantage of both. We thought it the more necessary to take notice of these particulars, because many of the people of Scotland, even in this age, think their ancestors at Darian were grossly injured, whereas, when we come to consider the whole, it will be found, that if errors were committed, both parties were guilty.— And this will likewise serve to clear up some things we shall have occasion to mention, concerning the church of Scotland. In the mean time to go on with our narrative.

These people inhabit a large tract of land, which is situated between North and South America.— They are all idolators, but their temples are poor mean huts, and their idols are only coarse stones set up within them. Like many other savages in America, they believe the sun and moon are husband and wife, and they adore them as objects of divine worship.

However, they acknowledge a Supreme Being, superior to them. They believe there is an evil principle that torments the children of men, and for that reason they have temples erected for it, where they offer sacrifices of flowers, fruits, perfumes, and all other things that they think will procure its favour. Every extraordinary phenomenon in nature is considered by them as an apparition and the voice of God.

Their priests are all pretended magicians, and the greatest impostors in the world. They perform all their tricks in secret, and the ignorant people are easily persuaded to believe them. The priests make dreadful cries and howlings, with distortions of their faces, under which some pretended mystery is concealed; for as true religion has its mysteries, so every false one pretends to the same, and so it is in many other things.

Their manner of healing the sick is very extraordinary. They seat the patient on a stone, which being done, the medico-priest takes a little bow and some small arrows, and shoots them as quick as possible at his patient, who is stark naked. They are so dexterous at this exercise, that they never miss their mark, but then there is a stop put to the arrow which prevents it from going beyond a certain mark or depth. If the arrow happens to open a vein, and the wind gushes out with the blood, the physician and those who are present leap for joy, and discover by their gestures, that they believe the operation to have been successful.

All these hypocritical priests, who are at the same time pretended physicians, make a vow of chastity, and if ever they violate it, they are either stoned or burnt to death. The devotees are obliged, during their fastings, to abstain from all commerce with their wives, but they can find other ways to gratify their passions. Before they go to war, they sacrifice hares and pleasants to the sun, and smear the bodies of their idols all over with the blood. They never go on any enterprize without asking advice from their idol, which is an image of the sun; for which purpose they undergo a penance of two months together, during which time they abstain from salt and commerce with women.

They advise with their priests in all affairs relating to peace or war, and consult their gods in groves and solitudes. They purposely make choice of the night for performing their magical ceremonies, and the darker it is the better. They conjure the devil by their cries, by a great noise, and their magical songs in the presence of several young people. The person whom they order to consult the oracle of the idol is seated, and the rest are standing. The magicians are silent when they expect the approach of the devil their master, and the moment he appears, the conjuror presents himself before him, and gives the signal for the homage that ought to be paid. The Spanish authors tell us a story diverting enough concerning these priests and devils.

They say, that one day some friars undertook to exercise the priest who was raising the devil, and that by the power of the signs of the cross and holy water, which was wonderfully assisted by a stole that was put about the neck of the conjuror, he answered very penitently to all the questions the friar put to the devil. Among other things, they asked him where the souls of the Indians would go after their deaths; the answer he made was, to hell.— Those whom they design for priests, are brought up in their sacred mysteries from their infancies.— Such children are obliged to retire for two years to the most remote parts of the woods, where they are not permitted to feed upon any thing that has blood in it, nor see any woman, but must forget their kindred, and are not allowed to stir out of their caverns.

The old priests visit and instruct them in the night, and when the probation time of these young candidates is expired, they receive a certificate, upon which they are looked upon as sacred priests, and doctors in physic and magic.

These savages burn all the prisoners of war, but pull out one of their teeth before they execute them. Something in this may appear extremely barbarous, and certainly it is so, but when we consider the state of heathen nations, it will not appear strange, especially as we read in many parts of the Old Testament, that all prisoners of war were put to death under the most excruciating tortures. The Greeks and Romans either butchered their prisoners, or sold them as slaves, and the ancient heathen Britons used to burn a thousand to death at a time.

They allow polygamy here, but it is under seven-ral restrictions for they are not permitted to part with their wives, unless they have been unfaithful to the conjugal vow. As soon as the young women are considered as fit for marriage, they are locked up from the society of men, and no person is permitted to visit them without the consent of their parents. They do not use much ceremony in their marriages, for as soon as the parents have settled the previous agreement, every thing is concluded. Every one of the relations brings a present according to the nature of their circumstances, and these presents enable the new married couple to begin house-keeping. The bridegroom's father makes a speech to the people, concerning the duties of the marriage state, and after that he dances like a madman. The dance being over, he kneels down, and presents his son to the bride, whose father being in the same posture, holds also his daughter by the hand; but the bride's father dances likewise in his turn, and makes the same antique gestures before he kneels down.

In their funeral ceremonies, they are like most of the other savages in America. They believe in the immortality of the soul, but they have almost as many casual notions concerning it, as our British materialists. They believe, that when the soul is dislodged from the body, it enters upon a life of pleasure, and feasts in the most sumptuous manner. For this reason, they bury provisions along with their dead, to be of service to them in the other world.

From what is here related of these people, we are to lament that the settlement attempted by the Scotch did not succeed. The Scotch adventurers took along with them several ministers, among whom was Mr. Spalding, who had been settled at Dundee. Had the factory met with proper encouragement, there is reason to believe, that before this time there would not have been a heathen in the place. Protestants alone are the men who should be sent to convert heathens, and therefore every encouragement ought to have been given to these enterprisers.— However, as we are not to call in question the purposes of Divine Providence, so we shall rest satisfied with this single consideration, that if that salutary end was not completed, yet one equally beneficial took place, namely, the union of the two kingdoms. God's ways are not as men's.

Religion of the savages of New Andalusia.

The only particulars we know of the religion of these people are, that they, like most of the other ancient Americans, adore the sun and moon; but above all, an evil spirit, which we may call the devil.

Some of them worship the dried skeletons of their ancestors; and they believe that the sun goes round the world, drawn in a chariot by tigers; for which reason they treat those ferocious animals with great respect, and give them the dead bodies of their relations to feed on. They have a tradition among them, that their country was once burnt up by the sun, because they did not shew proper respect to his servants the tigers. This fire, they say, was extremely violent, and consumed a vast number of the inhabitants; but really such ridiculous stories scarce deserve our notice.

They observed a certain ceremony which they called the giving away the spirit of courage. This gift is bestowed by the priests, who open the ceremony with songs and dances, in which every one foams at the mouth like a dog, and tumbles about like a madman. All such as desire to have the spirit communicated to them by the mediation of the priest, join hands, and continue dancing incessantly. When three or four priests enter the circle, they rush upon the demons, some with a gourd bottle tied to the end of a stick, and others with a long reed or cane, filled with lighted tobacco, with which they whip the dancers, crying out, at the same time, "Receive all ye the spirit of strength, by which you will be enabled to overcome your enemies."

From this form of invitation one would imagine there was something very solemn couched under the expression, but there is nothing of that nature in it; for, like most other savages, they acknowledge two beings, one good and the other bad. To the good being they never address themselves but in the way of praise or thanksgiving; but to the evil one they always pray, in order to avert his displeasure.

When any person among them is taken sick, they plunge him into a river, and afterwards whip him running till he is almost out of breath. This whipping-bout is round a great fire, and when it is over, they put him into his hammock. When they despair of a sick man's life, they take him out in his hammock to a wood, and hang him up in it between two trees, dancing round it for a whole day. As soon as night is come, they give him provisions for four days, and then leave him to his fate. If he happens to recover, so much the better; but in case he dies, there are very few who lament the loss.

It would be needless to repeat that polygamy is as much in vogue among these people, as in any other nations among the Americans, or even in Asia or Africa. The priests set the example; for they have always a great number of wives; nay, such slaves are they to the most sensual of all passions, that when they go on journeys, they order women to be ready for them at every stage where they are to put up. All this voluptuousness arises from that indolence to which these people are so much subject; and this, in some measure, is occasioned by the climate, which being hot and sultry, throws a languor over their spirits, and renders them in a manner unfit for action.

When a young man fixes his affections on a girl, or, in other words, when he wants a woman under that character, he addresses himself to her relations; for he never sees her till after he is married. When all the terms are settled, the bride's relations meet in company at the house of the bride's father, where a grand entertainment is provided; and the relations of the bridegroom come there at the same time to partake of the feast. After two or three hours spent in the utmost state of merriment, the whole of the relations set out to conduct the bride home to her husband's house. Musicians march before, playing upon their rustic instruments. After them come the priests, repeating aloud a variety of unintelligible jargon of prayers to their idols; then come the relations, who are followed by the bridegroom, who walks on foot; and behind him comes the bride in a litter carried by four men, and so closed up that no person can see her. The procession is closed by the servants and attendants; and as soon as they approach the house of the bridegroom, the young women in the village come out to meet them.

As this is at midnight, the young women have lamps in their hands trimmed with oil, and this, from what we are going to relate, may serve to shew what a vast conformity there was between the ancient heathen nations, and likewise that some of these customs were retained by the Jews.

The parable of the ten virgins (see Mat. xxv.) is well known, and in the account of these people of whom we are now treating, we have a proof of the origin of idolatry. Nay, it may serve farther to point out, that all that was bad among the heathens, was reprobated by the Jews, but the innocent ceremonies were retained.

When they arrived at the place where the bridegroom resided, and where the nuptials were to be celebrated, the bride was conducted into an apartment along with the women, and the night was spent in all manner of diversions, according to the custom of the country. In the same manner the bridegroom was led into his apartment, accompanied by the men, and with them he spent his time in the same manner. When the morning approached, the company retired, and the husband was permitted to go to bed to his wife. This is, perhaps, a little different from European practices; but we have had occasion to mention something of a similar nature, in our account of the Turkish religion. Seven days fasting are observed afterwards, and that period of time being expired, the new married couple forsake

In their funeral ceremonies they are extremely ridiculous, but not more so than has been related in our historical accounts of other heathens. When a person is taken sick, the priest is sent for, and he dances as if insane, two or three times round his bed. This is done in order to raise the spirit, and we may venture to affirm, that it has a strong connection with the practices of some of those people who are called Protestants. A few years ago a poor man died in London, and on his death-bed he declared that he was bewitched, by imagining a mouse jumped over his stomach, and this mouse he considered as the devil.

Some religions require art to wind up the human passions to a state of enthusiasm, and innocent weakness falls a sacrifice to interested priests, or rather to designing villains. The man who is really and virtuously religious, has no occasion to make an ostentatious display of it; but it is the interest of the hypocrite to do so. The first knows he has none to do with but God; the second pays no regard to God, but looks for the praise of men.

In their funeral ceremonies these people are equally ridiculous, and indeed some of them are more so than any we have yet mentioned, only they are not so barbarous as those in Asia and Africa. When a man dies, the body is washed clean and wrapped up in a goat's skin, and then put into a wooden coffin, where it remains seven days, from the time of the death till the interment. During that time the people meet together and get drunk in the most riotous manner, knocking each other down, just like what took place among the Greeks during their solemn dirges. When the seven days fasting is over, they proceed to the place of entertainment in the following manner. The priests walk before, singing their hymns, and are followed by all those who are called their students. Then come the relations of the deceased, walking in mournful procession. The corpse is carried behind the relations, and the procession is closed by the servants and other attendants. When they come to the grave, the priests mumble over some prayers, and then the body is laid in the grave. This, however, does not finish the ceremony, for all those who attend the funeral, throw flowers into the grave. The earth being laid upon the body, they all return home to the house of the deceased, and spend the whole night in such extravagancy, that sometimes before morning they get so drunk that they break each other's limbs, and many of those who come out sound in the morning, return home no better than cripples.

The regard these people have for their deceased relations, does not end with their interment; for notwithstanding all the nocturnal revels that take place after the funeral, yet they meet again, and erect a monument to perpetuate their respect to the person who was beloved by them in life. This is a natural and just sentiment, and nothing in the common or rather the vicious practices of this world can set it aside. Those who treat the ashes of their deceased relations with indignity, will never pay much regard to the living. The image of God is stamped upon man, and he who brutally abuses an human body, abuses the image of God. But we shall now take leave of the subject relating to the heathen nations, by suggesting the following reflections.

Are the heathens left in a state of ignorance? are they without God in the world? Let us learn that our ancestors were once heathens, and that we should have been the same now, had not the Divine goodness extended to us the blessings of the everlasting gospel.

Is heathenism become a term of reproach? and are heathens looked upon with contempt? Let Christians consider, that nothing can more endear them to the Divine Being, or exonerate them from the consciousness of guilt, as that of extending the blessings of redemption to their fellow-creatures.— Are unnatural crimes committed by the heathens?— Let Christians remember, that it is their duty to set them a fair example. Precepts are useful, but examples give a sanction to them. Is religion the grand monument of mercy? Then let us, who enjoy it, endeavour to disseminate the beneficial consequences to the most distant nations, Is there a possibility of doing good? Let it be shewn in the care we take to enlighten the heathen nations.

And now having said so much of these people, we shall take our leave by wishing earnestly that the sun of righteousness may arise with healing under his wings. That the desire of all nations may trample upon his enemies, that men may be blessed in him, that all nations may call him blessed. High is the command of the Almighty, enlarged are his orders with respect to his moral government of this world; vindictive is his justice, but his mercy is in a manner unbounded. These considerations should reconcile us to all the works of an Omnipotent Being. God conducts the affairs of this lower world unknown to us, but we behold with admiration when we consider the execution of every part of the beautiful design.

INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF THE PROTESTANT RELIGION.

THE consideration of events as flowing from causes apparently weak and insignificant, will at all times serve to prove, that there is a divine power by which this lower world is governed. The voluptuous and the ignorant suffer all these things to pass unnoticed, but the wise consider them, and draw such reflections from all the occurrences as make a lasting impression on their minds. History without reflection is nothing; but history properly improved, becomes the grand ornament of human life. The historian who makes a real use of that science, goes on from one degree to another, till he is lost in admiration. The wonders of providence appear to him as so many stupendous edifices, raised by hands unseen, and when he cannot comprehend the whole, he sits down in silence, acknowledging his ignorance, but at the same time desirous of knowledge.

The knowledge of history does not consist in the recital of facts, for that may be done by a fool, and a school-boy can tell what had happened before he was born. This, however, is not history, but a bare recital of facts, in the order of time in which they happened. History is an account of such events as have taken place on the theatre of this lower world: but in our endeavours to transmit them to the public in a proper manner, we must at all times remember that we are to blend instruction with entertainment; that is, we are to point out the causes which produced the events, and the consequences that followed. We are to consider the particular states of those countries of which we have been writing, we are to take in all the concomitant circumstances, and with modesty deliver our own opinions. We are to consider the difference of times and circumstances, and we are to compare the past with the present. By attending to these rules, we may become real historians, but if they are slighted we shall be left in a state of Egyptian darkness.— This naturally leads us to say something concerning the Reformation, and it shall be delivered with impartiality.

We have already treated the gradual progress of corruptions in the Christian church, from the reign of Constantine the Great, down to the age of Martin Luther. But having been obliged to shift the subject, we shall here proceed to give the reader an account of the Reformation, and then describe the particular professions that have sprung from it.

Bishop Hall has a pretty observation in his account of Zechariah's vision in the temple, and it is, "When things are at the worst, God usually works a remarkable deliverance, or brings about an important change." Indeed, all violence leads to changes, for such is the state of human nature, such is the government of this world, that whatever is carried to a more than ordinary extreme, must soon have an end. Pagan darkness was such, when Christ came in the flesh, that the minds of men were totally clouded with it, and then the sun of righteousness broke forth in an illustrious manner to enlighten the nations.

But to pursue the idea, let us consider the state of the European nations previous to the times of Martin Luther, who, in the hands of divine providence, was the happy instrument, assisted by some of the German princes, of opposing the whole power of the house of Austria, and all the machinations of the court of Rome. It is true, as Dr. Newton, the late bishop of Bristol, has observed, there never was an age since the death of Christ, in which some witnesses could not be found for the truth of the gospel. The doctrines taught by the famous Wickliff spread far and wide; and thirty years after his death, we find John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, condemned by the council of Constance, for teaching his opinions. Paul Craw, a Bohemian, having come over to Scotland for his personal safety, found himself exposed to the same dangers as at home; for he was burnt alive at St. Andrews. Learning was then beginning to revive, and the clergy began to be afraid of the downfall of their kingdom. They found the pillars beginning to shake, and they knew that their doctrines could not stand before the light of a rational enquiry. This filled them with so much resentment against all those who spoke their sentiments freely, that they were immediately put to death.

But it was not learning alone that brought about the Reformation; there were many political circumstances concurring in this great event, and some princes became the happy instruments of promoting true religion, although they themselves were men of no virtuous principles, but scandalous debauchees and arbitrary tyrants. The scandalous lives of the clergy were another means to bring about the Reformation, and while they were as it were asleep in the arms of carnal security; while they thought themselves beyond the power of being disturbed in their mansions; and in a word, when they found they had domineered over the consciences of the people, and almost engrossed the civil power to themselves, they began to consider that the whole orders of priesthood were established on the most permanent basis, they found themselves roused a little from their stupidity, and they found that they had to do with very important adversaries, whom before they looked upon as contemptible.

Pope Leo X. when raised to the papal throne, found the revenues of the church exhausted, by the vast projects of his two ambitious predecessors, Alexander VI. and Julius II. and being in his own temper naturally liberal and enterprising, rendered him incapable of that severe economy which the situation of his finances required. On the contrary his schemes for aggrandizing the family of the Medicis, his love of splendor, his taste for pleasure, and his munificence in rewarding men of genius, involved him daily in a long train of expences; in order to provide a fund for which, every device that the fertile genius of priests could invent was tried.

Among others, he had recourse to the sale of indulgences; a practice common enough in the church of Rome, but never before this time carried to such an extravagant height. But here we must explain this mystery of iniquity to our readers.

According to the doctrine of the Romish church, all the good works of the saints, over and above those which were necessary for their own justification, together with the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, are deposited in one inexhaustible treasury. The keys of this were committed to St. Peter, and to his successors the popes, who may open it at pleasure, and by transferring a portion of this superabundant merit to any particular person for a sum of money, may convey to him either the pardon of his own sins, or a release for any one with whom he is interested, from the pains of purgatory.

These indulgences were first invented in the eleventh century by pope Urban II. as a recompence for those who went in person on the wild enterprize of conquering the holy land. They were afterwards granted to those who hired a soldier for that purpose; and, in process of time, were bestowed on such as gave money for accomplishing any pious work enjoined by the pope. Julius II. had bestowed indulgences on all who contributed towards building the church of St. Peter's at Rome; and as Leo was carrying on that magnificent fabric, his grant was founded on the same pretensions.

The promulgation of these indulgences in Germany, together with a share arising from the profits in the sale of them, was assigned to Albert, elector of Mentz and archbishop of Magdeburgh, who, as his chief agent for retailing them in Saxony, employed one Tetzel, a Dominican friar, of licentious morals, but of an active spirit, and very remarkable for that sort of eloquence which serves to inflame the passions without leading the mind to truth, or guarding it against error. He, assisted by the monks of his order, executed the commission with great zeal and success, but with little discretion or decency; and though by magnifying excessively the benefits of these indulgences; and by disposing of them at a very low price, they carried on for some time a lucrative and extensive traffic among the credulous multitude the extravagance of their assertions, and the irregularity in their conduct, came at last to give general offence. The princes and nobles were irritated at seeing their vassals drained of so much money, in order to fill the treasury of a profuse pope. Men of piety regretted the delusions of the people, who being taught to rely for the pardon of their sins on the indulgences which they purchased, did not think it incumbent on them, either to abound in faith or practise holiness. Even the most unthinking were shocked at the more than scandalous behaviour of Tetzel and his associates, who often squandered in drunkenness, gaming, and low debauchery, those sums which were bestowed in hopes of obtaining eternal happiness; and all began to wish that some check could be given to this scandalous commerce, no less injurious to society than destructive of true religion.

As the form of these indulgences, and the benefits which they were supposed to convey, are in general unknown in Protestant countries, and but little understood at present in several places where the Roman Catholic religion is established, we have here for the information of our readers, inserted the form of the absolution used by Tetzel.

“May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, that of his blessed apostles Peter and Paul, and of the most holy pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they have been incurred, and then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the holy see; and as far as the keys of the holy church extend, I remit to you all punishment you deserve in purgatory on their account; and I restore you to the holy sacraments of the church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity you possessed at baptism; so that when you die, the gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the paradise of life shall be opened, and if you shall not die at present, this grace shall

From perusing this, which is faithfully transcribed from Sechenndorf, a popish writer, it will appear, that the terms which Tetzel and his associates made use of were so extravagant, that unless they had been well authenticated, we might have doubted of the truth of them. If any man purchased one of these indulgences, his soul was to rest secure with respect to its salvation. The souls confined in purgatory were, as soon as the money was paid, set at liberty, and ascend into heaven. The efficacy of the indulgences was to be so great, that the most heinous sins were pretended to be forgiven, and the person was to be freed from all manner of punishment, and even from the guilt which incurs it.—This was, indeed, the carrying priestcraft to an unbounded height; but it led to the fall of its own greatness. Almost every man looked upon them with silent contempt, or with an honest indignation; they saw natural religion as it were trampled under foot, and the glorious fabric of the church made to appear worse than heathenism was of old. They beheld an order of designing men, who had long trampled on the rights of private judgment, now attempting to deprive others of their natural faculties and to make the very name of Christianity odious in the world, by attempting to raise money in consequence of practices which the most unenlightened heathens would have been ashamed of.

Such was the favourable juncture, and so disposed were the minds of his countrymen to listen to his discourses, when Martin Luther first began to call in question the efficacy of indulgences, and declaim against the vicious lives, and false doctrines of those who promulgated them. He was a native of Eisleben in Saxony, where he was born in 1483, and though of poor parents, had received a learned education, according to the state of knowledge in that age, during the progress of which he gave many indications of uncommon vigour and acuteness of genius. As his mind was naturally susceptible of serious impressions, and tutored with somewhat of that religious melancholy which delights in the solitude and devotion of a monastic life, he retired into a convent of Augustine friars, and without suffering the entreaties of his parents to divert him from what he considered as his duty to God, he assumed the habit of that order.

There he acquired great reputation, not only for his piety, but for his love of knowledge and unwearied application to study. He had been taught the scholastic philosophy and theology, which were then in vogue, by very able masters, and wanted not penetration to comprehend all the intricacies and distinctions with which they abound; but his own understanding, naturally sound and superior to any thing frivolous, soon became disgusted with these subtle and unconstructive sciences, and he sought for some more solid foundation of knowledge and of piety in the sacred scriptures. Having found a copy of the bible which had long laid neglected in the library of his monastery, he abandoned all other pursuits, and devoted himself to the study of it with so much eagerness and assiduity as astonished the monks, who were little accustomed to derive their theological notions from that source. The great progress he made in this uncommon course of study, augmented so much both the fame of his sanctity and his learning, that Frederick, elector of Saxony, having founded an university at Wittenberg on the Elbe, the place of his residence, Luther was chosen, first to teach philosophy, and then theology in the schools; and he was considered as the chief ornament of that society.

While Luther was in the height of his reputation, Tetzel began to publish indulgences in the neighbourhood of Wittenberg; and to ascribe to them the same imaginary virtues, which in other places had been imposed on the credulity of the people. As Saxony was not more enlightened than other provinces, so Tetzel met with great success there. It was with the utmost concern that Luther beheld the artifices of those who sold, and the simplicity of those who bought the indulgences. The opinions of many of the most ancient and subtle schoolmen, who had established the doctrines of indulgences, were now falling into disrepute, and the scriptures, which Luther began to consider as the unerring standard of faith, afforded no countenance to a system that was destructive of natural reason, and calculated to render the most important things in the Christian system, no better than a farce.

His warm and impetuous temper did not suffer him long to conceal such important discoveries, or to continue a silent spectator while he saw his countrymen deluded. From the pulpit in the great church at Wittenberg, he inveighed bitterly against the irregularities of those who published indulgences. He went so far as to examine the nature of the doctrines they taught, and pointed out to the people the danger of relying for salvation on any other means than those prescribed in the word of God.

The boldness and novelty of these opinions drew great attention, and being recommended by the authority of Luther's personal character, and delivered with a popular and persuasive eloquence, they made a deep impression on his hearers. Encouraged by the favourable reception of his doctrines among the people, he wrote to Albert, elector of Mentz, and archbishop of Magdeburgh, to whose jurisdiction that part of Saxony was subject, and remonstrated warmly against the false opinions, and wicked lives of the preachers of the indulgences; but he found that prelate too deeply interested in their success to do any thing to hinder their progress.

His next attempt was to gain the approbation of men of learning, and for this purpose he published no less than ninety-five different propositions concerning the principles of theology. These he proposed not as points fully established of undoubted authority, but as subjects of doubt, inquiry, and disputation. He appointed a day on which the learned were invited to impugn them either in person, or in writing, and subjoined to the whole, solemn protestations of his respect for the apostolic see, of his submission to its authority, if the objections he had stated could be answered to his satisfaction. No opponent appeared at the time fixed, but the account of the propositions spread over Germany with the utmost rapidity; they were read with the greatest eagerness, and all admired the boldness of the man who had ventured to call in question the plentitude of papal power, and to attack the Dominicans, armed with all the powers of inquisitorial authority.

The friars of St. Augustine, Luther's own order, though addicted with no less obsequiousness than the other monastic fanatics, to the papal power, gave no check to the publications of these uncommon opinions.

Luther had, by his piety and learning, acquired uncommon authority among his brethren. He professed, from motives unknown to us, the highest regard for the authority of the pope, and probably his professions were at that time, sincere, and as a secret enmity, excited by interest and emulation, subsists among all the monastic orders in the Romish church, the Augustinians were highly pleased with his invectives against the Dominicans, and hoped to see them exposed to the hatred and scorn of the people. Nor was his sovereign the elector of Saxony, the wisest prince at that time in Germany, dissatisfied with that obstruction which Luther threw in the way of the publication of indulgences. He secretly favoured the attempt, and flattered himself that this dispute among the clergy might give some check to the exertions of the court of Rome, which the secular princes had long, though, without success, been endeavouring to oppose.

Many zealous champions immediately rose to defend opinions on which the wealth, power, and grandeur of the church were founded, against the propositions advanced by Luther. Amongst these was Tetzel, a man whose character we have already described. He published an equal number of propositions with those of Luther, and they were defended by all the sophistry of false logic by Eckius, a divine belonging to the cathedral church of Augsburg; and Prianius, a Dominican friar, wrote against Luther with all the virulence of a scholastic disputant. But the manner in which they conducted the cause, did little honour to their argument. Luther attempted to condemn the doctrine as well as the practice of granting indulgences, from arguments drawn from reason, or derived from scripture; but they produced nothing in support of them, except the sentiments of school-men, the conclusions of the canon law, and the decrees of the popes. The decisions of judges, so partial and degenerated, did not satisfy the people, who began to call in question even the authority of these venerable guides, when they found them standing in open opposition to the dictates of reason, and the determinations of the divine law.

Mean while the novelties which appeared in Luther's doctrine, and seemed so much to engage all the attention of the people, did not alarm the court of Rome. Pope Leo X. fond of elegant and refined pleasures, intent upon great schemes of policy, a stranger to the clerical controversies, and apt to despise them, regarded with the utmost indifference, the operations of an obscure friar, who in the heart of Germany, carried on a scholastical disputation in a barbarous style. Little did he apprehend, or Luther himself dream, that the effects of this quarrel would be fatal to the papal see. Leo imputed the whole to monastic enmity and emulation, and seemed inclined not to interpose in the controversy, but to allow the Augustinians and Dominicans to wrangle about the matter with their usual animosity.

The solicitations, however, of Luther's adversaries, exasperated to an high degree, by the boldness and severity with which he animadverted on their writings, together with the surprising progress which his opinions made in different parts of Germany, roused at last the attention of the court of Rome, and obliged Leo to take measures for the security of the church, against an attack that appeared now too serious to be despised. For this reason he summoned Luther to appear at Rome within sixty days, before the auditor of his chamber, and Prianius was summoned to appear at the same time, to make good his allegations.

He wrote at the same time, to the elector of Saxony, begging he would not protect a man whose heretical and professed tenets were so shocking to pious ears, and enjoined the provincial of the Augustinians to check, by his authority, the rashness of an arrogant monk, which brought disgrace upon the order of St. Augustine, and gave offence and disturbance to the whole church.

From the strain of these letters, as well as from the nomination of a judge so prejudiced and partial as Prianius, Luther easily saw what sentence he might expect at Rome. He discovered, for that reason, the utmost solicitude to have his cause tried in Germany, and before a less suspected tribunal. The university of Wittenberg, anxious for the safety of a man who did so much honour to their society, wrote to the pope, and after employing several pretexts to excuse Luther from appearing at Rome, entreated Leo to commit the examination of his doctrine to some persons of learning and authority in Germany. The elector of Saxony, his sovereign requested the same favour of the pope's legate at the diet at Augsburg; and as Luther himself, who, at that time, was so far from having any intention to disclaim the papal authority, that he did not even entertain the smallest suspicion concerning its divine original, had written to Leo a most submissive letter, promising an unreserved compliance with his will; the pope gratified them so far as to empower his legate in Germany, cardinal Cajetan, a Dominican, eminent for scholastic learning, and passionately devoted to the Roman see, to hear and determine the cause.

Luther, although he had good reason to decline a judge chosen among his avowed adversaries, did not hesitate about appearing before Cajetan; and having obtained the emperor's safe conduct, immediately repaired to Augsburg. The cardinal received him with decent respect, and endeavoured at first to gain upon him by gentle treatment; but thinking it beneath the dignity of his station to enter into any formal dispute, he required him, by virtue of the apostolical powers with which he was invested, to retract the errors he had uttered with regard to indulgences, and the nature of faith; and to abstain for the future, from the publication of new and dangerous opinions.

Luther, fully persuaded of the truth of his own tenets, and confirmed in the belief of them, by the approbation they had met with among persons conspicuous both for their learning and piety, was surprised at this abrupt mention of a recantation, before any endeavours were used to convince him that he was mistaken.

He had flattered himself, that in a conference concerning the points in dispute, with a prelate of such distinguished abilities, he would be able to remove many of those imputations with which the ignorance or malice of his enemies had branded him. But the high tone of authority the cardinal assumed, extinguished at once all hopes of this kind, and cut off every prospect of advantage from the interview.—His native intrepidity of mind, however, did not desert him. He declared, with the utmost firmness, that he could not, with a safe conscience, renounce opinions which he believed to be true; nor should any consideration ever induce him to do what would be so base in itself, and so offensive to God.

At the same time, he continued to express no less reverence for the papal authority than he had formerly done, and signified his earnest desire to have the whole decided by the opinion of different universities; promising, at the same time, never to write or preach against indulgences, so as his opponents would be silent in preaching in favour of them. It will, perhaps, appear rather strange to those who consider the age in which Luther first made his public appearance, his strenuous defence of the truths of the gospel, and his strong opposition to papal encroachment, that he should submit his cause to be tried by doctors in universities, who were no better than idol drones, accustomed to live in cloisters, and at all times obedient to the Roman Catholic power. To this it is answered, that although the dawn of learning was then beginning to diffuse its refreshing and cheering beams over a benighted world, lost in darkness and ignorance, yet it was not come to such a state of perfection as to dispel prejudices. It was the wretched notion of the people in the dark ages, that there was an infallibility lodged somewhere among men, for the preservation of the Christian religion. It was not sufficient for them to trust in the divine promise, but they were to look for infallibility among themselves. Some placed it in popes, some in general councils, and others in universities, without considering that God never delegated a power of that nature to any man, nor to any body of men whatever. It was the fault of the times, not the fault of any particular man.

But to go on with the narrative. Although, according to the extent of human understanding in that age, Luther's proposals were every way reasonable, yet Cajetan rejected them, and insisted peremptorily on a simple recantation, threatening him with ecclesiastical censures, and forbidding him to appear again in his presence, unless he instantly complied with what he had enjoined. This haughty and violent manner of proceeding, joined to many other circumstances, gave Luther's friends such strong reasons to suspect that even the imperial safe conduct would not be able to protect him from the legate's power and resentment, that they prevailed on him to withdraw secretly from Augsburg, and to return to his own country. However, before his departure, according to a form long used at all diets held for the German empire, and general councils, he prepared a solemn appeal from the conduct of this pope to his successor, whom he believed would be better informed, and more attentive to his cause.

Cajetan, who was a real bigot, enraged at Luther's abrupt retreat, and the publication of his appeal, wrote to the elector of Saxony, complaining of both, and requiring him, as he regarded the peace of the church, and the authority of the pope, either to send that seditious monk a prisoner to Rome, or to banish him out of his territories.

It was not from theological motives that Frederick, the Saxon elector, had hitherto protected Luther; he seems to have been a stranger to these controversies, and little interested in them. His protection flowed from political motives, and was afforded with secrecy and caution. He had neither heard any of Luther's discourses, nor read any of his books; and although all Germany resounded with his fame, he had never once admitted him into his presence. But upon this demand made by the cardinal, it became necessary for the elector to throw off somewhat of his former reserve. He had been at much expence, and had bestowed great attention in founding a new university, and foreseeing how fatal a blow the removal of Luther would be from that seat of learning, he refused to comply with the cardinal's request. He interested himself in Luther's safety, and began to declare himself a favourer of his opinions.

The inflexible rigour with which Cajetan insisted on a simple recantation, gave great offence to Luther's followers in that age, and has since been censured as imprudent by several popish writers, but it was impossible for the legate, according to the nature of his commission, to act otherwise. The judges before whom Luther had been required to appear at Rome, were so eager to display their zeal against his errors, that without waiting the expiration of the sixty days allowed him in the citation they had already condemned him as an heretic.—Pope Leo X. had in several of his letters, stigmatized him as a child of iniquity, and a man of a reprobate mind. Nothing less, therefore, than a simple recantation could save the honour of the church, whose maxim it is never to abandon the smallest point it has established, and which is even professed by its pretensions to infallibility: for if a church cannot do any thing wrong, then to annul one of its own decrees would be to acknowledge its fallibility by giving up one of the whole.

In the mean time, Luther's situation was such as would have filled any other person with the utmost apprehensions. He saw no reason to expect that a prince so cautious as Frederick, would, on his account, set at defiance the thunders of the church, and brave the papal power which had often crushed some of the bravest German princes. He knew what veneration was at that time paid to ecclesiastical decrees, what terror ecclesiastical censures carried along with them, and how easily these might influence a prince who was rather his protector from policy, than his disciple from conviction. If he should be obliged to quit Saxony, he had no pros-spect of any part of the habitable world where he could procure an asylum, and must stand exposed to whatever punishment the rage or bigotry of his enemies could inflict. Though sensible of his danger, he discovered no symptoms of timidity or remissness, but continued to vindicate his own conduct and opinions, and to inveigh against those of his adversaries with greater strength of argument than before.

So far Luther shewed himself to be a real hero indeed, and one who knew that truth ought always to be supported, should the most reputed characters for sanctity join in opposing it. But as every step taken by the court of Rome, particularly the irregular sentence by which he had been so precipitately declared a heretic, convinced Luther that Leo X. would soon proceed to the most violent measures against him, he had recourse to the only expedient in his power, in order to prevent the effect of the papal censures. He appealed to a general council, which he affirmed to be the representative of the Catholic church, and superior in power to the pope, who, being a fallible man, might err as St. Peter had before. This appeal made by Luther, gives us a melancholy notion of the sentiments embraced by the people in that age. Were general councils infallible? The answer is, no more than the popes themselves. Had all general councils concurred in the same opinion, then this sentiment respecting their infallibility might have been embraced; but as it is well known that one general council has excommunicated another of the same rank, where was the infallibility to be found? Nay, it is well known that the council of Trent, which met some time after the death of Luther, not only condemned all those doctrine embraced by the Protestants, but actually gave sanction to new ones, which before that time had been dubious and disputable.

It soon appeared, that Luther had not formed rash conjectures concerning the intention of the Romish church. A bull, of a date prior to his appeal, was issued by the pope, in which were inserted the virtues and benefits of indulgences, in terms as extravagant as any of his predecessors had ventured to use, even in the earliest ages, and without applying such palliations, or granting such concessions as the juncture might seem to call for, he required all Christians to assent to what he had delivered, as the doctrine of the Catholic church, and declared that those who held any other opinions, should be punished with the severest ecclesiastical censures. This bull had but little effect among Luther's followers, who conceived it in its true light, namely, as an engine to raise money to support papal extravagancies.

At this time, a circumstance took place which was very favourable to Luther, and that was the death of the emperor Maximilian, whose interests and principles both corresponded to enable him to support the grandeur of the Romish church. In consequence of this event, the elector of Saxony, by virtue of his offices, had his powers greatly enlarged, and under his protection, Luther not only lived in peace, but his opinions were taught almost every where throughout the empire.

During this inter-regnum, before an emperor was chosen, the court of Rome began to consider, that the growing heresy of Luther would be the ruin of their church. Leo X. the then pope, was a man of pleasure, loved expense and gaiety, but he knew nothing of religion. He was a profligate and a debauchee in the truest sense of the words; and if we believe Voltaire, he died of the venereal disease.—Leo did not know at this juncture how to act. He had given offence to the Germans, and to several other Christian nations, by the publication of his indulgences in the most scandalous manner; a poor private monk had boldly stood forth in defiance of religious liberty, and a vast number of people whose eyes seemed now to be opened, had declared, that unless the publication of indulgences was revoked, they would declare for Luther. Encouraged by the support he met with from his brave countrymen, Luther began to proceed farther, and even called in question the divine authority of the papal see. A public disputation was held on this subject at Leipsic, and the result was, that a breach with the court of Rome was found necessary.

Nor did this spirit of opposition to the doctrines and usurpations of the church of Rome stop here, for it broke out in several other parts of Germany at the same time. An attack, no less severe, and occasioned by the same causes, was made upon them about this time in Switzerland. The Franciscans being intrusted with the sale of indulgences in that country, executed their commission with the same indiscretion and rapaciousness which had rendered the Dominicans so odious in Germany. They proceeded, however, with uninterrupted success till they arrived at Zurich. There Zuinglius, a man not inferior to Luther himself in zeal and intrepidity, ventured to oppose them, and being animated with a republican boldness, and free from those restraints which subjection to the will of a prince imposed on the German reformer, he advanced with more daring and rapid steps to overturn the whole fabric of the established religion. The appearance of such a vigorous auxiliary, and the progress which he made, was at first matter of great joy to Luther, though on the other hand, the decrees of the university of Cologne and Louvain, which pronounced his opinions to be erroneous afforded great cause of triumph for his adversaries.

But the undaunted spirit of Luther acquired fresh vigour from every species of opposition, and pushing on his enquiries and attacks from one doctrine to another, he began to shake the firmest foundations on which the wealth or power of the church of Rome had been founded. Leo, the pope, came at last to be convinced that all hopes of reclaiming him by forbearance were in vain, and several prelates exclaimed against the pope's lenity without considering that he could not do any thing against Luther without the concurrence of the German princes, and to some of these the court of Rome had rendered itself obnoxious. The pope was roused as it were from his slumber, and he began to place some confidence in the new emperor Charles, believing, at the same time, that the elector of Saxony would not be so deaf to his own interest as to protect an incorrigible heretic, who for three years together had disturbed the peace of the church in opposition to the ecclesiastical canons, the decrees of the general councils, the letters or precepts sent by the popes, and the opinions of the doctors in the most celebrated universities.

The college of cardinals were often assembled, in order to prepare the sentence with due deliberation, and the most able canonists were consulted how it might be expressed with the most unexceptionable formality. At last, on the fifteenth day of June, (we must be formal) one thousand five hundred and twenty, the bull, so fatal to the church of Rome, was issued. Forty-one propositions, extracted out of Luther's works, were therein condemned as heretical, scandalous, and offensive to pious ears. All persons were forbidden to read his writings, upon pain of excommunication, and such as had any of them in their custody, were commanded to commit them to the flames. Nay, he himself, if he did not, within sixty days, recant all his heresies, was to be excommunicated, and delivered unto satan for the destruction of his flesh; and all secular princes were required, under penalty of the same censure, to seize his person, that he might be punished in the manner his crimes deserved.

The publication of this bull in Germany excited various passions in different places. Luther's adversaries exulted, as if his party and opinions had been crushed at once by such a decisive blow. His followers, whose reverence for the papal authority daily diminished, read Leo's anathemas with more indignation than terror. In some cities, the people violently obstructed the promulgation of the bull; in others, those who attempted to publish it were treated with contempt, and the bull itself was torn in pieces and trodden under-foot.

Luther had looked for this sentence some time, but it did not in the least intimidate him; superior to ecclesiastical menaces, his mind triumphed, and he rose in grandeur, in consequence of his enemies attempting to depress him. Consistent with the foolery of the age, he again renewed his appeal to a general council, and published some remarks on the pope's bull. It is certain, that in these remarks there is a great deal of scholastic jargon, taken mostly from the writings of St. Augustine; but still, as we have already observed, this was the fault of the age more than that of the author's, learning was then in leading-strings, and the abominable jargon of school divinity had in a manner hardly left common sense in the world.

Luther in this case shewed himself to be a man of spirit, and without shewing that mean, scrupulous pride so peculiar to the baseness of hypocrites, he maintained a dignity of sentiment that will ever do honour to his memory. He had the whole papal power to engage with, and he was no stranger to the ignorance and prejudices of his own countrymen.

As the pope had ordered Luther's books to be burnt at Rome, so this intrepid hero assembled the members of the university of Wittemberg together, and in solemn procession they burnt the pope's bull, and this example was followed by the inhabitants of several of the cities of Germany. The manner in which he justified this action, was more provoking than the action itself. He collected from the canon law some of the most extravagant propositions with respect to the plenitude of power and unlimited authority of the popes, and the subordination of all inferior to him in ecclesiastical jurisdiction. To these he added some remarks, which struck deep at the power of the church of Rome, because they tended to subvert civil government.

Such was the progress Luther had made, and such was the state of his party when Charles V. came to take possession, by election, of the German empire. No secular prince had hitherto embraced Luther's opinions, no change in the established religion had been introduced, and no incroachments were made on the revenues or foundations of the clergy. Neither party had yet proceeded to action; and the controversy, though conducted with great heat and passion on both sides, was still carried on in the way of argumentation. A deep impression, however, was made on the minds of the people; their reverence for ancient doctrines and institutions was shaken, and the materials were already scattered which produced the combustion that soon spread itself all over Germany. Students crowded from every province of the empire to Wittemberg, and there some of the greatest men who have done honour to the Protestant religion, received the first rudiments of their education. The field for religious controversies was now opened, a sort of restraint was laid upon the papal power, men began to see, and what was still more to their honour, they began to speak their sentiments with freedom, which their ancestors had not been permitted to do for a thousand years before.

During the course of these transactions, the court of Rome, though under the direction of one of its ablest pontiffs, neither formed its schemes with that sagacity, nor executed them with that steady perseverance which had long rendered it the most perfect model of political wisdom to all the rest of Europe. When Luther began to declaim against indulgences, two different methods of treating him lay before the pope, by adopting one of which, the attempt it is probable, might have been crushed, and by the other it might have been rendered innocent.

If Luther's first departure from the doctrines of the church had instantly drawn upon him the weight of its censures, the dread of these might have restrained the elector of Saxony from protecting him, might have deterred the people from listening to his discourses, or even might have over-awed Luther himself and his name, like that of many good men before his time, would now have only been known to the world by his honest but ill-timed effort to convert the corruptions of the Romish church; or on the other hand, if the pope had early testified some displeasure with the vices and excesses of those who had been employed to publish indulgences, if he had forbidden the mentioning of controverted points in private discourse, if he had enjoined the disputants on both sides to be silent, if he had been careful not to risk the credit of the church by defining what had hitherto been left undetermined. Luther would probably have stopped short at his first discoveries. He would not have been forward to put himself upon his own defence, and the whole controversy might probably have died away insensibly; or being confined entirely to the schools, might have been carried on with as little detriment to the peace and unity of the Romish church as that which the Franciscans maintain with the Dominicans concerning the immaculate conception, or that between the Jansenists and Jesuits, concerning the operation of grace. But Leo, by fluctuating between these opposite systems, and by embracing them alternately, defeated the effects of both. By an improper exertion of authority, Luther was exasperated but not restrained. By a mistaken exercise of lenity, time was given for his opinions to spread, but no progress made towards reconciling him to the church, and even the sentence of excommunication which at another juncture might have been decisive was delayed so long that it became at last scarce an object of terror.

Such a series of errors in the measures of a court seldom chargeable with mistaking its own true interest, is not more astonishing than the wisdom which appeared in Luther's conduct. Though a perfect stranger to the maxims of human prudence, and incapable, from the impetuosity of his temper, of observing them, he was led naturally by the method in which he made his discoveries, to carry on his operations in a manner which contributed more to their success, than if every step he took had been prescribed by the most artificial policy. At the time when he set himself to oppose Tetzel, he was far from intending that Reformation, which he afterwards effected; and would have trembled with horror at the thoughts of what at last he gloried in accomplishing. The knowledge of truth was not poured into his mind, all at once, by any special revelation; he acquired it by industry and meditation, and his progress, of consequence, was gradual.

The doctrines of popery are so closely connected, that the exposing of one error conducted him naturally to the detection of others; and all the parts of that artificial fabric were so linked together, that the pulling down of one loosened the foundation of the rest, and rendered it more easy to overturn them. In confuting the extravagant tenets concerning indulgences, he was obliged to enquire into the true cause of our justification and acceptance with God. The knowledge of that, discovered to him by degrees the inutility of pilgrimages and penances; the vanity of relying on the intercession of saints; the impiety of worshipping them; the abuses of auricular confession; and the imaginary existence of purgatory. The detection of so many errors, led him of course to consider the character of the clergy who taught them; and their exorbitant wealth, the severe injunction of celibacy and the intolerable rigour of monastic vows appeared to him the great sources of their corruption. From thence it was but one step to call in question the divine original of the papal power, which authorized and supported such a system of errors.

As the unavoidable result of the whole, he disclaimed the infallibility of the pope, the decision of schoolmen, or any other human authority, and appealed to the word of God as the only standard of theological truth. To this gradual progress Luther owed his success. His hearers were not shocked at first by any proposition too repugnant to their ancient prejudices, or too remote from established opinions. They were conducted insensibly from one doctrine to another.

Their faith and conviction were able to keep pace with his discoveries. To the same cause was owing the inattention, and even difference, with which Leo viewed Luther's first proceedings. A direct or violent attack upon the authority of the church, would have drawn upon him at once the whole weight of its vengeance; but as this was far from his thoughts, as he continued long to profess great respect for the pope, and made repeated offers of submission to his decisions, there seemed to be no reason for apprehending that he would prove the author of any desperate revolt, and he was suffered to proceed step by step, in undermining the constitution of the church, till the remedy applied at last came too late to produce any effect.

But whatever advantages Luther's cause derived either from the mistakes of his adversaries, or from his own good conduct, the sudden progress and firm establishment of his doctrines, must not be ascribed to these alone. The same corruptions in the church of Rome which he condemned, had been attacked long before his appearance, and the same opinions which he now propagated, had been published in different places, and were supported by the same arguments. Waldus in the twelfth century, Wickliff in the fourteenth already mentioned, and Huss in the fifteenth, had inveighed against the errors of popery with great boldness, and confuted them with more ingenuity and learning than could have been expected in those illiterate ages in which they flourished. But all these premature attempts towards a reformation proved abortive. Such feeble lights, incapable of dispelling the darkness which then covered the church, were soon extinguished: and though the doctrines of these pious men produced some effects, and left some traces in the country where they were taught, they were neither extensive nor considerable. Many powerful causes contributed to facilitate Luther's progress, which either did not exist, or did not operate with full force in their days; and at the critical and mature juncture when he appeared, circumstances of every kind concurred in rendering each step he took successful.

The long and scandalous schism which divided the church, during the latter part of the fourteenth, and the beginning of the fifteenth centuries, had a great effect in diminishing the veneration with which the world had been accustomed to view the papal dignity. Two or three contending pontiffs roaming about Europe at a time, fawning on the princes whom they wanted to gain, squeezing the countries which acknowledged their authority, excommunicating their rivals, and cursing those who adhered to them, discredited their pretensions to infallibility, and exposed both their persons and their office to contempt. The laity, to whom all parties appealed, came to learn that some right of private judgment belonged to them, and acquired the exercise of it so far as to chuse, among these infallible guides, whom they would please to follow. The proceedings of the councils of Constance and Basil, spread still wider this disrespect for the Romish see, and by their bold exertion of authority in deposing and electing popes, taught the world that there was in the church a jurisdiction superior even to the papal power, which they had long believed to be supreme.

The wound given on that occasion to the papal authority was scarce healed up, when the pontificates of Alexander VI. and Julius II. both able princes, but detestable ecclesiastics, raised new scandal in Christendom. The profligate morals of the former in private life; the fraud, the injustice and cruelty of his public administration, place him on a level with those tyrants, whose deeds are the greatest reproach to human nature. The latter, though a stranger to these odious passions which prompted his predecessor to commit so many unnatural crimes, was under the dominion of a restless and ungovernable ambition, which scorned all considerations of gratitude, of decency, or of justice, when they obstructed the execution of his schemes. It was scarce possible to be firmly persuaded, that the infallible knowledge of a religion, whose chief precepts are purity and humility, was deposited in the breasts of the impious Alexander, or the overbearing Julius. The opinion of those who exalted the authority of a council above that of the pope spread wonderfully under their pontificates: and as the emperor and French king, who were actually engaged in hostilities with these active pontiffs, permitted and even encouraged their subjects to expose their vices with all the violence of invective, and all the petulance of ridicule, and men's ears becoming accustomed as it were to these, were not shocked to hear Luther treat the papal power in the most ludicrous terms.

Nor did satire operate against the pope only.— Many of the dignified secular clergy, being the younger sons of nobles families, who had assumed the ecclesiastical function for no other reason but that they found in the church people accustomed to idleness, neglected the duties of their office, and indulged themselves without reserve or fear, in all those vices which generally spring from an immoderate degree of wealth.

Though the preachers were prevented by their poverty from imitating the expensive luxury of their superiors, yet gross ignorance and low debauchery rendered them as contemptible as the others were odious. The severe and unnatural case of celibacy, to which both were equally subject, occasioned such irregularities, that in several parts of Europe, the priests were permitted to keep concubines. Nor was this to be found only in the warmer climates, where the passions are supposed to be more violent than in the northern regions. It even extended to the north of Scotland, where some of the old bishops had three or four natural children; and lord Hales has mentioned an instance and produced the record of one Hepburn, bishop of Murray, having five natural children legitimated by patent in one day.

The degeneracy of men among the ecclesiastics might perhaps, have been tolerated with more indulgence if their exorbitant riches and power had not enabled them at the same time to oppress all the other orders of men. It is the genius of superstition, fond of every thing pompous or grand, to set no bounds to its liberality towards persons whom it esteemed sacred, and to think its expressions of regard defective, unless it hath raised them to the height of wealth and authority. Hence flowed the extensive revenues and jurisdiction possessed by the church in every country in Europe, and which were become intolerable to the laity, from whose undecerning bounty they were at first derived.

The burden however, had fallen very heavy on Germany, for although the people of that extensive empire are naturally brave, and not much addicted to levity, tenacious of their ancient customs and strenuous supporters of their liberties, yet they had fallen into the prevailing error, and were ruled by the court of Rome, not as children under paternal jurisdiction, but as wretched slaves, who were to be fleeced of all their wealth, in order to maintain a great number of indolent priests in luxury, idleness, sensuality, and all sorts of debauchery.

While the clergy asserted their own pretensions with so much zeal, they daily encroached on those of the laity. All causes relative to matrimony, to wills, usury, legitimacy, and even to their own revenues, were to be decided in their own courts.—Nay, they were not satisfied with this amazing power, they actually attempted to bring before themselves the cognizance of all civil causes, and to become judges between men in disputes concerning civil property.

They had engrossed to themselves almost the whole system of human learning; for the laity were more intent on martial achievements, than on cultivating their rational faculties, which was one of the means by which they were kept in a state of ignorance.

The penalties inflicted by the ecclesiastical courts, added great dignity to the judges, and filled the minds of the people with terror. The censure of excommunication was originally designed to preserve the purity of the church, that obstinate offenders, whose impious tenets, or profane lives, were a reproach to Christianity, might be cut off from the society of the faithful. This the corrupt churchmen took care to improve to their own advantage, and inflicted their censures on the most frivolous pretensions. Whoever incurred their displeasure were excluded from all the privileges of Christians, and deprived of their rights as men and citizens, and the dread of this rendered even the most fierce and turbulent spirits obsequious to the authority of the church.

clergy might have been, yet they could have been borne with much longer by the Germans, had the revenues been bestowed upon their own countrymen, but quite the reverse took place. The popes had, for several ages, pretended a title to fill up all vacant bishoprics, and for that purpose they seized on the rights of the secular princes in Germany by sending some of their Italian creatures to take possession of the most opulent church livings. Here these Italians received vast sums of money without doing any duty to entitle them to such a reward, and they exercised such an unlimited authority as none but slaves could endure. The pope's favourite mistresses sold the benefices to those who bid the most money for them, for the holy head of the church loved women as much as the grand seignior.

These scandalous practices were not carried on in secret, they were done publicly, and the avarice of the church of Rome triumphing over its former prejudices, pious men beheld with silent regret these simonial practices, so unworthy the character of those who pretended to be the ministers of a Christian church, while politicians complained of the exportation of so much money to support idle priests, whose scandalous lives had totally made them odious to all ranks of people by degrading their character even below the meanest of the human creation.

Such were the dissolute manners, the exorbitant wealth, power and privileges of the clergy before the Reformation; such the oppressive rigour of that dominion which the popes had established over the Christian world; and such the sentiments that prevailed concerning them in Germany, and in the rest of Europe about the beginning of the sixteenth century. Nor has this sketch been taken from the parties concerned in that age, who might possibly have been led into prejudices in consequence of their violent opposition to each other; it is formed upon more authentic evidence, upon the memorials and remonstrances of the imperial diets coolly enumerating the grievances under which the empire groaned, begging earnestly for redress. Dissatisfaction must have risen to a great height, when these grave and solemn assemblies exposed the crimes with so much acrimony, and if they demanded the abolition of these enormities with so much vehemence, we may be assured, they uttered their sentiments and decrees in more bold and virulent expressions.

To men thus prepared for shaking off the arbitrary papal yoke, Luther addressed himself with almost certainty of success. As they had long felt its weight and borne it with impatience, they listened with joy to the first proposal for their deliverance. Hence proceeded the fond and eager reception his doctrines met with, and the rapidity with which they spread over all the provinces of Germany.

Even the impetuosity and fierceness of Luther's spirit, his confidence in asserting his own opinions, and the contempt with which he treated all who differed from him, which in ages of more moderation have been reckoned defects in the character of that reformer, did not appear excessive to his contemporaries, whose minds were strongly agitated by those interesting controversies which he carried on, and who themselves had endured the rigour of papal tyranny, and seen the corruptions of that church against which he exclaimed.

But besides all the means already mentioned, which contributed toward facilitating Luther's undertakings in bringing about the Reformation, there were some others not hitherto mentioned. Among these one of the chief was the art of printing, which took its rise about half a century before his time. By this fortunate discovery, the facility of acquiring and of propagating knowledge, was wonderfully increased, and Luther's books, which must otherwise have made their progress very slowly and with uncertainty, in distant countries, spread at once over all Europe. Nor were they read only by the rich and the learned, who alone had access to books before that invention; they got into the hands of the people, who upon their appeal to them as judges, ventured to examine and reject many doctrines which they had been enjoined to believe under the severest penalty.

The eyes of the people began to open gradually, they saw the impositions that had been put upon them by designing priests, and they were glad to patronize a man who bid fair to restore them to their natural liberty.

But Luther was not alone in opposition to the measures of the court of Rome. The great Erasmus, who was his contemporary, without being a Protestant in possession, let loose the whole force of his satire on the errors and superstitions of popery. His acute judgment and vast erudition enabled him to discover many errors, both in the doctrine and worship of the church of Rome. Some of these he confuted with great solidity of reason and force of eloquence; others he treated as objects of ridicule, and turned against them the inextinguishable torrents of popular and satirical wit, of which he had a great command. There was scarce any opinion or practice in the Romish church which Luther sought to reform, but had been previously unadverted upon by Erasmus, and had afforded him either matter for censure or raillery.

Various circumstances however, concurred in hindering Erasmus from pursuing the same course as that which Luther embarked in. The natural timidity of his temper; his want of that force of mind which alone can prompt a man to assume the character of a reformer; his excessive deference for persons in high stations; his dread of losing the pensions and other emoluments which their liberality had conferred upon him; his extreme love of peace, and hopes of reforming abuses gradually, and by gentle methods; all concurred to induce him to repress that zeal which he had once manifested against the errors of the church, and to assume the character of a mediator between Luther and his opponents.

The diet of the German empire was summoned to meet at Worms, an imperial city, to consider of Luther's opinions, and thither this great and illustrious reformer was summoned to make his personal appearance. In vain did his friends persuade him that he was in danger, he went in conscious innocence, and smiled at the menaces of his enemies. The reception he met with at Worms, was such as might have filled his mind with pride, had he acted from any other motives than such as were purely evangelical.

Greater crowds assembled to see him than had been there when the emperor made his public entry, and in this there was nothing at all remarkable; for here was a poor monk who had boldly stood up against the whole thunders of the vatican, had braved the imperial power so far as it related to matters of religion, and had ridiculed the superstitions of the church and court of Rome with all the acrimony of the severest satire.

It is true, the emperor had interest sufficient in the diet to get a severe decree passed against him, but his sovereign the elector of Saxony, who had been his friend at the beginning, stood by him to the last. His opinions were gladly embraced by many great persons in Germany, they spread far and wide among the populace; learned ecclesiastics joined him, and princes, to their everlasting honour, stood up in the defence of what they sincerely believed to be the doctrines of divine revelation.

In this manner, and from circumstances that no human wisdom could have foreseen, the papal power received a fatal blow in Germany, and the eyes of other European nations were so far opened, that the love of knowledge spread itself into many other countries. Princes indeed, from the worst of motives, did all that lay in their power to check its progress; but neither civil tyranny, nor ecclesiastical anathemas could answer the end. It is true the Germans set the example; and all those who lived in the more southerly climate had neither zeal nor courage to copy after them, yet the rising plant was nourished by the hand of divine providence; it bore down before it every sort of opposition, and even the smaller states of Switzerland opposed the papal power, and took the sacred scriptures for their guide in all matters of a religious nature. Sweden and Denmark soon followed their example; England and Scotland from motives that will be mentioned afterwards, did the same.

Whatever progress Luther made in the work of Reformation, seemed only to point out the way to something more complete, and the divines in other nations improved on the plan he had laid down. But without entering into a discussion of these things, we shall lay down the plan of that most arduous part of the work that lies before us. First we are to treat of such religions as are established under the name of Protestantism in different nations, and then of those who are commonly called Dissenters. In the first, we shall find some few variations in discipline, though little in doctrines; but in the second a great number in both. And here we shall adhere so strictly to the truth, that none will desire to condemn us without first acknowledging their own ignorance or guilt.

The Papists have reproached us with being divided into a great number of sects and parties, and by this they have laid hold of the ignorance of those whom they intended to make proselytes, without acquainting them, at the same time, that Protestants never persecuted each other with so much severity as the Dominicans have the Franciscans in the Romish church. We are willing to acknowledge that we do not all agree in every trifling circumstance; but in those points upon which salvation depends, there has not till lately been any matter of dispute; and even where such matter of dispute took place, it was carried on by men who did not so much enquire after the truth as they sought an opportunity to gratify their pride, and establish their impotence.

We are ready to grant, that consistent with our accounts of the primitive church, there may be some variations among us; but none of these wherever an ecclesiastical establishment of religion has taken place, can effect the salvation of mankind. As for those who have dissented from civil establishments, we shall treat of their sentiments with candour, and leave the reader to judge purely for himself.

As Lutheranism takes place in respect of antiquity before all the other civil establishments of the Protestant religion in Europe, and it has been more generally embraced with respect to locality, so it is necessary that we should begin with it, confining ourselves to its doctrines, discipline, worship, and government, as a Christian church, and point out how far the several establishments of Protestantism may differ, whether in kingdoms at large, or in more contracted provinces.

rites and ceremonies of the Lutherans.

THE account we have given of the Reformation in general, will lead every intelligent person to make a proper enquiry into particulars; and here we shall first take notice of the times when, and the places where, the Protestant religion according to the plan laid down by Luther, was established, for at the Reformation, the prophet's words were verified:

Saxony, and the county of Mansfield, revived Lutheranism 1521, and the same year the elector of Saxony, who had all along favoured Luther, desired him to appoint preachers to reform the people in every part of his dominions. The same year it was received at Kreichsaw, Goslar, Rostock, Riga, in Livonia, Rentling, and at Hall, in Swabia. In 1522, it was established at Augsburg, Hamburgh, Treptow, Pomerania and Prussia. In 1523, it was established in the Duchy of Launenburgh, Nurcm-burgh, and Breslaw. In 1525, throughout the whole Landgravate of Hesse. In 1528, at Gottingen, Limgon, and Einbech. In 1530 at Munster, and Paderborn, in Westphalia. In 1532, at Ulm, and Ethlingen. In 1533, at Grubenhagan, and Hanover. In 1534, in the Duchy of Wittemberg. In 1535, at Clotius, in the Lower Lusatia. In 1536, in the county of Lippe. In 1538, in the Electorate of Brandenburg, in Bremen, Hall, in Saxony, Leipsic, in Misnia and Quedlenburgh. In 1539, at Embden, in East Friesland, Hailbron, Halberstade, and Magdeburgh. In 1540, in the Palatinate of the Duchy of Nemburg, Regensburg, and Wismar. In 1542, at Buxton de Hildershem, and at Osnaburgh. In 1543, in the lower Palatinate. In 1546 at Mecklinburgh. In 1552, in the Marquisate of Durlach, and Hockburg. In 1556, in the County of Bentheim. In 1564, at Hagenaw, and in the lower Marquisite of Baden. In 1568, in the whole Duchy of Magdeburgh.

Here was a rapidity of progress which no human wisdom could have foreseen; for besides all the places already mentioned, Lutheranism was established in Sweden, Denmark, and Norway. It was not like Mahometanism, propagated by the sword, nor like popery supported by the gibbet and the stake. It consisted of a rational address to the understandings of men, and divine providence prepared them to receive it.

The system of faith, embraced by the Lutherans, was drawn up by Melancthon, a dear friend of Luther's, 1530, and presented to the emperor Charles V. It was designed to support all the points of the Reformation, and oppose the leading principles, and corrupt practices of popery. This is called the Augsburg confession, because Melancthon presented it to the emperor in that city, and it was divided into two parts, the first of which contained the following articles:

The 1st acknowledged, and agreed to the decisions of the first four general councils, concerning the Trinity.—The 2d admitted of original sin, defined it differently from the church of Rome, making it to consist only in concupiscence.—The 3d contained the substance of the apostles' creed.—The 4th maintained, against the Pelagians, that a man cannot be justified by the mere strength and capacity of nature; and, against Roman Catholics, that justification is the effect of faith, exclusive of good works.—The 5th agreed with the church of Rome, that the word God, and the sacraments, are the means of conveying the holy spirit, but differed from that communion, by asserting, that this divine operation is never present without faith.—The 6th affirmed, that our faith ought to produce good works, purely in obedience to God, and not in order to our own justification.—The 7th made the church to consist of none but the righteous.—The 8th acknowledged the validity of the sacraments, though administered by hypocrites or wicked persons.—The 9th asserted against the Anabaptists, the necessity of infant baptism.—The 10th acknowledged the body and blood of Christ under the consecrated elements; adding that this mysterious presence in the holy sacrament continued with the elements only during the time of receiving, and that the Eucharist ought to be given in both kinds.—The 11th granted the necessity of absolution to penitents, but denied their being obliged to make a particular confession of their sins.—The 12th condemned the Anabaptists, who affirm, that whoever is once justified cannot fall from grace; as also the Novations, who refused absolution to sins committed after baptism; asserting withal against the church of Rome, that a repenting sinner is not made capable of forgiveness by any acts of penance whatever.—The 13th required actual faith, from those who partake of the sacraments.—The 14th forbade those who were not lawfully called, to teach in the church, or administer the sacraments.—The 15th appointed the observation of the festivals, and prescribed the ceremonies of the church.—The 16th acknowledged the obligation of civil laws, and approved the magistracy, propriety of estates and marriage.—The 17th acknowledged the resurrection, heaven and hell, and condemned the two following errors of the Anabaptists, and fifth monarchy men; viz. That the punishment of the devils and the damned will have an end, and that the saints will reign with Christ a thousand years upon earth.—The 18th declared, that our wills are not sufficiently free, in actions relating to the promoting of our salvation.—The 19th maintained, that notwithstanding God created man, and still continues to preserve him, he neither is, nor can be, the author of sin.—The 20th affirmed, that good works are not altogether unprofitable:—And the 21st forbade the invocation of saints.

The second part of the Augsburg confession is altogether in opposition to the church of Rome, containing the seven principal abuses on which the Lutherans founded the necessity of separating from the communion of that church.

The 1st head enjoined communion in both kinds, and forbade the procession of the holy sacrament.—The 2d condemned the celibacy of priests.—By the 3d private masses were abolished, and some part at least of the congregation were obliged to communicate with the priest.—The 4th declared against the necessity of making a particular confession of sins to the priest.—The 5th rejected tradition.—The 6th disallowed monastic vows:—And the 7th asserted, that the power of the church consisted only in preaching the gospel, and administering the sacrament.

This confession of faith was signed by the elector of Saxony, and his eldest son, by the marquis of Brandenburg, by the landgrave of Hesse, the prince of Hainault, and the republics of Nuremberg and Rutlingena. It was argued before the emperor Charles V. but rejected; the Roman Catholics having a majority of votes in the council. This was followed by a conference between seven deputies of each party; in which, Luther being absent, Melancthon, by his mollifying explanations, brought both sides to an agreement in relation to fifteen of the first twenty-one articles. But the conference broke up without adjusting all the differences between them.

In considering these articles, it appears, that in most of the capital doctrines of religion upon which salvation depends, there were but few differences between the Lutherans and Calvinists. Consubstantiation was one, absolution another, and an official priority in the clergy a third. The truth is most of the reformers throughout every part of Europe, were of the same sentiments with St. Austin, who so strongly supported the doctrine of absolute predestination, and efficacious grace against the Pelagians.

But be these things as they will, it is certain that although Luther, in his commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, wrote in defence of free grace, yet his followers did not remain long in that opinion; for we find that before the middle of the last century, their preachers began to assert the doctrine of free-will, which is now an universal topic in their pulpits, although no such thing is inserted in their confession of faith, already printed. But in this they are not much different from some other Protestant churches, perhaps being of opinion with bishop Burnet, that men may subscribe to a particular system he does not literally believe, and put what construction upon it he pleases. This opinion of bishop Burnet is not much unlike the conduct of a friar, who having a desire to a fowl in Lent, flourished his knife in his hand, and said, "Upon be God," and then eat it with the utmost avidity.—Mr. Blackburne the author of the Confessional, thinks that when men have no other way of procuring a subsistence than by that of subscribing to a certain formulary which they do not approve, that they may temporize and comply.

This has some connection with the conduct of the emperor of Germany, who granted a safe conduct to John Huss and Jerome of Prague, when they went to the council of Constance, and afterwards conducted them to the stake, declaring no faith should be kept with heretics. Without sincerity there can be no religion; and if systems cannot be written in such language as is understood, then there is an end of all uniformity of sacraments; and such evasion being used by so many Protestants, has done more hurt to their cause than all the machinations of Romish priests. In all Protestant countries men may dissent from the established religion, if they are not satisfied with the terms of conformity, and it is more honourable to live even in a state of poverty, than for a man to wound his conscience, by declaring his assent to what he does not believe to be truth.

But to return to the subject. The next thing to be considered is the worship of the Lutherans, for worship must always be considered as one of the essentials of religion.

The worship in the Lutheran churches has a near affinity to what we have already mentioned in our account of the primitive Christians, only that the Lutherans wear gowns and surplices, which were not in use till a considerable time after Constantine the Great. If we were able to form any notion of the worship practised in the church during the fifth century, it was much the same, if not entirely so, as what the Lutherans use at present. Mosheim, a Lutheran divine, and late president of the university of Göttingen, is of this opinion in his ecclesiastical history, and that learned gentleman freely acknowledges, that they have in their churches still too many ceremonies, as well as too many festivals.

All their churches are built in length from east to west, which is of great antiquity and still observed by Protestants in general, except by the Scotch, who build their places of worship in a promiscuous manner. When the Lutherans first go into their churches, they stand looking towards the altar, which is always at the east, and in that attitude offer up their devotions in private. The women sit in the middle of the church, and the men round about in the galleries. The public service begins with the organ playing and then all the people rise up and sing an hymn or psalm, to which they are directed by the preacher or reader. After this, the minister in his gown goes into the pulpit and prays, the people all looking towards the east, and some bowing to the altar. At the conclusion of the first prayer, which is a form though not read, the minister falls down upon his knees and remains in silence for some time. He then rises up, and all the people turn their faces towards him. He then reads out of their liturgy, the gospel for the day, and delivers a sermon from it, without notes; for throughout the whole world, no churches, whether Greeks, Roman Catholics, or Protestants, ever read sermons to the people, except the English. Sermon being over, the minister repeats a short prayer, the people having their faces towards the east, and then the organ begins to play, when they sing another hymn. The minister then pronounces the blessing.

This is the forenoon service, for they seldom have any preaching in the afternoon, the whole consisting of prayers and singing. In the afternoon, as soon as the minister enters within the rails of the altar, dressed in his surplice, he gives out the psalm to be sung, repeating the first line, when the organ strikes up, and all the people join in singing. The minister stands with his back to the people, much in the same manner as the Romish priests when they celebrate mass; but at the beginning of every new hymn, turns to them and repeats the first verse.—They are extremely fond of music, and, indeed, great part of their worship consists of it; but they do not make the sign of the cross, nor do they use any holy water like the Roman Catholics. These however, are only the outlines of their religious worship, for they have many other practices which might be attended to. This much, however, is necessary to observe, that they are the least removed from the church of Rome of all the Protestants.

It was Luther's intention to change the whole form of divine service as practised in the Romish church; but he met with powerful opposition from several of the German princes, which is not to be wondered at, when we consider that the people of Europe were in that age, little better than barbarians. In the celebration of the eucharist, he looked upon wine as sufficient without any mixture of water, and masses for the dead were abolished. He exhorted all true Christians before they approached the communion, to prepare themselves by fasting and prayer, and although he declared, that auricular confession was not absolutely necessary, or to be insisted on, yet he held it to be a salutary practice, and by no means to be rejected and condemned.— He found no fault with the canonical hours, but ordained, that the people worship in the church twice upon every Sunday; that there should be prayers and sermon in the morning, and singing in the afternoon; that the gospel should be expounded in the morning and the epistle at vespers, and that the saints' days should be kept up. Lent is still kept by the Lutherans, and during that time, all those who are come to partake of the eucharist at Easter, confess their sins to the minister of the parish.

It is certain that confession took place in the Christian church a little time after Constantine the Great; but it was never magnified into such a degree of esteem as it is now held by the Roman Catholics till many hundred years afterwards. Upon it much of the power of the clergy depends, and Luther retained it in his ritual, although it has no foundation in the sacred scripture.

The Lutherans consecrate their churches in the following manner:—The pastor, and the greatest part of his congregation, meet near the parsonage house, or at some convenient place adjoining to the church intended to be consecrated, and afterwards march in procession two and two, once at least, and sometimes thrice round it, singing hymns all the way.— As soon as this act of devotion is over, they enter the church, where the service is again opened with singing. After which, some portions of sacred scripture are read, and a sermon preached on the solemnity of the meeting. If the revenues of the church will admit of it, the superintendent is invited to be present, to assist at the ceremony and give his benediction to the church, and consecrate it with some form of his composing, which favour is acknowledged by a gratuity, and a genteel entertainment.

There can be no manner of doubt but that as the Lutheran religion is established by law in many countries, and tolerated in some others, so there must be considerable differences in the ceremonies, although none of a very essential nature. We have the following account of the consecration of a church in the neighbourhood of Dresden, performed so lately as 1730.

The procession set out from the place where the Lutheran service had been first performed, and the students and scholars sung all the way. After them went the superintendent, who is much the same with them as our bishops, carrying a large bible, and the pastor of the parish with a chalice in one hand and a patin in the other, followed by two deacons.

One of the deacons carried the small chest in which the book of their discipline was deposited, and the other carried a copy of the book itself. A numerous train of Lutherans of all ranks brought up the rear, and in this order they marched to the church, where there were several anthems sung, accompanied with instrumental music.

After this, the superintendent preached a sermon on the solemnity of the occasion, and there was a grand entertainment provided.

The superintendent repeated a few prayers over the ground upon which the church stood, and no doubt but from that time it became sacred. It is certain, that the holiness of times and places have been frequently insisted on; it is equally certain, that it has no foundation in the New Testament.— St. Stephen the first martyr, who suffered death for Christ, said before the Jewish Sanhedrim, "God dwelleth not in temples made with hands." But let us attend to what is said by the late Mr. Hervey, an author esteemed and admired by Protestants of every denomination.

Speaking of gratitude, he says, "Here I recollected, and was charmed with Solomon's fine address to the Almighty, at the dedication of his famous temple; with immense charge and equal skill, he had erected the most rich and finished structure that the sun ever saw, yet upon a review of his work and a reflection on the transcendent perfections of the godhead, how he exalts the one and abases the other. The building was too glorious for the mightiest monarch to inhabit, too sacred for unhallowed feet even to enter, yet infinitely too mean for the Deity to reside in. It was, and the royal worshipper acknowledged it to be, a most marvellous condescension in uncreated excellency to put his name there."

The whole passage breathes such a delicacy, and is animated with such a sublimity of sentiment, that I cannot persuade myself to pass on without repeating it. But will God indeed dwell on earth? Behold! the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee, how much less this house that I have builded. 1. Kings, viii. 27. Medit. Vol. I p. 5.

Undoubtedly, these sentiments of Mr. Hervey are extremely fine, and in all respects consistent with the gospel dispensation, nay, with the purity of religion in general; for what sanctity can there be in any place where the heart is polluted, the conscience defiled, and the soul not reunited to God. Whenever ceremonies are strenuously adhered to, the life of religion is generally lost, and all sinks down into formality. We have a remarkable instance of this in a controversy that took place in the London newspapers, 1766. It was occasioned by the following circumstance.

Dr. Joseph Butler, the celebrated author of the Analogy between Natural and Revealed Religion, delivered a charge to the clergy of Durham, in which he made use of the following expressions:—"There may be a form of religion where no religion exists, but there can be no religion without a form."

There was nothing in these words that any sensible man could look upon as superstitious; for as we are a composition of flesh and blood, we must either have some forms in our religious worship, or we must become quietists. However, Mr. Blackburne, the author of the Confessional, laid hold of these expressions; and not contented with representing bishop Butler as a superstitious person he actually accused him of having died a Roman Catholic. But this leads us to treat of the discipline of the Lutherans.

The validity of the English ordinations, although episcopal, has been called in question; but it was ably defended by father Le Conrayer, who was himself a Roman Catholic. But if such objections have been made to the church of England, we need not be surprised to find some treating the Lutherans as not canonically ordained; for although they have bishops or superintendants, yet they have no episcopal ordination. It is a rule in all Protestant churches except in England, never to ordain a man to be a minister till he is presented to a living; for say they, a shepherd is of no manner of use without a flock. For this reason, the Lutherans like the Calvinists, grant licences to young men to preach; but they are not to take upon them any charge of souls.

The young gentlemen among the Lutherans, who have finished their studies at the university, and are declared qualified for the clerical office, are generally sent as assistants to such ministers as are far advanced in years; and these are called expectants. Their business is to perform all the divine offices, except that of administering the sacrament, and hearing the confession of penitents, that being confined to such as are ordained.

These young men frequently succeed the aged ones when they die; and here we may observe, that it is much to the honour of the German princes who are Protestants, that although they have the right of presentation to livings, yet they generally give it to the people, leaving them at liberty to chuse their own ministers.

The day for the ordination being fixed, the candidate repairs to the church where he is to be ordained, in the presence of several ministers, ecclesiastical judges, and the congregation of the people. A sermon is preached, after which, the candidate makes a confession of his faith verbally; for they are not permitted to use notes. In the prayer after sermon, the candidate is mentioned by name, in words to the following import:—"A. B. attending here to be admitted and ordained a minister of the gospel, by the imposition of hands, according to the apostolical institution; let us pray for him, that God Almighty would vouchsafe to inspire him with the holy spirit, and bestow upon him an abundant portion of heavenly gifts."

As soon as the minister withdraws from the pulpit, they sing the Veni Spiritus Sancti; that is, the hymn beginning with the words, Come Holy Ghost, but not in Latin, as is the practice with the Roman Catholics, but in the vulgar language of the country where they reside. Then the superintendent with about five or six clergymen, repair to the altar, followed by the candidate, who as soon as they are entered, falls down on his knees before them.—Here the superintendent, addressing himself to his colleagues before mentioned, and having repeated the candidate's request, desires them to join with him in prayer on his behalf. After that, he reads the certificate of his free election by the people, and then they join in prayer the second time. The prayer being over, the superintendent speaks to the ministers, his colleagues, in the following words:—

"Dearly beloved brethren in our Lord Jesus, I exhort you to lay your hands on this candidate, who presents himself here before us, in order to be ordained a minister of the church of God, according to the ancient apostolical institution, and to concur with me in vesting him with that sacred office."—After this, they all lay their hands on the head of the candidate, when the superintendent says, "Be thou, and so remain to be, devoted to the service of God."

This being over, the superintendent addresses himself to the person thus ordained, in terms to the following purpose: "Being assembled here through the aid and assistance of the Holy Ghost, we have made our humble supplications to God for you, and hope that he will vouchsafe to hear our prayers.—Wherefore I ordain, confirm, and establish you, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, pastor and spiritual instructor of the saints belonging to the church of C. D. to govern it in the fear of God, and have a watchful eye over it as a faithful shepherd over his flock."

The superintendent having pronounced the exhortation, withdraws from the altar, and the stated minister approaches it, dressed in his sacerdotal vestments, to read the common service, and to consecrate the bread and wine, which he administers to the new pastor, who receives it upon his knees.—Some few hymns, and the usual benediction conclude the ceremony. After service is over, all the pastors retire to the vestry, where they congratulate in Latin the party ordained. The superintendent afterwards reminds him of the great importance of the pastoral charge, and presses home the numerous obligations he has laid himself under, the most material of which are the following.

As a pastor, he is to look upon himself as the shepherd and father of his flock; he must make the sacred scriptures the foundation of all his discourses, and not broach new doctrines, whatever may be his private sentiments with respect to established notions, yet he is to be careful not to make them public as doubts, lest he should mislead those who are weak. He must not look with contempt on his congregation, nor must he leave it without assigning such a reason as shall satisfy the superintendent that he is sincere. He must concern himself with no political or state affairs, nor interfere in any private dispute, unless it be to reconcile the parties, by acting the part of a mediator, which was the practice of the primitive Christians. He must not follow any trade, nor mechanical employment, or be concerned in commerce. It is true, that if he has gardens, vineyards, or any small piece of ground, he may cultivate them to the best advantage, so as it does not in any manner interfere with his duty.—He is to live in peace with his brethren, the clergy, and entertain a charitable opinion of their actions. Last of all, he is obliged to reside with his people, but he is, by no means, to have more churches than one.

The minister thus ordained, is invested, or put into the actual possession of his congregation, and all its temporalities. The superintendent confers the investiture upon him in the presence of the whole church of which he is constituted and appointed pastor. In Saxony, all the clergy are exempted from the payment of taxes, and so it is in some other parts.

Their superintendants so often mentioned, are, in Sweden and Denmark, called bishops; and it is true they are invested with episcopal power, but they do not pretend to a jure divino, or divine right, in a direct line of succession from the apostles. In Denmark the king appoints the bishops, and the bishop of Copenhagen ordains the others. This ordination is performed in the church of St. Mary in Copenhagen, in presence of the bishop and several pastors. The superintendent of Zealand, who is also bishop of Copenhagen, is ordained by the bishop who resides nearest him. The bishops are chosen from amongst the rest of the clergy, and, in general, are men of fair characters.

They go twice every year to the general assembly of the clergy, which consists of the superintendants of the provinces, and the ministers of parishes, who are sent by the people for that purpose. The civil governor of the province presides at all these meetings, but he does not interfere in their debates, unless they happen to censure the government, and then he dissolves them. These bishops, or superintendants, have power invested in them to inspect into the lives of the clergy, and to examine what progress the students make in the schools. All the schools in Denmark are established by royal authority, and supported by royal munificence out of the crown lands, and this may be one of the reasons why we seldom meet with a man from that country who is not well acquainted with religion.

The church of Sweden is governed by an archbishop and ten bishops, and over every ten parishes there is an inspector, or overseer, who gives an account of the rest of the clergy to the bishop four times in the year. In Germany, and some parts of Switzerland, where the Lutheran religion is professed, there cannot be such an exact regularity with respect to clerical dominion, many of the states being so small, that they cannot support a superintendent; but still the worship and government are, as much as can be, the same; for except in some things relating to doctrines the Lutherans are much the same as they were when their great founder established them.

All their disputes are regulated and adjusted in the assemblies of the clergy; for as these Lutheran ministers are prohibited from meddling with state affairs, so the government seldom interferes with their disputes. When any new regulation takes place the civil power generally gives it a sanction; but without that sanction it cannot be reduced to practice, so as to become binding either on the clergy or laity.

The school-masters, or instructors of youth in the Lutheran churches, are young men who have passed examination at the university, and such as they call expectants, they being afterwards ordained to the ministry if chosen by the people. Such, indeed, should be the qualifications of all those who teach youth; and perhaps it is owing to the want of these qualifications, that there are so many who undertake to teach things they are utterly unacquainted with themselves.

The Lutherans have public prayers and sermons, oftener than any other Protestants in Europe. This is perhaps, one of the worst practices in their church; for as God ordered but one day in seven to be kept holy among his ancient people the Jews, so the Primitive Christians never assembled but on the first day of every week. Every thing is beautiful in the order of Providence; and whenever men depart from labour, to attend divine worship, except at such times as the sacred scriptures have appointed, they act inconsistent with the order of God, and in general do much injury to their families. Nay, it frequently happens, that those who are more than ordinarily anxious after the exterior part of religion, have seldom any sincerity, but rather bring a dishonour upon it. This first opened the mouths of deists, for it is very remarkable, that our most celebrated deists were such as contracted prejudices against the Christian religion, in consequence of the clergy preaching and praying two or three times a day like angels, when they lived the lives of devils. Of this we might produce many examples: but we shall have occasion to take notice of some, when we come to another part of this work.

It is certain, that there are still in the Lutheran church several superstitious customs, inconsistent with the purity of Primitive Christianity; for they generally delay their funerals till Sunday, in order to have a prayer and a funeral sermon, which their ministers always preach on the death of any of their hearers whether old or young, rich or poor. These sermons are, for the most part, full of flattery, than which nothing in the world can be more useless or insignificant; for whatever rest we may wish our departed friends, yet we are left till the judgment day in a state of ignorance concerning them.

We have already observed that the Lutherans have altars in their churches, for the celebration of the holy communion. They likewise make use of lighted tapers in their churches, with a crucifix upon the altar, and sometimes they have incense; but some of these things are not general, being confined to particular parts.

Some of their divines urge, that these things add a lustre and dignity to divine worship, by fixing the attention of the people; others complain, that the priests lay too great a stress on these ceremonies, by considering them as essential to religion. It is certain that many of them pay too much regard to these unnecessary, or rather absurd trifles. Nay, we need not hesitate to call them dangerous? for whenever people, during divine worship, are led to seek any or the least assistance from carnal objects, religion itself becomes to them a carnal thing, and the purity of spiritual Christianity is defaced.

Their minds, says a pious author, are led away from beholding the great God of their salvation; and we are well persuaded, that the introduction of such ceremonies into the primitive church soon after the time of the emperor Constantine the Great, made way for all the ridiculous, and heathenish rites of the papists.

The Lutherans preserve a vast number of popish ceremonies, and in the observance of some they are very particular. Thus, their bells ring to public prayers and sermon, but never to vespers or matins; for strange as it may appear, the Lutherans retain the canonical hours; and, in some places, part of their service is said in Latin.

They all use organs in their churches, not only to strike the ear the more agreeably, but also to lead the people into a sort of concert with them. But besides organs, they have in all their cathedral churches a vast number of other musical instruments, especially on their solemn festivals; but these often give offence to the more sober part of the people.

It is necessary to observe in this place that nunneries or convents for women are still kept up in several places where Lutheranism prevails. These nuns however, are not bound down by the entanglements of vows; for they may leave the convent whenever they please. In every religious house there is an abbess, and the nuns lie two and two in a bed, in very decent apartments. Each of them has a small closet, where they work, read, or pray; and they have a chapel, wherein divine service is performed on Sundays and Fridays.

Their priest wears a kind of stole, made of fine crimson velvet, and a crucifix embroidered with silver when he reads prayers at the altar, but when he goes into the pulpit he has nothing on but his surplice. These nuns dress like other women, and may marry when they please.

Happy for Britain, had the revenues of the convents at the Reformation been applied to the same valuable purposes; but, alas! there is no such thing to be found. Nor do we read of any thing of this nature, except it be those small convents that were established in Holland, when the French Calvinists first fled thither for refuge after the revocation of the edict of Nantz.

They were called religious dormitories, and consisted chiefly of ladies of prudence and discretion, under the direction of ancient matrons, refugees like themselves, but of fortunes sufficient to command respect in their retirement, and vested with the authority of abbesses, as far as the Protestant religion would admit of. They spent their time in prayer, reading the sacred scriptures, and other books of devotion in public; but in these societies there were no sermons preached, nor sacraments administered. It is generally believed, that at the Reformation, it was the design of Luther to abolish festivals and many other ceremonies, which still prevail in the religion that bears his name; but he found the stream of popular prejudice too strong for him to suppress it.

In some Lutheran countries, the people go to church on the night of the nativity of our blessed Saviour, with lighted candles or wax tapers in their hands. There they spend the whole night in singing, and saying their prayers by the light of the torches. Sometimes they burn such a large quantity of incense, that the smoke thereof ascends in the form of a whirlwind, and their devotees may be said with propriety, to have their minds wrapped up in it. In Germany it is customary during such festivals, to make entertainments for their friends and relations, and to send presents one to another, especially to the young people, whom they amuse with very idle and romantic stories, telling them, that our Saviour descends from heaven on the night of his nativity, and brings with him all sorts of play-things.

They have another whim or conceit equally ridiculous, and that is, of wrapping an infant in swaddling clothes, and laying it in a cradle, in order to represent the infancy of our blessed Lord. They likewise stroll about in all sorts of masquerade dresses, which is frequently attended with very fatal consequences; because, mistaking one another, quarrels ensue, and in the scuffle the innocent often suffer where no affront was intended.

They have a sort of vagabonds, who, during the Christmas holidays, sing hymns about the streets, and these are considered by the vulgar, as persons who have real religion at heart. In times of war, these wretches are pressed into the army; but no sooner are they gone, than the women supply their places. In Saxony, they used formerly to erect way-poles in all their churches on Ascension Day; but this practice was abolished in 1715, because it induced the people to cut down the trees in the neighbouring forests and to prevent riots, which frequently happened on these occasions.

They all celebrate the jubilee of their Reformation from popery, and on such occasions several poems are written in honour of Luther. Many of the German princes have, in vain, attempted to put an end to their vast number of holy days; but the popular prejudices, as in all other cases, so in this prevented them from succeeding according to their wishes.

We have already treated slightly on the Lutheran form of worship, we shall now proceed to consider it more minutely and particularly.

In 1523, Luther drew up a sort of liturgy, which in many things, differed not much from the mass of the Roman church. In that formulary he called the communion of bread and wine, a ceremony instituted by Christ which all Christians should deem sacred; but treated with contempt the canon of the mass. And yet in this liturgy there were so many things like popery, that it was not an easy matter to separate the ideas. He allowed the Nicene Creed, which has given offence to many Protestants, to be read in the church; nor does it appear that he made any objection to the creed of St. Athanasius. He ordered that no water should be mixed with the wine in the sacrament; this was certainly right, because water was never used but in the warmer climates, where the strength of the wine led to intoxication. As for private confession before the communion, he said it was useful but not necessary.

He ordered that hymns should be sung after divine service was ended, some of which were to be in Latin, and others in the vulgar tongue; but that the rest of the service should be read in a language known to the congregation. In all this we may see, that at that time, Luther had but dark notions of the purity of Christianity. He was no stranger to the corruptions that had crept into popery; but either in consequence of his own prejudices, or of those of the people, he would not, or could not entirely heal them. However, some churches where the Lutheran religion is professed, have one ritual, and some another. Some are more clogged with ceremonies than others, and some more rational.

This will appear the more consistent with truth, when we consider, that in Sweden the liturgy differs from that in Germany, or in Denmark. At Nuremberg in Germany, there is but little difference in the outward form of divine worship between the Roman Catholics and the Lutherans; only that the latter renounce the pope's supremacy. This was one of the healing measures proposed by Melancthon, but that reformer was a time serving man. He loved indolence more than reformation, and being destitute of activity, he had no courage to support Luther, whose views were great, and whose spirit was undaunted.

Melancthon has been much cried up by Protestants in general, as a divine of great moderation, and as one who did not desire to carry things to extremity in the first instance. However, we are not to judge of the motives from which he acted, but of his conduct, as it appears on public record. There are many sentiments in his works that seem to breathe a spirit of peace; but if men are once convinced that the purity of the Christian religion has been contaminated, and errors established in it as truth, then it is necessary that every true believer should testify against them. To be timid in such matters, is to give up all attachment to the truth, it is to betray the cause we have embarked in, and to wound our consciences; but we shall afterwards give our readers a more enlarged account of these things, when we treat of the Reformation in other nations in Europe.

Much has been said concerning the notions which the Lutherans entertain with regard to the sacrament of the eucharist; but as all these are confused and contradictory, we shall here endeavour to lay the whole truth before the reader, as taken from one of their most eminent writers, viz. Melancthon. He says, "Our very children are not ignorant, that at the holy communion, we receive beyond all contradiction the body and blood of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and although that mystery is so far above our common or human capacities that we can never comprehend it, yet we firmly believe and rely on the veracity of those words of our Saviour, 'Take, eat, this is my body, &c.'—He who with a few words was able to satisfy the hunger of several thousands of people, and could walk on the sea,—could, at the celebration of his own supper, perform and bring to pass what was implied in these words he had expressed." It is very probable, that the most bigotted Roman Catholic would subscribe to this opinion, and yet they are inveterate enemies to the Lutherans.

Those who are of the Lutheran opinion in Germany, are obliged to come to the minister of the parish, either on Wednesday or Friday previous to the communion, and this is done on purpose that they may open their minds without reserve. This is called confession, but it is by no means conducted on such superstitious principles as among the Roman Catholics. It is true, that common practice and long usage give a sanction to many things, which although no way important in themselves, nor any way essential to religion, yet are considered as sacred by those who have not had it in their power to make a proper enquiry. We have a striking instance of this in Patkull, a gentleman of universal knowledge who had been brought up a Lutheran, but was, without changing his religion, many years ambassador from the Czar, Peter the Great, to the elector of Saxony, then king of Poland.—That great man had been, contrary to the law of nations, seized on by a party of Swedish dragoons, and chained to a stake in the camp of Charles XII. near Pirna, upwards of six months. In vain did he plead his privilege as an ambassador; in vain did he assert, that he had never done any thing against the honour of his native country, Livonia, which at that time belonged to Sweden. The misfeeling Charles ordered him to be broke alive upon the wheel, one of the most horrid and barbarous deaths that malice could invent. The day before he was to suffer, the chaplain of a Swedish regiment came to him by order of the king, and after a few formal expressions, said, "I am come to you with such a message as the prophet brought to good king Hezekiah of old, Set thine house in order for thou shalt die and not live."

The poor distracted prisoner begged to know in what manner he was to be put to death, but this was a question the clergyman could not answer; for as we have already observed, the Lutheran ministers are not to meddle with politics. Patkull told him, that he could not die in peace without confessing his sins, and the clergyman desired him to prepare himself for it against the next morning.—He did so, and when he had confessed his sins, he told the minister that he was ready to die. If a gentleman, who had obtained a liberal education, who was acquainted with all the sciences, and who had made a distinguishing figure as a minister of state, thought this formulary necessary in order to promote his eternal happiness, how then can we blame those poor creatures, whose minds were never enlightened with human knowledge. Patkull suffered death after five hours torture, and the learned Keyssler, the German traveller, takes notice, that from that period Charles's affairs first went into confusion and at last ended in ruin; but this we only mention by way of digression.

On the Sunday, when the communion is to be administered, the minister immediately after sermon prays to Almighty God for all in particular who are to partake of that holy ordinance. There is no form of prayer, however, for that purpose; but the minister is at liberty to make use of such words as he thinks proper for the occasion. After prayer, they sing a hymn, and while it is singing, those who are to communicate, advance towards the altar, and fall down on their knees, at least as many as can approach it at once, for the rest stand behind in a praying posture. As soon as the hymn is over, the minister says, let us pray, and repeats at the same time, the Lord's prayer, and after that he reads the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper.—In some places the whole congregation sing with an audible voice, both the prayer and the words of the institution. After that they receive the communion, much in the same manner as in the church of England, namely, kneeling before the rails of the altar.

In some parts of Saxony, the minister rings a little bell two or three times after a very solemn manner, which custom is both needless and impertinent, especially among people who are Protestants, and who pay no regard to the adoration of the host.—Indeed, they look upon every thing of that nature as idolatry; and yet we may find, that men may in words despise idolatry, while they are actually idolaters in practice. In most of the Lutheran churches, the pastor, before he administers the sacrament, puts on his surplice, and over that a vestment with several crosses fastened to it, which, however, ought not to be compared with the stole worn by the Roman Catholic priests, there being no resemblance between them.

In some places, the pastor, after he has read the gospel at the altar, throws the vestment before-mentioned over his head and lays it on the table.—After the creed is sung, he goes into the pulpit and preaches in his surplice, and then he returns to the altar, where he again puts on his vestments. However, many of them never put it on till the communion begins, and that is amongst them reckoned the most decent practice.

Some of their devotees, as among the Roman Catholics, consider the bestowing of habits on the priests as a very meritorious action; and in several of their churches they have eight or ten different sets: So profuse is superstition in bestowing what can be of no service to mankind, and so vain is human pride in placing some sort of confidence in what consists, merely, of empty shew. Mechanical religion is the worst that ever could take place in the world, and notwithstanding the bold assertions of Mr. Hulse, we may venture to affirm, that those who give encouragement to it, are no friends to Christianity.

We have already observed, that in many places they keep wax candles burning on their altars during the time of celebrating the communion. But can any thing in the world be more idle than to burn candles at noon day. But the whole force of this part of our argument is taken away by allegories; for they tell us, as Christ instituted the holy supper at night, so we should always receive it with candles burning.

They might just as well assert, that as the primitive Christians were obliged to meet in the night, on account of the violence of persecution, so all our meetings, even in a land of liberty, should be nocturnal assemblies. This is undoubtedly one of the most idle arguments that ever was advanced; but when men embrace only one half of the truth, it is not strange to see them again returning to error.

However, when the communicant has received the sacred elements, he falls down on his knees to return thanks to God for the spiritual nourishment, and in some places the communicants congratulate each other on that joyful occasion. As for the number of times for the communicants to partake of this sacred institution, they are not fixed but voluntary; some partake of it every Sunday, but these are only what are called devotees.

No minister can receive the communion from his own hands, that being absolutely forbidden by Luther's doctrine.

is administered, there is always a preparation sermon, and this custom has obtained in several other reformed churches; on that occasion, all those who are to communicate are obliged to be present, and those who neglect it without shewing a reasonable cause, are liable to the censures of the church.—Although in general they receive the communion kneeling, yet in some places they take it standing; but for this there is no fixed rule, which often creates a great deal of confusion in their public assemblies.

The Lutherans make use of red or white wine, just as opportunity serves, in the celebration of their communion. They never administer the sacrament to infants, but it is common enough for them to carry it to such as are sick, or on a death bed, at the same time observing a great many ceremonies. And here it is necessary to observe, that such communion carried to the sick and dying persons, bears a near affinity to the viaticum of the Roman church, except in the act of adoration. Nay, this communion of theirs may be called by the same name as the Romans; for the Lutheran priest says to the communicants, that it is a suitable provision for them in their journey to the other world. The term which the Lutherans make use of for viaticum, is expressive of the very same idea, and brings to our remembrance the ancient customary fee, paid to Charon by the heathens; for it was from the heathens the papists borrowed it, and the Lutherans have, in a great measure, retained it.

Whether the term viaticum was looked upon as too superstitious by the Lutherans, as being popish, we cannot determine; but this much is certain, that they have left it out of their ritual, and now they call it the communion of the sick.

As for the ceremonial part, it has been reduced to the following ceremonies.

1st, to the confession of the communicant, which is preceded by a prayer, and followed with an absolution pronounced by the confessor in the name of the ever blessed Trinity.

Secondly, the communion administered to the sick person, preceded also by a prayer, and accompanied with singing a psalm of praise and hope, most commonly the 23d, or 103d, according to the version made use of by the Lutherans, and several other Protestants, and a collect or prayer suitable to the solemn occasion.

Thirdly, the benediction which is delivered in the most solemn manner, recommending the departing soul to the arms of the Lord Jesus, to enjoy everlasting happiness in heaven.

In those parts where the Lutherans are the most superstitious, the priest when he comes into the chamber of the sick person, takes a table, which he places in the form of an altar, by covering it with Tapestry, a fine crimson cloth, and setting two lighted candles upon it. Between the candles he places a crucifix, and such other things as are objects of superstition among them. It should be administered in presence of some of the relations of the sick person, but when there are no relations, then the neighbours are to be invited in. Every person present is permitted to partake with the sick man or woman; and for that purpose they must have notice sent them before, that they may be duly prepared. The Lutherans do not only carry their communion to the sick, but also to such as are aged and infirm, so as to be incapable of attending public worship. To these persons the minister, who gives the communion to them, makes a serious exhortation, which may, with propriety, be called a domestic sermon, after a family communion.

We shall now proceed to consider their manner of confession, which is looked upon as highly necessary wherever the Lutheran religion is established. And here it is proper to add, that it contributes much towards aggrandizing the power of the clergy. If on the one hand, it relieves the agonizing pains of the soul, and gives a sincere comfort and consolation to a wounded conscience, it creates on the other hand, an awe, veneration and respect for their pastors, who, by such acts of confession, become the spiritual directors and physicians of their people.

They administer their cures in the name of the Lord, but in the same name denounce curses on those who will not take what they prescribe. However, let the veneration, respect and authority of the Lutheran preachers or confessors be ever so great, yet it falls vastly short of what the Romish priests procure for themselves. The following was delivered to the author by an eminent Lutheran minister lately deceased.

“Before the communion, the person who is to receive, confesses his sins to the minister, who, agreeably to the sacred scriptures, pronounces the full remission of sins to all such as truly repent.—This confession is not particular like that of the Roman Catholics; for the minister does not pry into secret affairs.

It is sufficient for the penitent or intended communicant, to declare in general that he has sinned, and what man would deny that? This is a thing implied in religion; for what purpose would it be necessary for men to attend to sacred duties, to ask pardon of God, to beg for his assistance, and praise him for his many mercies, if they were not sinners; that is, if they had not transgressed against the divine law. However, the practice of confession among the Lutherans is not always the same, it varies in different places according as prejudices may happen to aggrandize it, or the freedom of enquiry sink it almost beneath the lowest sort of contempt.

In some places the whole body of people go together to their pastor, in order to confess their sins, and one of them reads a general confession, after which the confessor asks if their sentiments are all one and the same. After the answer is given in the affirmative, the minister makes a formal exhortation, longer or shorter, as he thinks proper; and that, together with the absolution, concludes the ceremony. This is the general custom in most populous towns, where it would be, in a manner, impossible to attend to every private individual.—In some places, the minister proposes the three following questions to those who are to confess their sins:—

First, he asks them whether they repent sincerely of those sins of which their consciences accuse them? Secondly, if they sincerely believe and profess that the body and blood of the Lord Jesus Christ are really and actually present in the elements of bread and wine? And, thirdly, if they promise to persevere in the Lutheran faith to their lives' end? This last question implies a principle inconsistent with toleration, and consequently with Christianity, and it is well known, that the Lutherans are generally very stiff in that particular; not with regard to the Roman Catholics only, likewise to the Calvinists who have often made them the most generous professions of brotherly love.

At Nuremberg, and in some other places, imposition of hands is practised when absolution is given, and this is of considerable antiquity: for it seems to have taken its rise about the middle of the fifth century, when the Christian religion was beginning to give up its reality for an empty vain shadow. The form and manner of doing it is this:—

The minister, whom we may call the confessor, lays his hands three times on the head of the penitent, repeating, in a solemn manner at each exhortation, the name of one of the three persons in the blessed Trinity. After which he says to the penitent, “Go in peace, and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.”—Making at the same time, the sign of the cross.

As to their modes of confession, they either stand, sit, or kneel, just as they please, so that we find they are far from being so superstitious as the papists. And yet almost all the Lutheran ministers take money from their people when they come to confess their sins. Having been accused of this as a simoniacal practice, they have endeavoured to extenuate the enormity of the crime, by telling their accusers, that it is a part of their revenue. A popish priest, who takes goods as well as money, could have said no more. Whenever money is taken for a spiritual gift, the gift itself ceases to be spiritual, and many who call themselves ministers, make it appear to the world that the desire of gratifying their passions, tramples over all regard they can have for religion. As they have a vast number of fasts and festivals, so their superintendants exercise a high authority on those occasions; for they are sure to order the clergy to preach on whatever topics they think proper, and to prescribe rules for their conduct during every part of the solemnity. During their fasts, the shops are shut up, all manner of exercise ceases but devotion; though on their festivals, and even on Sundays, they will play at cards in the afternoon.

We shall, in the next place, proceed to their form of excommunication. In Denmark and Sweden, it is accompanied with very severe penance. In the Danish ritual, we are informed, that the person excommunicated, when he first appears in the church, is turned out with disgrace by the clerk of the parish, in the presence of the whole congregation. However, if the excommunication be of long continuance, he is not excluded from the privilege of attending public worship and joining in the congregation during sermons, and other acts of public devotion; but he is obliged to sit in a place appointed, and some distance from them; and when the minister comes down from the pulpit, the clerk before-mentioned conducts the excommunicated person out of the church. This has a near resemblance to some of the practices of the Primitive Christians when their church was on the decline.

As to the Swedes, their form of excommunication is equally rigid and severe. We are assured by a traveller, who visited that country, that he saw at Lincoping, a young woman who had been guilty of some rash misdemeanor, and who, by consequence thereof, had rendered herself obnoxious to the church, exposed to public view upon her knees, from break of day till noon, in the church porch, upon an eminence, like a criminal's bar, erected for that particular purpose.

It is probable however, that might have been a civil punishment and not an ecclesiastical censure. Such young women as are not ashamed of exposing themselves by drinking to excess, or the commission of any other odious and abominable vice, are punished in the same manner at the Hague.—There is not therefore, a possibility of forming a proper notion of this sort of Swedish punishment, because we know not whether it is of a civil or religious nature.

It is true, their discipline is severe, but no ecclesiastical censures are to be inflicted through the coercion of the civil power. This is much to their honour, and we are sorry to say that there is one Protestant church in the world where this practice prevails. In a word, the Lutherans admit of the lesser excommunication; but as to any civil pains and penalties being inflicted on the delinquents, they are never thought of. Probably, the civil power, in arbitrary countries, may sometimes deviate from what is here laid down; but still there is nothing in the ecclesiastical constitution of their churches that can give any authority for such a practice. Excommunication is the casting a person out from among the faithful, but except in the church of Rome, and in one single Protestant church, the punishment ceases with the declaration of the minister, which, according to the spirit of Christianity, should always be of a spiritual nature.

Luther has given us a formulary baptism in the vulgar tongue, in order that every person present might understand it, and in this we find many of the ceremonies used by the Roman Catholics left out, particularly that of breathing upon the infant, which however was, from a mistaken notion, practised in ancient times. Exorcism, or commanding the devil to go out of the child, is still observed, and the sign of the cross is retained.

As the Lutherans retain a large share of popish superstition, so they make it a rule to baptize their children as soon as possible after they are born. In case the child should be too weak to be carried to the church, they baptize him at home, and on such occasions one or more godfathers must attend.—When they imagine the infant to be in danger, then the midwife baptizes him, just as they do among the Roman Catholics.

If a child is found exposed in the streets, and a note is left along with it, intimating that it had been baptized, no regard is paid to that intimation, so that it is carried to the church and baptized in public. They never baptize idiots when they arrive at years of maturity till they have regained the use of their reason. All legitimate children are baptized before divine service begins, but bastards after it is over.

There are baptismal fonts in some of the Lutheran churches, but not in all of them. In several of the Saxon churches, the figure of an angel with a basin in his hand, descends from the ceiling by a private pulley, or some other secret machine, and presents the basin to the minister, who is to baptize the child. In some other places, a table is brought out of the vestry, and placed before the altar with the basin upon it, but this custom prevails more at Augsburg than any where else.

After the preliminary questions which are always common at baptism, the minister makes a discourse by way of exhortation, and then he exorcises the devil in the following words, "Get thee hence thou unclean spirit, and make room for the Holy Ghost?"

The minister at the same time makes the sign of the cross upon the infant, saying unto him, "Receive the sign of the cross, and be a faithful soldier of Jesus Christ, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." He then baptizes the child by dipping him three times in the water, in the name of the blessed Trinity, and the whole ceremony concludes with an exhortation and a blessing. And here we must not omit to take notice that the Lutheran ministers exact fees from those who have their children baptized; but we shall have occasion to mention this practice as taking place in some other reformed countries in Europe, and indeed, in many of them.

The next thing to be taken notice of, is their form of confirmation, which has no affinity to that of the Romish church; for they make no use of oil, and any common pastor of a congregation may perform the ceremony. The young person who comes to be confirmed, must give a satisfactory answer to all questions proposed to him by the minister, which practice is very much like that of the primitive church. When they have answered all the questions proposed to them, the minister delivers a suitable exhortation, and the congregation sing an hymn, and then the ceremony concludes with a prayer and the benediction.

The Lutheran discipline with respect to matrimony, is regular and uniform. In order to the consummation of marriage where there is no lawful impediment, the parties present themselves at church before their pastor, who asks them whether they are mutually agreed to enter into that state; and thereupon they join their right hands, and make an exchange of their respective rings. Then the pastor says, "A. & B. being desirous to enter into the holy state of matrimony, before all this congregation here present, I do hereby declare them husband and wife, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, one God, Amen." After that he repeats, without a book, several texts of scripture, that enforce the duties of husbands and wives; and the whole ceremony concludes with a prayer for their prosperity in time, and their happiness in eternity. It is proper to observe, that the Lutherans never marry any of their people on fast days, and few but the lower sort of people go to the church to have the ceremony performed; for those in genteel life, are generally married at their own houses in the evening; the ceremony however, is the same, consisting of prayers and exhortations.

In some parts of Germany where the people are married publicly, the streets are strewed with flowers, and there is a great deal of other unnecessary parade, not worthy of being mentioned. In the morning of the wedding day, which is very frequently on a Sunday, the bridegroom goes out of his own house to visit his mistress, but before he goes out, the door and windows of his house are adorned with flowers, to give intimation to the people that he is to be married.

At his first setting out a young girl throws some of the flowers into his face, after which he gets into a chaise, or cart, according as his circumstances will permit, the horses being grandly adorned.— When he meets his mistress at her own apartments, he quits his carriage, and both she and he go in another to the church, the streets being strewed with flowers; and as soon as they arrive at the church, the nuptial knot is tied, by which they are bound together for life.

We come at last to their funeral ceremonies, or at least to that last stage which puts an end to human existence.

The dying Lutheran has no extreme unction administered to him, no outward application of relics, he receives no comfort or consolation from a crucifix being put into his hand. He is buoyed up with no hopes from the virtues arising from a monk's habit, and he expects no happiness after death, in consequence of a number of masses having been said for him. His whole dependence is on the merits of Christ Jesus, and he receives spiritual consolation in consequence of the admonitions and exhortations he receives from his pastor. But notwithstanding they are very superstitious; nor is it an easy matter to divest the mind of superstition, without running it into deism.

On the day appointed for the interment of the corpse, the relations and friends of the deceased meet together at the house where he died, and the minister of the congregation resorts thither at the same time, attended by a train of young scholars, who, no doubt, come to learn the nature of the ceremony; for mechanical religion is not easily attained to. These youths sing two or three hymns before the door where the deceased lays, after which they march in the front of the procession, having either a cross or a large crucifix carried before them. An inferior clerk, or some young scholar appointed for that purpose, marches close by the side of the corpse with a small cross, which is afterwards fixed in that part of the church, or church-yard where the body was interred. The relations and friends of the deceased follow the corpse, the men first, and the women after them. During the procession, their bells are, for the most part, tolled out of respect and complaisance to the deceased, and several hymns sung as they march along. It is customary likewise to open the coffin at the grave, and take farewell of the deceased, singing at the same time, several hymns suitable to the occasion.

When they nail up the coffin for the last time, the minister reads a prayer, and pronounces a benediction or blessing. If a funeral sermon is to be preached, then the corpse is carried into the church and the discourse generally consists of a great deal of flattery, because the minister is paid for it. As in all other things, so in their funeral ceremonies, the Lutherans differ much from each other; but this indeed, is not much to be wondered at, when we consider how much we differ in the small island of Britain.

In some parts of this island, a woman must not attend a funeral; in many other parts, her presence is considered as necessary. What then shall we say to those differences which take place among the Lutherans? The answer is plain and easy, they depend upon locality and ancient custom, without any connection with religion.

It is necessary to observe in this place, that although Lutheranism is professed in many countries on the continent of Europe, yet sometimes it happens that the prince is of one persuasion and his people of another. Thus, the elector of Saxony is a papist, yet all his subjects are Lutherans. The king of Prussia and his court are Calvinists, and yet almost all his subjects are Lutherans. That illustrious monarch has drawn up the following confession of his faith, which will ever do him great honour. It was written at a time when he was in very precarious circumstances; but the whole may serve to shew the clearness of his head, and the goodness of his heart.

It was presented to the diet of the German empire at Ratisbon, 1744, and the substance of it is as follows:—

1. I do not believe in the ordinances of the pope, nor even in the writings of Luther, Beza, or Calvin; but I believe in the adorable Trinity, and I make his holy word the foundation of my faith, nor shall I ever believe any thing that clashes with it, even though an angel from heaven should reveal it.

2. I believe also that I shall be saved, together with all true Christians, by the blood of Christ, his suffering, and dying for us.

3. As I profess there is no salvation in any other name, I would not be stiled a Lutheran, a Calvinist, nor a Papist—but a Christian.

4. With regard to eternal election or predestination, this is my private opinion, that the merciful God hath called all men to salvation; and it is not for want of being called if they are not saved, but through their own wickedness and obstinacy in opposing divine grace, and by reason of their corrupt hearts, and their sins, that they are condemned through the just judgment of God.

5. As to good works, it is my opinion, that there must necessarily be good works where there is a true faith; for faith and good works can no more be separated, than light from fire: nevertheless it is an error to believe, that man can merit heaven by good works, or that he can be saved but by true faith. How then can the merit of good works save us.

6. With regard to baptism and the Lord's supper, it is my opinion, that I have been washed from sin in baptism; not by the water, but by the blood of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and have been by it received into the eternal covenant of grace with God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost: so I am nourished in the holy supper at the table of the grace of Jesus Christ; and, in virtue of this sacrament, am rendered partaker of all the benefits which my Saviour hath purchased by his wounds and death, and am become an inheritor of life everlasting; whence I believe, that those who believe in God, and seeketh his salvation in the blood of Jesus Christ, and leadeth a true Christian life, may die the death of the righteous, and shall be saved.

7. I leave to every one liberty of faith and conscience; protesting, before the face of God, that I am determined to live and die in this plain confession of faith: nevertheless, I leave to all good people to judge, whether I am cold, hot, or luke-warm.—I am far from believing, that the service of Catholic priests promote the salvation of souls; have learned by the experience which I have had, that all their actions are not to the honour of God, and the salvation of men, but solely to their own honour, and to be respected among men.

8. It is with reason that I scruple to be called a papist, a Lutheran, or a Calvinist, because, according to the custom and opinion of the world, it is not sufficient to take the name of a Christian, but we must be engaged to some particular church, and make profession of its faith; and as the pure reformed religion best agrees with my religion, I think it not improper to call myself a reformed; although I see no cause to say, there is the least difference between my confession of faith and the pure Lutheran religion; I would not, however, be called a Calvinist; but am, and shall always be, a reformed Christian:—that is to say, one that is disengaged from all error in the doctrine of faith, and who believes all that I have before mentioned; but a Calvinist is one who makes the doctrine of Calvin the rule of faith.

9. As Calvin was a man he might be mistaken, since no man is perfect: but I regard Calvin, Luther, and others, as chosen instruments of God, drawn by virtue of the Holy Ghost from the darkness of popery, and that they shewed the true way to life; but as they were fallible, I do not call them rabbies. I profess not to believe any doctrine that is not agreeable to the word of God, believing that

It is my duty, as St. Paul advises, to try all things, and hold fast that which is good.

It has been commonly reported that the king of Prussia was a deist; this has been believed by many, and yet let us only consider these different articles as they are here before us. Every Christian who is a Protestant, would subscribe to them if presented to him. It will be asked, that as there remains not the least doubt of their having been dictated by this illustrious hero, from what motives did they flow? To this we would answer, that in all cases where there does not remain the shadow of a doubt, we are to consider the conduct of our fellow creatures in the fairest point of view. We have no evidence that the Prussian hero ever denied the truth of divine revelation; for as to the many scandalous writings that have been imputed to him, there is little doubt but that they were written by some profane wits, who never either saw his majesty or knew his sentiments.

The famous book, entitled Eikon Basilican, ran through eight editions of two thousand each, in the compass of two years, merely because it was reputed and asserted to be the work of Charles I. and yet we have undeniable proofs that it was not written by that prince. Some years ago, a bookseller, a man of ingenuity, drew up a small piece, which has had an amazing run, because it was whispered that it had been written by a noble lord lately deceased. Thus we may frequently find Frenchmen of learning and ingenuity, writing and publishing things under the names of princes, and ministers of state, which although lively and entertaining, contain but little of the truth.

It has been just the same with the king of Prussia. Voltaire, and D'Argens, brought a great number of refugees to his court, and these men being of too abandoned characters to expect encouragement from a virtuous monarch, retired to Holland and published some gay trifles under his name; or at least, they insinuated that they had been written by him. The states general ordered them to be burnt by the common hangman; and surely, had the king been author of them, he would not have suffered this act of indignity to go unpunished; for it is well known that he has, by being in possession of East Friesland, a power at any time, to invade their territories.

In this manner the first characters may be traced, and men may be represented as the authors of sentiments which they hold in abhorrence. It is acknowledged by all, that the Prussian monarch wrote memoirs of the house of Bradenburgh; and what man will say that there is any thing derogatory to the truth and honour of the Christian religion? He maintains a Lutheran minister in every one of his regiments, who is not suffered to remain at home but must go to camp with the troops. This does not look like a prince upon whom religion sits so very light, as has been represented by some persons of the present age.

But who were those persons who first represented his Prussian majesty as a deist? We answer, the same profligates who published systems of debauchery, and then gave it out that they were written by him. Men who had enjoyed some favours from him, but because they could not get into the plenitude of power, to gratify their ambition and support their unbounded extravagancies, stabbed his character in the most tender part, by foisting their spurious predictions upon him.

We have dwelt the longer on this circumstance, for the honour of our own country, because, notwithstanding we have many deists amongst us, yet not one of them was ever guilty of such mean beggarly actions. They were Frenchmen who wrote the books alluded to, and as insincerity and false politeness are the characteristics of that nation, they are extremely welcome to all the honour that arises from a conduct so mean and base. We do not desire to import French vices, we may perhaps have enough, and too many of our own; but the dignity of our country, the honour of our nature, the sincerity of our dispositions, and above all, the regard we as well as our ancestors have for the truth, leads us to treat with contempt, every thing inconsistent with the duty we owe to those, who, for their illustrious actions, will shine bright in the annals of Europe. But to go on with our subject.

Thus we have given an account in the most impartial manner, of the first Protestant church in Europe with respect to time, and shall conclude with a few remarks.

First, although the Lutheran church has yet too many popish ceremonies in it, yet, when we consider every thing, it is surprising they have not more. Luther had the power of the house of Austria to oppose, as well as the cunning and malice of the court of Rome. Most of the German princes, who supported him, had nothing more in view than to get themselves delivered from the galling yoke of popish slavery, and to keep that money themselves, which had been annually sent to the Romish treasury. Such men as these did not seek for simplicity in worship, rites and ceremonies were more agreeable to them, because they captivated the senses. Nor was it less difficult to engage the prejudices of the common people, who were grossly ignorant, and long accustomed to popish ceremonies. It was wise in Luther to begin with removing a few of the misuses, reserving the others for some more favourable period, when the minds of the people would be better prepared to comply with innovations, and more ready to part with their favourite ceremonies.

Secondly, although the Lutherans retain a great many absurd ceremonies, yet in many things they are better reformed than some other Protestant churches. Thus they have no plurality of livings, and the clergy are obliged to reside with their people, so that they are all personally known to them. They are so zealous in the discharge of their duty, that the people almost adore them. Wherever they are met, either in the streets or in the fields, all hats are off to them; and from the regularity and simplicity of their lives, their ministry has a vast effect on their morals. It is the pious lives of ministers that must make religious exercises have a due and proper effect.

Lastly, as to the time when this religion is to be further reformed, it is not for us to enquire; we are satisfied that the means of salvation are to be found in it, and where these are properly improved, the end must be left to divine wisdom.

RITES AND CEREMONIES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, &c.

HENRY VIII. ascended the throne of England 1509, and married the widow of his brother Arthur, a circumstance that produced the most serious effects. Henry had been taught the jargon of school divinity, with a view as is thought of making him archbishop of Canterbury; but his brother's death changed that design. When Luther opposed the pope, a book was published in Henry's name against the opinions of that illustrious reformer, and although it was generally believed that Dr. Jno. Fisher, bishop of Rochester was the author, yet the king, in consequence thereof had the title of defender of the faith conferred on him.

It has been proved by lord Hebert, and several other writers of credit, that Henry had resolved to sue for divorce from his queen sometime before he saw Anne Boleyn. He had a large ingredient of superstition in his character, and he imputed the death of his two sons to the divine vengeance for having married his brother's widow; and he was extremely desirous of male issue, to prevent all disputes about the succession. He was startled at a doubt suggested of the legitimacy of the birth of his daughter Mary; and being a prince of violent passions, longed to be united to a lady of more endearing qualities than his present queen, who had not many personal attractions. His scruples, which are ascribed to the writings of Thomas Aquinas, were encouraged by his favourite Wolsey, who hated Catherine on account of her disapproving of his licentious manner of living, and was equally incensed against her nephew the emperor, for having twice baffled him in the design he had formed of obtaining the papal chair.

As the king passionately desired to obtain Cath-rine's consent to a separation, he sent several bishops to her, together with as many noblemen, to persuade her to drop her appeal, but all in vain; and when they endeavoured to persuade her to submit her cause to the decision of four ecclesiastics, she said, she would pray to God to send the king happiness, that she was his lawful wife, and would abide by her right, until the court of Rome should declare the contrary.

By this time Henry, having thrown off all obedience to the pope, and got himself declared head of the church. The bishops and dignified abbots had granted the king a large sum of money, which induced them to attempt to make the inferior clergy pay a part of it. Stokesly, bishop of London, sent for some of the priests of that metropolis to meet him in the chapter-house, to propose an assessment, hoping, if he could obtain the consent of a few at first, the rest would follow their example.— But all the London priests being apprized of this intention, went thither in a tumultuous manner, accompanied by a great number of their people, who all declared they would not pay any thing. They had already burst open the door, and a sharp conflict ensued between them and the bishop's servants; but his lordship dismissed the rioters with his blessing, assuring them, that they should never be called in question for disturbance.

But notwithstanding this promise, he complained to the chancellor, by whose order, fifteen priests and five laymen were committed to prison. The king alarmed at this tumult, resolved to convince his people, that though he had shaken off the papal yoke, his intentions were not to violate the rights of the established church, and therefore ordered the laws against heretics to be rigorously executed, an order which was attended with the death of two priests and a lawyer, who were all three burnt in Smithfield.

The lawyer was James Bamham, a gentleman of the middle temple, who having on a former occasion been taken up, was put in prison in Sir Thomas More's house, and whipped at a tree in his garden, called, "the tree of truth." This was done because he would not discover where he had concealed his books, nor accuse his fellow students in the temple. He was sent to the tower, and there so racked that he became lame. He abjured and had his liberty, but was so disconsolate, that he professed his repentance in a congregation, held in a private house in Bow-lane. On the succeeding Sunday, he went to St. Austin's church with the New Testament in English in his hand, and the obedience of a Christian man in his bosom. Here he was taken up, and after three hearings condemned and executed. Such executions were common enough in this reign, and yet even at that time Henry was supporting the Lutherans in Germany against the pope and emperor,—a conduct becoming a profound politician.

In January 1553, Henry assembled the parliament to consider the internal state of the kingdom, when the commons, having been previously instructed by the court, presented an address, beseeching his majesty to consent to the reformation of sundry abuses which had crept into the immunities enjoyed by the clergy. The king answered, that before he could assent to a proposal of such importance, he would hear what the clergy had to say in their own defence. This step was taken to shew them, that as they were odious to the parliament, how much they stood in need of his royal protection.

This year the king was privately married to Anne Boleyn, whom he had created marchioness of Pembroke, and the English nation were much pleased with the match, because the queen favoured the Reformation. But the great object the king had in view, was to procure the divorce with Catharine; for whatever steps had been hitherto taken for that purpose, the affair lay undecided. Dr. Crammer was a person in whom the king had great confidence, and being in Germany, when Wareham, archbishop of Canterbury died, he was sent for to discharge the duties of that important office.

April the 5th, the convocation met, and declared the pope had no right to grant dispensations contrary to law, and therefore the marriage with Catharine was void. Accordingly Crammer repaired to Dunstable, where Catharine had been summoned to make her appearance near Haughton-Park, the place of her residence; she rejected the citation, upon which Crammer pronounced sentence declaring her marriage null, as being contrary to the law of God, and by another sentence he confirmed the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was crowned on the first of June, to the no small joy of the people.

This part of Henry's conduct so incensed the pope against him and Crammer, that he threatened, if all these proceedings were not immediately annulled, he would proceed to the sentence of excommunication. At this time the duke of Orleans, next heir to the crown of France, was to be married to the princess Mary of Medicis, and the ceremony was to be graced with the pope's presence, who was to meet the parties at Marseilles. Francis I. king of France, wrote to Henry, desiring him to send an ambassador, to treat with the pope, and although Henry saw that he had proceeded too far to retreat, yet he sent the duke of Norfolk as ambassador, to accompany Francis, to meet the pontiff at Marseilles.

Along with the duke went Stephen Gardener, bishop of Winchester, Sir John Wallop, and Sir Francis Bryan, accompanied by Edmund Bonner, a clergyman of great impudence and resolution. After the ceremonies of the nuptials were over, Francis desired the pope to satisfy the king of England, but his holiness, in order to save the honour of the holy see, insisted on judging the cause in a consistory of cardinals. Bonner, who was ignorant of this resolution, demanded an audience of the pontiff, and told him that Henry had appealed to a future general council, for any papal sentence that either was or should be given against him. The pope said he would take the advice of the cardinals, and in a few days after told him, that the appeal could not be received. But Bonner, without being intimidated by this answer, proceeded to ratify archbishop Crammer's appeal from the revocation of the sentence he had pronounced. The pope was so exasperated at Bonner's presumption, that he threatened to have him thrown into a chaldron of melted lead. Francis was equally offended at Bonner's insolence and indiscretion and he promised to assist the pope in taking vengeance on him for such an outrage; but nevertheless he suffered him to make his escape. This was the same Bonner who became such a cruel persecutor in the reign of queen Mary.

January 15, 1554, the parliament met, and repealed the statute against heretics passed in the reign of Henry IV. The king and parliament did not, however, intend to exempt those accused of heresy from the flames; for by the new law the delinquents were still liable to suffer the same punishment as before. But in order to hinder the clergy from being sole judges in such cases, it was enacted that heretics should be tried according to the laws of the kingdom, without any regard to the canon law, by another act it was decreed, that no synod, or convocation of the clergy, should be held without the royal licence, that the king should appoint thirty-two persons from the parliament and clergy to examine the canons and constitutions of the church; that those who were necessary should be retained, and all the rest abolished.

This parliament confirmed the statute of amates, prohibiting the pope from receiving for the future any money out of England; they also enacted, that for the future, the pope should have no share in the election or confirmation of bishops; but that in cases of vacancy, the king should send his licence to the dean and chapter, to elect a new bishop; and if the election should not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, then the power of electing should devolve on the king. In the external government of the church, these things had some appearance of a progress towards a reformation; but although the king had abolished the papal power, yet he did not intend to part with the ceremonies.

In the mean time, the pope was not without his emissaries in England, many of whom did all they could to raise tumults throughout the nation.

Elizabeth Barton, commonly known by the name of the Maid of Kent, had been taught by doctor Bocking, a canon of Christ-church, in Canterbury, and Richard Master, the priest of the parish of Addington, where she resided. This woman was subject to fits, and often uttered very incoherent expressions, which the two impostors resolved to improve on. They told her she was inspired by the Holy Ghost, and taught her what to say when she fell down in pretended, instead of real fits. Vast crowds of people followed her, and to them she told that the king would be destroyed by some signal judgment, for having renounced the pope's authority. Some men of learning and eminence were so weak as to follow this impostor, who had been trained into these practices by artful designing priests. Bishops, abbots, and monks, held private meetings with her, pretending to believe all her blasphemies, and the affair at last became very serious.

One Peto, preaching before the king at Greenwich, told him he had been deceived by many lying prophets; but a true Micah warned him, that the dogs should lick his blood as they had licked the blood of Ahab. Henry bore this insult with great temper; but, to undeceive the people, appointed Dr. Corren, to preach before him on the next Sunday, when that priest justified the king's proceedings, and branded Peto with the epithets of dog, rebel, slanderer, and traitor. He was interrupted by one Elston, a friar, who called him a lying prophet, who established the succession of the crown upon adultery, and spoke with such virulence, that the king was obliged to interpose, and command him to be silent. At last these impostors became so insolent, that the king ordered the maid, with her accomplices, to be brought before the star-chamber.— There they confessed the whole mystery of iniquity, and soon after were brought to a scaffold in St. Paul's church-yard, at which place the articles of their confession were read in their hearing. They were sent to the Tower, and as soon as the parliament met, they were all attainted of high treason. On April 20, following, Barton, with five priests her accomplices, were executed at Tyburn, and there she confessed that she had been deceived by those artful impostors.

As soon as the parliament was prorogued, commissions were sent all over the kingdom to tender the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. These oaths were taken by the majority of the clergy, and Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, absolutely refused them; for which they were both committed to the Tower, and afterwards executed for high treason. More, though a man of wit and learning, yet was a violent persecutor; for while he was chancellor, a great many persons, both clergy and laity, had suffered for the gospel.

As the monks had insulted the king with personal abuse, and seduced his subjects from their allegiance, so he was determined to proceed against them with rigour. For this purpose a commission was appointed to visit all the monasteries, and Cromwell was made visitor general, who appointed substitutes to act in his stead. There they discovered such scenes of vice, debauchery, and impudence, as were disgraceful to religion and shocking to human nature. The visitors, who were no friends to the monastic life, did not fail to exaggerate many things, by representing the monks as all equally vicious, whereas some of them were very inoffensive persons. They told them, that in order to avoid punishment, they must give up their houses to the king, who would make a suitable provision for them during life.— Many of them complied with this, but refused to take the oath of supremacy.

Soon after this the parliament met, and passed an act, dissolving all convents whose revenues did not exceed two hundred pounds a year. This was a fatal blow for popery, for there were many of these in the kingdom. By this statute, three hundred and seventy-six religious houses were dissolved, and the sum of thirty-two thousand pounds a year was added to the royal-revenues, besides a capital of above one hundred thousand pounds in the plate, ornaments and effects of the convents and churches. A motion was made in the convocation, during this parliament, to have the bible translated into English in a more correct manner than Tindal's, but this was violently opposed by the Papists. However, a petition was drawn up to the king, and he gave orders for that purpose; it was printed at Paris about three years afterwards, but who the translators were is not certainly known. It is taken from the vulgate Latin, as appears from the grand copy still preserved in the king's library in the British Museum, where all the capitals are embellished.

In the beginning of this year the unfortunate queen Catharine died in the castle of Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire, and was buried in the abbey, now the cathedral of Peterborough. She sunk into a decline after the king had withdrawn his affections from her, but she would never resign her title of queen, though frequently importuned to it by Henry. When she found her end drawing near, she dictated a most affectionate and passionate letter to the king; she did not upbraid him with the treatment she had met with, but prayed for him, begging that God would bless him. She recommended her daughter Mary to his tender care, and likewise her servants, all which Henry complied with. For whatever scruples he might have had concerning the validity of his marriage, yet he never accused that princess of any thing indecent or unbecoming her character. She was certainly, in many respects a devout princess, according to the notions of those times, but she was bigotted and fretful, which, in some measure, alienated the king's affections from her. Henry seemed to be affected with her death, but his queen (Anne Boleyn) was so indecent in her behaviour as to speak of it with marks of greatest pleasure in company.

His majesty was now beginning to be cloyed with the possession of Anne Boleyn, the charms of lady Jane Seymour having captivated his unsettled mind. Anne was no stranger to this, and therefore in order to provoke his jealousy, she practised some very indiscreet levities, which were construed into crimes. She was committed to the tower as having been guilty of adultery with two of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, Weston and Breton, and likewise with one Smeton, a musician. The evidence against her did hardly amount to a presumption, but she was found guilty of high treason, in having violated the king's bed, and received sentence to be burnt alive, which was afterwards changed into beheading. She was executed within the walls of the tower, and her body thrown into an empty chest where it lay several days.

Thus fell Anne Boleyn, whose fate has been matter of much dispute. She is said to have been a lady of unaffected piety, and was certainly of a very charitable disposition, and an encourager of genius and learned men. She was naturally volatile, and in some cases, indiscreet. By her education in France, she had contracted a kind of vivacity, that did not suit the manners of the English court, and much less the impetuosity of the king's temper, to which she undoubtedly fell a sacrifice. All those accused of having been concerned with her were executed at the same time. Her brother and two more were beheaded, but Smeton was hanged. Nothing so much justified Anne Boleyn as the conduct of the king, who, on the very day after her execution, married the lady Jane Seymour. So little regard did he pay to common decorum, or the opinion of his subjects, over whom he had established and exercised the most arbitrary sway.

But that the king might convince his subjects, that he had no intention to part with the popish religion, though he had abolished the papal power, he issued strict orders, that several things should be attended to in public worship as they had been in former times. That the mass was to be still said in latin; image worship was to be retained, prayers for the dead were to be observed; the seven sacraments were to be solemnized in the same manner as before; prayers to saints were to be strictly observed; the doctrine of purgatory and works of supererogation were still retained, and indeed, every thing else in the Romish church, except obedience to the pope.

All those who either opposed, wrote, or spoke against these articles, were to suffer death as heretics, and the statute was executed with the greatest severity throughout the kingdom. Many, both clergy and laity, were burned alive at the stake, or racked on gibbets.

The people of England who had long groaned under the power of the clergy and papal extortions, were well pleased with the abolishing of the pope's supremacy; but they were not so well satisfied with the suppression of religious houses, thinking it unjust, that they should be all destroyed for the vices of a few, and that what the piety of their ancestors had dedicated to God, should be consigned to profane uses. The gentry used to provide for their children and decayed friends in those houses, and to be entertained themselves at the tables of the abbots. Travellers were lodged there, and the poor relieved by the alms daily distributed at monasteries.

The act of Parliament which suppressed them, enjoined that the farmers should keep up the same hospitality as before, and the king sold the lands to the nobles, at an easier rate for that purpose. But this hospitality was neglected, and in a short time it was taken no notice of. Books had been written to expose the characters of the monks, but this did not hinder their being punished, when shoals of them wandering from place to place, in a distressed and begging condition, told their own tale, and complained of the cruelty, and impiety of their treatment. To prevent their being restored the new proprietors thought proper to destroy their nests:—churches and convents were pulled down; the bells lead, and other materials were sold, and this havoc being visible in all parts of the country, shocked abundance of persons, besides the simple and devout who lamented, that their relations were likely to remain the longer in purgatory, through the want of masses being said for their deliverance. To abate something of the general clamour, the king restored fifteen convents of men, and sixteen nunneries, who had been the least exceptionable in their conduct, which subsisted till the general dissolution of abbeys, but this did not prevent insurrections.

The first that broke out was in Lincolnshire, where one Dr. Mackrel, Prior at Borlings in that county, called himself CAPTAIN COBLEP, gathered twenty thousand men together, swearing them to be true to God and the king, and drew up their grievances in a few articles, which were transmitted to court. These articles acknowledged the king's supremacy, desiring he would take the advice of his nobility and redress their grievances. Adding, that they were afraid more of their religious houses would be suppressed, their churches pulled down, and their plate sold.

Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, was sent against them with a declaration from the king, telling them he would grant none of their requests, and at the same time commanding them to deliver up their leaders. The answer enraging them, they seemed disposed for a march to London, but some gentlemen of the county whom they had forced to join them, moderated their resentment, and sent the duke word, that nothing would contribute more effectually to disperse them, than a general pardon.

A new proclamation was accordingly published, requiring them to return home, if they expected mercy; for whilst they continued in arms, no pardon would be granted. This induced most of them to return home; but captain Cobler, with the rest of the ring-leaders, was taken and executed.

What disposed the king to give these insurgents hopes of mercy was the advice of a much greater body of rebels being got together to the number of forty thousand men in Yorkshire. This rising was upon the same principle, and for the same reason as the others; but it was the more formidable, in consequence of being in the neighbourhood of Scotland.

One Robert Askew, a private gentleman, but of a turbulent disposition, put himself at the head of the rebels, whose march was called, "The Pilgrimage of Grace." Some priests marched before them, with crosses in their hands, and on their banners they had a crucifix with five wounds and a chalice, and every one wore on his sleeve as a badge of the party, an emblem of the five wounds of Christ, with the name of Jesus wrought in the middle.

As is generally the case with rebels, they pretended that they were come to drive evil counsellors away from the king, or in other words, they were to dictate to him in what manner he was to govern the nation.

Lee, archbishop of York, and Thomas lord Darcy, surrendered Pontefract castle to the rebels, who soon afterwards seized on the city of York, and the town of Hull: but Scarborough and Skipton held out against all their efforts.

However, the example of the archbishop and lord Darcy encouraged the inhabitants of Durham, Richmond, Lancashire, and Westmoreland to join the rebels. Geo. Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, marched against them with so much zeal and diligence, that he did not wait for the king's orders, not doubting but his service would merit a pardon for this presumption. The king made him commander in chief of all his forces in the north, and proposed joining him in person, but was diverted from it by Shrewsbury and Norfolk, whom he had sent to the army. These noblemen sent notice to the king, that it would be dangerous to bring the rebels to a general engagement; but the best way would be to gain them by amusing treaties, their numbers being so very great that they could not keep long together for want of provisions.

The earl sent a herald to them with a proclamation, requiring them to lay down their arms and submit to the king's mercy; but Askew, who assumed all the dignity of a prince rather than a general, would not suffer the proclamation to be read when he heard what were the contents. The king's troops did not exceed five thousand men, and with these the noblemen took post at Doncaster, where they fortified the bridge, and lined the river, to hinder the rebels from marching southward. Askew, with an army at least six times as numerous, had resolved to force a passage; but heavy rain falling on the two days he had appointed for that purpose, the fords became impassable, and Norfolk made use of that opportunity to engage him in a treaty. This afforded an opportunity for some agents he had employed among the rebels to insinuate, that their leaders were making terms for themselves, and would leave the rest to be hanged or ruined. The poorer sort whom Askew would not suffer to plunder the country for subsistence, were already reduced to great necessities, and hearkening the more readily to these suggestions, disbanded in great numbers, and returned home to their families. Norfolk seeing the success of his measures, proposed their sending deputies to court with their demands, offering at the same time, to accompany them, in order to intercede in their behalf. This he knew would take up some time, and most of them would disperse before his return. Sir Robert Elerkin, and Robert Bowes, two gentlemen who had been taken at Hull, and forced to go along with the rebels, were sent to Windsor; but they did not receive the king's answer till most of the insurgents had disbanded. At last the king pardoned the whole rebel army, except six, who were not mentioned. As the rebels had no hopes of seeing their grievances redressed, and as every one imagined that he might possibly be one of the six excepted, so they rejected the terms with disdain.

It was therefore found necessary to enter into a new treaty, and three hundred of the rebels were sent for to Doncaster to treat with the king's commissioners. The demands made by these men, were the most exorbitant that could have been thought of. They were, that he should restore all the religious houses, their former revenues, acknowledge the pope's supremacy, and in a word, disannul all the acts that had been made against even the grossest abuses in popery. They added further, that the king must remove all his ministers, and chuse in their room such as would be favourable to the Roman Catholic religion. However, the king being advised thereto by the duke of Norfolk, and the earl of Shrewsbury, told them in general terms, that he would call a parliament to consider their requests, and in the mean time to make them easy, he granted a general pardon, upon which they all dispersed. From what has been said concerning these two rebellions in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, we find that the opposition made to the Reformation arose, not so much from motives of what is commonly called superstition, but rather from temporal interest.

The poor had long enjoyed many temporal privileges, in consequence of the existence of religious houses, and the farmers seldom paid any money, the abbots being contented with a share of what the earth, the flocks, and the rivers produced. But now these lands were seized on by the rapacious nobility, who obtained grants of them from the crown; and as by the statute of alienations, they had a right to dispose of these, so they fell into different hands; and it frequently happened, that every new landlord raised the rents, which tenants were obliged to pay in money. There is, therefore, no wonder that a change so sudden and so unexpected should carry on discontents and raise tumults among the people, and we have been the more explicit concerning these things, because, without a proper knowledge of them, no man can understand the history of the Reformation in England. But to return to the subject.

Whether the people were not satisfied that the pardon would be inviolably adhered to, or whether the clergy were dissatisfied at not obtaining all their demands, a fresh rebellion broke out in the north, though not so dangerous as the former. Two gentlemen of Cumberland, Nicholas Musgrave and Thomas Tilly, raised an army of eighteen thousand men, with which they attacked Carlisle; but being repulsed by the citizens, were in their return routed by the duke of Norfolk, who put all the officers to death by martial law, with about seventy private persons, so that of all their leaders, only Musgrave made his escape. Sir Francis Biggot, and one Hellam, attempting to surprise Hull, were taken and executed. The pretence of this second rising in the north was, the king had promised to call a parliament to meet at York, to settle all the disputes, but he not having complied, they once more took the field. The reason assigned by the king was, that they had broke through the faith of treaties, and consequently they were not to be trusted, so that he would not call a parliament to redress their grievances, till such time as they would be quiet.

The duke of Norfolk, displaying the loyal standard, executed martial law wherever he saw it requisite; Askew was put to death at Hull, and some abbots and priors were executed at York. Lord Darcy was beheaded on Tower-hill, and lord Hussey at Lincoln. The former, on his trial, accused the duke of Norfolk of having encouraged the rebels to persist in their demands; but this nobleman's great services set him above all suspicion. The duke denied the charge, and offered to clear himself by single combat; but the king declared himself satisfied with his conduct. The executions were not all over till June, and in July the king published a general pardon for all the rebels in the north, which was received with great joy, and putting an end to the people's fears, re-established the peace of the country.

October 12, this year, was born Edward VI. to the inexpressible joy of the whole nation, and much more so to the king himself, who ardently wished to have an heir male of his own body. The prince was the son of his beloved queen, lady Jane Seymour, who died within twelve days after she was delivered. Some of our ignorant historians have been bold enough to assert, that Henry gave orders to the midwife who delivered his queen, to dispatch her. But that this is a falsehood, will appear to any person who looks into the loyal letters in the British Museum, where there is one written by this queen herself, a few days before she died, declaring that the king had always treated her with tenderness.

In 1538, the king, finding that such of the abbeyes as were still left were nurseries of rebellion, and plots against his crown and dignity were daily hatching in them, set on foot a second visitation, and the commissioners were to make a minute inquiry into every particular relating to their estates, their duties, their manner of living, and their vices. They were to inquire what number of images they had, by what names they were called? How many pilgrims frequented their shrines annually, and what money they paid? They were further to make a faithful report of all the miracles said to have been wrought at the shrines of these images, and they were to be laid before the king in his council, that he might take a proper account of them, so that the subjects should not be imposed on, as they had been in times past.

This produced a detection of an almost infinite number of impurities, besides holy cheats and pretended relics, made use of to encourage superstition, rather than devotion, in the people, and to draw them to pilgrimages, where they might be fleeced of their money. The horrid crimes of Sodom and Gomorrah are said to have been committed at Battle-Abbey, Christ's-church in Canterbury, and in several other convents. The visitors found innumerable instances of whoredom, adultery, and unnatural crimes, which ought not to be mentioned; and it was discovered, that the monks had taught the nuns how to procure abortions. In all this there seems to have been nothing exaggerated, for the confining such vast numbers of persons by the most solemn oaths to a state of celibacy, must have naturally led to the commission of unnatural crimes; for God having appointed the regular manner in which human passions are to be gratified, those who lay unnecessary restraints upon them, set aside the order of the divine Being, and open a large field for the commission of the most unnatural crimes.

With respect to monkish idolatry and deceit, Reading seems to have been the repository of the nation. There was found the figure of an angel with one wing, which the monks affirmed to have brought over from Palestine, the spear that pierced our Saviour's side, together with such a number of pretended relics, as took four-sheets of paper to contain their names. At St. Edmundsbury, some coals were shewed, said to be the remains of those with which St. Lawrence was roasted; the parings of St. Edmund's toe nails; the penknife and boots of St. Thomas-a-Becket; a piece of the real cross on which Christ suffered, and a vast quantity of other relics. Indeed, it would take up a whole volume to describe the whole, for they were endless; they were sent up to London, and such as were of no manner of use, were carried to Smithfield, where they were used a bonfire of; and one Point, a friar, was burnt along with them for denying the king's supremacy. There was something extremely natural in sending their friar into another world along with his gods; for as he pretended that they had often elevated his affections while he prayed before their shrines, so the last kind offices they could do him was, to send him from the fiery furnace into eternity.

One would naturally conclude, that the monks, after the detection of such impostures carried on by them, would have submitted to any thing rather than a public trial, and to surrender their houses to avoid the indignation of the king and Cromwell's anger, who, as visitor general, was no friend to them; nay, indeed, some of their vices had been of such a glaring nature, that as no excuses could be pleaded to extenuate them, so many of them signed confessions which were sent up to the king.

There were among the abbots and priors of the nitred convents, some who had been preferred since the breach with the court of Rome; and these readily agreed to resign, either from hopes of being advanced to bishoprics, or because they wished for a reformation. The pensions granted to some others induced them likewise to resign; but that which occasioned the destruction of most of the abbeyes was, the conduct of their superiors; who, expecting a change of religion, and the ruin of their societies, had taken fines, and granted leases of lands for twice ninety-nine years, at little or no rent; alienated a great part of the estates of their convents, and had been guilty of all kinds of depredations for which they stood responsible. The abbot of Glastonbury broke open a house where the plate belonging to his convent was lodged, and sent it to the rebels, for which he was hanged and quartered; the judges having construed this part of his conduct into an act of high treason. The abbots of Reading and Colchester shared the same fate; and, indeed, there were so many inferior monks and friars hanged, that there is no wonder the papists should point out Henry as a bloody tyrant; for as no papist will ever shew mercy to a Protestant, so, to use the words of Mr. Sterne, "every person who is possessed of false religion, hates those who possess the true."

One would have thought that this severity of the king towards the monks, would have induced him to embrace some things proposed by the reformers; but quite the reverse took place, for he was determined to persecute all those who acknowledged the papal supremacy, and all those who disputed the validity of the popish ceremonies. Of this we have a striking instance in the case of Lambert, who had been formerly minister in the English factory at Antwerp in Flanders, but was dismissed on account of his denying some of the popish tenets. Returning to London he kept a school some years, and one Sunday going to hear Dr. Taylor preach concerning the real presence in the sacrament, he sent him a letter containing his reasons for differing from his sentiments. This letter was shewn to Crammer, who was still of his old opinion concerning transubstantiation, and he sent for Lambert to converse with him. Cramer said all he could to dissuade the man from his opinions, but this was in vain, for Lambert, in order to display his logical powers, appealed to the king. This was like Gill Blas's going out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Lambert's appeal gave great pleasure to the king, because it gave him an opportunity of displaying his knowledge in theology; for such was the temper of this prince, that if he had thought there was a more learned man in his kingdom than himself, he would have ordered him to be hanged up in terrorem.—What a happy thing to have such a learned king!

For this poor insignificant purpose, the nobility, great officers of state, and the judges, were assembled in Westminster-hall, where the king himself sat as president. There the culprit was brought, and the trial was opened by a speech delivered by Dr. Day, who declared to the assembly that the end of their meeting was to hear the king convict the prisoner of heresy.

Here was judgment before evidence, and sentence before conviction, so that we may say in the words of a noble lord, "In vain are judges learned, in vain do they study to be upright, if the channels through which justice should flow are to be stopped." This mock trial, which lasted seven hours, ended just as might have been expected; for poor Lambert was brow-beaten, and told that if he would not recant his errors, he would be burnt. Lambert refused to comply, and the consequence was, that he was burnt in Smithfield with circumstances of the most horrid cruelty. His last words were, "None but Christ, none but Christ."

Soon after this, in consequence of the dissolution of the monasteries, the king received an annual revenue of near two hundred thousand pounds, besides an immense quantity of plate; for that of St. Edmundsbury alone amounted to five thousand marks of gold and silver. All this, however, did not make him rich; for his own prodigality, joined to the rapacious desires of his courtiers, induced him to squander away these revenues which might have been useful in promoting the education of youth, and supporting the aged and infirm.

It was much about this time, that Cramer procured an order from the king to have a proclamation published, granting every person who chose it, to have a bible in his own house. The year before this, English bibles had been fixed in the most conspicuous places in the churches for the people to read in; but now they were permitted to have them in their families. Hitherto we have been able to trace out some of the steps by which the Reformation was brought about in England; for Henry, though a merciless arbitrary tyrant, yet as an instrument in the hand of divine Providence, brought about that Reformation which he never intended to complete. His worst of passions promoted the glorious design, and God, the universal Lord of nature, providence, and grace, made him an eminent instrument in his hands, to open the way for the establishment of that religion which now takes place in this nation; and thus we may learn, that while men are gratifying their own sensual desires, God is making them perform his works. We must not pass over this part of the reign of that illustrious tyrant Henry VIII. without taking notice of the fate of Cromwell, earl of Essex, especially as most of our writers have represented that nobleman a friend to the Protestant religion.

We are told, that he was the son of a blacksmith at Putney, but this certainly is as great a falsehood, as that of cardinal Wolsey's being the son of a butcher at Ipswich. Cromwell was a man of learning, and as such he made the tour of Europe, after which he was taken into the family of cardinal Wolsey, who recommended him to the king. His advancement to grandeur was rapid, and it is certain that he rose to be Henry's prime minister of state. Like other courtiers, he was compliant with court measures, and justice or injustice were all one to him, so as he pleased his sovereign. Having acquired a superficial knowledge of religion, and seeing the wicked lives of its professors, he considered the whole as a cheat, and consequently trampled upon every moral obligation in compliance with the will of his sovereign. He was neither a Papist nor a Protestant, but he was willing to be either, just as circumstances happened. He pronounced sentence of death upon poor Lambert the school-master, and it was common to see him conduct papists to the flames for denying the king's supremacy.

He thought no crime too great so as he could please his royal master, and although he was indefatigable in business, yet his ambition seems to have been unbounded. It is generally supposed that he fell under the royal displeasure in bringing about the match between the king and Anne of Cleves; but be that as it will, thus much is certain, that when he was arrested, he shewed such pusillanimity of temper as was by no means consistent with the character of a minister of state. It was proposed at first to try him at common law, but his enemies believing they would not by that method have it in their power to convict him, had recourse to a much shorter expedient, and that was to bring in a bill of attainder. This easily passed through both houses, and Cromwell was in consequence thereof ordered for execution, which was inflicted with some circumstances of barbarity.

The seizing the lands belonging to the great abbey's, and the disputes among the courtiers concerning the partition of them, every one pretending to a share, occasioned insurrections almost every where, particularly in the north, where superstition seems to have taken deepest root. Many of the nobility entered into conspiracies, and some of them having corresponded with cardinal Pole, whom the king had proscribed, were executed. Pole was grandson to the duke of Clarence, and second cousin to the king, and although a priest, the pope had promised to secularize him, if the people would place him on the throne. This almost deluged the nation with blood, and executions were so frequent, that the people seemed to pay little regard to them.

There was one grand object Henry had in view at that time, namely, to prevail on his nephew, James V. king of Scotland, to join with him in shaking off the papal yoke. For this purpose he sent Sir Ralph Sadler to Edinburgh, with instructions to press James to dismiss cardinal Beaton from his councils, and to seize on the abbey lands. The Scottish clergy prevailed on James to reject the proposals made by his uncle, but at the same time promised to meet Henry at York. This alarmed the Scottish clergy so much, that they raised a considerable sum of money and presented it to James, who was a very extravagant prince, and then he broke his promise of meeting his uncle at York.

Henry, enraged at being trifled with in this manner by James, returned to London filled with deep resentment, but he met with another misfortune upon his return, which had almost discomposed his rational faculties. We have already observed, that Anne Boleyn was put to death on some slight suspicions, but now the king had a consort who had been guilty of repeated acts of lewdness, all which she confessed. This was Catharine Howard, niece to the duke of Norfolk, who was executed within the walls of the Tower. She was not tried at common law, but attainted along with that abandoned woman, the countess of Rochford, who had given evidence against Anne Boleyn. Henry having raised an army, sent it to chastise the Scots, and both meeting at Solway, a few miles beyond Carlisle, the latter were defeated, and the flower of their nobility taken prisoners by the English. This had such an effect on James, that he died in a state of madness, leaving behind him an infant daughter named Mary.

Henry ordered the Scottish prisoners to be treated with every mark of respect, and having nothing so much at heart as uniting the two kingdoms, he proposed a match between his son Edward and the young queen of Scotland. This was much relished by the prisoners, and the king generously suffered them to return to their country loaded with presents, that they might communicate the proposal to their next parliament.

Cardinal David Beaton had forged a will in the name of the late king James V. appointing himself regent of Scotland, so that every alliance with England was found to be impracticable while that prelate was at the head of affairs! but of this more afterwards.

Soon after this, Henry resolved to marry a sixth wife, but as not one of all the maiden ladies in the kingdom would trust their lives to his suspicions, so he gave his hand to lady Latimer, commonly called Catharine Parr, daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, whose name she had assumed on the death of her husband.

This lady was an intimate friend of Cranmer's, and under these two worthy persons the Reformation went on gradually, notwithstanding the violence of the king's passions. Henry, though a sworn enemy to the papal power, yet was no less so to all those who opposed the Romish ceremonies. Nothing was more common than to see a bigotted Papist, for denying the king's supremacy, and a Protestant, for refusing to comply with the ceremonies, chained to the stake together and burnt; and notwithstanding the minds of the people began to be wonderfully enlightened. By reading the bible, they found that there was a vast difference between what was written in the New Testament and popery. Primers and catechisms were distributed by Cranmer among the lower orders of the people, and the Reformation might have been completed had the king given his consent to it.

In this state was religion in England, when Henry VIII. died, on Friday January 28, 1548, according to the present style. A little before he expired, he sent for his dear friend Cranmer, who had retired to Croydon, that he might have no share in the attainer of the duke of Norfolk, who was his mortal enemy.

The character of Henry VIII. has been variously represented, just as the wantonness of men's passions led them to misrepresent the truth. In vain among contending parties do we look for the picture of the man.

Till he advanced in years, and became rather corpulent, he was extremely handsome, tall and well shaped, with a graceful countenance, set off by means of the dress used in that age.

Having in his youth learned all the jargon of the schools, so as to be able to dispute with his clergy, he became vain to excess, and embraced every opportunity of shewing his parts. His long attachment to Wolsey, is a proof that he was not always fickle in his disposition; and his proposal of marrying his son to the queen of Scotland, will serve to shew, that he was not ignorant of the interests of the people. The provocations he received from the pope and his adherents were great, but he took an ample revenge. His seizing on the revenues of the convents, enabled him to reward his favourites, and support his extravagances. It was generally understood that he spent all the money belonging to the convents. The reverse is the truth; he founded and endowed that noble structure Trinity College, in Cambridge, with many other structures for the education of youth.

The most striking part of his character is, that of living eighteen years with Catharine, who bore him several children, and then parting with her.— This was certainly from notions of superstition instead of those commonly assigned.

Whatever hand divine Providence took in punishing this king, it is not for us to determine; but thus much is certain, that after his divorce he was never happy with any other queen, at least not long. Anne Boleyn, for irritating his jealousy by the levity of her conduct, was beheaded. Jane Seymour died twelve days after the birth of her first child. Anne of Cleves was divorced the day after the king married her. Catharine Howard was a common prostitute, for which she suffered death.— And Catharine Parr had nearly lost her life, for disputing with the king about religion. Upon the whole, Henry was one of those men whose character seem to be marked with great vices, while, at the same time, they have many shining qualities.— He was a happy instrument, in the hand of Providence, of laying the foundation of the Protestant religion, although he never desired to see it accomplished. He died in the firm belief of a future state of rewards and punishments, and with seeming contrition for his past life.

He was succeeded by his son Edward, a pious youth, then in the tenth year of his age. The first thing relating to religion after the accession of this prince, was a general visitation of the churches, and the Reformation was begun in real earnest. All shrines and images that had been left standing were taken down, the lessons and epistles were read in English, and every thing was conducted with regularity.

The grand design that Cranmer had, in view was to abolish the whole of the Popish rites and ceremonies: and in this he was greatly assisted by the duke of Somerset, uncle to the young king. Never did Reformation proceed more gently and gradually than in this reign; the conduct of Somerset, the protector, and of archbishop Cranmer, ought to be imitated by all those who wish to conduct things with moderation, and prevent any sort of violence from taking place. The reading the lessons, epistles, and gospels in English, was of the utmost service to the people, by enlightening their minds in the knowledge of the truth, and exposing Popish errors. But our celebrated reformers did not stop here.

The next thing, was to have the whole service of the church read in English; and for that purpose a commission was granted to several learned men to revise the popish liturgy, and make another more agreeable to the genius of the gospel.

The next thing the reformers proceeded to establish was that a register should be kept in every parish, of births, marriages, and funerals; and no priest was to preach any where, but in his own parish, without a special licence. In churches where they had not a large English Bible, one was to be purchased in the space of three months; and before the expiration of one year, Erasmus's paraphrase of the four gospels, and the acts of the apostles lately translated into English, were to be placed in every church for people to read in. Every clergyman under the degree of bachelor in divinity, was obliged to procure a copy of the same paraphrase for his own use, and the bishops were to enquire from time to time, what proficiency the clergy had made in the study of the sacred scriptures.

As the priests knew little of preaching and much less of the nature of theology, so it was found necessary to publish a book of homilies or sermons, to be read every Sunday and holy day in the churches. This was the more necessary, because the people were running into mad extremes; some considered the priests as being in possession of a secret, by which they could bestow salvation on whom they pleased; whereas, on the other hand, some imagined, that in consequence of the death of Christ they were to be saved, let them live in whatever manner they would. To rectify these abuses, it was inculcated in the homilies, that salvation could only be obtained through the imputation of Christ's merits; but then, that no sinner was to expect justification before God, unless he lived in such a manner as became the rules laid down in the gospel. Many books were written at this time against image worship, and archbishop Cranmer published a catechism containing the genuine principles of the Christian faith and duty.

The next thing taken into consideration was, the admitting the laity to the cup in the eucharist.— This had been long denied them, but now an ordinance was published, wherein every priest was ordered to give the sacrament in both kinds to the communicants, and a new communion service was framed. The celibacy of the clergy came next under review, and it was declared, that as not only many of the primitive fathers were married men, but that even some of the apostles had wives, so it was both unjust and unlawful to exclude the clergy from that privilege. It was therefore granted to every clergyman, and many of them availed themselves with an act so consistent with common justice, and natural reason.

But while those who wished well to the interests of religion, were carrying on the work of reformation, some of the nobility and gentry, who had obtained grants of the crown lands, exercised great cruelties over their tenants. The rents were raised above double their ancient value; instead of corn, money was to be paid, and the people were really distressed. England, at that time, exhibited a shocking picture to every generous mind. Farmers who had lived in affluence, had their rents doubled four times; the iron hand of oppression was heavy upon them, and whatever their affections might have been to the Protestant religion, yet the love of ease and the enjoyment of affluence, naturally led them to wish for the return of those happy days they had enjoyed under popery.

These murmurings became at last of a very serious nature; for there were insurrections in almost every part of the country, particularly in Yorkshire, where they had been before raised, and even as far as Cornwall. All these insurgents demanded, that the old religion should be restored; but to have complied with the demands of mobs, would have been a strong instance of the weakness of government, and a proof that they were ready at all times, when it suited their own conveniences, to give up those rights and privileges which had been bestowed on them by their sovereign.

The Cornish men rose in a vast body, and were so audacious as to attack the city of Exeter. Lord Russell was sent against them, and arrived just time enough to relieve the city. The chief part of the rebels were sent to London and executed: many of the lower sort were put to death by martial law, and the vicar of St. Thomas was hanged up on the top of the steeple of his own church, dressed in his canonical habits, with his beads hanging round his girdle.

Much about the same time, a formidable insurrection broke out, in Norfolk, headed by one Robert Ket, a tanner, but extremely rich, for he was lord of three manors. The pretence made use of by this rebel was, that the people had been oppressed by the inclosing of commons: and therefore he and his company went about the country destroying all those inclosures which had been set up to exclude the tenants from common right. They took possession of the city of Norwich; but Dudley, earl of Warwick, having been sent against them, he stormed the place. One hundred and thirty were killed, and sixty being taken were immediately hanged. The rebels, enraged to see so many of their friends hanged up, became in a manner desperate, and attacked the earl, but the royalists killed two thousand of them, and put the rest to flight.—Ket and his brother were taken the next day hid in a barn, the former of whom was hanged over the walls of Norwich castle, and the latter on the top of Wymundham steeple. Nine others suffered in the same manner, being all hanged up on a tree, which the rebels called the Oak of Reformation.

Some of the vagabond priests of the county of Norfolk had forged a story, containing what they called a prophecy, in the following words:—

The country kuffs, hob, duck and hick,
With clubs and clouted shoon;
Shall fill up Daffordale with blood
Of slaughtered bodies soon.

The countenance given to these insurgents by the popish party, induced government to have a watchful eye upon such persons as were suspected. For this reason, Bonner, bishop of London, was taken into custody, and committed to the Marshalsea, where he remained several terms, for such was his disposition, that when he was brought before the council, he reviled them with the most opprobrious language.

During this reign, several foreigners, men of reputation and learning, arrived in England. They had been invited over by archbishop Cramer, who was respected and beloved by all the Protestants in Europe. Amongst these was Peter Martyr, a person well skilled in the knowledge of the fathers, of a sweet natural temper, a healing disposition, and one who desired, as far as lay in his power, to restore every thing relating to the church to its original state of genuine purity. He was accompanied by several others, the most celebrated of whom was Martin Bancer, a man of learning, but rather of austere manners. These gentlemen proposed a visitation of the universities, for some of the colleges had been so much injured, that there was not a sufficiency left to support them. These foreigners were undoubtedly men of understanding in their own country, but it was rather an impudent step to bring them over to England, at a time when the people's minds were unsettled as to religious principles. This will appear the more consistent with truth, when we consider in what manner they conducted themselves.

Having adopted the notions embraced by Luther concerning the real presence in the sacrament, they were continually disputing in favour of it, and this created them a great many enemies in England.—The English in their own country were convinced of the falsity of that doctrine, and as the great Cramer had published his catechism, concerning the devotion of the sacrament, much regard was paid to it, and some of the foreigners were treated with great contempt.

As we are treating of those steps which lead to the Reformation of the church of England, so we are obliged at the same time, to take notice of every obstacle that happened in its progress, not only from those who were professed papists, but also such as assumed the name of Protestants. This will appear the more necessary, when it is considered, that some of the sects which sprung up at that time, have since obtained a name in several European nations, and will make a most distinguishing figure in the latter part of this work. Indeed, in treating of these matters we are obliged to trace things from the original fountain, for without that, no proper knowledge can be attained.

Much about the same time that the foreign learned gentlemen above mentioned arrived in England, some gentlemen, or rather enthusiasts, came over to this country, who, instead of shewing a grateful sense of the favours they had been treated with, found fault with all the ordinances of the church of England; and they condemned the Reformation as not purged from the errors of popery.— In the infancy of a Reformation, nothing could have a more fatal tendency, or more likely to prevent its succeeding than such a nonconformity and division amongst its professors, for at this time great divisions happened among the reformed in Germany.

The chief of these foreigners was John Law, a Polish baron, who came over with several of his countrymen, and a great number of German refugees, to whom he acted as a pastor. He had been some time settled at Embden, in East Friesland; but the fears of persecution had driven him from thence, and then he took shelter in England. He applied himself in behalf of his people, to the duke of Somerset, who then acted as protector to the young king. Accordingly, a charter was granted them to settle in Austin Friars, within the city of London. A charter was likewise granted under the great seal constituting these foreigners a body politic, under the direction of John Law, their superintendent, and four other ministers, with a power to increase their number and chuse their successors, if the king approved of it. At the same time several other foreigners settled in England, but they had all such wild romantic notions concerning religion, that they attempted as far as lay in their power, to bring every thing into a state of confusion.

At the same time a vast number of Anabaptists took shelter in England, who had been driven out of Germany by the violence of persecution. These people, however innocent their sentiments might have been with respect to religious principles, and however inoffensive they were to the powers in being, yet such was the intolerent principles of the times, that they were considered as objects of punishment. A commission was granted to prosecute these people, whom the law at that time called heretics; and many of them being seized recanted their errors; except Jane Boucher, and George Van Paris, both of whom were natives of Holland, and these were burnt alive at a stake.

The liturgy of the church of England having been established in parliament, it was considered as necessary, that a confession of faith, or articles of religion should be drawn up. This was consistent with the practice of the reformed churches in general; for as the papists had reproached them with holding opinions contrary to the Christian system, so it was necessary that they should use these methods, in order to prove their innocence to the world. During the whole of this period, reformation went on in such a rapid manner, that nothing but infinite wisdom, for wise purposes could have stopped it; but wherever God acts, let men be silent.

It was at this time that the famous, or rather infamous council of Trent first met, and notwithstanding all their zeal, yet they could not obliterate the light of truth, nor overpower the religion of Protestants. The priests in that council had no intention to give any countenance to the Protestant religion; they were persons interested in the fate of popery; and they knew that they must stand or fall by it. For this reason, instead of abolishing any of the ancient rites and ceremonies, they not only imposed new ones, but even obliged the people to subscribe to new articles, which were mere matter of speculation before. The acts of the council of Trent ruined the popish interest, while if properly regulated, they might have established it on the most permanent foundation.

The grand object before this general council was the settlement of some disturbances that had taken place in the Christian world. The provocation on the part of the court of Rome had been so great, that it could not be veiled over; and the concessions made by the Protestants were treated with contempt. Had the bishops, or other deputies in this council, considered the duty they owed to the church, they would have abridged the papal power, ordered the mass to have been said in English, granted the clergy liberty to marry, and church communion in both kinds. To this it may be added, that had they granted a privilege to their people to enter into a free enquiry into matters of faith and duty, they might have established their credit, and the Roman Catholic religion, under a few modifications, might have now been the established religion of these countries which we now inhabit.

In 1553, king Edward, the greatest prodigy that perhaps ever lived, considering his tender age, found himself in a decline, and although several of the faculty told him that he might survive the malignancy of his disorder, yet he set his mind upon heaven, without neglecting the obligations he was under to his people. That which struck deepest into his mind, was the regard he had for the Protestant religion. It was in his power to alter the will of his father; and therefore upon mature consideration he thought that as his sister Mary was a bigotted papist, and so far as he knew, the education of Elizabeth had been little attended to, he made a will in favour of lady Jane Gray, grand-daughter of Mary queen of France, youngest sister of Henry VIII. This was one of the most striking instances of bad policy that ever could have taken place.—Lady Jane Gray had been but lately married to lord Dudley, and she did not court any such dignity. The decorated crowns and regal dignities were beneath her notice. Her mind was enlarged with human knowledge, she was endowed with the most unaffected piety, her heart was a stranger to contentions, but an ambitious father-in-law prevailed upon her to assume the regal dignity, which brought her and her husband to the block. The popish party were still strong in England, the leaven of old prejudices was not totally worn out, different passions led to different ends, and the bigotted Mary was seated on the throne of England. Had this princess been endowed with the least spirit of common humanity, she would have looked on the lady Jane Gray as an object of compassion; but consistent with the temper of that family from which her mother descended, being a most merciless tyrant, she suffered her and her husband to be both put to death under some degrees of torture that are a disgrace to human nature. The cause of Edward's death was a decline, which was improperly treated by some persons who were ignorant of the nature of his disorder. He was certainly a very pious prince, and from the latter part of his conduct it seems that a year before his death, he had given over all hopes of life. He was an enemy to persecution on account of religion, and in learning, he exceeded many who were double his age. He seemed to have no pleasure in any thing besides that of doing good. Men of great learning came from all parts of Europe to visit this more than illustrious prince, and Cardan, a learned physician, in returning from Scotland, where he had been to cure Hamilton, archbishop of St. Andrews, of the venereal disease waited upon Edward, and found him so amazingly learned in the languages, that he declared he had never met with such another before. Upon the whole, he was one of those illustrious characters that is but too seldom found on the throne, and at his death he left the church of England almost as much reformed as it is at present. When his death was made known, and particularly during his funeral, there was an universal dejection displaying itself, as it were over the whole kingdom, and the people seemed to have been well persuaded what part Mary would act.

No sooner had Mary got possession of the throne than she resolved to re-establish the old religion, for mass was said in her own chapel. Being of a revengeful disposition, she sought every opportunity of sacrificing those to her malice who had given the least encouragement to the Reformation. She had taken the oath of supremacy in her father's life-time, but her priests easily granted her absolution.

Having called a parliament, she found the members so obsequious to her will, that popery was easily established. Orders were sent to all the counties, and indeed to every civil officer in the kingdom, to take into custody all those who did not go to mass, so that in a short time all the prisons were full.—The horrid cruelties inflicted on these poor sufferers are well known to all those who have read the history of England; but if the reign of this princess was violent, God so ordered that it was short. It was the last struggle the Protestant church of England had with popery, so far as to resist unto death. It was like that darkness which generally takes place before the day breaks, to make way for the rising sun. Stakes were erected and faggots lighted in most towns in England; people were not tried in the civil courts, but before the bishop's chancellor, and he having declared them heretics, sent a certificate thereof into chancery, upon which a writ was made out, directed to the sheriff commanding that they should be burned alive. This princess continued her cruelty to the last, and died forsaken by Philip of Spain her husband, despised by her neighbours, and abhorred by her subjects.

The accession of Elizabeth to the throne of England, on the death of her sister Mary, is the grand epocha of the Reformation of England. This princess had been brought up with great care under Ascham, whose works are now well known. She was not only acquainted with the French and Italian, but even with the Latin and Greek. The solitary manner in which she lived during the reign of her sister, gave her an opportunity of improving her mind, and the continual fear she laboured under of being put to death as an heretic, led her to consider those points upon which salvation depends.—She was at her accession to the throne, twenty-five years of age, but had nothing in her countenance that was engaging. A fatal blow was given to the papal power by her father, when he took off the pope's supremacy; the minds of the people were beginning to be gradually, and, as it were, imperceptibly enlightened, and her brother Edward had almost established the Protestant religion. The grand work however, was left for her, and she proceeded upon such principles of moderation as will ever do honour to her memory. Having assembled her council together, she proposed calling a new parliament, in which Sir Nicholas Bacon, as lord keeper, sat president. In this parliament it was agreed upon, though not without much opposition from the popish party, that a convocation should be assembled, to consider the articles of religion, and the state of the liturgy that had been set forth in the reign of Edward VI. The clergy were commanded not to preach on disputed points, till such time as the opinion of the convocation should be taken, and the consequence was, that a committee of clergymen were appointed so revise the liturgy, and make what alterations they thought proper, leaving the whole to the inspection of parliament. The next thing was to call home all the Protestant ministers who had taken refuge abroad during the reign of queen Mary, and some of these being men of learning, they were advanced to the highest places under government. But this leads us to take notice of the state of religion at that time in England.

Learning was beginning to rear her head, but she had many difficulties to struggle with. Inveterate prejudices were not easily eradicated, and religion, the grand ornament of human life, was so little attended to, that they did not care much what they embraced. Those who had been long accustomed to idolatry, were loath to refrain from image worship, and others, who thought reformation necessary, had but very confused notions concerning it. Thus it was no easy matter to steer between the two extremes. But the intrepidity of the queen surmounted all difficulties, and rose superior to opposition. A system of articles were drawn up, thirty-nine in number, which in many things differed materially from those drawn up in the reign of Edward VI. These we shall consider in the order they lie before us, because we shall attend to what was originally intended in our account of Protestant churches, namely—to give an account of the faith, worship, discipline and government, of every Protestant community established by law in Europe.

There has been much objection made concerning the validity of the articles of the church of England, but it is our business to consider them with moderation; we are not to enter into disputes, but we will freely acknowledge our own sentiments, even concerning the most disputed points; and when we do so, we hope it will not be considered as arrogant. In every thing of that nature it is becoming the dignity of the historian to speak without partiality or prejudice, and to acquire honour without seeming to look for it. We shall, therefore, proceed to examine these articles one by one, and make such reflections on them, as appear consistent with common sense, and with the Christian religion.

The first article in the church of England is, that which should constitute the foundation of all religion whatever; namely, the being of a God, and the existence of the ever blessed Trinity.

The second article relates to the divinity, as well as the human nature of Christ, and this is upon the most orthodox principles.

The third article relates to Christ's descent into hell, and the modesty which the authors have expressed cannot be too much commended. In the reign of Edward VI. the article was very different from what it is at present, and savoured strong of popish superstition; but here the word hell is simply mentioned, without defining what is meant by it, leaving every one at liberty to judge for himself. Hell no where means a state of punishment in the writings of the ancient fathers, but merely the state of departed souls; and so it is in Luke xvi. where we find both Lazarus and the rich man; nay, Abraham himself was in hell. That is, they were confined in that place where all the souls, both of the righteous and the wicked, were to remain till the resurrection: but not in the same condition, because the wicked are in continual terror, and the righteous in joyful cheerful hope. But as different notions have been formed concerning our Saviour's descent into hell by the reformers abroad, so our worthy divines, who compiled the articles, made the words general, without imposing such a fixed sense upon them, as should set aside the right of private judgment.

The fourth article contains a declaration, that Christ rose from the dead, with the same body that was crucified on mount Calvary, and buried by Joseph of Arimathea. This is a grand article in the Christian religion; for had Christ not risen with the same body with which he suffered, then his followers could have no hopes of ever rising from the grave. As his descent into hell was to make them look with pleasure on the state of the dead, so his resurrection was to remove all fears from their hearts; for because Christ lives, so we shall live also. Nay, we may add further, that if we only in this life have hopes, we are of all men most miserable. For what is life? What are all the enjoyments of this world, which are of such a transitory perishing nature, were we not to have a firm persuasion that we are to exist hereafter?

The fifth article asserts the divinity of the Holy Ghost, which is another fundamental article of the Christian religion; for it is by the spirit of God we are sealed to the day of redemption, that is, till the resurrection-day, when the work of our salvation will be completed.

The sixth article is another of great importance, for it asserts, that in all things the sacred scriptures are sufficient to make men wise unto salvation. It is certain, however, that to assert that we take the scripture for the rule of our faith, is a very ambiguous expression; for it may be construed into any sense whatever. In this article the books of the Apocrypha, that are not to be found in the Hebrew, and were never acknowledged as canonical by the Jews, are totally excluded. They were, however, permitted to be read in the churches, for the example of life and instruction of manners, but this has been complained of by some other Protestant churches, because, in some of these books, there are several stories of too loose a nature to be read to Christian congregations. As it is our intention to adhere to the strictest impartiality, in giving an account of our Protestant brethren, so we shall take notice of such of the articles as exceptions have been made to, by whom made, and for what reason, leaving the reader to judge for himself.

The seventh article is a noble description of the true sense in which the Old Testament should be read; for it distinguishes between the ceremonial and moral law, pointing out what is binding on Christians, and what has been abolished by the sacrifice of our Redeemer.

The eighth article asserts the validity of the three creeds. This is one of those articles which has been much objected to by the people called Arians. It is certain, that the creed called the Apostles, may be subscribed by any Arian in the world; for although it asserts the divinity of the three persons in the ever blessed Trinity, yet it says nothing either concerning their unity or equality.

The Nicene creed was written against the Arians; for it asserts, in the most positive terms, the unity and equality of the three persons in the ever blessed Trinity. The third, commonly called the Creed of St. Athanasius, carries things much further than the Nicene, for it pronounces damatory clauses against all those who do not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity.

It is certain, that in the primitive church, every congregation had its own creed, but they never differed in any of those points that relate to the essentials of religion. They were the same in substance, but not in words. Some great men in the church of England have complained of the Athanasian Creed, particularly archbishop Tillotson, who, in a letter to bishop Burnet, says, "I wish we could get well rid of it."

The ninth article asserts the doctrine of original sin, that is, that all mankind are conceived and born in sin, so that no man can be accepted by his maker, without the interposition of a mediator. The doctrine of original sin was never denied in the church, till the time of Pelagius, who was learnedly confuted by St. Austin.

All the Protestant reformers acknowledged this doctrine till 1605, when Arminius, a Dutch divine, wrote against it, and was followed by several of like countrymen, which occasioned the calling the synod of Dort.

The tenth article asserts, that man cannot, by the freedom of his own will, nor by any powers he can exercise, obtain the divine favour; which article seems to have been uniformly believed by the primitive church. It is consequent to, and naturally follows, original sin; for if men come into the world in a state of corruption, consequently it must require almighty power and sovereign grace to renew them in the image of God, lost by their first parents' transgression.

The eleventh article asserts, that men are justified and made acceptable to God, through the imputation of Christ's righteousness. This article naturally follows the others that went before, for if we have no power to turn to God of ourselves, then there must be another person to save us from divine wrath; and certainly he who becomes our surety, transmits to us his merits, or his righteousness.

The twelfth article establishes the doctrine of good works; as flowing from faith in Jesus Christ. This article is expressed with all the caution imaginable; for certainly all good works flowing from a lively faith in Jesus Christ, are evidences of our being his disciples. It is very observable, that the sincere Christian, who performs the greatest number of good works, pays the least regard to them, nor does he put any confidence in them.

The thirteenth article asserts, that nothing can be acceptable to God, which does not flow from faith in Jesus Christ. This sentiment was, in general, believed by the primitive fathers; for we find only three of them of a different opinion, namely, Chrysostom, Justin Martyr, and Gregory Nazianzen.—The grand difficulty is to settle the dispute, whether the heathens, who lived virtuously, could be saved, although they had never been favoured with the light of the gospel? This question has been nobly answered by bishop Wilkins, in the last chapter of his book on natural religion. He says, "That the mercy of God, as well as all his other attributes, is a great depth; and as he has not told us what he will do with the heathens, so it is very improper that we should tell him what he ought to do." This we know, that none ever was, nor ever will be saved, but through the merits of Jesus Christ, who was the lamb slain from the foundation of the world; but in what manner God may communicate that blessing, is what we have no manner of business to pry into. Let us rest satisfied, that the judge of all the earth will do what is right.

The fourteenth article overthrows the popish notion of men being able to do more good works than they are commanded to perform in the gospel. This notion, which is what a sober heathen would have been ashamed of, was not heard of in the Christian church till many years after the time of Constantine the Great, nor have we any account of it till after the tenth century. All Protestants of whatever denomination, whether established by law or otherwise, are of the same opinion with regard to this article, as the church of England.

The fifteenth article asserts one of the grand fundamental doctrines of Christianity; namely, that Christ was in all things like unto us, sin only excepted; and so far as we know, this doctrine never was denied, either by the Roman Catholics, or Protestants; nor by any who ever assumed the name of Christians, except some of the ancient heretics.—And here it is necessary to observe, that the first reformers considered the justification of sinners through the imputation of Christ's righteousness, as a necessary consequence of his having taken our nature upon him. Nor does it appear from the whole scripture account, that it could be otherwise; but had Christ descended among us in his glory we could not have received any benefit from him, but it was the will of the Lord our God to make the captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings.

The sixteenth article relates to sin after baptism and militates against the popish notion of venial and mortal sins. It is well known, that every offence against the law of God is a sin; but the papists, in order to make a proper distinction for the sake of aggrandizing their clergy have told us, that those venial or rather trifling sins, may be atoned for by penance; whereas grosser crimes, which they call mortal sins, can never be forgiven. Here is a distinction without a given rule, and a conclusion drawn before the points were stated. In order to oppose this popish notion, the church of England is plain and explicit; for as all sins are offensive to God, so the blood of Christ is sufficient to cleanse the most impure sinner from all wickedness, and to render him acceptable to the Divine Being.

The seventeenth article relating solely to predestination; and it must be acknowledged, that it is here defined in a more modest and scriptural sense, than in any of the systems drawn up by the other reformers in Europe. It is certain, that some of the reformers abroad, when treating of this article made use of very unguarded expressions, which which led some of those, who were otherwise piously disposed, to despair, while the profane plunged themselves into deism. But here the church of England takes the middle line between the two extremes. She acknowledges the doctrine to be a scriptural one, but conscious of the weakness and depravity of human nature cautions her members to be upon their guard against enquiring too minutely into it.

The eighteenth article contains an enlarged sentiment indeed; for it declares that no man can be saved in consequence of his belonging to a particular sect or party, but that salvation alone is through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ. This article was extremely necessary to be carefully inserted, because, that when the Reformation took place, many of the people were so ignorant, that they thought they might be saved by the merits of the saints. Here the church of England, to her everlasting honour, has given the glory of men's salvation to that Redeemer who purchased peace and pardon for them with his blood. If Christ did not come into the world to save sinners, why did he die on Mount Calvary? If Christ Jesus is not the Redeemer of lost mankind, and the sole hope the sinner can repose any confidence in, then there is an end of our religion and our preaching is vain indeed.

The nineteenth article asserts, that the church of Christ consists of a body of persons, who willingly consent to be obedient to every rule laid down in the gospel. This was the more necessary, because the papists had asserted, that the whole of those who in words professed the Christian religion, were members of the church. This article further asserts that no church is, or can be infallible; and it gives us three instances, besides that of Rome. It is certain, that Christ will have a body of people in the world, who will worship him in all ages till his second coming: and it may be added further, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against this church; but then it must be remembered that there is no promise that this church shall be local. God has his churches frequently where men do not discern them.

The twentieth article asserts the power of the church in decreeing rights and ceremonies, and although this article is expressed in the most cautious terms, yet it has been the occasion of much controversy. The dissenters were exempted from subscribing to this article, and yet we cannot see with what propriety. Had the declaration here made been that the church's power was absolute, then we should have been in the same condition as the papists. But it is quite otherwise, for the church is not to declare any thing to be binding on the people that is contrary to the scriptures. Indeed, there does not seem to be any ambiguity in the words of the article, for all the popish errors are carefully guarded against.

The twenty-first article relates to general councils, which were originally called by the Roman emperors; but least too much confidence should be placed in their decrees, the church of England has declared, that they have no such things as infallibility in them. Composed of fallible men, they are liable to err, and therefore all their decrees must be tried by the test of sacred writ. It is certain, that general councils have erred, or at least, this much is certain, that they have not all been infallible; so far from it, we frequently meet with one council anathematizing another, and if this is the case, where is the truth to be found. General councils are nothing more than ecclesiastical bug-bears or scare-crows; but ancient usage had conferred upon them a sort of sanctity, embraced by the ignorant and nourished by designing priests.

The twenty-second article relates entirely to purgatory, a notion which the papists had embraced partly in consequence of not understanding what had been written by the primitive fathers, and partly to court favour with the heathens. It was necessary that our reformers, consistent with their characters as Protestants, should oppose this doctrine; for although it may, in the common acceptation of the word, have some affinity with Christianity, yet in general it is totally repugnant to it. It procures much money to the priests, whose heathenish tricks, preying upon the ignorance of the people, can at all times make them subservient to their purposes.

The twenty-third article relates solely to ordination, that is, that no person shall take upon him the office of a minister of the gospel till he is regularly appointed for that purpose. Bishop Stillingfleet, speaking of this article, says, there is no ambiguity in it; for he believed that every church might ordain their ministers in whatever manner they thought proper. It is certain, that there is necessity for a regular succession of ministers in the Christian church, and in the primitive times, notwithstanding the violences that took place, this was never interrupted. It may, however, be carried to a superstitious height, and therefore the church of England has expressed herself in very general terms concerning it.

The twenty-fourth article militates against the popish practice of having worship celebrated in a language which they do not understand. At what time this abominable practice took place does not appear, but we are certain it was not sooner than the tenth century. As a proof of this, there are several liturgies extant written in the sixth century, and in the language of those people for whom they were composed. Nay, the author asserts further, from his own knowledge, that there are several liturgies still extant in the Saxon language, written long before the use of Latin ones was imposed on the people.

The twenty-fifth article relates to the doctrine of sacraments in general, and gives as clear a definition of them as ever could have been given by any Protestant divines whatever. They are defined to be the symbols of an unseen object, which they certainly are. They are the representations, says the church, of something that happened, but not the object itself.

The article, however, admits of nothing as a sacrament, except what is pointed out to be such in scripture. Confirmation and penance, matrimony and extreme unction are wholly excluded from the number. This may serve to shew, that the design of the English reformers was to level their whole power against the strong bulwarks of popery, to strike at the root of their principles by which it had been long supported, and establish in room of it a system of religion consistent with the doctrine laid down in the New Testament.

The twenty-sixth article asserts that the efficacy of the sacraments taken, received in faith, does not depend on the merits of the person who administers them. To understand this article rightly, which does not in the least militate against the papists, we must attend to the following circumstance:—About the time of the Reformation, when light was beginning to spring up in the minds of men, there were several people in Europe who embraced very erroneous opinions. Among these were some Germans who came over to England, and taught that the sacraments were of no avail, nor could the person who received them obtain any benefit, unless the minister by whom they were given was a real believer.

This was a most destructive notion, for admitting it to be true, then there is an end of all divine institutions. When a pious Christian goes to receive the sacrament, how does he know but the person by whom it is administered is an hypocrite. And is the favour of God to be lost in consequence? No, God forbid.

It was to oppose this notion, that the article we are speaking of was written, and it is expressed in modest and manly terms. While it regulates the notions of men's putting any merit or confidence in the person who administers the sacrament, it, at the same time, enforces the necessity of ecclesiastical discipline, and points out the duty of ministers in the clearest manner. This article is agreed to by all Protestants whatever, but none of their confessions are expressed with so much modesty as here, where we do not meet with a single dogmatical expression.

The twenty-seventh article enforces the doctrine of baptism by water, as a sign of our adoption into the church, as sons of God by regeneration. The words of this article are so clearly and plainly expressed, that even a child may understand them as soon as he has learned his catechism. It concludes with enforcing infant baptism, not only as useful and agreeable to the word of God; but as necessary. It seems to have been on this principle, that the rubric was inserted in the office for the burial of the dead, which prohibits its being read over such as died unbaptized.

The twenty-eighth article treats of the Lord's Supper, as one of the sacraments of the Christian church. It is considered, in its genuine sense, as a sign of that charity which should always distinguish Christian churches. The popish doctrine of transubstantiation was totally abolished, and declared to be contrary to the nature of a sacrament. It is added further, consistent with the sense of the sacred scriptures, that as a sacrament is no more than a visible sign of something which it is to point out, so the bread and wine must be received by faith, as emblems of that body which was broken, and that blood which was shed for sinners.

The twenty-ninth article is a necessary consequence of the preceding one, for it is inseparably connected with it. It declares that no person can obtain any benefit from the partaking of the sacrament except the righteous. The article further expresses a strong caution to those who would partake of the sacrament to be on their guard; to be cautious in examining themselves, lest that which was intended to promote their spiritual interest, should even seal their condemnation. It is certain, that nothing is more dangerous than to trifle with and make light of religious ordinances. It hardens the mind, and in general the person embraces deism.

The thirtieth article enjoins the receiving the sacrament of both kinds, which was the practice of the Christian church from the death of Christ even so late as the tenth century. Nay, it was not then totally denied, for even two hundred years later, we find several writers standing up in defence of it. It is certain, that those who believe in transubstantiation, must consider the blood in the wafer, and were it not for that doctrine which contributes so much towards enlarging and aggrandizing the papal power, probably the papists would have granted the sacrament in both kinds to the laity at the Reformation.

The thirty-first article differs a little from the seventeenth, for it asserts that Christ died for the sins of the whole world, both original and actual, which notion was afterwards improved on by James Arminius. This article, as it differs somewhat from St. Austin's notions, so it is probable that our reformers borrowed the sentiment from the fathers of the ancient Greek church. It is certain, that this sentiment runs through the works of Chrysostom, Gregory, Nazianzen, Basil, and many others. And it is generally acknowledged, that the death of Christ, as it surpasses all human comprehension, so it may be of infinite efficacy; but here we leave the reader to judge for himself.

The thirty-second article relates to the marriage of the clergy, and condemns the popish doctrine on that subject. It is certain that no part of the New Testament enjoins celibacy to the clergy; and, during the first four centuries, we constantly find them mentioned as married men. If any lived single lives, they did so from choice, without being obliged thereto by any positive command. Celibacy among the clergy began to be encouraged about the sixth century, when the monastic life became in vogue, but still it was not imposed. Nay, so late as the tenth century, we find Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, entering into a violent struggle with the secular clergy, who refused to put away their wives. This struggle continued till the twelfth century, when we find Henry I. of England, giving countenance to celibacy among the clergy, and the consequence was, they kept their Limmers, an old word for prostitutes.

The thirty-third article relates to the sentence of excommunication, but it is not so clearly expressed as some of the others. By the proper judge that hath authority to publish this sentence, is undoubtedly meant the bishop's chancellor, who is generally a layman, at least he always acts under that character. By his authority here mentioned, must be understood that authority which he derives from common law; for in the primitive church, and among all other Protestants except in Europe, excommunication is considered as a spiritual action.

The thirty-fourth article relates to the traditions of the church, and it contains a clear definition of them. The latter part of this article has been much objected to, where it gives leave to all national churches to change their rites and ceremonies as often as they please, so as they be done to edifying. The word edifying has by some been considered as too loose and vague, because the papists tell us, that their ridiculous ceremonies are calculated for that purpose; but our reformers seem to have had nothing more in view than to establish what was consistent with the truth, and they looked upon all others as absurd and unnecessary.

The thirty-fifth article establishes the doctrine that the homilies were to be read. But as these venerable discourses are but little known in the present age, we shall take some notice of them.

The ignorance of many of the clergy, and the unsettled state of the church at the time of the Reformation, induced many of the greatest men at that time, to draw up a set of discourses, in the form of sermons, on the principal points of the Christian religion. One of those were to be read every Sunday in the parish churches, till such time as the clergy could learn to compose sermons for themselves. This was of great service to the cause of truth at the time of the Reformation, for these homilies, having been drawn up very judiciously by men of learning and piety, they prevented the people from relapsing into popery, and established the principles of religion on their minds.

The thirty-sixth article asserts, the necessity and utility of episcopal ordination. This sentiment is founded on a notion, that there had always been in the church a regular succession of clergy from the days of the apostles; some great divines however, were at that time of a different opinion, particularly Jewel, bishop of Salisbury, and Grindal, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Many of the inferior clergy contented that it was sufficient for presbyters to ordain presbyters; and as these pretended to promote a purer Reformation than had hitherto taken place in the church, they were called in derision Puritans. This article is not so much disapproved of by the Dissenters as some are apt to imagine, for they allow the validity of English ordinations although they do not consider it necessary to impose them.

The thirty-seventh article establishes the supremacy of the civil magistrate in all things, and over all persons, whether civil or ecclesiastical, and this has occasioned much contention. It is certain, however, it was in some measure necessary at the Reformation, because the clergy had been long accustomed to call the pope their head. Some princes indeed, made a bad use of this act, by turning out bishops whenever they pleased; but nothing of that sort has happened for a considerable time. Indeed, it lodges a vast power in the crown, but while that power is not abused, we ought not to complain. All the power granted in this article to the king over the clergy is of a civil nature, for he is not permitted to administer divine ordinances, but merely to preserve the external peace of the church, and prevent factious clergymen from disturbing government.

The thirty-eighth article is levelled against the German Anabaptists, who sprung up at that time, many of whom, as we have already mentioned, came over to England. These people asserted, that all Christians should have their goods in common, and that none should be richer than the others. This was owing to a mistaken notion concerning the first Christians in Jerusalem. This was never enjoyed by the apostles, for Ananias and Saphira were told by Peter, that they might have kept their estate to themselves. It is said, we acknowledge, that they had all things in common; but it is no where said they were commanded to have them so.

The Christians at Jerusalem were warmed with the love of the truth; they loved each other; they had but a very precarious title to their possessions, while they were hated by the Jews and persecuted by the Romans. The afflictions of many of their brethren were great; the Jews considered them as blasphemers, and the Romans treated them as rebels. It was, therefore, necessary that they should assist each other; but when the cause was removed, the effect naturally ceased. We have a strong proof of this in several of the apostolical epistles, where the rich are exhorted to be charitable to the poor; and had there been an equality of property, there would have been no need to this exhortation.

The thirty-ninth and last article, relates to a Christian man's oath. This article, although it does not expressly say so, seems likewise to have been levelled against the Anabaptists; who not considering properly the meaning of our Lord's words, "Swear not at all," declared that all oaths were, in their own nature, sinful; whereas, all that Christ had in view was to put an end to two things, which were then much encouraged by the Pharisees: First, the frequency of swearing in common conversation, when there was no necessity for it; and, secondly, swearing by heaven, by the temple, the altar, the sacrifice, and such other things as were not objects of divine worship. The apostle, in writing to the Hebrews, explains every doubt concerning this point. God swore by himself, because he could swear by none greater, that was, that the Messiah should be priest for ever after the order of Melchizedeck. And the same apostle adds, that an oath is necessary to put an end to controversies among men. If it was not for the solemnity of an oath, there would be an end of civil society; for such is the state of human nature, that although men may sometimes perjure themselves, yet there is generally a dread on their minds, when they go into a court of justice to swear.

Such are the articles of religion in the church of England, and when we consider all the circumstances attending the framing of them, we are really led to admire them. Let us but reflect, that the authors of them had been brought up in popish superstition; were proscribed and persecuted by queen Mary; obliged to take shelter in foreign countries, where they met with men of different sentiments.— And yet these men returned and compiled a system of divinity as little liable to exceptions, if not less so, than any other systems framed by different Protestant churches. In perusing the articles it appears, that in all those points which have been matter of dispute, and occasioned much controversy, the English reformers have conducted themselves with the greatest moderation. If a few expressions may happen to appear ambiguous, even the ambiguity gives peace of mind to the subscriber, because in consequence thereof, he can put what sense he pleases upon them. The church of England allows of no infallibility in human beings, and therefore as her fundamental articles were written by men, so if any sentiment should displease the person who comes to subscribe them, he is at liberty to refrain, so as he gives up all pretensions to the temporal emoluments annexed to the subscription.

The next thing in order is the worship used in the church of England, and here we shall first take notice of the Liturgy, or Common Prayer in general, and then proceed to consider its different parts, omitting only the catechism, as that has been fully explained in our account of the articles. For all catechisms are no more than articles of religion, or public confessions of faith, drawn up in a plain easy manner, for the use of youth to be learned at school.

Before the Reformation, the Liturgy was only in Latin being a collection of prayers made up partly of some ancient forms used in the primitive church, and partly of some others of a later original, accommodated to the Romish religion, at that time the religion of England. But, when the nation in king Henry VIIIth's time, was disposed to a reformation, it was thought necessary both to have the service in the English or vulgar tongue, and to correct and amend the Liturgy, by purging it of those gross corruptions which had gradually crept into it.

And, first the convocation appointed a committee, A. D. 1537, to compose a book, which was entitled, The Godly and Pious Institution of a Christian Man, containing a declaration of the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Seven Sacraments, &c. This book was again published in 1540, with corrections and alterations, under the title of, A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.—In the same year, a committee of bishops and other divines was appointed by king Henry VIII. to reform the rituals and offices of the church: and the next year the king and clergy ordered the prayers for processions, and litanies to be put into English, and to be publicly used. Afterward in 1545, came out the King's Primer, containing the whole Morning and Evening Prayer in English, not very different from what is in our present Book of Common Prayer. Thus far the Reformation of our Liturgy was carried in the reign of Henry VIII.

In the year 1548, the first of king Edward VI. the convocation unanimously declared, that the communion ought to be administered in both kinds: whereupon an act of parliament was made, ordering it to be so administered. Then a committee of bishops, and other learned divines, was appointed to compose a uniform order of communion, according to the rules of scripture, and the use of the primitive church. The committee accordingly met in Windsor-castle, and drew up such a form. This made way for a new commission, empowering the same persons to finish the whole Liturgy, by drawing up public offices for Sundays and holy days, for baptism, confirmation, matrimony, burial, and other special occasions.

The committee appointed to compose this Liturgy, were:—

1. Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury.
2. Thomas Goodrick, bishop of Ely.
3. Henry Holbeck, bishop of Lincoln.
4. George Day, bishop of Chichester.
5. John Ship, bishop of Hereford.
6. Thomas Thirlby, bishop of Westminster.
7. Nicholas Ridley, bishop of Rochester, and afterwards of London.
8. Dr. Wm. May, dean of St. Paul's.
9. Dr. John Taylor, afterwards bishop of Lincoln.
10. Dr. Simon Haynes, dean of Exeter, and master of Queen's Coll. Camb.
11. Dr. John Redman, dean of Westminster, and master of Trin. Coll. Camb.
12. Dr. Richard Cox, dean of Christ's Church, Oxon.
13. Mr. Thomas Robinson, archdeacon of Leicester.

Our excellent Liturgy, thus compiled, was revised and approved by the archbishops, bishops, and clergy of both the provinces of Canterbury and York, and then confirmed by the king and three estates in parliament, A. D. 1549.

But, about the end of the year 1550, exceptions were taken against some parts of this book, which were thought to savour too much of superstition, Archbishop Cranmer therefore proposed a new review, and, to this end, called in the assistance of Martin Bucer and Peter Martyr, two foreigners, whom he had invited over from the troubles in Germany. These, not understanding the English tongue, were furnished with Latin translations of the Liturgy. The principal alterations occasioned by this second review were, the addition of the sentences; exhortation, confession, and absolution, at the beginning of the morning and evening services, which, in the first Common Prayer book, began with the Lord's Prayer; the addition of the Commandments at the beginning of the communion-office; the removing of some rites and ceremonies retained in the former book, such as the use of oil in confirmation, the unction of the sick, prayers for departed souls, the invocation of the Holy Ghost at the consecration of the eucharist, and the prayer of oblation that used to follow it; the omitting the rubric, that ordered water to be mixed with the wine; with several other less material variations. The habits also, which were prescribed in the former book, were in this laid aside; and lastly, a rubric was added at the end of the communion office, to explain the reason of kneeling at the sacrament.—The Liturgy, thus revised and altered, was again confirmed by parliament, A. D. 1551, with this declaration, that the alterations made in it proceeded from curiosity rather than any worthy cause. But both this and the former act in 1548, were repealed in the first year of queen Mary, as injurious to the Romish religion, which she was resolved to restore.

Upon the accession of queen Elizabeth, the act of repeal was set aside, and several learned divines appointed to make another review of king Edward's Liturgies.

These (according to Cambden and Strype) were:—

1. Dr. Matthew Parker, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury.
2. Dr. Richard Cox, afterwards bishop of Ely.
3. Dr. May.
4. Dr. Bill.
5. Dr. James Pilkington, afterwards bishop of Durham.
6. Sir Thomas Smith.

It was debated at first, which of the two books of king Edward should be received. At length the second was pitched upon, and confirmed by parliament, which commanded it to be used, "With one alteration or addition of certain lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Litany altered and corrected, and two sentences added in the delivery of the sacrament to the communicants, and none other, or otherwise."

The alteration in the Litany here mentioned was the leaving out the deprecation, from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities, and adding these words to the petition for the sovereign, "Strengthen in the true worshipping of thee, in righteousness and holiness of life."—The two sentences, added in the delivery of the sacrament, were; "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. and the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c." which were taken out of king Edward's first book, whereas, in the second book, these sentences were left out, and in the room of them were used, "Take, eat, or drink this," with what follows; but now in queen Elizabeth's book, both these forms were united.

There are some other variations in this book from the second of king Edward. The first rubric, concerning the situation of the chancel, and the proper place for reading divine service, was altered; the habits enjoined by the first book of king Edward, and forbid by the second, were now restored; at the end of the Litany was added a prayer for the sovereign, and another for the clergy. Lastly, the rubric, that was added at the end of the communion-office, in king Edward's second book, against our Saviour's corporeal presence in the sacrament, was left out in this. This was done, that the aforesaid notion might remain as a speculative opinion, not determined; it being the queen's design to unite the nation, as near as possible, in one faith.

In this state the Liturgy continued without farther alteration, till the first year of king James I. when a conference was held at Hampton court, between that prince with archbishop Whitgift, and other bishops and divines, on the one side, and Dr. Reynolds, with some other Puritans, on the other: the result of which was, the adding some forms of thanksgiving at the end of the Litany, and an addition to the catechism in relation to the sacraments. Also, in the rubric at the beginning of the office for private baptism, the words Lawful minister were inserted, to prevent midwives and laymen from presuming to baptize; with one or two more small alterations.

But, immediately after the restoration, king Charles II. at the request of several of the Presbyterian ministers, issued out a commission for a new review of the Liturgy, empowering twelve of the bishops and twelve Presbyterian divines to make such reasonable and necessary alterations as they should jointly agree upon. Nine coadjutors were added on each side, to supply the place of any of the twelve principals, who should happen to be absent. Their names are these:

These commissioners had several meetings at the Savoy, but to very little purpose; the Presbyterians reviving all the old scruples of the Puritans against the Liturgy, and adding several new ones of their own. Baxter had the assurance to affirm, that our Liturgy was too bad to be mended, and confidently pretended to compose a new one, which he thought proper to offer to the bishops. Upon this the conference broke up, without any thing being done, except that some particular alterations were proposed by the episcopal divines; which, the May following, were considered and agreed to by the whole clergy in convocation. The principal of these alterations were, that several lessons in the Calendar were changed for others more proper of the days; the prayers for particular occasions were disjoined from the Litany, and the two prayers to be used in the Ember-weeks, the prayer for the parliament, that for all conditions of men, and the general thanksgiving, were added. Several of the collects were altered; the epistles and gospels were taken out of the last translation of the bible, being read before according to the old translation. The office for baptism of those of riper years, and the forms of prayer used at sea, were added. In a word, the whole Liturgy was then brought to the state in which it now stands, and was unanimously subscribed by both houses of convocation of both provinces, on Friday, Dec. 20, 1661. And being brought to the house of lords the March following, both houses very readily passed an act for its establishment; and the earl of Clarendon, then lord Chancellor, was ordered to return the thanks of the lords to the bishops and clergy, for their care and industry shewn in the review of it.

We shall subjoin Dr. Comber's character of the Liturgy of the church of England. "No church was ever blessed with so comprehensive, so exact, and so inoffensive a Liturgy, as ours; which is so judiciously contrived, that the wisest may exercise at once their knowledge and devotion, and yet so plain, that the most ignorant may pray with understanding; so full, that nothing is omitted, which ought to be asked in public; and so particular, that it compriseth most things which we would ask in private; and yet so short, as not to tire any that have true devotion. Its doctrine is pure and primitive; its ceremonies so few and innocent, that most of the Christian world agree in them; its method is exact and natural; its language significant and perspicuous, most of the words and phrases being taken out of the holy scripture, and the rest are the expressions of the first and purest ages, and in the opinion of the most impartial and excellent Grotius, who was no member of, nor had any obligation to this church, the English Liturgy comes so near the primitive pattern, that none of the reformed churches can compare with it."

Again he says, "In the prayers a scholar can discern close logic, pleasing rhetoric, pure divinity, and the very marrow of the ancient doctrine and discipline; and yet all made so familiar, that the unlearned may safely say, Amen."

As in the ancient church the reader always spoke a few words to the people before he began the service, so in the church of England, one verse of the sacred scripture is repeated. There is something praise-worthy in beginning divine worship with some part of sacred scripture, because it is giving preference to inspiration above every thing human.—It is really bestowing honour on God, and it is well known, that the sentences are most judiciously collected. They all intimate something leading to the confession of sins; and these are followed by the exhortation. The confession that follows is expressed in very striking language, and such as is easy to be retained in the memory.

It has been much controverted by several other Protestants, whether a minister should pronounce the absolution. But if any person reads this form, he will find it is no more than a declaration that God will pardon sincere penitents. It supposes, that those who have on their knees confessed their sins, are contrite and penitent, which gives them encouragement to hope for mercy.

It has been objected, that the Lord's Prayer is too frequently repeated, so as to make it like a charm; but with respect to the controversy, we shall not meddle with it, leaving every man at liberty to judge for himself. And here it is necessary to observe, that every minister in the church of England may pray extempore before sermon if he pleases, only it is reckoned necessary to conclude with the Lord's Prayer. If this was more attended to, it would remove many objections that are constantly made against formality and repetition. The marquis of Halifax, who served four sovereigns in the highest departments of the state, recommended this practice; and he used to say, that when he knew a minister's life to be pious, and heard him pour out the effusions of his heart before sermon in extemporary prayer, it always affected him, and made a lasting impression on his mind, by charming him with the love of religion.

The Arians and Socinians make strong objections to the greatest part of the Common Prayer, because it every where asserts the unity of the three persons in the ever blessed Trinity: but these objections have been ably answered by many eminent divines, and also by laymen.

Another objection was made to the Litany by the Presbyterians at the Savoy conference, particularly these words, "From fornication and all other deadly sins," &c. Now by deadly sin has been generally understood the popish doctrine of mortal sin, but surely the compilers of the Liturgy never meant so. This will appear the more probable, when we consider that fornication is here called a deadly sin; for what man will assert that sin to be unpardonable? All that seems to be meant is, that as fornication is a breach of an absolute precept, so it is dangerous in any person to commit it as well as other sins of a similar nature. But we think this need not be enlarged on; we shall only add, that it has been objected, that some of the collects have been taken out of the Romish mass book. If it is allowed that the collects are good, then the objection falls to the ground; for it might, with equal propriety, be objected, that we should not be called Christians, because the papists call themselves by that name; and so on in thousands of other instances. Let us keep all they have good among them; and let what is useless be retained by themselves. Reformation may be carried too far at some particular periods. Probably the first reformers thought so, and therefore they left these things for a more favourable opportunity. As for Litanies, we shall here observe what many learned men have said of them.

In the Christian sense of the word, a Litany is a solemn form of supplication to God. Eusebius, speaking of Constantine's custom of making his solemn addresses to God in his tent, says, he endeavoured to renew God propitious to him by his supplications and Litanies. And Arcadius, in one of his laws against heretics, forbids them to hold profane assemblies in the city, either by night or by day, to make their Litany. At that time, the public prayers, hymns, and psalms, were all comprised under the general name of Litany. Afterwards the word came to signify a peculiar sort of prayers used in the church; concerning the original of which learned men are not agreed.

At first, the use of Litanies was not fixed to any stated time, but they were employed only as exigencies required. They were observed, in imitation of the Ninevites, with ardent supplications and fastings, to avert the threatening judgments of fire, earthquakes, inundations, or hostile invasions. The days on which they were used, were called Rogation-days. Several of these days were appointed by the canons of different councils, till the seventeenth council of Toledo decreed that Litanies should be used in every month throughout the year. And so, by degrees, these solemn supplications came to be used weekly, on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days in all churches.

As to the form in which Litanies are made, namely, in short petitions by the priest, with responses by the people. St. Chrysostom derives the custom from the primitive ages, when the priest began, and uttered by the spirit some things fit to be prayed for, and the people joined the intercessions, saying, "We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord." When the miraculous gifts of the spirit began to cease, they wrote down several of these forms, which were the original of our modern Litanies.—St. Ambrose has left us one, agreeing in many things with that of our own church.

About the year 400, Litanies began to be used in processions, the people walking barefoot, and repeating them with great devotion. It is pretended several countries were delivered from great calamities by this means. About the year 600 Gregory the Great, out of all the Litanies extant, composed the famous seven-fold Litany, by which Rome, it is said, was delivered from a grievous mortality.—This has been a pattern to all the western churches since; to which ours of the church of England comes nearer than that of the Romish missal, in which later popes have inserted the invocation of saints, which our reformers justly expunged. These processional Litanies having occasioned much scandal, it was decreed that the Litanies for the future should only be used within the walls of the church.

The days appointed by the 15th canon of our church, for using the Litany, are Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient fasting days of the primitive church; to which, by the rubric, Sundays are added as being the days of the greatest assembly for divine service. Before the last review of the common prayer, the Litany was a distinct service by itself, and used some time after the morning prayer was over. At present it is made one office with the morning service, being ordered to be read after the third collect for grace, instead of the intercessional prayers in the daily service.

By the fifteenth canon, whenever the Litany is read, every householder dwelling within half a mile of the church is to come, or send one at least of his household, to join with the minister in prayers.

There is one great advantage to Christians in the worship used by the church of England, and that is the reading of the psalms and lessons, and it is surprising that this should not take place in all Protestant churches. The advantage is not only to those who cannot read, but it refreshes the memories of the best scholars whatever. Nay, it has been asserted, that were the scriptures not read in our churches, we should become in a short time such barbarians as our ancestors were two thousand years ago. But let us here consider the practice of the ancient church on this head, and then take notice of our own, that the reader may make the comparison.

In the ancient church, the reading of the scriptures was one part of the service of the catechumens, at which all sorts of persons were allowed to be present for instruction. The lessons were always two at least, and sometimes three or four. The author of the constitutions speaks of four lessons, two out of Moses and the prophets, and two out of the gospels and epistles. The church of Rome seems to have been a little singular in this matter: for, till the time of pope Celestine, about 400 years after Christ, they read no lessons out of the Old Testament, but only out of the New; whereas in all other churches, they read lessons out of both.

The method of reading the scriptures seems always to have been governed by some rule, though this might vary in different churches. St. Austin tells us, there were some lessons so fixed and appropriated to certain times and seasons, that no others might be read in their stead. He particularly instances in the festival of Easter, when for four days successively the history of Christ's resurrection was read out of the four gospels. In like manner, on all other festivals, they read those parts of scripture, which related to the particular festival.

Particular books of scripture had their particular seasons of the year, in which they were more especially read. Thus the Acts of the Apostles was read immediately before the feast of Pentecost, and in Lent they usually read the book of Genesis. The book of Job and Jonah were both read in the Passion-week, and the prophet Hosea was read on the Vigil of our Saviour's passion. Though we have no complete Lctionarium, or Calendar of Lessons extant, yet we are sure their reading the scriptures was some way methodized, and brought under rule. The first Calendar of this kind is thought to be Hippolytus's Canon Paschalis, which Scaliger and Gothofred take to be a rule appointing lessons for the festivals. But Bucherius, and others, give another account of it, which leaves the matter uncertain. There is a Lctionarium under the name of St. Jerome; but the best critics look upon it as counterfeit. Some time after, there were several books of this kind composed for the use of the French churches. It is observable, however, that the lessons were sometimes appointed by the bishops at discretion. Ferrarius gives several instances of this practice out of St. Austin, and St. Chrysostus.

As to the persons whose office it was to read the lessons, it is probable, that during the two first centuries, they were the deacons, or in imitation of the Jewish church, such as the bishop or president for that time appointed. But, in the time of St. Cyprian, it was the peculiar office of the readers, who were become an inferior order of the clergy. The reader, before he began to read, was used to say, Pax vobis, Peace be with you, which was the usual form of salutation at the entrance of the offices in the church. This custom continued till the third council of Carthage made an order to the contrary, appointing that it should be said by some other minister. St. Chrysostom mentions two other customs introductory to the reading and hearing the scriptures. The first is the deacon enjoining silence and attention before the reader began. The second the reader's beginning every lesson with, "Thus saith the Lord."

There is a distinction made by some between the longer and shorter lessons, used in the ancient church. The longer lessons are said to be used at the long nocturnal or antelucan service, and the shorter at the other canonical hours of prayer. But this distinction could have no place till the canonical hours were settled; which was not till the fourth or fifth century. It is probable, these shorter lessons were no other than the psalms; or antiphonal hymns collected out of the psalms, for the service of the several hours of devotion.

It is observable, that, in some churches, other books were allowed to be read by way of lessons and instructions, besides the canonical scriptures, such as the passions of the martyrs on their proper festivals, the homilies of the fathers, the epistles and tracts of pious men, and the letters communicatory of one church to another, with other writings of the like nature. Eusebius tells us, the book called Hermes Paster was anciently read in the church. Dionisius bishop of Corinth, says, they read Clemens Romanus's first epistle to the Corinthians, and another written by Soter, bishop of Rome. Sozomen tells us, the Revelations of Peter were read once a year, on Good-Friday, in many of the churches of Palestine. Many other instances are to be met with in ecclesiastical authors.

Our own church in the choice of lessons, proceeds as follows. For the first lesson on ordinary days, she directs, to begin at the beginning of the year with Genesis and so to continue on, till all the books of the Old Testament are read over; only omitting the Chronicles (which are for the most part the same with the books of Samuel and Kings) and other particular chapters in other books, either for the same reason, or because they contain genealogies, names of persons, or places, or other matters less profitable for ordinary hearers.

The course of the first lessons for Sundays is regulated after a different manner. From Advent to Septuagesima Sunday, some particular chapters of Isaiah are appointed to be read, because that book contains the clearest prophecies concerning Christ. Upon Septuagesima Sunday Genesis is begun, because that book which treats of the fall of man, and the severe judgment of God on the world for sin, best suits with a time of penance and mortification. After Genesis follow select chapters out of the books of the Old Testament, as they lie in order; observing that, on festival Sundays, such as Easter, Whitsunday, &c. the particular history relating to the day is appointed to be read. On the festivals of the saints called saints-days, the church appoints lessons out of the moral books, such as Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and Wisdom, as containing excellent precepts and instructions for the conduct of life.

As to the second lessons, the church observes the same course both on Sundays and week-days: reading the gospels and Acts of the Apostles in the morning, and the epistles in the evening, in the same order they stand in the New Testament; excepting on saints-days and holidays, when such lessons are appointed, as either explain the mystery, relate the history, or apply the example to us.—

Thus, by the prudence of our church, the Old Testament is read over once, and the new thrice in the year, some particular parts of both, for particular reasons, excepted.

In treating of the whole public service used in the church of England, we are under the necessity of taking notice of all the objections commonly made to it by all denominations of Christians. This is the more necessary, because, by taking these things in a proper point of view with candour, it may be the means of settling some of our unhappy controversies, or at least making Protestants love each other as brethren.

It is well known that there are holy days ordered to be observed in the church of England, yet they are not imposed, being left wholly to people's own discretion. If any of these holy days have been used to a bad purpose, the fault does not lay in them, but in the depravity of human nature. Did God become man for us, and must we become beasts? An afternoon's debauch will follow very ill after a forenoon's sermon; and therefore those who keep days holy, should keep them holy to the Lord. The first and most solemn of the times observed in the church of England, is Lent.

The word Lent, in the old Saxon language, signifies the Spring, and is therefore used to denote this holy season, which belongs to that part of the year, it being observed by Christians as a time of humiliation before Easter, the great festival of our Saviour's resurrection.

The observation of this fast is of very great antiquity in the Christian church. The Latins call it Quadragesima, which word denotes the number forty; whence this fast was called Quadragesimal, but whether from its being a fast of forty days, or only forty hours, is matter of dispute among the learned. They of the Romish church, and some of the Protestant communion, maintain that it was always a fast of forty days, and, as such, of apostolical institution. Others think it was only of ecclesiastical institution, and it was variously observed in different churches, and grew by degrees from a fast of forty hours to a fast of forty days. This latter is the sentiment of Morton, bishop Taylor, du Moulin, Daille, and others.

The church seems to have limited the term of fasting to forty days, in regard either to the forty days, in which God drowned the world; or to the forty days, in which the children of Israel did penance in the wilderness; or to the forty stripes, wherewith malefactors were to be corrected; or because Moses fasted this number of days, as did Elias the same space of time; or because the Ninevites were allowed precisely as many days for repentance; or, lastly, and most probably, because our blessed Saviour himself, when he was pleased to fast, observed the same length of time. For some, or all, of these reasons, the church used this number of days, as the common solemn number belonging to extraordinary humiliation.

As to the original of this Quadragesimal fast, learned men are inclined to believe, it was not instituted by the apostles, at least not as any necessary rule obliging all men to fast forty days; and that for the following reasons: First, because there is some probability, that at first it was only a fast of forty hours, or the time that our Saviour lay in the grave, that is, the Friday and Saturday before Easter.— This appears from Tertullian and Irenæus, who speak of Christians observing those days, in which the bridegroom was taken from them, agreeable to these words of our Saviour; "The days will come that the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." However, it must be confessed, these authors speak of more days than two as observed in many churches, only with this difference, that the first were observed as more necessary, being founded on the words of Christ himself, and the others were at the church's free liberty and choice, as being purely of ecclesiastical institution.

Secondly, because, if this fast was of apostolical institution, it is scarce accountable how such a great variety in point of time should immediately happen in the observation of it; some churches keeping it only three weeks, some six, some seven, and yet none of them hitting upon the precise number of forty days. It is observable however, that they all agreed in calling this fast Quadragesimal, and assigned different reasons for this appellation.

Lent consisted not of above thirty-six fasting-days in any church; for though some churches kept it six weeks, which make forty-two days, yet all Sundays were excepted out of the fast; and then six days being subducted, there remained but thirty-six days of fasting. Who first added Ash-Wednesday, and the other three days to the beginning of Lent, in the Roman church to make them forty, is not agreed among their own writers. Some say, it was the work of Gregory the Great; but others ascribe it to Gregory II. who lived about an hundred years after, in the beginning of the VIIIth century.

The general design of this institution is set forth by St. Chrysostom: "Why do we fast these forty days? Many therefore were used to come to the communion indevoutly and inconsiderately, especially at this time, when Christ first gave it to his disciples. Therefore our forefathers, considering the mischiefs arising from such careless approaches, meeting together, appointed forty days for fasting and prayer, and hearing of sermons, and for holy assemblies; that all men, in these days, being carefully purified by prayers and alms deeds, and fasting, and watching, and tears, and confession of sins, and other the like exercises, might come according to their capacity, with a pure conscience, to the holy table."

But if we enquire more particularly into the reasons of instituting the Lent-fast, we shall find them to be these following: First, the apostles' sorrow for the loss of their master. For this reason the ancients observed those two days, in which our Saviour lay in the grave, with the greatest strictness. Secondly, the declension of Christian piety from its first and primitive fervour. Thirdly, that the catechumens might prepare themselves for baptism, and the penitents for absolution; Easter being one of the settled times of baptizing the catechumens and absolving the penitents.

This solemn season of fasting was universally observed by all Christians, though with a great liberty, and a just allowance for men's infirmities; and this was in a great measure left to their own discretion. If men were in health, and able to bear it, the rule and custom was for them to observe it. On the other hand, bodily infirmity and weakness were always admitted as a just apology for their non-observance of it.

The manner of observing Lent, among those who were piously disposed to observe it, was to abstain from all food till evening. Whence it is natural to conclude, that the pretence of keeping Lent only by a change of diet from flesh to fish is but a mock fast, and an innovation utterly unknown to the ancients, whose Lent-fast was a strict and rigorous abstinence from all food till the evening. Their refreshment was only a supper, and then it was indifferent whether it was flesh, or any other food, provided it was used with sobriety and moderation. But there was no general rule about this matter, as appears from the story which Sozomen tells of Spiridon, bishop of Trimitus, in Cyprus; that a stranger once happening to call upon him in Lent, he, having nothing in his house but a piece of pork, ordered that to be dressed and set before him; but the stranger refused to eat flesh, saying he was a Christian; Spiridon replied, for that very reason thou oughtest not to refuse it, for the word of God has pronounced all things clean to them that are clean.

Lent was thought the proper season for exercising more abundantly all sorts of charity. Thus what they spared from their own bodies, by abridging them of a meal, was usually given to the poor. They likewise employed their vacant hours in visiting the sick and imprisoned, in entertaining strangers, and reconciling differences. The imperial laws forbid all prosecution of men in criminal actions, which might bring them to corporal punishment and torture during this whole season. Lent was a time of more than ordinary strictness and devotion; and therefore, in many of the great churches, they had religious assemblies for prayer and preaching every day. They had also frequent communions at this time, at least on every sabbath or Lord's day. All public games and stage-plays were prohibited at this season; as also the celebration of all festivals, birth-days and marriages, as unsuitable to the present occasion.

These were the common rules observed in keeping the Lent fast, when it was come to the length of forty days. But there was one week, called the Hebdomas magna; or the great week before Easter, which they observed with a greater strictness and solemnity than all the rest. This is usually called the Passion-week, because it was the week in which our Saviour suffered.

The Christians of the Greek church observe four Lents. The first commences on the fifteenth of November, or forty days before Christmas. The second is our Lent, which immediately precedes Easter. The third begins the week after Whitsunday, and continues till the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul. The number of days therefore comprized in this Lent is not settled and determined, for they are more or less according as Whitsunday falls sooner or later. Their fourth lent commences the first of August, and lasts no longer than till the fifteenth. These Lents are observed with great strictness and austerity. On Saturdays and Sundays they indulge themselves in drinking and using oil, which are prohibited on other days.

Lent was first commanded to be observed in England by Ercombert, seventh king of Kent, before the year 800. No meat was formerly to be eaten in Lent, but by licence, under certain penalties.—And butchers were not to kill flesh in Lent, except for the victualling of ships, &c.

The next thing to be taken notice of, is Baptism, the first sacrament in the Christian church. As to what manner this is observed in the church of Rome, we have already taken notice in our accounts of the popish ceremonies. We know of but two objections that ever have been made to the form of baptism, as practised in the church of England, but these will be taken notice of afterwards.

We have already seen, that the church of England defines baptism to be, not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened; but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly, are grafted into the church; The promises of the forgiveness of sin, of our adoption to be the sons of God, by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed, faith is confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer to God. She adds, that the baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ.

In the rubrics of her liturgy, she prescribes, that baptism be administered only on Sundays and holy-days, except in cases of necessity. She requires sponsors for infants; for every male child two god-fathers and one godmother; and for every female two godmothers and one godfather. We find this provision made by a constitution of Edmond, archbishop of Canterbury, A. D. 1236; and in a synod held at Worcester, A. D. 1240. By the xxixth canon of our church no parent is to be admitted to answer as godfather to his own child.

The form of administering baptism is too well known to require a particular account to be given of it; and we shall only observe some of the more material differences between the form, as it stood in the first liturgy of king Edward, and that in our Common Prayer Book at present. First, in that of king Edward, we meet with a form of exorcism, founded upon the like practice of the primitive church, which our reformers left out, when they took a review of the liturgy in the 5th and 6th of the king.. It is as follows:—

Then let the priest, looking upon the children, say,—

“I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou come out, and depart from these infants, whom our Lord Jesus Christ hath vouchsafed to call to his holy baptism, to be made members of his body, and of his holy congregation. Therefore, thou cursed spirit, remember thy sentence, remember thy judgment, remember the day to be at hand, wherein thou shalt burn in everlasting fire, prepared for thee and thy angels. And presume not hereafter to exercise any tyranny towards these infants whom Christ hath bought with his precious blood, and by this his holy baptism called to be of his flock.”

The form of consecrating the water did not make a part of the office, in king Edward's Liturgy, as it does in the present, because the water in the font was changed, and consecrated but once a month. The form likewise itself was something different from that we now use, and was introduced with a short prayer, that Jesus Christ upon whom, when he was baptized, the Holy Ghost came down in the likeness of a dove, and would send down the same Holy spirit, to sanctify the fountain of baptism; which prayer was afterwards left out, at the second review of it.

By king Edward's first book, the minister is to dip the child in the water thrice; first dipping the right side; secondly the left; the third time dipping the face towards the font. This three-fold immersion was a very ancient practice in the Christian church, and used in honour of the holy Trinity; though some later writers say it was done to represent the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, together with his three days' continuance in the grave. Afterwards, the Arians making an ill use of it, by persuading the people that it was used to denote, that the three persons in the Trinity, were three distinct substances, the orthodox left it off, and used only one single immersion.

By the first Common Prayer of king Edward, after the child was baptised, the godfathers and godmothers were to lay their hands upon it, and the minister was to put on him the whole vestment, commonly called the Chrysome, and to say, "Take this white vesture, as a token of the innocency, which, by God's grace, in this holy sacrament of baptism, is given unto thee; and for a sign whereby thou art admonished, so long as thou livest, to give thyself to innocency of living, that, after this transitory life, thou mayest be partaker of the life everlasting. Amen." As soon as he had pronounced these words, he was to anoint the infant on the head, saying, "Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath regenerated thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and hath given unto thee remission of all thy sins, may he vouchsafe to anoint thee with the unction of his holy spirit, and bring thee to the inheritance of everlasting life. Amen." This was manifestly done in imitation of the practice of the primitive church.

The custom of sprinkling children, instead of dipping them in the font, which at first was allowed, in case of the weakness, or sickness of the infant, has so far prevailed, that immersion is at length quite excluded. What principally tended to confirm the practice of affusion, or sprinkling, was, that several of our English divines, flying into Germany and Switzerland, during the bloody reign of queen Mary, and returning home when queen Elizabeth came to the crown, brought back with them a great zeal for the Protestant churches beyond sea, where they had been sheltered and received; and, having observed that, at Geneva, and other places, baptism was administered by sprinkling, they thought they could not do the church of England a greater piece of service than by introducing a practice dictated by so great an oracle as Calvin. This, together with the coldness of our northern climate, was what contributed to banish entirely the practice of dipping infants in the font.

Lay-baptism we find to have been permitted by both the common prayer books of king Edward, and that of queen Elizabeth, when an infant is in immediate danger of death, and a lawful minister cannot be had. This was founded upon the mistaken notion of the impossibility of salvation without the sacrament of baptism; but afterwards, when they came to have clearer notions of the sacrament, it was unanimously resolved in a convocation, held in the year 1575, that even private baptism, in a case of necessity, was only to be administered by a lawful minister.

The objections made to the office of baptism are, first, the use of godfathers and godmothers. At the Reformation, it was absolutely necessary that they should have sponsors for infants, lest their parents should have brought them up in the popish religion. It was the same in the primitive church, as has been already taken notice of, to prevent the children from being brought up heathens. At present, when we consider that almost universal depravity of manners, so prevalent among the people, we are led to wish that pious persons could be found, who would take care to see the children brought up in the fear of God. On the other hand, when we reflect on the conduct of those persons who frequently assume the characters of sponsors, such as drunken sots and giddy girls, who never intend to pay any regard to the solemn promise they have made, as it were, before God and a Christian congregation, we are apt to wish that none were admitted but such as would do their duty. We know but of one law in the church of England that forbids a father to be sponsor for his own child, but long usage has given a sanction to the present practice. Let sponsors, however, beware of mocking God, but if they take that office upon them, let them endeavour, through the divine assistance, to discharge their duty.

The second objection is, that made to the use of the sign of the cross. We have already taken notice, that this was used in the primitive church, and lord King thinks it first began about the middle of the second century. After that time, it began to be generally practised, but not imposed, so that people were left at liberty to use it, or let it alone. Soon after the time of Constantine the Great, it was become so universal, that it was considered as an imposed duty on the clergymen to cross the children in the sacrament of baptism.

We find from what we have taken notice of before, that the ritual for baptism in the beginning of the reign of king Edward, had something in it very superstitious. As for the making the sign of the cross, there can be no harm in it, unless people believe that it has something in it of a sacred nature. Those who submit to it as the mode used in the established church, should look upon it as an indifferent thing, but those who consider it as inconsistent with the word of God, should by no means use it. There is, however, in this country, but little reason to complain, for there is such liberty for tender consciences, that although the minister cannot dispense with the act of uniformity, yet any man who is of opinion that baptism is absolutely necessary to infants, may apply to the Dissenters, none of whom use the sign of the cross.

The next thing to be considered is confirmation.

In the primitive times, this was a grand ceremony in the church. It frequently followed immediately after baptism, when the party made a solemn promise before the bishop and all the congregation present, that he would live according to the rules of the gospel. He was then admitted to the communion, after the bishop had prayed for him, and laid his hands on his head. It was absolutely necessary that such a declaration should be made, especially as the people were but newly converted from heathenism. And the same circumstance took place here immediately after the Reformation. It was necessary that the ministers of parishes should know to whom they administered the communion, and therefore it was ordered, that those who intended to partake of that holy ordinance, should first be instructed in the principles of the Christian religion; for no solemn mystery enjoined in the New Testament must be trifled with.

It is therefore appointed both by the canons and by several public acts, that all those who are to be confirmed, must produce a certificate of their knowledge from the minister of the parish where they reside. This ordinance is observed by the Lutherans, and although not attended to by many Protestants, yet we shall have occasion to point out wherein they have something like it. Indeed, we do not know that ever any of the Protestants spoke or wrote against confirmation, but in some of their writings we find them complaining of abuses in the ceremony, namely, it is not attended to with that awful reverence it was in the primitive church. All we can say on this head is, that our bishops should consider whether it would not be much better to visit their parishes once every year, than once in three years. Bishop Jewel used to say, "A bishop should die preaching, and surely the gates of heaven must be ready opened for that minister who leaves this world doing his duty."

We come next to the eucharist or sacrament of the Lord's supper, which in all Christian churches makes a part of divine worship. This sacrament, as well as that of baptism, was instituted by Christ himself; and by many divines it has been called Christ's last legacy to his people. It was constituted to be kept up in remembrance of him to the end of the world. We are assured by Pliny, in his epistle to the emperor Trajan, that the Christians met on one day in seven, and had a feast together. This feast was no other than what we now call the communion. In the beginning of Christianity, the whole church or body of Christians met together; and those who had been baptized were admitted to the communion. But as they began to multiply, a more rigid discipline was found necessary, catechumens, penitents, and all who were found guilty of any scandalous offences, were debarred from the communion; the former, till they had been properly instructed, and the latter, till they had given sufficient proofs of their amendment. The bishop always washed his hands before he consecrated the elements, according to the words of the psalmist, "I will wash my hands in innocency, so will I go to thine altar." But as these things have been treated of at large in our account of the primitive church, we shall therefore only take notice of some traditions concerning the efficacy of the eucharist, which we have carefully collected from different historians. These traditions, however, are not related as facts, but merely as forgeries invented, when the purity of Christianity was on the decline.

Optatus tells us, that some Donatists, who, in their mad zeal against the Catholics, ordered the eucharist which they had consecrated to be thrown to their dogs, but not without an immediate sign of divine vengeance on them; for the dogs, instead of devouring the elements, fell upon their masters and tore them to pieces.

Again it is related of St. Laurence, that being extended on a red-hot gridiron in order to suffer martyrdom, the sacramental bread and wine which he had just before received, rendered him quite insensible of the force and violence of the fire; and that this surprising event converted a great many people, who were present to see the execution.

The acts of St. Stephen relate a remarkable story concerning the eucharist, of one Tharficus, an acolyth, who, as he was carrying home some of the consecrated elements, met with a company of soldiers, who demanded of him what he was carrying, and upon his refusal to discover the sacred mysteries to those infidels, they beat him to death. The story adds, that God confirmed his piety and prudence by a miracle; for the soldiers, though they searched all over him, could not find what he wished to conceal from them.

Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, in the fourth century, and a great persecutor of the Novatians, having long hated some of those poor people, obliged them, against their will, to communicate with him, by forcing open their mouths and thrusting the eucharist down their throats, which to them was the most insupportable of all punishments.

The historian Sozomen relates, that a certain woman of the Macedonian sect, being obliged by the threats of her husband to dissemble an inclination to embrace the Catholic faith, came to church in order to receive the eucharist, where, instead of swallowing the consecrated bread, she privately conveyed it away, and put another piece she had brought with her into her mouth. But by the judgment of God, when she endeavoured to eat it, she found it changed into a stone, upon which she became a sincere convert to the Catholic faith.

St. Austin relates of one Acacius, that he came into the world with his eye-lids so closed that he could see nothing, and that his mother, by applying the encharist to his eyes in the form of a plaister, brought him presently to sight.

We are likewise told by St. Austin, of a young girl who being possessed by the devil, and having continued twenty-eight days without nourishment, was dispossessed and perfectly restored to health, by partaking of the encharist.

We have mentioned these things for the benefit of our Protestant readers, who ought to be on their guard when they read the writings of the ancient fathers. And here we may find, that just after the time of Constantine the Great, the priests began to extol the encharist so much, that the foundation of the corporeal presence was laid. The magnifying any thing beyond its proper merits, or the design for which it was appointed, is first superstition, and then generally ends in idolatry. This is always the effect of will worship, or doing what is not commanded; and if we can here find such a name as that of St. Austin giving countenance to such notions, we need not be much surprised at finding the same in latter writers.

The compilers of our Common-Prayer Book originally extracted this service out of several ancient liturgies, as those of St. Basil, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory; but Boucher having found great fault with it, it therefore went under several alterations. The office was originally designed to be distinct, and consequently to be used at a different time from morning prayer. A custom which bishop Overall says was observed in his time in York and Chichester; and he imputes it to the negligence of the ministers, and carelessness of the people, that they are ever huddled together into one office.

By the last rubric after this office, part of it is appointed to be read on every Sunday and holy-day, though there be no communicants; and the reason seems to have been, that the church may shew her readiness to administer the sacrament upon those days, and that it is not her's, but the people's fault, that it is not administered: or it might be so ordered for the sake of reading the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, and the Nicene Creed; together with the Offertory, or sentences of scripture, and the prayer for Christ's church.

As there has been much dispute concerning the propriety of having altars in churches, where there is no sacrifice, we find it necessary to take some notice of the place where the church of England orders the encharist to be celebrated. And here it is necessary that we should first describe the progress of the primitive church, and then compare it with the practice of the reformed.

This holy table was distinguished among the primitive Christians, by the name of altar; and Mr. Mede thinks it was usually so called for the two first ages, and that the name table is not to be found in any author of those ages now remaining. However, it is certain they did not mean by the altar, what the Jews and heathens meant, either an altar adorned with images or idols, like those of the heathens, or an altar for bloody sacrifices, which was the use of them both among the Jews and Gentiles. But for their own mystical, unbloody sacrifice, as they called the encharist, they always owned they had an altar, which they scrupled not to term indifferently by that name.

The communion-tables, or altars, of the primitive Christians, seem to have been made only of wood, till the time of Constantine, when stone altars were brought in, together with the stateliness and magnificence of churches. The pontifical speaks of silver altars, dedicated by Constantine. And, as the materials of which altars were made, were changed, so the form and fashion of them began to be changed likewise: For whereas, before, they were in the form of tables, they now began to be erected more like altars, either upon a single stone, or pillar, in the middle, or upon an edifice erected like a tomb.

Among the primitive Christians there never was more than one altar in a church. One bishop and one altar, is the known aphorism of Ignatius. Some are of opinion, that, anciently, there was but one altar in a whole city, or diocese, belonging to a bishop; notwithstanding there were many churches. But this is a point involved in too much obscurity to be easily determined.

In some of the more stately churches, as that of Sancta Sophia at Constantinople, the altar was overshadowed with a sort of canopy. It was raised in the form of a little turret, upon four pillars, at each corner of the altar. The heads of the pillars were adorned with silver bowls, the top of it was in the form of a sphere, adorned with graven flowers.—Above the sphere stood the cross: and the several arches below, between the pillars, were hung with veils or curtains, which served to cover and conceal the whole altar. Sometimes the Holy Ghost was represented, in the effigies of a silver dove, hovering over the altar.

The holy vessels, which they made use of to administer the encharist in, made another part of the ornaments of the communion-table, or altar. The materials, it is true, were sometimes no better than plain glass or wood; but, in the more stately churches, they were often of gold or silver. What this holy furniture consisted of, we may judge from an inventory of communion plate, given in to the persecutors by Paul, bishop of Cirta. There we find two gold cups, six silver cups, six silver water-pots, seven lamps, and some other things.

As to the ceremony of bowing towards the altar at the first entrance into the churches, Mr. Mede thinks there is no plain demonstration of it in the ancient writers, but some probability of such a custom derived from the Jews, who used to bow themselves down towards the mercy seat. It is certain, the Christians, both of the Greek and oriental churches, have time out of mind, and without any known beginning thereof used to bow towards the altar, repeating the words of the publican in the gospel, "God be merciful to me a sinner," as appears by the Liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, which custom not being founded on any known decree, or canon of a council, and being agreeable to the practice of the Jewish church, to which the Christians succeeded, may therefore fairly be supposed to have been derived to them from some very remote and ancient tradition.

The communion-table or altar in the primitive church, was placed at the upper end, not close to the wall, as it is at present, but at some little distance from it; so that the bishop's throne might be behind it, and room enough left in a void space to encompass or go round it. And this is the meaning of Eusebius, who speaking of the church of Paulinus, says, "He set the holy of holies, the altar, in the middle," not in the middle of the nave, or body of the church, as some have misunderstood it; but in the middle of the bema, or sanctuary, at such a distance from the upper end, as that the seats of bishops and presbyters might be behind it. Dr. Hammond, and other learned men, think this position of the altar, in the Christian churches was in imitation of the altar of the Jewish temple, to which the psalmist alludes in those words, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar."

At the beginning of the Reformation in England, a dispute arose, whether the communion-tables of the altar-fashion, which had been used in popish time, and on which masses had been celebrated, should be still continued. This occasioned a letter from the king and council of all the bishops, requiring them to pull down the altars; and, when the Liturgy was reviewed in 1551, the rubric was altered, and the priest was directed to stand on the north side, not on the altar as it was before, but of the table.

In the reign of queen Elizabeth, when the Reformation first received a civil establishment, then it was that our reformers displayed a considerable share of moderation. They appointed that the communion-table should be either in the church or chancel, but not a word concerning altars. In this manner things continued till the reign of Charles I. when one half of the people ran mad in favour of Puritanism, and the other half in favour of superstition. The love of ceremonies trampled over the love of truth, and opposition to government was considered as a virtue. It was at that time that Dr. Laud caused the Book of Sports to be published, by which people were permitted to play at all sorts of games after divine service on Sundays. This circumstance proved fatal at that time to the church of England, but affliction taught her leaders wisdom.

In 1634, Laud procured an order, that all those tables where the people communicated, should be removed from the middle of the church, and placed within rails on the east end of the chancel, and this was to be called the altar. It is impossible to describe all the confusions that took place on this occasion. The Puritan ministers, by their affected austerity, had gained on the minds of the people, who were become as much slaves to them as ever they had been to the popish priests. They said, that to set up altars, was the same as to set up popery, and as some of the clergy were more forward in this affair than others, so it occasioned many tumults, fomented by the Puritans, and laughed at by the papists.

At Grantham, in Lincolnshire, the vicar of the parish procured a piece of painting from one of the remains of an abbey, and had it placed within the altar. All his hearers were Puritans, and the setting up the painting drove them almost stark mad. And here it may be justly said in the words of a celebrated author, "There were fire and tow assembled." The vicar loved ceremonies, and the people hated them. A combination of the parishioners went to the church to demolish the altar, and the vicar to defend it. A stout battle ensued, in which the vicar, who seems to have been a man of courage, lifted a form upon his shoulder, and knocked down five or six of the assailants. The clergy who cannot teach people wisdom, should drive it into them.

Here was a fine opportunity for the papists to laugh at the simplicity and weakness of Laud, who, to use the words of bishop Burnet, "Drove all things into confusion." Ward, who wrote a book called England's Reformation, takes notice of this, when he says,

What mischiefs did in Kirks arise,
By setting tables altar wise;
How Grantham's vicar by the rabble,
Was bang'd about the communion-table.

By the act of uniformity, none is to communicate in public, but at the altar, and they are to receive the elements kneeling. The ceremony of kneeling at the sacrament is observed by the Lutherans and the church of England, but not by any other Protestants that we know of. In this country, it has occasioned much contention, and a variety of disputes. This much is certain, that kneeling at the communion was not used in the primitive church till after the time of Constantine the Great. And yet there can be no harm in the ceremony, so as it is not used to superstition. It is certain, that the rubric has cautioned people against running into superstition, and perhaps to the liberal and enlarged in sentiment, it will be much the same whether they commemorate the death of their Redeemer kneeling or standing. In all things of an indifferent nature, people should be left to their own discretion; for where the conscience is once wounded, there can remain no peace of mind. Last of all, let us consider that this holy ordinance is a feast of charity, and was considered as such by the primitive Christians. With what great care then ought we to examine ourselves, whether we have any grudge or malice against our neighbours, for we ought not to go to the Lord's table with any besides those with whom we could wish to sit down in heaven.

Marriage, as in all other Protestant countries except one, must in England be performed by a clergyman. That marriage is in the law of nature a civil institution, is known to every historian, and the sentiment is established by all modern writers, who have treated of the laws of nature and nations. The Jewish marriages were civil contracts, attended with some innocent ceremonies, and the bishops, in the primitive ages of Christianity, never meddled with those things, their sole care being to prevail on the people to live in a state of chastity, according to the apostolical institution, "Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband."

We are not exactly certain as to the time when the Christian priests first claimed the privilege of marrying the people, all that we know is, that it was practised before the reign of the emperor Justinian, who lived in the sixth century. That emperor published an edict, forbidding any person to perform the ceremony of marriage except a clergyman.—To enforce the clerical power, he made this a principle in the pandects, and from that time till the time of the Reformation, it was an object of great emolument to the priests who performed the ceremony, and to the popes who assumed the power of setting aside marriages whenever they pleased.

At the Reformation, the Lutherans did not follow the popish rule of making a sacrament of marriage, but still they retained many of the ceremonies. In the church of England it is likewise declared not to be a sacrament, but the privilege of performing it is still confined to the clergy; and by the marriage act 1754, there are several restrictions laid upon this bond of union, that where unknown before. This act has defeated its own intention, which was that of preventing young persons from marrying without the consent of their parents or guardians. Avarice inspired the sentiment, and pride supported its operations. By this act, destructive of the natural rights of the human race, dreadful enormities have been committed. Those who found they could not elude the force of it in England, made elopements to Scotland, where they were married without the consent of their parents; and these marriages are declared by the court of session, the supreme court of judicature in that part of the island to be legal; and this decision has been affirmed in the house of lords, from whose decree no appeal lies.

But as most of these matches were, and still are concluded in the heat of youthful unguarded passion, and as the parents frequently withdrew from them what was intended as a marriage portion, so poverty creates uneasiness, brings on a coldness between the parties, and they are seldom happy.—But this is not the worst effect of the act, it operates shockingly, and with a baneful influence on the morals of those in high life. Young ladies, being forced by their parents to enter into the marriage state with persons who have nothing to recommend them but money, are tempted to engage in unlawful pleasures, and to this is owing the vast number of divorces that have taken place in this country.—Indeed, these have been multiplied so much of late years that the lower classes of people, copying the example of their superiors, have as it were laughed at all moral obligation, and endeavoured to unhinge the basis of human society. The evil has spread far and wide, and we should not have been so explicit on it, had it not been learnedly animadverted upon, by some of the members of both houses of parliament, who are in their private and public characters, an ornament to human society. Methods have been proposed to put a stop to the growing evil, but they have all met with violent opposition, and where it will end God only knows.

The church of England, though she does not consider marriage as a sacrament, yet looks upon it as an institution so sacred, that it ought always to be celebrated by an ecclesiastical person. And by several canons of our church, it is declared to be no less than prostituting one's daughter, to give her in marriage without the blessing of the priest. But marriages without this sanction are not, therefore, null and void, for, though the positive law of man ordains marriage to be made by a priest, that law only makes marriages otherwise solemnized, irregular, but does not dissolve them.

There is no canon, or custom of this realm, which prohibits marriages to be solemnized at any time. The ecclesiastical courts, it is true, pretend, that a licence is necessary, to impower persons to marry, during such times as are said to be prohibited, viz. from Advent-Sunday, to the Octave of the Epiphany inclusive; from Septuagesima-Sunday, till the Sunday after Easter inclusive; and from the first of the Rogation-days, that is, the Monday before Ascension-day, till the day before Trinity-Sunday inclusive. During these pretended prohibited times, they allow no person to marry by banns only, as at other times of the year.

For better security against clandestine marriages, the church orders, that all marriages be celebrated in the day time. By the LXIId canon, they are ordered to be performed in time of divine service; but that practice is now almost, by universal consent, laid aside and discontinued. The canonical hours for celebrating matrimony are, from eight to twelve in the forenoon. Formerly it was required, that the bridegroom and bride should be fasting, when they made their matrimonial vow; by which means they were secured from being made incapable, by drink, of acting decently and discreetly in so weighty an affair.

The impediments to marriage are specified in the 102d canon of our church, and are these: 1. A preceding marriage, or contract, or any controversy or suit depending upon the same. 2. Consanguinity or affinity. 3. Want of the consent of parents or guardians. In Henry VIIIth's time, an act was passed, that marriages, solemnized and consummated, should stand good, notwithstanding any pre-contract, that had not been consummated. But this was done only to gratify the king: and therefore, in the next reign, this act was repealed. As to the impediment of consanguinity or affinity, there is a table of prohibited degrees drawn up by archbishop Parker, and set forth by authority in 1563.

There is one objection that has been made to the ceremony of marriage in the church of England, and that is the use of the ring. Among the ancient heathens the ring was considered as an emblem of eternity, because a ring has no end. We find several instances of this in ancient history, particularly among the Egyptians, and it was to please the heathens that the Christian clergy, about the latter end of the sixth century, adopted the ceremony. From that time till the Reformation it was kept up; but in the Greek church, the parties in marriage exchange rings with each other, so that both husband and wife has one each. At the Reformation, it was retained by the Lutherans, and by the church of England, but all other Protestant churches exploded it. However, as the English Dissenters are all obliged to marry in the church, they use the ring in common with others, except the Friends, vulgarly called Quakers, who never make use of it. All we have to say concerning this dispute, is, that we do not think it worth the mentioning, nor a subject of serious enquiry. If women will have husbands, no doubt but they will accept of the ring along with the male partner; for as Mr. Gray says,

It puts us in mind of what Cartwright, the Puritan minister said, when being asked what objections he had to a square hat, answered, that his head was not square. There are some other religious disputes which might be terminated in the same manner.

We are here obliged to take notice of another objection made by several persons, and that is against the following words, “With my body I thee worship.” This was a dreadful bugbear to some enthusiasts in the last century, who did not understand what the word worship pointed out. They imagined that worship and divine service were synonymous terms. Now the simple meaning of the expression is, that as the Christian dedicates himself wholly to God, so the man who enters into the marriage state should consider, that he is so connected with his wife, as not to have any thing to do with harlots.

As marriage is necessary on many accounts, and as it is one of the ordinances appointed to be observed in the church, so it ought to be attended to with great care; nor was it ever despised but by libertines. The comforts of society, the mutual assistance that the one sex should give to the other, the propagation of the human species, the care of bringing up children, and industry of providing for them, are all included under this name. The debauchee may enjoy a temporary pleasure, attended with a severe repentance; the virtuous man who is married knows the sweets of human life. If he is afflicted, he has a helpmate to sympathize with him; if he is in a state of prosperity, then she will partake of his comforts. Their children will grow up together as ornaments of human society, as saints prepared for heaven, and on a death-bed it will be their consolation that they have not lived in vain.

We cannot conclude this article better than in the words of Milton, the greatest poet perhaps that ever lived in the world, next to the inspired writers.

Hail, wedded love! mysterious law! true source
Of human offspring! sole propriety
In paradise, of all things common else!
By thee adulterous lust was driven from man,
Among the bestial herds to range: by thee,
Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure,
Relations dear, and the charities

Of father, son, and brother, first were known;
 Perpetual fountain of domestic sweets!
 Here love his golden shafts employs, here lights
 His constant lamp, and waves his purple wings:
 Here reigns and revels: not in the bought smile
 Of harlots, loveless, joyless, unindear'd,
 Casual fruition; nor in court-amours,
 Mix'd dance, or wanton mask, or midnight ball,
 Or serenade, which the starv'd lover sings
 To his proud fair, best quitted with disdain.

The next thing to be considered is, the visitation of the sick, a duty which hath been attended to amongst all ranks and denominations of Christians, and it points out a fixed belief of eternity; for what occasion would there be to visit the sick, if there was not a belief of an awful change taking place soon afterwards. We know but of one objection that has been made to the office for the visitation of the sick, and that is, the absolution. Undoubtedly there are here some words that might have been more clearly expressed, so as to remove all sorts of doubt, and to extinguish ambiguity; but where is perfection to be found in human things? It appears by the rubric, that the minister is to pronounce this absolution in consequence of a firm persuasion that the sick man is a real penitent; and as he does it by the authority of Christ, consequently we should imagine that no real Protestant would consider it in an improper light. We are loath to enter into disputes of that nature; but this much is certain, that absolution to sick persons was very early used in the church, even before the time of Constantine the Great; but if it was turned to superstition afterwards, we are not to answer for it, being convinced that the church of England gives no encouragement to it, unless a few simple words can be construed to that purpose.

The burial of the dead naturally follows the visitation of the sick, and the rubric enjoins that it shall not be used for any that die unbaptised or excommunicated, or who have laid violent hands on themselves. These words of the rubric have occasioned much controversy; for first, it supposes, or at least insinuates, that those who die unbaptised cannot be saved. This notion was never embraced in the Christian church till the tenth century, when it was established into a law by the council St. John de Lateran. Secondly, as to persons excommunicated in the church of England, they may be so for civil offences, and to deny them Christian burial, according to the rites of their own church, is joining civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction together. Lastly, as to those who have laid violent hands on themselves, the general practice of this country has set aside the barbarity of the rubric. Inquests generally set aside common homicides, because it is imagined that none would put an end to their lives, unless they were madmen. To despise life, indicates a privation of judgment, and therefore we generally find that our inquests return their verdicts Lunacy. However, this is not all, the sentiment arises according to the sense of the rubric, from a belief that those who lay violent hands on themselves can have no time to repent, and consequently are lost for ever.

That self-murder is a horrid crime is not to be disputed, and God forbid that we should stand up in defence of it; but then who is to limit Divine Omnipotence? Mr. Clark repeats a story, which although perhaps not true, yet it may serve to point out the sentiments of a charitable Christian.

A very profane man riding one day on horse back, fell and was killed in the very act of swearing. That his soul was gone to hell most people believed, and yet a bye-stander declared he heard a voice utter the following words:—

Betwixt the saddle and the ground,
 Mercy was sought, and mercy found.

We mention this, not as a real fact, but only to point out what are frequently the sentiments of men on such a subject. Great caution should be used in forming notions of the state of our departed friends. God has ways to govern the exertions of his glorious attributes, with which we are utterly unacquainted; and to acknowledge our ignorance is the sure way to attain to wisdom.

There is, however, another objection to this ceremony, which has been frequently made by the Dissenters, and that arises from the repetition of the words, "In sure and certain hope of resurrection to eternal life." By a sure and certain hope can only be meant a well grounded hope, and that is such an hope as is founded upon rational principles. Therefore, if there is any ambiguity in the expression, it does not seem to arise from superstition in our reformers, but rather from a charitable principle.

The next ceremony in the church of England is, that of returning thanks to the great God of nature and providence, for delivering women in child-birth. This practice is attended to in one form or other by all the Protestant churches we know of, whether established by law, or Dissenters. And can any thing in the world be more just? Natural religion points out that we should return thanks to God for every favour we receive from him, and Christianity enforces the duty by the most solemn sanctions.—Our gratitude should at least be, as far as lays in our power, proportioned to the benefits we have received; and what sufferings in this life can be compared with those of a woman who goes through the pains of child-bearing? And, if the affliction is so great, if there is a living mother, and what is still more, a living child? How cheerfully should those concerned go into the house of God, and acknowledge the obligation they are under to him. So far as we know, there has never yet been any exception made to a single passage in this office, by any of our Dissenting brethren. It follows the practice of the Jewish church, in which they were to offer a turtle-dove, or two young pigeons; but Christianity requires the sacrifice of the heart.

The commination, the last ceremony to be taken notice of, has its rise from a practice in the ancient church, when the bishop, or in his absence, any other lawful minister, declared, that those who had not repented of gross sins or immoralities, should not presume to come to the Lord's table. That such a practice existed in the primitive church, is acknowledged in the rubric to this office. The whole ceremony is plain and simple, and the man who is conscious of his guilt, may freely acknowledge himself as cursed in the sight of God for the sins he has committed, without losing hopes of the divine favour, which no doubt will be communicated to him in consequence of his accepting of salvation, according to the terms offered in the gospel.

Such is the public service of the church of England, and, perhaps, upon a dispassionate inquiry, it will be found that very few exceptions in the eye of reason can be made to it. There can be no criticising, however, in these affairs, so that we must speak with candour, concerning all those who differ from us.

The next thing to be considered in the church of England is, her government, which is different from all other Protestant churches in the world. She is the same in her discipline, and both these must be explained to the reader.

England is governed in ecclesiastical matters by two archbishops, and twenty-four bishops, and under these, by deans of cathedrals, arch-deacons, rectors, and vicars of parishes; all which must be properly attended to, especially as we must soon take notice of Calvinism and the church of Scotland.

Though bishops, in the primitive church, were all vested with the same office, yet as Christianity increased, it was found necessary to enlarge the episcopal power; therefore, as before, there was commonly a bishop placed in every great city, so now, in every metropolis, as the Romans called it, or mother city, of every province, wherein were courts of civil judicature, there was a metropolitan or archbishop, who had ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all the bishops of that province. His jurisdiction consisted in ordaining, or ratifying the elections and ordinations of all other bishops; and once a year he was to summon them all to a synod, in which he presided, to inquire into their conduct, to censure with suspension, or deprivation, and to hear and determine causes between contending bishops.

Dr. Bingham is of opinion, that archbishop was originally but another name for patriarch; though in process of time their jurisdiction became distinct.

The first establishment of archbishoprics in England, if we may credit Bede, one of the most ancient writers of the English nation, was in the time of Lucius, said to be the first Christian king of England; who, after the conversion of his subjects, erected three archbishoprics, at London, York, and Landaff, then called Caerleon. The dignity of archbishop continued in the see of London 180 years, till, in the time of the Saxons, it was translated to Canterbury, where it has continued ever since, and York remains a metropolitanical see to this day.

Augustin, the monk, who was sent by pope Gregory, to convert the English nation, in the reign of Ethelbert, king of Kent, was the first bishop of Canterbury; but Theodore, the sixth in succession after him, was the first archbishop of that see. The archbishops of Canterbury had anciently the primacy not only over England, but Ireland also, and all the bishops of the latter were consecrated by him. He was styled by pope Urban II. "Alterius Orbis Papa;" he had a perpetual legantine power annexed to his archbishopric; he had some marks of royalty, such as the power of coining money, &c. Since the Reformation, he is styled Primate and Metropolitan of all England: archbishop Cranmer was the first who bore this title. As to precedence, there have been ancient contests about it, as also about the oath of canonical obedience, between the two archiepiscopal sees. Some antiquaries will have it, that the archbishop of York was originally primate of the British church; for London never was a Roman colony, or the seat of the Roman emperors, as York was, where both Severus and Constantius Chlorus lived and died, and where Constantine the Great was born; and from hence they infer, that, where the emperors resided, that was the most likely place to have pre-eminence above the rest. However it be, in the reign of Henry I. William Corbel, archbishop of Canterbury, obtained from the pope the character of legate, by which he secured to himself a superiority over the see of York, which he visited Jure Legationis. But after his death, the contest still continued. For we find, that in the reign of Henry II. a synod being called at Westminster by the pope's legate, the archbishop of Canterbury coming first, seated himself at the right hand of the legate; but York coming afterwards, refused to take the seat on the left hand, and demanded Canterbury's place, which the latter refusing, York sat down in his lap. This occasioned the synod to break up in disorder, and both parties appealing to the pope, the contest was decided in favour of the see of Canterbury, which enjoys the precedence to this day.

The privileges of the archbishop of Canterbury are, among others, to crown the kings of England; to have prelates for his officers; as the bishop of London his provincial dean; the bishop of Winchester his chancellor; the bishop of Lincoln his vice-chancellor; the bishop of Salisbury his precentor; the bishop of Worcester his chaplain; and the bishop of Rochester his crosier bearer; which last office, since the times of popery has ceased. He is also the first peer of England, next to the royal family.

The archbishop of Canterbury hath the supreme government of ecclesiastical matters, next under the king. Upon the death of any suffragan bishop, the custody of his see devolves upon the archbishop; he hath a power of censuring any bishop in his province; he hath an ancient right to preside in all provincial councils of his suffragans, which formerly were held once a year, but have been discontinued a long time; so that his power of examining things throughout his province is devolved to his courts; of which he holds several, as the court of arches, prerogative-court, court of peculiars, &c. and he has the probate of wills.

As to the archbishop of York, he is now styled primate and metropolitan of England, and takes place of all peers, except the archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord Chancellor. He had originally the primacy, not only over twelve English sees, but also over all the bishoprics of Scotland. But Scotland has disowned his prerogative many years since, and the archbishopric itself hath swallowed up several smaller and more inconsiderable bishoprics; so that the whole province is now reduced to four sees; Durhani, Chester, Carlisle, and Man.

Scotland, whilst episcopacy prevailed in that country, had two archbishoprics; viz. of St. Andrews and Glasgow; the former of whom was primate of Scotland.

Wales also anciently boasted of an archbishop, whose see, as has been observed, was established at Caerleon; and was afterwards translated to St. David's. But the plague raging very much in that country, the archiepiscopal see was again removed to Doll in Bretagne; where this dignity ended.—Notwithstanding which, in after ages, the Britons or Welsh, commenced an action, on that account, against the archbishop of Canterbury, but were cast.

Ireland has four archbishops: of Armagh, Dublin, Cassil, and Tuam, of whom the archbishop of Armagh is primate of all Ireland.

The earliest account we have of British bishops, is carried up no higher than the council of Arles, assembled by the emperor Constantine, in the fourth century; at which were present the bishops of London, York, and Caerleon.

Before the Norman conquests, bishops were chosen by the chapters, whether monks or prebendaries. From the conqueror's time to the reign of king John, it was the custom to chuse bishops at a public meeting of the bishops and barons, the king himself being present at the solemnity, who claimed a right of investing the bishops by delivering to them the ring and the pastoral staff. It is true, the popes endeavoured to gain the election of bishops to themselves; and this occasioned great struggles and contests between the Roman pontiffs and our kings. At length, after various disputes between king John and the pope, the former by his charter A. D. 1215, granted the right of election to the cathedral churches. A statute, in the reign of Henry VIII. settles the election of bishops as follows:

“The king upon the vacancy of the see, was to send his Conge d'eslire to the dean and chapter, or prior and convent, and in case they delayed the election above twelve days, the crown was empowered to nominate the person by letters patent.—And, after the bishop thus elected, had taken an oath of fealty to the king, his majesty, by his letters patent under the broad seal, signified the election to the archbishop, with orders to confirm it and consecrate the elect. And lastly, if the person assigned to elect and consecrate, deferred the performing their respective offices twenty days, they were to incur a præmunire.” But a statute of Edward VI. made a change in the manner of electing bishops, and transferred the choice wholly from the deans and chapters to the crown. The preamble in the first place alleges the inconveniences of the former manner of electing; from the circumstances of delay and expence. After which it is said in the preamble, “that the said elections are in every deed no elections, but only by a writ of conge d'eslire have colours, shadows, and pretences of election: that they serve to no purpose, and seem derogatory and prejudicial to the king's prerogative royal, to whom only appertains the collation of gift of all archbishoprics and bishoprics, and suffragan bishops, within his highness's dominions.” This statute therefore enacts, that “for the future no conge d'eslire shall be granted, nor any election be made by the dean and chapter, but that the archbishopric or bishopric shall be conferred by the king's nomination in his letters patent.” But this alteration made by the statute of king Edward, is no longer in force, and the custom of sending down the congé d'eslire is restored.

Upon the vacancy of a bishop's see, the king grants a license, under the great seal, to the dean and chapter, to elect the person whom by his letters missive he hath appointed; and they are to chuse no other. The dean and chapter, having made their election accordingly, certify it under their common seal to the king, and to the archbishop of the province, and to the bishop thus elected; then the king gives his royal assent under the great seal, directed to the archbishop, commanding him to confirm and consecrate the bishop thus elected. The archbishop then subscribes his fiat confirmatio, and grants a commission to the vicar general to perform all the acts requisite thereto; who thereupon issues out a summons to all persons who may object to the election, to appear, &c. which citation is affixed on the door of Bow church. At the time and place appointed, the proctor for the dean and chapter exhibits the royal assent, and the commission of the archbishop, which are both read, and accepted by the vicar general. Then the new bishop is presented by the proctor to the vicar general: and, three proclamations being made for the opposers of the election to appear, and none appearing, the vicar general confirms and ratifies the choice of the person elected, who takes the oath of supremacy, canonical obedience, and that against simony.

Till this act of confirmation is performed, the bishop elect may be rejected, because there may be reasons assigned why he should not be made a bishop; which is the reason of the above-mentioned citations and proclamations.

After confirmation, the next thing to be done is consecration; which the archbishop performs by the imposition of hands and prayer, according to the form laid down in the Common Prayer Book.—Which done, the bishop is complete as well in relation to spiritualities as temporalities. Justice Dodridge, in his argument of Evans and Ascue's case, says, there is a spiritual marriage between the bishop and his church, which is begun by election, contracted by confirmation, and consummated by consecration.

A bishop of England is a peer of the realm, and, as such, sits and votes in the house of lords. He is a baron in a three-fold manner, viz. Feudal, in regard of the temporalities annexed to his bishopric; by writ, as being summoned by writ to parliament; and by patent and creation. Accordingly he has the precedence of all other barons, and votes as baron and bishop. But though their peerage never was denied, it has been contested whether the bishops have a right to vote in criminal matters. This right was disputed as early as the reign of Henry II. and we find this decision of the controversy; archbishops, bishops, &c. in like manner as the rest of the barons, ought to be present at the judgments in the king's courts until it come to diminution of members, or to death.

The reason which the canonist give, why bishops should not be present in cases of blood is, because they contract an irregularity thereby. Yet archbishop Cramer, being one of the privy-council to Edward VI. signed the warrant for the execution of Thomas Seymour, lord high admiral of England. And the archbishop of Canterbury was the first in commission at the trial of Mary queen of Scots.—And, in the earl of Strafford's case, in the reign of Charles I. when Williams archbishop of York, declared his opinion, that the bishops ought not to be present at the passing of the act of attainder, it was looked upon as betraying a fundamental right of the whole order. At present, the bishops have their vote in the trial and arraignment of a peer; but, before sentence of death is passed, they withdraw, and vote by their proxy.

The jurisdiction of a bishop, in England, consists in collating to benefices; granting institutions on the presentation of other patrons; commanding induction; taking care of the profits of vacant benefices for the use of the successors; visiting his diocese once in three years; in suspending, depriving, degrading, and excommunicating; in granting administrations, and taking care of the probate of wills: these parts of his function depend on the ecclesiastical law. By the common law, he is to certify the judges touching legitimate and illegitimate births and marriages. And to this jurisdiction, by the statute law, belongs the licensing of physicians, chirurgeons, school-masters; and the uniting small parishes: which last privilege is now peculiar to the bishop of Norwich.

The bishops' courts have this privilege above the civil courts, that writs are issued out from them in the name of the bishop himself, and not in the king's name, as in other courts. The judge of the bishop's court is his chancellor, anciently called Ecclesiæ Causidicus, the Church Lawyer.

The bishops of Scotland anciently exercised their episcopal functions wherever they were, there being no distinct dioceses in that kingdom till the reign of Malcolm-III. about the year 1070. Whilst episcopacy prevailed in that kingdom, the form of church government stood thus: In every parish the cognizance of some offences belonged to the cession, a judicature where the minister presided ex officio.—But, if the case proved too intricate, it was referred to the presbytery, a superior judicature consisting of a certain number of ministers, between twelve and twenty. The moderator of this assembly was named by the bishop. Above all, was the convocation, in which the archbishop of St. Andrews presided.— And, besides these, every bishop, for the causes of testaments, &c. had his official or commissary, who was judge of that court within the diocese. The bishops of that kingdom were likewise lords of parliament.

In the reign of Henry II. A. D. 1177, the Scotch bishops and abbots obliged themselves by oath to own the archbishop of York for their metropolitan, and consented that their successors should repair to York for consecration. But in the reign of Edward IV. A. D. 1471, the pope made the church of Scotland independent of the see of York, induced to it by complaint of bishop Graham, that, when England and Scotland were upon terms of hostility, the Scotch bishops had no opportunity of having recourse to their metropolitan, and bringing appeals to him.

The ecclesiastical government of Ireland hath been from ancient time by bishops, consecrated either by the archbishop of Canterbury, or by one another. But in the year 1152, as we find in Philip of Flattebury, “Christianus, bishop of Lisimore, legate of all Ireland, held a famous council at Meath, where were present the bishops, abbots, princes, dukes, and magistrates of Ireland; and there, by authority of the pope, with advice of the cardinals, and consent of the bishops, abbots, and others, there met together, four archbishoprics were established in Ireland, Armagh, Dublin, Cassil, and Tuam.”

The bishop of the Isle of Man is a baron of the Isle. He has this peculiar privilege, that if any of his tenants be guilty of a capital crime, and is to be tried for his life, the bishop's steward may demand him from the lord's bar, and try him in the bishop's court, by a jury of his own tenants; and, in case of conviction, his lands are forfeited to the bishop. When the bishopric is vacant, the lord of the Isle nominates a person, and presents him to the king of England for his royal assent, and then to the archbishop of York to be consecrated. After which he becomes subject to him as his metropolitan.

The next officer to the bishop in precedence, is the dean, who, with great propriety, may be called the master of the cathedral, or president of the chapter. His office is just what the deacon's was in the ancient church, for his duty is to govern every thing of a domestic nature belonging to the cathedral. He sits as president among the canons and prebendaries. His name is first mentioned in all leases granted by the chapter, and in the king's writs, which are directed for the election of a bishop.— They are frequently advanced to bishoprics, or at least their office is considered as leading to it.

As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in England, the old and the new, the new erected by Henry VIII. so there are two ways of creating deans. Those of the old foundation, as the deans of St. Paul's, York, &c. are raised to that dignity, much after the same manner as bishops; the king first sending his warrant, the chapter electing, and the king confirming the election. Those of the new foundation, whose deaneries were raised upon the ruins of priories and convents, such as the deans of Canterbury, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Winchester, &c. are donative, and installed by a shorter course, namely, by the king's letters patent, without any election or confirmation.

There are cathedral churches that never had a dean, and in which the bishop is head of the chapter, and in his absence, the archdeacon; such are the cathedrals of St. David and Landaff. There are also deans without a chapter; such as the dean of Battle in Sussex: and there are deans without a jurisdiction; as the dean of the chapel royal, &c. A dean, without a chapter, has a jurisdiction in the ecclesiastical matters, arising in the several parishes within his peculiar. Rural deans, who, originally, exercised jurisdiction over deaneries, and afterwards became only the bishop's substitutes, to grant letters of administration, probate of wills, &c. are now quite laid aside, and their office is lost in that of the archdeacons and chancellors.

A dean and chapter are the bishop's council, to assist him in the affairs of religion, and to assent to every grant, which the bishop shall make to bind his successors; and as a deanery is a spiritual dignity, a man cannot be a dean and prebendary of the same church.

Though ecclesiastical bodies, in cathedrals, are very ancient in England, yet it does not appear, that they had any jurisdiction peculiar to themselves during the Saxon times. Sir Edward Coke says, there were chapters, as the bishop's council, before they had distinct possessions, and that the bishops parted with some of their possessions to them, and so became patrons of the prebends of the church.

In the reign of king Charles I. a remonstrance was presented to the parliament, by the Presbyterian party, setting forth the great revenues, and the little use of deans and chapters. And, the same year, so fatal to episcopacy and the hierarchy, the commons voted, that all deans, deans and chapters, prebendaries, canons, &c. should be abolished, and their hands employed to the advancement of learning and piety.

The next officer in the church of England is, the archdeacon, and he may be called the bishop's vicar or substitute, as he acts great part of what was the duty of the bishops formerly; and though archdeacons, in these last ages of the church, have usually been of the order of presbyters, or priests, yet anciently they were no more than deacons; as the name imports. But how the archdeacon came by his honour, and after what manner he was invested, is a matter of some dispute among learned men.—Salmatus, and some others, are of opinion, that originally he was no more than the senior deacon. Others think, the dignity was always elective, and in the breast of the bishop: and St. Jerome plainly asserts, that the office went not by seniority, but by election.

The office of archdeacon was always a place of great honour and reputation; for he was the bishop's constant attendant and assistant; by which means he commonly gained such an interest, as to get himself chosen before the presbyters, to succeed the bishop. His business was, 1. To attend the bishop at the altar, and to administer the cup, when the bishop celebrated the eucharist. He was to order all things relating to the inferior clergy, such as to appoint readers, acolythists, subdeacons, &c. 2. He was to assist the bishop in managing the church revenues assigning their several portions to the poor, orphans, &c. Upon which account, Prudentius, describing the office of St. Laurence, whom he makes to be archdeacon of Rome, among other things, assigns him the keys of the church's treasure, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people: and he introduces the heathen persecutor demanding of him those treasures, which he promising to do, in a short time brought before him the poor, the lame, the blind, and the infirm, telling him, those were the riches, which he had in his custody. 3. Another part of his office was to assist the bishop in preaching, and in ordaining the inferior clergy. 4. He was also invested with the power of censuring deacons, the inferior clergy, but not presbyters. 5. As to his jurisdiction, it will admit of a dispute, whether it originally extended over the whole diocese, or was confined to the city or mother church. In the middle ages of the church, there is no question but his power extended over the whole diocese. 6. Valesius observes, that the archdeacons were also called Cor-Episcopi. This may seem at first only a corruption of the Chorepiscopus, because, in latter ages, the power of the ancient Chorepiscopi dwindled into that of the archdeacons. But when it is considered, that the deacons anciently were called the bishop's eyes, ears, mouth, or heart, it will appear very probable, that the archdeacon was called by way of eminence, Cor-episcopi, i. e. the bishop's heart.

How long this office has existed in England, cannot well be known; but probably long before the Norman conquest. At present there are sixty of them, because some bishoprics being large, it is necessary there should be in them more than one. The office is not altogether a sinecure, but it is not much unlike it, and sometimes we find the bishop of a diocese acting the part of archdeacon in another. It does not prevent them from holding other livings, even at present, nor is a dispensation necessary. Some of them have been advanced to bishoprics, without having any other dignity in the church; and at present they are to summon the clergy to meet them at some particular place, where they hear a sermon, and deliver a charge. On these occasions a free gift is bestowed upon the archdeacon, and he makes presentations either to the bishop or the spiritual court of every thing he finds annis. It is his duty to examine candidates for the ministry. This part of his duty, however, generally devolves on the bishop's chaplain.

The rectors and vicars of parishes are the next to be considered. The rectors are those who have the whole emoluments of the livings without any deductions. On the other hand, the vicars are such as whose livings were either subject to cathedrals, or to religious convents. Many of both are presented by the king, and others by the lords of manors. By the constitution of the church of England, no clergyman, who is an incumbent, and has the tithes, is obliged to preach more than one sermon on Sunday; but prayers are to be read in the afternoon. This was the reason why a new order of the clergy took place about the latter end of the reign of queen Elizabeth, and these were called lecturers. They were at that time mostly composed of Puritan ministers, who scrupled to read the prayers, on account of the ceremonies. They were men of sour tempers, full of austerity, excessively proud, and continually abusing such of the bishops as were fond of ceremonies. Their followers were among the lower orders of the people, over whom they exercised an unlimited power. Many of the ladies, however, were their adherents, and the noblemen, disaffected to government, took them into their families, as tutors to their children.

When Dr. Laud was advanced to the see of Canterbury, he resolved to change many things in the Protestant church of England, and he began with putting an end to the lectureships. Nothing could have been more iniquitous, for the people paid for the lecturer, who was not provided for them by law.

At the restoration, 1660, lectureships were restored, and they have continued on the same footing ever since. And here it is necessary to observe, that as these lecturers are paid by the people of the parish, so their choice or election falls on the housekeepers in general. They have no right to demand any thing; but we hope there are few men of piety, whether churchmen or Dissenters, who will refuse them so small a pittance,—especially as they discharge their duty, trusting in the benevolence of the parish.

There is one complaint, frequently made by the parishioners against the ministers of their parishes, and that is, that although they pay their lecturers, yet the incumbent can at any time refuse him the pulpit. That the incumbent has a right to do so by law cannot be disputed; but it has been considered as extremely hard, by several well-meaning pious men, that as the law has made no provision for sermons in the afternoon, so when the people are willing to pay a preacher, it is rather cruel to hinder them.

It is undoubtedly the duty of the rector of every parish to deny his pulpit to a man of scandalous life, whose character has been blackened by the most enormous crimes; but we really believe, the people seldom, if ever chuse such persons, but quite the reverse. Some small difference in sentiment should not induce the minister of a parish to disoblige his people; for in such cases he will be little esteemed by them; and if preachers are not esteemed, their public ministrations will have but little effect on the hearers. We cannot comprehend every thing, but in all religious disputes, we ought to take care that the people may not be confused in their notions, because confusion in these matters generally leads them to Deism.

The last order of the clergy, and such as have no benefices annexed to their titles, are the chaplains, and these by statute, 21 Henry VIII. are to be kept by particular persons. The act, however, contracts the number in the following manner:—An archbishop is allowed to have eight; a duke, six; a dutchess, two, besides the six her husband has, and she has a right to retain two after she is a widow, and although she should marry again; a marquis is allowed five; and an earl the same number; the lord Almoner, two; a viscount, four; a baron, three; the widows of viscounts and barons, two each; a bishop three; the chancellor, six; chief justice, one; clerk of the closet, two; master of the rolls, two; comptroller of the household, two; dean of the chapel, two; a knight of the garter, three; secretary of state, two; treasurer of the household, two; and the wardens of the cinque ports, one. By 25 of Henry VIII. every judge of the king's bench, and common-pleas, the chief baron of the exchequer, the king's attorney, and solicitor general, is permitted to retain one chaplain, who shall be attendant on his person, and may have one benefice without being resident on it. And by statute 33 of the same king, the groom of the stole, the treasurer of the king's chamber, and the chancellor of the duchy, are allowed to retain one chaplain each.

Before we conclude this account of the church of England, it is necessary we should say a few words concerning the convocation; for although that court has never been permitted to do any business during the last sixty years, yet it still meets on the second day of every session of parliament. It is an assembly of the clergy of England, by their representatives, to consult of ecclesiastical matters, and consists, like parliament, of an upper and lower house. In the upper house, all the archbishops and bishops sit, and in the lower, the inferior clergy, who are represented by their proctors; consisting of all the deans and archdeacons, of one proctor for every chapter, and two for the clergy of every diocese, in all one hundred and forty-three divines, viz.—twenty-two deans, fifty-three archdeacons, twenty-four prebends, and forty-four proctors of the diocesan clergy. The lower house chuses its prolocutor, or speaker, and presents him to the archbishops and bishops of the upper house. His business is to take care that the members attend, to collect their debates and votes, and to carry their resolutions to the upper house.

The lower house of convocation was formerly called together by two distinct writs. The first was the parliamentary, or king's writ, to the bishops of every diocese, summoning them to parliament, with a clause in it, requiring each chapter to send one of their body, and the clergy of each diocese two proctors, to represent them in parliament; and whence some have been of opinion, that the clergy sat, together with the laity, in parliament, till the reign of Henry VIII. when they fell under a prerogative, by submitting to Cardinal Wolsey's legate power, and forfeited their seats there. It is certain, the lower house of convocation, in the next reign, apprehended they had a right to sit in parliament, and therefore petitioned the upper house to intercede with the king and protector, that they might be restored to the same. This was again attempted in the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, and in that of king James I. but still without success.

The second writ by which the clergy were assembled together, was called the provincial writ. By the first writ, they were a mere state convention, and not a church synod; and the intent of their meeting was, to consult about their civil rights, and to grant a portion of their estates towards the support of the government. But, the clergy not looking upon themselves as obliged to obey this lay summons, archbishop Winchelsea prevailed with king Edward II. to discharge them from it; and from that time, when the king issued his parliamentary writ to the bishops, he sent another to the archbishop, to summon all his provincial bishops to the convocation.—This second writ was to secure their obedience to the former, and to make the assembly more canonical, as meeting by virtue of a summons from their archbishop. This writ is now ordered by the lord chancellor, and transmitted by him to the archbishop of Canterbury, who issues thereupon his mandate to the bishop of London, as dean of his province.

The clergy, assembled in convocation, had the power of giving away their own money, and taxing themselves; a power which they continued to exercise from the Reformation till the 15th year of Charles II. from which time they receded from that customary right, and were for that reason discharged from two of the four subsidies given by themselves, and then in arrear; and it was for this reason, that from the time before-mentioned, the rectors and vicars, who were to be taxed for their spiritual preferments, were allowed to vote in elections for knights of the shire, that they might still be virtually taxed by themselves.

The power of the convocation is limited by a statute of king Henry VIII. They are not to make any canons or ecclesiastical laws without the king's licence, nor, when permitted to make any, can they put them in execution but under these restrictions:—

1. Such canons must not be contrary to the king's prerogative.
2. They must not contradict any statute, or the common law.
3. Nor must they alter any known custom of the realm.

They have the examining and censuring all heretical and schismatical books, persons, &c. but there lies an appeal to the king in chancery, or to his delegates. The clergy in convocation, and their servants, have the same privileges as members of parliament.

The reason why the convocation is not permitted to sit, was originally owing to the unhappy disputes that began after the Revolution, between the high-church party and those who favoured moderation.—In the latter end of queen Anne's reign, these disputes were not only carried on with an unbecoming heat, but some of the disputants went almost stark mad. Mr. Dodwell wrote a book to prove, that the human soul is mortal, but becomes immortal by baptism, so as the ceremony is performed by those ministers who have received episcopal ordination.—This book was levelled against the Dissenters, but it was answered by the churchmen. Dr. Atterbury attempted to prove that the convocation had a power equal to that of the parliament, but he was learnedly answered by Nicholson, bishop of Carlisle. And Dr. Sacheverell did not content himself with giving all the Dissenters to the devil, he actually called all those of his own brethren hypocrites, who were not equally violent with himself. The whole nation was in a flame, the people were driven to a state of religious insanity, the Dissenters had their meetings pulled down, and the moderate part of the clergy were in danger of sharing the same fate.

This occasioned the making the riot act, and such was the madness of the people, that a club of high-churchmen in a public-house, went to another public-house in Salisbury-court, where there was a club of low-church, or moderate men, and pulled the house down to the ground. For this offence, some of the rioters suffered death, and of course their families were ruined.

The learned Dr. Hoadly represented to his majesty George I. that such tumults would never cease while the convocation was permitted to do business, because their disputes tended to inflame the minds of the people. These things having been taken into consideration, it was resolved on in council, that the convocation should be still summoned to meet, but on the day of their meeting they should be adjourned.

We have been the more explicit concerning these matters, because we could wish the reader to know as much as possible.

The last thing to be treated of is, the discipline of the church of England, or the means by which good order is kept up, and delinquents punished.

In all civil establishments of religion, there must be a power lodged somewhere, and in general this is vested in the clergy, except in the church of England, where the proceedings against offenders are carried on, in what is called the bishop's, or spiritual court. The proceedings in these courts are carried on by the bishop's chancellor, who is generally a doctor of the civil law; but if he happens to be a clergyman, he gets another to act for him, who is called his official. Adultery, blasphemy, refusing to pay tithes, traducing the characters of their neighbours, together with many other gross immoralities, are cognizable in this court.

The proceedings begin by citation, which issues from the court, and is delivered by an officer called Aparitor. If the person who receives the summons, treats the order with contempt, then he is liable to be excommunicated, and he can be arrested for the plaintiff's costs. And even supposing he should be able to pay the bill of costs, yet he cannot get admitted into the church again without doing penance. Excommunicated persons are much in the same condition as if they had been proscribed.—They cannot have their children baptized; they cannot be admitted to the communion; they cannot sue in any action in law, so as to obtain property; they cannot be admitted to swear as evidences in a court of justice; they cannot marry;—and, in a word, the sentence is dreadful, for it even denies the excommunicated person the common rights of Christian burial. The proceedings in these courts are very expensive, and it is dangerous to be concerned in them; but they are calculated to teach people not to offend.

The public examination of the children is a us-cessary part of the discipline of the church of England, and it is much to be wished that it was more attended to than it is.

The catechism of the church of England is drawn up, after the primitive manner, by way of question and answer. Originally it consisted of no more than repetition of the baptismal vow, the creed, and the Lord's prayer: but king James I. ordered the bishops to add to it a short and plain explanation of the sacraments; which was accordingly performed by bishop Overall, then dean of St. Paul's, and approved by the rest of the bishops.

This catechism is universally allowed to comprehend a summary of the Christian doctrine; it being so short, that the youngest children may fix it in their memory, and yet so full, that it contains all things necessary to be known and practised in order to salvation.

The times appointed for catechising are Sundays and holidays. By the first book of Edward VI. it was not required to be done above once in six weeks. But, upon Bucer's objecting to the interval of time as too long, the rubric was altered, but expressed notwithstanding, in indefinite terms, leaving it to be done as often as occasion requires. Indeed, the fifty-ninth canon enjoins every parson, vicar, or curate, upon every Sunday and holiday, to teach and instruct the youth and ignorant persons of his parish, in the catechism set forth in the book of Common Prayer; and that under pain of a sharp reproof for the first omission, suspension for the second, and excommunication for the third.

In the other parts of the discipline of the church of England, the minister is obliged to visit the sick, and to baptize such children as are in danger of dying without the benefit of that ceremony. In refusing to perform any of these ceremonies, he is liable to be informed against in the spiritual court, and may be suspended from his living by the bishop. It is, however, not a very easy matter to proceed against clergymen in these matters, and perhaps the fewer disputes take place between the ministers and the parishioners the better. This should always be attended to, that no offence be taken against religion. Clergymen are not to enjoy any more benefices with the cure of souls than one, unless any obtain a second by a dispensation from the lord chancellor. However they may, at the same time, enjoy sinecures in cathedrals.

The holding pluralities of livings has been much complained of, as inconsistent with the institution of the Christian church, and much has been written on the subject by Dr. Newton on the one hand, and Mr. Wharton on the other. It is certain, that it was not known till the middle ages of Christianity. England is the only Protestant country where it is permitted, and non-residence has been a continual bone of contention. The late bishop Burnet, in his charge to the clergy of the diocese of Salisbury, mentioned an expression made use of by one of the ancient fathers, when a young man came to be ordained, and who wanted to hold two livings; the good bishop asked him how he was to discharge the duty of both? He answered, he would do the duty of one himself, and the other could be done by a substitute. "Yes, answered the bishop, you may get the duty done by a substitute, but you will be damned in person." This had such an effect on Mr. Kelsey, a pious clergyman, that he gave up one of the two livings he enjoyed, and Dr. Burnet had so much regard for him on that account, that he made him his archdeacon, in order to set an example to the rest of his brethren.

In all these matters of dispute, we shall not concern ourselves; because where there is such a general toleration as we enjoy, there can be but little room to complain. There is not a Protestant church in the world, but what will own its imperfections: If this was not the case, then we might, like the Roman Catholics, pretend to the belief of infallibility, a notion which we utterly disclaim.

Upon the whole, no Protestant church has produced greater scholars, better writers, or more pious Christians, than that of England; and where the means of grace are to be found, it is our fault if we do not use them in a proper manner. However, the rigour of the ecclesiastical law may appear to some, yet the innocent need not be afraid of it; and as for non-residents in parishes, if they are culpable of a fault, the people are no losers in general thereby, because they generally find substitutes or curates to perform the duty for the hearers. Thus, where there is no loss there should be no complaint, and this should reconcile us all to those circumstances, which sometimes create diversity of opinions.—The members of the church of England live in peace with those who differ from them in religious sentiments, leaving every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.—They are not led away by those prejudices, which took place in former times; they consider their Protestant brethren travelling to heaven as well as themselves, and therefore they are much to be honoured. Long may true religion flourish among them:—may their ministers become an ornament to their profession, and the people an honour to the gospel; and to use the words of the apostle; "Let every one who nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

THE HISTORY OF CALVINISM.

THE next religious profession in order among Protestants, is that of Calvinism, established first at the little Republic of Geneva, afterwards in several of the Cantons of Switzerland; and professed by almost one half of the people in France, before the revocation of the edict of Nantz, 1685. In 1560, it was established in Scotland, as will be mentioned afterwards, and it is now the national religion of the Seven United Provinces; and throughout most of the American provinces this system is professed.

In giving an account of this religion, we shall be extremely impartial, and point out how far the public profession of Calvinism differs in one place from another, beginning with the life of its illustrious founder.

John Calvin was born at Soissons a city of France, June 6, 1509. His father's name was Gerrard Calvin, who gave his son a liberal education.

From the grammar school, he sent him to Paris, and placed him with Maturinus Corderius, a man well esteemed both for probity and learning.

His father, from the beginning, designed him for the study of divinity, which he judged him to be much inclined to, being religiously addicted from his childhood. He procured a benefice of the bishop for him, in Soissons, in which place John, before his ordination, preached divers sermons to the people. But this purpose of his was afterwards altered; for his father, seeing the study of the law was the surer step to riches and honour, altered his mind, and his son, growing into acquaintance with a certain kinsman of his, was by him instructed in the true religion, whereupon he applied himself to the study of the sacred scriptures, and began to abominate the superstitious services in the popish church.

Whilst he was employed in these studies, he neglected not that of divinity, so that he preached divers sermons in a neighbouring town. But whilst he was thus busied, news came to him of his father's death, which called him back into his own country. Having settled his affairs there, he went to Paris, being now about twenty-four years old. After a few months stay at Paris, he grew acquainted with all that professed the reformed religion; and among the rest, with Stephen Forgeus, a famous merchant, who afterwards sealed the truth with his blood.

From henceforward, at the earnest request of all those that held their private meetings in Paris, he laid aside all other studies, and wholly applied himself to that of divinity. At this time Nicholas Cope was rector of the university at Paris; who, being to make an oration on All-saints day, at the instigation of John Calvin, spoke of religion more purely and clearly than he used to do. This the parliament of Paris was angry at, inasmuch that they cited him before them; but, as he went, some of his friends advised him to take heed of his adversaries; whereupon he returned home, and immediately after left France and went to Basil.

The officers, sent by the parliament, searching for Cope, went into Calvin's house, who, by chance, not being at home, they ransacked his study, and amongst his papers, found many of his friends' letters, which had like to have endangered the lives of many. But it pleased God to divert that storm, by the prudent and pious diligence of the queen of Navarre, the only sister of king Francis, a woman of admirable wit, and exceedingly tender of the professors of the reformed religion. She also sent for Mr. Calvin to her court, used him very hospitably, and heard him gladly. But Mr. Calvin finding Paris too hot for his abode, went to Xantonge, where, he sojourning with a friend, at his request, drew up short admonitions, which were dispensed amongst certain priests, to be taught to their people, that so they might by little and little, be drawn to search out the truth.

About the same time, observing that there were many in France that knew, and were convinced of the truth, and yet indulged themselves as if it were enough that they reserved their hearts for Christ, though they were present at the Popish services, he published two elegant epistles; one, to exhort the flying idolatry; the other on the popish priesthood. But whilst he (Calvin) was thus employed, he met with grievous seditions at home.

The gospel indeed was entertained, and popery abjured in Geneva; but many were not reformed from the profane and scandalous courses which they had learned of the popish clergy; and the ancient feuds amongst the chief families were not yet laid aside. These, at first, were gently admonished, and, when that prevailed not, more sharply reprehended; and, when yet they continued stubborn, and the city, by the factions of private persons, was divided into parties, Farrell, Calvin, and Carodus, openly professed that they could by no means administer the Lord's supper to persons who were at such enmity amongst themselves.

Upon this occasion, the Syndics which were chosen for that year at Geneva, who, for the time, are the chief magistrates, assembling, the captains of the seditious persons, so far prevailed, that these three worthy servants of Christ were commanded, within two days, to depart the city. When this decree was brought to Calvin, he said, "Truly, if I had served men, I should have had but an ill reward; but it is well—that I have served him who doth always perform to his servants what he hath once promised."

Calvin went to Basil, and thence to Strasbourg; where, by desire of the senate, he was made professor of divinity, which place he discharged with great applause of learned men; and by the consent of the senate, planted the French church there, and settled discipline in it. Calvin settled in another place, and a new church was erected.

At this time, cardinal Sadolet, a man of great eloquence, seeing the flock deprived of such able and vigilant shepherds, thought it fit time to ensnare them; for which end he wrote letters, directed to his dear friends as he called them, the senate, council, and people of Geneva, in which he omitted no arguments, whereby he might persuade them to return into the bosom of the Romish church. There was no man in Geneva that would undertake to answer him; so that probably these letters would have done much mischief, but that they were written in a foreign language. But when Calvin had read them; forgetting all the wrongs which had been done him, he returned an answer so speedily and eloquently that the cardinal, despairing of accomplishing his end, wholly gave over his design.

Mr. Calvin continued at Strasbourg to the year 1541, in which the emperor Charles V. assembled two diets, the one at Worms, the other at Ratisbon, for composing the differences about religion: at both which Mr. Calvin was present, to the great advantage of the churches, and where he was most lovingly entertained by Philip Melancthon, and Gasper Cruciger. He also had much private conference with them about the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and they could not but approve of his opinion therein. The city of Geneva began to call for Farrell and Calvin; but when, by no means, they could recover Farrell, they used all their endeavours to procure Calvin; and for that end, sent ambassadors to Strasbourg. The senate of Strasbourg were exceedingly unwilling to hearken to it; and Calvin himself, abhorring to enter into new troubles, and finding great success attended his ministry at Strasbourg, did absolutely refuse to return. Besides, Bucer, and the other pastors, did profess their great unwillingness to part with him.

But the Genevians still pressing hard for him, Bucer at last thought their requests should be condescended to. This falling out just at the time when Calvin, with Bucer, was going to the diet at Ratisbon, his return was delayed for a time; when they chose Peter Viret: and, indeed, this made Mr. Calvin far more willing to return, when he saw that he was to have such a colleague.

Mr. Calvin went to Geneva, September the 13th, 1541, being singularly welcomed by the people, and especially by the senate, who acknowledged the wonderful mercy of God towards them, in restoring him to them. And whereas the senate of Strasbourg had decreed, that, after a time, he should return to them again; that of Geneva would never give it over, till they had reversed that decree, which at last, was yielded to by those of Strasbourg, yet with this proviso, that the pension, which they had settled upon him, should still be continued to him.

But Mr. Calvin could never be persuaded to receive it, caring for nothing less than for riches. Mr. Calvin being thus restored to his church, and perceiving that the city needed such bridles, he professed that he could not comfortably exercise his ministry among them, except, together with the doctrine of the gospel, they would embrace the Presbyterian government, for the well regulating of the church. Hereupon elders were chosen, and a model of government was drawn up.

His ordinary labours were these: every other sabbath he preached twice; Mouday, Tuesday, Wednesday, he read his divinity lectures; every Thursday he assisted in the consistory for the ecclesiastical discipline. On Fridays he read a lecture for the clearing hard places of the scriptures; answered many adversaries to the truth; wrote many letters to sundry places. So that we have cause to wonder how it was possible for one man to undergo so many businesses.

Besides his forementioned labours, he had also the charge and business of a family, and many foreign employments; for God so blessed his ministry, that from all parts of the Christian world, he was sought to, partly for advice in matters of religion, and partly to hear him preach; so that, at the same time, there was an Italian church, an English church, and a Spanish church, and the city seemed too little to entertain all that came to it for his sake.

In 1542, Mr. Calvin met with many afflictions, some at home, but especially by the fury of the adversaries of the truth abroad in France and Italy, whence they drove away many professors of the gospel, for the comfort of whom he laid himself out exceedingly, writing many encouraging letters every way, both to those that were escaped, and to those that yet remained in the lion's jaws.

In 1545, was that abominable and cruel edict which the parliament of Aquitaine set forth against the poor Waldenses of Merindol, Cabriers, and those parts; whereby unheard-of cruelties were exercised, not against some few, but against all of them, without any distinction of age or sex.

Some of those that escaped, flying to Geneva, Calvin was the more afflicted for them, and careful of them, because, a little before, he had written consolatory letters to them, and sent them faithful pastors, and had also, where they were in danger before, preserved them by his intercession to the German princes.

In 1546, one of the senators, in a public assembly of the people, blamed Calvin as one that taught false doctrine, suborned, as was supposed, by two of the college of pastors, both of them being drunkards, and, therefore, fearing the severity of the laws. But Mr. Calvin made little account of this. Yet the man who accused him was called before the senate, and, his cause being heard, was condemned for slander; and those two drunken ministers who had set him on, were removed out of their places.

The year 1547 proved far worse; indeed that age saw not a more calamitous time than it was: the churches of Germany seemed to be utterly subverted, the Protestant princes taken, and cities yielding up themselves after so great labours used, and so great difficulties passed through, in planting the gospel amongst them.

With what grief Mr. Calvin was afflicted for the desolations of the churches, is not easy to express, especially if we consider that great affection which he bore to them, though far remote from him, which indeed was no other than if he had supported them all upon his shoulders. Indeed he was wonderfully grieved when he heard of those holy men, his worthy friends Philip Melancthon, Bucer, Peter Martyr, &c. in so great danger, that they seemed nearer death than life.

In the midst of these contentions, the church of Geneva did wonderfully increase, and Mr. Calvin was very solicitous to entertain and provide for such as were banished for the name of Christ. In the year 1550, the church of Christ enjoyed peace, and then it was decreed in Geneva, that the ministers, not only in their sermons, which many neglected, and others heard with small profit, but, from house to house, should divide the city amongst them, and require of every family an account of their faith; by which means it is scarce credible what benefit accrued to the people.

At this time a grievous persecution rising at Paris, it was a great concern to Mr. Calvin; many being taken when they were assembled in St. James's-street, for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, being about eighty in number, the rest escaping by the benefit of the night; who, the next morning, were led to prison, loaded with scorn and reproaches, though some of them were noble women of good account.

There were also some false witnesses furnished against them, when the credulous multitude were too apt to believe; there were, therefore, seven of them brought forth to be burned, amongst whom there was a noble woman, who, with six others, shewed admirable patience; and whereas they were accused of promiscuous whoredoms at their meetings, a learned man who had lately been their pastor, easily confuted those lies; and the German princes interceding in their behalf, which Mr. Calvin procured with admirable celerity, the tempest was, in a good measure, blown over.

The year 1559 was famous for the league entered into between the two most potent kings of Spain and France, strengthened by affinity betwixt them, which was likely to prove fatal to Geneva. In the mean-time Calvin, though sickly, laboured hard, comforting the afflicted churches; as also by his frequent and fervent prayers, craving help of God. Whilst all things were full of terror, the king of France, in the great marriage solemnity which was made for the confirmation of the peace, in his running at tilt, received his death wound, and that by the hand of the captain of his guard, by whom, a little before he had apprehended and imprisoned several senators.

At this time the Bohemians sent two of their brethren to Calvin, to desire his judgment about some matters of religion, whom he lovingly satisfied, exhorting them also that they would enter into a nearer conjunction with other reformed churches. At the same time also, queen Mary being dead, and queen Elizabeth succeeding, many of the French relying upon her piety and humanity, fled for refuge into England, with the consent of that reverend divine Edmund Grindal, bishop of London; and craved leave of her, that one might be sent from Geneva, to plant a French church there.

Towards the latter end of this year, king Francis of France, died suddenly, and that in such a juncture of time, when all things seemed desperate.—King Charles IX. a child, was scarce entered on his reign, when by a herald, letters subscribed with his name were brought to Geneva, wherein he complained that many were sent from thence, who infected his kingdom, desiring that they might be presently called back; threatening, that otherwise he would revenge the injury.

Calvin, being hereupon sent for by the senate, answered in his own, and in his colleague's names, that, at the request of the churches of France, they had exhorted certain men who were sound in the faith, and of a holy life, that they should not be wanting to lend their help to their country in so holy a cause; and that this they had done, not to disturb the kingdom, but that the people might be taught the gospel of peace; and, if they were accused for any thing further than this, they were ready to answer their accusers before the king: so this business went no further.

In the year 1562, God gave peace and liberty to the French churches, by a public edict of the king: but not long after the king of Navarre, presently after the duke of Guise had committed that abominable massacre at Vassy, began a civil war, which continued many years after, to the miserable devastation of France. It cannot be spoken how much Calvin was afflicted therewith, which so far increased his disease, that it was easy to divine, that it would not be long before he would be translated to a better life; yet he did not desist from exhorting and comforting every one, nor from preaching and reading his ordinary lectures.

In this manner Calvin continued to practise the duties of his function till he sunk under a variety of infirmities, and at last died on the third day of June, 1563, much beloved by the people of Geneva, and much esteemed by all the Protestant churches.

His works are numerous, and amongst them is a commentary on the bible, written in elegant Latin. But those which chiefly demand our notice are, his institutions of the Christian religion. Calvin had been brought up to the study of the civil law of the Romans, and therefore he considered, or imagined, that every science should be reduced to a system.— Thus he drew up his famous institutions of the Christian religion, on the same plan as that laid down by the emperor Justinian, and followed by all the Civilians. It is certain, that systematical learning gives people a clearer notion of the truth than any other methods that can be made use of; but still it is equally certain, that systems may be too slavishly attended to. If systems are considered as mere matter of speculation, and not imposed as absolutely binding on the conscience, they may be innocent enough; but when they are imposed as the real sense of the word of God, they sometimes wound the tender conscience, and lay a stumbling-block before the weak and well-meaning.

It is acknowledged by bishop Burnet, Mr. Brandt, and other writers, that all the Protestant reformers embraced the same notions with St. Austin, bishop of Hippo, in Africa. That Luther did so, appears evident from his commentary on the epistle to the Galatians; and that the English reformers were of the same opinion, appears from perusing the thirtynine articles. Calvin, however, was the first person who reduced the sentiments of St. Austin into a system, and those who will read his works in a dispassionate manner, will find that he has done justice to that celebrated father. That Austin was opposed by all the Greek fathers in his time, is certain, but this does not concern us at present. All we have to do is to point out those grand distinguishing marks by which the doctrine of St. Austin is known, and the systematical manner, into which it was reduced by Calvin, and, in some measure, though not in every thing, still adhered to by those people called Calvinists.

And, first, they assert that God made all things in a state of perfection, and entered into a covenant with our first parents, that they should enjoy eternal life, in consequence of their obedience to the law, which he had prescribed as the rule of their conduct: that had they continued to obey this law, they would have become immortal as the angels, and death could have had no dominion over them. But should they transgress this law, then they were to be subject to all the miseries of this life; to death itself both temporal and eternal. That in consequence of our first parents disobeying this command, the divine malediction was to descend to all their posterity, and the earth was to be cursed for their sake. That is, they were not to receive those instantaneous productions which the garden of Eden afforded, but they were to labour hard in order to procure sustentance.

Secondly, that our first parents did forfeit the divine favour, by eating the forbidden fruit, and having been declared guilty by the Almighty Lord. God of providence and grace, they were excluded from his favour, and all their descendants were involved in the general dreadful calamity. This fall of our first parents, not only involved us in their guilt, but in the ordinary way of generation, conveyed to us a natural propensity to evil. All the faculties of the human soul were disordered, that glorious fabric which God had erected after his own image, was in a manner reduced to a heap of ruins, and man, who had come pure from the hands of his maker, became, by the domineering slavery of his passions, like one of the beasts that perish.— This was the origin of evil (we speak in the words of the Calvinists) and from that dreadful period, there has been little but sin in the world. All the evils that have taken place, have been caused by the fall of man; he has become obnoxious to his maker, and the beasts of the field, over which he was made the universal lord, are now become his enemies; when he fell he was without hope, because he knew the eternal mandate would hold good, for God is the fountain of truth and cannot lie.

Thirdly, it was asserted by St. Austin, and embraced by Calvin, that no man had it in his power to turn to God when he pleased, but that he must wait for the operation of efficacious grace. This sentiment has occasioned much controversy; and although there are some expressions in the apostolical epistles that give countenance to it, yet they should be read with much caution. Our notion of God should always be founded on the principles of moral rectitude; but here we are led into an amazing difficulty, when we come to consider what moral rectitude is. Human nature objects, that it is inconsistent with the divine attributes, to exact obedience from the man who has it not in his power to perform it, and those feelings peculiar to men as rational beings, teach them, that the merciful Lord of the universe cannot act the part of a tyrant.

On the other hand, it is asserted, that God has a right to dispose of his creatures in what manner he thinks proper, and that he may exact obedience without giving any reason for so doing. And here the words of the prophet Isaiah are brought in to support the sentiment. "My ways are not as your ways, nor my thoughts as your thoughts." It is certain that Omnipotence cannot be limited, and it is blasphemy in men to set bounds to the divine perfections.

Our Lord says, "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." And again, the prophet Isaiah says,— "Let the sinner forsake his ways, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord who will have mercy, and our God who will abundantly pardon." In these, and in many other expressions in the sacred scriptures, there seems to be no privation of the will implied. There are, however, objections against this, in support of the original sentiment.

Thus it is said, that "No man can come unto me, except the father which sent me draw him."— In our humble opinion (for we will not dictate to any one) these words do not refer to the privation of the human will, but they seem to be an allusion to those words of the prophet, "I will allure them into the wilderness, and there will I speak comfortably to them." The alluring goodness of God leads men to repentance: for what disobedient son would not obey his father, if he was to treat him with tenderness? It is said several times in scripture,— "None ever sought God in vain," and therefore let every one make a proper use of those powers given them, and then most certainly God will command his blessing.

The next article in the systematical plan of Calvinism, which deserves our notice, is that of predestination. Like the article concerning the freedom of the human will, it has been much animadverted on, and perhaps little understood. We cannot, under the present head, take notice of it in its utmost point of view, being obliged to confine ourselves to the sense in which St. Austin broached it, and how it was retained by Calvin.

We are certain, that the sacred scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament, give some sort of countenance to the doctrine of predestination; but the grand question is, does this predestination apply to individuals, or is it only the ordinance of God at large? it has been contended that it should be taken in the former sense, and the sentiment has been founded and supported on the following principle.

"God looking down upon the human race, saw that all mankind would be disobedient to his commands, and therefore he fixed what should be their inevitable fate. He ordered it so, that these people should never be able to make a proper use of the means of grace so as to lead them to eternal happiness; or at least these means should not be conveyed to them in an efficacious manner. And yet at the same time, it was asserted, that the clergy should teach the people to comply with the plan laid down in the gospel, without considering that at the same time they were denied the exercise of the freedom of the human will." Calvin seems to have considered the doctrine in the following light.

"He believed that God had fixed an eternal purpose to save some part of the human race, and to reject the others; but as that was a secret which no human being could know, consequently it was the duty of ministers to exhort all their people alike. This last sentiment is much favoured by several expressions in the sacred scriptures, and particularly in the New Testament, and probably it is in consequence thereof that some of the genuine Calvinists exhort their people to duties, without prying into the divine decrees." That God knows what shall happen to his creatures in this world cannot be denied; but that he lays an impulse upon their wills, has been disputed. We do not chuse to enter into this controversy, for we are certain, that there is enough in the sacred scriptures to give satisfaction to every humble enquirer, and make men wise unto salvation.

It must be acknowledged, that the Divine Being sees all that passes in the course of this life, and has it, as it were, all before him, from the beginning of time, till the commencement of eternity. To deprive God of prescience, is to rob him of one of his attributes; but then we may believe that God knows, without saying that he lays a restraint on our rational powers. Dr. Edwards of New Jersey has written with great judgment on this subject, and such was the effect of this treatise, that it induced lord Kames to alter the second edition of his discourses on religion and morality. But no writer we know of ever came up to the learned lord Stair.

That nobleman, who had seen much of the world and served the crown fifty years, in one of his meditations, says, "That to believe in the prescience, or fore-knowledge of God, is the same thing as to believe in predestination; for if God foresees what will happen and does not change it, then the effect is the same as if he had appointed it." And he adds, that there is a comfort in believing a doctrine which sets the Omnipotence of God in such a grand point of view. "Did my gracious God (says his lordship) create me and send me into this world? Did he bring me under the light, and within the sound of the everlasting gospel? Did he give me power to embrace that gospel, and will he suffer me to perish? No: I will say with Luther,—I can trust my soul with God."

The next article in Calvinism, and that which distinguishes it from Arminianism, is particular redemption. That is, that Christ died to save only a select number of the human race. This naturally follows the doctrine of absolute predestination; for if God has appointed that a certain number of the human race shall be saved, and no others, consequently Christ could only have died for that number, and the efficacy of his death could not reach any further.

The nature of this work leads us into the necessity of taking notice of every disputed point in religion; but still we could wish the reader to judge for himself. That Calvin taught that there was such a thing as particular redemption, cannot be denied; for this is plain throughout the whole of his institutes. And yet this celebrated reformer seems to have thought otherwise at some times; for in his commentary on the parable of the king's making a marriage feast for his son, he says, that the man who had not the wedding garment was condemned by the evidence of his own conscience, because he might have had it—if he chose; and this may serve to shew, that men had a power to comply with the terms offered in the gospel. Thus we find how difficult it is to keep to the positive words of a system, while the sentiment is disputable. It is certain, that there may be different conclusions drawn from many intricate passages in scripture, and in all such cases we should be humble, without prying into the secrets of the Almighty.

Another, and a very important article in St. Austin's system, is that of final perseverance, which was embraced by Calvin. There are many passages in the sacred scripture, that may be understood as not only favouring this doctrine, but even enforcing it. Thus it is said, "the path of the just man is a shining light, that shineth more and more until the perfect day," and again, "those whom he once loved, he loved to the end." Nay, there are many other expressions stronger in support of the doctrine than those above quoted, and there are others that appear quite the contrary. Thus it is said, "let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." Many great and pious men have believed, that although God will not forsake his people who love and serve him, yet they may forsake him, and become objects of his displeasure. This seems to have been the opinion of the elegant and pious Dr. Watts, when he says,

Unshaken as the sacred hill,
And firm as mountains be;
Firm as a rock the soul shall rest,
That leans, O Lord, on thee!

The greatest objection made to this doctrine, is, that it leads to carnal security, keeping men off that holy caution and strict guard which should regulate all their actions. It is further objected, that it fills the mind with pride, by teaching people to believe, that they themselves are more worthy of the divine favour than others. Perhaps there is too much truth in this; for surely we may trust in the divine veracity, without running into presumption.

Mr. Neale, in his account of the death of Oliver Cromwell, has recorded an anecdote which we shall consider as true, because it comes from the pen of such a candid writer. He tells us that when Oliver Cromwell lay on his death-bed, he was attended by the most eminent divines of the independent persuasion. Amongst these was Dr. Thos. Godwin, then president of Magdalen college, Oxford. This gentleman, whose writings are dull and tedious, seems to have been a great favourite of the protector's; for Cromwell asked him seriously, "whether there was a falling off from grace." Godwin said there was not; then replied Cromwell, "I am certain I once had grace." And in these sentiments this man died.

To conclude, these disputed points are exceedingly dangerous, when handled without caution and moderation; but they have been treated with respect by the wise of all denominations. They have created much confusion, and yet one would imagine there was no necessity for any thing of that nature. God has revealed enough for us to know, in order to make us happy, both in time and in eternity, and therefore it is irreverent, as well as indecent and impious in us to enquire into secrets, which to know can be of no service to us, nor even make us wise unto salvation.

The wit of the profane, the malice of the satirical, and the laugh of the debauchee, have been all united to ridicule those notions which St. Austin broached, and Calvin taught. This will appear from an attentive consideration of the following verses of Mr. Dryden.

But here the doctors eagerly dispute,
Some hold predestination absolute:
Some clerks maintain, that heav'n at first foresees,
And in the virtue of fore-sight decrees.

If this be so, then prescience binds the will,
And mortals are not free to good or ill;
For what he first foresaw he must ordain,
Or his eternal prescience may be vain.

As bad for us if prescience had not been:
For first, or last, he's author of the sin.

And who says that, let the blaspheming man
Say worse, ev'n of the devil, if he can.

For how can that eternal pow'r be just
To punish man, who sins—because he must?

Or, how can he reward a virtuous deed,
Which is not done by us, but first decreed?

I cannot bould this matter to the brain,
As Bradwardin and holy Austin can:

If prescience can determine actions so,
That we must do because he did foreknow?

Or that foreknowing, yet our choice is free,
Not forc'd to sin by strict necessity.

This strict necessity they simple call
Another sort, there is conditional.

The first so binds the will, that things foreknown,
By spontanciry, not choice, are done.

Thus galley-slaves tug willing at their oar,
Content to work in prospect of the shore,
But would not work at all if not constrain'd
Before.

That ether does not liberty restrain;
But man may either act, or may refrain;
Heav'n made us agents free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not though he foresaw the will.
Freedom was first bestow'd on human race,
And the prescience only held the second place.

If he could make such agents wholly free,
I'll not dispute,—the point's too high for me:
For heaven's unfathom'd pow'r what man can sound,

Or put to his omnipotence a bound?

He made us to his image; all agree,
That image is the soul, and that must be,
Or not the maker's image, or be free.

But whether it were better man had been
By nature bound to good, not free to sin,
I wave, for fear of splitting on a rock.

Having said thus much concerning the doctrinal principles of the Calvinists, we must now proceed to their worship. All the reformers pretended to simplicity, but all did not attain to it. Of this we have a striking instance in the Lutherans, who have retained many of the popish ceremonies. On the other hand, the church of England kept in the middle, between the two extremes, while the Calvinists attempted to strip religion of all those gaudy ornaments which it had borrowed from superstition.—In Geneva, where Calvinism was first propagated, in Holland, in some of the German provinces, and indeed every where but in England and Scotland, their form and manner of worship is the same.—There may, indeed, be some few differences, but they are of such a trifling nature as not to be worthy of notice. At Geneva, and in Holland, as well as in all the provinces of Germany, and Switzerland, where Calvinism is professed, the service is conducted in the following manner:—

The minister goes into the reading-desk, and having told the people to lift up their hearts to God, begins with a short prayer, begging the divine presence to be with them, during the whole of the worship. This being over, he reads two or three chapters out of the Old or New Testament, according to his own discretion, and then a psalm or hymn is sung.

He then reads the Ten Commandment, which are followed by the Apostles' Creed, and another hymn or psalm is sung afterwards. And here it is necessary to observe, that in most of the Calvinistical churches abroad, they have organs, together with some other sorts of instrumental music.

This part of the service being over, the minister goes into the pulpit, and repeats an extemporary prayer for the whole state of mankind in the world, and then a discourse follows, which is either a sermon on a particular text, or a paraphrase of some passage in the sacred scripture. The sermon being over, another hymn is sung, after which the congregation are dismissed with a blessing.

With respect to the sacrament of baptism, it is as amongst us, administered to their infants, but they do not use the sign of the cross, nor have they any godfathers or godmothers, every father being obliged to stand sponsor for his own child. On which occasion he binds himself to see it brought up in the fear of God.

In the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, they are not confined to any rule with respect to the mode of administration, nor have they any altars. Some of the communicants receive it kneeling, some sitting, and others standing. This allowance granted to tender consciences is much to be commended; for what may appear trifling to one man, may have a most formidable appearance to another.

The Calvinists abroad, that is, on the continent of Europe, also observe several holy days, such as Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, with some others; but they do not pay superstitions regard to them.—However, we find in the acts of the general assembly of the church of Scotland in 1594, something remarkable on this subject. King James told the general assembly of the clergy, that the people of Geneva kept their Christmas and their Pasch; and pray, said he, what warrant have they for it? It is nothing but will-worship, and, like the service of the church of England,—it is an ill said muss in English. James, however, changed his sentiments afterwards, and became a persecutor of those very people whose piety and religion he had extolled.

In the discipline among the Calvinists, there is something that bears a near affinity to the ancient church. Every congregation has its own minister, and under him are a certain number of respectable persons, called Elders. These elders are ordained by the imposition of the hands of the minister, and their business is to visit the sick from house to house, and to pray with them.

They are to be men of fair characters, against whom no complaint has been preferred, and they are to examine, in the absence of the minister, all those who desire to come to the communion. They are to give notice to the minister of all such persons as lead scandalous and immoral lives, that they may be cut off from the congregation of the faithful.

They are to take care that no part of their own conduct shall give such offence, so as to bring the gospel into disrepute; and they are to be at all times ready to assist the minister with their advice. This order among the Calvinists seems to have come in the room of the presbyters in the ancient church, who were always to assist the bishop, both by their council and otherwise. These men are not elected for a time, as churchwardens are in England, but they are ordained for life, and nothing can set aside the exercise of their office, but some crimes of a scandalous nature.

The next order of officers in the Calvinistical churches abroad are deacons, whose business it is to visit the poor, and distribute as much money as the church allows for that purpose. They are elected by the people, and appointed by the minister; they are to carry the elements of bread and wine round to the communicants: they are to see that the widows and orphans are provided for in a proper manner, and that Christian parents bring up their children in the fear of God. They are to give a faithful account to the minister and elders in what manner they have disposed of the money committed to their care; and they are, by their conduct, to set an example before all those who belong to the congregation. They are to be extremely cautious into what company soever they go, and they are to maintain a conscience void of offence towards God and man.

The first time we hear or read of deacons in the Christian church is in Acts vi. and as to their office, it seems to have succeeded that of the Levites among the Jews, who were to be ministers and servants under the old law. The following account of the ordination of primitive deacons will, no doubt, give some satisfaction to our readers.

The ordination of a deacon, in the primitive church, differed from that of a presbyter, both in the form and manner of it, and also in the gifts and powers conferred thereby. The ordination of the former might be performed by the bishop alone, who puts up his prayer in general that "God would make his face to shine upon his servant, who was then chosen to the office of a deacon, and fill him with the holy spirit and power as he did Stephen the martyr; that he, behaving himself acceptably, uniformly, and unblameably in his office, might be thought worthy of an higher degree, &c."

As to the office of deacons, the most common and ordinary was, to be attendant on the bishop or presbyters in the service of the altars, to take care of the holy table and all the ornaments and utensils belonging to it. In the next place, they were to receive the offerings of the people, and to present them to the priest, at the same time reciting the names of those that offered. In some churches, but not in all, the deacons read the gospel, both before and at the communion service. At Alexandria, the archdeacon only reads the gospels, and in some churches, on high festivals, the bishop himself, as at Constantinople, on Easter-day. But it was something more peculiar to the office of deacons, to assist the bishop and presbyters in the administration of the eucharist: at which their business was, to distribute the elements to the people who were present, and carry them to those that were absent. But they were not allowed to consecrate them at the altar; as appears from the testimonies of Hilary, Jerome, and the author of the constitutions; who assign as a reason, that deacons were reckoned no priests, or but in the lowest degree.—As to the sacrament of baptism, it is evident, they were permitted, in some cases, to administer it solely, as appears from Tertullian, Jerome, and the council of Eliberis.

Another part of the office of deacons was, to be a sort of monitors and directors to the people, in the exercise of their public devotions in the church. To which purpose they made use of certain known forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service began.

The deacons had a power to preach, by licence and authority from the bishop, but not without it: which was likewise the case with relation to the power of reconciling penitents, and granting them absolution; this privilege being allowed them only in cases of extreme necessity, when neither bishop nor presbyter was at hand to do it. It may be reckoned also among their extraordinary offices, that they were sometimes deputed by the bishops to be their representatives and proxies in general councils. But, in provincial synods, they were allowed to give their voice, as well as the presbyters, in their own name.

There are two things more to be observed concerning the office of deacons, in church assemblies. The first is, that they had a power to rebuke and chastise those who behaved indecently in the church. The other is, that before the institution of the inferior orders in the church, such as sub-deacons, exorcists, catechists, &c. the deacons were employed in performing all the offices which were afterwards committed to those orders.

But, besides these offices, which properly belonged to the service of the church, the deacons had employment out of the church. One of these was, to be the bishop's sub-almoner, and to take care of the necessitous, such as orphans, widows, virgins, prisoners, and all the poor and sick, who had any title to be maintained out of the public revenues of the church. Another of these offices was, to inquire into the morals and conversation of the people, and to make their report thereof to the bishop. Upon this account, the deacons were usually styled the bishop's eyes, and ears, his mouth, his right hand, and his heart; because by their ministry he took cognizance of men's actions, as much as if he himself had seen or heard them; and because, by them, he sent orders and directions to his flock, and by them distributed to the necessities of the indigent.

For this reason, there being a great variety of business attending the office of a deacon, it was usual to have several deacons in the same church. In some they were precisely to the number of seven, in imitation of the first church of Jerusalem. But this rule was not observed in other churches, the number of deacons being indifferent, as the business of each church required. In that of Constantinople particularly, the number was so great, that we find them limited to an hundred, for the service of the great church, and three others only.

The qualifications required in deacons, were much the same as those required in bishops and presbyters; except that in their age, there was some difference. Deacons might be ordained at twenty-five years of age, and not before; whereas bishops and presbyters could not be ordained till thirty.

The ceremony of the ordination of deacons in the Romish church, is briefly this. The candidate prostrates himself before the bishop, who confers on him the Holy Ghost, laying his right hand only on his head, to signify that he does not receive it so fully as the priest. An acolyth puts on him the stole and dalmatica; after which the bishop presents him with the book of the gospels: the ceremony concludes with the prayers of the bishop and people. It is the deacon's office to incense the officiating priest or prelate; to lay the corporal on the altar; to receive the paten or cup from the sub-deacon, and present them to the person officiating, to incense the choir; to receive the pix from the officiating prelate, and carry it to the sub-deacon; and at the pontifical mass, when the bishop gives the blessing, to put the mitre upon his head, and to take off the archbishop's pall, and lay it on the altar.

The Maronites of mount Libanus have two deacons, who are merely administrators of the temporalities. Dandini, who calls them il signori diaconi, tells us, they are secular lords who govern the people, set in judgment on all their differences, and treat with the Turks concerning the taxes, and other matters.

In England, deacons are not capable of any ecclesiastical promotion, not so much as to be admitted to a donative; all benefices requiring the incumbent to be in the priest's orders. Yet he may be a chaplain in a family, curate to a beneficed clergyman, or lecturer to a parish church. A man may be ordained deacon at twenty-three years of age, anno currente; but it is expressly provided, that the bishop shall not ordain the same person both a deacon and a priest in the same day. The form of ordaining deacons declares, that it is their office to assist the priest in the distributing of the holy communion; in which agreeably to the practice of the ancient church, they are confined to the administering of the wine to the communicants.

St. Paul requires, that deacons should be chaste, sober, and blameless; that they should be neither great drinkers, nor given to filthy lucre; that they should hold the mystery of faith in a pure conscience; that they should be well approved, before they are admitted into the ministry; that they should be husbands of one wife, and take care of their houses and families.

The last thing to be attended to is, their government.

In Geneva, and in Holland, they have their presbyteries and synods, but no general assemblies as in Scotland. Political states are jealous of political disputes, and therefore they take care that the clergy shall meet as seldom as possible together. Had this rule been attended to in the middle ages of Christianity, perhaps we should not have had so many violent disputes as we have at present.

All offences of a common, ordinary nature, are first considered by the minister and the elders, and if the delinquent does not chuse to comply with their decision, he may appeal to the presbytery. If after their decree, he thinks himself aggrieved, he may appeal to the synod, whose sentence is binding. But there are no civil penalties inflicted upon the delinquent as in England, for he is only excluded from church communion, and church privileges.

Such is the nature of the Calvinistical religion on the continent of Europe, and when it is considered how nearly we are connected with its professors, it will naturally point out that we should consider them as brethren. Did they persecute to death Servetus? The church of England has burnt Ptolestants who had been declared heretics! Are they without episcopal ordination?—the church of Scotland knows nothing of bishops. Do they reject the ring in marriage?—this does not deserve our notice; for to take up the idea of the ingenious author of a tale in a tub, Peter kept all his gaudy ornaments upon him; Martin stripped off a few, but still left his clothes in a decent manner; but Jack went farther, and pulled off both the lace and the clothes. It is certain, that the Calvinistical religion, as professed on the continent of Europe, affords all the means of grace, and opens the way to eternal happiness. In that form of religion, many pious Christians, many eminent divines, have been brought up, and where God has bestowed his blessing on the appointed means, let man be silent.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

WE have already, in our account of Calvinism in general, considered the nature of those sentiments, concerning which there has been so much dispute. We have stated the objections made against them, with the answers that have been offered. We have shewn in the most candid manner from whence those disputed sentiments took their rise, and unwilling to enter into controversy, we have referred them to history. We have considered the Calvinists in a general point of view, as particularly established in some nations in Europe. We shall now consider them as a national church, begun by infinite wisdom, supported by Almighty power, regulated by unerring Providence, and at present one of the glories of the Protestant world. And here we are sorry to observe, that although the people of England are united under one government with those of Scotland, yet there are many of the former utterly ignorant of the religion of the latter. Nothing is more common in England than to call the people of Scotland Dissenters, whereas they have their own church established by law. Nay, so firmly is the church of Scotland established, that it cannot be overthrown, unless there is a total revolution.

This will appear evident, when we consider in what manner the king of Great Britain swears to protect, defend, and support that church. The moment the death of the king is made public to his successor, the heir takes his place in the council, and it is intimated to him, that he cannot be proclaimed till he has sworn before their lordships that he will maintain the church of Scotland as by law established. This oath is administered in the Scottish fashion, by the king's holding up his right hand, and solemnly swearing, that he will do nothing to injure the church of Scotland, but support her in all her rights and privileges. A copy of this oath is recorded in the books of the privy council, and then a messenger is dispatched to Edinburgh, who gives it in to the court of session, where it is read, and ordered to be recorded in the lords' register office.

Here we find a vast privilege bestowed on the church of Scotland, beyond that of England; for in England the king does not swear to maintain the church till his coronation. This privilege was claimed by the people of Scotland, in that convention of estates, 1689, which declared the throne vacant, and voted in William and Mary. It was again insisted on by the whole nation of Scotland, at the union 1707. It was claimed, not as a favour, but as a right, and the king of Great Britain can no more dispense with it, than he can with any of the fundamental laws of the constitution. We have been the more explicit on this subject, that our readers may be made acquainted with it, and that they may know every particular; for, as a celebrated author says, "We should not only learn every thing, but we should learn every thing well."

We shall now proceed to consider this church in a manner altogether different from those who have gone before us; for we can assert, that the history of this church was never yet properly written, though often attempted.

In the treating of it, we shall lay down the following principles, to direct us in the narrative.

First, a general view of the history of that church.

Secondly, a more particular state of it since the Reformation.

Thirdly, its various forms of worship during that period.

Fourthly, its various forms of confession during that time.

And lastly, its present state in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government.

And first—with respect to a general view of religion in Scotland.

Religion, according to reading, report, and experience, is the first consideration that attracts a man's attention in Scotland. But, when we speak of religion, we do not mean that propensity for agitating controverted points of divinity, which has possessed the clergy of most countries and ages; but we mean that plan of doctrine and discipline, which, in a well-regulated state, ought to be adapted to the constitution of the government, without regard to the dreams of bigots, or the talk of enthusiasts. Now it is impossible to understand the present state of religion in Scotland, in the sense of the words which we have laid down, without a review of their ecclesiastical constitution; and by that review we shall be enabled to form a pretty clear idea of their ancient government, not only in their church but their state.

The introduction of Christianity into Scotland, was by monks, who were without the means of transmitting orders of any kind to their successors, in the manner which the churches of England and Rome now prescribe. The name of the person who was at their head, was Regulus, said to be a Greek: They were driven on the coast of Scotland by accident, and after his death, they of themselves, elected and ordained another to preside in their principal church Kilrimont, now St. Andrews, without applying to the court or church of Rome. That this was the case, unquestionably appears from the canons of the council of Calcuth in England, in the year 816, the fifth of which prohibits any Scotch clergyman from exercising his functions in England, because, say the makers of the canon, it is uncertain to us by whom he is ordained, or if he is ordained at all. In like manner, the sixty-fifth of the Capitularia of the French king, is concerning the Scots who call themselves bishops, and ordain certain persons without the licence of their superiors.

We know it may be pretended that the Scots spoken of here were the Irish, and even the learned have a vulgar notion, that when the word Scots occurs at this time, the Irish are understood; and in a few, but a very few, instances of higher antiquity, we may admit the fact to have been so; but at the time here mentioned, there can be no doubt but that the North British Scots were meant.

That their religion was void of many errors, and superstitions which then prevailed; that their manners were blameless, their zeal indefatigable, their piety unaffected, and their submission to their superiors, such as became good Christians and subjects, could be proved by many unquestionable cotemporary authorities, which can have no room here.—They went by the name of Culdees, or Culdees, which is not, as the Scotch historians ignorantly imagine, a contradiction of the words Cultoris Dei, but two ancient Pictish or Celtic words; Cul, a Hood, from whence we have the word Cowl, and Due, Black, because of their wearing black hoods, so that the people of the country distinguished them by that appellation.

The plainness, virtue, and piety of the Culdees, gave offence to the church of Rome, whose corner stone is founded upon a succession of priesthood, derived from bishops depending upon the pope; and pope Celestine sent one Paladius, with a large train of followers to preside over the Scots, about the year 430. Every one knows what impression high pretensions and great pomp have upon weak minds. Paladius soon formed a party amongst the chief inhabitants, who received his clergy, and believed in the name of the pope. This occasioned a schism; the Culdees were favoured by the Pictish princes, and the Romanists by the descendants of the ancient Celts, who had been settled before the Picts were, in Scotland; and to whom the Picts gave the reproachful term of Scots. This name was then appropriated to many of the northern adventurers, in different parts of Europe; and undoubtedly, was derived from the Scyths, the maternal nation of all those various clann'd barbarians, who, at that time, deluged Europe.

As they were themselves Celts, when a part of them landed in Scotland, they naturally fell in with the old Guidels, or the ancient Caledonians, who were Celts likewise: and their singularity of language and manners, soon cemented a friendship between them. The Picts, on the other hand, who had pushed the Guidels westward, in the same manner as the Romans had pushed the Picts northward, were the descendants of the Belgic Gauls; and though they were likewise of Celtic original, yet their communications had occasioned a great difference in their language and manners from the Guidels, whom we may term the Aborigines; whereas the Belgic Gauls, the ancestors of the Picts, had not been settled in Britain above four score years before the invasion of it by Julius Cæsar. As the Picts, about the time of the landing of the Scots, undoubtedly professed Christianity, it was easy for the Culdees to cement a friendship with them. The degeneracy of the Pictish princes, giving the old inhabitants vast advantages, the Culdees sometimes suffered great persecutions, till Alexander the first, one of the wisest and best of the kings of Scotland, wanting to abolish all invidious distinctions amongst his subjects, restored the Culdees, about the year 1118, to their primitive lustre, though he could not to their sanctity of manners. This was a severe blow to the interest of the church of Rome in Scotland; and she omitted no practice to procure an exclusion of the Culdee ordination. They, however, kept their ground, and the chief pastor, who continued to be of their own choice, and to hold his seat at St. Andrews, was dignified with the name of Scotorum Episcopus, bishop of the Scots; but that denomination was afterwards changed into Escop. Alban. bishop of Albany.

David, the brother and successor of Alexander, having great connections with England, was eaten up with superstition, and suffered a Romish legate to hold councils in the most southerly parts of Scotland, and prevailed with Robert, then the chief of the Culdees, to receive a coadjutor from the bishop of Chester, and to appropriate the revenues of the other Culdees, to defray the expence of extravagant buildings at St. Andrew's, the stupendous remains of which are still visible there. This revived the interest of the Romanists in Scotland, and David finding the Culdees to be too well established for him to think of exterminating them, sought only to persuade them to accept of papal ordinations and consecrations, which never had as yet been admitted of amongst them. The more sensible, however, amongst the Culdees, were not to be either flattered or frightened out of their rights and properties, and continued to make a vigorous opposition to the Romanists, though by that time several other sees, filled with popish bishops, had been erected in Scotland. But the Culdees, who were now only a handful, found it impossible to make head against the ambition of the popes, favoured by the weakness of their own princes.

In the year 1250, their right of ordination and consecration came to be questioned, and the pope appointed the abbot of Dumfermling, and another ecclesiastic, to summon the chief Culdee, whom the record does not style bishop, but Prepositus, Provost, to appear before them at the church of Inverkeithen, to answer for the crime of rebellion against the see of Rome, and to inquire whether the Culdees had a right to celebrate divine offices. That is, they were to inquire into the right that the Culdees had to confer orders; and celebrate divine ordinances. It appears, however, from the same record, that Adam Malkarwiston, the head of the Culdees, and his brethren, refused to submit to this tribunal; nor do we find any thing decisive was done till the year 1273, when one Wishart, after receiving episcopal orders at Scoon, was thrust by the pope and the king of Scotland, Alexander the Third, upon the Culdees. He was succeeded by Fraser and Lamberton, against whose elevation the Culdees made a vigorous resistance; but their head being ill enough advised to appeal to the see of Rome, pope Boniface the Eighth confirmed Lamberton's election, and the Culdees, notwithstanding all their struggles, were never afterwards permitted to have any voice in the election of a bishop of St. Andrews.

Such of the historians of Scotland, who were really Protestants, were ignorant of the facts we have laid down in this short review; and they are stilled by the papists and popish Protestants.

The dispute, however, between the Culdees and the Romanists had the happy effect, that the laity, especially those of the greatest power, of Scotland, never could be reconciled to the latter; and the papal power had less influence with them, than it had amongst any people in Europe, before the time of the Reformation: therefore the wisest of their kings were always sure of being supported in the frequent and vigorous oppositions they made, not only to the power, but to the visits of papal agents.

The first prince of the Stuart family, who deviated from that wise policy, was James the Fifth, who, to a thorough hatred of England, which was his family's ruling passion, joined cruelty and bigotry, vices till then unknown to the blood of Stuart; but a misconception of his own and his people's interests with regard to England, served materially to pave the way for the Reformation. His Dowager, who succeeded him in the administration, a weak bigotted woman, governing Scotland by French magistrates, French soldiers, and French councils, rendered the Reformation a measure of necessity as well as choice.

The kings of Scotland had always been bounded in their prerogative, not so much by the positive laws of their country, as by the unlimited exercise of power, which the feudal constitutions gave to the great landholders over their dependents, whom they styled their vassals. These great landholders, as we have seen, had always hated the Romish bishops, whose power rested solely upon the regal authority: and Scotland is the only nation in Europe, into which the Reformation was introduced without opposition from any lay subject. Nay, what is still more remarkable, while England and other nations were reforming by slow, imperfect degrees, the Scots reformed all at once, so thoroughly, from the errors of the church of Rome, that all the deviations that have been since made from their original reformation, have been in favour of popery.

But this Reformation, glorious as it was in some respects, was not without lamentable consequences in other. For zeal lighting upon ignorance, and interest prompting riot, the whole was a scene of confusion, and effected by agents so totally illiterate that the Scotch presbyterian clergy continued long distinguished for their ignorance, and for not having produced one man of learning, or eminence in letters. This was the more extraordinary, as they had all the means of erudition in their possession, and their incomes, in general, were not only greater, and less precarious, than those of the foreign Protestant clergy, who made great figures in learning, but than those of the English, the most learned in the world.

Many of the Scotch Roman Catholics, at the time of the Reformation, made great figures in Europe by their learning, and the reformers succeeded in their attempts by a conduct and character diametrically opposite. But in this nothing was affected, for they were really as ignorant as they appeared to be; and bigotry in them, being destitute of knowledge, they relapsed into the most dangerous abuses of what we may call practical popery. The churchmen usurped a power not only over the consciences, but even the persons and estates, of the laity; their excommunications were attended, if possible, with worse consequences than those of Rome, for they always inferred the loss of all property; in many cases, that of liberty; and in some, that of life itself.

The nobility of Scotland, who, till the union of the two kingdoms, had perhaps the truest notions of public liberty of any set of men in the world, found themselves, by this frantic conduct of their clergy, in the case of Actæon. They were ready to be torn to pieces by the very dogs they had so hounded out upon others, and who seldom returned without their prey; and, to save themselves, they were obliged to resume the shape of men, which they had for political ends discontinued for some time after the Reformation. Meanwhile, the part they had to act was dangerous; for the ambition of the court, and of the clergy, though pointed different ways, was equally threatening to public liberty. James the first, Charles the first, and Charles the second, hated not only the Presbyterians, but all moderate Protestants, worse than they did the Papists; while the Presbyterian clergy were ever willing to prefer the most horrid scenes of civil war to a submission either to the king or the nobility.

The power of the latter, however, carried it for a moderate episcopacy, founded in a great measure, upon the plan of the Culdees; for we do not find in general, that their bishops thought it necessary to have recourse for their consecration, either to Rome or to England. The madness of Laud influenced Charles the first to break this excellent scheme, by introducing many sopperies into the public worship, which the common people looked upon as Popish, and, throwing off all restraint, they reverted to the extreme from which they had been reclaimed; for from the year 1640 to the year 1660 the Presbyterian clergy in Scotland exercised over the laity a power more than papal, which the nobility for the sake of public liberty, endangered by the practices of the court, and attacked by the power of England, were once more obliged to submit to, till the restoration took place.

Had it not been for this frantic behaviour of the clergy, who had thereby forfeited all esteem with the nobility and great landholders of Scotland, the Scots never could have been brought to have received Charles without terms. It is true they made an effort, and sent deputies for that purpose, but they betrayed the people of Scotland, as Monk did those of England, and the ministers of Charles ever after alledged, in vindication of their despotic administration, that their master, being restored without terms, had a right to govern as he pleased, a people who, having been rebels to his government, now subsisted only through his clemency. The Scots were not united among themselves so well as to dispute this doctrine, and the odium into which the clergy had brought themselves with all the civilized sensible part of the kingdom, made the abolition of Presbyterianism there go down without a struggle.

The earl of Clarendon knew too little of the temper and disposition of the Scots, and was too much wedded to certain formalities without the essentials of episcopacy, to make a right use of a juncture so critical for the interests of his master. The episcopacy which was restored, was indeed more moderate than that contended for by Laud, for the people were not offended by the use of the book of Common Prayer; and their public service differed very little, if any thing, from that of the Presbyterians. Many faults, and those irretrievable, however, were committed in the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland, which was very different from that in England, where many great and eminent confessors for the cause of monarchy and loyalty, upon the breaking out of the civil wars, were yet alive, and had a title to the highest ecclesiastical preferments.

In Scotland, excepting in a few of the northern parts, the clergy had avowed themselves to be the enemies of monarchy and episcopacy; they had acted accordingly, and Sharp, with some of the more moderate amongst them, had won the confidence of many of the nobility, by promising, as one of the deputies from the clergy, to insist upon the continuance, and at the same time the restriction, of Presbyterianism in Scotland. But Sharp deceived all his constituents, and he not only accepted of the primacy of Scotland, but consented that he and his brethren should be consecrated in England.

But neither this step, nor the restoring bishops to their seats in parliament, could have produced any considerable disaffection amongst the Scots either to episcopacy or to the family of the Stuarts, had it not been that most of the men made choice of for bishops, were a set equally profligate and illiterate; and they who were not, were men bred to books without either inclination or talents for public business, even in their own functions. The whole episcopal order in Scotland was thus exposed to hatred and contempt. To hatred, not only on account of their apostasy and treachery, but on account of the cruelties they countenanced against the Presbyterians; which were such as would have disgraced the reign of a Nero or Domitian; and to contempt, on account of their putting themselves upon the same footing with the old nobility, without possessing one good quality that could entitle them to notice, far less to elevation.

Mean while the nobility, and the men of sense in Scotland, loved episcopacy, though they hated prelacy, but the court could not be brought to disjoin them. This produced a few ill-judged insurrections in the west, which were easily suppressed, for the nation in general hated Presbytery, and the success of the government was crowned by scenes of the most horrid cruelties, abetted and impelled by the prelates. Those cruelties were defended by Sir George Mackenzie, a great lawyer, and lord advocate or attorney general for Scotland, but a mere fanatic both in religion and politics. It became now the avowed principle at the council board in England, that the king in Scotland was above law, and might govern it, as he actually did, by a military force. The same doctrine was recommended to the council board of Scotland, where divisions ran so high, that each party sought to strengthen itself by an implicit obedience to the will of the court and of the bishops.

This was the critical period that effected the revolution under the prince of Orange. The Scots, in general, saw themselves in a real state of slavery, under the most worthless and contemptible of men, and this consideration superseded all others. The men of spirit amongst them, applied more early than the English did, to the prince of Orange; and the consequence was, that the revolution met with less difficulty from the Scotch, than it did from the English parliament.

The crown being settled, religion came next under debate, and the inclination both of court and parliament was to have continued it upon the same footing it was on before. But the connection which the prelates knew to subsist between king William and the enemies rather of their persons than of their order, made them distrust his sincerity. They thought that king James might yet retrieve his affairs by the power of France, and by the Highlanders; who, had their general, the viscount of Dundee, survived the defeat which he gave to the government troops at Gillieranky, would certainly have changed the face of affairs in Scotland. They considered that if king James should be restored, after their submitting to king William, they were to expect no favour; and that should he not be restored, many of them would be brought to a severe account for their illegal conduct in the last two reigns. All these, and other motives, influenced them to stand out against the revolution, and as the necessity of the juncture could admit of no delay, Presbytery, but not of that bloody tyrannical kind that was abolished at the restoration, was again restored by act of parliament in Scotland.

But the same case happened after the revolution, that had happened at the Reformation. The few clergymen in Scotland, who, by their learning were qualified for their functions, were episcopists, who, influenced by their bishops, and the prepossessions in which they had been educated, disclaimed king William's title to the crown; and thus the government was obliged to fill up the vacant churches with men who had nothing to recommend them, but zeal against the exiled family and the routed clergy.—The nation, however, in general, was discontented with the restoration of Presbytery; the episcopalianism formed a strong party, the men of the greatest fashion and interest in Scotland became their followers, and they of Presbyterianism were thereby so mortified, that, excepting in some trifling instances, their conduct, ever since the revolution, has been excellently adapted to that plan of civil power which ought to be pursued in a free country; nay, we should be wanting to that sincerity we profess, if we did not give it as our opinion, that the established clergy in Scotland have done more than any one set of men (the legislature excepted) in Britain, to keep the crown in the family of Hanover.

Mean while, though it may perhaps seem unfair to attribute a virtuous conduct to an interested motive, we cannot help saying, that the very existence of their order depended upon that attachment, since nothing is more certain, than that before the last rebellion in 1745, the nation in general was much more inclined to episcopacy than to Presbyterianism, and it is incredible to believe with what spirit the former was supported, both amongst the jurat and nonjurant part of their persuasion. The extinction of the rebellion, however, left the established church in triumphant possession of every thing they could claim, but that which they could not recover, we mean the hearts of the people.

This, we are afraid, was owing to the degeneracy of discipline; which must always happen in any body of men where the individuals are vested with a parity of power. The Roman senate long held out against it by means of the censorship, and private virtue will ward it off for some time:—but it happens unfortunately for the Scotch clergy, that their constitutional powers are very limited, and their influence was owing to that authority which they had over the minds of the people, prepossessed with an opinion of their virtue. When that opinion was gone, their authority vanished, and they had nothing but power to trust to. However, we are not to imagine, that there are not in the established church of Scotland many divines whose virtues would do honour to any church: but we are afraid their numbers are not sufficient to revive the veneration of the people for their order.

This appeared eminently upon the extinction of the rebellion, when, encouraged by their public services, they came to a resolution of applying to the legislature for some favours that really seemed very reasonable, but in the opinion of the people pointed towards an augmentation of their own livings. To our knowledge, the ministry was extremely well disposed towards them: but so incredible an opposition arose to them from people of all ranks in Scotland, that when they were ill enough advised to push the affair into parliament, the ministry did not think it prudent to support them, and the spirit of opposition was carried so far against them, that they lost every reasonable point they aimed at, merely through a prepossession that they intended to aim at what was unreasonable.

The bounds of this volume will not suffer us, though we could easily enter on a detail of the causes, why the Scots, a people that formerly believed in their clergy, hold them now so cheap.—The want of discipline, as we observed before, is the obvious cause, and that is occasioned, in a great measure, by a superficial education, by which the younger part of the clergy learn just as much as to have a contempt for all learning that requires pains and application. Thus some of them commence deists, and some enthusiasts. The abilities, whether natural or acquired, of both, are pretty much alike; and the complexion of the man generally determines the walk into which he strikes, whether it be that of enthusiasm or irreligion. The former resigns all freedom of thinking, the latter abuses it:—the one carries zeal into bigotry; the other liberty into licentiousness: and, in both, ignorance is the ruling principle. Instead of studying that sound philosophy, which reconciles religion to reason, the one part of them cons over the shallow observation of Shaftsbury, the illiterate remarks of Chubb, the false reasoning of Collins, and the second-hand objections of Bolingbroke to the Christian religion. The other part of them disclaim all what we call human learning, and though not less contemptible than the former, yet they are less dangerous, as long as the power is so circumscribed as it is.

We are obliged to be the more plain concerning these things, because people in general are apt to believe either too much or too little. Thus, if a Scotchman is an enthusiast in favour of his church, he will tell you with an unblushing boldness, that their church could never have any errors in it. On the other hand, the libertine, or profane person will tell us, that the clergy in Scotland are all hypocrites, but we shall take more notice of this afterwards. In other respects there are many valuable things in the church of Scotland, but we must write of things as they are, without considering what they should be.

We come now, 2dly, to consider the circumstances of that church in a more enlarged point of view, and also from historical evidence, to bring every circumstance open to public view.

In England, the Reformation was gradually carried on; in Scotland it was sudden. The Romish clergy knowing that their young queen had been educated in France, had great hopes of their religion being supported by her in all its cruelty. This made them attempt to despise the ancient nobility, whose spirits were too high and too proud to brook the affront, especially as it came from men of obscure birth, who had nothing to recommend them besides their church livings. Mr. Knox was invited over from Geneva, where he had resided several years as an assistant to Calvin and Beza. This was in 1558, and the nobility making choice of such a man as Knox, is a strong proof of their good sense. He was a man of a bold, intrepid spirit, who feared nothing, and consequently became the happy instrument in the hand of Providence, of introducing the reformed religion among a rude people. The bigotry of Mary of Guise, the queen-regent, obliged the nobility and gentry to form themselves into societies for their own preservation, and these were called the lords of the congregation. The queen-regent drew up an army in order to give them battle, but finding herself too weak, and her men of the same opinion with the lords, she promised to grant them a toleration till the parliament should meet.

Had the queen kept her promise, things might have been conducted in a more moderate manner than they were; but just about that time [1559] her brothers, the cardinal and duke of Guise, the avowed enemies of the Reformation, planned the league of Cambray, by which an association was entered into to extirpate the Protestant religion. A copy of this was sent over to the queen-regent, who, not doubting but she would be supported by a train of Papists, ordered several clergymen to be burnt alive for preaching the Protestant doctrines. This exasperated the lords of the congregation, who had the whole body of the country people on their side, and they marched through Fifeshire with Mr. Knox along with them. The queen went eastward from Stirling-castle to give them battle, but she was too weak. She had then recourse to her former practices of amusing them with false promises, but they would not trust her. They marched northward to Perth, a town situated on the river Tay, very near the borders of the Highlands. There was a Carthusian convent, where king James I. was murdered, 1436. It is certain, that the reformers had no intention at first to commit any violence, but provocation drove them mad.

A few days before they came to Perth, two men had been burned alive, and one woman drowned, for no other crime besides that of eating a capon on a Friday. The people saw what was to be their fate if the clergy were to exercise a coercive authority, not only over their consciences, but also over their persons. It would have been prudent in the Romish clergy to have left the town for a few days, especially as they knew they were hated by the people; but just as if they had courted their own destruction, one of the priests ordered the chapel door of the convent to be set open, and began to say mass. This was considered as an insult offered to the lords of the congregation, upon which their followers tore the priest's robes from off him, brought out all the utensils of the chapel, and made a bonfire of them in the street. The town was now in an uproar, the people were exceedingly exasperated against the priest, and in a few hours the whole convent was levelled to the ground.

The army then marched westward to Stirling, near to which they demolished the mitred abbey of Cambus Keneth, and indeed every cathedral and collegiate church or convent wherever they came, except at Glasgow, where the town's people bore arms and defended their cathedral. The queen-regent took shelter in the castle of Edinburgh, where she died soon after, probably of a broken heart, on being told of the devastation that had been made among the relics of the ancient superstition.

From Glasgow the reformers marched eastward to Edinburgh, and happened just to come into that city, while the priests were preparing to begin a procession, in honour of St. Giles, the titular saint of that city.

The priests went into the high church as it is called, to bring out the image of the saint, but some unlucky rogue had stolen it away. Vexed with the disappointment, they borrowed an image from another church, which was carried about in procession, and the people called it in derision, Young St. Giles. The procession being over, the mob tore the priests' vestments to pieces, mounted St. Giles on the back of a jack-ass, led him to the Grass-market, the common place of execution, where his saintship was tied to a stake and burnt.

Just about this time, when Scotland was in a state of confusion without a sovereign, their young queen being then in France along with her husband Francis II. that monarch was killed in a tournament, and Mary was left a widow, about the nineteenth year of her age. Application was made to her to call a parliament, to settle disputes concerning religion, and writs were sent over to Scotland for that purpose, before she herself arrived.

This parliament met at Edinburgh, August 24, 1560, and by it the Protestant religion was established by law, although the queen, who arrived the next year in Scotland, refused to give her assent to it. This act, however, was always considered as the basis of Reformation in Scotland, and although another act passed in 1567, yet there was so much studied ambiguity, such vague expressions, and such appearance of duplicity, that those of the reformed religion saw through the intended deception, and insisted that the first act should be the security of their religion.

At the same time that the parliament met in August 1560, a general assembly of the clergy were summoned to meet in the high church of Edinburgh, of which assembly the famous Buchanan was president, though he was no more than a layman. But these were violent times, and there was no regularity. This was the first assembly of the church of Scotland, and its decrees were important. Thirteen of the mitred abbots attended as members of this assembly, and the rest were formed by some priests, who were willing to embrace the Reformation, and by some zealous men, who had commenced preachers without being ordained to that office. It was agreed, that they should embrace in some part the discipline of the church of Geneva, but then it was difficult to find out in what manner the external government of the church was to be conducted. It could not be by presbyters and synods, because they had not a sufficient number of ministers, and as for episcopacy they abhorred it.— They took a middle line, for they sent as many ministers as they had, to the most capital towns, and in the country parts they appointed persons whom they called readers, who were to read the scriptures as often as the people came to church.

Above these they appointed another set of men, who had no ordination at all, and these were called superintendants. They were but few in number.—Spotswood was appointed to superintend all those counties which lie southward of Edinburgh. Winram, who had been formerly sub-prior of the convent of St. Andrews, was appointed superintendent of Fife and its neighbourhood. Mr. Erskine, a lawyer, was appointed to superintend the counties lying north of the Tay, as far as the county of Murray. Mr. Willocks, who had been formerly an Augustinian monk, was appointed superintendent of Glasgow, and the western counties; and Carswell, a franciscan friar, was sent to Argyle and the isles.

The duty which these superintendants were to perform, was of a very important nature. They were to visit every parish in their bounds, and they generally preached at least twelve times every week.—They were to inquire into the conduct of the clergy and readers, and see that churches should be provided with ministers as soon as any could be procured. They were to hold synods for church discipline, but when the general assembly met, they were to take their places as ordinary ministers, and to submit to church censures with those of the lower order. Here was a sort of moderate episcopacy, and an episcopacy suitable to the state of Scotland at that age.

The superintendants were likewise to preside at all ordinations of the clergy, which may serve to shew that the Scots at that time did not pay any regard to a Jure Divino; or a divine right conferred by orders. Their characters were blameless, and they were revered while they were beloved by their people. Whenever there was a vacant congregation, they endeavoured as far as lay in their power to supply the want of a minister, and under their nourishment, as men who wished well to the interests of Christianity, the church of Scotland grew and flourished; the sooner they could provide ministers for vacant churches, their labours decreased of course: although most of them were advanced in years, yet they thought no hardship too great, so as they could promote the interest of their fellow Christians.

Such was the state of the church of Scotland till the year 1570, when a new revolution, though of a short duration, took place, which flowed from avarice, and was maintained by ambition. The Scottish reformers, like all those who undertake to set up new religions, had made a public declaration of their own disinterestedness, but they soon found that the benevolence of their people was not sufficient to support them. On the other hand, the nobility, embracing such a favourable opportunity, laid hold of the greatest part of the church lands, and left the clergy to starve. To treat men with inhumanity, who are set up as the public guides in religious exercises, is unjust, cruel and impious: and what encouragement could these men have to prosecute their studies, and teach the people, while they were left to starve? The clergy saw their folly, and the nobility triumphed over their weakness.

There was, however, a necessity of saving appearances, of putting on the garb of the hypocrite when truth was in a manner extinguished. A motion was made in one of the parliaments, that the superintendants were beginning to grow old, and therefore it would be much better to appoint bishops in the different dioceses, but that they should still be subject to a general assembly. Accordingly some old friars were appointed to these offices, without knowing for what reason. The nobility, however, had their own interests in view; for their design was, that these men should have the name of bishops, while they themselves enjoyed their emoluments.

As they had no more than a name, they were called Tulchan bishops, a term that we must explain to the reader. The word is Saxon, and signifies deception. When a calf in Scotland is taken from the cow in order to be weaned, they dress an image resembling the young one, which they put under her teats, to make her let go her milk. This image is called Tulchan, because it represents what it is not.

As this form of church government took its rise from unjustifiable motives, so it could not be supposed that it would last long. The parity of power in the general assembly gave the members an opportunity of censuring the bishops, and Douglas, who had been promoted to the see of St. Andrews, was degraded. Indeed these Tulchan bishops had no power, but they were tools in the hands of a brave but ambitious nobility. They were despised by the very persons who set them up, and they were considered as time-serving creatures by the people.—Their ministry was not attended, and every general assembly called them to an account for their conduct.

During the whole of this period, the kingdom of Scotland was, as it were, drenched in blood, owing to their unhappy civil dissensions. Almost all the inhabitants were Protestants, and yet dividing themselves into two parties, they supported different interests. One of the parties took part with their unfortunate queen, who was then a prisoner in England; and the other supported the aristocracy of Scotland.

The power of the nobility had been strengthened by a succession of minorities; and when we consider that the king was then no more than an infant, we need not be surprised to find that the high spirits of the Scottish nobility led them to dispise monarchy, and trample upou municipal institutions. It is certain that they did so, but that leads us to consider a more important period of the history of the church of Scotland, which, in some measure, gave rise to the form it now enjoys. The event could not be ascribed to a single cause, but to many. The pride of the nobility, the ignorance of the clergy, the minority of the sovereign, the unsettled state of affairs in the nation, the disputed points between the contending parties, all conspired towards bringing about an event, which, although small in its first appearance, yet was in the end, great in its consequences.

The nobility continued to support the nominal bishops, although they were in general men of so pliant tempers that they lost all credit with the lower ranks of the people. The king was an infant, the nobility were employed in cutting each others throats, the clergy were starving, and discipline was neglected; so that every thing bid fair to promote an ecclesiastical Reformation in the then Protestant church of Scotland.

In the year 1574, Mr. Andrew Melvill, returned to Scotland from Geneva, where he had spent some years under the tuition of the famous Theodore Beza. If we take the character of this man from the episcopalians, it is very striking indeed. Mr. Sage says, "He was a man by nature fierce and fiery, restless and ungovernable. Education in him had not sweetened nature, but nature had soured education, and both these conspiring together, formed a true original; a piece composed of pride and petulence, of malice and mischief; he could make as free with the sceptre as with the crozier, and could treat with the same contempt, the purple and the lawn-sleeves."

On the other hand, the Presbyterians in Scotland have represented him in a light quite the reverse.—It is certain, he was a man of some learning, and as for his attachment to the religion of Geneva, it is a speculative notion, which must be left to every one's own private judgment.

No sooner had Melvill returned to Scotland, than he was appointed one of the professors in the University of St. Andrews, and minister of a parish. This naturally called him to the general assembly of the clergy, where he harangued in favour of the discipline of Geneva; which he represented as superior to all others. It took mightily with the people, but it was opposed by the nobility, who to colour their sacrilegious use of the church-money, wanted to retain the poor Tulchan bishops.

The controversy, however, was carried on full six years, till at last the Presbyterian party carried it in a general assembly of the clergy held at Dundee 1580. King James VI. of Scotland was then only fourteen years of age, but he took the government upon himself. It is certain, he loved the Presbyterians, and would never have quarrelled with them, had not their intolerable insolence forced him to it. They not only presumed to dictate to him as a Romish confessor, but, they even abused him openly in their own churches; and, to use the words of Dr. Robertson, who is himself a Presbyterian minister, "The pulpit was disgraced by being used as a vehicle to revile the sovereign, and stir up contention among the people."

One Black, preaching in the chapel-royal at Edinburgh, told his sovereign, "á kings were the De'il's bairns;" that is all kings were the devil's children. Of these indecent expressions Dr. Robertson observes, that the preacher deserved the most severe chastisement; but the king only banished him out of the country, along with six others.

The reformed clergy, in all countries, brought along with them intolerant principles; and thus, when the king of Scotland was petitioned to support the Protestant religion, it was implied that he should extirpate the Roman Catholics. James seldom went into a church but he was insulted; and one time, because he refused to dismiss his kinsman the earl of Lenox, from his presence, and banish him from the country, the clergy stirred up the people at Edinburgh, who besieged the king in the parliament-house, crying out, in the words of the Old Testament, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon, the day shall be either theirs or ours."—The king would have been barbarously torn in pieces, had not the earl of Mar come down from the castle with a party of soldiers and rescued him.

This usage exasperated James so much against the Presbyterians, that he never loved them afterwards. He began to abridge their power, and curb their insolence, by giving up all his share of the crown lands that had formerly belonged to the bishops, and appointed thirteen ministers to assume that name, but still they had no episcopal ordination. They were not Tulchan bishops, because they had revenues: but still they were without power, and their ministry was confined to single congregations.—Things continued going on in this manner till the death of queen Elizabeth, 1603, when James succeeded to the crown of England. Then it was that this prince resolved to introduce the episcopal form into his ancient kingdom of Scotland, but he proceeded with great moderation, always bestowing the bishops lands on such men as were most esteemed for their abilities.

It does not appear that James ever thought of causing the Scottish clergy to be episcopally ordained till he was persuaded thereto by Boncraft, archbishop of Canterbury; nor indeed did this prince see the scheme wholly reduced to practice. It is true, three of the Scottish bishops were sent up to London and consecrated, and on their return they consecrated their brethren; but most of the clergy refused to be re-ordained by them, and still kept their churches.

In 1616 James went down to Scotland and held a general assembly of the clergy at Perth, where, by a small majority, he got the following articles declared to be binding on the church of Scotland.

First, that the cross should be used in baptism. Secondly, that confirmation should be used.— Thirdly, that Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday should be observed. Fourthly, that the sacrament of the Lord's supper should be received kneeling. And lastly, that baptism should be administered in private to infants. These are commonly called the five articles of Perth, and they were the same year confirmed by a small majority in the Scottish parliament, but it gave great offence to the people, and to the majority of the clergy.

It is perhaps from this period, that we must date the original of the civil wars. The clergy who hated the ceremonies were very popular; they prayed for two hours together before sermon, and the sermon itself was seldom less than five hours at a time. This inflamed the passions of the people who admired them, because they spent most of their time in abusing the king and traducing the bishops. They ingratiated themselves with the ladies, who are generally the most easily caught by the priests, and they pretended that they frequently got answers to their prayers from heaven. Many of the poor old women who were not addicted to enthusiasm, were desired to pray, and bring an answer to one of the pious ladies. Some of the ladies were women of high rank, and their husbands, who were no great friends to the bishops, were easily brought to join them.— Their ministers, during the summer, had private meetings with their friends, and plans were laid to irritate the people against episcopacy.

In this manner things went on till 1633, when Charles I. went down to be crowned at Edinburgh, attended by Laud, Lindsey, archbishop of Glasgow, who came to assist at the coronation, hated the ceremonies, and Laud thrust him away from him with contempt, because he was not dressed in the pontifical habits. A parliament was called to enforce the observations of the Perth articles, and when the clerk-register had collected the votes, he declared that there was a majority against the motion. The clerk was seconded by lord Balmerino, the earl of Cassels, and other noblemen, which so much enraged the king, that he demanded the roll of the names, and declared that there was a majority in favour of the bill. Accordingly the act passed, and then the king ordered the chancellor to command any person who contradicted him to come forward to the bar, and swear that what Cassels had said was true. By the law of Scotland, to say that the king tells a lie, is high treason, so that none would venture to do it, and the act was recorded.

Charles returned to England, but left the Presbyterian ministers in Scotland, meditating a dreadful revenge. They had their meetings in private every summer, and having heard that a common-prayer-book was to be sent them from England, they dispatched some of their agents to London, to prevail upon their Puritan brethren to say all they could in favour of the liturgy, for they knew that if ever it should be sent to Scotland, it would answer all they had in view, namely, to extirpate the bishops, and oblige the king to grant themselves the emoluments of the church. All their wishes were gratified; for in 1636, Laud sent down the prayer-book, which was to be read publicly in the churches of Edinburgh, on Easter-Sunday of the next year, 1637. In the mean time, a great number of Presbyterian ministers held a private meeting at Edinburgh, and it was agreed, that one Janet Geddes, a zealous woman, should take her seat near the reading desk, and knock down the dean if he came to read the book. The chancellor, who at that time was Spotswood, archbishop of St. Andrews, the great officers of state, the judges of the court of session, and the magistrates of Edinburgh, all attended in the high church of that city, in order to hear the new service book read, which was just a copy of the English liturgy.

No sooner had the dean begun the service, than Janet Geddes took up the stool on which she sat, and at one stroke knocked him down in the reading desk, calling aloud at the same time, "Out, ye, you false thief, do you say mass at my lug." As much as if she had said, "Go out, for shame, you false thief, do you intend to say mass in my hearing." Ward, speaking of this transaction, says,

How Janet Geddes, that shrewd quean,
Pelted for reading it, the dean.

The whole congregation was in an uproar; the dean was carried out almost dead, the bishop of Edinburgh had his robes torn, and would have been murdered, had not a nobleman present taken him into his coach; with great difficulty the chancellor made his escape, the judges were insulted, and the prayer-book was burnt by the populace at the Cross. It was attempted to be read at one more of the churches of Edinburgh, but met with the same fate.

The country was now in an uproar, all ranks of people assembled, and the chancellor Spotswood went up to London with an account of these things to the king. The king ordered the prayer-book to be discontinued, and sent down the duke of Hamilton to a general assembly to be held at Glasgow.— In Scotland there are sixty-eight presbyters, each of which sends three ministers and two elders to the general assembly, and the universities send five, so that the whole number amounts to four hundred and sixty-five. The author of this has perused the records of that assembly, and finds that nine out of ten of the ministers, were such as had been long disaffected to episcopacy, and the elders were noblemen and gentlemen of high rank, who hated the bishops. From such men the episcopal clergy had every thing to fear, and the Presbyterians every thing to hope. They met at Glasgow, and Henderson, one of the most learned Presbyterian ministers, was chosen president, or, as they call him, moderator. The duke of Hamilton recommended unanimity and moderation, telling him at the same time, that the king would grant every reasonable request so as they did not attempt to injure the established church; but they had higher objects in view, and therefore, the first thing they did was, to summon all the bishops to appear before them.

It was not to be supposed that the bishops would obey such an order, and therefore they proceeded to excommunicate the whole of them, declaring at the same time, that their order was contradictory to the word of God, and to the constitution of the church of Scotland. Such proceedings being contrary to law as it then stood, because their proceedings looked with impudence in the face of several acts of parliament; duke Hamilton came to the assembly, and in the king's name dissolved them, declaring that it would be high treason for them to sit any longer. He might as well have declared it to be high treason in them, either to eat or drink, for they had the populace on their side, whose sciences they domineered over, and whose passions they could turn to what purposes they pleased.

Accordingly, they continued to sit till they had overturned the whole frame of episcopacy, and then marched an army into England to support the Puritans, who had the same views as themselves.— The king was obliged to pacify them, and next year he came to Edinburgh, where he called a parliament, and ratified all their proceedings. But soon after this, the English having taken up arms, the king erected the royal standard at Nottingham, and the civil wars began, of which we shall at present take no farther notice, than that the Scots had an active hand in them. Their clergy, who disliked the bishops, greedily swallowed their revenues, and reigned like arbitrary tyrants.

The provocation given by the Scottish clergy to Oliver Cromwell, was in all respects unsufferable, and therefore, while they were sitting in their general assembly at Edinburgh, 1652, he sent one colonel Cotterel with two regiments of dragoons who dispersed them, and beat the rogues march behind them, till they were out of the west-gate of that city.— During the reign of the protector, they were prohibited from meeting, except in their presbyteries and synods, for Cromwell knew how to deal with those like himself. At the restoration, presbytery was abolished and established again at the revolution, as we have noticed before; but we must now proceed to take notice of other particulars relating to this church, which at present makes such a distinguishing figure in the island of Great Britain, for the erudition of its clergy, and their faithful discharge of their duty.

We come now in the third place, to consider the various forms of worship that have taken place in the church of Scotland since the Reformation, down to the present time. The revolutions, indeed, are neither great nor numerous, but still they command our attention. It cannot be supposed, that in the infant state of the reformed church of Scotland, that the form of worship could be regular, and yet notwithstanding this, we find that natural principles, and a regard to some parts of divine revelation, induced the Scottish reformers to follow almost entirely the ancient practices as observed before the time of the emperor Constantine the Great. We have a form, in what is commonly called John Knox's liturgy, but that did not remain long. It was adapted for the readers, and it died with them. They began by reading the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, with the Creed, and then there was a prayer before sermon, which always concluded with the Lord's Prayer. This form seems to have continued till 1580, when Presbytery was established, and then things took a different turn.

Before that time, there were but few sermons preached in Scotland, for the clergy were so ignorant that they knew but little of the sacred scriptures; some of them were enthusiasts, and others were men who had no learning at all, and a third sort were those who had formerly been Romish priests. From such a medley, little good could have been expected, and the divisions that took place in the country, and which in a manner unhinged the basis of morality, induced the people to forget all those obligations they were under to themselves, and to their neighbours, and to God. The worship in that church was performed sometimes in one form, and sometimes in another, and confusion in the state occasioned confusion in the church.

When Presbytery took place in the church of Scotland 1580, although conducted by a parcel of insolent, bigotted, unlearned zealots, who knew nothing of toleration, with respect to matters of conscience, yet the leaders had the good sense to point out an uniform practice of religious worship. They ordered that the public service of the church should be conducted in the following manner:

While the people were assembling in the church, the reader, or, as they call him, the precentor, read two or three chapters out of the Old or New Testament, and in the choice of these, they were left to their own discretion. The congregation being assembled, the minister came into the pulpit, and repeated a short prayer, after which he read the Apostles' Creed and the Ten Commandments, but the people made no responses. This part of the ceremony being over, the minister delivered a discourse, which had some relation to the subject matter of the sermon that was to follow, and then he prayed for the general state of the world and of the nation. The text was then read, and the sermon preached, after which a psalm was sung, and a prayer followed, the service for the time being concluded by the general blessing. It is certain, that such a form of worship was very plain and simple, and in many respects consistent with the nature of the ancient church, and both the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians complied with it, without making any objections till the Westminster assembly 1645. That form of worship varied in some measure from the other that had gone before but in few things of a material nature.

These were times of popularity, when the prejudices of the common people run high, and when the clergy were willing to keep them in good humour. The Scottish clergy had at that time an unlimited power over the consciences of their people, and they endeavoured to introduce an external form of worship, which differed no more from the old, than that of a temporary compliance with temporary superstition. The clergy of Scotland, however, did not all at once embrace this change in their form of worship, but some of the zealots carried it to the other extreme. Instead of that rational form of worship which had taken place before, they introduced many innovations, which even exceeded all those laid down in their common directory for public worship. It is true, that this innovation was contrived by the general assembly of divines at Westminster, and there are many things in it very rational, and consistent with the practice of the primitive church, but still many of the preachers did not conform themselves to it. In all respects, and under every occurrence, where the circumstances of the times gave them an opportunity, they varied from the prescribed form. Thus some of them used the Lord's Prayer at the conclusion of their devotions, and others did not. Some of them, instead of reading the scriptures, made long discourses to their people, and during the whole space of time that took place from the death of Charles I. till the restoration they never prayed for the civil government, though that duty is enjoined in their directory; for what man could ever dispute the force of that duty, unless he was deprived of reason.

The directory for the church of Scotland is composed in words to the following import, and although they do not admit of any forms, yet we shall find that they have something formal. That directory is here set down, and we shall have occasion to take notice afterwards, how far it was complied with at the revolution, and how it is attended to in that country at present.

When the congregation is to meet for public worship, the people having before prepared their hearts thereunto, ought all to come, and join therein; not absenting themselves from public ordinances, through negligence, or upon pretence of private meetings.

Let all enter the assembly not irreverently, but in a grave and seemly manner, take their seats or places without adoration, or bowing themselves towards one place or another.

The congregation being assembled, the minister after solemnly calling them to the worshipping of the great name of God, is to begin with prayer.

In all reverence and humility acknowledging the incomprehensible greatness and majesty of the Lord, in whose presence they do then in a special manner appear, and in their own vileness and unworthiness to approach so near him; with their utter inability of themselves to so great a work, and humbly beseeching him for pardon, assistance, and acceptance in the whole service then to be performed; and for a blessing on that particular portion of his word then to be read; and all in the name and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The public worship being begun, the people are wholly to attend upon it; forbearing to read any thing, except what the minister is then reading, or citing; and abstaining much more from all private whisperings, conferences, salutations, or doing reverence to any person present, or coming in; as also from all gazing, sleeping, and all other indecent behaviour, which may disturb the minister or people, or hinder themselves or others in the service of God.

If any through necessity be hindered from being present at the beginning, they ought not, when they come into the congregation, to betake themselves to their private devotions, but reverently to compose themselves to join with the assembly in that ordinance of God which is then in hand.

Reading of the word in the congregation, being part of the public worship of God, wherein we acknowledge our dependence upon him, and subjection to him, and one means sanctified by him for the edifying of his people, is to be performed by the pastors and teachers.

Howbeit, such as attend the ministry, may occasionally both read the word, and exercise their gift in preaching to the congregation, if allowed by the Presbytery therunto.

All the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments, but none of those which are commonly called Apocrypha, shall be publicly read in the vulgar tongue, out of the best allowed translation, distinctly, that all may hear and understand.

How large a portion shall be read at once, is left to the wisdom of the minister; but it is convenient that ordinarily one chapter of each testament be read at every meeting; and sometimes more, where the chapters are short, or the coherence of matter requireth it.

It is requisite, that all the canonical books be read over in order, that the people may be better acquainted with the whole body of the scriptures; and ordinarily, where the reading in either Testament endeth on one Lord's day, it is to begin the next.

We commend also the fervent reading of such scriptures, as he that readeth shall think best for the edification of his hearers; as the book of Psalms and such like.

When the minister who readeth, shall judge it necessary to expound any part of what is read, let it not be done until the whole chapter or psalm be ended; and regard is always to be had to the time, that neither preaching or other ordinances be straightened, or rendered tedious; which rule is to be observed in all other public performances.

Besides the public reading of the holy scriptures, every person that can read, is to be exhorted to read the scriptures privately, and all others that cannot read, if not disabled by age or otherwise, are also to be exhorted to learn to read, and to have a bible.

After reading of the word, and singing of the psalm, the minister who is to preach, is to endeavour to get his own and his hearers' hearts to be rightly affected with their sins, that they may all mourn in sincerity before the Lord, and hunger and thirst after the grace of God in Jesus Christ, by proceeding to a more full confession of sin with shame and holy confusion of face: and to call upon the Lord to this effect.

To acknowledge our great sinfulness: first, by reason of original sin, which beside the guilt that makes us liable to everlasting damnation, is the seed of all other sins, hath depraved and poisoned all the faculties and powers of the soul and body, doth defile our best actions, and were it not restrained, or our hearts renewed by grace, would break forth in innumerable transgressions, and the greatest rebellions against the Lord, that ever were committed by the vilest of the sons of men. And next by reason of actual sins, our own sins, the sins of magistrates, of ministers, and of the whole nation, unto which we are many ways accessory.

Which sins of ours receive many fearful aggravations, we having broken all the commandments of the holy, just and good law of God, doing that which is forbidden, and leaving undone what is enjoined, and that not only out of ignorance and infirmity, but also more presumptuously against the light of our minds, checks of our consciences, and motions of his own holy spirit to the contrary, so that we have no cloak for our sins; yea, not only despising the riches of God's goodness, forbearance, and long suffering, but standing out against many invitations, and offers of grace in the gospel, not endeavouring as we ought, to receive Christ into our hearts by faith, or to walk worthy of him in our lives.

To bewail our blindness of mind, hardness of heart, unbelief, impenitency, security, lukewarmness, barrenness, or not endeavouring after mortification and newness of life, nor after the exercise of godliness, in the power thereof; and that the best of us have not so stedfastly walked with God, kept our garments so unspotted, nor been so zealous of his glory, and the good of others, as we ought, and to mourn over such other sins as the congregation is particularly guilty of; notwithstanding the manifold and great mercies of our God, the love of Christ, the light of the gospel, and Reformation of religion, our own purposes, promises, vows, solemn covenants, and other special obligations to the contrary.

To acknowledge and confess, that as we are convinced of our guilt, so out of a deep sense thereof, we judge ourselves unworthy of the smallest benefits, most worthy of God's fiercest wrath, and of all the curses of the law, and heaviest judgments inflicted upon the most rebellious sinners, and that he might most justly take his kingdom and gospel from us, plague us with all sorts of spiritual and temporal judgments in this life, and after cast us into utter darkness, in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, where are weeping and gnashing of teeth for evermore.

Notwithstanding all which, to draw near to the throne of grace, encouraging ourselves with hope of a gracious answer of our prayers, in the riches and all-sufficiency of that only one oblation, the satisfaction and intercession of the Lord Jesus Christ at the right hand of his father; and in confidence of the exceeding great and precious promises of mercy and grace in the new covenant, through the same mediator thereof, to deprecate the heavy wrath and curse of God, which we are not able to avoid, or bear; and humbly and earnestly to supplicate for mercy, in the free and full remission of all our sins, and that only for the bitter sufferings and precious merits of that our only Saviour Jesus Christ.

That the Lord would vouchsafe to send abroad his love into our hearts by the Holy Ghost, seal unto us by the same spirit of adoption, the full assurance of our pardon and reconciliation, comfort all that mourn in Zion, speak peace to the wounded and troubled spirit, and bind up the broken hearted; and as for secure and presumptuous sinners, that he would open their eyes, convince their consciences, and turn them from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they also may receive forgiveness of sin, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith in Christ Jesus.

With remission of sins through the blood of Christ, to pray for sanctification by his spirit; the mortification of sin dwelling in, and many times tyrannizing over us, the quickening of our dead spirits with the life of God in Christ, grace to fit and enable us for all duties of conversation, and callings towards God and men, strength against temptations, the sanctified use of blessings and crosses, and perseverance in faith, and obedience unto the end.

To pray for the propagation of the gospel and kingdom of Christ to all nations, for the conversion of the Jews, the fulness of the Gentiles, the fall of Anti-Christ, and the hastening of the second coming of our Lord; for the deliverance of the distressed churches abroad, from the tyranny of the Anti-Christian faction, and from the cruel oppressions and blasphemies of the Turk: for the blessing of God upon all the reformed churches: especially upon the churches and kingdom of England, Scotland, and Ireland, now more strictly and religiously united in the solemn national league and covenant, and for our plantations in the remote parts of the world; more particularly for that church and kingdom whereof we are members, that therein God would establish peace and truth, the purity of all his ordinances, and the power of godliness; prevent and remove heresy, schism, profaneuess, superstition, security, and unfruitfulness under the means of grace, heal all our breaches and divisions, and preserve us from the breach of our solemn covenant.

To pray for all in authority, especially for the king's majesty, that God would make him rich in blessings, both in his person and government; establish his throne in religion and righteousness, save him from evil council, and make him a blessed and glorious instrument for the conservation and propagation of the gospel, for the encouragement and protection of them that do well, the terror of all that do evil, and the great good of the whole church, and of all his kingdoms; for the preservation of the queen, the religious education of the prince, and the rest of the royal seed; for a blessing upon the high court of parliament, (when sitting in any of these kingdoms respectively:) the nobility, the subordinate judges and magistrates, the gentry and all the commonality; for all pastors and teachers, that God would fill them with his spirit, make them exemplary sober, peaceable, just, holy, and gracious in their lives; sound, faithful, and powerful in their ministry; and follow all their labours with abundance of success and blessing; and give unto all his people pastors according to his own heart; for the universities, and all schools, and seminaries of church and commonwealth, that they may flourish more and more in learning and piety; for the particular city or congregation, that God would pour out a blessing upon the ministry of the word, sacraments, and discipline, upon the civil government, and all the several families and persons therein; for mercy to the afflicted under any inward or outward distress; for reasonable weather and fruitful seasons, as the time require; for averting the judgments that we either feel or fear, or are liable unto, as famine, pestilence, the sword, and such like.

And, with confidence of his mercy to his whole church, and the acceptance of our persons through the merits and mediation of our great high priest the Lord Jesus, to profess that it is the desire of our souls to have fellowship with God in the reverent and conscionable use of his holy ordinance; and, to that purpose to pray earnestly for his grace and effectual assistance to the satisfaction of his holy sabbath, the Lord's day, in all the duties thereof, public and private, both to ourselves and to all other other congregations of his people, according to the riches and excellency of the gospel this day celebrated and enjoined.

And, because we have been unprofitable hearers in times past, and now cannot of ourselves receive as we should, the deep things of God, the mysteries of Jesus Christ, which require a spiritual discerning, to pray that the Lord who teacheth to profit, would graciously please to pour out the spirit of grace, together with the outward means thereof, causing us to attain such a measure of the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord, and in him of the things which belong to our peace, that we may account all things but as nothing in comparison of him: and that we, tasting the first fruits of the glory that is to be revealed, may long for a more full and perfect communion with him, that where he is we may be also, and enjoy the fullness of those joys and pleasures, which are at his right hand for evermore.

More particularly, that God would in a special manner furnish his servant, now called to dispense the bread of life unto his household, with wisdom, fidelity, zeal, and utterance, that he may divide the word of God aright, to every one his portion in evidence and demonstration of the spirit and power and that the Lord would circumscribe the ears and hearts of the hearers, to hear, love, and receive with meekness, the ingrafted word, which is able to save their souls, make them as good ground to receive in the good seed of the word, and strengthen them against the temptations of satan, the cares of the world, the hardness of their own hearts, and whatsoever else may hinder their profitable and saving hearing; that so Christ may be so formed in them, and live in them, that all their thought may be brought into captivity, to the obedience of Christ, and their heart established in every good word and work for ever.

We judge this to be a convenient order, in the ordinary public prayers; yet so, as the minister may defer, as in prudence he shall think meet, some part of these petitions, till after his sermon, to offer up to God some of the thanksgivings, hereafter appointed, in his prayer before his sermon.

Preaching of the word, being the power of God unto salvation, and one of the greatest and most excellent works belonging to the ministry of the gospel, should be so performed, that the workman need not be ashamed, but may save himself, and those that hear him.

It is presupposed, according to the rules for ordination, that the minister of Christ is in some good measure gifted for so weighty a service, by his skill in the oriental languages, and in such arts and sciences as are handmaids unto divinity, by his knowledge in the whole body of theology, but most of all in the holy scriptures, having his senses and heart exercised in them above the common sort of believers, and by the illumination of God's spirit, and other gifts of edification, which, together with reading and studying of the word, he ought still to seek by prayer, and an humble heart, resolving to admit and receive any truth not yet attained, whenever God shall make it known unto him. All which he is to make use of, and approve in his private preparations, before he deliver in public what he hath provided.

Ordinarily, the subject of his sermon is to be some text of scripture, holding forth some principle or head of religion; or suitable to some special occasion emergent; or he may go on in some chapter, psalm, or book of the scripture, as he shall see fit.

Let the introduction to his text be brief and perspicuous, drawn from the text itself, or context, or some parallel place of general sentence of scripture.

If the text be long, as in histories and parables it sometimes must be, let him give a brief sum of it; if short, a paraphrase thereof, if necessary: in both looking diligently to the scope of the text, and pointing at the chief heads and grounds of doctrine, which he is to raise from it.

In analysing and dividing his text, he is to regard more the order of matter, than of words; and neither to burthen the memory of the hearers in the beginning, with too many members of division, nor to trouble their minds with obscure terms of art.

In raising doctrines from the text, his care ought to be, first, that the matter be the truth of God: secondly, that it be a truth contained in, or grounded on that text, that the hearers may discern how God teacheth it from thence; thirdly, that he chiefly insist upon those doctrines which are principally intended, and make most for the edification of the hearers.

The doctrine is to be expressed in plain terms; or if any thing in it need explication, it is to be opened, and the consequence also from the text cleared. The parallel places of scripture confirming the doctrine, are rather to be plain and pertinent, than many, and if need be, somewhat insisted upon and applied to the purpose in hand.

The arguments and reasons are to be solid; and, as much as may be, convincing. The illustrations of what kind soever, ought to be full of light, and such as may convey the truth into the hearer's heart with spiritual delight.

If any doubt, obvious from scripture, reason or prejudice of the hearers, seem to arise, it is very requisite to remove it, by reconciling the seeming differences, answering the reasons, and discovering and taking away the causes of prejudice and mistake. Otherwise it is not fit to detain the hearers with propounding or answering vain or wicked cavils, which, as they are endless, so the propounding and answering of them doth more hinder than promote edification.

He is not to rest in general doctrine, although never so much cleared and confirmed, but to bring it home to special use, by application to his hearers; which albeit it prove a work of great difficulty to himself, requiring much prudence, zeal and meditation, and to the natural and corrupt man, will be very unpleasant: yet he is to endeavour to perform it in such a manner, that his auditors may feel the word of God to be quick and powerful, and a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart; and if that any unbeliever or ignorant person be present, he may have the secrets of his heart made manifest, and give glory to God.

In the use of instruction or information in the knowledge of some truth, which is a consequence from his doctrines, he may, when convenient, confirm it by a few firm arguments from the text in hand, and other places of scripture, or from the nature of that common place of divinity, whereof that truth is a branch.

In confutation of false doctrines, he is neither to raise an old heavey from the grave, nor to mention a blasphemous opinion unnecessarily; but if the people be in danger of an error, he is to confute it soundly, and endeavour to satisfy their judgments and consciences against all objections.

In exhorting to duties, he is, as he sees cause, to teach also the means that help to the performance of them.

In debatement, reprehension, and the public admonition, which require special wisdom, let him, as there shall be cause, not only discover the nature and greatness of the sin, with the misery attending it, but also shew the danger his hearers are in, to be overtaken and surprised by it, together with the remedies and best way to avoid it.

In applying comfort, whether general against all temptations, or particularly against some special troubles and terrors, he is carefully to answer such objections as a troubled heart and afflicted spirit may suggest to the contrary.

It is also sometimes requisite to give some notes of trial, which is very profitable, especially when performed by able and experienced ministers, with circumspection and prudence, and the signs clearly grounded on the holy scripture, whereby the hearers may be able to examine themselves, whether they have attained those graces, and performed those duties to which he exhorteth, or be guilty of the sin reprehended, and in danger of the judgments threatened, or are such to whom the consolations propounded do belong, that accordingly they may be quickened and excited to duty, humbled for their wants and sins, affected with their danger, and strengthened with comfort, as their condition upon examination shall require.

And, as he needeth not always to prosecute every doctrine which lies in his text, so is he wisely to make choice of such uses, as by his residence, and conversing with his flock, he findeth most needful and seasonable; and among these, such as may most draw their souls to Christ, the fountain of light, holiness and comfort.

This method is not prescribed as necessary for every man, or upon every text; but only recommended as being found by experience to be very much blessed of God, and very helpful for the people's understandings and memories.

But the servant of Christ, whatever his method be, is to perform his whole ministry.

1. Painfully, not doing the work of the Lord negligently.

2. Plainly, that the meanest may understand, delivering the truth, not in the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and power, lest the cross of Christ should be made of non-effect; abstaining also from an unprofitable use of unknown tongues, strange phrases, and cadences of sounds and words, sparingly citing sentences of ecclesiastical, or other human writers, ancient or modern, be they never so elegant.

3. Faithfully, looking at the honour of Christ, the conversion, edification and salvation of the people, not at his own gain or glory, keeping nothing back which may promote those holy ends, giving to every one his own portion, and bearing indifferent respect unto all, without neglecting the meanest, or sparing the greatest in their sins.

4. Wisely, framing all his doctrines, exhortations, and especially his reproofs, in such a manner as may be most likely to prevail, shewing all due respect to each man's person and place, and not mixing with it his own passion or bitterness.

5. Gravely, as becometh the word of God, shunning all such gesture, vice and expressions, as may occasion the corruptions of men to despise him and his ministry.

6. With loving affection, that the people may see all coming from his godly zeal, and hearty desire to do them good. And,

7. As taught of God, and persuaded in his own heart, that all that he teaches is the truth of Christ; and walking before his flock as an example to them in private; earnestly, both in private and public, recommending his labours to the blessing of God, and watchfully looking to himself and the flock, whereof the Lord hath made him overseer; so shall the doctrine of truth be preserved uncorrupt, many souls converted and built up, and himself receive manifold comforts of his labours, even in his life, and afterward the crown of glory laid up for him in the world to come.

Where there are more ministers in a congregation than one, and they of different gifts, each may more especially apply himself to doctrine or exhortation, according to the gift wherein he most excelleth, and as they shall agree between themselves.

The sermon being ended, the minister is

To give thanks for the great love of God, in sending his son Jesus Christ unto us: For the communieration of his holy spirit; for the light and liberty of the glorious gospel, and the rich and heavenly blessings revealed therein,—as viz. election, adoption, justification, sanctification, and hope of glory; for the admirable goodness of God, in freeing the land from anti-christian darkness and tyranny, and for all other national deliverances; for the Reformation of religion; for the covenant; and for many temporal blessings.

To pray for the continuance of the gospel, and all ordinances thereof, in their purity, power, and liberty.

To turn the chief and most useful heads of the sermon into some few petitions; and to pray that it may abide in the heart, and bring forth fruit.

To pray for preparation for death and judgment, and a watching for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. To intreat of God the forgiveness of the iniquities of our holy things, and the acceptance of our spiritual sacrifice, through the merits and mediation of our great high-priest and Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ.

And because the prayer which Christ taught his disciples is not only a pattern of prayer, but itself a most comprehensive prayer, we recommend it also to be used in the prayers of the church.

And whereas at the administration of the sacraments, the holding public fasts and days of thanksgiving, and other special occasions, which may afford matter of special petitions and thanksgivings; it is requisite to express somewhat in our public prayers, as at all times, it is our duty to pray for a blessing upon the churches, the armies by sea and land, for the defence of the king, parliament, and kingdom: Every minister herein is to apply himself in his prayer, before or after his sermon to those occasions; but for the manner he is left to his liberty, as God shall direct and enable him in piety and wisdom, to discharge his duty.

The prayer ended, let a psalm be sung, if with conveniency it may be done. After which, unless some other ordinance of Christ that concerneth the congregation at that time be to follow, let the minister dismiss the congregation with a solemn blessing.

Before baptism, the minister is to use some words of instruction, touching the institution, nature, use and ends of this sacrament:—Shewing

That it is instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ; that it is a seal of the covenant of grace, of our ingrafting into Christ, and of our union with him, of remission of sins, regeneration, adoption, and life eternal: That the water in baptism representeth and signifieth, both the blood of Christ, which taketh away all guilt of sin, original and actual, and the sanctifying virtue of the spirit of Christ, against the dominion of sin, and the corruption of our sinful nature: That baptizing or sprinkling and washing with water, signifieth the cleansing from sin by the blood, and for the merit of Christ, together with the mortification of sin, and rising from sin to newness of life, by virtue of the death and resurrection of Christ; that the promise is made to believers and their seed, and that the seed and posterity of the faithful, born within the church, have by their birth, interest in the covenant and right to the seal of it, and to the outward privileges of the church under the gospel, no less than the children of Abraham in the time of the Old Testament; the covenant of grace, for substance being the same; and the grace of God, and the consolation of believers, more plentiful than before. That the son of God admitted little children into his presence, embracing and blessing them, saying, for of such is the kingdom of God; that children by baptism are solemnly received into the bosom of the visible church, distinguished from the world, and them that are without, and united with believers, and that all who are baptized in the name of Christ, do renounce, and by their baptism are bound to fight against the devil, the world, and the flesh. That they are Christians and covenanted holy before baptism, and therefore are they baptised. That the inward grace and virtue of baptism is not tied to that very moment of time wherein it is administered, and that the fruit and power thereof, reacheth to the whole course of our life; and that outward baptism is not so necessary, that through the want thereof the infant is in danger of damnation, or the parents guilty, if they do not condemn or neglect the ordinances of Christ when and where it may be had.

In these or the like instruments the minister is to use his own liberty, and godly wisdom, as the ignorance or errors in the doctrine of baptism, and the edification of the people shall require.

He is also to admonish all that are present,

To look back to their baptism; to repent of their sins against their covenants with God; to stir up their faith, to improve and make the right use of their baptism, and of the covenant sealed thereby betwixt God and their souls.

He is to exhort the parent,

To consider the great mercy of God to him and his child; to bring up the child in the knowledge of the grounds of the Christian religion, and in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and to let him know the danger of God's wrath to himself and his child, if he be negligent; requiring his solemn promise for the performance of his duty.

This being done, prayer is also to be joined with the word of institution, for sanctifying the water to this spiritual use, and the minister is to pray to the following effect:—

without the covenant of promise, but called us to the privileges of his ordinances, would graciously vouchsafe to sanctify and bless his own ordinance of baptism at this time; that he would join the inward baptism of his spirit with the outward baptism of water: make this baptism to the infant a seal of adoption, remission of sin, regeneration and eternal life, and of all the other promises of the covenant of grace; that the child may be formed into the likeness of the death and resurrection of Christ, and that the body of sin being destroyed in him, he may serve God in newness of life all his days.

Then the minister is to demand the name of the child, which being told him, he is to say, calling the child by his name,

I baptise thee in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

As he pronounces these words, he is to baptise the child with water; which for the manner of doing it, is not only lawful but sufficient, and most expedient to be, by pouring or sprinkling of the water on the face of the child, without adding any other ceremony.

This done, he is to give thanks and pray, to this or the like purpose:

Acknowledging, with all thankfulness, that the Lord is true and faithful in keeping covenant and mercy; that he is good and gracious, not only in that he numbereth us among his saints, but is pleased also to bestow upon our children this singular token and badge of his love in Christ: that in his truth and special providence, he daily bringeth some into the bosom of his church, to be partakers of inestimable benefits, purchased by the blood of his dear son, for the continuance and increase of his church.

And praying, that the Lord would still continue, and daily confirm, more and more, this his unspeakable favour: that he would receive the infant now baptised, and solemnly entered into the household of faith, into his fatherly tuition and defence, and remember him with the favour that he sheweth to his people, that if he shall be taken out of this life in his infancy, the Lord, who is rich in mercy, would be pleased to receive him up into glory; and if he live and attain the years of discretion, that the Lord would so teach him by his word and spirit, and make his baptism effectual to him, and so uphold him by his divine power and grace, that by faith he may prevail against the devil, the world, and the flesh, till in the end he obtain a full and final victory, and so be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The communion, or supper of the Lord, is frequently to be celebrated: but how often, may be considered and determined, by the ministers and other church governors of each congregation, as they shall find most convenient for the comfort and edification of the people committed to their charge. And when it shall be administered we judge it convenient to be done after the morning sermon.

The ignorant and the scandalous are not fit to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Where this sacrament cannot with conveniency be frequently administered, it is requisite that public warning be given the sabbath day before the administration thereof; and that either then, or on some day of that week, something concerning that ordinance, and the due preparation thereunto, and participation thereof be taught, that by the diligent use of all means sanctified of God to that end, both in public and private, all may come better prepared to that heavenly feast.

When the day is come for administration, the minister having ended his sermon and prayer, shall make a short exhortation; expressing the inestimable benefit we have by this sacrament, together with the ends and use thereof, setting forth the great necessity of having our comforts and strength renewed thereby, in this our pilgrimage and warfare. How necessary it is that we come unto it with knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and with hungering and thirsting souls after Christ and his benefits: how great the danger to eat and drink unworthily.

Next, he is in the name of Christ on the one part, to warn all such as are ignorant, scandalous, profane, or that live in any sin or offence against their knowledge or conscience, that they presume not to come to that holy table, shewing them, that he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment unto himself; and on the other part, he is in especial manner to invite and encourage all that labour under the sense of the burden of their sins, and fear of wrath, and desire to reach out unto a greater progress in grace, than yet they can attain unto, to come to the Lord's table, assuring them, in the same name, of ease, refreshment, and strength, to their weak and wearied souls.

After this exhortation, warning, and invitation, the table being before decently covered, and so conveniently placed, that the communicants may orderly sit about it, or at it; the minister is to begin the action with sanctifying and blessing the elements of bread and wine set before him, the bread in comely and convenient vessels, so prepared, that being broken by him and given, it may be distributed amongst the communicants: the wine also in large cups; having first in a few words shewed, that those elements otherwise common, are now set apart and sanctified to this holy use, by the word of institution and prayer.

Let the words of institution be read out of the evangelists, or out of the first epistle of the apostle Paul to the Corinthians, chap. 11. ver. 23. "For I have received of the Lord," &c. to the 27th ver.

which the minister may, when he seeth requisite, explain and apply.

Let the prayer, thanksgiving, or blessing of the bread and wine, be to this effect:

With humble and hearty acknowledgment of the greatness of our misery, from which neither man nor angel was able to deliver us; and of our great unworthiness of the least of all God's mercies, to give thanks to God for all his benefits, and especially for that great benefit of our redemption, the love of God the Father, the sufferings and merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, by which we are delivered; and for all means of grace, the word and sacraments; and for this sacrament in particular, by which Christ and all his benefits are applied and sealed up unto us, which notwithstanding the denial of them unto others, are in great mercy continued unto us, after so much and long abuse of them all.

To profess that there is no other name under heaven, by which we can be saved, but the name of Jesus Christ, by whom alone we receive liberty and life, have access to the throne of grace, are admitted to eat and drink at his own table, and are sealed up by his spirit to an assurance of happiness and everlasting life.

Earnestly pray to God the father of all mercies, and God of all consolation, to vouchsafe his gracious presence, and the effectual working of his spirit in us, and so to sanctify these elements both of bread and wine, and to bless his own ordinance, that we may receive by faith the body and blood of Jesus Christ crucified for us, and so to feed upon him, that he may be one with us, and we with him, that he may live in us, and we in him, and to him, who hath loved us, and given himself for us.

All which he is to endeavour to perform with suitable affections answerable to such an holy action, and to stir up the like in the people.

The elements being not sanctified by the word and prayer, the minister being at the table, is to take the bread in his hand, and say in these expressions, or other the like used by Christ or his apostle upon this occasion:

According to the holy institution, command and example of our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, I take this bread, and having given thanks, I break it and give it unto you. Then the minister, who is also himself to communicate, is to break the bread and give it to the communicants: Take ye, eat ye, this is the body of Christ which is broken for you, do this in remembrance of him.

In like manner, the minister is to take the cup, and say in these expressions, or other the like, used by Christ, or the apostle, upon the same occasion:

According to the institution, command and example of our Lord Jesus Christ, I take this cup, and give it unto you (here he giveth it unto the communicants): This cup is the New Testament in the blood of Christ, which is shed for the remission of the sins of many: Drink ye all of it.

After all have communicated, the minister may in a few words put them in mind of the grace of God in Jesus Christ, held forth in this sacrament, and exhort them to walk worthy of it.

The minister is to give solemn thanks to God, for his rich mercy and invaluable goodness vouchsafed to them in that sacrament, and to intreat for pardon for the effects of the whole service, and for the gracious assistance of his good spirit, whereby they may be enabled to walk in the strength of that grace, as becometh those who have received so great pledges of salvation.

The collection for the poor is so to be ordered, that no part of the public worship be thereby hindered.

The Lord's day ought to be so remembered before hand, as that all worldly business or ordinary callings may be so ordered, and so timely and seasonably laid aside, as they may not be impediments to the due sanctifying of the day when it comes.

The whole day is to be celebrated as holy to the Lord, both in public and private, as being the Christian sabbath. To which end it is requisite, that there be an holy cessation, or resting all the day, from all unnecessary labours, and an abstaining, not only from all sports and pastimes, but also from all worldly words and thoughts.

That the diet of that day be so ordered, as that neither servants be unnecessarily detained from the public worship of God, nor any other persons hindered from the sanctifying that day.

That there be private preparation of every person or family by prayer, for themselves, and for God's assistance of the minister, and for a blessing upon his ministry, and by such holy exercises as may further dispose them to a more comfortable communion with God in his public ordinances.

That all the people meet timely for public worship, that the whole congregation may be present at the beginning, and with one heart solemnly join together in all parts of the public worship; and not depart till the blessing is pronounced.

That what time is vacant, between or after the solemn meeting of the congregation in public, be spent in reading, meditation, repetition of sermons, especially by calling their families to an account of what they have heard, and catechising of them, holy conferences, praying for a blessing upon the public ordinances, singing of psalms, visiting the sick, rich relieving the poor, and such like duties of piety, charity, and mercy, accounting the sabbath a delight.

Although marriage be no sacrament, nor peculiar to the church of God, but common to mankind, and of public interest in every common-wealth, yet because such as marry are to marry to the Lord, and have special need of instruction, direction, and exhortation, from the word of God at their entering into such a new condition, and of the blessing of God upon them therein; we judge it expedient, that marriage be solemnized by a lawful minister of the word, that he may accordingly counsel them, and pray for a blessing upon them.

Marriage is to be betwixt one man and one woman only; and they such as are not within the degrees of consanguinity or affinity, nor prohibited by the word of God. And the parties are to be of years of discretion, fit to make their own choice, and upon good grounds to give their mutual consent.

Before the solemnizing of marriage between any persons, their purpose of marriage shall be published by the minister three several sabbath days in the congregation, at the place or places of their most useful and constant abode respectively. And of this publication, the minister, who is to join them in marriage, shall have sufficient testimony, before he proceed to solemnize the marriage.

Before the publication of such their purpose, if the parties be under age, the consent of the parents or others under whose power they are, in case the parents be dead, is to be made known to the church officers of that congregation to be recorded.

The like is to be observed in the proceeding of all others, although of age, whose parents are living, for their first marriage. And in after marriages of either of those parties, they shall be exhorted not to contract marriage, without first acquainting the parents with it if with conveniency it may be done, endeavouring to obtain their consent.

Parents ought not to force their children to marry without their free consent, nor deny them their own consent without just cause.

After the purpose or contract of marriage hath been thus published, the marriage is not to be long deferred. Therefore the minister having had convenient warning, and nothing being objected to hinder it, is publicly to solemnize it in the place appointed by authority for public worship, before a competent number of credible witnesses, at some convenient hour of the day, at any time of the year except on a day of public humiliation, and we advise that it be not on the Lord's day.

And because all relations are sanctified by the word and prayer, the minister is to pray for a blessing upon them to this effect:—

Acknowledging our sins whereby we have made ourselves less than the least of all the mercies of God, and provoked him to imbitter all our comforts earnestly in the name of Christ to intreat the Lord, whose presence and favour is the happiness of every condition, and sweetens every relation, to be their portion, to own and accept them in Christ, who are now to be joined in the honourable estate of marriage, the covenant of their God. And that as he hath brought them together by his providence, he would sanctify them by his spirit, giving them a new frame of heart, fit for their new estate; enriching them with all graces, whereby they may perform the duties, enjoy the comforts, undergo the cares, and resist the temptations, which accompany that condition as becometh Christians.

The prayer being ended, it is proper that the minister do briefly declare unto them out of the scripture—

The institution, use, and ends of marriage, with the conjugal duties, which in all faithfulness they are to perform to each other, exhorting them to study the holy word of God, that they may learn to live by faith, and to be content in the midst of all marriage cares and troubles, sanctifying God's name in a thankful, sober, and holy use of all conjugal comforts, praying much with and for one another, watching over and provoking each other to love and good works, and live together as the heirs of the grace of life.

After solemnly charging of the persons to be married before that great God, who searcheth all hearts, and to whom they must give a strict account at the last day, that if either of them know any cause by precontract or otherwise, why they may not lawfully proceed to marriage; that they now discover it. The minister, if no impediment be acknowledged, shall cause first, the man to take the woman by the right hand, saying these or the like words:—

I N. do take thee N. to be my married wife, and do, in the presence of God, and before this congregation, promise and covenant to be a loving and faithful husband unto thee, until God shall separate us by death.

Then the woman shall take the man by his right hand, and say these words:—

I N. do take thee N. to be my married husband, and do in the presence of God, and before this congregation, promise and covenant to be a loving, faithful, and obedient wife unto thee, until God shall separate us by death.

Then without any further ceremony the minister shall in the face of the congregation, pronounce them to be husband and wife, according to God's ordinance, and so conclude the action with prayer to this effect:—

That the Lord would be pleased to accompany his own ordinance with his blessing, beseeching him to enrich the persons now married, as with other pledges of his love, so particularly with the comforts and fruits of marriage, to the praise of his abundant mercy, in and through Jesus Christ.

A register is to be carefully kept, wherein the names of the parties so married, with the time of their marriage, are forthwith to be fairly recorded in a book provided for that purpose, for the perusal of all whom it may concern.

It is the duty of the minister, not only to teach the people committed to his charge, in public, but privately, and particularly to admonish, exhort, reprove and comfort them, upon all reasonable occasions, so far as his time, strength, and personal safety will permit.

He is to admonish them in time of health, to prepare for death; and for that purpose they are often to confer with their minister about the estate of their souls: and, in times of sickness to desire his advice and help, timely and seasonably before their strength and understanding fail them.

Times of sickness and affliction, are special opportunities put into his hands by God, to minister a word in season to weary souls: because, then the consciences of men are, or should be more awakened, to bethink themselves of their spiritual estates for eternity; and, satan also takes advantage then to load them with more sore and heavy temptations. Therefore the minister being sent for, and repairing to the sick, is to apply himself with all tenderness and love, to administer some other spiritual good to to his soul, to this effect:

He may, from the consideration of the present sick, instruct him out of the scripture, that diseases come not by chance or by distempers of body only, but by the wise and orderly guidance of the good hand of God to every particular person smitten by them. And that whether it be laid upon him out of displeasure for sin, for his correction and amendment, and for trial and exercises of his grace, or for other special and excellent ends, all his sufferings shall turn to his profit, and work together for his good, if he sincerely labour to make a sanctified use of God's visitation, neither despising his chastening, nor waxing weary of his correction.

If he suspects him of ignorance, he shall examine him in the principles of religion, especially touching repentance and faith; and as he seeth cause, instruct him in the nature, use, excellency, and necessity of those graces; as also the covenant of grace, and Christ the Son of God, the mediator of and concerning remission of sins by faith in him.

He shall exhort the sick person to examine himself, to search and try his former ways, and his estate towards God.

And if the sick person shall declare any scruple, doubt, or temptation, that is upon him, instructions and resolutions shall be given to satisfy and settle him.

If it appear that he hath not a due sense of his sins, endeavours ought to be used to convince him of his sins, of the guilt and desert of them, of the filth and pollution which the soul contracts by them, and of the curse of the law, and wrath of God due to them; that he may be truly affected with, and humbled for them; and withal to make known the danger of deferring repentance, and of neglecting salvation at any time offered; to awaken his conscience, and rouse him out of a stupid and secure condition, to apprehend the justice and wrath of God, before whom none can stand, but he that being lost in himself, layeth hold upon Christ by faith.

If he has endeavoured to walk in the ways of holiness, and to serve God in uprightness, although not without many failings and infirmities; or if his spirit be broken with the sense of sin, or cast down through want of the sense of God's favour, then it will be fit to raise him up, by setting before him the freeness and fulness of God's grace, the sufficiency of righteousness in Christ, the gracious offers in the gospel, that all who repent and believe with all their heart in God's mercy through Christ, renouncing their own righteousness, shall have life and salvation in him.

It may be also useful to shew him, that death hath in it no spiritual evil to be feared by those that are in Christ, because sin, the sting of death, is taken away by Christ, who hath delivered all that are his from the bondage of the fear of death, triumphed over the grave, given us victory, is himself entered into glory, to prepare a place for his people: So that neither life nor death shall be able to separate them from God's love in Christ, in whom such are such, though now they must be laid in the dust, to obtain a joyful and glorious resurrection to eternal life.

Advice also may be given to beware of an ill grounded persuasion on mercy, or on the goodness of his condition for heaven so to disclaim all merit in himself, and to cast himself wholly upon God for mercy in the sole merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, who hath engaged himself never to cast off them, who in truth and sincerity come unto him.—Care also must be taken, that the sick person be not cast down into despair, by such a severe representation of the wrath of God due to him for his sins, as is not mollified by a reasonable propounding of Christ and his merit, for a door of hope to every penitent believer.

When the sick person is best composed, may be least disturbed, and other necessary offices about him least hindered, the minister, desired, shall pray with him, and for him, to this effect:

Confessing and bewailing of sin original and actual, the miserable condition of all by nature as being children of wrath, and under the curse, acknowledging that all diseases sicknesses, death, and hell itself, are the proper issues and effects thereof: imploring God's mercy for the sick person through the blood of Christ, beseeching that God would open his eyes, discover unto him his sins, cause him to see himself, make known to him the cause why God smiteth him, reveal Jesus Christ to his soul for righteousness and life, give unto him his holy spirit to create and strengthen faith, to lay hold upon Christ, to work in him comfortable evidence of his love, to arm against temptations, to take off his heart from the world, to sanctify his present visitation, to furnish him with patience and strength to bear it, and to give him perseverance in faith to the end.

That if God shall please to add to his days, he would vouchsafe to bless and sanctify all means of his recovery to remove the disease, renew his strength, and enable him to walk worthy of God, by a faithful remembrance, and diligent observing of such vows and promises of holiness and obedience, as men are apt to make in times of sickness, that he may glorify God in the remaining part of his life.

And if God hath determined to finish his days by the present visitation, he may find such evidence of the pardon of his sins, of his interest in Christ, and eternal life by Christ, as may cause his inward man to be renewed while his outward man decayeth; that he may behold death without fear, cast himself wholly upon Christ without doubting, desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ, and so receive the end of his faith, the salvation of his soul, through the only merits and intercession of the Lord Jesus Christ, our only Saviour and all-sufficient Redeemer.

The minister shall admonish him also, as there shall be cause, to set his house in order, thereby to prevent inconveniences, to take care for the payment of his debts, and to make restitution or satisfaction where he hath done any wrong, to be reconciled to those with whom he hath been at variance, and fully to forgive all men their trespasses against him, as he expects forgiveness at the hand of God.

Lastly, the minister may improve the present occasion to exhort those about the sick person to consider their own mortality, to return to the Lord and make peace with him; in health to prepare for sickness, death and judgment, and all the days of their appointed time, so to wait until their change come, that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, they may appear with him in glory.

When any person departeth this life, let the dead body, upon the day of burial, be decently attended from the house to the place appointed for public burial, and there immediately interred without any ceremony.

And because the customs of kneeling down and praying by, or towards the dead corpse, and other such usages in the place where it lays, before it be carried to burial, are superstitious; and for that, praying, reading, and singing both in going to, and at the grave have been grossly abused, are no way beneficial to the dead, and have proved many ways hurtful to the living, therefore let all such things be laid aside.

Howbeit we judge, if very convenient, that the Christian friends, which accompany the dead body to the place appointed for public burial, apply themselves to meditations and conferences suitable to the occasion; and that the minister as upon other occasions, so at this time, if he be present, may put them in remembrance of their duty.

That this shall not extend to deny any civil respects or differences at the burial, suitable to the rank and condition of the party deceased whilst he was living.

When some great and notable judgments are either inflicted upon a people apparently imminent, or by some extraordinary provocations notoriously deserved; as also, when some special blessing is to be sought and obtained, public solemn fasting, which is to continue the whole day, is a duty that God expecteth from the nation, or people.

A religious fast requires total abstinence not only from all food, unless bodily weakness do manifestly disable from holding out till the fast be ended, in which case somewhat may be taken yet very sparingly to support nature when ready to faint; but also from all worldly labour, discourses and thoughts, from all bodily delights, although at other times lawful, rich apparel, ornaments and such like, during the fast, and much more from whatever is, in the nature or use, scandalous or offensive; as garnish, attire, lascivious habits and gestures, and other vanities of either sex, which we recommend to all ministers in their places, diligently and zealously to reprove, as at other times, so especially at a fast without respect of persons, as here shall be occasion.

Before the public meeting, each family and person apart, are privately to use all religious care; to prepare their hearts to such a solemn work, and to be early at the congregation.

So large a portion of the day, as conveniently may be, is to be spent in public reading, and preaching of the word, with singing of psalms fit to quicken affections suitable to such a duty; but especially in prayer to this or the like effect:

Giving glory to the great majesty of God, the creator, preserver and supreme ruler of all the world, the better to affect us thereby with a holy reverence, and awe of him. Acknowledging his manifold, great, and tender mercies, especially to the church and nation, the more effectually to soften and abase our hearts before him. Humbly confessing of sins of all sorts, with their several aggravations: justifying God's righteous judgments, as being far less than our sins do deserve: yet humbly and earnestly imploring his mercy and grace for ourselves, the church and nation, for our king and all in authority, and for all others for whom we are bound to pray, according as the present exigence requirerh, with more special importunity and enlargement than at other times. Applying by faith the promises and goodness of God for pardon, help, and deliverance from the evils felt, feared, or deserved, and for obtaining blessings which we need and expect, together with a giving up of ourselves wholly and for ever unto the Lord.

In all these, the ministers, who are the mouths of the people unto God, ought so to speak from their hearts upon serious, and through premeditation of them, that both themselves and the people may be much affected, and even melted thereby: especially with sorrow for their sins, that it may be indeed a day of deep humiliation and afflicting of the soul.

Special choice is to be made of such scriptures to be read, and of such texts for preaching, as may best work the hearts of the hearers to the special business of the day, and most dispose them to humiliation and repentance; insisting most on those particulars, which each minister's observation and experience tell him are most conducing to the edification and reformation of that congregation to which he preacheth.

Before the close of the public duties, the minister is in his own and the people's name, to engage his and their own hearts to be the Lord's, with professed purpose and resolution to reform whatever is amiss among them, and more particularly such sins as they have been more remarkably guilty of; and to draw nearer unto God, and to walk more closely and faithfully with him in new obedience than ever before.

He is also to admonish the people with all importunity, that the work of that day doth not end with the public duties of it, but that they are so to improve the remainder of the day and of their whole life, in re-inforcing upon themselves and their families in private, all those godly affections and resolutions which they professed in public, as that they may be settled in their hearts for ever, and themselves may more sensibly find that God hath smelt a sweet savour in Christ for their performances, and is pacified towards them, by answers of grace, in pardoning of sin, in removing of judgments, in averting or preventing of plagues, and in conferring of blessings, suitable to the conditions and prayers of his people by Jesus Christ.

Beside solemn and general fasts enjoined by authority, we judge that at other times congregations may keep days of fasting, as divine providence shall administer to them special occasions. And also that families may do the same, so it be not on days wherein the congregation to which they do belong, is to meet for fasting or other public duties of worship.

When any such day is to be kept, let notice be given of it; and of the occasion thereof some convenient time before, that the people may the better prepare themselves thereunto.

The day being come, and the congregation, after private preparations, being assembled, the minister is to begin with a word of exhortation to stir up the people to this duty for which they are met, and with a short prayer for God's assistance and blessing, as at other conventions for public worship, according to the particular occasion of their meeting.

Let him then make some pithy narration of the deliverance obtained, or mercy received, or of whatever hath occasioned that assembling of the congregation, that all may better understand it, or be minded of it and more affected with it.

And because singing of psalms is of all others the most proper ordinance for expressing of joy and thanksgiving, let some pertinent psalm or psalms be sung for that purpose, before or after the reading some portion of the word, suitable to the present business.

Then let the minister who is to preach, proceed to further exhortation and prayer before his sermon, with special reference to the work; after which let him preach upon some text of scripture pertinent to the occasion.

The sermon ended, let him only pray as at other times after preaching is directed, with remembrance of the necessities of the church, the king, and state, if before the sermon they were omitted, but enlarge himself in due and solemn thanksgiving for former mercies and deliverances, more especially for that which at the present calls them together to give thanks; with humble petition for the continuance and renewing of God's wonted mercies, as need shall be, and sanctifying grace to make a right use thereof. And so having sung another psalm suitable to the mercy, let him dismiss the congregation with a blessing, that they have some convenient time for their repast and refreshing.

But the minister, before their dismissal, is solemnly to admonish them, to beware of all excess and riot, tending to gluttony or drunkenness, and much more of these sins themselves, in their eating and refreshing, and to take care their mirth and rejoicing be not carnal but spiritual, which may make God's praise to be glorious, and themselves humble and sober; and that both their feeding and rejoicing may render them more cheerful, enlarged further to celebrate his praise in the midst of the congregation, when they return into it, in the remaining part of that day.

When the congregation shall be again assembled, the like course in praying, reading, preaching, singing of psalms, and offering up of more praise and thanksgiving, that is before directed for the morning, is to be renewed and continued so far as the time will give leave.

At one or both of the public meetings that day, a collection is to be made for the poor, and in like manner upon the day of public humiliation, that their loins may bless us, and rejoice the more with us. And the people are to be exhorted at the end of the latter meeting, to spend the residue of that day in holy duties, and testifications of Christian love and charity one towards another, and of rejoicing more and more in the Lord, as becometh those who make the joy of the Lord their strength.

It is the duty of Christians to praise God publicly by singing of psalms together in the congregation, and also privately in the family.

In singing of psalms, the voice is to be tuneable and gravely ordered: But the chief care must be, to sing with understanding, and with grace in the heart, making melody unto the Lord.

That the whole congregation may join herein, every one that can read is to have a psalm-book, and all others, not disabled by age or otherwise are to be exhorted to learn to read. But for the present, where many in the congregation cannot read, it is convenient that the minister, or some other fit person appointed by him and the other ruling officers do read the psalm, line by line, before the singing thereof.

Thus we have here a complete directory for public worship, and when all the circumstances are considered, an unconcerned person will be surprised that such a composition should be drawn up by a body of men, differing in many sentiments concerning the externals of religion, but all agreeing in the essentials. At the same time, it must be acknowledged, that this directory comes nearer to the primitive form, than any of those in the reformed churches abroad; but this leads us to take notice, in the third place, of their various confessions of faith, from time to time.

The church of Scotland, at the Reformation 1560, had no regular confession of faith, nor articles of religion, but as to fundamental points, they were like the rest of the Protestant world. That is, they held all those sentiments as genuine, that were embraced by the church of Geneva, and in the church of England, except so far as the articles of that church relate to church government.

In 1561, Mr. Knox and some other divines, drew up a confession of faith, which continued to be the uniform standard of doctrine of the church of Scotland, till 1645, and this system, containing forty-three articles was constantly subscribed both by Episcopalians and Presbyterians. In all these articles, where the subject matter is disputable, the Scottish reformers have conducted themselves with great modesty, and much more so than the Westminster divines. In their account of predestination, they speak with the same moderation as the church of England; and although the whole is consistent with the doctrine of St. Austin, yet it is not carried to an extravagant height, nor are dogmatical assertions made use of.

This system of religion was so well esteemed, that no fault was found with it by the people of Scotland till the famous Westminster assembly, when some of the members, who were violent in their tempers and high in their notions, objected to it as favouring the Arminian scheme, which was really false, there not being one article in it but what every Calvinist might subscribe. This ancient Protestant confession of faith is but little known in the present age, except by those who are curious in searching into such matters. It is, however, a noble composition, and is worthy of those men, who although but little acquainted with human learning, yet had the fear of God, and the love of true religion implanted in their hearts.

There is one thing very remarkable, namely, that when episcopacy was established 1662, not one word was mentioned concerning a system of articles. Perhaps there never was such a blunder committed before. An established church without a system, is like a body without a soul. And yet this want of articles in the episcopal church of Scotland was never called in question till 1682, when the test act was proposed, and carried through parliament, by the influence of the duke of York. This infamous act was expressed in words to the following purport, or import. Every person was to swear that he would support the Protestant religion as by law established. Here was a studied ambiguity, calculated to serve the ends the Roman Catholics had in view; and nothing could have induced the people of Scotland to give their consent to it, had it not been the terrors they were under of coming once more under the severity of Presbyterian discipline.

The oath was taken by some of the nobility, but when it was proposed to the earl of Argyle, he asked, what was the religion by law established? The bishops of Scotland were at that time poor, ignorant, worthless men; but this question put them to what they had never done before, namely, the blush. It was then proposed in council, that a system should be fixed on, and after many debates, that of 1561 was made choice of. The Presbyterians did not object so much to the form of the old confession, as they did to its moderation, and as for the Episcopalians, many of them treated all sorts of religion with contempt. But this was not all:—There was an ambiguity in the words of the act, which seemed to have been studied by some very artful person. Thus by the words “Protestant religion” it was not said whether it was episcopacy, or presbytery. This seems to have been contrived to irritate all those who were of the presbyterian persuasion; but the snare was laid equally for the virtuous amongst the episcopalians. The act appointing the reformed religion as the establishment of Scotland was never signed by queen Mary, and therefore when it was said, “by law established,” the Papists had it still in their power to insinuate that there was no religion but theirs established by law. The sensible part of the Episcopalians saw through the deception, and the oath was rejected by them, while the Presbyterians treated it with abhorrence.

The horrid murders that took place in Scotland, in consequence of this act, are well known to all those who are properly acquainted with the history of that country. But then it should be considered that the duke of York was a merciless tyrant, and the Scottish bishops were mean obsequious wretches. It is true, this system which had been embraced by the church of Scotland under all her forms for at least eighty-five years, was acknowledged by the Episcopalians till the revolution, and by some of them afterwards. But this leads us to consider their second system, which was framed by the assembly of divines at Westminster, was the formula of doctrine for the church of Scotland till the restoration, and has been so ever since the revolution.

This system is a compilation of those doctrines, which were propagated by St. Austin, and embraced by most of the Protestant reformers. The sentiments are striking, and the language is engaging.—It is divided into thirty-three articles, all of which we shall take notice of.

The first article relates to the holy scriptures, and points out the necessity of divine revelation, to bring men to a state of happiness, where the light of natural reason fails. It enumerates all the books of the Old and New Testament; it disclaims all reliance on church authority, or traditions, and allows nothing to be the foundation, or ground work of our faith and obedience, but the truths contained in the sacred scriptures.

The second article asserts the doctrine of the Trinity in unity, a sentiment that most Christians agree in, excepting a few English dissenters. This article is well expressed; and all the positions are supported by such texts of scripture as are inconfictory. And here it may not be improper to observe, that this article of the Christian faith was never called in question till the middle of the fourth century.

The third article relates to predestination, and here the notion is carried much higher than it is in the seventeenth article of the church of England. It is certain, there are some very unguarded expressions in this article, and others that clearly point out a forced construction put upon scripture. The greatest fault in this article is, that the assertions are too positive and dogmatical. The persons who framed them, seem to have looked upon themselves as infallible, or otherwise they would never have pretended to dictate to their fellow-creatures in matters of no manner of importance.

The fourth article is one of those which is acknowledged by all the inhabitants of the world, unless they are Atheists, or Epicureans. This article asserts, that the world was created by Almighty power, and that all the three persons in the ever blessed Trinity were concerned in it. It is certain, that no object can make itself, no being form its own existence. There is in this article a line drawn between natural and revealed religion, a circumstance too seldom to be met with in modern systems of divinity.

In a regular course, the fifth article relates to Providence. Some parts of this article are rather harsh, and many of the expressions unguarded; but in general there is something noble and grand in the whole. God is here acknowledged to be the sovereign Lord of the creation, and consequently has a right to dispose of his creatures in what manner he pleases. The article concludes by taking notice, the same Providence which takes care of the world, exercises the same care over the church of God.

The sixth article relates to the fall of man, and all the sentiments in this article are expressed with care and precision. There are few people in the world who will deny the existence of original corruption; for common experience points it out.—Why should men be so prone to sin if there is not a contamination in the nature? Why should all the faculties be corrupted, if there was not an original cause? The case is plain and obvious, and agrees with the doctrine of the church of England.

The seventh article relates to the two covenants, namely, those of works and grace. This article asserts, that the covenant of works, was a conditional engagement, entered into by the great Jehovah and our first parents, concerning personal obedience.—The covenant of grace was an engagement entered into by God on the one part, and his son on the other, to redeem our fallen race. The words in this article are stiff and affected, and there are some very ambiguous expressions made use of. This, however, is not so much to be imputed to the framers of the articles, as to the tempers of those people with whom things were conducted. God in his goodness promotes the interests of his creatures, and he loves that all his subjects should do the same.

The eighth article relates to Christ, as a mediator between God and man. This is one of the fundamental articles of the Christian faith; for what necessity could there have been for Christ's taking our nature upon him, unless it was by his mediation to make up that breach which sin had procured. It is through Christ, as a mediator between offending power and offending sinners, that we must look for acceptance. The papists, although they pray to angels and saints, yet allow Christ to be the Supreme Mediator. Nay, nothing is more common than to hear an Arian mentioning Christ as a mediator, although at the same time he attempts to rob him of his glory.

The ninth article relates to the freedom of the human will, and is much the same as that in the church of England, only that it is more full and expressive. It is grounded on all those passages of sacred scripture, which point out the omnipotence of God; but it is certain that many of these passages relate to the general purposes of God, and not to the condition of individuals. We shall not, however, meddle with the controversy, but leave every reader to judge for himself.

The tenth article follows the ninth of course, and relates to effectual calling, or, as it is commonly expressed, efficacious grace in bringing men to a sense of sin, and a knowledge of the necessity they are under of being justified through the imputation of Christ's righteousness.

The chain of principles in this compendium is so regularly interwoven, that the actual justification of a sinner follows immediately in the eleventh article after effectual calling. And here, in conformity with all the Protestant churches at the Reformation, it is asserted that no man can be justified before God so as to be saved eternally, but through the imputation of Christ's righteousness. Certainly it is the safest way for a man to trust for salvation in the righteousness of Christ, rather in any thing done by himself. It is, in the words of the old proverb, "Erring on the safe side." For surely the man who has a low and humble opinion of himself, will be the most ready to do good works; so that if the sentiments concerning the imputation of Christ's righteousness should not be true, yet he will be able to obtain salvation on the score of his own merits.

Adoption of course follows, by which is meant, sinners being adopted or admitted as the children of God, and heirs of his glory. The term is borrowed from the civil law of the Romans, which permitted a man who had no children to make choice of one, whom he called by his own name, and left him his estate. In such cases, no law-suit could be entered into by the collateral relations, the adopted person being to enjoy the whole secure and unmolested.—As this supposed a right of possession among the Romans, as well as a right of disposal, so adoption in a Christian sense imports God's absolute power and freedom to bestow his mercies, favours, and blessings, whenever he pleases.

The thirteenth article is concerning sanctification, which naturally follows adoption. It is certain, that without holiness or good works, all pretensions to justification and adoption are vain. It is, however, a very melancholy consideration, that the most zealous professors of religion are the worst of men. The man who is justified and adopted into the family of God, is holy, humble, meek, charitable, and virtuous; whereas the bold hypocrite who tires heaven with his prayers, and talks to people of his experiences, is only ripening for hell.

The fourteenth article is concerning saving faith; and here the doctrine of the appropriation has been held forth as a leading principle. It is certain, that this was in general the notion embraced by the reformers throughout Europe, and it follows exactly the doctrine of St. Austin. In the church, before the time of Austin, faith was considered as a firm belief that Christ was what he is represented in scripture; namely, the second person in the ever-blessed Trinity, God and man; that he was born of the Virgin Mary, that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, and that he arose again and ascended into heaven. To believe this, was all that was required of the ancient Christians, only that they were to depart from all sorts of iniquity. St. Austin, however, introduced the notion, that there was a necessity for the appropriating act, and in this he has been followed by the reformers. Mr. Hervey defines the appropriating act in the following words, "Christ is mine, grace is mine, pardon is mine, and why? because I feel sanctifying operations in my heart." Perhaps Mr. Hervey was right, for surely the man who feels within himself an inclination to do good, must have the grace of God in his heart. By those, however, of enlarged sentiments, faith has been logically defined in the following words:—

1. Faith is the belief of something being true, in consequence of a firm persuasion that the person who related the fact could not tell a lie.
2. But God is the author of Divine Revelation.
3. Therefore, to believe the Old and New Testament to be true, is saving faith.

The fifteenth article is concerning repentance, which must always make a part of religion, where men believe themselves to be sinners. There are no Christians that we know of, who deny the doctrine of repentance, only that some whom we shall have occasion to mention afterwards, believe that it flows from the freedom of the human will, whereas the article before us asserts, that it is effected by divine grace. The Arminians say, that repentance goes before faith, and the Calvinists insist that it follows after.

The sixteenth article is concerning good works, which is what may be called an excrescence. We have already considered the article on sanctification, and in the name of common sense, do not good works flowing from faith in Christ Jesus become sanctification. What is sanctification, is it not the effect of every duty flowing from evangelical principles? The church of England has treated of good works and sanctification as one and the same, and we will freely acknowledge, that to separate them is little better than insanity. We must acknowledge, however, that the hypocrite makes use of the word sanctification, while the true Christian glories in good works without trusting in them.

The seventeenth article relates to the final perseverance of the saints, which is one of the grand articles in that system which St. Austin taught, and which was reduced into a system by Calvin. It is certain, that when we consider the state of human nature, the pride of men, and their ill-grounded expectations, this article will appear to us clogged with dangerous consequences. Thus the person who believes he cannot fall from grace, is apt to be so vain in his own conceit as to neglect moral duties. Perhaps this is the greatest error in modern religion, and we can almost venture to affirm, that it has laid the foundation for crimes. While men are on their guard, God will be with them; while they indulge themselves in security, they will be in danger.

The eighteenth article is little more in words than a repetition of the last. It is on the assurance of salvation. Whatever men may believe, whatever they may embrace as their own private sentiments, they ought to be extremely cautious how they make them public to others. Ask a man whether he is sure of salvation, and perhaps the boldest professor will decline answering in the affirmative.

The nineteenth article relates to the law of God, and this is plain and expressive. It distinguishes the law of God into two different parts, as first, that made with, or given to Adam, which has commonly been called the moral law, though with great impropriety. Secondly, the ceremonial law, by which through sacrifices and other significant types, the whole gospel dispensation was pointed out.—Thirdly, the fundamental law of the Romans, which related to the security of civil property, as well as the preservation of life; and lastly, the law of Christ which comprehends all that is useful in any of the others.

The twentieth article is concerning liberty of conscience; and here we are sorry to observe that there is a studied ambiguity runs through the whole of it. It is remarkable, that above forty years after the Reformation, the Protestants should have retained intolerant principles. To consider this article in a superficial light, it would seem that the framers of it had been friends to ecclesiastical and civil liberty, but a person who is acquainted with reason, cannot be deceived with such flimsy pretences. The whole article has been drawn up by a very artful person, who seems to have been no stranger to the school of Loyola.

The twenty-first article relates to the Christian sabbath, or Lord's day, and it is certain, that this was a duty observed by the primitive church, except by such as were slaves to heathen masters. In this article the sentiments are clearly expressed, and point out all those duties which the sincere Christian should practise. This much is certain, that if the religious observation of the sabbath was more attended to than it is, it might be of great service to the world in general. There is something that has a heavenly appearance, in men setting apart some of their time for religious duties. One day in seven is observed by the Mahometans, one by the Jews, and one by the Christians.

Article twenty-second relates to oaths or vows, and here the authors have adhered very strictly to the scriptural sense. It is certain, that the form of swearing in England does not carry along with it, that solemn dread which should be upon the minds of the people. But here the duty is explained in a clear, comprehensive; expressive manner.

The twenty-third article relating to the civil magistrate, is very ambiguously expressed. This much is certain, that the framers of the article delivered sentiments which contradicted their own practise. They were, at that time, in a state of rebellion, and yet they here expressed themselves as loyal subjects.

The twenty-fourth article relates to marriage, and when we consider every thing in it, we shall find, that it is, in all respects, consistent with the moral law of nature, and the gospel of Christ. There are some strong invectives against people despising the marriage state, and perhaps it would be much better for the people in the present age were they to attend more to this sentiment.

The twenty-fifth article relates to the universal church, and this is much the same in substance, as the article on that subject in the church of England. It disclaims all pretensions to infallibility, and declares the pope of Rome to be anti-christ. It asserts that Christ is the head of the church, in opposition to all those whom they call Erastians, who give that power to the civil magistrate.

The twenty-sixth article concerns the communion of saints as united to Jesus Christ their living head. This is an important article of the Christian faith, and in it that doctrine is clearly expressed. It is certain, that all believers on this earth may be said to be in a state of communion, like children of the same family, and heirs of the same inheritance. As they all partake of the same effects of the death of Christ, and are all to enjoy his presence for ever, so there is nothing more necessary than that they should be united.

The twenty-seventh article relates to the sacraments, and although the sentiments of the person who framed it are the same with those of the church of England, yet the Westminster divines have explained themselves with greater precision. Like the church of England, they here declare that there are but two sacraments, and that they are only visible signs of inward invisible grace.

Article twenty-eight is on baptism, and here these divines have kept in the middle between the two extremes. The article asserts, that it is a great sin to delay baptism, and much more so to despise it; but abhorring the popish notions, as well as those embraced by some Protestant churches, that it is absolutely necessary to salvation.

The twenty-ninth article is on the Lord's supper, and the same sentiments are retained in it as in the church of England, only that there is no ambiguity, the whole being expressed in the clearest manner.

The thirtieth article relates to church censures, which will be taken more notice of when we come to treat of the discipline of the church of Scotland.

The thirty-first article relates to synods, or councils, and here it is necessary to remark, that although the Puritans condemned the twentieth article of the church of England, which gives power to the church to appoint rites and ceremonies, yet here we find the same sentiment advanced, and indeed, in a much more ambiguous manner, than in the church of England.

The thirty-second article relates to the state of men after death, and the resurrection. There are two things necessary to be attended to in this article:—

The first of which is, that the framers of it disclaim the notion that the souls of people sleep from the time of their death till the resurrection. This notion is at present embraced by many of the English dissenters, who seem to be glutted with liberty and fond of novelty.

The second thing in this article, is the common opinion, that the souls of the righteous go into heaven at death, and the souls of wicked men into hell. It is very surprising, that any man who has read Luke xvi. should ever run away with such an absurd notion, that human souls either go to heaven or hell at death. The express words in that chapter assert, that there are two states, one for the righteous, and the other for the wicked.

The heathens, as appears from the sixth book of Virgil, thought thus, and Christ speaks of such a separate state, as afforded an opportunity for the happy and miserable to see each other. This was the sense of the primitive church; for as Christ had taken our nature upon him, and as he was not glorified himself till he ascended into heaven, consequently our happiness will not be complete till our bodies and souls are united.

The thirty-third and last article is concerning the general judgment. This is an article of natural religion, and is strongly enforced by divine revelation; the natural principle on which it stands, is the inequality of the distribution of justice and mercy in this world. Our notions of God are, that he is just, and that he will reward virtue and punish vice. Now, as vice often reigns triumphant, while virtue is depressed, it is consistent with the divine attributes, that God should appoint a day for a general retribution. However, concerning this article, divine revelation has not left us in the dark; for Christ himself has assured us, that he will come in glory to give to every one according to his works. And Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles, speaking on this subject in the court of Areopagus, said, "He hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness." Acts xvii. 32.

Such are the articles contained in that formulary drawn up by the assembly of divines at Westminster, and at present embraced by the church of Scotland. It is certain, that it contains a complete and methodical system of Austin's opinions and Calvin's doctrines. It is equally certain, that there are sentiments in it which were not known in the Christian church, till the fourth century. With respect to the civil power, it has a studied, or rather a forced ambiguity, but this must be ascribed to the spirit and temper of that age when it was compiled. When this system was drawn up, a copy fairly engrossed on vellum, was deposited in the chapel of Henry VII. at Westminster; where the members of both houses gave their assent to it; for the parliament was at that time without a king. The parliament of Scotland ratified this confession 1649, but it was abolished at the restoration. In 1690, it was established as the fundamental articles of religion in the church of Scotland; and, at present, every professor in their universities, every probationer, and every minister, previous to his ordination, must subscribe to it. It is not, however, imposed on the civil magistrates, nor in Scotland are there any sacramental tests.

The church of Scotland has two catechisms, both drawn up in the same manner, only that the one is a composition to be read, the other is a simple catechism to be got by heart. Both these catechisms are divided into a more regular plan than any perhaps in the universe. They consist only of three parts, namely, first, what the scriptures teach us to believe concerning God; secondly, an account of that duty which God requires of men; and, lastly, an illustration of all that the churches should attend to in this life.

The shorter catechism of the church of Scotland, is one of the most beautiful compendiums of Calvinistical divinity that ever was written. The sentiments are striking, the language is nervous, though adapted to the meanest capacities, and the doctrines are such as in general may be supported by scripture. The questions are drawn up in such an easy manner, that the weakest capacity may return the answer in an easy manner; and they are so connected together, that they seem to resemble the links of a chain; for remove the answer to one of the questions, and you discompose the whole.

Having said thus much concerning the fundamental articles of their religion, we shall now endeavour to lay before the reader the present state of their church in all its different parts.

And first, with respect to its government.

The church of Scotland is at present, and has been ever since the revolution, governed in the following manner:

In every parish there is at least one minister, and sometimes two, but where there are two, they are equal in power; for no individual minister in the church of Scotland has authority over another. In every parish, besides the minister, there are a few reputable men chosen, whom they call elders. The number of these men are according to the extent of the parish, and they are solemnly ordained for life. Their business is to visit the sick, and pray with them in the absence of the minister; to take care that parents bring up their children in a proper manner; to inquire into all acts of immorality, and make a report thereof to the kirk session.

The kirk session is composed of the minister and those elders, and they meet at least once every week, and in country places most commonly on Sundays after the service is over. They inquire into every complaint against any of the parishioners, and if it is for fornication or adultery, they inflict the following censures upon them.

There is in every parish church a seat erected in a most conspicuous part, where the offender must sit three several Sundays, and receive as many rebukes from the minister; but from this sentence the offender may appeal to the presbytery, of which we shall speak afterwards.

The lowest order of officers in the church of Scotland are their deacons. These men, like the elders, are in number according to the extent of the parish. They are always reputable housekeepers, and their duty is to inquire into the state of the poor, to administer to them the alms of the congregation, but they are not permitted to sit in any church judicatures.

The presbytery is composed of the ministers of a certain district, which, according to the situation of the country, may be from ten to sixteen parishes.—From each parish an elder goes as well as the minister, and they meet once every six weeks. They hear all appeals from the church session, and they elect ministers to represent themselves in the general assembly.

An appeal from the presbytery lies to the synod, which is composed of the whole members of three or four presbyteries, and they meet twice in the year, and review the proceedings of the presbyteries. In both these meetings the president, or, as they call him, moderator, is always chosen from among the ministers. He proposes the questions and collects the votes; and both in presbyteries and synods attorneys are allowed to plead.

Above all these is the general assembly, which, properly speaking, may be called the parliament of the church of Scotland. This council is composed of three hundred and forty-five members, being ministers and elders, together with commissioners from the universities. They have, ever since the revolution, met at Edinburgh, in the last week of May, and the king sends down a commissioner to represent his person. When the commissioner arrives at Edinburgh, he walks in procession to the high church, where a sermon is preached by the moderator, or president for the last year. Divine service being over, the assembly meets in an aisle belonging to the church, where there is a throne covered with crimson velvet. The commissioner takes his seat on the throne, and three steps below him is the president for the last year, with the clerk, who is always a minister, at a table before him. The commissioner, who is, during his office, styled his grace, receives the commission from the bag-bearer, and delivers it to the moderator, who reaches it to the clerk.

The clerk reads the commission first in Latin, and then in English. It is always to the following import. It begins with a declaration of his majesty's love and regard for the church of Scotland; an acknowledgment of the favours his family are under to that church; and this is followed by an exhortation, that they will promote the interest of virtue and morality, that they will send able teachers among the poor Highlanders, that they may be brought up in the fear of God, as useful members of society. The commission being read and recorded, two candidates are named to be moderator, and the majority of votes carries the election. The new moderator then goes up to the chair, and constitutes the assembly by prayer.

As soon as prayer is over, the high commissioner delivers a speech from the throne, concerning the state of the nation, and recommends to them peace and unanimity, and rejoices in having been honoured to represent his majesty's person in such a learned and reverend assembly. After this he withdraws, and the first thing done is to draw up an address to his majesty, which is given to the commissioner, who transmits it to the secretary of state. The next thing done by them is to grant a warrant on the exchequer to pay one thousand pounds towards supporting the charity schools in the Highlands, and then they proceed to chuse their committees, which, in general, is the business of the first day.

Next day they enter upon such business as was left unfinished the preceding year, and every member has leave to speak to the question proposed.— Council, who must all be advocates, are permitted to plead in all matters of dispute; so that what a learned author says is true, namely, that the general assembly of the church of Scotland is the school of eloquence.

The commissioner may come as often as he pleases to the assembly, but he must not interfere in their debates, nor has he so much as a vote. The business before the assembly is either by appeals or original actions, which are prosecuted by summons. The appeals are of various sorts, and such as perhaps may have been carried from the kirk session through the presbytery and synod.

The original actions are of a more important nature, and for the most part relate to the settlement of ministers. From the Reformation to the year 1649, the patrons of parishes presented ministers to vacant churches, but from that time to the restoration, they were elected by the people.

From the restoration to the revolution, the right of patronage returned to its old form, but at the revolution, when presbytery was established, 1690, the right of patronages was abolished. At the union, 1707, it was enacted, that the revolution settlement should continue; but the whigs, having by their ambition, pride, and avarice, forfeited all claims to the royal favour, queen Anne, in 1710, changed her ministry, and made choice of such persons as were then called high churchmen.

These men hated the church and people of Scotland, not only on account of the simplicity of their religion, but likewise because they were endeavouring to do all they could towards suppressing popery, and bringing the present family to the throne. In order, therefore, to please the Jacobite party, and provoke the members of the church of Scotland, a bill was brought into parliament to restore the right of patronages. Some of the Scottish members opposed this bill, well knowing the fatal consequences that would attend it, by provoking the people and dishonouring religion. Others, however, had more interesting views; and as for the English members, they gave themselves no concern about it, so that the act passed with very little opposition.

It is impossible to describe the discontent that took place among all ranks of people in Scotland, when this act took place, and, notwithstanding, it must be mentioned to the honour of the Scottish nobility, that it was many years before they availed themselves of this privilege. In time, however, they did, and it has occasioned much mischief. But the conduct of the church of Scotland on these occasions has been really praise-worthy. The patron must present the probationer to the presbyteries within six months, and if they find that he is not qualified, they will reject him. On the other hand, when they do find him qualified, but at the same time likely to be obnoxious to the people, so as to render his ministry ineffectual, they do all they can to persuade the patron to send another, who is likely to be more useful. Nay, in some cases, the presbyters will remonstrate, and refuse to proceed to the ordination, and this brings many appeals before the general assembly, but from their decision there is no appeal.

Besides the general assembly, there is another court, which may be called the privy council of the church of Scotland, because it is composed of a few deputies, who prepare business for the next assembly, though they can make no acts of their own, but only draw up papers, and inquire whether the presbyteries have obeyed the orders of the assembly. This court is called the commission of the assembly, and meets at Edinburgh as often as they please, for they have no fixed times. They consist chiefly of such as are most celebrated for their learning, wisdom, piety, and such other qualities as may enable them to discharge all those duties incumbent upon them, as the fathers and guardians of the established church.

The young clergy in Scotland have few tempting objects before them, besides that pleasing one, namely, to seek to win the hearts of their people. When the young gentlemen have finished their studies at the university, they are examined by the presbyters of the bounds where they were born, and it is done in the following manner:

The candidate having considered, a theses, or head in divinity, delivers in a critical explanation of it, and answers all the objections usually made against

it. He then delivers in Latin a critical discourse on one of the Hebrew psalms; after which, on the next day, he delivers a discourse in English, in the form of a sermon, both critical and practical. These examinations take up several days, and on the last of these comes the grand questionary trial, in which every minister has a right to ask what questions he pleases; and if satisfactory answers are given, the young student receives a licence to preach in any church in Scotland to which he may be invited; but he is not to administer the sacraments till he is ordained, nor is he to be ordained till he obtains a parish living.

When a minister dies, or is removed from one church to another, the presbytery meet in the bounds where the church is in, and appoint one of themselves to go and preach once to the people, and he affixes a paper on the church door, declaring it vacant. If no person is presented by the patron in six months, then the right falls to the presbytery; but in such cases they always give up their right to the people. When one of these probationers is presented or elected, he must attend the next meeting of the presbytery, where he undergoes a second examination, and performs the same exercises as before. He must likewise bring a certificate of his moral conduct, and then one of the presbytery goes with him to the church door, and reads a paper which he fixes up, intimating, that if any person can, within forty-two days, mention any thing against him, they are to come and prove it, otherwise they will proceed to his ordination. If no objection is made, then the presbytery meet at the parish church where the probationer is to be ordained.

One of the ministers preaches a sermon on the nature and duty of the ministerial office, and another delivers a discourse on the necessity and regularity of ordination. The candidate then repeats his confession of faith, which consists of his notions concerning the chief heads in divinity. He then declares before them, that he will not deliver any thing that is contrary to the Westminster confession of faith; and subscribes it, as an oath, in a book kept for that purpose.

Then one of the ministers prays, and the candidate kneeling down in the middle of the congregation, all the members of the presbytery lay their hands upon his head, the moderator acquainting him, that he is ordained to the work of the ministry, after which they all give him the right-hand of fellowship as a brother. This part of the ceremony is followed by the congregation singing an hymn or psalm, after which the moderator or president goes up to the pulpit, and delivers a discourse to the new ordained minister, exhorting him to consider what a charge he has taken upon him; to be tender and affectionate to his people, not plaguing and perplexing them with new doctrines, but inculcating the solid truths of the gospel; and, by his own example, to teach them as much as by his doctrine. To be careful to instruct the youth; to visit the aged and infirm; to be careful of what company he keeps lest he should bring a blemish upon his character.— He is to consider himself as if he was married to his people, that like an affectionate father, a tender husband, or a faithful shepherd, to behave in all lawful things, to every one, that he may bring up his people in the fear and worship of God, so as to prepare them for everlasting happiness. He is to teach him further, that he is to live in peace and harmony with his brethren the clergy, and pay a proper obedience to all the ordinances of the church.

On the other hand, he is to exhort the people to consider their pastor as one placed over them by divine Providence, according to the plan of the gospel, and that they are to attend to his ministry as if he had been one sent from God. And this is not a presumptuous expression; for whatever is done according to what is enjoined in the word of God, may justly be said to come from God.

Thus every minister under the New Testament, if regularly ordained, though perhaps in various forms, comes from God; and let his conduct afterwards be ever so bad, yet this does not affect the graces, that God will bestow in consequence of his ministry, to those persons who never imagined him to be an hypocrite. The people are to be told, that it is their duty to receive his instructions with cordiality, to be meek and humble, not to enter into any disputes with him; but to consider him not only as a man of the same passions with themselves, but likewise as one who is to give an account of his conduct at the judgment-seat of Christ.

The next thing to be considered in the church of Scotland is her worship; and we have already taken notice that it has varied little since the Reformation till the revolution. Although there were many changes in the government of the church of Scotland from the Reformation till the Westminster assembly 1645, yet there were no changes in the worship till that time; for the mad attempt to establish the liturgy, was momentary in its own nature, but dreadful in its consequences. We have already treated of the manner in which the people of Scotland worshipped God in public till the revolution, and since that time no changes of a material nature have taken place; for although they have not a liturgy, yet it may justly be said of them, that things are done decently and in order.

The service always begins with singing, and sometimes the minister reads the psalm before it is sang; but in some congregations it is read by the clerk, whom, according to the ancient form, they call the precentor.

The psalm being over, the minister desires the people to join with him in prayer and supplication. This prayer seldom exceeds ten minutes, which perhaps is as long as any prayer should be, unless people would tell God idle tales.

The prayer being over, the minister reads part of a chapter, and then makes several reflections on every verse. This they call the lecture, and it generally takes up half an hour. This is perhaps the best method that could have been contrived to instruct people in the Christian religion, and it is owing to this that the people of Scotland know more of religion than any others in the world. In Scotland, it is common for a young minister to begin either with a particular book in the sacred scriptures, and sometimes with the whole New Testament, which he goes over regularly. In general, he meddles no farther with criticism than is necessary to illustrate such passages, and explain such things as the people may be unacquainted with. But the practical reflections exceed every thing that can be imagined in the whole system of the civil establishments of religion; for by these, men are taught to know what use they should make of the scriptures, and by carrying home and repeating them to their children, they train them up as it were in the nursery of grace.

The lecture being over, two or three verses of a psalm are sung, after which the minister prays a few minutes, and then he begins the sermon, which seldom takes up more than half an hour. Their sermons consist of, first, an explication of the context, with the sense of the text itself; secondly, a doctrinal proposition, as drawn from the words themselves; thirdly, an illustration of the doctrine, in a few leading general heads, and then he concludes with a few practical inferences. The sermon being over, the minister prays for the whole state of the world, and then a few verses of a psalm are sung, after which he dismisses the people with the common blessing. This is the service during the forenoon, but in the afternoon it is only one half as long, because there is then no lecture.

In some of the remote parts of the country, where the ministers are more zealous in the discharge of their duty than in great towns, they assemble the people a third time together, during the summer season, and recapitulate to them the heads of all that has been declared to them before, in the preceding part of the day. Then the people are enabled to remember almost every thing they have heard.

We come next to the administration of the sacrament of baptism, which is carried on in the same manner as mentioned in the directory. They have, however, varied a little from the rules of the compendium, in the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. We have already seen how it was to be in the directory, but the frequency of its administration, which, by the constitution of the church of Scotland, was to be only four times in the year, was considered by many of the more zealous of the clergy, after the revolution, as injurious to their order, by taking away some of the solemnity, which they looked upon as inseparably connected with the church order.

During the violent persecution that took place in Scotland, in the reign of Charles II. the Presbyterian ministers were mostly proscribed, and therefore met in mountains, or in woods, and their sermons consisted of violent invectives against the civil government and the bishops. They found that the best way to inflame the passions of the people, was to celebrate the communion as seldom as possible, and somewhat like the Romish processions, to keep the people, as far as related to their consciences, in a state of slavery.

That ancient leaven of superstition was retained by those ministers who composed the first general assembly of the church of Scotland after the revolution. They were men of little knowledge, sour tempers, and a sort of unfeeling apathy distinguished every part of their conduct. They therefore proposed, that the best means to keep the people in subjection, was to make their solemn occasions, as they call them, as frequent as possible. Accordingly, they laid down a new plan for the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which, although never reduced to a law by any of the acts of their assemblies, yet grew into practice, and has been, with very little variations, adhered to ever since in Scotland. The method is this:—

Two Sundays before the sacrament is to be administered, the minister gives notice to the people, and the elders of the congregation are to make a report to them concerning the morality of their conduct, that the sacred ordinances may not be profaned. On the Thursday before the celebration, five or six ministers assemble at the church, and the day is kept as a fast. The inhabitants of many of the neighbouring parishes assemble, and there are sermons preached, not only in the church, but also in a tent in the church-yard, or perhaps in a neighbouring field. It is amazing to think what numbers of people assemble on those occasions, and sometimes, like the procession to Loretto in Italy, they make parties of pleasure.

Friday being a sort of interval, those who live in the parish, and near to it, return home to their own houses, but those who perhaps have come sixteen, or twenty, or thirty miles, procure lodgings either in farm-houses or barns; and here, to use the words of Mr. Sandiman, they sometimes on these occasions increase the number of the human species, for religion will not make people idle.

On Saturday several sermons are preached, both in the church and in the church-yard, where the tent is erected, and then they retire till Sunday morning. It is then that the great day begins. The minister of the parish goes to the church, and preaches what he calls the action sermon, after which he prepares the people for the communion, by debarring all those from partaking of it, who know of any immorality in their conduct, that they have not made satisfaction for to the church.

A table is covered in the middle isle of the church, and the minister having consecrated the elements, the elders carry them round to the people. Previous to the distribution of the elements, every person who is to communicate, delivers to one of the elders a leaden ticket, which is a token from the minister that he has been examined, and is properly prepared for that holy ordinance. The person who has not got this ticket is rejected, and must immediately depart. As soon as those who have filled the first table, have partaken of the elements, a psalm is sung, and they retire to make room for others.— And thus it frequently happens that there may be ten or more, of these tables served at once. The communicants being all served, there is a sermon preached by the minister of the parish, and the congregation are dismissed from the church.

But this is not all: during the whole time this ceremony is carrying on in the church, sermons are preaching in the tent, in the church-yard, or perhaps in an adjacent field. These sermons sometimes used to continue till midnight, but at present they are much more regular. Monday concludes the ceremony, for on that day two sermons are preached in the church, and as many in the church yard, after which the people retire to their own habitations. It is certain, that this looks more like the popish processions than any thing that bears the name of Christianity, and an attempt was made some years ago to set the practice aside; but it was all in vain, for popular prejudices ran so high in favour of it, that such of the clergy as countenanced the motion, were looked upon as lukewarm, time-serving wretches, who had no regard for the interests of religion, and who, in short, were destitute of real piety.

Education makes a part of religion in Scotland, for both in public and private, means are used to promote it. Thus, the first thing they learn is the shorter catechism, and this they repeat not only at home to their parents, but also at school, where the master prays with them mornings and evenings.— On every Sunday morning before the service begins two boys stand up in the gallery, and a third in the clerk's desk. Him in the desk asks the boy on the left hand, the first question in the catechism, who having answered it, he turns to the other on the right, and desires him to prove the answer from scripture, who does it. They have printed catechisms with these proofs, and they are obliged to get them carefully by heart. In three Sundays they go over the catechism in this manner, and then three other boys take their places.

There is another part of their education that ought to be attended to by every one who would form a just notion of the church of Scotland. And that is, that every man and woman servant, as well as the boys and girls, are obliged to repeat, when they come home, the text upon which the minister preached, and such as begin to grow up, must, when they come home, repeat the points or heads upon which the minister preached, and as much more as they can remember.

Before the family sit down to supper, the master takes his place, and asks the questions in the catechism of his children and servants. That being over, every one is ordered to bring in his bible, when the master in a few words, prays for a blessing on what they are going about to perform.— After this they sing a psalm, and one of the young persons reads a chapter in the bible; sometimes two or more are read, and the family-worship ends by the master praying with his people, who all kneel down in a decent and reverend manner.

These devotions are performed every evening, but the catechism never is asked on these occasions, except on Sundays. In many parts of the country, family worship is performed in the mornings as well as in the evenings; and here let us calmly consider, whether this does not exceed any thing that we read of in other nations. There is another thing which contribute much towards keeping up the life and power of religion in Scotland, and that is the conduct of the clergy, who being always with their people, they visit them from house to house, pray with them, and exhort them to mind religion, to take care of their families, to be tender to their servants, and to live peaceably with their neighbours. And all this is done in such a particular manner, that they are almost adored. They never interfere with their people's innocent amusement, but they do not join with them in such things, well knowing, as Mr. Peunant says, "The least degree of levity sinks the clerical character into contempt."

In their funerals in Scotland, the people, like those in England, bury their dead either in churches or in church-yards; and it may be proper to observe, that at baptisms and marriages they pay no fees, except a mere trifle to have their names registered in the parish books. This indeed is the practice in all other Protestant churches, except England, where it is often extremely difficult for the couple to get married, or get their children baptized, because of the exorbitant fees. For funerals, the people of Scotland pay no fees, except for registering the name, and a small matter to the grave digger.

In their funerals, the clergy never attend, unless invited, and they neither read prayers, nor do they make a discourse at the grave, as is done among Dissenters in England. The corpse is carried in a plain decent manner to the grave, and interred without any other ceremony besides that of the men just taking off their hats when they body is let down into the grave. In most parts of the country, the mourners return home to the house where their friend died, spend the evening in eating, drinking, and smoking, and this they call the Dergey, which answers to the dirge among the ancient Greeks. At some of these funeral solemnities, the lower order get drunk and quarrel, perhaps about the merits of the deceased, about religious sentiments, or something of politics; but this is no more than is common to human nature.

It has been a custom with them, from the most early ages, to sit up and drink in the room where the deceased lies, from his death to his interment; and although they are not so ridiculous as the Irish in these practices, yet there can be no doubt but both were borrowed from their heathen ancestors. There are but few parts of Scotland where the women are permitted to accompany the corpse to the grave; but if it is in the country parts, they all come to the door when the corpse is carried out, and stand in a mournful condition till the bearers have carried it out of sight. They used formerly to wrap them in clean linen, and they are not now restrained from that practice, but they have got much into the English fashion, and the greatest number of them, particularly the gentry and people of fashion, bury in flannel.

When one of their gentry dies, circular letters, written in the following manner, are sent to the relations of the deceased, desiring their presence at the funeral, which is generally complied with.

“SIR,

Your presence is desired here on Monday next, to accompany the funeral of my late spouse, M. B. from this to the place of her interment in the church-yard of M, and you will oblige

Your friend and servant, C. B.”

Saturday, September 11, 1778.

To Mr. H—y, at L.

All the other letters differ in nothing more than this, except in the qualities of the persons.

In some of the market towns in Scotland, when a person dies, and is to be buried, the sexton of the parish goes round with a hand bell, and repeats the following words:—

“Dear brethren, I let you to wit that our neighbour, X——y lieth dead at his house in B. street, and as he is to be interred to-morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon, your company is desired at the funeral.”

Such are the particulars that relate to the church of Scotland. If there are faults in any part of its establishment, perhaps they are as few as in any other Protestant church in the world; and to look for perfection among men, would be to expect what never happened in the world. It is certain, that errors crept into the Christian church long before the death of the apostles, or why should those holy men have taken notice of them in their writings. There is not one of the epistles but what mentions some of these errors, and when we consider what troubles took place in Scotland at the time of the Reformation, and for many years after, it will appear almost a miracle that their church should at present be so well governed as it is. It has all those means of grace that can be necessary, in order to bring men into a state of salvation; and if it differs from other churches in some points of discipline, it is certain that many of these bear more to the primitive form. Sir Kenelem Digby, who was actually a Roman Catholic, used to tell the Laudian party, in the reign of Charles I. “That if they wanted to form their church on the model of the ages, they must take the example from Scotland.”

Before we dismiss this article relating the church of Scotland, we must take notice of two or three sects of people who have sprung from it, and are at present very numerous in that country.

ACCOUNT OF THE SECEDERS.

WE have already mentioned some of those mischiefs which took place in Scotland concerning the patronage act, but as the people of England are but little acquainted with them, we shall here lay them before the reader. The nobility and gentry, who had the right of presentation, did not avail themselves of those emoluments or privileges arising from the act, till more than twenty years after it passes. The first who set them the example was one from whom it was least expected. This person was the great John, duke of Argyle, a nobleman whose ancestors had been for a long series of years strongly attached to the Presbyterians, and for whose opposition to the measures carried on by Charles II. two of his ancestors were publicly beheaded. That duke was, in 1732, ill enough advised to present one Mr. Rennie to the parish of Mukart, of which he was the patron. The presbytery refused to ordain him, upon which an appeal was brought before the general assembly, and a select body of their own members was sent to perform the ordination. This exasperated the people so much, that not above one family would go to the church.

In the mean time, those members of the presbytery who had refused to ordain him, were called to a severe account. Four of them were summoned before the general assembly, and refusing to acknowledge that they had acted in a disobedient manner, they were deposed, and their churches declared vacant. The year following, four more of them were deposed; and, in general, the country was in a state of discontent. Those people who adhered to their discarded ministers, formed themselves into societies, and, at last it was agreed, that they should set up a separate communion from the established church. As they had no churches, nor meeting, they preached for some time in the fields; and as their characters were popular, they soon procured a vast number of followers, especially among the lower ranks of the people.

It is certain that these men were not destitute of abilities, at least they were useful preachers, according to the Calvinistical system. Some of their printed discourses would do honour to clergymen, who had far greater opportunities of improving themselves than ever they had; but in some things they were weak, and in others they were proud and bigotted. They had assumed a sourness of temper inconsistent with the Christian religion, and something equally unfeeling with that of a stoic. They were either weak or vain enough to believe, that in consequence of that popularity they had acquired among the people, they could bring about a revolution in the church and state, in the same manner as their ancestors of old had done, when they were assisted by the nobility, whom, in their infant years, they had trained up in principles of rebellion. But alas! the nobility had become their enemies, they saw into their duplicity, and therefore they left them to the whole vengeance of the civil power.

Here was an infatuation without a legal remedy, and men who had received the benefit of a liberal education were weak enough to imagine that they could produce effects without being in possession of those causes from which they naturally flow. They had many consultations with their people, and it was some time before they could form a proper plan in order to reduce their machinations to practice. They hated the Episcopalians, who were at that time very numerous in Scotland, and they equally abhorred the civil power, for not doing what was not in its power, without acting contrary to law. It was an easy matter to inflame the passions of the people, but it was not so easy to trample upon a mild benevolent government. Perhaps an evil spirit possessed them; for they went like madmen up and down the country, preaching to their thousands and ten thousands.

It is well known that when the English and Scotch Presbyterians agreed to oppose king Charles I. they professed a great deal of loyalty; but this loyalty was to be in consequence of the king's complying with all their demands, and conferring upon them all those emoluments which formerly belonged to the bishops and other dignified clergy. This induced them to enter into an engagement which they called the solemn league and covenant, but the best title that can be given it is, a bond of rebellion. It was an association to overthrow the established church, and abridge the power of the civil magistrate; and yet it was carried on under such specious pretences of loyalty, that we are apt to imagine that what has been often said is true, that there were some Jesuits among them.

The following is an exact copy of that famous covenant.

We noblemen, barons, knights, citizens, burgeses, ministers of the gospel, and commons of all sorts in the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the providence of God, living under one king, and being of one reformed religion, having before our eyes the glory of God, and the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the honour and happiness of the king's majesty, and his posterity, and the true public liberty, safety and peace of the kingdoms where every one's private condition is included: and calling to mind the treacherous and bloody plots, conspiracies, attempts and practices of the enemies of God, against the true religion and professors thereof in places, especially in these three kingdoms, ever since the reformation of religion, and how much their rage, power and presumption are of late, and at this time, increased and exercised, whereof the deplorable estate of the church and kingdom of Ireland, the distressed estate of the church and kingdom of England, and the dangerous estate of the church and kingdom of Scotland, are present and public testimonies. We have now at last, after other means of supplication, remonstrances, protestations and sufferings, for the preservation of ourselves and our religion, from utter ruin and destruction, according to the commendable practice of these kingdoms in former times, and the example of God's people in other nations, after mature deliberation, resolved and determined to enter into a mutual and solemn league and covenant:—Wherein we all subscribe, and each one of us for himself, with our hands lifted up to the most high God, do swear,

1. That we shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, endeavour in our several places and callings, the preservation of the reformed religion in the church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, against our common enemies. The reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, according to the word of God, and the example of the best reformed churches; and shall endeavour to bring the churches of God in the three kingdoms, to the nearest conjunction and uniformity of religion, confession of faith, form of church government, directory for worship and catechizing, that we, and our posterity after us, may as brethren, live in faith and love, that the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us.

2. That we shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of popery, prelacy (that is, church-government, by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors, and commissaries, deans, and chapters, arch-deacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy) superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found to be contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness, least we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues: And that the Lord may be one and his name one in the three kingdoms.

3. We shall, with the same sincerity, reality and constancy in our several vocations, endeavour with our estates and lives, mutually to preserve the rights and privileges of the parliament, and the liberties of the kingdoms, and to preserve and defend his majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion, and liberties of the kingdoms: That the world may bear witness with our consciences of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his majesty's just power and greatness.

4. We shall also, with a faithfulness, endeavour the discovery of all such as have been or shall be incendiaries, malignants, or evil instruments, by hindering the reformation of religion, dividing the king from the people, or one of the kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties among the people, contrary to this league and covenant, that they may be brought to public trial, and receive condign punishment, as the degree of their offences shall require or deserve, or the supreme judicatories of both kingdoms respectively, or others having power from them for that effect, shall judge convenient.

5. And whereas the happiness of a blessed peace between these kingdoms, denied in former times to our progenitors, is, by the good providence of God, granted unto us, and has been lately concluded, and settled by both parliaments, we shall each one of us, according to our place and interest, endeavour that they may remain conjoined in a firm peace and union to all posterity, and that justice may be done upon the wilful opposers thereof, in manner expressed in the preceding article.

6. We shall also, according to our place and calling in this common cause of religion, liberty, and peace of the kingdoms, assist and defend all those that enter into this league and covenant, in the maintaining and pursuing thereof, and shall not suffer ourselves directly or indirectly, by whatsoever combination, persuasion or terror, to be divided and withdrawn from this blessed union and conjunction, whether to make defection to the contrary part, or to give ourselves up to a detestable indifferency, or neutrality in this cause, which so much concerneth the glory of God, the good of the kingdoms, and honour of the king, but that all the days of our lives zealously and constantly continue therein, against all opposition, and promote the same according to our power against all lets and impediments whatsoever; and that what we are not able ourselves to suppress or overcome, we shall reveal and make known, that it may be timely prevented or removed. All which we shall do as in the sight of God.

And because these kingdoms are guilty of many sins, and provocations against God and his son Jesus Christ, as is too manifest by our present distresses and dangers, the fruits thereof: We profess and declare before God and the world our unfeigned desire to be humbled for our own sins, and for the sins of these kingdoms, especially that we have not, as we ought, valued the inestimable benefit of the gospel, that we have not laboured for the purity and power thereof; and that we have not endeavoured to receive Christ in our hearts, nor to walk worthy of him in our lives, which are the causes of other sins and transgressions so much abounding amongst us, and our true and unfeigned purpose, desire and endeavour for ourselves, and all others under our power and charge, both in public and in private, in all duties we owe to God and man, to amend our lives, and each one to go before another in the example of a real reformation; that the Lord may turn away his wrath and heavy indignation, and establish these churches and kingdoms in truth and peace; and this covenant we make in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as we shall answer at that great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed; most humbly beseeching the Lord to strengthen us by his holy spirit for this end, and to bless our desires and proceedings with such success, as may be deliverance and safety to his people, and encouragement to other Christian churches groaning under or in danger of the yoke of Antichristian tyranny, to join in the same, or like association and covenant, to the glory of God, the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and the peace and tranquillity of Christian kingdoms and common-wealths.

It is well known, that under that mild government which has taken place since the revolution, no body of men whatever could have publicly sworn this bond or covenant, without either subjecting themselves to all the penalties inflicted by the riot act, or even to high treason. Their ministers were popular, but they were, at the same time, crafty. They knew how to accommodate their self-interest to the enthusiastic madness of the people's passions; and, at the same time, they had the art to screen themselves from the sword of the civil magistrate.—Every pretender to high and exalted attainments in religion, is an artful politician; and it frequently happens that very insignificant creatures, who have acquired an ascendancy over the consciences of the people, can plan out schemes that would do honour to the genius of a Machiavel.

Thus we find, that when these discarded ministers could not, without making a solemn procession to the place of execution, swear to observe the solemn league and covenant, they contrived (to use the words of Sandiman) to make an image like it. The same artful writer says, that it is as much like the original, as a child ever was like its father. This new covenant is a sort of bond of union among them, that they will do every thing to support the church of Scotland, and, as far as lies in their power, endeavour to bring about a reformation. It is certain, that had it been drawn up in the most learned school of the Jesuits, it could not have been more ambiguously expressed. Thousands of meanings might be put upon the words, and people of any denomination might swallow it without choking themselves, as they did, when they took the test in that country.

This covenant being thus framed, it was considered as meritorious to subscribe it, as if they had depended for salvation upon it. By this time the weak deluded people had built meetings with thatched roofs, for the artful preachers, who demanded from each of them a small sum of money for the benefit of their ministry.

The next thing to be done was to renew their covenant, as they call it; and for this purpose many thousands of mad brained people assembled at most of their meetings, where there were generally above a dozen of ministers; for by this time, their numbers were increased by some young probationers having joined them, who could not get places in the established church. The popularity of their discourses had a vast effect on vulgar minds, and they reigned triumphant over the consciences of the people.

It is impossible to conceive how these people spread themselves over many parts of Scotland, within a few years. Wherever there was an improper minister among those of the establishment, one of their preachers received an invitation, and a new meeting was built for him. As only a few of the regular probationers chose to join them, so they set up an academy to teach a few of their sons; and it may justly be said, that they knew just as much of learning as to despise it. They were utterly unacquainted with history, or any of that sort of knowledge which enlarges the human mind, and makes man an ornament to society. They were actually taught to despise such learning, and perhaps had one of them been seen reading the best poem in the world, he would either have been excommunicated, or have stood, as Allen Ramsey says,

“With a hot face before the holy band.”

The meaning is, he would have been obliged to mount the black stool of repentance. As for reading of plays or novels, though ever so innocent, it would have been as bad as holding a correspondence with the devil. They were not permitted to read a book written by a church of England divine; and, as for bishops, their names were never mentioned but with contempt, and as men who were at war with Christ Jesus. But if they had not learning, they had zeal, and a large share of assurance. For any of them to smile was reckoned indecent, but to laugh was abominable. The more gloomy countenances they put on, the more they were esteemed, and they sung their sermons in a long drawing strain.

Such were the first preachers whom the Seceders brought up, and we can assure the reader, that the picture here drawn is far from being too highly coloured. They began their ministry by inspiring the people with a violent hatred to the ministers of the established church, so that in many parts, when the ministers went round to visit their parishes, these people, who had joined the new religion, shut their doors upon them. None of them would employ servants who went to the parish church, if they could procure any other; but when they were forced to employ some, they made their lives miserable by disputing concerning religion.

The next thing to be done, was to prepare the people for swearing the covenant, and this was laborious work for the ministers indeed. Their houses could not contain the vast numbers of people that came to them to be examined concerning their knowledge of this son of the solemn league, so that they were obliged to take them into the meetings.— There they explained to them the nature of the oath they were to take, and they pointed out the necessity they had been under to make a new covenant, as it would have been dangerous in them to swear the first till a more favourable opportunity, so that it was only a temporary covenant. The whole of the candidates having been examined, such as the minister and his elders approved of, received tickets, as a certificate of their qualifications, and these they were to give back when they came to swear the covenant.

The day for this ceremony being fixed, ten or a dozen of their ministers repaired to the place, where there were two tents erected in the fields, besides the service in the congregation within the meeting. After sermon was over in the meeting, there was a vast deal of formalities, all those who had not tickets were commanded to separate, and hear sermons at the tents. These sermons consisted of indecent and violent invectives against the established church, and forced allegorical constructions of such passages in the Old Testament as related to the temporal state of the Jews, which had no more to do with their new made covenant, than the Alcoran of the Turks, or the man in the moon.

In the mean time, the names of all the candidates for swearing were called over, and they were commanded to hold up their right hands, which they did after they had delivered their tickets. It happened very unfortunately, for some of those who had been rejected, thrust themselves in among the ticket-men and women, so eager were they to swear to the son of the solemn league. These were thrust out, which frequently created much confusion, and kept the ceremony back a considerable time. However, as there were a couple of sermons going forward in the tents, they had no more to do than to repair thither.

All the malignants, which is a most dreadful word amongst them, being driven out of the meeting, the minister held a scroll in his hand, and read the covenant to them, which being done, he asked the people, who were still holding up their hands, whether they would subscribe it, which they all eagerly did, and afterwards there was a sermon of two or three hours in length, a prayer of about an hour long, and one of the psalms, that contains the word covenant was sung. The subscribed roll was kept in the meeting, and if by any mischievous accident a subscriber went to the parish church, got a girl with child, was found at a dancing bout, or in an ale-house, his name was first erased out, and then he was excommunicated. Those who retained their attachment to the covenant, were perhaps as fully persuaded of their own salvation, as a Romish devotee is when he comes from the confessor's chair.

No person was to have his child baptized, nor be admitted to the communion, till he had first sworn and subscribed the covenant. It was the test of their faith as well as their obedience; and it was the first question asked when these people met together, "Have you taken the covenant?" The rebellion broke out soon after, and it must be acknowledged, that these people gave many striking instances of their loyalty. Whatever might have been their madness in other things, they were no strangers to that sort of conduct which would entitle them to the favour of government. They knew what their ancestors had suffered from the Stuarts, and they had no reason to expect any mercy had a popish prince been placed on the throne of Britain. This made them exert themselves to the utmost, to keep their people in a state of loyalty. Nay, many of them took up arms; and when the city of Glasgow raised a regiment of seven hundred men, one half of these were Seceders, who behaved gallantly at the battle of Falkirk, and would certainly have defeated the rebels, had not the dragons ran away in a cowardly manner.

Such was the condition of these people when the rebellion was suppressed, and then they quarrelled among themselves. The reason was this:

One Campbell a fiery hot-headed man, pretended, that no members who were burgesses, or freemen of corporations, should be admitted to take the covenant; because, when these burgesses take up their freedoms, they swear to maintain the religion as by law established. On the other hand, although their cunning prevented them from swearing to extirpate the established religion, yet they knew it meant so as soon as a favourable opportunity offered. There was certainly some sense and reason too in what this man said, and it appears that he had too much honesty to approve of a mental reservation.

In consequence of this, a division took place among them, and the numbers on each side were nearly equal. Young men who had served their apprenticeships in corporations, were loth to be deprived of their freedoms, nor did they know where to seek for a living. In most of the towns in Scotland, when a young woman marries a non-freeman, she can convey the freedom to her husband, if her father was free. This, to some young women, was as good as a marriage portion; but here was an attempt to set the whole aside. Both parties thought themselves under a necessity of swearing, but they differed about the mode. The tempers of the ministers were too fiery to be reconciled, and an antipathy against each other took place, equal to that between cats and mice. They consequently divided themselves into two parties, the one called Burghers, and the other Anti-burghers; both of which we shall here consider in their proper places.

Of the Burghers.

Those who were called Burghers, were the most moderate, but not the most numerous. They were however, very subtle; and the distinction they made concerning the nature of the two oaths, would have done honour to the school of Loyola.

They asserted, that to swear to support the religion as by law established, was to support the Presbyterian religion as it had been established by the parliament of Scotland in the year 1640, after the famous Glasgow assembly 1638, and to adhere to the solemn league covenant; but as at the revolution the solemn league had not been recognized or acknowledged, and as the patronage act had set aside one of the articles of the union, consequently the then established religion was not according to law; so that when burgesses took their oaths in their corporations to maintain their established church, how could they mean the then church of Scotland, which was not legally established, but only that which was overthrown at the restoration.

The sense was neither more nor less than this; they might swear one thing and mean another. Now it is well known, that all oaths should be expressed in words free from ambiguity, or a double meaning. The oath that the persons took who were made free in corporations, was clear. They were to maintain the religion as by law established. In the same manner that the burgher-ministers taught their people to take this oath, a papist might take it in England. Every Roman Catholic in this country believes, that his religion was established by law, because it was once so; and the papists have here the advantage over the Presbyterians, who are called burghers. For the popish religion was actually established by the consent of parliament, long before the Norman conquest; whereas, if we include the solemn league and covenant, with the abolition of the rights of patrons to present to ecclesiastical benefices we shall find that the Presbyterian religion, in the manner contended for by the Seceders, was not established in Scotland till 1640, when there was no king, but only a junto of both houses of parliament.

However, the burghers continued to admit those to swear the covenant who had taken the corporation oaths, and still put their own jesuitical meaning upon it. They were followed by such of the members of corporations as made choice of them for preachers; and these were followed, or imitated, by many who knew nothing of the nature of an oath. The Burghers were most numerous in the towns, the Anti-burghers in the country. But a vast revolution had taken place in the notions of the Burghers.

As the others carried things into the wildest extremes, so the Burghers inclined towards moderation. They became gradually more and more so, and they receded from the mode of imposing their covenant, except to those who denied to swear it, which is now done in private. They think there is no sin in hearing a minister of the established church of Scotland preach, so as there is no errors in his doctrine; by which is meant, he is a sound Calvinist; nay (and wonderful it is to relate) they will actually go and hear a Methodist preach without being censured.

This will appear the more surprising, when it is considered, that the late Mr. Whitfield wanted to cultivate a friendship with the Seceders before they split in parties, but they would have nothing to do with him, unless he would acknowledge himself to be a guilty sinner, for having been ordained by an anti-christian bishop, namely, Dr. Benson, bishop of Gloucester, and for preaching in the parish churches of Scotland. At present, the numbers of the Burghers are daily dwindling away, and probably they will die with the present generation. Heats in religion are like fevers in the human body, and the patient is soon killed or cured.

Of the Anti-Burghers.

We have already observed, that the Burghers were more moderate than the Anti-Burghers, and we shall now lay before the reader the difference of spirit that took place between them.

The first thing done by the Anti-Burghers was, to excommunicate the Burghers, which they did in as solemn a manner as they had formerly sworn the covenant. One Mr. Ralph Erskine, a very popular preacher, who was one of the second four deposed by the general assembly, took part with the Burghers, and the greatest part of his congregation adhered to him. This man had two sons, both ministers among the Seceders, and they had taken the same side with the Anti-Burghers. Like their father, they were both popular, and probably, notwithstanding their different sentiments, yet they had a paternal regard for him. But be that as it will, their brethren, the Anti-Burgher ministers resolved to make the same trial as the inquisitors do when they send the nearest relations to apprehend the accused person, and tells him that he must conquer nature by grace.

These two young men were pitched upon to excommunicate their own father. If there was a necessity for excommunication taking place, it would have been more decent to have come from the mouth of a stranger than a son; but wherever the externals of religion are contended for without the internals, cruelty takes place in the heart. The young ministers were obliged to comply, and seemed cheerful when they did so. The form of these excommunications is as follows:

A day is appointed for a fast, and a tent erected in the fields, where several inflammatory sermons are preached to crowds of poor working people, who have left their employments to be witness of the solemn scene. The case of these people leaving their lawful employments, and some of them traveling twenty or thirty miles to hear inflammatory discourses, which, so far from being consistent with the gospel, are sufficient to take their minds away from it, leads us to mention the following anecdote by way of digression.

In the memorials of Mr. John Livingston, a famous minister in Scotland, during the last century, there is a singular relation concerning one Euphan M'Cullan in the parish of Kinneucher in Fifeshire. It was thus:

"Euphan M'Cullan in the parish of Kinneucher, a poor woman but rich in faith. I have heard the lady Culross tell the following things of her. That she seldom or ever prayed but what she got a positive answer. That she one time desired her to pray for the temporal state of her family, and when she enquired what answer she got, Euphan said the answer was, "He that provides not for his own house, has denied the faith." Whereat the lady said, "Now you have killed me, for I go to preachings and communions here and there, neglecting the care of my family." Euphan replied, "Madam, if you are guilty in that sort, you have reason to be humbled for it; but it was not said in that sense to me, for the Lord said, "He that provides not for his own, is worse than an infidel. Will not I provide for her and her house, seeing she is mine?"

This passage affords matter of very serious reflection. The irreverent familiarity in the address to the deity—the great God of heaven and earth, is indeed horrible. What is there here but the dregs of popish crudity? How can Protestants object to the visions of St. Clara, St. Bridget, and St. Terressa, and yet justify the visions of Euphan M'Cullan. See lord Hale's Remarks, page 255.

But to return to the subject:

After sermon there is a long prayer, and then the preacher, who is to repeat the excommunication, goes up into the pulpit, and for the most part orders the hundred and ninth psalm to be sung, in which so many dreadful curses are imprecated on the enemies of God. Where they find the enemies of God mentioned, they apply it to the enemies of the church under the gospel; whereas it relates only to those heathen nations who fought against the Jews.

The psalm being ended, the minister prays for a blessing upon the curse he is going to pronounce, and then all the people standing up, he reads the crime the offender is guilty of, and then says, "For these and for all other acts of disobedience to the church, I being a minister of Jesus Christ, and having power and authority from him, do, in his name and by his authority, excommunicate and cast out of the true church of God, A. B. and deliver him up to satan to be tormented in the flesh, that his soul may be saved in the day of the Lord." He concludes, by praying that God would ratify, seal, and confirm the sentence he has pronounced.

These are pretty words, perhaps the reader may say, to be pronounced by a son against his father. But the most remarkable thing in the words is, that satan, the grand adversary of mankind, is here made a minister of the gospel; he has the excommunicated person put under his tuition, and by tormenting his flesh he is to bring him to a sense of the dreadful sin of differing with another in opinion.

It was imagined the Burghers would have returned the compliment and excommunicated in their turn, but they did not, only that on the excommunication days they preached in their own churches against the Anti-burghers. Some may imagine they did this to keep their people together, but whatever might be in that, there was no manner of necessity for it; because at that time they were so exasperated against each other, that they would have continued without sermons a whole year, rather than go into each other's meetings. However, at present, the Burghers are as great Latitudinarians as the Methodists are in England.

On the other hand, the Anti-burghers still continue to take the covenant, and like the Roman Catholics, to hate all those who differ from them in opinion. They are as severe in their discipline as ever, and not long since, a poor taylor, who was clerk to one of their meetings, was silenced from singing a single stave, merely because he went one working day into another meeting.

Sometime ago, a report was made to one of their ministers in Scotland, who is at present the chief leader of the party, that two young men of his congregation had been admitted into the society of free-masons.

The minister, imagining he had now an opportunity of disclosing to the public all the secrets of free-masonry, which frighten so many people, sent for the young men to his own house. When they came, they were threatened, under the penalty of church censures, that they would reveal to him the secrets of free-masonry. Their answer was, they could not do it, but if he pleased they would make him a mason and then he would know all.

Not so enraged were the Scribes and Pharisees, when Jesus made them condemn themselves by their own words, nor so enraged was the consul when Polycarp set all his torments at defiance, as the Anti-burgher minister was when the young men gave him such an answer. He raged like a madman, and told them they should be excommunicated. He was as good as his word; but the young men appealed to their synod, which is the highest court the Seceders have. This made things worse, for it occasioned the excommunication of all the free-masons in Scotland that belonged to them; and all these turning to the Burghers, who readily admitted them, became a valuable acquisition to the latter. Many other instances of their superstition might be mentioned, but we shall only relate the following.

It was the custom formerly in Scotland, and is so still in many parts, for the women to fan the chaff from the corn before it is ground into meal. This was tedious, but it was an ancient custom. An ingenious artist made a machine that stood in the inside of the mill, having flat thin boards to go round by means of a connection with the wheel.

A miller near Edinburgh had one of them made, and this man being a Seceder, the same minister who had the dispute with the free-masons, happening to call at the miller's, he looked at the machine. It displeased him much, and he told him to take it down, for those who were so new fangled as to set up such machines, would in time follow the wolf in sheep's clothing, meaning Mr. Whitfield. The miller stood amazed to think what connection his fanners could have with religion, and refused to pull them down. Upon that he was excommunicated and went to the Burghers. They have but one meeting in London, and so wedded are they to their ancient opinions and practices, that although they have no more occasion for it than a cart has for a third wheel, yet once every year they must have a minister sent up to them from Scotland to assist their own pastor in administering the sacrament. As none of them in Scotland will be married by the established clergy, the ceremony is performed by their own ministers, so it is generally supposed that when the minister comes up from Scotland, he marries such as desire it privately. It would not be prudent in their own minister, because he might bring himself into trouble, but as the other is to set off for Scotland, so he is out of all manner of danger. However, they do not consider that these marriages are illegal, for disputes might arise if a law suit was depending between one of them, concerning a will made in favour of one of their children, and the opposite party, who had been born in legal wedlock.

Supposing the judges should order both parties to produce a certificate of their marriage, where would the Anti-burghers be found. The man would then reflect on the injury he had done to the child, and the child himself would have cause to remember it ever after. Some of them go down to Scotland and get married, but those are few in number; for the greatest number of them are working men, and few of them can bear the expence. On the other hand, the Burghers are so regardless about these things, that they are married in the churches.

No people in the world have a stronger hatred to the Methodists than the Anti-burghers. The minister had a scuffle with the miller, and afterwards wrote a book, wherein he endeavoured to prove, first, that Mr. Whitfield's doctrine was diabolical. Secondly, that it was a horrid sin for any one to hear him preach. Thirdly, that the justice of God would overtake him. In this work is the following remarkable passage:—

“As for the gentleman himself, while he is under a ruinous delusion, and thereby led out into the horrid path we have been describing, which, besides all its other dreadful tendencies, is calculated for gathering upon him his own blood and the blood of multitudes; thus his condition loudly requires the pity of all who know him. And I know no way wherein to shew it, then by avoiding his company, that he may be made ashamed of his conduct. In this manner it is that we are called to the exercise of love to his person, and a desire for his recovery."

An account of the Presbytery of relief.

THE third and last sort of Presbyteries, who arose in Scotland in consequence of the patronage act, have called themselves the Presbytery of relief.

To understand this term rightly, it is necessary to observe, that the people in Scotland have, ever since the Reformation, loved those doctrines which point out salvation as only to be obtained through the imputation of Christ's righteousness. Now it has unfortunately happened, that many of the young preachers presented by the patrons, were of different sentiments; and some of them went so far as to point out to their hearers all those doctrines as true, which commonly go under the name of Arminianism. This was too good a name for them to assume, for Arminianism never denied the imputation of Christ's righteousness, only that it allowed there was a freedom in the human will. Whereas, their young preachers in Scotland, often preached whole sermons without mentioning the name of Christ as a mediator. This was shocking to those people who had been brought up in the principles of their own confession of faith and catechisms; but they did not chuse to join the Seceders.

It was said that a club of young divines met at a house in Edinburgh, to ridicule the doctrines of Calvin; and certain it is, that one of them, who was no more than a probationer, and a schoolmaster, had his licence taken from him, for publishing a pamphlet on that subject. In answer to this pamphlet, one Dr. Weatherspoon, minister at Paisley, about six miles from Glasgow, published an essay, entitled, "The Ecclesiastical Characteristics." In this treatise he endeavoured to prove, that most of the clergy of Scotland taught nothing but downright Heathenism, or, as they call it, morality. For this he was called before the synod of Glasgow; but having no proof of his being the author, the case was dismissed. As Weatherspoon was continually quarrelling with his people, and as they had instituted a law-suit against him for defamation, he went over to America, where he was made president of the college of New Jersey, and is at present one of the members of the congress.

However, he did not leave Scotland till he had laid a plan for a schism in that church. He collected together as many of the popular clergy who had poor livings as he could, and told them, that if they would leave their churches without joining the Seceders, they would find a powerful assistance from many of the people. They would build them meetings and their livings would be doubled.

Accordingly, many left their churches and had some meetings built for them. It was some time before they could fix upon what name they should assume, and therefore, as they were to give relief to those people who were plagued by the moral preachers, they took upon themselves the name of the Presbytery of Relief.

This circumstance did not take place till within these twenty years, but the ministers did not find their account in it. Their moderation was equal to that of the established church and to the Bughers, which did not suit the tempers of the people. There were some other circumstances much against them, one of which was, that most of their meetings were built in populous towns, where none of the moral preachers had been settled. The people found nothing new, and therefore many of them returned home to their own churches. Another circumstance was, that one of them deserted his flock, and settled at the head of a populous congregation in London, because the salary was four times as much as they could allow him.

It is certain, the clergy cannot live without money any more than other men, but they ought to examine from what motives they leave a poor for a rich congregation. It is a maxim among the laity, that a clergyman never leaves a rich benefice to go to a smaller one, and undoubtedly it is in general true, as it is with all other professions, and yet we have known instances to the contrary, both among the clergy and laity. However, when a body of poor people are indulgent to their pastor, he ought not to leave them.

But with respect to these people, or rather to their clergy, they are but few in number, and they hold a synod on every year. Their form of discipline is weak, and they are followed only for their popularity. Like the Seceders, they visited their people from house to house, and do all they can to keep them in their interest. They are industrious in the discharge of their pastoral office, but they now have academies, like the Seceders who are more numerous, for the education of young men for the ministry. As their reasons for separating from the church of Scotland were the most trifling that could be imagined, so they have not many friends among the better sort of people; and as they do not deal much in invective or abuse, they are considered as lukewarm by the vulgar.

Many of them have left their first principles, and are daily returning back to the established church. Some of their preachers have made attempts to join the established church again, and obtain livings, but an everlasting door is shut against them. In a word, they will only exist a few years longer, for few men are sooner bankrupts than those who carry on the wholesale trade in religion. When the motives that at first induced man to change his religion are once found to be insincere, he is despised by all parties, and, in general, converts are but little esteemed. Upon the whole, we shall conclude this article by observing, that all these parties which have sprung from the established church of Scotland, swear the same articles of religion, teach the children the same catechism, and observe the same form of worship, so that there is no difference but in the covenant.

Account of the Cameronians, or Mountaineers.

This sect of religious people did not take their rise from any of the causes already mentioned. They existed long before the revolution. One Mr. Cameron, a Presbyterian minister, having made his escape from the battle of Bothwell-bridge, 1679, fled towards the south, and being followed by about three hundred men of his own sentiments, they once more renewed the covenant, and began their march, having first read a proclamation, setting forth that the king had no right to the throne, because he had taken the covenant, and afterwards ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common executioner; that they were determined to turn out the bishops, and have them punished, as the Amalakites were of old by the divine command; that they were to restore the kingdom of Christ in Scotland, and once more to revive it to its ancient glory. They meant, that they would overthrow the government both in church and state, and put all those to death who differed from them in religious sentiments.

These mad brained people, who had been driven by oppression to desperation, vainly imagined, that they would be joined by the country people as they went eastward; but alas! instead of meeting with new reinforcements, Sir John Graham, afterwards Lord Dundee, came up with them at a place called Aird's Moss, where they were mad enough to attempt opposing the king's forces. They shot two or three of the dragons, who had not so much as fired upon them, and then Sir John ordered his men to attack them. Cameron, their leader, was killed, with about thirty more, and most of the others were taken prisoners, and the ringleaders were executed at Edinburgh in a most barbarous manner, among whom was one Mr. Hackstone, a young gentleman, who assisted in the murder of Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrews. The remainder of the prisoners were sent to the colonies in America.

From this time till the revolution, some of these madmen assembled on the mountains, from which circumstance they were called Mountaineers, and sometimes Cameronians. When king James published the indulgence for liberty of conscience, they would not accept of it, but followed one Mr. James Renwick, a young probationer, who was afterwards hanged at Edinburgh a few months before the revolution.

When the revolution took place, they would not acknowledge it, because the covenant was not restored, and because king William would not abolish episcopacy in England. They continued to preach on the mountains for many years after the revolution, although they were at liberty to build meetings. At the union, they abused government so much, that some of them were imprisoned, and others set in the pillory. One of them being asked in the court of justice by what authority he abused government, pulled out his bible from his pocket, and told the judges that it was by the authority of that book which he believed their lordships had never read. They hated the present family on the throne as much as they did the Stuarts, and being a sort of fifth monarchy men, would acknowledge no king but Jesus. Some of the established clergy, who had little learning and less knowledge, took part with them, and one more impudent than the rest, told his hearers that king George I. had no more right to the crown than a moor-cock.

This man escaped the vengeance of the civil power, but he was despised and excommunicated. He died some years after at Edinburgh, and always was called the moor-cock. In latter times, these people had private meetings in different parts of the south of Scotland, and many scandalous stories were told concerning them, some of which perhaps were not true.

These people are much dwindled away, there being but only a handful of them left, but they still retain their old sentiments. They are Calvinists with respect to the terms of acceptance, but their notions concerning ecclesiastical and civil power are abominable. They marry their own people, and baptize their children. They have still no meetings but in private houses, and they discard, all those who differ from them. They admit of no toleration, and if they had power, probably they would make a very bad use of it.

They are in general treated with much contempt, and sometimes they deserve it. Some of their members joined to the Seceders, and for that were sent to the devil, by a warrant of excommunication. Their meetings are as private in Scotland as those of the Roman Catholics, and they are of such unsocial tempers, that few sober, sensible persons will keep company with them. Their worship is the same as that observed in the church of Scotland, but in their sermons they are continually abusing the clergy and the government. They are, however, too insignificant to be brought to punishment for their insolence.

ACCOUNT OF THE GLASSITES, COMMONLY CALLED THE SANDEMANIANS.

THESE people did not take their rise in Scotland, in consequence of the patronage act, for they disclaim every connection with all the established churches in the world, but of this we shall take notice afterwards, when we come to speak of their principles. In the mean time, having read all the books published by them, and conversed with many of their leaders, we shall lay before the reader a faithful account of them, for although some persons who are but little acquainted with history and less with divinity, may be disposed to laugh at their simplicity of worship and government, yet many good things will be found amongst them.

In the year 1727, Mr. John Glass, minister of a parish church near Dundee in Scotland, published a book entitled, "The testimony of the King of Martyrs." His chief design in that work was to prove, that as Christ's kingdom was not in this world, so it could no where receive a civil establishment. That it might be persecuted or tolerated according to the will of princes, but all those bearing the name of Christian ministers, who accepted of civil emoluments from the state, were unacquainted with the gospel, and enemies to Christ's kingdom.

These notions alarmed the clergy of Scotland, in the same manner as Dr. Hoadly's sermon had alarmed the clergy in England. They did not know what might be the consequence, for had the principle advanced by this man once been established, the crown might have seized on their revenues and left them and their families to starve. It is certain, that statesmen are not always the most pious Christians, and there have been times when such a favourable circumstance would have been made a bad use of. However, this man although an excellent reasoner, was too obscure to create much division or defection among his brethren, had not their public judicators called him forth from his retirement, and made him conspicuous on the theatre of the world.

He was summoned before the presbytery, and made a most able defence, and because they could not answer him, they deposed him. He appealed to the synod, where he defended himself still more ably, but the clergy were his most bitter enemies. He was obliged to appeal to the general assembly, who were very unwilling to lose a man who was esteemed in his parish, and an honour to the church. They reversed the decrees of the presbytery and synod, restored Mr. Glass to his ministry, and ordered the cause to be brought on before themselves in the first instance.

In the mean time, the sober persons who were members of the assembly, were willing to let the affair drop; for as Mr. Glass's ministry was confined to his own parish, and as in his general doctrine he taught nothing inconsistent with the fundamental articles of their own religion, they could not see any danger in it. To this they added the character of the man, which was fair and respectable.

The affair came on again before the general assembly, about two years after, and the arguments took up four days. Some of the members, especially the elders, were men of high rank, and amongst these was the famous Duncan Forbes, lord advocate of Scotland. Besides the lord advocate, there were several other gentlemen and noblemen of high rank, members of the assembly, who pleaded strongly in favour of Mr. Glass. They represented that his opinions were only of a speculative nature, nor had they any immoral or irreligious tendency. They insisted further, that to depose a man of Mr. Glass's knowledge and approved virtue, would be to do an injury to the church of Scotland.

These worthy members were seconded by some of the most respectable of the clergy, and by all the commissioners from the universities. They said that they could not see any hurt in the doctrines taught by Mr. Glass, for, with respect to the grand article, namely, the atonement made by Christ to reconcile us to his father's love, he was of the same sentiments with themselves. They added, that to proceed in such a summary manner against him, would be acting inconsistent with their characters as representatives of the church of Scotland; and therefore they begged, that every sober member of the assembly would drop all thoughts of the prosecution.

However, this moderate party was strongly opposed by those of more violent tempers, particularly because Mr. Glass had made an attempt to rob them of their popularity without seeking any to himself. Here we may learn that both parties were bad politicians, for men may court popularity while they seem to despise it, and they may set up themselves as the idols of the people, while they pretend, or rather affect, to be clothed with humility. There are some secret springs of human actions which the judgment day alone can reveal.

It is certain, that had the majority of the assembly proceeded on principles of moderation, they might have kept a worthy minister in the church, who was beloved by his people, and esteemed by all who knew him; but the intolerant principles of some were such, that when the question was put, it went against him by a great majority. Accordingly he was deposed, and another minister put in his room. This was much complained of by the people of Scotland in general, but there was no appeal from the act of the general assembly.

In the next general assembly a motion was made to reverse this decree, and the former act was rescinded; for it was ordered that Mr. Glass might offer himself a candidate for any church that became vacant. This privilege, however, he did not avail himself of, for he gathered together a few people, and proposed to them a new plan of religion. This plan of religion came, perhaps, as near to the primitive church as any we have mentioned. But this leads us to consider the principles upon which this new, or rather old religion, was conducted. By old religion we mean its affinity with the primitive church, by new religion we consider its revival.

It is certain, that Mr. Glass's notions were not popular, but still he procured some followers.—Good sense pays no regard to popularity, but vanity courts all.

The principal heads of that religion laid down by Mr. Glass were, that,

First, there can be no civil establishments of religion consistent with the plan laid down in the gospel.

Secondly, that human learning is of no manner of service to Christianity, but that every man, let him be ever so ignorant, may take upon him that office.

Thirdly, that no Christian congregation can be properly constituted unless there are a plurality of ministers.

Fourthly, that there is not an instance in the whole of the New Testament, wherein individual ministers administered the sacrament, without some to assist them.

Fifthly, that no person who calls himself a Christian, can eat blood.

Sixthly, that in all accusations against the moral characters of members of the congregation, there was to be no appeal.

Sevently, that when the accused person was excommunicated, he was to be hated by all the people with whom he had formerly any connection.

Eighthly, they were, at the time of their admission into the congregation, to declare, that the religion they formerly embraced, was no less than hypocrisy.

Ninthly, at the time of their admission, they were to kiss all the women and men in the congregation.

Tenthly, they were to be obedient to all the orders of the church, and they were not to be absent without shewing a very reasonable excuse.

Lastly, they were not to take part in any political disputes, but in all things to be obedient to the laws of the country, so as they did not interfere with the dictates of their consciences. They were to attend to the words of Christ, render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.

Let Cæsar's dues be ever paid,

To Cæsar and his throne;

But consciences and souls were made,

To be the Lord's alone.

These are the fundamental principles laid down by Mr. Glass, and like the founder of all new religions, he soon found himself followed by some persons, who, perhaps were instigated thereto by vanity. It is certain, that their religion was not much relished by the people of Scotland, and yet there are times and circumstances which give a sanction to every thing. But we shall now consider them in a more enlarged point of view. We are the more ready to do this, because but few people in England know any thing of these people. We shall therefore go on to give an account of their discipline, doctrine, and worship, and leave the reader to draw from it what conclusions he pleases. In this account it will be found, that nothing has been said to injure them; and while we attend to history, we hope that no man will condemn us as being guilty of partiality.

Before we mention the peculiarities of these people, we shall take notice of that grand distinguishing mark which is little known to the people of our country in general, and exclaimed severely against by those who are the greatest pretenders to religion.

Their faith, or general articles concerning the leading principles of religion, are the same as the most rigid Calvinists, except in one point. They believe in eternal election and reprobation, and carry these notions to a great, and perhaps too great an height. But they deny final perseverance, and assert that no man can tell whether he will be saved or not. They look upon what the Calvinists call the act of approbation to be great presumption arising from spiritual pride, and as for the conversion of the Methodists, they call it blasphemy.

They define faith to be a firm belief of every thing related concerning Christ, and particularly his resurrection; and they believe further, that this faith leads men to all sorts of good works, but they are not to imagine, that they know themselves to be the children of God.

They are to attend to the apostle's words not be high-minded, but fear. To be continually on their guard, lest they should fall into any snare; but they are not to make an ostentatious display of religion, and as for what the Methodists call experience, and which is so called by some other churches, they are to look upon it as a sure mark of a child of the devil.

In every congregation, they have a plurality of ministers, whom they call elders, and indeed they may have as many as they please, because they pay them no money. They are tradesmen of all degrees and ranks, and it is matter of fact, that we have heard a chimney-sweeper preach amongst them.

They have also several deacons, whose business it is to watch over all secular affairs of the church, and visit the members from house to house, to watch as spies upon their conduct, and above all things to take care to observe whether they keep company with any of the Methodists, or with such of the Dissenters as profess to any sort of experience in the things of God.

If the wife of an elder or a deacon should die, he may marry again, but he must no longer be a church officer. This practice they ground upon the words of St. Paul to Timothy, where he says that a bishop should be the husband of one wife, and so of the deacons. Certainly this is one of the most forced constructions that ever was put upon a text since the New Testament was written. For certainly the apostle can never mean any thing more, than that the ministers of the gospel should have but one wife at a time. As for their appealing to the primitive church, where they tell us that no mention is ever made of a bishop or deacon having any more than one wife, it no way applies to their case, for the following reason:

When a single man was ordained a bishop or deacon in the primitive church, he seldom married afterwards, because compassion for the fair sex and children he might probably have had, led him to believe he must soon suffer a violent death which frequently happened. He did not despise marriage, nor did he distrust God, but he adhered to the exhortation of St. Paul; he that married doth well, but he that marryeth not doth better; and this is certainly the sense of the words, which allude to the afflicted state of the church at that time.

Again, when married men were appointed deacons or bishops, and their wives died, for the same reasons they seldom married again, though there was no precept to the contrary. These people we are treating of, have had several learned men among them, but none of them seems to have been much acquainted with church history.

When a person desires to be admitted into their congregation, the deacons and sometimes the other members, go and converse with him not concerning his moral character, but merely his faith, and if he makes use of one unguarded expression, he is cast out, that is, he is left as one who has too much religion to be admitted amongst them. They are amazingly jealous of all the Methodists, and all those who believe in appropriations, and they would rather wish to find the candidate whistling a merry tune, than singing a psalm.

When the candidate is approved of, he comes to the meeting where every member is at liberty to put what question he pleases to him, and then it is put to the vote, whether he shall be admitted or not. This is done by holding up their hands; but if one should be of a different opinion when their names are called over, then that man, who is of a different opinion, is excommunicated; for these people admit of no differences in opinion, saying that this man must be an unbeliever, or otherwise he would not have voted against the church.

In examining these candidates, there are several curious questions put to them. And here it is necessary to observe, that most of those who have been admitted amongst them, were such as believed in the appropriation. It is against this famous article that they level the whole force of their spiritual thunders.

Some of these questions are as follows:

Have you ever been at the tabernacle? And how often? Have you ever been a dabbler in religion? Was you ever converted? These questions are answered in the affirmative; but here the candidate says, I imagined so, though I find all to be delusion. Did not you think yourself in the straight road to heaven, in consequence of your experience work at the tabernacle? I did so. And what do you think of this experience work now? I look upon it as a delusion, and that all those who are believers in it are deceived.

He then proceeds to ask him several other questions, such as whether he approves of eating of blood, and his answer must be in the negatives, or he is rejected. This notion of theirs is founded on the apostolical injunction, in 1 Cor. 15, but the late lord Barrington in his Miscellanea Sacra, has made it appear that this injunction was never intended to reach any further than the apostolic age, being only of a temporary nature, not to offend the Jewish converts. The Sandemianians, however, ask the question; Why then is it joined with fornication? The reason (says lord Barrington) is, that fornication was not reckoned as a sin among the Gentiles, but rather esteemed as a virtue. Nay, to such an extravagant degree was lewdness carried, that it actually became a part of their temple service.

They had places in their temples, where the priests retired in private with their women, and this was reckoned very honourable. It was therefore the more necessary to caution the Christian converts against this, because they had been so long accustomed to such practices. Thus they were to refrain from eating things offered to idols, lest it should offend their Christian brethren; from things strangled, and from blood, lest it should offend the Jews; and from fornication, not only as a crime forbidden in the gospel, but also as contrary to natural religion. See Barrington's Miscellanea Sacra, Vol. II. page 16.

The last of the questions generally proposed to him, is concerning infant baptism; for they have the same enmity to the Anabaptists as to the Methodists. The reason they assign for baptizing infants, is, that all the human race are in a passive state, that they can do nothing for themselves; and therefore to pretend that people could be qualified for baptism was to set up the doctrine of merit. This, however, is a mistake, for the Calvinistical Anabaptists disclaim any such notion; they say, that as there is not an instance in the New Testament of a child being baptized, so it was never commanded in the primitive church, nor were any baptized till they were properly instructed. They mention this only as a speculative opinion, not as a dogmatical assertion.

When the candidate is approved of, the elders kiss him and then the deacons. After that, the names of the people, men and women, are called over, and the new admitted member kisses every one, man or woman, old or young, rich or poor. Perhaps our readers may consider that this must be a very merry ceremony, but we can assure them, that it is conducted with great decorum and decency, being done in the meeting where every person is free to come. The kissing affair being over, he receives an exhortation, and the congregation is dismissed.

We must not leave this part of the subject, without making a few remarks on this ceremony, of which these people are as tenacious as they are of the greatest precepts in the gospel.

Throughout the whole historical part of the Old Testament, we read of the people kissing each other in a way of friendship when they met in the streets, or in the fields; and it is related, that Joab took Abner by the beard and kissed him, while, with his right hand, he plunged a dagger into his heart. There are many parts of Europe where the men kiss each other when they meet, and it has been the practice of the eastern nations from the earliest ages of time. It was the practice in the Anglo-Saxon time, when the Danes invaded this country, and these barbarians used frequently to stab those whom they saluted. From this horrid practice arose the word used in England, when people desiring their neighbours to drink to them, say, "I'll pledge you." That is, you shall give me security, or I will take security of you, that you will not injure me. So far we have considered it in a civil light, let us now consider it in the sense the Sandemanians use it, namely, as a religious duty.

They ground their practise on the words of the apostle to the Romans, "Salute one another with a holy kiss," that is, with a friendly kiss, or a kiss of charity. Now the epistle was writing to people who had been formerly Heathens, but were then converted to the faith in Christ. As the practice of kissing each other continued both among the Jews and Gentiles, so it appears that St. Paul had nothing further in view than to point out to them, that whenever they met and kissed each other, it should be done in a charitable, friendly manner. That the action itself being an indication of love and friendship, so there should be no deceit in the heart.

That this was what he had in view, will appear the more evident, when we consider, that the apostle never says kiss each other in your churches, where indeed no salutations took place; for all was composure and decorum. The most ignorant person knows, that when we meet our friends, we shake hands as it is commonly called, and therefore the precept itself relates to no more than common forms of civility.

The next thing to be considered is, in what manner they excommunicate their people; and we can assure our readers that he must be a very artful man who is able to live as a member of one of their congregations one single year. They profess to have all things in common; and yet when any of their members become rather uncommonly free in his demands, they part with him. From this we may learn, that words or professions in religion are one thing, and reality another.

As their deacons are constantly on the watch, so when they find a brother offending, they go and tell him of it, and if he freely acknowledges his error, and promises amendment, then no person is to take any further notice of it. If he persists in what he is accused of, the deacon takes two or three more, and if they can persuade him, then it goes no further, nor is it made public to any but themselves. But if he still persists in his obstinacy, it is mentioned publicly in the church, and he is sent for, and if he either refuses to come, or when he does come, to satisfy the church that he was not in an error, then the elders put the vote to the people, whether he should not be excommunicated, to which, when they have all given their assent, one of the elders prays that the offender may be delivered over to satan to be tormented in the flesh, until he is brought again into the church. Upon that, all the congregation turn from him with a sort of supercilious contempt or disdain, as if he was unworthy of their company, and they are strictly commanded, that whenever they meet with him, they will not speak to him; they will not wish him any happiness, nor will they do any thing whatever to serve him. They are the most inveterate enemies in the world to those who have been cast out of their congregations; and many of their members openly declare, that those who were cast out of the church, should have no compassion shewn them. This is perhaps what may be called religious barbarity, of which there is a little too much in the world.

It is a maxim with these people, that if a member has been once excommunicated, he may be re-admitted upon condition of his repentance, but he must first undergo a very severe penance. They must come constantly to the meeting, and they must bear all the scoffs and scorns of the members, without seeming to be displeas'd. Like the Inquisitors in Spain, and the Seceders in Scotland, he is to conquer nature by grace. And indeed it requires a good deal of grace to bear all the affronts he receives. When he is re-admitted, he receives a sharp rebuke for his backsliding from the truth, and a caution to be on his guard for the future.

If a member is excommunicated a second time, he can never be admitted again, and then he generally becomes a Deist, if not worse. We knew a rich man, who is still alive, and was excommunicated the first time, because he had dropped some expressions that seem'd to militate against infant baptism. He was re-admitted, but being loth to part with his money when demands were made upon it, under pretence of supplying the wants of the poor, he was again excommunicated, and knowing that no further favours would be shewn him, he took a room in an ale-house, where he preached the Sunday evenings to a rabble, who only laugh'd at him, and then gave himself up to all manner of debauchery. Nothing was more common than to hear him over his cups, singing the words of the poet:—

I was a fanatical preacher,
And turn'd up my eyes when I pray'd;
But my hearers half starv'd their teacher;
For they believ'd not a word that I said.

Another was excommunicated a second time, for refusing to play at blindman's-buff on Sunday after service was over, in the meeting, and that man turn'd first Antinomian, then Deist, and at last died, perhaps, (if it be possible) an Atheist. Such are the effects of people's dabbling in religion.

That our readers may understand what is meant by playing at blindman's-buff, we must explain it to him historically.

Mr. James Hervey, in 1755, published his Theron and Aspasio, one of the most agreeable systems in Calvinism that ever was written. And it may be said of this author, that his works have been read and esteem'd by Protestants of all denominations; for whatever might be his particular sentiments concerning disputed points, yet the beautiful manner of writing, his fine descriptions of nature, and above all the fervent piety to be found in every line, made his works esteem'd by all lovers of true religion.

However, one Mr. Robert Sandiman, a merchant at Perth, and one of the people call'd Glassites, in Scotland, wrote a book entitl'd Letters on Theron and Aspasio, which offend'd the Calvinistical Dissenters in London. A correspondence was enter'd into between Sandiman and some of the Dissenting ministers, and the consequence was, that Sandiman himself went up there and establish'd a meeting. As the Dissenters generally put on an austere countenance when they come out of their meetings; and as the Methodists are fond of talking concerning religion, Mr. Sandiman went to the opposite extreme, and order'd, that his followers, on every Sunday after service, should light the candles, and play at blindman's-buff. The meeting house where this was perform'd was in Beech-lane, and multitudes of people, from idle curiosity, went to see it. It became an object of ridicule, and they found themselves under the necessity of dropping it. It seems to have been done from political motives, to ridicule the sour austerity of the Independents, but it did not answer the end, for these people are the same as ever.

That men should set up such diversions in places set apart for public worship, is really amazing, and we firmly believe, that had it not been for their metaphysical notions, all the rakes in London would have join'd them, in order to have an opportunity of playing with the women. There was something in the practice like that of the Adamites of old, but for the honour of the Sandemanians this practice is now set aside.

We now come to their form of worship, which is plain and simple, though not without some austerities, and other formalities, that have but little connection with Christianity.

On Sunday morning, they meet so early as nine o'clock, and the elders being seated in a place much resembling a manger, one of them calls upon a particular person in the congregation to pray. This person is followed by two or three more, who all pray in the same manner. Then they sing a psalm, or, as they call it, a religious song, and one of the deacons prays. After this, a person appointed for that purpose, reads three or four chapters out of both Testaments; and such is the superstition of these people, that in their ordinary course of reading, they read with the same pleasure the chapters that contain nothing but names, as they would any chapter in the New Testament.

The reading being over, another song is sung, and then one of the elders delivers a discourse to the people. As these elders are in general men of no learning, and as all sorts of reading are prohibited among these people, except the bible, we need not be at a loss to consider the complexion of their sermons. They use no method, but deliver a discourse, which might do as well without a text as with one. It is certain, that as their discourses are the effusions of ignorance and pride, so they are calculated to keep the people in the same unhappy state. They must not exhort the people to any duty, for were they to do so they would be excommunicated. The whole consists of a dissertation on what they call the truth, and it is delivered in such a manner that the most profound metaphysician cannot understand it. Their discourses are certainly the least calculated to promote piety of any in the world, except those of another sect, whom we shall have occasion to mention afterwards.

The afternoon service is the same as that of the forenoon, but in the interval of worship another ceremony takes place. For this practice the Sandemanians have been much ridiculed, though from the following investigation, it will appear, that there may be weakness in it without wickedness. It has, indeed, no concern with the essentials of religion, but then it must, or at least should be, observed, that all of them who set up new systems of divinity, pay more regard to the externals than the internals.

We read much in church history concerning the love feasts, or feasts of charity of the ancient Christians. That they took some victuals to their churches is certain, and the poor fed at the expense of the rich. There was a temporary necessity for this, because many of the Christian converts were slaves, consequently they could not go to the place of meeting without leave of their cruel masters.—Those who are acquainted with the Roman history, know well that slaves under the Roman government were slaves indeed. It was a great favour, and but seldom granted to these poor creatures, to attend the Christian assembly, and when they did so, there is reason to believe, that when they returned home, no food was allowed them. It was therefore necessary, that those who were in affluent circumstances should have compassion on them, and supply them with those necessaries which their cruel masters denied them.

The practice, therefore, was, for the primitive Christians to carry food along with them to the church, part of which they eat, and gave the rest to the poor. This seems to have continued till the reign of the emperor Constantine the Great, after which, according to the rules of common sense, it ceased to be in use.

This short sketch we have given of these things, is, in all probability, consistent with the truth; and we can appeal to the greatest historian in the world, whether one assertion has been made of, that is not, in one sense or other, confirmed by the first fathers of the Christian church. It was considered in this light through the middle ages of Christianity, and in that sense it was considered at the Reformation. And this leads us to consider the practice of the Sandemanians.

At noon, when divine service is over with those people, they have a feast in their meeting. On the Saturday before, the deacons go to a butcher's, and buy as much meat as they think will be necessary, and this is dressed in a kitchen adjoining to the meeting. In that kitchen they feast, or in other words, have a plain dinner with small beer. The meat is purchased at the expense of the rich, and the poor dine gratis. As soon as dinner is over, the different members adjoin to public houses, where they call for what they please, and then return to the meeting. We shall make no further animadversions on this subject, than to declare that it is an idle unnecessary ceremony. Those ancient Christians were in a continual state of persecution, their love for the brethren was strong, and they did every thing they could to supply their wants.

On the other hand, the Sandemanians are not in such circumstances; they enjoy the blessings of a free government; and they are at liberty to go home to their own houses without molestations. And yet, notwithstanding their slavish attachments to a ridiculous, though temporary institution, has induced them in this, as in most other things, to make it as singular, by embracing the shadow, like the dog in the fable, when perhaps they lost the substance.—Those who are fond of trifles in religion, seldom or ever know any thing of the vital parts. The man who loves religion, pays little regard to the exteriors, while he finds that the heart is renewed, and the conduct changed.

The Sandemanians are not numerous, either in England or Scotland, for they have so many ceremonies, that people are afraid to have any thing to do with them. To this may be added, that they fleece every rich member, in order to support the poor. The young man in the gospel, did not like to sell his possessions, and people, who are dealers in religion, are not willing to part with their money. When salvation can be obtained without money, there are generally a great number of religious people; but when money is required, they generally drop off. Strange that such circumstances should take place, but what can be strange in human nature? Nothing, indeed, to those who are acquainted with it.

These people, according to the primitive practice, celebrate the communion every Sunday, and it is done in a plain decent manner. We shall conclude our account of them, which has been delivered in a candid manner, by inserting the following hymn, drawn up in a few verses, written by one of their preachers on his death-bed.

When to my sight thou God appears,
I'm filled with sudden fear,
Thy justice with uplifted arms,
O'erwhelms me with despair.
The formal signs of grace no more,
Relieve my troubled heart,
And past experiences of love,
Add torture to my smart.
What shall I say? My prayers and tears
Are impious in thy sight!
I am remov'd as far from thee

As darkness from the light.
Is there no room for mercy left?
Is grace for ever gone?
I'll mind the years of thy right-hand,
And wonders thou hast done.
How to be one with sons of men,
Immanuel did not scorn;
And how from Mary's virgin womb,
The holy child was born.
I'll mind the greatness of that love,
Which in his breast did burn,
When all the wrath of God for sin,
Upon his soul did turn.
And did the father's dearest son,
Go mourning to the grave?
And did he die for sin, that grace
Might dying sinners save.
See from the grave the prince of peace,
In glory bright appears,
No further proof of hope I'll seek,
This quiets all my fears;
This beam of hope within the cloud,
Sure token is of grace;
Where wrath did frown, now mercy smiles—
In lovely Jesu's face:
This sign of grace relieves my heart,
'Tis ease for all my pain,
I will not blush to see my God,
Because the lamb was slain.

ACCOUNT OF THE DISSENTERS.

IN treating of the people called Dissenters in England, we are brought into a large wide extended field. We have prejudices to combat with, we have to do with men of opposite sentiments, and yet we think it is in our power to conduct the whole upon the principles of reason and religion. There are three objects which are to be in view:

First, the reasons why the Dissenters left the established church.

Secondly, how far the Dissenters continued in one body.

Lastly, what is the condition of the Dissenters at present.

These must be brought into one point of view, and they must be treated historically. For this purpose we shall begin with the history of these people; and the reader may be assured, that truth shall dictate what we say, and candour shall direct our pen.

When the Reformation took place in England, most of the Protestant divines were enemies to the ceremonies, and it was the wish of all sober-serious persons that they should be abolished. However, the disposition of queen Elizabeth, was quite to the contrary. This created a great deal of disturbance: for those who did not approve of the established religion, became obnoxious to government. Those people, who opposed government, entered into cabals, they had private meetings together, and there were severe prohibitions issued out against them. Still, however, the contagion took deep root, and the more these people were oppressed, the more they increased. They were called Puritans because they aimed at a purer reformation; but the worst of all was, they wanted to reform the church without reforming themselves.

They were great enemies to all public vices, but at the same time they sought to aggrandize their own power. They had little ceremony, but much cunning. They ingratiated themselves with the ladies, whose passions are easily played upon, and by a conduct of that nature they procured a sort of temporary subsistence. This was the time when lectureships were first established, and thus a set of men were allowed to preach in the churches, without being obliged to comply with the ceremonies. Shocking that the church of England could not procure afternoon preachers, but the queen would never allow it.

It is in a manner impossible to describe what these people, who were in derision called Puritans, suffered. They were fined and imprisoned, and such as denied the queen's supremacy were executed as traitors. Grindal archbishop of Canterbury, was a man of great moderation, and did all he could to moderate the rigour of the act of uniformity, but she was inexorable. The queen inherited the obstinate spirit of her father, and therefore, when she once fixed her mind upon a thing, it was impossible to turn it.

Saunders, archbishop of York, and Horne, bishop of Winchester, were of the same moderate sentiments, and superior in moderation to all these was Jewel, bishop of Salisbury. These were men whose names will ever be revered, for their moderation. They had been sufferers during the reign of queen Mary, and for their own safety had fled to Switzerland. There they and many of their brethren were kindly entertained by the famous Bullinger, and they kept up a correspondence with him as long as they lived. In many of the letters that passed, they professed a dislike to the ceremonies and habits, and wished that they could be removed.

From these letters, of which Dr. Burnet has given us some extracts, we learn, that many of the greatest men at the Reformation were Puritans. That is, they did not think the church properly reformed, and as the queen had it in her power to call a new parliament to settle these disputes, no nothing was more reasonable than that she should have done it; but the queen dictated to all her parliaments.

About the year 1568, a society of people met together at Rygate in Surry, and having a minister along with them, they formed themselves into a congregation, after the model of that at Geneva. They met privately, but Parker, who was archbishop of Canterbury before Grindal, and who had received many favours from the Protestants abroad, became a most violent persecutor. Strange, that a man who had been obliged to leave his native country on the score of religion should become a cruel persecutor of Protestants, who only differed from him in a few trifling matters.

The truth is, to use the words of good Dr. Secker, our reformers, when they left popery, brought persecution along with them. They formed all their notions of church government on the theocracy of the Jews, and they vainly and ignorantly imagined, that all people should be of the same mind. Strange infatuation! but not more so than true.

Whitgift, who succeeded Grindal, was as violent a persecutor as Parker, and therefore there is no wonder that the Puritans increased in number almost every day. By a prescriptive right, the university of Cambridge has authority to send out four preachers to any part of England, who may be chosen lecturers, and serve the duties of their office without a licence from the bishop. These men made many converts among the clergy, and before Whitgift died, two-thirds of the people were Puritans. A severe act was made, enforcing the act of uniformity; prisons were filled with delinquents, and many families were ruined.

Aylmer, bishop of London, who had suffered under queen Mary, became a most violent persecutor of the Puritans, and it is amazing to think what numbers of pamphlets were written in ridicule of this persecuting bishop. There is at present a large collection of them in the British Museum, and some of them have very laughable titles. We have really perused several of them, and one of the titles is, "Have you any more Work for the Cooper."—Aylmer was the son of a cooper in Essex.

Another is entitled, "Foxes and Firebrands," in allusion to Sampson and the Foxes. In this pamphlet there is, as in most of the others, something inflammatory indeed. It was written by one Bell, or Beale, (for he is called by both names) and the poignancy of the satire strikes to the heart. It was levelled against the bishops, particularly Whitgift and Aylmer; and Ward, the papist, having laid hold of a copy of it, played away in his usual manner upon the Protestants.

How Whitgift's hamper'd by a fell,
Hot-headed Puritan, call'd Bell;
How he and bishops, nine or ten,
Their grievances tell to the queen;
She kindly promises redress,

But first comes death to summons Bess.
In the other world she meets with dad,
Eager to know what news she had;
After some thund'ring discourses,
Both vanish in a cloud of curses.

Thus, from these lines we may find what pleasure it gives to the Roman Catholics to see Protestants destroy each other; what Protestants can condemn the Roman Inquisition, while he sets up one himself. It is certainly true, that a little before the queen died, she had formed a scheme to put every Puritan in the nation to death. She was then in her dotage, and the state of her mind on her death-bed was such as the most miserable creature in the world would not wish for.

In the year 1608, James VI. king of Scotland, ascended the throne of England by succession, being the great grandson of Henry VII. by his eldest daughter the princess Margaret, married in 1503, to James IV. of Scotland.

In our account of the church of Scotland, we have already taken notice of the numerous provocations which James VI. received from the Presbyterians, and he left his native country with a fixed hatred against them. With this circumstance, however, the English Puritans seem to have been unacquainted, for they had great hopes of James, and the king willing to shew his moderation, as well as to display his parts in theology, having ordered a conference to be held at Hampton Court, 1604, Reynolds, a man of sense, with four other divines, attended for the Puritans; but these were to be opposed by all the bishops. It must be acknowledged, that it was indecent in the king's being present, because it took away the freedom of debate, and his majesty himself browbeated the Puritans.

Indeed this was only a mock assembly, for what could the poor Puritans do when they were browbeaten by their sovereign, who ought to have been absent. The Puritans had no more notion of a toleration than the churchmen, but they wanted a dispensation from the use of the habits and ceremonies. This, however, the king would not comply with; for so grossly had he been insulted by the Scottish Presbyterian ministers, that he thought there could be no loyalty where there was no bishops. "No bishop, no king," was a common expression with James.

The Puritans having lost all hopes of success, had recourse to methods so artful, that we may conclude, that there are not a more dangerous set of men in the world than clerical combinations, who are longing for those emoluments which their factious dispositions deprive them of, and to which they have no title by merit.

Their first scheme was to ingratiate themselves with the ladies, and it is well known what powerful influence a popular preacher can, at any time, have upon female minds. They were readily admitted into the houses of the nobility and gentry, and however strange it may appear, yet nothing is more true than that poor obscure preachers actually influenced the elections for members of parliament. To use the old saying, "They moved heaven and earth to get Puritans returned to serve in parliament," and as they were employed to instruct the young noblemen and gentlemen, so they brought them up in principles of rebellion, which at last overturned the constitution both in church and state.

From the Hampton-court Conference, till the year 1640, there was not a single election for a member of parliament, but what was influenced by the Puritan ministers. They took a severe revenge on James, for not complying with their request; for they got their pupils to oppose all his measures in parliament, to distract his councils, and render him odious to his subjects.

They had studied that sort of eloquence which is calculated to rouse and inflame the passions; but when we peruse one of their sermons, we find them to be very poor compositions. There is a critical review of some of their works written by the late Dr. Doddridge, in manuscript, which the author of this work has perused, but where it is now he cannot say, though perhaps it may be in the Dissenters' library.

At last, the long wished-for period arrived, when those Puritans were to come out of their places of concealment, to strip off the borrowed mask, and appear in their real colours. Their brethren in Scotland had set them the example, and they joined cordially together, till they overturned episcopacy in Scotland as well as in England, and on the ruins of the former established the Presbyterian religion, on the ruins of the latter nothing at all; so from the year 1640 till 1660, it may be justly said, that England contained almost all the religions in the world.

Having thus brought the history of the Puritans down to their splitting into parties, and sharing the church livings among them, we shall now treat of every denomination separately, that the reader may be able to form a proper notion of them. And we shall begin with that sect which is not the most numerous, yet looks upon itself as the most respectable.

ACCOUNT OF THE PRESBYTERIANS,

THE Presbyterians may be divided into the four following classes: first, Calvinists;—secondly, Arminians;—thirdly, Arians;—and, lastly, Socinians.

Calvinistical Presbyterians.

We have already taken notice of all those who are Calvinists in other parts of the world, and also in Scotland, we must now consider such as come under that name among the English Presbyterians. They are, indeed, but few in number, but what remains of them are very respectable. Till the latter end of the reign of king William, all the Dissenters were Calvinists, but now they are divided, as we shall have occasion to take notice of afterwards.

The Calvinists among the English Presbyterians, have, properly speaking, no discipline at all. They have no Presbyteries, no synods, but only meetings of their ministers, when and where they please.—When a minister dies, they send an invitation either to a young student, or to one who is settled in a smaller charge, and if they approve of him, they elect him as their pastor. Every member of the congregation has a vote, but still there is as little freedom in these elections, as there is for members of parliament; for the rich order the poor to vote in whatever manner they please.

When the day is fixed for the ordination, a great number of people assemble, and the ceremony is begun with prayer. After that some suitable chapters of scripture are read. This is followed by a general prayer for the state of the world, and the nations. A psalm is then sung, and the sermon follows. The sermon is always on the nature of the clerical office, its origin, necessity and utility. The presiding minister after another psalm has been sung, mounts the pulpit and delivers a discourse, which generally turns upon the nature of the pastoral office, but more particularly on the then state of the church, the time when it was first established, its succession of ministers, the character of the last, and the success that attended him in the discharge of his duty. All this is done in order to stimulate the other, to abide in the practice of his duty, and the people to revere their pastor.

The candidate then delivers his confession of faith, but he is not obliged to subscribe to any articles whatever. This is exactly the primitive custom, and that is the reason why we have so many creeds, their being at least four hundred extant in the writings of the fathers.

As these young men, who are to be ordained, are in sentiment Calvinists, so their confessions are consistent therewith.

After his confession is read and approved of by the ministers and people, he kneels down and is ordained by imposition of hands. A psalm is then sung, and then all the ministers present give him the right hand of fellowship. One of the ministers then goes up into the pulpit, and delivers a charge both to the newly ordained minister and the people; and this much in the same manner as in the church of Scotland, only that the English charges are seldom so much to the purpose.

When they admit a member, they are very different from the Sandemanians, and much more so from Christ and his apostles. Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; and the Sandemanians do not chuse, if they can avoid it, to admit any into their communions, but such as are of the most abandoned characters. Christ came with offers of salvation to a sinful world; but it is probable, that the Sandemanians look out for immoral people, that they may have an opportunity of shewing their power in excommunicating them as soon as possible.

The Calvinist Presbyterians, however, admit none but righteous people among them. Sinners may come and hear, but none but saints can go to the communion. The candidate is examined privately by the minister and elders, of whom they have generally two or three, and next Sunday after sermon, the minister tells the congregation, that such a person has been examined as to his knowledge in the sacred scriptures, and the Christian religion; that they have enquired into his moral character, and that they now propose to the church, whether he should not be admitted a member. This is put to the vote and generally carried.

These people must have a high notion of church fellowship, to put themselves to all this trouble for almost nothing. There is no new privilege they can obtain, but that of going to the communion.— They are not like the primitive Christians, who considered each other as brethren; and they are not like the Friends, vulgarly called Quakers, who never suffer their poor to want. But the Calvinistical Presbyterians act with their poor as the university did with Dean Swift, that is, Spiralia Gratia, or special grace. It is true, money is collected for the poor, or at least under that pretence; but the sole distribution of it is left to the discretion of the minister, and he gives to whom he pleases. This is not church fellowship; for in all congregations, there should not be one person in want, while the rest of the members are enjoying affluence.

This is one of the greatest dishonours to religion that ever yet took place in the world. It makes the poor really to doubt the truth of the sacred scriptures, and it brings the rich under the denomination of those against whom Christ promised a woe, because of their manifold offences. This is a melancholy consideration, but we may see instances of it every day; and we know that human bodies, endowed with rational souls, are such compositions, that no advices, no instructions, no exhortations, will have any force, if charity and compassion to the poor are neglected.

They seldom or ever proceed against delinquents, unless their crimes are of a glaring nature, and then they excommunicate them; but not as the Seceders or the Sandemanians do, for they send them a summons to attend on some weekly meeting, where they tell them the nature of their guilt, and if they promise repentance, or profess it, they are forgiven. But if they remain obstinate, they give them a written paper, signed by the minister and elders, intimating, that they are no longer members. If the offending brothers refuse to come to the meeting, they send them notice by a post letter.

In their worship they are not much unlike the primitive Christians. They begin with a short prayer, after which, one or more chapters are read, but they make no remarks on them, as they do in Scotland, so that their people are but very little acquainted with religion. The reading being over, they sing a psalm, which is followed by the general prayer, and that by another psalm.

Then follows the sermon, which is read out of a manuscript, which they put within the leaves of their bible. The sermon is seldom much less than an hour in length, and generally tedious. When they administer the communion, the minister stands in a square pew before the pulpit, and the people come as near to him as possible. The elders carry the bread and wine to them, after which, an hymn is sung, and the ceremony concludes with prayer. The communion is, for the most part, administered in the afternoon, after sermon is over; but for this practice there is no other rule but custom.

In baptizing their children, they are much the same as in the church of Scotland, for the minister performs the ceremony either in their meetings or at the parents' houses. There are no other particulars relating to them worth mentioning, only that they have several academies for the education of their young men for the ministry. Their preachers are more popular than some of the other Dissenters, but their numbers are now very small.

Account of the Arminian Presbyterians.

The Arminian Presbyterians are very numerous, which leads us to give an account of the people who come under that denomination.

We have already had occasion, and that frequently, to mention, that with respect to the terms of acceptance with God, all the reformers were of the same opinion as St. Austin. This will appear evident to every one who peruses Luther on the Galatians, Calvin's institution, the thirty-nine articles of religion in the church of England, and the old Scottish confession of faith. It is inconsistent with the impartiality we have hitherto adhered to, to give our own opinions on the subject. From the death of the apostles, there are near one hundred years obscured, by something worse, if possible, than Egyptian darkness. If there were any writings among the Christians, they are now lost to us; and as for the epistles that go under the name of Ignatius, they are undoubtedly spurious.

This, however, is certain, that from the time of Clemens Romanus, down to the time of St. Austin, all the writings we have are against him. Whether there were any who held the same doctrines before, is utterly unknown to us. The argument strikes two ways, and indeed, with equal force.

First, it is remarkable, that although there were many writers before St. Austin, yet not one of them embraces the same sentiments with him. Secondly, had his doctrine been new, is it not natural to believe that he would have been powerfully opposed. And yet we read of no one person who did oppose him, except the famous Pelagius. In this state of uncertainty, we leave the reader to judge for himself, and proceed to lay before the reader, some account of Arminius himself.

James Arminius was born at Haerlem in Holland, 1580, his father being a very reputable man in that place. From his most early youth, he discovered such a sweetness of temper, that he became the admiration of all who knew him. About seventeen, having made great progress in grammar learning, he was sent to the university of Geneva, where he studied divinity, church history, and criticism. He read over all the Greek fathers, and imbibed their sentiments. When fatigued with study he walked out into a grove of trees, near the side of the lake, which has ever since been called Arminius's Walk.

Having taken his degrees, he left the university, with the character of a pious young gentleman, and an excellent scholar. Indeed, there can be but little doubts remaining concerning his extensive knowledge, when at only the age of twenty-five he was appointed by the states-general, professor of divinity in their university of Leyden. He began his lectures with discourses on the epistles to the Romans and Galatians, where it is supposed the strength of the Calvinistical argument lays.

It was now that Arminius began to teach publicly those sentiments which he had long embraced.—The force of conviction from the perusal of the Greek fathers led him to it; and it is an established maxim, that what men believe to be true they will teach.

His sentiments have always been reduced to the following points :

First, that by predestination is meant, God's eternal purpose to send the gospel to whom he pleases, and in that sense, he understood the words, God will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. By hardening people he understood, that God would withhold from them the blessings promised to believers by the promulgation of the gospel.

Secondly, he asserted, that in conformity with the Greek church, God had given every man power to turn from sin to righteousness, and, in that sense he understood those words, Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life. And again, all those expressions in the bible, upon which exhortations are founded; for as he said, what occasion for exhortation to men to perform any duties, if they have not the power to do it.

Thirdly, that as for the sin of our first parents, it runs along with us, and is implanted, but not imputed, otherwise (said he) how can it happen, that some are sanctified from the womb.

Fourthly, that the death of Christ was a sacrifice sufficient to make an atonement for the sins of the whole world. He gave himself a ransom for all.—He did not assert, that by the death of Christ all mankind would be saved, because many of them would not embrace the offered conditions; but he had taught; that the sacrifice itself was sufficient to make a complete atonement. In this he has been followed by the pious and ingenious Dr. Watts, who says,

He came to make the blessing flow,
Far as the curse is found.

Lastly, in conformity with the ancient Greek church, he asserted, that there was no such thing as final perseverance, for men might at any time fall off from grace. In this sense he understood the words, Be not high-minded, but fear, and let him who standeth take heed lest he fall. And again, that that parable of Christ's, where, speaking of an apostate, he says, The last end of that man shall be worse than the first. And he likewise adverted to all those passages where there is an intimation of falling off from grace.

The apparent novelty of these doctrines, at a time when men's minds were not properly settled concerning religious disputes, because they had not been hitherto contradicted, created much confusion.

James I. of England, who pretended to have much knowledge in theological controversies, wrote a severe letter to the States-general, in which he inserted, that Arminius should be burnt alive.—Perhaps this sentence might have been put in execution, had not Arminius died soon after. His sentiments, however, did not die with him; for many learned men in Holland embraced them, among whom was Episcopius (it should be bishop) and the famous Grotius, celebrated all over Europe for his treatise on the laws of peace and war. Political interests took place with polemical disputes, and James I. of England, though a man of learning, like a true pedagogue, influenced the Protestant princes to call (what is vulgarly called), a general council. Just as if the gospel of Christ Jesus, which is so clearly revealed in the New Testament, could be better illustrated by a parcel of priests with gowns and cassocks. This council, or rather synod (for so it was called) met at Dort, 1617, and there were several commissioners from all the Protestant states in Europe. They met in the church of Dort, where we have seen paintings of the most celebrated amongst them, particularly the famous bishop Hall.

As the assembly was composed of partial men, it was no difficult matter to get the opinions of Arminius condemned. They were condemned, and those who professed them were thrown into prison, among whom was the famous Grotius, who made his escape, and was afterwards taken into the service of Christina, queen of Sweden.

But notwithstanding all the rigour made use of by James, and the other Protestant princes in Europe, Arminianism grew and flourished. All the Lutherans embraced it; and this much is certain, that at the restoration of Charles II. in 1660, there was not a divine in the established church of any note, who did not preach the same doctrines. It has for many years become as it were universal in the church of England, and it is to be found in many parts of Scotland; but this leads us to consider in what manner the English Presbyterians first embraced it, together with its causes and consequences.

About the year 1691, just after the toleration act took place, some books were published concerning Antinomian principles; for before that time, the generality of the English Dissenters were Calvinists. This provoked one Dr. Williams, a man of vast fortune, some learning, but no eloquence, to write a book, entitled, "Gospel Truth Stated." In this work he deviated from many of his brethren, who, in their writings, had made salvation an absolute thing, whereas he made it conditional, depending on faith. He said, that repentance must come before faith; whereas the Calvinists had always asserted, that there could be no repentance without faith.— This man was undoubtedly a moderate Calvinist, or, in other words, a strict Arminian. But from this time a schism took place among the Protestant Dissenters in England. The most learned among them inclined to Dr. Williams' notions, and what is rather remarkable, they improved upon them. Every year they became more and more loose in their doctrines, till at last their sermons were little better than systems of deism. They seemed, as they still do, to take a pleasure in teaching their people just what they may read in Seneca, or Epictetus, without so much as adhering to any thing in the gospel. The consequence has been, that they are forsaken by their people, and left in distress. They have nothing now left them but to preach against government, and as most of their hearers are rebels, this procures them a scanty subsistence. The ministers are still numerous, but the hearers are few; for their dull tedious discourses will not go down with the generality of people.

They are undoubtedly very impolitic in one part of their conduct; for although they know that it is consistent with human nature to court popularity, yet they affect to despise it. The consequence is, they have few hearers left, except such as are enemies to the government. Indeed, it may justly be said of them, that in order to starve themselves and their families, they have embraced all the sentiments of the Arians and Socinians, and the truths of the gospel are rather nauseous to them. But we shall have occasion to mention another sect of Dissenters still more erroneous than they. In all their public offices these people are the same as those we have already described.

Account of the Arian Presbyterians.

We have already, in the course of this work, taken notice of the origin of those people called Arians, who sprung up at Alexandria about the middle of the fourth century. Little notice has been taken of them by the writers of the middle ages; but at the Reformation some persons actually declared themselves to be of these sentiments.

This, indeed, is not much to be wondered at, when we consider the unsettled state of the times, the agitations into which men's minds were thrown by a change from the grossest superstition to rational religion, and the religious disputes which naturally took place in consequence of agitated arguments concerning the worst of all subjects, namely, polemical divinity.

However, after the Reformation was established in those nations which embraced it, we find but very little account of the Arians for more than a century. In 1616, two of them were burnt alive at Lichfield, in Staffordshire, on the abominable act of Henry IV. and the Puritans in New England, burnt about three or four more, during the time of Oliver Cromwell.

Persecution, during the reign of Charles II. kept the English Dissenters in one mind; but no sooner did the revolution take place, and men were allowed that liberty which is the inherent right of every rational creature, than they abused it to licentiousness.

About the year 1720, one Mr. Pearce, a Dissenting minister at Exeter, who had written a learned treatise in defence of his brethren, began to broach some new doctrines concerning the Trinity, which created much confusion, and many of the ministers, who were very numerous in those parts, entered into an association, to prefer a bill of indictment against Mr. Pearce, for denying the doctrines of the Trinity. This was such an instance of madness as cannot be paralleled in church history, but to the everlasting honour of the grand jury, the bill was returned Ignoramus. These doctrines, however, spread far and wide, and within a few years many of the Presbyterians embraced them; and, indeed, it may be added, that those amongst them who would wish to shelter themselves under the name of Arminians, are now become Arians.

There are now some things necessary to be taken notice of in treating of the Arian Presbyterians, and the rather so because there were Arian in England some years before they declared themselves to be of those sentiments. If a man goes into one of their congregations, unless he is of a particular genius, he will not know what they mean. A friend of the author has heard some of them, for a whole hour together, hold out the glory of Christ, and, at the conclusion, declare that he was no more than a created being.

Their congregations are numerous throughout

England, but the hearers are so few, that they are not able to support the minister. Their sermons are, in general, to the ignorant, very ambiguous, but to those who know any thing of Christianity, they are worse than heathenism. Most of their congregations begin to drop off, and there is no wonder, for those who love the New Testament, love Jesus Christ as a saviour. But it would seem, that these Arian Presbyterians, in order to support their wild romantic notions, did every thing in their power to drive their people away from their assemblies. The author of this has actually heard one or more of their ministers, spend the whole of their sermons in endeavouring to make it appear, that Christ was not an object of worship. That he was a mere man whom God had created, but they, at the same time, allowed him to be a mediator between God and sinners.

How this can be reconciled to all the accounts we have of the Divine Redeemer, we leave the reader to judge. We may justly say, that if Christ was not God, and one with the father, our faith is vain, and we have believed in vain. Let us only consider, how different from this the sentiments of the most pious men have been in all ages and nations; and it was esteemed the peculiar glory of Protestants, to look upon Christ as their Saviour.

And here is the very strength of the argument; for if our sins were committed against an infinite being, consequently none but one of an equal nature, could make an atonement for them.

All the hopes that a sinner can have, must be through the mediation of Christ, and those who despise that mediation, cannot expect the divine mercy. All blessings were first promised to Christ in his human nature, and these were to be transmitted by him to all his faithful followers.

Some of the Arian Presbyterians have compiled a new liturgy, which is perhaps, the worst composition that ever was read by men. In the midst of their prayers, we find them denying the divinity of Christ, and they seem to dwell with pleasure on the subject. But we must not stop here. Be not surprised reader. They have actually made a new Bible.

One of their teachers, celebrated for mangling the works of some of the greatest divines, actually took it into his head to collect into one book, all those texts of scripture that suited his purpose, and recommended unto his people not to read any other. If this was not making a new bible, it will be difficult to say what is.

It is observed by the pious Mr. Henry, that the way of sin is downwards, that is, as soon as men leave the truth, and the way where they could find rest to their souls, they continue sinking as it were downwards into darkness and error. Of this the following specimen of the errors of the Arian Presbyterians may suffice.

Some of their preachers have boldly asserted, that the soul of man dies with the body, which shews, that they are what the Epicurians were among the heathens, and the Sadducees among the Jews. It is a lamentable truth, that several people, in consequence of reading those writings, have given themselves up to all sorts of debauchery.

Some others of their preachers have asserted, that the soul sleeps, from death, till the general resurrection. This is an ancient heresy, for we read of a sect of people commonly called soul sleepers, who appeared in Egypt, in Syria, before the time of Constantine the Great.

There is a third sort, at the head of whom is a divine, famous for his knowledge in politics, who asserts, by eternal punishment is meant, eternal annihilation. They say, that after the last judgment is over, and the righteous acquitted by their Lord, the wicked will be condemned and burnt to ashes with the earth. Now these people must be materialists, for how could the fire burn the soul.

We have mentioned these things not from motives of ill-nature, but compassion, and to shew that there is no end to error. What man who has read the writings of those Dissenters who died about fourscore years ago, such as Bates, Howe, Baxter, and many others, would imagine that they could be succeeded by men who are greater enemies to the Christian religion than the Deists are, nay, who actually deny one of the leading principles of natural religion, namely,—the immortality of the soul. A very intelligent person, who is now a Dissenting minister, once observed to us, that ever since the publication of Dr. Williams's book on Gospel Truth, the English Presbyterians have been successively plunging as it were into errors; and as they have made a new bible, so they may, in time recommend a new God.

It is, however, melancholy to consider what distraction they have driven the people into. Those who used formerly to go regularly to their meetings, and heard the gospel preached, seldom go now to any place of worship at all.

There is, however, this advantage attends them and their minister, namely, that they cannot do much harm, for the largest meeting they have has only a few hearers. Two of their chief preachers in London, preached away both their congregations, and both meetings were advertised to be let. Most of their ministers are very needy, and it is but a few years since the Calvinistical Presbyterians made a collection to supply the wants of one of them.—How strong must the hatred these men have to the divinity of Christ be, when they will suffer all these hardships, rather than inculcate those truths that were taught by their ancestors.

But still there are exceptions. About twenty years ago, a noble lord, equally famous for his knowledge in politics and heresy, fixed his eyes upon such clergymen, whether Dissenters or others, who denied the divinity of Christ. Of those there were three brothers, all Arian Presbyterian ministers. His lordship sent one of these to study physic, and the other two he presented to livings in the church of England. Thus for the sake of livings, the men who denied the divinity of Christ, could not only subscribe the thirty-nine articles, but even read the Athanasian Creed.

In all their ceremonies of worship, they observe the same forms which we have already mentioned, except those who read their printed liturgy, but that is only in a few places. Some of them read a prayer in manuscript, and their sermons are all written. They have no discipline nor government, and in their congregations, the people seem cold and insensible, while the preacher is delivering his moral harangue, or depreciating the glories of Christ Jesus. No new members are added, therefore there will be probably none left after the present generation.

We shall conclude this article by observing, that such people as belong to them, never instruct their children in any catechisms, so that they are shockingly ignorant. They do not so much as know those very points by which their religion is distinguished. The cold lifeless manner in which the minister preaches, makes them despise all religion, or at least not to regard any.

Account of the Socinian Presbyterians.

Solomon, the wisest prince that ever lived in the world, says, there were four things he could not understand, namely,—the way of a ship in the sea; the way of an eagle in the air; the way of the comies on the rocks; and the way of a man with a maid. But what would that great prince have said had he lived in our time, to see such variety of forms and sentiments in religion as we have amongst us, and all these bearing the names of Christians and Protestants. Perhaps he would have said, as he did on another occasion, “God hath made man upright, but he hath sought out many inventions.”

There is nothing has contributed more towards the propagation of popery in this country, than the various sects we are divided into. The first thing a Romish priest advances in conversation with such Protestants as he intends to convert, is our difference in religion. He tells the person, that the Roman Catholics are all united, whereas, the Protestant religion is like a dreadful monster with a great number of heads. But he does not stop here.

He tells him, that one sect denies the divinity of Christ; another that of the Holy Ghost; a third the immortality of the soul; a fourth the resurrection of the body; a fifth the eternity of hell torments, &c. &c. &c.

This is the way they make converts, as they call them; and it is told by themselves, that within these twenty years, they have drawn over to their communion above twenty thousand Protestants, many of whom were Dissenters. And this is not much to be wondered at, when we consider, what a thing it is for weak minds to be distracted about religious opinions. These poor unfortunate people, no sooner embraced popery, than they imagined themselves delivered, as it were, from Egyptian bondage.

A few years ago, a young Presbyterian minister turned Roman Catholic, and was ordained a priest. He was so zealous, that he was sent on the mission to Scotland, where he had been brought up, and actually boasted of his having made some hundreds of converts.

A few years ago, a Socinian minister in London, preached away all his congregation; and one of them, a person of sense and great abilities, turned Roman Catholic. That man is still alive, and boasts that there is seldom a week in which he does not gain some proselytes. But to proceed with our subject.

Faustus Socinus, from whom these people take their name, was a physician of some repute at Siuma in Italy, about the time of the Reformation. The profligacy of the court, and the corruption of the church of Rome, convinced him, that Christianity was not to be found there. And as he had been taught to believe in the unity of the church, so he imagined that Christianity was not to be found among the Protestants, because they were divided into many parties.

However, as nothing could please him that he saw or heard, he resolved to make a new religion to suit his own fancy.

He taught, like the Arians, that to believe in the divinity of Christ, was to destroy the unity of the godhead; adding, that if there were three persons, there might be three hundred, or any number whatever. He said, that the texts made use of to prove the divinity of Christ, ought to be understood in a different sense.

The Arians admit, that Christ existed before the world was created; but the Socinians say, he had no existence till his body was formed in the womb of the virgin. As for the incarnation of Christ, they think that it is not to be considered as miraculous; and they maintain, that it cannot be proved from the sacred scriptures. They say, that had it been necessary to believe in the incarnation, the bible would have mentioned it. One would think these people had never read the bible, for the incarnation was prophesied in the Old Testament, and it is related at large in the New.

About four years ago, a Socinian minister wrote a pamphlet to prove that the virgin spoken of in Isaiah, was not the Virgin Mary, and that the child to be born was Hezekiah. In answer to this, Mr. Sharp wrote a learned tract, and he was seconded by a pious German divine, now at Hesse-Cassel. One would have thought this was sufficient to have refuted the Socinian, but he had recourse to a method, which had it not been taken notice of, might have soon deprived us both of the Old and New Testament.

Mr. Sharp had observed, that the very words of the prophet relating to Christ's incarnation, are, by Matthew the evangelist, applied to Christ in chapter I. and II. Upon that the Socinian wrote a pamphlet, attempting to prove that those two chapters are spurious, and forged by some of the ancient fathers.

He was going to have proceeded in the same manner with the first two chapters of St. Luke's gospel, but Mr. Sharp answered him in such a masterly manner, that probably he will be silent for ever.

They teach, that man was of his own nature mortal, even before the fall, and was never endowed with original righteousness, consequently there can be no original sin by the fall of Adam. That we have a power to do good or evil whenever we please. That knows nothing of what is to happen, even to-morrow. That the cause of predestination is not in God, but in man. That God predestinates no one in particular to be saved. That he might have forgiven sin without Christ's death; for as he is the universal Lord, so he might do with his creatures as he pleased; he might give up his right to punish.

They add further, that as Christ was a mortal man, so it was necessary that he should die; and this, say they, shews he was not God, because God cannot die. That the death and all the sufferings of Christ were for no other purpose, than to shew an example for people to imitate. That Christ made no atonement for sin, nor was his death of any great service to mankind. That God hath exalted Christ in heaven somewhat above the saints, but still he is a dependent being. That baptism is an indifferent thing, and may either be used or not. That the torments of hell mean no more than that the soul and body shall be both annihilated. We shall not mention the dreadful consequences which might be drawn from these principles, because it might injure many persons in the present age, whose minds we hope, are well established in the faith.

They say that every sort of discipline is no more than ecclesiastical policy, and certainly so it is, but they have none. That pastors are all equal, and to them with the elders belong the government of the church.

The pastoral function consists in preaching, praying, visiting the sick, and administering the sacraments. They admit of no more sacraments than two, viz. Baptism, and the Lord's supper.

A sacrament say they, is an oath, or an engagement to perform something; and when they partake of the communion, they sit round a table, like the Calvinists, there being no difference between them in that particular.

The Socinians are charged with measuring their faith by the narrow bounds of their reason. God (say they) never commanded, that man can believe what cannot be comprehended. That we are created with an understanding fit to conceive, and we should reject what we cannot comprehend.

And here we would ask, if any man could ever yet comprehend God. "Canst thou by searching (says Job) find out God, canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" Plato, a heathen, said, speaking of God, "Truth is his body, and light is his shadow." Simonides, a Sicilian philosopher, being asked by his king Dionysius, what God was, asked some time to consider of an answer, but at last returned for answer, that the more he considered the more he was lost in admiration, at the boundless nature of the subject.

Toland and Tindal, attempting to write in defence of Socinianism, became professed deists, and wrote against the Christian religion.

Mr. Whiston, who was himself an Arian, being one day in conversation with Chubb, who was a Socinian, he (Whiston) told him it would not be long before he embraced deism, and he did so.

It is certain, that those who reject mysteries, must, at the same time, reject divine revelation; and here we may say, with a great man, "Nothing is more reasonable than to believe that to be true which is above reason; what notion can a man form of the soul, any more than that it is a living active principle, which he feels within himself, but cannot in any manner comprehend."

The Socinians often speak very disrespectfully of Christ, particularly in their sermons, and always treat of a future state, as but very imperfectly revealed. They are apparently happy, that God has not made the gospel dispensation clearer than it is, and yet they will not believe what is revealed.

Dr. Blair, an author and a divine, justly admired by his brethren, the ministers of the church of Scotland, has made some fine remarks concerning the notions of the Socinians. It appears (says the Dr.) to be the plan of the Deity, in all his dispensations to mix light with darkness, evidence with uncertainty. Whatever the reason of this providence be, the fact is undeniable.

God is described in the Old Testament, as a God that hideth himself. Clouds and darkness are said to surround him. His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters, his footsteps are not known. Both the works and the ways of God are full of mystery. In the ordinary course of his government, innumerable events occur, which perplex us to the utmost. There is a certain limit to all our enquiries in religion, beyond which, if we attempt to proceed, we are lost in a maze of inexticable difficulties. Even that revelation which affords such material instruction to man concerning his duty and his happiness, leaves many doubts unresolved. See Blair's Sermons, ser. iv. p. 290.

It is certain, that if men could comprehend every thing revealed; if they could see the veil drawn aside, and the mystery of God's moral government unfolded, there would be an amazing change, but it would be for the worst. Men would neglect those duties they owe to society, to their country, their families and themselves. Human life would procure no object sufficient to rouse the mind to a state of activity, nor to urge the hand of industry. Nay, it has been supposed, perhaps with good reason, that were men to behold the glories of a future state, they would deprive themselves of its blessings by rushing upon their own destruction.

It has pleased our God to conceal many things from us, that we may give evidence of our humility and our confidence in him. To set up reason as the boundary of our religion, is an attempt to make ourselves greater than the glorious angels in heaven. For the apostle, speaking of the work of man's redemption, says, "Which things the angels desire to look into." Which implies, it was then too great for them, and will remain so till Christ has finished his mediatorial office.

How different from these sentiments are those of the humble believer? How often does he exclaim with joy,

Thy mercies still thou dost impart,
With every added day,
Above the rest, O give an heart,
Its tribute still to pay.
Th' angelic host for ever pure,
My late returns shall bless;
Nor sin nor sorrow ever more,
Conspire against my rest.
Those false suggestions, flesh and blood,
Did interpose below.
Shall then be clear'd and understood,
And unmix'd friendship flow.

We have said the more concerning the Socinians, because they are, with respect to the Presbyterian clergy, the most numerous in England, but many of them have not above a dozen of hearers. In their worship they are the same as the Arians, and for the most part they are very similar; they have already preached away most of their hearers, and probably there will be but few left soon.

ACCOUNT OF THE INDEPENDENTS.

IT is remarkable, that in treating of the different sects among the Protestant Dissenters in England, we generally find them divided and subdivided into parties. To what can this be owing, says the unbeliever in Christ? Can there be any truth in the religion of those people, who are daily projecting new schemes, and changing these as often as their capricious humours direct them? Here let the deist not triumph; for we could make it appear, that there are more differences among those people, who call themselves Freethinkers. Thus, Toland was an enemy to all those sentiments that distinguish Christians from other people in the world. Tindal was of a quite different opinion. Blount denied the immortality of the soul and shot himself. Bolingbroke was a professed debauchee, and faintly attempted to overthrow the Scripture History. We have only mentioned these few instances, in order to shew, that there are no people in the world more inconsistent than the writers among the deists, when they ridicule the differences among Protestants.

These differences among Protestant Dissenters are so trifling, that they seldom affect the essentials of religion; and people ought to bear with each other, and be tenderly obliging, without affording an opportunity for either the papists or deists to triumph over their weakness.

The Independents, as they are now in England, may be divided into two sects, namely, the regulars and the irregulars. The regular Independents are those who have been brought up at their academy, and received as much learning as we shall have occasion to take notice of afterwards. The irregular Independents consist of the lower ranks of people, who have for some time attended the preaching of the Methodists, but are seduced away by some of their friends, who happen to have a greater volubility of speech than the others. But of each of these in their order.

Account of the Regular Independents.

These people were called originally Brownists, from the following circumstance:—

Mr. Robert Brown, a Puritan preacher, in the diocese of Norwich, had been much persecuted by the bishops, and frequently thrown into prison.

This Mr. Brown was descended from an ancient and honourable family, in the county of Rutland, and nearly related to the great lord treasurer Cecil. He received his education in Corpus Christi College, in Cambridge, but having conceived early prejudices against the ceremonies, he went about the country preaching in private houses. Having had an information lodged against him in the spiritual court, he was degraded from his office, and being then a young man, he went and lived some time privately with his father.

He could not, however, be restrained from preaching and inveighing against the bishops and the ceremonies. For this he was imprisoned no less than thirty-two times, and at last forced to leave the kingdom. Upon this he retired to Middleburgh, in Zealand, with several of his followers, where he formed a church upon his own plan of discipline.— This happened in 1586, but in three years after, 1589, they split into so many parties, that Brown left them and returned to England, where he renounced his principles. After this he became rector of a parish church in Northamptonshire, where he lived an idle and dissolute life, and having assaulted one of his neighbours, he was committed to the gaol of Northampton, where he died, 1630, in the eighty-first year of his age.

The Brownists held the same notion with respect to the terms of acceptance, as the Calvinists, but in their discipline they were uncommonly rigid. They taught, that every congregation was a church independent of any other, and this is the reason why they are called Independents.

Some of their reasons for separating from the church of England were, that the laws and the queen's injunctions, had imposed several things that were not in the gospel. That there were several gross errors in the service of the church, which were made necessary for the communion, and imposed accordingly. That if persecution for the sake of conscience was inconsistent with Christianity, the church of England could not be a true one. That the constitution of the hierarchy was too bad to be mended. That the very pillars of it were rotten, and that there was a necessity for a total reformation.

These people suffered much, along with the other Puritans during the reign of queen Elizabeth, and many suffered death with remarkable constancy for the principles they professed.

In 1593, the Brownists were become so numerous, that Sir Walter Raleigh declared in parliament, that there were upwards of twenty thousand of them in the counties of Norfolk and Essex, and in the neighbourhood of London. Those near London being more numerous than any where else, they formed themselves into a congregation, and chose a pastor. They had many learned men among them, particularly Ainsworth, whose exposition of the Pentateuch and the Psalms, is one of the best books in the world. But the congregation was soon dispersed, and fifty-six of the members sent to prison, where some of them perished for want of the necessaries of life.

Hereupon they petitioned the lord treasurer, setting forth the hardships they laboured under, but their petition was rejected. These persecutions obliged many of them to go over to Holland, where they set up themselves in most of the principal towns. In the reign of James I. the persecution carried on against them was greater than before; but these people, although persecuted, split into parties, and did all they could to injure each other.

About the year 1610, they assumed the name of Independents, and one Mr. Robinson, a learned man amongst them, returned to England, and formed a congregation, which met in the Borough of Southwark, where there is a meeting to this day. It is called Deadman's Place, because the Dissenters have a burying ground adjoining to it.

But this little society having been informed against by the bishop's pursuivant in 1632, forty-two of them were apprehended and thrown into prison. Some of these were admitted to bail, but no favour was to be shewn to their pastor; upon which he petitioned the king for leave to depart from England, which was granted him. He, with about thirty of his followers, went over to New England; and Mr. Canne, who wrote the marginal notes on the Bible, was chosen pastor in his room.

Mr. Canne preached in private houses, but the rage of the persecution drove him and his followers over to Holland, where they established a congregation at Amsterdam.

Mr. Howe was their next minister, who was thrown into prison, where he died. As opposition is the life of argument, so persecution promotes religion, whether true or false. These people increased to an amazing number, and although almost all of them were of different sentiments, yet they were either called Puritans or Brownists.

They continued to meet in Deadman's Place as usual; but one Sunday, whilst they were celebrating divine worship, they were surrounded by the marshal of the King's-bench, and committed to prison.—Next day they were carried before the house of lords, and accused of denying the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, and with preaching contrary to the statute of uniformity. The house, however, did not proceed against them in a summary manner, but dismissed them with a gentle reprimand. Next day a great many people went to see their meeting, and were so pleased with its simplicity, that they embraced their notions, and became converts.

History addresses itself to a period far more distant than the dreams of wild enthusiasts, or the blasphemies of madmen. She undertakes to hold out truth to public notice, without regard to factions, or any attachment to parties. She is to dress up truth in her native colours, and leave the impartial reader to judge. This is not an easy matter in the midst of contending parties. We are not to be swayed or biassed by inveterate prejudices, any more than partial attachments. So just are the words of the poet.

So from the time we first begin to know,
We live and learn, and not the wiser grow:
But he who truth from falsehood would discern,
Must first disrobe the mind, and all unlearn.
To disposes the child the mortal lives,
But death approaches e'er the man arrives:
Thus truth lies hid, and e'er we can explore
The glittering gem, our fleeting life is o'er.

We have, however, endeavoured to avoid all these extremes; we have considered that all human beings are liable to err; and sensible of our own weakness, we shall continue our account of these people with impartiality and with tenderness.

In the year 1641, when the Puritans began their grand attempt to overturn the government both in church and state, many of the Independent ministers returned to England; and so unsettled was the state of affairs at that time, that some of these men were chosen ministers of that famous assembly of divines which met at Westminster, and overturned the whole frame of episcopacy. The Independents were more favoured than the Presbyterians; and as they had no objection against money, they accepted of the grand church livings, while at the same time, they were exclaiming against clerical power.

When the Presbyterians in 1648, petitioned the parliament against the tolerations of the Sectaries, which was seconded by the Scots, the Independents presented a counter-petition from the city, signed by a great number of hands. The parliament upon this, called upon the Presbyterians to prove their jus divinum; and an assembly of them met for that purpose; but the Independents withdrew, and left them, not chusing to have any hand in the affair.

The army, at this time, was composed of Independents mixed with Anabaptists, and other Sectaries, who, when they found the Presbyterians even in their treaty with the king, insisting upon uniformity, without making the least provision for that liberty of conscience they had been contending for, grew outrageous, and at last buried king, parliament and presbytery, in the ruins of the constitution.

As Oliver Cromwell was an enemy to clerical power, and a friend to universal toleration, they were one of his chief supports during his usurpation. They petitioned him for leave to hold a synod, in order to publish to the world an uniform confession of their faith; for they were become very considerable. Their churches were greatly increased, both in the city and country, and many rich and substantial people had joined them, but they were not agreed upon any standard of faith or discipline, though their brethren in New England had done so ten years before. The protector yielded to their importunity, but did not live to see the effects of it.

About a month after the protector's death, a meeting was held in the Savoy between the Presbyterians and the Independents, and they appointed a committee to draw up a new confession of faith, which differed but little from that of the Westminster confession. At the end of the confession is a chapter of discipline in which they assert, that every society of visible professors agreeing to walk together in the faith and order of the gospel is a complete church, and has full power within itself to elect and ordain all church officers, to exclude all offenders, and to do all other acts relating to the edification and well being of the church. That all ordinations shall take place in consequence of the pastors being elected by the people; and they are to be set apart by fasting and prayer, with the imposition of hands; but even without the imposition of hands, they are to be declared duly ordained; nor shall any person object to their being ministers of the gospel; for they consider the act of ordination as in its own nature, rather indifferent than binding.

They disallow the power of all stated synods and presbyteries, and all sorts of conventual churches over particular assemblies, but admit, that in cases of difficulty or difference relating to order of doctrine, churches may meet together by their messengers, to give advice, but not to exercise any authority. They say farther, that churches agreeing in the fundamentals of religion, should keep up a communion with their brethren. And it is true that the ministers and rich people do so, but the poor are generally neglected.

At present, the Independents have many meetings in England, but their ministers are for the most part poor. Indeed this is reasonable; for if they have no compassion for those in distress, so it would seem inconsistent with the dictates of common sense, that any people should shew compassion to them.

They have an academy where their young ministers are brought up, but not one of them can be admitted till he has declared that he has been converted. The greatest number of these young men are taken from menial employments, and they are first employed to learn as much Latin as Cæsar of Borgia acquired. They then lay hold of a Greek grammar, and acquire as much knowledge of that ancient language as to be able to read a chapter in St. John's gospel. In Hebrew they go over Robertson's edition of the Psalms, and here their knowledge of languages stops.

During their leisure hours, a minister comes to the academy, and delivers them some lectures on rhetoric and logic, which they are vain enough to call the fine arts. An attempt was made, a few years ago, to introduce amongst them the study of the mathematics, in order to make them reasoners; but their governors could not undertake the making of compasses, lines and circles, so that their young ministers have just as much learning as one would naturally imagine who attends to the nature of things, and considers the constitution of the Christian religion.

The next thing to be considered is their ecclesiastical polity, if it deserves that name. When one of their young men has acquitted himself so well as to be made choice of for a church, about half a dozen of the neighbouring ministers assemble, with a great many of the people. The ordination is conducted in the same form as among the Presbyterians, but the confession differs.

The following confession of faith, delivered by Mr. Thomas Bradbury, in London, July 10, 1707, is almost similar to all that have been delivered since, and may serve as a specimen.

“Forasmuch as, upon these occasions, many have taken in hand to set forth, in order, a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us; I desire to make the same good profession before many witnesses, and, according to my measure of the gift of Christ, give a reason of the hope that is in me, with meekness and fear, and especially at this time, when by fasting and prayer, and laying on of hands, I am to be separated for the work whereunto the Lord hath called me; though I be less than the least of all saints, and not worthy of this grace, to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ.

ART. I. I therefore declare my belief, that the books of the Old and New Testament, which are commonly received amongst us, came not by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness.

II. This, through grace, I will always adhere to, as the great rule of my faith and ministry; to this law and testimony I profess to bring every opinion; this I promise, in a dependance upon him who has the residue of the spirit; I apply to these scriptures as the best discovery God hath made of himself in this life; I here learn what God is, and what he doth. This includes both his nature and glorious perfections; it includes both his eternal unity and trinity of persons.

III. I believe that the Lord our God is one Lord, there is none besides him.

IV. I believe there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and that these three are one. This I would avow as a truth, and humbly adore as a mystery.

V. I believe that this one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is a spirit. The king eternal, immortal, invisible, from everlasting to everlasting, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, but who will take vengeance on his adversaries, and not at all acquit the wicked.

VI. I believe that he created all things, and for his pleasure they are and were created; that his government reaches over the whole creation; that his providence extends to all creatures, and their actions, and that the fore-knowledge of God over-rules the corruptions of men.

VII. I believe that God made a covenant with our first parents, as the common root of all their posterity, and gave them a righteous law, with this establishment, that he that does these things, shall live by them; but in the day that he offended, he should surely die.

VIII. I believe, that by one man's disobedience, our natures are not only guilty but impure, and that we lie dead in trespasses and sins.

IX. I believe that God resolved to glorify himself by redeeming some of the lost race; that he did, from all eternity, predestinate some to the adoption of children, whose names are written in heaven; that this election was free, and it will have a certain issue; that the remnant are saved according to the election of grace, not for the works which they should afterwards do, but according to his own purpose and grace before the world began.

X. I believe that this design will be effectual to the happiness of all those.

XI. I believe that the only method of obtaining this happiness was by appointing one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus; giving a certain number to him, and setting him forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, for the remission of sins, that God might be just, and yet the elect be saved.

XII. I believe the divinity of our great Lord and Redeemer; that he is over all, God blessed for evermore; that he thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but receives a divine homage. I believe this word was made flesh, and dwelt among us:—this is the mystery of godliness, great without controversy, that God was manifest in the flesh. I believe him to be a teacher come from God: that he was made a priest for ever: that he is the king of saints, of whose kingdom there shall be no end.—In all these capacities he is head of the church, and the Saviour of the body, appointed to be the heir of all things; but more especially lord over them who are given to him.

XIII. I believe he went about doing good, delighting to do the will of him that sent him, by the which will we are sanctified: that he was made a curse for us, suffering in both the parts of his human nature; that he was the Messiah, who should be cut off to finish transgression, and make an end of sin: that there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved.

XIV. I believe when he had by himself purged our sins, he was buried, and lay part of three days and three nights in the belly of the earth.

XV. I believe that God raised him to heaven, loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible he should be holden of it. I believe he ascended up on high, is seated on the right hand of God, as the advocate of his people and the judge of the world.

XVI. I believe that whom he predestinated, them he also called, and whom he has called, them he also justifies freely by his grace. The blessedness of this consists in God's imputing righteousness without works. I believe that we lay hold on his mercy by faith, and that not of ourselves, but of the gift of God: that the people of God receive the adoption of sons, and there is a change in the disposition of those who are heirs of the grace of life, owing to free love and to Almighty power. I believe that the ransomed of the Lord grow in grace, and that he who has begun a good work in them, will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ. No man shall be able to pluck them out of his hands.

XVII. I believe he is to be worshipped with reverence and godly fear. I believe that we are to own this Lord in societies, and that there is a communion with all that in every place call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, both theirs and ours, and that Jesus Christ will be with them to the end of the world.

XVIII. I believe he hath given us several commands and institutions, which we, as Christians, are obliged to perform, one of which is baptism in water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, taught us all things whatsoever he has commanded, admonishing one another in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs. And by eating bread and drinking wine, in remembrance of him, we are to continue steadfast in doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayer.

XIX. I believe, that in all these parts of worship, one is our master, even Christ; no man having dominion over our faith and liberty.

XX. I believe that the Christian, at his death, enters upon two blessings, a complete purity and satisfying enjoyment, that the spirits of just men are made perfect, see Christ and know him as themselves are known: and that more perfect felicity which will follow the resurrection and universal judgment. For,

XXI. I believe there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust: that Christ hath authority to execute judgment, because he is the son of man: that the angels, who sinned, are delivered into the chains of darkness; both they and the wicked, who know not God, nor obeyed the gospel of his dear son, shall go into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.

The other particulars relating to the regular Independents lead us within the veil, obscurity is enlightened, darkness to the human eye vanishes away before our sight, and we can see them in their native colours.

Their congregations consist of a minister, two deacons, and, in conjunction with them, the whole of the congregation. These form a sort of congregational body, taking upon themselves the same power as a general council. The minister is elected by the people at large, with this reservation, that they can turn them away whenever they please.—This is, perhaps, a very extraordinary way of proceeding, and yet we meet with something like it in ancient ecclesiastical history.

In their discipline they profess to be like the primitive Christians; that is, they will never publish the faults of each other until they are excommunicated. This appears to be as strict a piece of hypoetry as ever took place in the world, and we shall give a specimen of it afterwards.

At present, in their form of worship, they differ a little from the Presbyterians, but still, even in that difference, they are not uniform. In all their meetings they begin with a psalm, and then follows a prayer. In some, after the prayer is over, they begin the sermon, which generally lasts an hour; and the minister must take great care not to drop one single word that looks like an exhortation to duty. The whole sermon has some resemblance to a system of divinity, without the conclusion. In some of their churches they sing three times during divine service; but, in general, their sermons are the same, only with this difference, that some of their young ministers have boldly ventured to imitate their ancestors, such as Bates, Howe, and others.

It is necessary to inform the reader concerning this vast difference in the mode of preaching between the present Independents, and those who lived at the time of the revolution.

In 1708, one Mr. Hussey, a minister at Cambridge, published a heavy, tedious volume, to shew that no minister had a right to make any offers of grace or salvation to sinners. This is not original Calvinism, but it is an inference, or consequence deducible from it; at least from that part of it called absolute predestination. For if God has elected one part of mankind, and reprobed the other, what occasion is there for exhortation, seeing man has no power to comply. This is a popular objection of the Arminians, which has already been in a measure refuted. It is not hereby meant to charge the Independents alone with this consequence, as many other sectarists, and even some in our established church, adopt the same opinion.—If we might be allowed to give our advice on so important a subject, we should rather think the express command of our Lord should be more attended to than any of these traditions of men; and if in Ezekiel's days, the dead bones were commanded to live, why should not the same method be taken under the superior brightness and vivifying nature of the gospel dispensation.

There is an apparent inconsistency in establishing the above consequence from a belief in absolute predestination, among a people who, in general, profess to have been converted from the ways of sin, under the Methodists; for this is the case with the modern Independents. It is pretty generally known, that exhortation is their fort, and that they had rather forego systematic divinity than lose an opportunity of earnest exhortation.

When a man or woman desires to be admitted a member, the minister and deacons confer with him, inquire into his character with a strictness and precision which does honour to them. If it is found such as will bring an honour to religion, as well as an ornament to their congregation, he or she is then told to write out an account of his Christian experience, and of the manner of his conversion.

This account is given to the minister, who having perused it, desires the candidate to be at the meeting on the next Lord's day. When service is over in the afternoon, the minister, with the deacons, and the principal members of the congregation, meet together in a large pew before the clerk's desk, called the table pew, because it is there they administer the Lord's Supper.

The candidate is then called upon, and the minister, pulling the paper out of his pocket, tells the people that he is come to read the Christian experience of A. B. The paper is then read, which generally contains, first, a confession of his original and actual transgressions against God, his deep conviction of guilt on that account, and his hearty desire of embracing that salvation which is revealed in the gospel: he then proceeds to relate the method and manner by which divine grace operated upon his heart; but as these are so various, we cannot fix any particular one, only we believe, that the general way which God takes to bring sinners to the knowledge of himself, is through the instrumentality of the preached word. He then professes his desire to become a member of that particular church, and assigns his reason for it, which is generally this, that he cannot any longer conscientiously abstain from obeying the positive command of Christ, which is binding upon all Christians, viz. the participation of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It is a general rule, not only with the Independents, but with most other sectarists, not to admit any one to their communion, until they have undergone some examination of this nature.

As soon as the paper is read, the candidate is desired to retire into the vestry, and while he is there, a consultation is held among the minister and members of the church; they then determine whether in the judgment of charity his experience is genuine, and such as will entitle him to church fellowship; added to which, they also judge of his character and conduct in the world; if these correspond with their sentiments of propriety, the candidate is made acquainted therewith, the minister gives him the right hand of fellowship, and he is from that moment a member of the church. It is generally contrived that the day of admission is upon a Lord's day, when the sacrament is administered, and then the new admitted member immediately communicates with the church.

Should the candidate be objected to, either from some inconsistency in his moral conduct, or should the account of his experience not correspond with the tenor of gospel conversion, he is exhorted to Continue some time longer under the ordinances; to be diligent in his attendance on Lord's days, and to be very circumspect in his behaviour. After a longer or shorter trial, he is admitted or totally rejected.

As for the present state of the regular Independents, it rather resembles a standing pool, whereas formerly it was as a rapid current. They have some rich people amongst them, and many poor; they consist chiefly of old members, and their additional converts are not very numerous. They are rather in a declining than a prosperous state: we hope this is not a sign of a decay of religion and virtue in the world, but that people in general see less necessity than formerly for dissenting from the established church of England.

Irregular Independents.

It is not from any ill natured prejudice, nor any thing like malevolence that we call these people by such a name. This would be very unbecoming those who are candidates for the public favour; impartiality alone, and nothing less can captivate men of reason, and obtain their good opinion. The author did not rightly know by what name to call them, till being one day in company with a doctor in divinity amongst the regular Independents, the reverend doctor said, "They are our Irregulars."—The reader must not be left in the dark, he must know who these people are, and who are those followers who support their ministry. To understand this rightly, it will be necessary to observe, that soon after the establishment of Methodism in this country, by those first institutors of it, Messrs. Whitfield and Wesley, many of the preachers in their separate connections, thinking they had equal abilities with the rest of their brethren, took meetings, and became Independents themselves. Having been rendered popular by their connection with one or the other of the above reverend gentlemen, and substituting loud declamation in the place of sound reasoning, they soon collected a sufficient number to fill their meeting-houses. We will not say that their congregations were the most respectable, they generally consisted of the unlearned and the poor, and not by any means so reputable as the regular Independent congregations. Their discipline was much the same, but many parts of their conduct different.

We have already observed, that the regular Independents have an education in their academies, but not the best that can be obtained, stopping vastly short of that erudition which in our opinion is necessary to form a Christian minister. But the Irregulars are still at a lower ebb, as they are in general ignorant of systematic divinity, as well as common education: however, their public harangues are popular; they tend to inflame the passions, and set the affections at work: what wonder if under such influences as these, the judgment should sometimes be misled and the practice be consequently erroneous. It is not our business to enquire by what motives they are actuated, we shall leave that to him, before whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid; whose prerogative it is to try the reins and search the hearts of the children of men. But this much is certain, that they have a great number of followers, and yet they have neither system nor discipline. Strange that a religion should exist without these, and yet it is true. Their terms of communion are rather uncertain, any person of good character, and what they in their separate congregations call orthodox principles, may be admitted. Men of business sometimes join them, and it is often proved that they benefit themselves considerably, as it is a general maxim with them to encourage those of their own communities; this is very natural, and we will not blame them for it: self-love prevails amongst mankind in so eminent a degree, that when we encourage others of the same opinion, we are only gratifying this predominant principle.

With respect to their manner of preaching, it would require a more able pen to defend it in every particular; this is a very essential branch of a minister's office, and where it is not properly conducted, the effects will be lamentable. Religion itself, in such congregations, will be disesteemed at least, if not totally neglected. It cannot be expected that a minister without learning should convey much knowledge to the people under his care. These irregular Independents pursue the same method as the regulars, by taking a text, and from thence preaching a discourse, though some people will have it, that they take leave of their text immediately, and that their discourse is as suitable to any other. The discourse is generally unconnected, and not well calculated to impress the minds of the auditory with a becoming reverence and devotion. If they have little or no education, we may be sure that rhetoric has not been studied by them, much less proper gestures or cadences. They do wisely, circumstanced as they are, to ridicule the art of preaching, and explode all manner of attention to propriety of action, of sound and judicious reasoning in the pulpit. We are afraid that the sum total of their harangues amount in general to this, Vox et preterea nihil.

We are willing to hope and believe, that notwithstanding these evident marks of impropriety and indecorum, that they have some real merit, in being frequently the means of reclaiming the vicious, especially among the vulgar; for though they are thus detected by people who have their eyes open, yet the majority of mankind, who judge of things at first sight, and take every thing for gospel they hear, are fascinated by their preaching, which operates by different ways, in some people, by raising their minds to an exalted pitch of enthusiasm, and by sinking others into desperation. Upon the whole, it is believed that some good is done by them, and that they are a mean used by the hand of providence whose works are altogether marvellous, and who frequently brings good out of apparent evil.

We would recommend it to the ministers who rank themselves under this denomination, to act in a compassionate manner to their hearers, to consider the poor as greater objects of compassion than the rich, to make the truths of the gospel appear in a more amiable light than they do, to cease from declaiming against other parties and professions, evidently better qualified in every point of view, and to make their public dissertations more a matter of study. They would then make a proper improvement of the trust committed to their care, and acquire as much honour as would make amends for all their deficiencies. They would do well to follow the advice and example of the blessed Saviour of men. He knew well the false hopes and fallacious reasonings of the heart of man; how prone men were to form themselves into parties and distinguish themselves by trifling inventions. In the business of religion and the great concern of souls, all that is short of obedience to God's commands, and a life of devotedness to his service, is nothing but trick and evasion, froth and folly. Consequently if any man build on such deceitful grounds, and with such slight materials, he must and can expect no other, than that his house should fall upon his head, and he perish in the ruins.

The irregular Independents have, in general, no proper notions of ecclesiastical discipline, nor any idea of systems of divinity. They have no regular plan, every congregation assuming some particularity. They are truly independent in the strictest sense of the word. In the form of their worship they are nearly the same with the regular Independents, only with this difference, they frequently use the Lord's prayer in public, which the others do not. What can be the reason of the latter disusing it we will not pretend to assert, unless it is that their objection to all forms is so great, that they will not accept of one, even from the mouth of truth itself.

After all that has been said, we are happy to affirm from our own knowledge, that there are many exceptions amongst the irregular Independents, both ministers and people. Men of learning and abilities, who are actuated by the purest principles, who study as much as is in their power to render religion a pleasing and delightful science, who are, in one word,—an ornament to their profession, and whose names will be respected, while virtue has any countenance in the world.

ACCOUNT OF THE ANABAPTISTS.

IN treating of these people, we are obliged to take notice of their divisions and sub-divisions, for they are even as much divided as the Presbyterians.—They are called Anabaptists, for their practice of baptizing believers only; and they say, that the mode of baptism should be by immersion, according to the method used by the primitive Christians, or, at least, during the three first centuries. Thus they claim an immediate descent from Christ and his apostles, and assert, that the constitution of their churches is from the authority of Jesus Christ himself, and his immediate successors.

Some historians, indeed, deduce their origin as a sect from much later times, and affirm, that they first sprung up in Germany, and separated themselves from the Lutherans, because the doctrine of these reformers was imperfect, or not brought to the primitive standard; as the proper mode and subject of baptism, was not allowed by them to be necessary, in the performance of the rite. Therefore, they re-baptized their followers, condemning infant baptism as unscriptural, and of no effect; whence they are called by the reproachful name of Anabaptists.

They insisted on plainness of dress, and simplicity in worship. They not only exclaimed against the church and power of Rome, but also against all those who opposed liberty of conscience. It is not at present our business to enter into a polemical argument concerning the time of baptism. Lord King has made it appear, and perhaps to a demonstration, that it never was used in any other sense than by immersion, till after the time of Constantine the Great. One objection his lordship admits of, and that is, that when people were converted from Paganism on their death-beds, and desired to be baptized, they were only sprinkled.

In Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and many other parts of Europe, many of the Anabaptists suffered martyrdom before the Reformation took place: and Dr. Wall, the greatest English writer in defence of infant baptism, admits, that there were some thousands of Anabaptists in the world before the troubles broke out at Munster, in Germany.

It is pretty clear, from the writings of many learned men, that Dr. John Wickliffe, the first English reformer, either considered infant baptism as unlawful, or at least not necessary, and he denied that sin was taken away by baptism. Some of Wickliffe's followers maintained, that the children of believers are not to be sacramentally baptized, and that it was impossible to give children ecclesiastical baptism, saying, they were sufficiently clean and holy, because they were born of holy and Christian parents. But to go on with the history of these people, as a general body before they split into so many parties.

Though several Anabaptists were put to death and other banished for their opinion, during the reign of Henry VIII. yet they still continued to increase. Bishop Burnet says, that at this time, 1547, there were many Anabaptists, in several parts of England, and they were generally Germans, whom the revolutions of that country had driven over.

Upon Luther's first preaching in Germany, there arose many, who, building upon some of his principles, carried things much further than he did.— Upon this many of them argued, that the mysteries of the Trinity, Christ's incarnation and sufferings, and the fall of man, were philosophical subtleties, not derived from scripture nor necessary to salvation. We shall have occasion to consider these points more at large hereafter.

They rejected, in particular, infant baptism, as a duty not enjoined, or so much as mentioned in scripture. Many of them, however, had opinions different from each other, but they all went by the name of Anabaptists.

April 12, 1747, there was a complaint brought to the council, that with the strangers that were come into England, some of that persuasion had come over, and were disseminating their errors, by making proselytes, so a commission was ordered, and the archbishop of Canterbury, with some other bishops and lords of high characters, were appointed by a commission under the great seal, to examine and search after all those people called Anabaptists, and indeed, all such as did not go to church.

They were to endeavour to reclaim them, to enjoin them penance, and give them absolution, or, if they were obstinate, to excommunicate them, and deliver them over to the civil power, to be further proceeded against, that is, they were to be burnt. In May, the same year, some tradesmen of London were brought before these commissioners, and ordered to abjure their former opinions, particularly they were to acknowledge, that infant baptism was a Christian sacrament.

One of these who thus abjured, was commanded to carry a faggot the next Sunday to St. Paul's, where there would be a sermon setting forth his heresy. But there was another of these extremely obstinate, viz. Joan Bocher, commonly called Joan of Kent. She denied, that Christ was truly carnate of the virgin, whose flesh being sinful, he could not take any of it; but the word, by the consent of the inward man in the virgin, took flesh of her. There must have been many more of these scintments at that time; for how could a poor ignorant woman form notions that would have puzzled the most learned philosophers to comprehend.

The commissioners took a great deal of pains with this woman, and had many conferences with her, but she was so extravagantly conceited of her notions, that she rejected all they said with scorn. Upon this she was condemned to suffer death as an obstinate heretic. We are sorry to say that this happened in the beginning of a Protestant reign.— The pious young king Edward withstood all the solicitations of his council for signing the warrant for her execution, declaring, it was doing in fact what they had condemned in the church of Rome, and that he would not drive her headlong to the devil. At last the king was persuaded by archbishop Cranmer, who urged that her crime was an impeachment of the apostles' creed, and that blasphemers were to be stoned to death, according to the Mosaic dispensation. The king, overcome by Cranmer's arguments, put his hand to the bloody warrant, though not without shedding tears, declaring he would lay all the charge on the archbishop before God. Accordingly the woman was executed, being burnt alive; and soon afterwards Geo. Van Paris, a Dutchman, was committed to the flames in Smithfield.

A faithful historian must neither conceal virtue nor vice, and the crime of a Protestant archbishop must no more be veiled over, than the guilt of a Roman pontiff, or a Spanish inquisitor.

Cranmer's conduct on this melancholy and remarkable occasion, is a striking proof of the corruption of human nature, even in the midst of good actions. The archbishop, with many other good men, endeavoured to promote the reformation of religion in England, and yet they could not help bringing along with them, from the church of Rome, the vilest dregs of practical popery. This is a matter of very serious consideration, and should teach men to be on their guard, when they change from the practices of a corrupted church. Let them leave all that is bad behind, and bring all that is good along with them.

The arguments made use of by Cramer, to induce the young king to sign the warrant for the execution of a poor ignorant mad-brained woman, points out to us the shocking notions, and the baleful influence, that ignorance of the sacred truths of the New Testament will always have on the minds of people. He argued from the Mosaic law, that the blasphemer was to be stoned to death, and it is very true; but the archbishop did not so much as know what was meant by a theocracy. He imagined, that because God, as the real sovereign of the Jewish people, permitted them to put blasphemers to death, so Christians were to do the same. But we pity the man, while we detest the action.

The papists rejoice in this act of cruelty, and retort back persecution on the Protestants. Philips, in his life of cardinal Pole, while he is contriving every means to blacken the characters of the reformers, takes care not to let this pass unnoticed.—However, if we Protestants have persecuted, we learned it from the papists, nor shall we attempt to vindicate such unchristian principles.

In the reign of queen Elizabeth, the Anabaptists increased, and were subjected to imprisonment and banishment. Some few, as Dr. Fuller observes, recanted their errors, but two of them were burnt in Smithfield.

In the reign of James I. among the persecuted exiles that fled to Holland were several Anabaptists, who set up a church under the pastorship of Mr. John Smilh, who had been a minister of the established church; but they were violently opposed by the other Puritan exiles, from whom they received much abuse in books written against their opinions. In this reign Edward Wightman, a Baptist, of Burton upon Trent, was burnt at Litchfield. He was the last martyr who suffered by this cruel statute of burning heretics in England. And it may be remarked, that William Sawtre, the first that suffered in that manner for his religious opinions, was supposed to have denied infant baptism; so that this sect had the honour both to lead the way and bring up the rear of all the martyrs that suffered in England upon the bloody statute of Henry IV.

In the year 1620, some Anabaptists transported themselves to New England, where, for a time, they met with very bad treatment from the Independents, who though they had fled from persecution themselves, yet persecuted with great cruelty both the Baptists and Quakers. Dr. Mather, in his history of New England, has declared, that many of the Baptists were very worthy honest men; and that Mr. Williams, one of their preachers, being banished from Salem, settled at a place called Providence, where he gathered a church together and was very instrumental in obtaining a charter for the government of Rhode Island, of which he was frequently chosen governor, and that he did all in his power to convert the Indians in his neighbourhood. He published a treatise on their manners, language, and tempers, and when peace was restored in New England, the Baptists spread themselves throughout many parts of the continent.

In 1642, there was a dispute or conference held in the Borough of Southwark, between Dr. Featly and some Anabaptist preachers, of which the doctor has published an account, but it is supposed to be a very partial one; for from the title page, to the latter end, there is a spirit of bitterness runs through it. During the civil wars of the last century, they increased in vast numbers, and no less writers than Dr. Hammond and bishop Taylor, spoke favourably of their sentiments. In 1643, the Baptists published their confession of faith, and in 1646, it was licensed by order of the parliament. Except in the articles of baptism, and church government, this confession differed very little from that of Westminster now established in the church of Scotland.

However, they were now persecuted by the Presbyterians, just as they had been before by the Episcopalians. But in March, 1647, a declaration of the lords and commons was published in their favour, induced thereto by the great numbers of them, then in the army, and in most of the corporations in England.

This declaration has the following words:

“The name of Anabaptism hath, indeed, contracted much odium, by reason of the extravagant principles and practices of some of that name in Germany; tending to the disturbance of government and peace of all states, which opinions and practices abhor and detest; but for their opinion against the baptism of infants, it is only a difference about a circumstance of time in the administration of an ordinance, wherein, in former ages, as well as this, learned men have differed both in opinion and practice. And although we could wish that all men would satisfy themselves, and join with us in our judgment and practice in this point, yet herein we hold it fit, that men should be convinced by the word of God, with great gentleness and reason, and not driven to any thing by force and violence.”

The Protestants, however, did not abide long in those sentiments of moderation; for the very next year, 1648, they published a cruel ordinance for the punishment of blasphemies and heresies, by which every sect, but the rigid Presbyterians, were con-denmed; and upon this ordinance several Baptists were persecuted, merely for their opinions about baptism.

The short rest they enjoyed towards the close of the usurpation, was succeeded by a most cruel persecution, during great part of the reign of Charles II. The story of Venner, the fifth monarchy man, is well known, who at the time of the restoration, sallied out from a house in Coleman Street, with some of his hearers, parading the streets, and knocking down every person who came in their way.— Their professed intention was, to set king Jesus upon his throne. These infatuated people believed, that the millenium was then to take place, and Christ was to reign with his people a thousand years.

It is certain, that the Anabaptists had no more concern with this insurrection of Venner's, than they had with the election of a pope of Rome, but the Presbyterian party at court embraced the opportunity of wreaking their vengeance on the whole body of those innocent people. We call them innocent; for where men's notions do not tend towards disturbing government, or promoting immorality, they may be justly esteemed innocent, and not objects of public censure.

About four hundred of these people were crowded into Newgate, besides many in other prisons. But at the coronation they were set at liberty by the act of indemnity. They published a declaration, wherein they testified their abhorrence of Venner's insurrection, and all they begged for was, liberty to meet together, to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences. This, however, did not avail them much, for they were continually persecuted during the whole of that reign.

John Bunyan, one of their preachers, was confined in prison eleven years, in Bedford gaol, where he had no other way of procuring a subsistence, but by knitting of purses, and in that afflicted state he wrote his Pilgrim's Progress, a book that will perhaps be read to the end of the world.

The famous bishop Patrick, author of the Commentary on the Bible, wrote a book under a similar title, which the witty earl of Rochester ridiculed in the most severe manner, when compared with that of Bunyan's.

The Baptists continued to suffer much in England till king James II. published his indulgence, and at last they were entitled to all the benefits of the toleration act, which leads us to consider what they have been since, and what they are at present.

The Anabaptists are, by their own choice among themselves divided into the following classes or rather parties:

- 1st, Calvinists.
- 2dly, Arians.

3dly, Sabbatarian Calvinists.

4thly, Sabbatarian Arians.

We shall treat of all these in their order.

Of the Calvinistical Anabaptists.

All the Anabaptists, from the time of the Reformation, till some time after the revolution, were Calvinists, but they soon split into parties, the common consequence of the abuse of liberty. Not that we would wish to abridge the least part of the toleration act, but only to shew, that the best things may be made the worst use of; and here we would not have it understood, that we are opposing any of those parties, but merely giving an historical account of them.

The Calvinistical Anabaptists are the most numerous of their sects, and it arises from a circumstance that will surprise the reader.

It is owing to this, that those who are best qualified for delivering their sentiments in public, will become most popular. It is so among the Roman Catholics, and in all Protestant countries where the sermons are delivered without notes. It is, in a great measure, owing to the cold indifferent manner in which sermons are read, that the established clergy have become unpopular, and the dissenting meetings empty. This observation was made by bishop Burnet so long ago as the year 1692, in one of his charges to his clergy.

It is an established maxim, that no part of human learning is necessary towards qualifying a man to be a member among the Anabaptists, besides that of being able to read the Bible, and a few other religious books.

They have therefore made it a rule, to pick out such of their hearers as are the most popular to harangue the people; and these they send to their country congregations, which are extremely numerous. Their high pretensions to piety, their earnest manner of addressing themselves to the passions of their hearers, and their strict attention to the duties of their functions, bring after them a vast number of followers, but chiefly among the lower classes of the people.

We must acknowledge, that they have had a Gill and a Brine, and some others among them. These were like constellations in a clouded sky, and some of their valuable performances have dispelled the mists of ignorance and infidelity, and reconciled many seeming inconsistencies in the Christian system.

When a man presents himself to be admitted a preacher among them, he is only asked whether he has been converted by divine grace, and whether he considers infant baptism as inconsistent with the word of God. He is likewise to give his assent to every thing professed by his community, which are the doctrines of Calvinism. To these they add some of their own which Calvin never intended.—It is not enough for them to allow of eternal reprobation, but like the Independents, they draw that conclusion from it that exhortations are unnecessary. Calvin, in several of his sermons, frequently says, "O sinners, we offer you Christ;" which, indeed, is no more than the apostle said, when he told the Corinthians that he preached Christ. But these people answer to this, that they have no Christ to offer. It might not be improper to ask them, whether preaching the gospel, and preaching Christ, are not synonymous terms? As all the promises in the Old Testament were made first to Christ, so they are like an inheritance, to descend to believers in the same manner as an estate descends to a son.—If believers are heirs of Christ, and if the inheritance itself comes by the gospel, then is not preaching the gospel the offering of Christ to sinners as a Saviour.

The ministers of this persuasion take great pains in their preaching, to affect the hearers with the importance of their doctrines, and use every method to rouse the passions, and influence the heart, to high and heavenly pursuits; the attempt is laudable, and in it we must wish them success.

They have some decorum and order in their sermons, which we think would have still more effect upon the hearts and lives of their hearers, did they accustom themselves to draw practical inferences.—As the ministers are generally men of abilities and piety, it is rather to be wondered at that they do not only see the necessity for this manner of proceeding, but also break through that prejudice which has so long been a barrier to it. It is remarkable, that all our Saviour's discourses consist of explanations of the law, and are always mixed with exhortations.

Nine parts out of ten of the apostolical epistles consist of earnest exhortations to duty, and strange that it should ever have entered into the heart of man, to neglect such an useful part of preaching.—The most strenuous Calvinists in the church of Scotland, who are the Anti-burgher Seceders, seldom spend less than one-fourth part of their sermons in the most fervent exhortations to duty; for they consider, with the apostle, that when the foundation has been once laid, they should endeavour to raise the superstructure.

But here let it be observed, that we are as well convinced of the necessity of teaching principles, as any of the Anabaptists are, but we consider it as only one part of preaching. We are no more to leave any thing undone, than we are to do what is forbidden. A constant direction on speculative opinions may enable men to talk of religion, but inferences drawn from them qualify them for heaven.

In their admitting of members, they differ much from the Independents. They do not call upon them to make a display of all those favours which have been shown to them by divine goodness; and that in a public manner before the face of a whole congregation. But still they have something similar to it, and something, perhaps, even more public.

When a person desires to be admitted a member into one of their societies, he is examined strictly by the minister and deacons, as to their knowledge, and a strict inquiry is made into his moral character. Christ received sinners; and his apostles, so far from making inquiry into the moral characters of their new converts, received them as sinners, and pointed out their moral duty afterwards. This is only a hint by the bye; it is not our intention to recommend the dissolute and profane, at least while they continue so, as proper members of any church, but the synagogue of satan: we only mean to say, that true penitents have a right to the blessings of the gospel dispensation. The benefits of the salvation provided in the gospel extend to sinners, and are calculated only for such: the whole need not a physician, but those who are sick. Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

But we must not look for primitive purity in religion among any set of people. The truth is, the Calvinistical Anabaptists rest so much on speculative notions, and have such an antipathy to the term good works, that they run into errors in the extreme. This is rather absurd, because their own notions point out grace irresistible. However, there is such an inconsistency in human notions, and in human actions, that nothing less than the judgment day will clear up.

However, when the candidate has been examined and approved of, he is ordered to come and be baptized. In the country, this ceremony is frequently performed in a different manner from that used in London. One of the Anabaptists, perhaps more zealous than many of his brethren, told us, that he was plunged in a river in Pembrokeshire, in South Wales, after the ice had been broken to make way for the ceremony.

It is rather different in London, where the ceremony is performed before a numerous and respectable congregation.

The candidate comes near to a font, or rather a reservoir of water, in the centre of the meeting having a robe around him to conceal his nakedness, and the minister walks into the water before him. The minister being up to the middle in the water, the candidate approaches towards him in a very reverend posture. Then the minister lays him back, and holds him in the water till he repeats these words:

“ I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.”

They then go out of the water together, and a sermon is preached suitable to the occasion.

The mode of conducting this ceremony is sometimes very solemn; the minister generally quotes those passages of scripture which are suitable to the purpose, and which, in his opinion defend the practice of adult baptism. It is very certain, that when Christianity was first promulgated, adults were baptized, and so were children too, otherwise we should not hear of the baptism of whole households.

With respect to discipline, these people have none in particular, but they excommunicate their members in the same manner as the Independents. They make provision for their poor, and have many collections for that purpose, yet there is a discretionary power left in the minister to give what part of it to whom he pleases.

In all other respects, they are like the Independents, and differ but little from them, except in the article of baptism. How far such men act consistently with the rules laid down in the gospel, is not our business to enquire. To be censorious is inconsistent with that impartiality which should at all times distinguish the character of an historian; to be remiss in taking notice of some abuses, would point out a fawning disposition. Let God be true, and let every man be a liar.

Of the Arian and Socinian Anabaptists.

We have already taken notice of those Anabaptists who are called Calvinists, we must now proceed to consider such as are of a different denomination.

The first Arian Baptist preacher in England was Dr. John Gale, who made his first public appearance about the beginning of this century. That he was a man of some learning cannot be denied, and his book, in answer to Dr. Wall, discovers amazing abilities. But, notwithstanding all this, he contracted, in his early youth, the most violent prejudices against every thing, either in Calvinism or Arminianism. The most part of his sermons, consisted of invectives against the godhead of Christ, and what was practical consisted of no more than what a common heathen would have delivered. No mention of Christ as a Redeemer, no notice of his offices as a mediator, no enlivening hope of pardon through his merits or acceptance, in consequence of his righteousness,—but a heavy commentary on the words virtue, good men, and all such other titles as we find mentioned in heathen authors.

In consequence of this man's preaching, a sort of schism took place among the Anabaptists, but of a very extraordinary nature.

The clergy increased, and the laity decreased.— There is something in this, resembling the conduct of five hundred shop-keepers setting up in a city, to sell a new commodity, while, at the same time, they could not have one hundred customers. It is certain, that no man can live without the common necessaries of life; for self-preservation is the first principle in natural religion. Poverty should be borne with resignation, when it comes as an ordinary dispensation of divine Providence; but we are not to court poverty. This much, however, is certain, that these men, in consequence of having denied the divinity of Christ and of the Holy Ghost, drove the greatest part of their hearers away, so that their families were left in distress.

In all disputed points concerning religion, it is best to err on the safe side, that is, it is much better to rest satisfied with a declaration of our own ignorance, than to run into an opposite extreme. It is certain, that the doctrine of the Trinity is taught both in the Old and New Testament, and it is equally certain, that we are not able to comprehend it. Then in such cases, is it not much better to wait with humility, till God lays open all these secrets to us.

In all these things acknowledge th' Almighty first,
And where we can't unridle, learn to trust.

With respect to the discipline of these Arian Anabaptists, they have but little, and their meetings are deserted of hearers. Their discourses are in general, such as an ancient heathen would blush at. Every thing that strikes at the root of the fundamentals of Christianity, has been adopted by them, and properly speaking, they may be considered as enemies to Christianity. Is it the resurrection of the body, they are sure to start some doubts concerning it? Is it the mediatorial office of Christ? It is laughed at with contempt. Is it the salvation through the redemption wrought by Christ? It is nonsense.

This brings to our remembrance what Sir Matthew Hale says, viz. that nothing can make the people so immoral as moral preaching.

In their ceremonies there are no differences between them and the Calvinistical Anabaptists, only that the Arians admit any person whatever to communicate with them, who only subscribe towards supporting their meetings.

All the ministers of their persuasions, are such as have received a liberal education, so in that particular they differ from many others. But notwithstanding all their learning, they are left to starve. Undoubtedly, the hatred these men have to Jesus Christ as a mediator, must be very shocking, when they can subject themselves to all sorts of want, that they may have an opportunity of blaspheming his name.

There are not many of them at present in England; for this much is certain, that no attachments to systems will ever go down with the people where the doctrine is not popular. They have no rule by which they can proceed in church censures; for as there is no gate to come in, so there is no opposition against their going out.

In a word, these people are, perhaps, as destitute of Christian knowledge as the heathens. Their ministers are enemies to the gospel, but the people do not so much as know any thing concerning true religion. However, we shall have occasion to speak of some sects more inconsiderable than those, and such as are but little known by the generality of people in the present age.

ACCOUNT OF THE SABATARIANS.

IN treating of these people, there are two things necessary to be considered.

First, their general principles, and secondly, their present state.

As for their principles, we are naturally led to enquire into the origin and authenticity of what we commonly call the Christian sabbath. And here the following questions naturally present themselves to us for solution.

First, is it a moral principle, that one day in seven should be kept holy to God?

To this it is answered, that it is not moral, nor has it any connection with natural religion. That some one day should be set apart for the worship of the Divine Being, is beyond all manner of dispute, but that one day in seven, or in seven hundred should be observed, natural religion does not point out.

Secondly, was this a patriarchal institution?

The answer is, it was not, for it took place long before. We read, that when God finished the glorious work of the creation, he rested from his labours, and pronounced the whole to be good. This was on the seventh day, and it is intimated, that the seventh day from that period should be a time of rest among men.

It is impossible, at this distance of time, to say in what manner this sacred institution was attended to in the antediluvian world. Perhaps, nay it is probable, that the neglect of this institution, was one of those sins, for which the people were destroyed by the deluge. Whether the sabbath, or one day in seven was observed by the patriarchs, cannot now be known; only this much is certain, that in all the accounts we have of them, it is not so much as mentioned, although the narrative is particular in other things.

But then it will be enquired in the third place, was the observation of one day in seven among the Jews, a ceremonial or a moral institution? The answer is, that in some sense it was both ceremonial and moral; ceremonial so far as it was connected with the Jewish law; moral, as being the effect of some Divine revelation. As a ceremonial practice, it took place among the Jews; and it is well known, that these people were so superstitiously attached to the observance of it, that many hundreds of them were massacred by Antiochus Epiphanes, because they would not fight on that day.

On the other hand, the moral obligation was quite of a different nature, for it was reasonable that some time should be set apart for the worship of the Divine Being, and as the Jews believed that the high command came from God, so they were under the most absolute and indisputable necessity to consider it as moral.

There is a morality in natural religion, which cannot be known unless we attend to the state of man in this world. But in Divine Revelation, there is a necessity of believing, that whatever God reveals is moral. If we believe a precept inculcated by Divine revelation, we must believe it to be moral; for what can be immoral that God prescribes as a duty. In judging of all these things, we are to consider, how far the evidence will support us through the whole of the argument, and then, if any doubt arises we are to draw the line between natural and revealed religion.

But this leads us to consider the state of the Christian sabbath under the New Testament dispensation.

With respect to the New Testament dispensation, here is a grand question indeed. It is certain, that Christ came to put an end to all carnal ordinances in the law of Moses. He came not to destroy any thing moral in that law, but to fulfil in his own person, every thing pointed out by the different types and shadows. Christ taught the Jews that the sabbath should be kept, but not in the manner they kept it; for the Pharisees had made it a rule, not so much as to do good to the afflicted on that day. To convince them of the depravity of their conduct, he asked them, or rather asked their consciences, whether it was lawful to do well on the sabbath day, and then wrought a miracle.

When Christ said, it is finished, the whole law of carnal ordinances fell to the ground, and the veil of the temple was rent, and the partition wall was broken down that separated the Jews from the Gentiles. What command Christ gave to his disciples concerning their keeping the day of his resurrection cannot be known. Whether he did so or not, this much is certain, that his disciples considered the first day of the week as coming in the room of the Jewish sabbath.

Thus we read, Acts xx. 7. "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them."

Now it is not said, that he called them together, but that he found them met there according to their constant practice. In the Revelation (i. 10.) St. John says, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." Now whether Christ desired them to remember him on that day, or whether they did it in gratitude for the many blessings he had procured for them, is not certainly known. No! they were blamed for imposing the observance or non-observance of the sabbath.

It seems, however, that many of the Christians in Galatia kept the Jewish sabbath, for which they were severely reprimanded by the apostle Paul.—However, it was the uniform custom of the primitive Christians, to meet on the first day of the week, as frequently as they had an opportunity. But this duty could not be imposed, because many of the first converts were slaves.

When the church obtained peace, under the emperor Constantine, then the first day of the week was religiously observed as the Christian sabbath, and about two hundred years afterwards, the emperor Justinian published an edict, commanding, that all Christians should observe that day, by attending public worship in the churches. It has never since been observed by the Christians, as we know of, except those whom we are just going to mention.

Account of the Calvinistical Sabatarians.

These people, called Calvinistical Sabatarians, are all Anabaptists; though they are not very numerous, yet they are very rigid in their notions. They say, that the institution of the sabbath is not ceremonial but moral, because it took place immediately after the creation. They added further, that there must have been some traditional account of its being observed by the patriarchs, else Moses would never have inserted it into his law.

It is certain, that many of the rites in the Jewish law, were observed by the patriarchs; for it is generally allowed, that Moses did no more than reduce them to a system. And if this was the case, say they, why might not the sabbath be observed by these ancient fathers.

There seems not to be much force in this part of the argument, for we cannot suppose that the very men who were called and instructed by our Saviour himself, would have kept the resurrection day instead of the seventh sabbath. To this we may add conjecture, that as God ordered the seventh day of the week to be observed in memory of the creation, and as the work of man's redemption was the greatest event that ever took place here below, so it was necessary that it should be commemorated as long as the existence of time, till Christ should make his second appearance. This is certainly the best way to consider the subject; and it is certain, that nothing can be more dangerous, vague, and uncertain, than to take disputed points of religion by inference or implication (the very thing here done), when, at the same time, a better proof offered itself.

Now it is certain, that the observation of the first day of the week as the Christian sabbath, hath been uniformly observed by all those who bear that name, except a few; and this is evidence much stronger than any thing that can be taken by implication. Thus far we think the argument rests in favour of those who keep the first day of the week as the Christian sabbath, but we are not to dictate to any one. Men are to be judged by the evidence of their consciences, in consequence of that degree of knowledge which they have had opportunity of acquiring.

These Calvinistical Sabatarians differ in nothing from the Calvinistical Anabaptists, except in worshipping God on Saturday. They have very little discipline in the churches or meetings, and their sermons are generally void of exhortations. They are very morose in their tempers, and in general uncharitable to those who differ from them in sentiments.

When they admit members among them, they are very strict in making inquiries into all that can be known concerning all those notions they formerly embraced. They also inquire into their moral characters: for although these people believe that no moral duties can be of any service in the article of divine acceptance, yet they like to be moral themselves, and to have moral people among them.

Their public devotions are the same as those of the Independents and Calvinistical Anabaptists; and when they excommunicate one of their members, they seldom re-admit him to their communion.

They have but few hearers, and these are in general so pliable, that they keep both the Jewish and Christian sabbaths. Here is an inconsistency, not only in speculation, but in practice; but what can we look for in human nature? It is possible that these people will die away with the present generation; for as they were never very numerous, so they are daily dropping off. They are all Millenarians, that is, they believe that Christ will reign a thousand years on the earth; which notion is embraced by many of the other Dissenters. There are no other particulars relating to them worth mentioning, nor do they make much figure at present.

The Arian Sabatarians.

These people are the most pliant of any in the world, for they generally act in a double capacity. Thus they preach in their own meetings on Saturdays, as the real sabbath, and in other meetings on Sundays, as the Christian sabbath. Upon this last, however, it is probable that they are rather a sort of assistants to the Arian Anabaptists. But let them act from whatever motives they think proper, yet this much is certain, they are not popular.

It is remarkable, that whatever popularity may take place among the vulgar, yet when men of knowledge preach the truths of the gospel in their primitive simplicity, they are generally followed, and they are obeyed in consequence of their lives being a practical comment on their preaching. On the other hand, when a preacher forsakes the gospel of Christ, and attempts to deprive him of his glory, the people sit with indifference under his cold lifeless discourses, and they drop off one by one, while the poor infatuated preacher is forsaken.

We have already seen how this applies to the cause of the Arians in general; and to none can it be more particularly applied than to the Arian Sabatarians. If ever they mention the name of Christ, it is with some mark of reproach, and not with that mark of reverence one would naturally expect from those who would make us believe they were his followers.

But here let us stop a little. Perhaps these men are not Christians. They observe part of the Jewish law, but they reject the divinity of Christ.—They pretend to a more than ordinary zeal for the sacred scriptures, and yet their sermons are nothing more than dull moral precepts. They have this advantage, however, above the Calvinistical Sabatarians, in that they exhort their people to duty.

It would not be difficult for a man of understanding to make a good sermon out of two of theirs; for the Calvinistical Sabatarians would furnish him with speculation, and the Arians with duty.

As these men are, in general, necessitous for the necessaries of life, and as they are but little regarded by those few people who follow them, so some of them are obliged either to follow mechanical employments, or, if they have education, to keep schools.

And here we would make an observation, that perhaps was never before committed to writing, namely, that the Arians, Socinians, and Arminians, all sing in their public worship Dr. Watts's Psalms. Now it is well known that the doctor's imitation of the psalms is purely Calvinistical; and how these men who deny the divinity of Christ and the Holy Ghost, can sing that in their public worship, which is totally opposite to their principles, we are not able to account for.

To hear a minister preach a full hour against all the glories of Christ's kingdom, and at the same time, order a psalm to be sung in public worship contradictory to what he had before advanced, is one of the greatest paradoxes in the world. Nay, we will not hesitate to declare, that it is a very serious matter. For true religion is of an uniform nature: no part of it must clash or interfere with another; all must be beautiful, regular, and uniform; but how can this be found where there is a total opposition.

These people admit their members by immersion: in riper years, but indeed they make so few converts, that they do not practice this ceremony much. The person to be baptized, has a declaration of his faith drawn up on purpose for him by the minister, who reads it to the people that are in the meeting.

This confession has always something in it against the Trinity, and against all systems of divinity; and yet these people are the most systematical in the world, for every one has a system of his own.

They have no manner of discipline, which indeed would be unnecessary; for what great occasion has that schoolmaster for a rod, whose school contains but few scholars. In their public worship they are like the other Arian Dissenters, and they generally select a chapter of the bible to read before sermon. They read their sermons to the people in a dull lifeless manner, so that it cannot be supposed that they will make much impression upon them. Probably in a few years they will be totally extinct; for at present, perhaps, there are not a great number in the nation.

ACCOUNT OF THE FRIENDS, COMMONLY CALLED QUAKERS.

IN treating of these people in an historical manner, we are obliged to have recourse to much tenderness. That they differ from the generality of Protestants in some of the capital points of religion cannot be denied, and yet, as Protestant Dissenters, they are included under the provisions of the toleration act. It is not our business to enquire whether people of similar sentiments had any existence in the primitive ages of Christianity; perhaps, in some respects they had not; but we are to write of them not as what they were but what they now are. That they have been treated by several writers in a very contemptuous manner is certain; that they did not deserve such treatment is equally certain.

The appellation Quakers, was bestowed upon them as a term of reproach, in consequence of their apparent convulsions which they laboured under when they delivered their discourses, because they imagined they were the effect of divine inspiration.

It is not our business, at present, to enquire whether the sentiments of these people are agreeable to the gospel, but this much is certain, that the first leader of them, as a separate body, was a man of obscure birth, who had his first existence in Leicestershire, about the year 1624. In speaking of this man we shall deliver our own sentiments in an historical manner, and joining these to what has been said by the Friends themselves, we shall endeavour to furnish out a complete narrative.

He was descended of honest and respected parents, who brought him up in the national religion: but from a child he appeared religious, still solid, and observing beyond his years, and uncommonly knowing in divine things. He was brought up to husbandry and other country business, and was particularly inclined to the solitary occupation of a shepherd; "an employment," says our author, that very well suited his mind in several respects, both for its innocence and solitude; and was a just emblem of his after ministry and service." In the year 1646, he entirely forsook the national church, in whose tenets he had been brought up, as before observed; and in 1647 he travelled into Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, without any set purpose of visiting particular places, but in a solitary manner he walked through several towns and villages, which way soever his mind turned. "He fasted much," says Sewell, "and walked often in retired places, with no other companion but his bible." "He visited the most retired and religious people in those parts, says Penn, and some there were, in piety, short of few, if any in this nation, who waited for the consolation of Israel night and day; as Zacharias, Anna, and Simeon, did of old time. To these he was sent, and these he sought out in the neighbouring counties, and among them he sojourned till his more ample ministry came upon him. At this time he taught, and was an example of silence, endeavouring to bring them from self-performances; testifying of and turning them to the light of Christ within them, and encouraging them to wait in patience, and to feel the power of it to stir in their hearts, that their knowledge and worship of God might stand in the power of an endless life, which was to be found in the light, as it was obeyed in the manifestation of it in man: for in the word was life, and that life is the light of men. Life in the word, light in men; and life in men too, as the light is obeyed, the children of the light living by the life of the word, by which the word begets them again to God, which is the regeneration and new birth, without which there is no coming into the kingdom of God, and to which whoever comes is greater than John; that is, than John's dispensation, which was not that of the kingdom, but the consummation of the legal, and fore-running of the gospel times, the time of the kingdom. Accordingly several meetings were gathered in those parts; and thus his time was employed for some years.

In the year 1652, he had a visitation of the great work of God in the earth, and of the way that he was to go forth, in a public ministry, to begin it. He directed his course northward, and in every place where he came, if not before he came to it,

He had his particular exercise and service shewn to him, so that the Lord was his leader indeed." He made great numbers of converts to his opinions, and many pious and good men joined him in his ministry. These were drawn forth especially to visit the public assemblies, to reprove, reform, and exhort them; sometimes in markets, fairs, streets, and by the highway-side, "calling people to repentance, and to return to the Lord, with their hearts as well as their mouths; directing them to the light of Christ within them, to see, examine, and to consider their ways by, and to eschew the evil, and to do the good and acceptable will of God."

They were not without opposition in the work they imagined themselves called to, being often set in the stocks, stoned, beaten, whipped and imprisoned, though as our author observes, honest men of good report, that had left wives, children, houses and lands, to visit them with a living call to repentance. But these coercive methods rather forwarded than abated their zeal, and in those parts they brought over many proselytes, and amongst them several magistrates, and others of the better sort. They apprehended the Lord had forbidden them to pull off their hats to any one, high or low, and required them to speak to the people without distinction, in the language of thou and thee. They scrupled bidding people good morrow, or good night; nor might they bend the knee to any one, even in supreme authority. Both men and women went in a plain and simple dress, different from the fashion of the times. They neither gave nor accepted any titles of respect or honour, nor would they call any man master on earth. Several texts of scripture they quoted in defence of these singularities; such as "swear not at all." "How can ye believe, who receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour which comes from God only?" &c. &c. They placed the basis of religion in an inward light, and a sensible impulse of the holy spirit.

In 1654, their first separate meeting in London was held in the house of Robert Duing, in Watling street, for by that time they had spread themselves into all parts of the kingdom, and had in many places set up meetings or assemblies, particularly in Lancashire and the adjacent parts, but they were still exposed to great persecutions and trials of every kind. One of them in a letter to the protector, Oliver Cromwell, represents, that though there are no penal laws in force obliging men to comply with the established religion, yet the Quakers are exposed upon other accounts; they are fined and imprisoned for refusing to take an oath; for not paying their tithes; for disturbing the public assemblies, and meeting in the streets, and places of public resort; some of them have been whipped for vagabonds, and for their plain speeches to the magistrate.

Under favour of the then toleration, they opened their meetings at the Bull and Mouth in Aldersgate street, where women, as well as men were moved to speak. Their zeal transported them to some extravagances, which laid them still more open to the lash of their enemies, who exercised various severities upon them throughout the next reign. Upon the suppression of Verner's mad insurrection, the government having published a proclamation, forbidding the Anabaptists, Quakers, and fifth monarchy men, to assemble or meet together under pretence of worshipping God, except it be in some parochial church, chapel, or in private houses, by consent of the persons there inhabiting, all meetings in other places, being declared to be unlawful and riotous, &c. the Quakers thought it expedient to address the king thereon, which they did in the following words:—

"Oh King Charles!

Our desire is that thou mayest live for ever in the fear of God and his council. We beseech thee and thy council, to read these following lines in tender bowels, and compassion for our sufferings, and for your good:

And this consider, we are about four hundred imprisoned, in and about this city, of men and women from their families, besides, in the county gaols, about ten hundred, we desire that our meetings may not be broken up, but that all may come to a fair trial, that our innocency may be cleared up."

London, 16th day, 11th month, 1660.

On the 28th of the same month, they published the declaration referred to in their address, entitled, "A Declaration from the harmless and innocent people of God called Quakers, against all sedition plotters, and fighters in the world, for removing the ground of jealousy and suspicion, from both magistrates and people in the kingdom, concerning wars and fightings." It was presented to the king the 21st day of the eleventh month, 1660, and he promised them upon his royal word, that they should not suffer for their opinions, as long as they lived peaceably; but his promises were very little regarded afterwards.

In 1661, they assumed courage to petition the house of Lords for a toleration of their religion, and for a dispensation from taking the oaths which they held unlawful, not from any disaffection to the government, or a belief that they were less obliged by an affirmation, but from a persuasion that all oaths were unlawful; and that swearing, upon the most solemn occasions, was forbidden in the New Testament. Their petition was rejected, and instead of granting them relief, an act was passed against them, the preamble to which set forth, "That whereas several persons have taken up an opinion, that an oath, even before a magistrate, is unlawful, and contrary to the word of God; and whereas, under pretence of religious worship, the said persons do assemble in great numbers in several parts of the kingdom, separating themselves from the rest of his majesty's subjects, and the public congregations and usual places of divine worship: be it therefore enacted, that if any such persons, after the 24th of March 1661-2, shall refuse to take an oath when lawfully tendered, or persuade others not to do it, or maintain in writing or otherwise, the unlawfulness of taking an oath; or if they shall assemble for religious worship, to the number of five or more, of the age of fifteen, they shall for the first offence forfeit five pounds; for the second, ten pounds; and for the third shall abjure the realm or be transported to the plantations: and the justices of peace at their open sessions may hear and finally determine in the affair."

This act had a most dreadful effect upon the Quakers, though it was well known and notorious, these conscientious persons were far from sedition, or disaffection to the government. George Fox, in his address to the king, acquaints him that three thousand and sixty-eight of their friends had been imprisoned since his majesty's restoration; that their meetings were daily broken up by men with clubs and arms, and their friends thrown into the channel, and trampled under foot till the blood gushed out which gave rise to their meeting in the open streets. A relation was printed, signed by twelve witnesses, which says that more than four thousand two hundred Quakers were imprisoned; and of them five hundred were in and about London, and the suburbs; several of whom were dead in the gaols.

However, they even gloried in their sufferings, which increased every day; so that in 1665, and the intermediate years, they were harassed without example. As they persisted resolutely to assemble, openly, at the Bull and Mouth, before mentioned, the soldiers, and other officers, dragged them from thence to prison, till Newgate was filled with them, and multitudes died of close confinement, in that and other gaols.

Six hundred of them, (says an account published at this time) were in prison, merely for religion's sake, of whom several were banished to the plantations. In short, says Mr. Neale, the Quakers gave such full employment to the informers, that they had less leisure to attend the meetings of other Dissenters.

Yet, under all these calamities, they behaved with patience and modesty towards the government, and upon occasion of the Rye-house plot, in 1682, thought proper to declare their innocence of that sham plot, in an address to the king, wherein, appealing to the searcher of all hearts, they say, their principles do not allow them to take up defensive arms, much less to avenge themselves for the injuries they receive from others: that they continually pray for the king's safety and preservation; and therefore take this occasion humbly to beseech his majesty to compassionate their suffering friends, with whom the gaols are so filled, that they want air to the apparent hazard of their lives and to the endangering an infection in divers places. Besides, many houses, shops, barns and fields are ransacked, and the goods, corn and cattle swept away, to the discouraging trade and husbandry, and impoverishing great numbers of quiet and industrious people; and this for no other cause, but for the exercise of a tender conscience in the worship of Almighty God, who is the sovereign Lord and King of men's consciences.

On the accession of James II. they addressed that monarch in these words:—

"Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God (by whom kings reign) to take hence the late king Charles II. and to preserve thee peaceably to succeed; we thy subjects heartily desire, that the giver of all good and perfect gifts, may please to endue thee with wisdom and mercy, in the use of thy great power, to his glory, the king's honour, and the kingdom's good. And, it being our sincere resolution, according to our peaceable principles and conversation (by the assistance of Almighty God,) to live peaceably and honestly, as becomes true and faithful subjects under the king's government, and a conscientious people that truly fear and serve God, we do humbly hope, that the king's tenderness will appear, and extend with his power to express the same, recommending to his princely clemency, the case of our present suffering friends hereunto annexed."

When James, by his dispensing power, granted liberty to the Dissenters, they began to enjoy some rest from their troubles; and indeed it was high time, for they were swelled to an enormous amount.—They, the year before this, to them glad release, in a petition to James for a cessation of their sufferings, set forth, that of late above one thousand, five hundred of their friends, both men and women had been imprisoned, and that now there remain one thousand three hundred and eighty-three; of which two hundred are women, many under sentence of praemunire; and more than three hundred near it, for refusing the oath of allegiance, because they could not swear. Three hundred and fifty have died in prison since the year 1680: in London the gaol of Newgate had been crowded, within these two years, sometimes with near twenty in a room, whereby several have been suffocated, and others, who have been taken out sick, have died of malignant fevers within a few days. Great violences, outrageous distresses, and woeful havock and spoil have been made upon people's goods and estates, by a company of idle, extravagant and merciless informers, by prosecutions on the conventicle-act, and others; also on qui tam writs, and on other processes, for twenty pounds a month, and two-thirds of their estates seized for the king. Some had not a bed left to rest on, others had no cattle to till the ground, nor corn for food or bread, nor tools to work with; the said informers and bailiffs in some places breaking into houses, and making great waste and spoil, under pretence of serving the king and the church. Our religious assemblies have been charged at common law with being rioters and disturbers of the public peace whereby great numbers have been confined in prison without regard to age, and many confined in holes and dungeons. The seizing for twenty pounds a month has amounted to many thousands, and several who have employed some hundreds of poor people in manufactures, are disabled to do any more, by reason of long imprisonment, they spare neither widow nor fatherless, nor have they so much as a bed to lie on. The informers are both witnesses and prosecutors, to the ruin of great numbers of sober families; and justices of the peace have been threatened with the forfeiture of one hundred pounds, if they do not issue out warrants upon their informations. With this petition they presented a list of their friends in prison, in the several counties, amounting to four hundred and sixty.

During the reign of king James II. these people were, through the intercession of their friend Mr. Penn, treated with greater indulgence than ever they had been before. They were now become extremely numerous in many parts of the country, and the settlement of Pennsylvania taking place soon after, many of them went over to America. There they enjoyed the blessings of a peaceful government, and cultivated the arts of honest industry.

As the whole colony was the property of Mr. Penn, so he invited people of all denominations to come and settle with him. An universal liberty of conscience took place: and in this new colony the natural rights of mankind were, for the first time, established.

The Friends are, in the present age, a very harmless inoffensive body of people; but of that we shall take more notice hereafter. By their wise regulations, they not only do honour to themselves, but they are of vast service to the community; and here we are led to consider their tenets with respect to the great articles of the Christian faith, and their discipline concerning church communion.

They profess faith in God, by his only begotten son Jesus Christ, as being their light and life, as well as their only way to the father, and a mediator with the father. That God created all things by his son Jesus Christ; and that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit are one Divine Being, inseparable, one true, living, and eternal God, blessed for ever. That the word, or son of man in the fulness of time, took our nature upon him and became a perfect man, according to the flesh; was miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; declared to be the son of God, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead. That in this word was life, and the same life was the light of men, the life and light within us; and that men are to believe in this light, Christ Jesus.

That as man he died for our sins, rose again, and was raised up into glory; he having by that one great universal offering, become a sacrifice for peace, atonement and reconciliation between God and man. That Jesus, who sitteth on the right hand of the majesty of heaven, is our king, high-priest, and prophet in his church, and by his spirit also maketh intercession in our hearts. That the gospel of this grace should be preached in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, being one in power, wisdom and goodness in the work of man's salvation, and that all our prayers are answered by the Father through the Son.

That Christ's body that was crucified was not the godhead, yet, by the power of God, it was raised from the dead, changed into a more glorious condition, and ascended into heaven.

Firm and living faith in Christ Jesus the son of the living God respects his being and fulness, and also his making himself known in the soul in every degree of his light, life, spirit, grace, and truth, the immediate cause, author, object, and strength of our living faith; which light and life of the son of God, when truly observed and followed, will bring us to the adoption of sons.

It is true, we are not to undervalue the holy scriptures, nor slight the preaching of the word, as being outward helps and instruments in the hand of God for the conversion of sinners, nor do we set them up in opposition to the light of the spirit of God or Christ within; for his faithful messengers are ministers thereof to turn people to the same spirit and light within them.

It is certain, that great is the mystery of godliness in itself; that God should be manifested in the flesh; and it is a great and precious mystery of godliness and Christianity, that Christ should be spiritually and effectually manifested in men's hearts. Christ is revealed to all true believers, freeing them from the bondage of sin, in their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. This mystery of godliness in its own being and glory, hath been and must be testified, preached and believed, where God is pleased to give commission, and prepare people's hearts for the same.

As touching the resurrection of the dead, we believe as the scripture testifies, "that if in this life we only have hope, we are of all men the most miserable." That the soul or spirit of every man or woman shall be resumed in its own distinct and proper being, and every soul shall have its proper body, as God is pleased to give it. A natural body is sown, a spiritual body is raised; and though this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, the change shall be such as flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, so we expect our bodies to be spiritual in the resurrection, and that they shall far excel what our bodies are at present; but how the dead are raised, or with what body they come, we submit to the wisdom and pleasure of Almighty God; for we cannot presume to determine.

As to the doctrine of the final judgment, we believe, that God hath committed all judgment into his son Jesus Christ, and he is appointed to be both the judge of quick and dead, and of the states and end of all mankind. That Jesus Christ, who has so deeply suffered, and endured so many indignities shall in the last and great day manifestly appear in glory, attended with all his glorious and heavenly host and retinue, to the terror and amazement of all those who have denied him; but to the glory and triumph of the righteous, the faithful followers and friends of Christ. It is a righteous thing with God, that they who suffer with him, should appear with him in glory and dignity, when he shall appear at last to judge the world and princes thereof. Whilst those who now evade and reject the inward convictions and judgment of the light, and shut up the records or books thereof in their own consciences; they shall be at last opened, and every thing judged of the things recorded therein, according to their works.

These articles are generally approved of by most of those Christians whom we call orthodox; but as a charge was brought against the Quakers for having embraced the notions of Socinus, in vindication of themselves they added a few more articles to their creed. These are as follows:

I. That Jesus of Nazareth, who was born of the Virgin Mary, is the true Messiah, the Christ the son of God, to whom all the prophets give witness; and that we do highly value his death, sufferings, works, offices, and merits, for the redemption of mankind, with his laws, doctrines and ministry.

II. That this very Christ of God, who is the lamb of God that taketh away all the sins of the world, was slain, was dead, and is alive for ever in his eternal glory, dominion and power with the father.

III. That the holy scriptures are of divine authority, as being given by the inspiration of God.

IV. And that magistracy, or civil government, is God's ordinance, the good ends thereof being for the punishment of evil doers, and the praise of them that do well.

These articles were added by one George Whitehead, a noted man among them; and here it may be necessary to observe, that these people pay very great regard to the scriptures, and to many other doctrines of the gospel.

Baptism is not practised by these people. They say, that it is not outward washing with water that makes the heart clean, by which men are fitted for heaven. Mr. Barclay, in his apology, endeavours to prove this proposition in the following manner, viz. "As there is one Lord, and one faith, so there is one baptism, which is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. And this baptism is a pure and spiritual thing; that is, the baptism of the spirit, and by which we are buried with him; that being washed and purged from our sins, we may walk in newness of life; of which the baptism of John was only a figure, which was commanded for a time, and not to continue for ever." Such are the sentiments of this learned man concerning infant baptism, or in general all water baptism whatever. He adds further, that infant baptism is a mere human invention; for which neither precept nor practice is to be found in scripture.

Concerning the sacrament of the Lord's supper, he advances, "that the communion of the body and blood of Christ is inward and spiritual, which is the participation of his flesh and blood, by which the inward man is daily nourished in the hearts of those in whom Christ dwells; of which things the breaking of bread by Christ with his disciples was a figure, which they even used in the church for a time, who had received the substance for the sake of the weak; even abstaining from things strangled, and from blood; the washing of one another's feet, and the anointing of the sick with oil; all which are commanded with no less authority and solemnity.

than the former; yet seeing they are only the shadows of better things, so they cease in such as have obtained the substance."

It is not our business to enquire whether Mr. Barclay's sentiments be true or not; his apology, however, was soon after its first publication translated into Latin, which even led foreigners to read it; and the author has seen translations of it in French, German, and Low Dutch.

Having thus far considered the principles of the Friends, commonly called Quakers, we shall proceed to give some account of the various parts of their discipline.

In 1667, George Fox recommended the setting up of monthly meetings throughout the nation, the friends having only had their quarterly meetings.—“And the Lord appeared (says George) unto me, and bid me see what I must do, and how men and women's monthly and quarterly meetings should be ordered and established in England, and other nations, and that I should write to them where I came not to do the same. Accordingly, having recommended the setting up of two monthly meetings in London to take care of God's glory, and to admonish and exhort such as walked disorderly, and not according to the truth; then I passed forth into the counties again, and advised that monthly meetings should be settled there also, for the same purpose, which was done according to the gospel order, in and by the power of God; and in the year 1668, I went over for the same purpose to Ireland. From thence I went to Scotland, to Holland, to Barbadoes, and to many parts of America, advising friends to settle monthly meetings in those countries; all which was accordingly done.

The good effects of these monthly meetings discovered themselves in the reformation that took place among our friends, and they were acknowledged even by those who did not join us." These monthly meetings were more or less in number, as the case required, in every respective county.—These meetings called quarterly, determined every thing too hard for the monthly ones, and prepared matters for the general yearly meetings. In all these meetings they are equal in power, they have no person to preside over them, because they acknowledge none but Christ for their head. They have no disputes concerning differences, but endeavour to convince each other in the spirit of love and meekness. In these meetings they enquire into all the wants of their brethren.

In their proceeding against offenders, they act as follows:—He is visited by some of the friends, and the fact he is charged with is laid before him. They labour with much love and zeal to convince his conscience that has been out of the way of his duty. They keep in view the glory of God, the good of his soul, and the honour of their profession. It commonly happens, that he is prevailed on to own his fault, and profess sincere repentance; and then the thing is never mentioned to him afterwards.

The monthly meeting chuse some of the gravest of their friends to visit such as are absent, to converse with them, to take care that the poor be provided for, to promote piety, charity, and friendship, in families, to take care that the children of the poor be instructed, clothed, and in all things provided for.

Although they supply the wants of all their own poor, yet this does not prevent them from being charitable to the poor of other religious denominations.

The questions asked by those whom we have already mentioned as visitors, are the following:—

I. Are ministering friends in love and unity with one another, and with faithful brethren in their own meetings?

II. Do none of them travel abroad in the work of the ministry, without a certificate from their own monthly meetings?

III. Do they give way to each other, and to strangers?

IV. Do none overcharge themselves with business to the hinderance of their service?

V. Are they sound in their ministry?

VI. Do any of them burthen their hearers with words without life?

VII. Do they adorn their doctrine by a suitable conduct and conversation, as good examples in all respects?

The sensible reader will acknowledge, that these are very important questions; but their discipline concerning marriage, merits the attention of Protestants of all denominations.

The man and woman present themselves to the men and women at the monthly meetings where they reside, and there deliver their intention of taking each other as husband and wife, if the said meeting have no material objections against it.

The principal conditions of their acceptance are the following:—

First, It is an established rule, that no man propose marriage to a woman, without the previous consent of his own and her parents, or guardians; and if the unbridled affections of any should have precipitated him into a breach of this rule, he is required to remove the offence, as is also the woman, and give satisfaction to such parents and guardians, and to the meeting to which they belong, by a due and open acknowledgment of the offence, and condemnation of themselves for it, and to get the consent of their guardians before they can proceed with the marriage.

Secondly, That the parties be of the same opinion and judgment in matters of religion, and professed members of this society.

Thirdly, That none shall marry within such degrees of consanguinity or affinity, as are forbidden by the law of God.

Fourthly, If either of the parties has given offence to their friends formerly, by some act of scandal, they are to acknowledge it, which is generally done in writing.

If no objections are then made, notice of the intended marriage is published in the meetings, where the man or woman resides, or did reside, which must be done before the marriage is solemnized, in order that convenient time may be granted for satisfaction concerning their clearances of all scandal of previous contract, and every thing else.

The parties are required to give their attendance a second time at the monthly meeting, which is usually the next ensuing, when the parties appointed to make the inquiry, return and give the answer, which, if proved satisfactory, the parties are at liberty to proceed to the accomplishment of the marriage.

These marriages are solemnized in the common ordinary meetings, which hath had this good effect, to make public, and strongly recommend this decent and comely order to all sober friends.

Here the man and woman take each other as husband and wife, and promise, with God's assistance, to be loving and faithful in that relation, till death separates them. Of all these proceedings, a narrative is kept in the manner of a certificate, to which the husband and wife first set their hands, thereby making it their own act and deed, and some of the persons present do the same. This certificate is afterwards written into the record of the meeting.

As for second marrying they attend to the following things:—

First, If the man be a widower, or the woman a widow, and have children by a former husband or wife, that provision be previously made for such children, where it can conveniently be done.

Secondly, Friends should not proceed to second marriages, till at least one year is elapsed from the death of the former wife or husband, and the practice accordingly has been such; for to do otherwise would look indecent.

To their general meeting at London, which assembles the third week in May, are admitted friends from all the churches they have in the world, to give an account of the state of every particular church, which from some parts is done only by writing; and then a general epistle is sent to all the churches.

These epistles, from their general meetings in London, have something in them of a very pious and moral tendency, of which we shall afterwards give a specimen. In the mean time, we cannot help observing, that of all religious denominations, these people suffer more than others. They are obliged to pay all sorts of taxes, and yet none of their poor become burdensome to the parishes.

The Papists have had greater indulgences shewn them than the Friends, and there are numbers of Papists in the workhouses in England. It is true, those of the Quakers, or Friends, must be also admitted, on condition of their applying for it; but we cannot say but it is rather cruel, to make men pay for the support of the poor, seeing they support all their own, and that in so decent a manner.

The following epistle was written by that great ornament of the literary world, Dr. John Fothergill, at the yearly meeting at London, May 29, 1779.— It will serve to shew what are the sentiments of those peaceable people under the then unhappy circumstances of affairs.

Dearly beloved friends and brethren,

In the love of God, and the fellowship of the gospel, which we have, with deep thankfulness of heart, in a good degree experienced to attend us, both in our meetings for worship, and those for transacting the affairs of the church, we affectionately salute you, with fervent desires that brotherly love, peace, and concord, may continue and increase amongst us, and that a tender and Christian concern may come upon all, in their respective stations, for the maintenance of good order, and the promotion of truth and righteousness upon earth.

By accounts received from the several quarterly meetings in England, and by epistles from Wales, North Britain, Ireland, Holland, New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, we are informed, that love and unity are generally preserved in the churches, to many of which divers have been joined through conviction; and that a considerable number of well-disposed youth appears in various parts.

The sufferings of our brethren in America have been great in many places, especially in Pennsylvania, the Jerseys, Long-Island, Rhode-Island, and Nantucket. These sufferings have principally arisen from that confusion and distress which are inseparable from war, from the laws enacted for promoting military services, and from acts enforcing declarations of allegiance to those in power.

The Friends who were banished from Philadelphia, have been permitted to return to their habitations, excepting two, who died in exile; and some of those who were imprisoned have been set at liberty.

It is with satisfaction we understand, that their meetings for worship and discipline are duly kept up, and that notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers which surround them, friends attend them with diligence, and many from remote places; their minds are often tendered therein, and united in love one to another, and in deep sympathy with the sufferers amongst them. And it evidently appears, that the turning of the mighty hand of the Lord upon them hath not been in vain; but that, having learned by the things they have suffered, and from the apprehension of future probations, they are engaged to wait for that divine help, protection, and support, which alone can enable them to endure with patience and holy resignation the trials that are permitted to attend them.

Our brethren in those parts gratefully acknowledge the kindness and regard of friends in England and Ireland, in so early and liberally contributing to the relief of their distresses. Many, from easy circumstances, have been reduced to great hardships and necessities, but have been measurably kept in a state of contentment: these have shared the benevolence of those who have been preserved from the like sufferings. It appears that their afflictions, though grievous in divers places, have tended to awaken many to a proper sense of their condition, and to increase a watchfulness and care, that they may walk answerable to the mercies received, and faithful in the testimonies committed to their charge, against wars, and other antichristian practices.

May a deep sympathy with our afflicted brethren affect every mind; and may we all watch unto prayer, that it may please the Divine Majesty to shorten the day of their distress.

The sufferings of friends brought in this year from England and Wales, being chiefly for tithes, and those called church rates, amount to three thousand, seven hundred, and sixty-three pounds; and those from Ireland to one thousand two hundred, and fifty-four pounds.

Inasmuch as we have sufficient ground to believe that the true gospel ministry is freely received from the Holy Head and unchangeable High-Priest of the Christian church, and by him commanded to be freely given; we cannot esteem the laws of men, made in the apostatized state of the professing churches, as of any force to supersede his divine law, or to warrant us to act in violation thereof; we therefore exhort you, brethren, be true and stedfast in the faith once delivered to the saints, and deeply suffered for by divers of the Protestant martyrs, as well as by our own faithful predecessors. However any amongst us, to whom blindness in part hath happened may swerve from the law, and from the testimony, suffer it not to fall as in the streets, through your weakness, or the want of your example; lest for your denial of Christ before men, he deny you before his father and the holy angels.

Let us also remind such as may be remiss in attention to the teachings of the grace of God in their own hearts, that the kingdom of Christ is a peaceable kingdom; and though his servants walk in the flesh, they do not war after the flesh. He commands them to love their enemies; and many who have followed him in the regeneration, and abode under his government, have found themselves restrained from all wars and fightings; which are not of the spirit of the Saviour, but of that of the destroyer of mankind. Believing this, we cannot consistently take any part therein; nor be concerned as owner of armed vessels, in letters of marque, or as purchasers of prize goods; neither can we assist in the sale of them:—for whoever amongst us so confederate with the captors, afford evident tokens that they either prefer the gain of a corrupt interest to the convictions of divine light in their own consciences, or that they are become insensible of them; both which must tend to their condemnation.

Now, dear friends, seeing our time is ever silently upon the wing, and the opportunity afforded us for the important work of preparation daily shortening; knowing also, that the solemn period advances, wherein every individual, however occupied in this transient mode of being, must soon be called hence, and may, in a moment unexpected, be broken off from every temporal connection, by that awful command, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward:" Let us be vigilant, and in earnest so improve the precious time allotted us, that when this awakening call approaches, our consciences may not accuse us; but our faith may be firm, and an admittance granted us into that city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God!

See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.—Grace be to all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

Eph. v. 15.—vi. 23.

Before we conclude the account of these people, it may be necessary to observe, that as the Friends, commonly called Quakers, will not take an oath in a court of justice, so their affirmation is permitted in all civil affairs; but they cannot prosecute a criminal, because in our courts of justice all evidence must be upon oath.

ACCOUNT OF THE NONJURORS.

WE have had already occasion to treat of different sects of Protestants, who embraced sentiments arising from disputed points in theological systems, or metaphysical disquisitions. We shall now proceed to point out a party whose religion is founded on politics.

The Nonjuring religion is, in all respects, a political system, and is founded on an opposition to the revolution settlement; but this cannot be understood till we consider it historically. This naturally leads us back to a period before they took their rise. As in religious disputes there ought always to be some sort of candour mixed with the argument, so politics should be treated with modesty. The grand point in dispute between these people, and the established churches of England and Scotland depend entirely on the revolution settlement, but why it should be so, must be explained to the reader.

The sectaries in England, who brought king Charles to the scaffold and the block, had two objects in view. The first was to procure the church livings, and the second to obtain a power to dominate over the consciences of the people. Religion, with them, was considered in the same light as it was with pope Alexander VI. and his natural son Cæsar of Borgia. For it is well known, that they overturned the constitution in church and state, and trampled on the ruins of their plundered country.—The consequence was, that the two royal brothers were obliged to seek refuge in foreign countries while they were very young. Complaisance to those who supported them during a state of exile, induced them to embrace the Roman Catholic religion.

In 1660, Charles returned and was crowned king of Great Britain, but concealed his religion till his dying day. At the same time James returned along with his brother, a confirmed papist. The Presbyterians thought to have ingratiated themselves with the young sovereign, but his father's sufferings could not be effaced, they sunk deep into his mind, and therefore he resolved to set up episcopacy in England and in Scotland.

Accordingly episcopacy was established both in England and Scotland; and the Presbyterians, who had been turned out of their churches, were prosecuted upon the act of uniformity. That these people who had trampled on the constitution in a manner unknown before in all the annals of history, deserved a little chastisement cannot be disputed, but at the same time it must be acknowledged that the extension of the regal power went too far. Many of the people who had suffered under the cruel and inhuman government of the sectaries, forgetting the charity they owed to their fellow creatures, and the duty they owed to God, took every opportunity of retaliating. There is no grudge, (says Mr. Sterne) like a religious one; for false religion always discovers itself in seeking revenge.

Here was a large field opened for the clergy, who accepted of the civil emoluments, to exert themselves in persecuting those who in point of government differed from them in sentiments. And although the sectaries who had overturned the government and murdered their sovereign, had no right to expect any favours, yet it was the duty of the episcopalians to have treated them with lenity. True Christianity is known by its peaceable and forbearing disposition, false religion by its undermining arts.

Never, perhaps, were the Protestant clergy of England in a more corrupt state than during the reigns of Charles II, and James II. Finding that they enjoyed the royal favour and that nothing could give so much pleasure to the court as the persecuting of the Dissenters, they exerted themselves to the utmost in that horrid employment. In their pulpits, they taught that the king was above law, and that it was the greatest sin in the world to call his authority in question. They were ridiculed by the poets, as appears from the following lines:

Each day unto my flock I taught,
Kings were by God appointed;
And told damnation was their due,
Who touch'd the Lord's anointed.

Passive obedience and non-resistance were favourite topics with them, and they carried these notions to such an extravagant height, that had they not been restrained by notions of self-interest, they would have established arbitrary power. However, the indulgence granted by king James II. 1687, opened their eyes, and they began to seek for their own interest.

When the revolution took place, all those who held church livings, were commanded to take the oaths of allegiance, but many refused to do it, among whom was Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, together with many of the inferior clergy. These men were turned out of their livings, and therefore we are obliged to consider them in a two-fold point of view. First, as English Nonjurors, and, secondly, as Scottish ones.

English Nonjurors.

The reign of king William was, in all respects, a system of severity. But this is what generally happens after every revolution. Prejudice creates anger, and anger excites itself in cruelty. These people set up separate congregations, and there is no doubt but they imagined, however vainly, that the exiled prince would be restored to the throne. They taught the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance so long that they were in a manner afraid, or rather ashamed to recede from their former professions.

It would have been very well for them, had they confined themselves to the duties of their office, in teaching the doctrines of Christianity; but the most wretched thing of all was, they sought to dabble in politics. They were continually hatching plots against government, and many persons suffered in consequence of their knew notions. Had these men considered the nature of Christianity they would never have acted in this manner, but their notions were carnal, and their views selfish.

Some of them, however, ran into wild extremes and what will ever appear remarkable, they met the Papists half way on the road. Like some patriots in the present age, they took pleasure in doing every thing they could to disturb government, and at the same time, they felt the iron hand of opposition from the whigs. The whigs, those inveterate enemies of all, who opposed them in search after places of honour or emoluments, were the most severe against the Nonjuring principles. They could have borne with any thing, so as an opportunity presented itself to wreak their vengeance on the Nonjurors. The reason is obvious. The whigs were seeking for places, the Tories were discarded. Had the Nonjurors not meddled with the affairs of government in England, they might have lived in peace: but wisdom is not to be conveyed to fools, nor knowledge to men of no understanding.

The English Nonjurors became obnoxious to government. On the accession of George I. future ages will read, with detestation, the account of cabals that were set up in order to oppose government on the one hand, and support it on the other. The grand principle upon which these people founded their doctrine was hereditary right. How far they could act consistent with the dignity of rational creatures in doing so must be left to the judgment of every man who knows any thing of the history of England.

Is hereditary succession a principle in our law? The answer is in the negative. We shall prove it from historical evidence.

William obtained the crown of England by conquest. His eldest son Robert did not succeed him, but he was succeeded by his second son William Rufus. Rufus, dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother Henry I. while Robert the heir apparent, was still alive; and who for his pretensions to the crown, had his eyes put out and died a prisoner at Bristol.

Stephen succeeded by force without right, and Henry II. succeeded on the hereditary line. From that time till the death of Richard II. it went on, when a very remarkable revolution took place. Henry IV. had but a slender title to the crown, and that crown sat tottering on his head. Soon after the wars commenced between the houses of York and Lancaster, and, consistent with the right of hereditary succession, neither of them had any right to the crown. The Stewarts succeeded in a real hereditary right to the crown of England, but the justice of the nation pointed out, that they had no right to trample on the liberties of the subjects.

It is much to be lamented, though it is true, that while the Dissenters were rioting on the spoils of their deluded people, the Nonjurors were inventing schemes for the subversion of government.

The English Nonjurors contrived all things wrong. In plotting against the government, they involved their hearers in many difficulties, and some of them were apprehended and executed. This, indeed, is not much to be wondered at; for the Nonjurors were, in those times, what mock patriots are at present in England. All their ceremonies are the same as those of the established church, and the difference is only of a political nature. They are, however, dwindling away, and possibly there are not above twenty meetings of them in England. They read the church service, but instead of praying for king George, they pray for the king in general terms; but then it must be observed, that no more than five of them are permitted to meet together, exclusive of the minister and the clerk. That they should subsist long cannot be expected, that they have subsisted so long, is an insult to common sense.

Account of the Scottish Nonjurors.

The Scottish Nonjurors were more numerous than those in England, and, in some respects, they were more respectable.

The nobility of Scotland had just notions of public liberty, whether civil or ecclesiastical; and had the episcopal party acted with prudence, modesty, and decency at the revolution, their order would not have been overturned. But quite the reverse took place. King William was desirous of establishing episcopacy in Scotland, or rather continuing it upon its former establishment, and most of the Scottish nobility concurred in that sentiment. However, the episcopal clergy acted just as they had done some time before, namely, as if they had laboured under a penal infatuation.

Dr. Alexander Ross, a man of some learning, but high clerical notions, was at that time bishop of Edinburgh. This man was deputed by his brethren the Scottish clergy, to wait on king James, when they heard that the Prince of Orange intended landing in England. They offered that if king James would support them and their order, they would stand by him to the last. The meaning was, they would assist him in establishing Popery and persecuting the Presbyterians.

This, however, was rather the act of the bishops' than of the whole body of the clergy, for many of the episcopal clergy were at that time shining ornaments to religion in Scotland. Mr. Nairn, Mr. Charters, and Mr. Annan, were men of great moderation, and wrote some things that will ever do honour to their memory. But to return to Dr. Ross.

The bishop had not got above half way to London, when he heard that the king was fled, and that the prince of Orange had arrived in London. Under such circumstances he knew not how to act, and therefore wrote to his brethren in Scotland for their advice. In the mean time he continued his journey to London, where he met with Dr. Hickey, dean of Worcester, and some other clergymen who afterwards made a shining figure among the English Nonjurors.

Had Dr. Ross considered the interests of his brethren, he would have in their name, without any authority from them, professed loyalty to king William especially as the convention of estates both in England and Scotland, had voted him and his prince the crown.

We have already taken notice of the behaviour of some of the Scottish bishops in our account of the episcopal church of that nation, namely, that as the Presbyterians were mad, so the bishops persecuted them, not only with unrelenting cruelty, but actually committed depredations on the liberties of the subjects, and the fundamental laws of the constitution.

For these, and for many other malversations, they had great reason to imagine that they would be brought to a severe account had their religion been countenanced, and men of virtue and moderation would have been placed in their room. It is true, that they knew the greatest part of the nation was inclined to support the order, while they hated the prelates. Many of the ancient nobility, who above thirty years ago had suffered under the merciless cruelty of the Presbyterians, were still alive, and they dreaded being brought under the same inquisitorial power.

It is certain, that the Scottish nobility, and a vast majority of the commons, would have supported episcopacy, had the bishops taken the oaths to the new government; but the whole number (14) remained obstinate, and above five hundred private ministers followed their example.

Under such circumstances it was necessary that there should be some form of religion established; and in the midst of their disputes, the following article was presented to the convention of estates at Edinburgh, and was admitted an article in the claim of rights: "That prelacy, or the superiority of any office in the church above presbyters, is and has been a constant grievance to this nation, ever since the Reformation (they having been reformed from Popery by presbyters) therefore it ought to be abolished."

Upon this article being admitted in the claim of rights, episcopacy was overturned, and presbytery established.

As it was on the construction of this article in the claim of rights that the Scottish Nonjurors always vindicated their conduct in opposing the government, so we shall consider it more particularly.

And the first inquiry is, were the Scots reformed from Popery, by persons solely clothed with the character of presbyters? The answer is in the negative. In the first general assembly which met at Edinburgh 1560, there were no less than thirteen bishops and mitred abbots, all of whom embraced the reformation, and three of them secularized. Now the whole assembly did not consist of above thirty persons, as appears from their records in the advocate's library, and about seven of these were country gentlemen who never had entered into orders. This brings the number up to twenty, and if to these were added William Harlaw, a tailor, and Andrew Scrimshaw, a baker, there will only remain eight; four of whom had been Popish priests, and the other four were zealous preachers, but not only clerically ordained. Thus it appears, the church of Scotland was reformed from Popery more by the assistance of prelates than of presbyters.

Secondly, whatever the character of the Scottish reformers was, whether of Presbyterian principles or not, can it be inferred that presbytery was more esteemed, and episcopacy an intolerable grievance, from the Reformation to the revolution?

The answer is, it was not. For even the Reformation was itself a sort of moderate episcopacy, and even presbytery had not been long established, when the insolence, ignorance and hypocrisy of the clergy, lost them the affections of those who had the least regard to decency and good order.

Whatever might have been the conduct of the bishops in Scotland before the breaking out of the civil wars, this much is certain, that the inferior clergy were an ornament to their profession. Nay, such was the lenity of government, that the Presbyterian ministers were tolerated in their parishes, without being obliged to take institution from the bishop.

Another circumstance may serve to shew, that the people of Scotland were not averse to episcopacy at that time, nor indeed during the whole of that period alluded to, namely, the answer which the doctors of Aberdeen gave to the Presbyterian ministers who came to desire them to sign the national covenant. They said they could not do it without a breach of their oath, to maintain episcopacy as by law established. To this it was answered by the Presbyterians, that there was nothing in the covenant against episcopacy, but that they might swear it without injuring their order.

Again, when the restoration took place, the Scottish nobility and gentry denied to restrain the power of the Presbyterian clergy, and whatever violences were committed during the reigns of the two royal brothers, yet this much is certain, that episcopacy, had it been properly conducted, was not then a grievance to the nation.

The third inquiry suggested by this article is, was episcopacy a grievance when the article was established in the claim of right? It is answered, it was not. So far from being a grievance, it was received by nine-tenths of the people. It is true, there were several court sycophants who were longing to enjoy the estates that had been set apart for the support of the bishops; and in the western counties many of the people were led by some Presbyterian ministers, who endeavoured to drive all things into a state of confusion. These men, who had nothing in view besides that of supporting their interests, and nourishing their pride, went all round the country endeavouring to influence the elections of members who were to compose the convention of estates at Edinburgh. There is no wonder that they should be able to procure a majority; for wherever they went they pulled down the houses of the episcopal clergy, turned them and their families out of doors, and stripped them of every thing that was valuable, setting fire on what they could not carry away.

The fourth question, is whether, supposing the affirmative included within the parenthesis, would that have been good and sufficient reason for the abolition of episcopacy?

The affirmatives are two, first, prelacy was an intolerable grievance, and, secondly, the Scots were reformed from Popery by Presbyters.

In answer to the first, namely, that it was an intolerable grievance, the fact has been already disproved; but that does not come within the limit of the argument. It is, whether the real existence of the grievance can vindicate the conduct of those who abolished episcopacy, or, in other words, whether such an assertion, included within a parenthesis, could with any propriety, make an article in the claim of rights?

The answer is obvious. It could not.

For, first, was not the Jewish institution under the Mosaic economy, a most intolerable grievance to the people, and yet they were obliged to submit to it, because it was the command of God? Secondly, when the Christian religion received a civil establishment, under the emperor Constantine the Great, the Heathen priests considered this as an intolerable grievance; but that did not invalidate the authenticity of the gospel. No civil establishment of religion can become an intolerable grievance, unless power is either abused or misapplied.

The second article within the parenthesis is, they were reformed from Popery by Presbyters. The contrary has been already proved; but we are to suppose the assertion to be true, and try its validity by the strength of reason.

Now it is well known, that in Scotland, the people were converted to the knowledge of Christ, by the ministry of some poor monks, who certainly had no ceremonial ordination at all, for this plain reason, there was no such thing as canonical ordination at that time in the world. Now, can it be inferred from this, that monks not ordained are always to govern the church of Scotland? Consider the absurdity; but this is not all.

Some nations in the eastern parts have been converted by Jesuits; but is this any reason that they should still govern them? Nay, if we pay any regard to ecclesiastical history, we may affirm, that some people were converted by the ministry of females; and for that reason must the churches in that country, or those countries, be now governed by women; the thought is absurd, and nothing less than the distraction of the times could have given countenance to it, so as to put it into a public claim, made by the people of Scotland, to have the whole form of their religion changed.

These arguments are not ours, but those of Mr. Sage, the learned author of the Fundamental Charter of Presbytery, and who was himself a Nonjuring minister. It is certain, that they carry a sort of conviction along with them; and it is equally certain, that the poor Nonjurors in Scotland suffered many cruel hardships during the reign of king William, and under the whig ministry in the beginning of the reign of queen Anne.

In 1711, an act passed by which the Nonjuring ministers were permitted to open meetings, upon condition of their reading the book of Common Prayer; and some of them complied with it. But the greatest part retained their ancient form of worship, which came nearer to the primitive plan than any of the Protestant churches whatever.

However, the gentry were fond of the English ceremonies, and the Nonjuring clergy were willing to comply, in order to procure a subsistence. Thus when the last rebellion broke out in Scotland, there were above three hundred of their meetings in that country, who all read the book of Common Prayer, only they omitted the name of the king, but prayed for the king in general, by whom they meant the pretender.

They are now dwindled away, and although there are still a great number of Episcopalians, in Scotland, yet they are mostly such as are well affected to government.

ACCOUNT OF THE PEOPLE CALLED METHODISTS.

THESE people are the most numerous at present of any sect that has sprung up since the revolution. That they have been much traduced is certain, but whether they deserve all the epithets that have been bestowed upon them, the reader may judge for himself. Some of their first founders are still alive, and one of them has written the following account of their principles. Dr. Johnson has justly observed, that every man is the best judge of his own opinions; and therefore we shall, in compliance with what the doctor says, lay before our readers those principles which they held in their own words.

1. "The distinguishing marks of a Methodist are not his opinions of any sort. His assenting to this or that scheme of religion, his embracing any particular set of notions, his espousing the judgment of one man or of another, are all quite wide of the point. Whosoever therefore imagines, that a Methodist is a man of such or such an opinion, is grossly ignorant of the whole affair: he mistakes the truth totally. We believe indeed, that all scripture is given by inspiration of God; and herein we are distinguished from Jews, Turks, and Infidels. We believe the written word of God to be the only and sufficient rule, both of Christian faith and practice; and herein we are fundamentally distinguished, from those of the Roman church. We believe Christ to be the eternal Supreme God; and herein we are distinguished from the Socinians and Arians. But as to all opinions which do not strike the root of Christianity, we think and let think. So that whatever they are, whether right or wrong, they are no distinguishing marks of a Methodist.

2. Neither are words or phrases of any sort. We do not place our religion, or any part of it, in being attached to any peculiar mode of speaking, any quaint or uncommon set of expressions. The most obvious, easy, common words, wherein our meaning can be conveyed, we prefer before others, both on ordinary occasions, and when we speak of the things of God. We never therefore willingly or designedly deviate from the most usual way of speaking; unless when we express scripture truths in scripture words (which we presume no Christian will condemn.) Neither do we affect to use any particular expressions of scripture, more frequently than others, unless they are such as are more frequently used by the inspired writers themselves. So that it is as gross an error, to place the marks of a Methodist in his words, as in opinions of any sort.

3. Nor do we desire to be distinguished by actions, customs or usages, of an indifferent nature. Our religion does not lie in doing what God hath not enjoined, or abstaining from what he hath not forbidden. It does not lie in the form of our apparel, in the posture of our body, or the covering of our heads; nor yet in abstaining from marriage, nor from meats or drinks which are all good if received with thanksgiving. Therefore neither will any man who knows whereof he affirms, fix the marks of a Methodist here; in any actions or customs purely indifferent, undetermined by the word of God.

4. Nor, lastly, is he to be distinguished by laying the whole stress of religion on any single part of it. If you say, "Yes, he is; for he thinks we are saved by faith." I answer you do not understand the terms. By salvation he means, holiness of heart and life. And this he affirms to spring from the faith alone. Can even a nominal Chris-can deny it? Is this placing a part of religion for the whole? Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid! Yea, we establish the law.—We do not place the whole of religion, as too many do, God knoweth, either in doing no harm, or in doing good, or in using the ordinances of God:—No, nor in all of them together; wherein we know, by experience, a man may labour many years, and at the end have no true religion at all, no more than he had at the beginning. Much less in any of these; or, it may be in a scrap of one of them: like her who fancies herself a virtuous woman, only because she is not a prostitute; or he who dreams he is an honest man, merely because he does not rob or steal. May the Lord God of my fathers preserve me from such a poor starved religion as this! Were this the mark of a Methodist, I would sooner chuse to be a sincere Jew, Turk, or Pagan.

5. What then is the mark? Who is a Methodist according to your own account? I answer: A Methodist is one, who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart, by the Holy Ghost given unto him: one who loves the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his mind, and with all his strength. God is the joy of his heart, and the desire of his soul; which is constantly crying out, “Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee! My God and my all! thou art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.”

6. He is therefore happy in God, yea always happy, as having in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life, and overflowing his soul with peace and joy. Perfect love having now cast out fear, he rejoices evermore. He rejoices in the Lord always, even in God his Saviour: and in the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom he hath now received the atonement. Having found redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of his sins, he cannot but rejoice, whenever he looks back on the horrible pit out of which he is delivered, when he sees all his transgressions blotted out as a cloud, and his iniquities as a thick cloud. He cannot but rejoice, whenever he looks on the state wherein he now is, being justified freely, and having peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.—For he that believeth hath the witness of this in himself: being now the Son of God by faith; because he is a son, God hath sent forth the spirit of his Son into his heart, crying out, Abba, Father!—And the Spirit itself beareth witness with his spirit, that he is a child of God. He rejoiceth also, whenever he looks forward in hope of the glory that shall be revealed; yea, this his joy is full, and all his bones cry out, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten me again to a living hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for me.

7. And he who hath this hope thus full of immortality in every thing giveth thanks; as knowing that this (whatsoever it is) is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning him. From him therefore he cheerfully receives all, saying, good is the will of the Lord; and whether the Lord giveth or taketh away, equally blessing the name of the Lord. For he hath learned in whatsoever state he is, therewith to be content. He knoweth both how to be abased, and how to abound. Every where, and in all things, he is instructed, both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound and suffer need. Whether in ease or pain, whether in sickness or health, whether in life or death, he giveth thanks from the ground of his heart to him who orders it for good: knowing that as every good gift cometh from above, so none but good can come from the Father of Light, into whose hands he has wholly committed his body and soul, as into the hands of a faithful creator. He is therefore careful (anxiously or uneasily careful), for nothing; as having cast all his care on him that careth for him, and in all things resting on him, after making his request known to him with thanksgiving.

8. For indeed he prays without ceasing. It is given him always to pray and not to faint. Not that he is always in the house of prayer; though he neglects no opportunity of being there. Neither is he always on his knees, although he often is, or on his face, before the Lord his God. Nor yet is he always crying aloud to God, or calling upon him in words. For many times the spirit maketh intercession for him with groans that cannot be uttered; but at all times the language of his heart is this, “Thou brightness of the eternal glory, unto thee is my mouth, though without a voice, and my silence speaketh unto thee.” And this is true prayer, the lifting up the heart to God. This is the essence of prayer, and this alone. But his heart is ever lifted up to God, at all times and in all places. In this he is never hindered, much less interrupted by any person or thing. In retirement or company, in leisure, business, or conversation, his heart is ever with the Lord. Whether he lie down, or rise up, God is in all his thoughts; he walks with God continually, having the loving eye of his mind still fixed upon him, and every where seeing him that is invisible.

9. And while he thus always exercises his love to God, by praying without ceasing, rejoicing evermore, and in every thing giving thanks, this commandment is written in his heart, that he who loveth God, loves his brother also. And he accordingly loves his neighbour as himself; he loves every man as his own soul. His heart is full of love to all markind, to every child of the Father of the spirits of all flesh. That a man is not personally known to him, is no bar to his love; no, nor that he is known to be such as he approves not, that he repays hatred for his good-will: for he loves his enemies, yea and the enemies of God, the evil and the unthankful: and if it be not in his power to do good to them that hate him, yet he ceases not to pray for them, though they continue to spurn his love, and still desperately use him and persecute him.

10. For he is pure in heart. The love of God has purified his heart from all revengeful passions, from envy, malice, and wrath, from every unkind temper, or malign affection. It hath cleansed him from pride and haughtiness of spirit, whereof alone cometh contention; and he hath now put on bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering; so that he forbears and forgives, if he had a quarrel against any, even as God in Christ hath forgiven him. And indeed all possible ground for contention, on his part is utterly cut off; for none can take from him what he desires, seeing he loves not the world, nor any of the things of the world, being now crucified to the world, and the world crucified to him; being dead to all that is in the world, both to the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life; for all his desire is unto God, and to the remembrance of his name.

11. Agreeable to this his one desire, is the one desire of his life, viz. not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. His one intention at all times, and in all things, is not to please himself, but him whom his soul loveth. He has a single eye; and because his eye is single, his whole body is full of light. Indeed, where the loving eye of the soul is continually fixed upon God there can be no darkness at all, but the whole is light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth enlighten the house. God then reigns alone. All that is in the soul is holiness to the Lord. There is not a motion in his heart but is according to his will.—Every thought that arises points to him, and is in obedience to the law of Christ.

12. And the tree is known by its fruits; for as he loves God, so he keeps his commandments; not only some, or most of them, but all, from the least to the greatest. He is not content to keep the whole law, and offend in one point, but has in all points a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man. Whatever God has forbidden, he avoids; hath enjoyed, he doth; and that whether it be little or great, hard or easy, joyous or grievous to the flesh. He runs the ways of God's commandments, now he hath set his heart at liberty. It is his glory so to do; it is his daily crown of rejoicing; to do the will of God on earth, as it is done in heaven; knowing it is the highest privilege of the angels of God, of those that excel in strength, to fulfil his commandments, and hearken to the voice of his word.

13. All the commandments of God he accordingly keeps, and that with all his might; for his obedience is in proportion to his love, the source from whence it flows; and therefore, loving God with all his heart, he serves him with all his strength. He continually presents his soul and body a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God; entirely and without reserve devoting himself, all he has, and all he is, to his glory. All the talents he has received he constantly employs, according to his master's will; every power and faculty of his soul, every member of his body. Once he yielded them unto sin and the devil, as instruments of unrighteousness; but now, being alive from the dead, he yields them all, as instruments of righteousness, unto God.

14. By consequence, whatsoever he doth, it is all to the glory of God. In all his employments of every kind, he not only aims at this (which is implied in having a single eye) but actually attains it. His business and refreshments, as well as his prayers, all serve to this great end. Whether he sit in his house or walk by the way, whether he lie down or rise up he is promoting in all he speaks or does, the one business of his life: whether he put on his apparel, or labour, or eat and drink, or divert himself from too wasting labour, it all tends to advance the glory of God, by peace and good-will among men. His one invariable rule is this, whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do it all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the father by him.

15. Nor do the customs of the world at all hinder his running the race that is set before him. He knows that vice does not lose its nature, though it becomes ever so fashionable; and remembers, that every man is to give an account of himself to God. He cannot, therefore, even follow a multitude to do evil. He cannot fare sumptuously every day, or make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof. He cannot lay up treasures upon earth, no more than he can take fire into his bosom. He cannot adorn himself (on any pretence) with gold or costly apparel; he cannot join in, or countenance any diversion which has the least tendency to vice of any kind. He cannot speak evil of his neighbour, no more than he can lie, either for God or man. He cannot utter an unkind word of any one; for love keeps the door of his lips. He cannot speak idle words; no corrupt communication ever comes out of his mouth, as is all that which is not good, to the use of edifying, not fit to minister grace to the hearers. But whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are justly of good report, he thinks, and speaks, and acts, adorning the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ in all things.

16. Lastly, as he has time he does good unto all men; unto neighbours and strangers, friends and enemies; and that in every possible kind, not only to their bodies, by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting those that are sick and in prison; but much more does he labour to do good to their souls, as of the ability which God giveth to awaken those that sleep in death; to bring those who are awakened to the atoning blood, that, being justified by faith, they may have peace with God, and to provoke those who have peace with God to abound more in love and in good works; and he is willing to spend and be spent herein, even to be offered up on the sacrifice and service of their faith, so they may all come unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

17. These are the principals and practices of our sect; these are the marks of a true Methodist. By these alone do those who are in derision so called, desire to be distinguished from other men. If any man say, "Why these are only the common, fundamental principles of Christianity!" Thou hast said: so I mean; this is the very truth; I know they are no other, and I would to God both thou and all men knew, and walked by the common principles of Christianity. The plain, old Christianity that I teach, renouncing and detesting all other marks of distinction; and whosoever is what I preach (let him be called what he will, for names change not the nature of things), he is a Christian, not in name only, but in heart and in life. He is inwardly and outwardly conformed to the will of God, as revealed in the written word. He thinks, speaks, and lives according to the method laid down in the revelation of Jesus Christ. His soul is renewed after the image of God, in righteousness and in all true holiness, and having the mind that was in Christ, he so walks as Christ also walked.

18. By these works, by these marks of a living faith, do we labour to distinguish ourselves from the unbelieving world; from all those whose minds and lives are not according to the gospel of Christ. But from real Christians, of whatsoever denomination they be, we earnestly desire not to be distinguished at all; nor from any who sincerely follow after what they know they have not attained. No: whoever doth the will of my father who is in heaven, the same is my brother, sister, and mother. And I beseech you brethren, by the mercies of God, that we be in no wise divided among ourselves.

Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thine? I ask no farther questions. If it be, give me thy hand. For opinions or tenets let us not destroy the work of God. Dost thou love and serve God? It is enough. I give thee the right hand of fellowship. If there can be any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the spirit, if any bowels of mercies, let us strive together for the faith of the gospel, walking worthy of the vocation wherewith we were called, with all lowliness and weakness, with long suffering, forbearing one another with love, endeavouring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Let us remember there is one body and one spirit, even as we are called with one hope of our calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and father of all.

Such is the character of a Methodist, as drawn up by the late reverend Mr. John Wesley. His character, both as a preacher and a writer, are so well known throughout every part of the British dominions, that it is needless to enlarge upon either in this place.

Of the principles of the Methodists.

Although we may have occasion afterwards to treat of some persons called Methodists, who differ much from the followers of Mr. Wesley, yet we considered it as most proper to treat of the latter first because they are the most ancient as well as the most numerous.

We shall therefore lay before the reader those principles which every follower of Mr. Wesley professes to hold, in his own words.

And first, of justification by faith.

"I believe justification by faith alone; for I am firmly persuaded, that every man of the offspring of Adam is very far gone from original righteousness, and is, of his own nature, inclined to evil. That this corruption of our nature in every person born into the world, deserves God's wrath and damnation. That therefore, if ever we receive the remission of our sins and are accounted righteous before God, it must be only for the merits of Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings of any kind.

Nay, I am persuaded, that all works done before justification, have in them the nature of sin; and that, consequently, till he is justified, a man has no power to do any work pleasing and acceptable to God.

I believe three things must go together in our justification. On God's part, his great mercy and grace; upon Christ's part, the satisfaction of God's justice, by the offering his body, and shedding his blood, and fulfilling the law of God perfectly; and upon our part, true and living faith in the merits of Jesus Christ. So that in our justification there is not only God's mercy and grace, but his justice also. And so the grace of God does not shut out the righteousness of Christ in our justification, but only shuts out the righteousness of man; that is, the righteousness of our works; and therefore the apostle St. Paul requires nothing on the part of man, but only a true and living faith; yet this faith does not shut out repentance, hope, and love, which are joined with faith in every one that is justified, but it shuts them out from the office of justifying; so that although they are all present in him that is justified, yet they justify not all together.

Neither does faith shut out good works necessarily to be done afterwards; but we may not do them to this intent totally to be justified by doing them. Our justification comes freely of the mercy of God: for whereas all the world are not able to pay any part towards their ransom, it pleased him, without any of our deserving, to prepare for us Christ's body and blood, whereby our ransom might be paid, his law fulfilled, and his justice satisfied.— Christ therefore is now the righteousness of all them that truly believe in him. He for them paid the ransom by his death. He for them fulfilled the law in his life. So that now in him, and by him, every believer may be called a fulfiller of the law.

But let it be observed, the true sense of those words, "we are justified by faith in Christ only," is not, that this our own act, to believe in Christ, or this our faith which is within us, justifies us (for that were to account ourselves justified by some act of virtue that is within us); but that, although we have faith, hope, and love within us, and do never so many good works, yet we must renounce the merit of all, of faith, hope, love, and all other virtues and good works, which we either have done, shall do, or can do, as far too weak to procure our justification: for which therefore we must trust only in God's mercy, and the merits of Christ.— For it is he alone that taketh away our sins. To him alone are we to go for this; forsaking all our virtues, good words, thoughts, and works, and putting our trust in Christ only.

In strictness therefore, neither our faith nor our works justify us, that is, deserve the remission of our sins; but God himself justifies us, of his own mercy, through the merits of his Son only. Nevertheless, because by faith we embrace the promise of God's mercy, and of the remission of our sins, therefore the scripture says, that faith doth justify, yea, faith without works. And as it is all one to say, faith without works, and faith alone justifies us, therefore the ancient fathers from time to time speak thus: Faith alone justifies us. And because we receive faith through the only merits of Jesus Christ, and not through the merit of any virtue we have, or work we do; therefore in that respect we renounce, as it were again, faith, works, and all other virtues. For our corruption through original sin is so great, that all our faith, charity, words and works, cannot merit or deserve any part of our justification for us: and therefore we thus speak, humbling ourselves before God and giving Christ all the glory of our justification. But it should also be observed, what that faith is whereby we are justified. Now that faith which brings not forth good works, is not a living faith, but a dead and devilish one. For even the devils believe, that Christ was born of a virgin, that he wrought all kind of miracles, declaring himself to be very God; that for our sakes he died and rose again, and ascended into heaven, and at the end of the world he shall come again, to judge the quick and the dead. This the devils believe, and so they believe all that is written in the Old and New Testament; and yet still, for all this faith, they are but devils. They remain still in their damnable estate, lacking the true Christian faith.

The true Christian faith is, not only to believe the holy scriptures and articles of our faith are true, but also to have a sure trust and confidence to be saved from everlasting damnation by Christ, whereof doth follow a loving heart, to obey his commandments. And this faith neither any devil hath nor any wicked man. No ungodly man hath or can have this sure trust and confidence in God, that by the merits of Christ his sins are forgiven, and be reconciled to the favour of God.

Of Christian Perfection.

"Perhaps the general prejudice against Christian perfection may chiefly arise from a misapprehension of the nature of it. We willingly allow, and continually declare, there is no perfection, in this life, as implies a dispensation from doing good, and attending all the ordinances of God; or a freedom from ignorance, mistake, temptation, and a thousand infirmities necessarily connected with flesh and blood.

First, we not only allow, but earnestly contend, as for the faith once delivered to the saints, that there is no such perfection in this life, as implies any dispensation from attending all the ordinances of God or from doing good unto all men while we have time, though especially unto the household of faith. And whosoever they are who have taught otherwise, we are convinced are not taught of God. We dare not receive them, neither bid them good speed, lest we be partakers of their evil deeds. We believe that not only the babes in Christ, who have newly found redemption in his blood, but those also, who are grown up to perfect men, unto the measure of the fulness of Christ, are indispensably obliged and that they are obliged thereto is their glory and crown of rejoicing, as oft as they have opportunity to eat bread, and drink wine, in remembrance of him; to search the scriptures; by fasting, as well as temperance, to keep their bodies under, and bring them into subjection; and above all, to pour out their souls in prayer, both secretly and in the great congregation.

We secondly believe, and therefore speak, and that unto all men, and with much assurance, that there is no such perfection in this life, as implies an entire deliverance, either from ignorance or mistake in things not essential to salvation, or from manifold temptations, or from numberless infirmities, wherewith the corruptible body; more or less, presses down the soul. This is the same thing which we have spoken from the beginning; if any teach otherwise, they are not of us. We cannot find any ground in scripture to suppose, that any inhabitant of an house of clay is wholly exempt either from bodily infirmities, or from ignorance of many things; or to imagine any mere man is incapable of mistake, or of falling into divers temptations: No; the servant is not above his master, nor the disciple above his Lord.

It is enough that every one who is perfect shall be as his master. But what then, it may be asked, do you mean by one that is perfect, or one that is as his master? We mean, one in whom is the mind which was in Christ, and who walketh as he also walked; a man that hath clean hands and a pure heart; or that is cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit: one in whom there is no occasion of stumbling, and who accordingly doth not commit sin. To define this a little more particularly, we understand by that scriptural expression a perfect man, one in whom God hath fulfilled his faithful word, "From all your iniquities and from all your idols will I cleanse you. I will also save you from all your uncleanness." We understand hereby, one whom God hath sanctified throughout, even in body, soul, and spirit: one who walketh in the light, as he is in the light, in whom is no darkness at all; the blood of Jesus Christ his son having cleansed him from all sin.

This man can now testify to all mankind, I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me. He is holy, as God who hath called him is holy, both in heart and in all manner of conversation. He loveth the Lord his God with all his heart, and serveth him with all his strength. He loveth his neighbour, every man, as himself; yea, as Christ loved us: them in particular that despitefully use him and persecute him, because they know not the Son, neither the Father.—Indeed his soul is all love, filled with bowels of mercies, kindness, meekness, gentleness, long-suffering. And his life agreeth thereto, full of the work of faith, the patience of hope, the labour of love: and whatsoever he doth either in word or deed, he doth it all in the name, in the love and power of the Lord Jesus. In a word, he doth the will of God on earth, as it is done in heaven.

This it is to be a perfect man, to be sanctified throughout, created anew in Christ Jesus; even to have a heart so all-flaming with the love of God, to use archbishop Usher's words, as continually to offer up every thought, word, and work, as a spiritual sacrifice, acceptable unto God through Christ. In every thought of our hearts, in every word of our tongues, in every work of our hands, to shew forth his praise, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light! O that both we, and all who seek the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, may thus be made perfect in one!

If there be any thing unscriptural in these words any thing wild or extravagant, any thing contrary to the analogy of faith, or the experience of adult Christians, let them smite me friendly and reprove me; let them impart to me of the clearer light God has given them. How knowest thou, O man, but thou mayest gain thy brother? but he may at length come to the knowledge of the truth? and thy labour of love, shewn forth with meekness of wisdom, may not be in vain?

Of the Assurance of Justification.

"I believe that conversion, meaning thereby justification, is an instantaneous work; and the moment a man has living faith in Christ, he is converted or justified; which faith he cannot have, without knowing he has it.

I believe the moment a man is justified, he has peace with God: which he cannot have, without knowing that he has it.

The first sense of forgiveness is often mixed with doubt or fear: but the full assurance of faith excludes all doubt and fear, as the very term implies.

Of the Conditions of Justification.

"I believe every man is penitent before he is justified; he repents, before he believes the gospel. But it is never before, and generally long after he is justified, that Christ is formed in him; and that this penitence and contrition is the work of the Holy Ghost.

Yet I believe that all this is nothing towards, and has no influence on our justification.

Again, I believe that in order to obtain justification I must go straight to Christ, with all my ungodliness, and plead nothing else.

Yet I believe we should not insist upon any thing we do or feel, as if it were necessarily previous to justification. No, nor on any thing else."

Of the Effects of Justification.

"I believe a man may have a strong assurance if he is justified, and not be able to affirm he is a child of God.

A man may be fully assured that his sins are forgiven, yet may not be able to tell the day when he received this full assurance; because it grew up in him by degrees.

A man may have a weak faith, at the same time that he has peace with God, and no unholy desires.

A man may be justified who has not a clean heart, neither the indwelling of the spirit."

To sum up the whole, Mr. Wesley desires not a more consistent account of his principles than the following words:

"Our spiritual state should be considered, and distinctly, under each of these views.

1. Before justification; in which state we may be said to be unable to do any thing acceptable to God: because then we can do nothing but come to Christ which ought not to be considered as doing any thing, but as supplicating, or waiting to receive a power of doing for the time to come. For the preventing grace of God, which is common to all, is sufficient to bring us to Christ, though it is not sufficient to carry us any further till we are justified.

2. After justification. The moment a man comes to Christ by faith, he is justified, and born again: that is, he is born again in the imperfect sense, for there are two, if not more, degrees of regeneration; and he has power over all the stirrings and motions of sin, but not a total freedom from them. He has Christ with him, but not Christ in him. Therefore he hath not yet, in the full and proper sense, a new and clean heart, or the indwelling of the spirit.— But being exposed to various temptations, he may, and will fall again from this condition, if he doth not attain to a more excellent gift.

3. Sanctification; the last and highest state of perfection in this life. For then are the faithful born again in the full and perfect sense. Then have they the indwelling of the spirit. Then is there given unto them a new and clean heart, and the struggle between the old and new man is over."

Mr. Wesley in "An earnest Appeal to men of Reason and Religion," thus further expresses himself in regard to the principles of the Methodists:

"Although it is with us a very small thing to be judged of you or of man's judgment, seeing we know God will make our innocency clear as the light, and our just dealing as the noon-day; yet are we ready to give any that are willing to hear, a plain account both of our principles and actions; as having renounced the hidden things of shame, and desiring nothing more, than by manifestation of the truth to commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

We see, and who does not, the numberless follies and miseries of our fellow-creature. We see on every side, either men of no religion at all, or men of a lifeless formal religion. We are grieved at the sight, and should greatly rejoice, if by any means we might convince some, that there is a better religion to be attained, a religion worthy of God that gave it. And this we conceive to be no other than love; the love of God and of all mankind; the loving God with all our heart, and soul, and strength, as having first loved us, as the fountain of all the good we have received, and of all we ever hope to enjoy; and the loving every soul which God hath made, every man on earth, as our own soul.

This love we believe to be the medicine of life, the never failing remedy, for all the evils of a disordered world, for all the miseries and vices of men. Wherever this is, there are virtue and happiness going hand in hand. There is humbleness of mind, gentleness, long-suffering, the whole image of God, and at the same time a peace that passeth all understanding, and joy unspeakable and full of glory.

This religion we long to see established in the world, a religion of love, and joy, and peace, having its seat in the heart, in the inmost soul, but ever shewing itself, by its fruits, continually springing forth, not only in all innocence, for love worketh no ill to his neighbour, but in every kind of beneficence spreading virtue and happiness round it.

This religion have we been following after for many years, as many know if they would testify; but all this time, seeking wisdom we found it not; we were spending our strength in vain. And being now under full conviction of this, we declare it to all mankind: for we desire not that others should wander out of the way, as we have done before them; but rather that they may profit by our loss, that they may go, though we did not, having then no man to guide us, the straight way to the religion of love, even by faith.

Now faith, supposing the scripture to be of God, is the demonstrative evidence of things unseen, the supernatural evidence of things invisible, not perceivable by eyes of flesh or by any of our natural senses or faculties. Faith is that divine evidence whereby the spiritual man discerneth God and the things of God. It is with regard to the spiritual world, what sense is with regard to the natural. It is the spiritual situation of every soul that is born of God.

Perhaps you have not considered it in this point of view, therefore I will explain it to you a little farther.

Faith, according to the scripture account, is the eye of the new-born soul. Hereby every true believer in God, seeth him who is invisible. Hereby, in a more peculiar manner, true life and immortality have been brought to light by the gospel; he seeth the light of the glorious gospel of God in Christ Jesus, and beholdeth that manner of love it is which the father hath bestowed upon us, that we, who are born of the spirit, should be called the sons of God.

It is the ear of the soul, whereby a sinner hears the voice of the son of God and lives; even that voice alone which awakes the dead, and says, son thy sins are forgiven thee.

It is the palate of the soul, if I may be allowed the expression; for hereby a believer tastes the good world, and the powers of the world to come; and hereby he both tastes and sees that God is gracious and merciful to him as a sinner.

It is the feeling of the soul whereby a believer perceives, through the power of the highest overshadowing him, both the existence and the presence of him, in whom he lives, moves, and has his being; and indeed, the whole invisible world, the entire system of things eternal. And hereby in particular, he feels the love of God shed abroad in his heart.

By this faith we are saved from all uneasiness of mind, from the anguish of a wounded spirit, from discontent, from fear and sorrow of heart, and from that inexpressible lothness and weariness both of the world, which we had so helplessly laboured under for many years; especially when we were out of the hurry of the world, and sunk into calm reflection. In this we find that love of God, and of all mankind, which we had elsewhere sought in vain. This we know and feel, (and therefore cannot but declare) saves every one that partakes of it, both from sin and misery, from every unhappy and every melancholy temper.

If you ask, "Why then have not all men this faith? all at least, who conceive it to be so happy a thing? Why do they not believe immediately?"

We answer according to scripture, it is the gift of God. No man is able to work it in himself. It is the work of omnipotence. It requires no less power thus to quicken a dead soul, than to raise a body that lies in the grave.

It is a new creation, and none can create a soul anew, but he who at first created the heavens and the earth.

May not your own experience teach you this? Can you give yourself this faith? Is it now in your power to see, or hear, or taste, or feel God? Have you already, or can you raise in yourself susception of God, or of an invisible world? I suppose you do not deny that there is an invisible world? Now is there any power in your soul whereby you discern therein him that created you? Or can all your wisdom and strength open an intercourse between yourself and the world of spirits? Is it in your power to burst the veil that is on your hearts, and let in the light of eternity? You know it is not. You not only do not, but cannot, by your own strength, thus believe. The more you labour so to do, the more you will be convinced it is the gift of God.

It is the free gift of God not on those who are worthy of his favour, not on such as are previously holy, and so far to be crowned with all the blessings of his goodness, but on the ungodly and unholy; or on those who, till that hour, were fit only for everlasting destruction; those in whom was no good thing, and whose only plea was, God be merciful to me a sinner. No merit, no goodness in man, precedes the foregoing love of God. His pardoning mercy supposes nothing in us but a scene of want, sin and misery. And to all who see, feel, and own their wants, and their utter unbelief to remove them; God freely gives faith to remove them, for the sake of him in whom he is well pleased.

This is a short plain sketch of the doctrine we teach: These are our fundamental principles, and we spend our lives in confirming others therein, and in a behaviour suitable to them."

After a great deal of shrewd and pertinent reasoning, he goes on to vindicate those doctrines in a manner peculiar to himself.

"Perhaps (says he) the first thing that occurs to your mind at present, relates to the doctrines which we teach. You have heard that we say, "men may live without sin;" and have you not heard that the scriptures say the same? Does not St. Paul plainly say, that those who believe do not continue in sin: that they cannot live any longer therein? Rom. vi. 12. Does not St. Peter say, he that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin? That he should no longer live to the desires of men, but to the will of God, 1 Peter iv. 1, 2. And does not St. John say more expressly, he that committeth sin is of the devil: For this purpose, the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot commit sin, because he is born of God, 1 John iii. 8. And again, we know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not, ch. v. 18.

You see then it is not we that say this, but the Lord. These are not our words, but his. And who is he that replieth against God? Who is able to make God a liar? Surely he will be justified in his saying, and cleared when he is judged. Can you deny it? Have you not often felt a secret check when you was contradicting this truth? And how often have you wished what you was taught to deny? Nay, can you help wishing for it at this moment? Do you not now earnestly desire to cease from sin, to commit it no more? Does not your soul pant after this glorious liberty of the sons of God? And what strong reason have you to expect it? Have you not had a poof of it already? Do you not remember the time when God first lifted up the light of his countenance upon you? Can it ever be forgotten, the day when the candle of the Lord first shone upon your head? You then had power not to commit sin. You found the apostle's words strictly true. He that is begotten of God purifieth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

But those whom you took to be experienced Christians, told you this was the only time of your espousals, this could not last for ever, you must come down the mount, and the like, which shocked your faith.

You looked at men more than God, and so became weak like another man, whereas, had you then had any to guide you according to the truth of God, had you then believed the doctrine you now blame, you had never fallen from your steadfastness; but had found that in this sense also, the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

Have you another objection nearly allied to this, namely, that we preach perfection? The term you cannot object to, because it is scriptural. All the difficulty is to fix the meaning of it according to the word of God. And this we have done again and again, declaring to all the world, that Christian perfection does not imply an exemption from ignorance, or mistake, or infirmities, or temptations; but that it does imply the being so crucified with Christ, as to be able to testify, I live not, but Christ liveth in me, and hath purified my heart by faith, Acts xv. 9. It does imply the casting down every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. It does imply the being holy, as he that hath called us is holy in all manner of conversation; and, in a word, the loving the Lord our God with all our heart, and serving him with all our strength.

Now, is it possible for any who believes the scripture to deny one tittle of this? You cannot: you dare not: you would not for the world; you know it is the pure word of God: and this is the whole of what we preach: this is the height and depth of what we, with St. Paul, call perfection: a state of soul devoutly to be wished for by all who have tasted of the love of God. O pray for it without ceasing; it is the one thing you want. Come with boldness to the throne of grace, and be assured, that when you ask this of God, you shall have the petition you ask of him. We know indeed, that to man, to the natural man, this is impossible; but we know also, that as no work is impossible with God, so all things are possible to him that believeth.

For we are saved by faith. But have not you heard this urged as another objection against us, that we preach salvation by faith alone? And does not St. Paul do the same thing? By grace, saith he, ye are saved through faith. Can any words be more express? And elsewhere, Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, Acts xvi. 31.

What we mean by this, if it has not been sufficiently explained already, is that we are saved from our sins, only by a confidence in the love of God. As soon as we behold what manner of love it is which the Father has bestowed upon us, we love him, as the apostle observes, because he first loved us; and then is that commandment written in your heart, that he who loveth God loveth his brother also: from which love of God and man, meekness, humbleness of mind, and all holy tempers spring. Now these are the very essence of salvation, of Christian salvation, salvation from sin; and from these, outward salvation flows, that is, holiness of life and conversation. Well, and are not these things so? If you know in whom you have believed, you need no further witnesses.

But perhaps you doubt, whether that faith whereby we are thus saved, implies such a trust and confidence in God as we describe. "You cannot think faith implies assurance; an assurance of the love of God to our souls, of his being now reconciled to us, and having forgiven all our sins." And this we freely confess, that if number of voices is to decide the question we must give it up at once; for you have on your side, not only some who desire to be Christians in deed, but all nominal Christians in every place, and the Romish church, one and all. Nay, these last are so vehement in your defence, that in the famed council of Trent, they have decreed, "If any man hold trust, confidence or assurance of pardon, to be essential to faith, let him be accursed."

Thus does that council anathematise the church of England, for she is convicted thereof by her own confession. The very words in the homily on salvation are, "Even the devils believe that Christ was born of a virgin; that he wrought all kind of miracles, declaring himself very God; that for our sakes he suffered a most painful death, to redeem us from death everlasting. These articles of our faith the devils believe; and so they believe all that was written in the Old and New Testament; and yet, for all this faith, they are but devils. They remain still in their damnable estate, lacking the true Christian faith."

The right and true Christian faith is, not only to believe the holy scriptures and the articles of our faith are true, but also to have a sure trust and confidence to be saved from everlasting damnation through Christ: or, as it is expressed a little after, "a sure trust and confidence which a man hath in God, that by the merits of Christ his sins are forgiven, and he reconciled to the favour of God."

Indeed the bishop of Rome saith, "If any man hold this, let him be an Anathema Maranatha." But it is to be hoped papal anathemas do not move you. You are a member of the church of England. Are you? Then the controversy is at an end. Then hear the church. Faith is a sure trust which a man hath in God, that his sins are forgiven. Or if you are not, whether you hear our church or no, at least hear the scriptures. Hear believing Job declaring his faith, I know that my redeemer liveth. Hear Thomas, when having seen he believed, crying out, my Lord and my God. Hear St. Paul clearly describing the nature of his faith, The life I now live, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. Hear, to mention no more, all the believers who were with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians, bearing witness, We give thanks unto the Father, who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear son; in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.

But what need have we of distant witnesses? You have witness in your own breast. For am I now speaking to one that loves God? How came you then to love him at first? Was it not because you knew that he loved you; Did you, could you love God at all, till you tasted and saw that he was gracious? that he was merciful to you a sinner? What avails then controversy or strife of words? out of thine own mouth? You own you had no love to God, till you was sensible of his to you. And whatever expressions any sinner who loves God uses to denote God's love to him, you will always, upon examination, find, that they directly or indirectly imply forgiveness. Pardonning love is still at the root of all. He who was offended is now reconciled. The new song which God puts in every mouth, is always to that effect, O Lord I will praise thee: though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away. Behold, God is my salvation. I will trust and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song: he is also become my salvation, Isa. xii. 1, 2.

A confidence then in a pardoning God is essential to true faith. The forgiveness of sins is one of the first of those unseen things, whereof faith is the evidence. And if you are sensible of this, will you quarrel with us concerning an indifferent circumstance of it? Will you think it an important objection that we assert, that this faith is usually given in a moment? First, let me intreat you to read over that authentic account of God's dealings with men, the Acts of the Apostles. In this treatise you will find, how he wrought from the beginning on those who received remission of sins by faith. And can you find one of these (except perhaps St. Paul) who did not receive it in a moment? But abundance you find of those who did, besides Cornelius and the three thousand. And to this also agrees the experience of those who now receive the heavenly gift. Three or four exceptions only have I found in the course of several years. Perhaps you yourself may be added to that number, and one or two more whom you have known. But all the rest of those, who from time to time among us have believed in the Lord Jesus, were in a moment brought from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

And why should it seem a thing incredible to you who have known the power of God unto salvation, whether he hath wrought this in your soul or no, for there are diversities of operations by the same spirit, that the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God, and in that moment live? Thus he useth to act, to shew, that when he will, to do is present with him. Let there be light, said God, and there was light. He spake the word, and it was done. Thus the heavens and the earth were created, and all the hosts of them. And this manner of acting in the present case, highly suits both his power and love. There is therefore no hindrance on God's part: since, as his majesty is, so is his mercy: and whatever hindrance there is on the part of man, when God speaketh, it is not. Only ask then, O sinner, and it shall be given thee, even the faith that brings salvation; and that without any merit or good work of thine; for it is not of works, let any man should boast. No, it is of grace, of grace alone; for unto him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the nudgedly, his faith is counted to him for righteousness.

“But by talking thus you encourage sinners.” I do encourage them, to repent; and do not you? Do you not know how many heap sin upon sin, purely for want of such encouragement? Because they think “they can never be forgiven, there is no place for repentance left.” Does not your heart also bleed for them? What would you think too dear to part with? What would you not do, what would you not suffer, to bring one such sinner to repentance?—Could not your love endure all things for them? Yes, if you believed it would do them good, if you had any hope they would ever be better. Why do you believe it would do them good? Why have you not a hope that they will be better? Plainly because you do not love them enough; because you have not that charity which not only endureth, but at the same time believeth and hopeth all things.

“You still think we are secretly undermining, if not openly destroying the church.” What do you mean by the church? A visible church, as our article defines it, is a company of faithful, or believing people, believing in the truth. This is the essence of a church; and the properties thereof are as they are described in the words that follow, and the pure word of God be preached therein, and the sacraments duly administered. Now then, according to this authentic account, what is the church of England? What is it indeed, but the faithful people, the true believers of England? It is true, if these are scattered abroad, they come under another consideration. But when they are visibly joined, by assembling together to hear the pure word of God preached, and to eat of one bread, and drink of one cup, they are then properly the visible church of England.

It were well if this were a little more considered by those who so vehemently cry out, The church! the church! as those of old: The temple of the Lord! the temple of the Lord! not knowing what they speak, nor whereof they affirm. A provincial or national church, according to our articles is, the true believers of that province or nation. If these are dispersed up and down, they are only a part of the invisible church of Christ; but if they are visibly joined by assembling together to hear of his word, and partake of his supper, they are then a visible church, such as the church of England, France, or any other.

This being premised, I ask, how do we undermine or destroy the church, the provincial visible church of England? The article mentions three things as essential to a visible church: 1st, Living faith, without which, indeed, there can be no church at all, neither visible nor invisible. 2dly, Preaching, and consequently hearing, the pure word of God, else that faith would languish and die. And 3dly, A due administration of the sacraments, the ordinary means whereby God increaseth faith. Now come close to the question: in which of these points do we undermine or destroy the church?

Do we shut the door of faith? do we lessen the number of believing people in England? Only remember what faith is, according to our homilies, viz. “a sure trust and confidence in God, that through the merits of Christ my sins are forgiven, and I am reconciled to the favour of God,” and we appeal to all mankind, do we destroy this faith, which is the life and soul of the church? Is there, in fact, less of this faith in England than there was before we went forth? I think this is an assertion which the father of lies himself will scarce dare to utter or maintain.

With regard then to this first point, it is undeniable, we neither undermine nor destroy the church. The second thing is, the preaching and hearing the pure word of God. And do we hinder this? Do we hinder any minister from preaching the pure word of God? If any preach not at all, or not the pure word of God, is the hindrance in us or in themselves? Or do we lessen the number of those that hear the pure word of God? Are then the hearers thereof, whether read or preached, fewer than were in times past? Are the usual places of worship less frequented by means of our preaching? Whosoever our lot has been cast for any time, are the churches emptier than they were before? Surely none that has any regard left either for truth or modesty, will say, that in this point we are enemies to, or destroyers of, the church.

The third thing requisite, if not to the being, at least to the well-being of a church, is the due administration of the sacraments, particularly that of the Lord's Supper. And are we, in this respect, underminers or destroyers of the church? Do we either by our example or advice draw men away from the Lord's table? Where we have laboured most, are there the fewest communicants? How does the fact stand in London, Bristol, Newcastle? O that you would no longer shut your eyes against the broad light, which encompasses you on every side.

I believe you are sensible by this time, not only how weak this objection is, but likewise how easy it would be, terribly to retort every branch of it upon most of those that make it; whether we speak of true living faith, of preaching the pure word of God, or of the due administration of the sacraments, both of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. But I spare you. It sufficeth that our God knoweth, and will make manifest, in that day, whether it be by reason of us or you that men abhor the offering of the Lord.

Others object, "that we do not observe the laws of the church, and thereby undermine it." What laws? The rubrics or canons. In every parish where I have been curate yet, I have observed the rubrics with a scrupulous exactness, not for wrath, but for conscience sake: and this, so far as belongs to an unbeneficed minister, or to a private member of the church, I do now. I will just mention a few of them, and leave you to consider which of us has observed, or does observe them most.

1. Days of fasting or abstinence to be observed:

The forty days of Lent.

The Ember-days at the four seasons.

The three rogation days.

All Fridays in the year, except Christmas-day.

2. So many as intend to be partakers of the holy communion, shall signify their names to the curate, at least some time the day before.

And if any of these be an open and notorious evil liver, the curate shall advertise him, that in any wise he presume not to come to the Lord's table until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented.

3. Then, after the Nicene creed, the curate shall declare unto the people what holy-days or fasting-days are in the week following to be observed.

4. The minister shall first receive the communion in both kinds himself, and then proceed to deliver the same to the bishops, priests and deacons, in like manner, if any be present, and after that to the people.

5. In cathedral and collegiate churches, and colleges, where there are many priests and deacons, they shall always receive the communion with the priest, every Sunday at the least.

6. The children to be baptized must be ready at the font, immediately after the last lesson.

7. The curates of every parish shall warn the people, that, without great necessity, they procure not their children to be baptized at home in their houses.

8. The curate of every parish shall diligently, upon Sundays and holy days, after the second lesson at evening prayer, openly in the church, instruct and examine so many children as he shall think convenient in some part of the Catechism.

9. Whensoever the bishop shall give notice for children to be brought unto him for their confirmation, the curate of every parish shall either bring or send in writing, with his hand subscribed thereunto, the names of all such persons within his parish as he shall think fit to be presented to the bishop.

Now the question is not, Whether these rubrics ought to be observed (you take this for granted in making the objection), but whether in fact they have been observed, by you or me most, many can witness. I have observed them punctually, yea sometimes at the hazard of my life: and as many, I fear, that you have not observed them at all, and that several of them you never pretended to observe. And is it you that are accusing me, for not observing the rubrics of the church? What grimace is this! "O tell it not in Gath! publish it not in the streets of Askelon!"

With regard to the canons, I would in the first place desire you to consider two or three plain questions.

1st, Have you ever read them over.

2dly, How can these be called "the canons of the church of England?" seeing they were never legally established by the church, never regularly confirmed in full convocation?

3dly, By what right am I required to observe such canons as were never legally established?

And then I will join issue with you in one question more, viz. Whether you or I have observed them most?

To instance only a few.

Can. 29. No person shall be admitted god-father or god-mother to any child before the said person hath received the holy communion.

Can. 59. Every parson, vicar, or curate, upon every Sunday and holy-day, before evening prayer, shall, for half an hour, or more, examine and instruct the youth, and ignorant persons of his parish.

Can. 64. Every parson, vicar, or curate, shall declare to the people every Sunday, whether there be any holy-days or fasting-days the week following.

Can. 68. No minister shall refuse or delay to christen any child that is brought to the church to him on Sundays, or holy-days to be christened, or to bury any corps that is brought to the church or church-yard.

N. B. Inability to pay fees does not alter the case.

Can. 75. No ecclesiastical persons shall spend their time idly, by day or by night, playing at dice, cards, or tables.

Now, let the clergyman who has observed only these five canons for one year last past, and who has read over all the canons in his congregation, as the king's ratification straitly enjoins him to do once every year, let him, I say, cast the first stone at us, for not observing the canon so called of the church of England.

However, we cannot be, it is said, friends to the church, because we do not obey the governors of it, and submit ourselves, as at our ordination we promised to do, to all their godly admonitions and injunctions. I answer, in every individual point of an indifferent nature. We do and will, by the grace of God, obey the governors of the church: but the testifying the gospel of the grace of God, is not a point of an indifferent nature. The ministry which we have received of the Lord Jesus, we are at all hazards to fulfil. It is the burthen of the Lord which is laid upon us here; and we are to obey God rather than man. Nor do we, in any ways, violate the promise which each of us made when it was said unto him, "Take thou authority to preach the word of God, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." We then promised to submit, mark the words, to the godly admonitions and injunctions of our ordinary. But we did not, could not promise to obey such injunctions, as we know are contrary to the word of God.

But why then, say some, do ye leave the church? Leave the church! what can you mean? do we leave so much as the church-walls? your own eyes tell you we do not. Do we leave the ordinances of the church? you daily see and know the contrary. Do we leave the fundamental doctrine of the church, namely salvation by faith? Is it our constant theme in public, in private, in writing, in conversation? Do we leave the practice of the church, the standard whereof are the ten commandments? which are so essentially inwrought in our constitution, as little as you may apprehend it, that whosoever breaks one of the least of these, is no member of the church of England. I believe you do not care to put the cause on this issue. Neither do you mean this, by leaving the church. In truth I cannot conceive what you mean. I doubt you cannot conceive yourself. You have retailed a sentence from some body else which you no more understand than he."

Mr. Wesley then takes a retrospective view of the state of religion before the Methodistical doctrines were preached, and the happy change produced thereby in the following words:

"Before I conclude, I cannot but treat you who know God, to review the whole matter from the foundation. Call to mind what the state of religion was in our nation, a few years since. In whom did you find the holy tempers that were in Christ? Bowels of mercies, lowliness, meekness, gentleness, contempt of the world, patience, temperance, long-suffering? A burning love to God, rejoicing evermore, and in every thing giving thanks, and a tender love to all mankind, covering, believing, hoping, enduring all things? Perhaps you did not know one such man in the world. But how many that had all unholy tempers? What vanity and pride, what stubbornness and self-will, what anger, fretfulness, discontent, what suspicion and resentment, what inordinate affections, what irregular passions, what foolish and hurtful desires might you find in those who were called the best of men? in those who made the strictest profession of religion? and how few did you know who went so far as the profession of religion, who had even the form of godliness? Did you not frequently bewail, wherever your lot was cast, the general want of even outward religion? how few were seen at the public worship of God? how much fewer at the Lord's table? and was even this little flock zealous of good works, careful, as they had time, to good to all men? On the other hand, did you not with grief observe, outward irreligion in every place? Where could you be for one week, without being an eye or an ear witness of cursing, swearing, or profaneness, of sabbath-breaking, or drunkenness, of quarrelling or brawling, of revenge or obscenity? Were these things done in a corner? did not gross iniquity of all kinds overspread our land as a flood? yea, and daily increase, in spite of all the opposition which the children of God did or could do against it.

If you had been then told, that the jealous God would soon arise and maintain his cause, that he would pour down his spirit from on high and renew the face of the earth; that he would shed abroad his love in the hearts of the outcasts of men, producing all holy and heavenly tempers, expelling anger, and pride, and evil desire, and all unholy and earthly tempers; causing outward religion, the work of faith, the patience of hope, the labour of love, to flourish and abound; and wherever it spread, abolishing outward irreligion, destroying all the works of the devil: if you had been told, that this living knowledge of the Lord would in a short space overspread our land; yea daily increase, in spite of all the opposition which the devil and his children did or could make against it: would you not vehemently have desired to see that day, that you might bless God and rejoice therein?

Behold the day of the Lord is come. He is again visiting and redeeming his people. Having eyes, see ye not? having ears, do ye not hear? neither understand with your hearts? At this hour the Lord is rolling away our reproach. Already his standard is set up. His spirit is poured out on the outcasts of men, and his love shed abroad in their hearts. Love of all mankind, meekness, gentleness, humbleness of mind, holy and heavenly affections, do take place, of hate, anger, pride, revenge, and vile or vain affections. Hence wherever the power of the Lord spreads, springs outward religion in all its forms. The houses of God are filled; the table of the Lord is thronged on every side; and those who shew their love of God, shew they love their neighbour also, by being careful to maintain good works, by doing all manner of good, as they have opportunity, to all men. They are likewise careful to abstain from all evil. Cursing, sabbath-breaking, drunkenness, with all other (however fashionable) works of the devil, are not once named among them. All this is plain, demonstrable fact. For this is also not done in a corner. Now, do you acknowledge the day of your visitation? do you bless God and rejoice therein?

What hinders? Is it this, that men say all manner of evil of those whom God is pleased to use as instruments in his works? O ye fools, did ye suppose the devil was dead? or that he would not fight for his kingdom? and what weapons shall he fight with if not with lies? Is he not a liar, and the father of it? Suffer ye then thus far. Let the devil and his children say all manner of evil of us; and let them go on deceiving each other, and being deceived: but ye need not be deceived also. Or if you are, if you will believe all they say: be it so, that we are weak, silly, wicked men, without sense, without learning, without even a desire or design of doing good: yet I insist upon the fact. Christ is preached, and sinners are converted to God. This none but a madman can deny. We are ready to prove it by a cloud of witnesses. Neither therefore can the inference be denied, that God is now visiting his people. O that all men may know in this their day, the things that make for their peace."

Mr. Wesley, in his Farther Appeal, thus answers the charge of enthusiasm brought against the Methodists:

"I assert, that till a man receives the Holy Ghost, he is without God in the world; that he cannot know the things of God, unless God reveals them unto him by his spirit; no, nor have even one holy or heavenly temper, without the inspiration of the Holy One." Now should one who is conscious to himself, that he has experienced none of these things, attempt to confute these propositions, either from scripture or antiquity, it might prove a difficult task. What then shall he do? Why, cry out, "Enthusiasm, Enthusiasm!" and the work is done.

But what does he mean by enthusiasm? Perhaps nothing at all: few have any distinct idea of its meaning. Perhaps "something very bad," or, something I never experienced and do not understand." Shall I tell you then, what that "terrible something" is? I believe thinking men mean by enthusiasm, a sort of religious madness; a false imagination of being inspired by God; and by an enthusiast, one that fancies himself under the influence of the Holy Ghost, when in fact he is not.

Let him prove me guilty of this who can. I will tell you once more the whole of my belief on these heads: and if any man will shew me, by argument, not hard names, what is wrong, I will thank God and him.

Every good gift is from God, and is given to man by the Holy Ghost. By nature there is in us no good thing; and there can be none, but so far as it is wrought in us by that good spirit. Have we any true knowledge of what is good? This is not the result of our natural understanding. The natural man discerneth not the things of the spirit of God: so that we never can discern them, until God reveals them unto us by his spirit: reveals, that is, unveils, uncovers; gives us to know what we did not know before. Have we love? It is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us. He inspires, breathes, infuses into our soul, what of ourselves we could not have. Does our spirit rejoice in God our Saviour? It is joy in, or by the Holy Ghost. Have we true inward peace? It is the peace of God wrought in us by the same spirit. Faith, peace, joy, love, are all his fruits; and, as we are figuratively said to see the light of faith, so by a like figure of speech we are said to feel this peace, and joy, and love: that is, we have an inward experience of them, which we cannot find any fitter words to express.

The reasons why in speaking of these things I use those terms, inspiration particularly, are, 1. Because they are scriptural. 2. Because they are used by our church. 3. Because I know none better. The words "influence of the Holy Ghost," which I suppose you use, is both a far stronger and a less natural term than inspiration. It is a far stronger, even as far as "flowing into the soul" is a stronger expression than "breathing upon it;" and less natural, as breathing bears a near relation to spirit; to which flowing in has only a distant relation.

"But you thought I had meant immediate inspiration." So I do, or I mean nothing at all. Nor indeed such inspiration as is sine mediis. But all inspiration, though by means, is immediate. Suppose, for instance, you are employed in private prayer, and God pours his love into your heart.—God then acts immediately on your soul: and the love of him which you then experience, is as immediately breathed into you by the Holy Ghost, as if you had lived 1700 years ago. Change the term.—"Say, God then assists you to love him." Well, and is not this immediate assistance? Say, "His spirit concurs with yours." You gain no ground. It is immediate concurrence, or none at all. God a spirit acts upon your spirit. Make it out any otherwise if you can.

I cannot conceive how that harmless word, immediate, came to be such a bugbear in the world.—"Why I thought you meant such inspiration as the Apostles had: and such a receiving of the Holy Ghost as that was at the day of Pentecost." I do, in part: Indeed I do not mean that Christians now receive the Holy Ghost in order to work miracles; but they do doubtless now receive, yea, are filled with the Holy Ghost, in order to be filled with the fruits of that blessed spirit. And he inspires into all true believers now, a degree of the same peace and joy, and love, which the apostles felt in themselves on that day, when they were first filled with the Holy Ghost.

I have now considered the most material objections I know, which have been lately made against the great doctrines I teach. I have produced, so far as in me lay, the strength of those objections, and then answered them, I hope, in the spirit of meekness. And now I trust it appears, that these doctrines are no other than the doctrines of Jesus Christ: that they are all evidently contained in the word of God, by which alone I desire to stand or fall; and they are fundamentally the same with the doctrines of the church of England, of which I do, and ever did profess myself a member."

By these extracts the reader will see the principles of these honest, if mistaken people, and will come to such conclusion as his reason and understanding will afford him. It will not be expected of me to give my opinion; it is the business of an historian to relate facts, and not to comment upon them, particularly in cases where religion is the concern, and in which I think, every man has a natural right to follow the determinations of his own judgment: but before I give a brief history of their rise, &c. after this recapitulation of their principles and doctrines, I shall set before my readers what they say in answer to one or two of the most popular objections or calumnies raised against them; the first of which is, "That they create divisions in private families." Their able Apologist thus refutes it, "Accidentally we do. For instance, suppose the entire family to have the form and not the power of godliness, or to have neither the form nor the power in either case, they may in some sort agree together. But suppose when these hear the plain word of God, one or two of them are convinced, "This is the truth, and I have been all this time in the broad way leading to destruction:" these then will begin to mourn after God, while the rest remain as they were. Will they not therefore of consequence divide, and form themselves into separate parties? Must it not be so, in the very nature of things? and how exactly does this agree with the words of our Lord?

Suppose ye that I came to send peace upon earth? I tell you nay: but rather division. For from henceforth there shall be five divided in one house, three against two, and two against three. The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother: the mother-in-law against the daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law. Luke xii. 51. 52. 53. And the foes of a man shall be they of his own household. Matthew x. 36.

Thus it was from the very beginning. For is it to be supposed, that a heathen parent would long endure a Christian child? or that a heathen husband would agree with a Christian wife? unless either the believing wife could gain her husband; or the unbelieving husband prevailed on the wife to renounce her way of worshipping God: at least unless she would obey him in going no more to those societies or conventicles, as they termed the Christian assemblies.

Do you think now, I have an eye to your case? Doubtless I have; for I do not fight as one that beateh the air. Why have not I a right to hinder my own wife or child from going to a conventicle? and is it not the duty of wives to obey their husbands? and of children to obey their parents? Only set the case seventeen hundred years back, and your own conscience gives you the answer. What would St. Paul have said to one whose husband forbade her to follow this way any more? What direction would our Saviour have given to him, whose Father enjoined him not to hear the gospel? His words are extant still, "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me. And he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me." Matt. x. 37, 38. Nay more, "If any man cometh to me, and hateth not, in comparison of me, his father and mother, and wife and children, yea, and his own life, he cannot be my disciple." Luke xiv. 26.

O, but this is not a parallel case; for they were heathens; but I am a Christian. A Christian! Are you so? Do you understand the word? Do you know what a Christian is? If you are a Christian, you have the mind that was in Christ; and you so walk as he also walk. You are holy, as he was holy both in heart and in all manner of conversation.

Have you then the mind which was in Christ? and do you walk as Christ walked? are you inwardly and outwardly holy? I fear not even outwardly. No; you live in known sin. Alas! how then are you a Christian? What, a railer, a Christian? a common swearer, a Christian? a sabbath-breaker, a Christian? a drunkard or whoremonger, a Christian? Thou art a heathen barefaced! the wrath of God is on thy head, and the curse of God upon thy back. Thy damnation slumbereth not.—By reason of such Christians it is that they holy name of Christ is blasphemed. Such as thou they are, that cause the very savages in the Indian woods to cry out, "Christian much drunk, Christian beat men, Christian tell lies, Devil-Christian! me no Christian."

It may be observed above, that the Methodists do not separate from the church, nor dispute about the externals or circumstances of religion; they approve of and adhere to them, all that they learned when they were children, in their Catechism and Common Prayer Book. They were born and bred up in the church of England, and desire to die therein. They always were, and now are, they say, zealous for the church; only not with a blind zeal.

They do not indeed lay the stress of their religion on any opinions, right or wrong; neither do they ever begin, or willingly join, in any dispute concerning them. The weight of all religion, they apprehend, rests on holiness of heart and life; and, consequently, wherever they come, they press this with all their might. How wide then is their case from that of the Protestant Dissenters in general? They avowedly separated from the church: The Methodists utterly disavow any such design. They severely, and almost continually, inveighed against the doctrine and discipline of the church they left: these approve both the doctrines and discipline of our church, and inveigh only against ungodliness and unrighteousness. They spent great part of their time and strength in contending about externals and circumstantials; the Methodists agree with the church of England in both; so that having no time to spend in such vain contention, they have their desire in spending and being spent; and promoting plain practical religion. "I am sick (says Mr. Wesley) of opinions: I am weary to bear them; my soul loaths this frothy food. Give me solid and substantial religion: give me an humble, gentle lover of God and man; a man full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy: a man, laying himself out in the work of faith, the patience of hope, the labour of love. Let my soul be with these Christians, wheresoever they are and whatsoever opinion they are of. Whosoever thus doth the will of my father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister and mother."

With regard to the charges of making men idle, and thereby beggaring their families, and of driving men out of their senses, Mr. Wesley thus answers: "This objection having been continually urged for some years, I will trace it from the foundation.—Two or three years after my return from America one captain Robert Williams of Bristol, made affidavit before the then Mayor of the city, that "it was a common report in Georgia, Mr. Wesley took people off from their work, and made them idle by preaching so much."

The fact stood thus: At my first coming to Savannah the generality of the people rose at seven or eight in the morning; and that part of them who were accustomed to work, usually worked till six in the evening. A few of them sometimes worked till seven; which is the time of sun-set there at Midsummer.

I immediately began reading prayers and expounding the second lesson both in the morning and evening. The morning service began at five, and ended at, or before six: the evening service began at seven. Now supposing all the grown persons in the town had been present every morning and evening would this have made them idle? Would they hereby have had less, or considerably more time for working! The same rule I follow now, both at London, Bristol, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne: concluding the service at every place, winter and summer, before six in the morning, and not ordinarily beginning to preach till near seven in the evening.

Now do you, who make this objection, work longer throughout the year, than from six to six? Do you desire that the generality of people should? Or, can you count them idle that work so long? Some few are indeed accustomed to work longer.—These I advise not to come on week days: and it is apparent that they take this advice, unless on some rare and extraordinary occasion. But I hope none of you who turn them out of their employment, have the confidence to talk of my making them idle. Do you, as the homely phrase is, cry Wh—first? I admire your cunning, but not your modesty. So far am I from either causing, or encouraging your idleness, that an idle person, known to be such, is not suffered to remain in one of our societies; we drive him out, as we would a thief or a murderer. "To shew all possible diligence," as well as frugality, is one of our standing rules; and one, concerning the observance of which, we continually make the strictest enquiry.

"But you drive them out of their senses. You make them run mad." Nay, then they are idle with a vengeance. This objection therefore being of the utmost importance, deserves our deepest consideration.

And first, I grant, it is my earnest desire to drive all the world into what you probably call madness: I mean inward religion, to make them just as mad as Paul was when he was so accounted by Festus. I grant, secondly, it is my endeavour to drive all I can into what you may term another species of madness, which is usually preparatory to this, and which I term repentance or conviction.

Now, what if your wife, or daughter, or acquaintance, after hearing one of these field-preachers, should come and tell you, that they saw damnation before them, and beheld with the eye of their mind the horror of hell? What if they should tremble and quake, and be so taken up, partly with sorrow and heaviness, partly with an earnest desire to be delivered from this danger of hell and damnation, as to weep, to lament, to mourn, and both with words and behaviour to shew themselves weary of life?—Would you scruple to say, that they were stark mad? that these fellows had driven them out of their senses? and that whatever writer it was, that talked at this rate, he was fitter for Bedlam than any other place ?

You have overshot yourself now to some purpose. These are the words of our own church. You may read them if you are so inclined, in the first part of the homily on fasting. And, consequently, what you have peremptorily determined to be mere lunacy and distraction, is that repentance unto life, which, in the judgment both of the church and of St. Paul, is never to be repented of.

I grant, thirdly, that extraordinary circumstances have attended this conviction in some instances. A particular account of these I have frequently given. While the word of God was preached, some persons have dropped down as dead : some have been, as it were, in strong convulsions ; some roared aloud though not with an articulate voice ; and others spoke the anguish of their souls.

This, I suppose, you believe to be perfect madness : but it is easily accounted for, either on principles of reason or scripture.

First, on principles of reason. For how easy is it to suppose, that a strong, lively and sudden apprehension of the heinousness of sin, the wrath of God, and the bitter pains of eternal death, should affect the body as well as the soul, during the present laws of vital union ; should intercept or disturb the ordinary circulation, and put nature out of its course. Yea, we may question, whether while this pain subsists, it be possible for the mind to be affected in so violent a degree, without some or other of these bodily symptoms following ?

It is likewise easy to account for these things on principles of scripture ; for when we take a view of them in this light, we are to add to the consideration of natural causes, the agency of those spirits who still excel in natural strength ; and as far as they have leave from God, will not fail to torment whom they cannot destroy ; to tear those that are coming to Christ. It is also remarkable, that there is plain scripture precedent, of every symptom which has lately appeared ; so that we cannot allow even the conviction attended with them to be madness, without giving up both reason and scripture.

I grant, fourthly, that touches of extravagance, hordring upon madness, may sometimes attend severe convictions. And this also is easy to be accounted for, by the present state of the animal economy. For we know fear or grief, from a temporary cause, may occasion a fever, and thereby a delirium.

It is no way strange that some, while under strong impressions of grief or fear, from a sense of the wrath of God, should for a season forget almost all things else, and scarce be able to answer a common question. That some should fancy they see the flames of hell, or the devil and his angels around them ; or that others, for a space, should be afraid, like Cain, who said, " whosoever meeteth me will slay me."

All these, and whatever less common effects may sometimes accompany this conviction, are easily known from the natural distemper of madness, were it only by this one circumstance, that whenever the person converted tastes the pardoning love of God, they all vanish away in a moment.

Lastly, I have seen one instance, and I pray God I may never see another, of real lasting madness.

A few years since, I took one along with me to Bristol who was under deep convictions, but of as sound an understanding, in all respect, as ever he had been in his life. I went a short journey, and when I came to Bristol again, found him really distracted. I enquired particularly at what time and place, and in what manner this disorder began. And I believe there are above threescore witnesses alive (1749) who are ready to testify the truth of what follows.

When I went from Bristol he contracted an acquaintance with some persons who were not of the same judgment with me. He was soon prejudiced against me. Soon after, when our society were met together in Kingswood-house, he began a vehement invective, both against my person and my doctrine. In the midst of this he was struck raving mad, and so he continued till his friends put him in Bedlam ; and probably, his madness was imputed to me.— Perhaps there may be many instances of madness proceeding from a variety of causes that we cannot comprehend.

Supposing for instance, that a person hearing me is strongly convinced that a liar cannot enter the kingdom of heaven ; he comes home and relates this to his parents, or friends, and appears to be very uneasy. These good Christians are disturbed at this, and afraid he is running mad too. They are resolved he shall never hear any of these fellows more, and keep to it in spite of all his entreaties.

They will not suffer him while at home to be alone, lest he should read or pray ; and perhaps, in a little while they will constrain him, at least by repeated importunities, to do again the very thing for which he was convinced the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience.

What is the event of this ?

Sometimes the spirit of God is quenched, and departs from him. Now you have carried the point. The man is as easy as ever, and sins on without any remorse. But in other instances, where those convictions sink deep, and the arrows of the Almighty stick fast in the soul, you will drive that person into real settled madness, before you can quench the spirit of God. I am afraid there have been several instances of this. You have forced the man's conscience, till he is stark mad; but then, pray do not impute the madness to me. Had you left him to my direction, or rather to the direction of the spirit of God, he would have been filled with love and a sound mind; but you have taken the matter out of God's hand; and now you have brought it to a fair conclusion!

How frequent this case may be, I know not.—But doubtless most of those who make this objection, of our driving men mad, have never met with such an instance in their lives. The common cry is occasioned either by those who are convinced of sin, or those who are inwardly converted to God; mere madness both, as was observed before, to those who are without God in the world. Yet I do not deny but you may have seen one in Bedlam who said he had followed me. But observe, a madman's saying this is no proof of the fact; nay, and if he really had, it should be farther considered, that his being in Bedlam is no sure proof of his being mad. Witness the well-known case of Mr. Periam; and I doubt more such are to be found. Yea, it is well if some have not been sent thither for no other reason but because they followed me; their kind relations either concluding, that they must be distracted before they could do this, or perhaps hoping that Bedlam would make them mad, if it did not find them so.

And it must be owned, that a confinement of such a sort is as fit to cause as to cure distraction; for what scene of distress is to be compared to it? To be separated at once from all who are near and dear to you; to be cut off from all reasonable conversation; to be secluded from all business, from all reading, from every innocent entertainment of the mind, which is left to prey wholly upon itself; day and night to prone over your misfortunes; to be shut up day by day in a gloomy cell, with only the walls to employ your heavy eyes, in the midst either of melancholy silence, or horrid cries, groans, and laughter intermixed; to be forced by the main strength of those "who laugh at human nature and compassion;" to take drenches of nauseous, perhaps torturing medicines, which you know you have no need of now, but know not how soon you may, possibly by the opening of these very drugs on a weak and tender constitution. Here is distress! It is an astonishing thing, a signal proof of the power of God, if any creature who has his senses when that confinement begins, does not lose them before it is at an end!

How must it heighten the distress, if such a poor wretch, being deeply convinced of sin, and growing worse and worse, as he probably will, seeing there is no medicine here for his sickness, no such physician as his case requires, be soon placed among the incurables! Can imagination itself paint such a hell upon earth? where even "hope never comes, that comes to all!" For what remedy? If a man of sense and humanity should happen to visit that house of woe, would he give the hearing to a madman's tale? or, if he did, would he credit it? "Do we not know, might he say, how well any of these will talk in their lucid intervals." So that a thousand to one he would concern himself no more about it, but leave the weary to wait for rest in the grave!"

The first public appearance of the Rev. Mr. Geo. Whitfield, of Pembroke College, Oxford, who was an ordained clergyman of the church of England, about London, was in the year 1737, when he and his associates preached up and down in the fields to vast multitudes of people, with an energy that struck every one, particularly in Moorfields, on Kennington Common, Blackheath, &c. and for some time they were admitted also into the churches to declare their peculiar opinions, till the indolent clergy were roused by their extraordinary popularity, and the church-wardens fearing damages to their pews, &c. they were generally refused the use of the public pulpits. The uncommon fervour they expressed, a simple yet persuasive eloquence, and the mortified and laborious life they led, procured them not only most numerous auditors, but their doctrines such a multitude of followers, as astonished the guardians of our church; but whilst they themselves indolently persisted in their old rout of stated preaching, Mr. Whitfield, particularly, with a rapid progress, took from them thousands of their hearers, especially of the lower sort, and brought many more to a sense and abhorrence of their vices, and to attend his preaching, who, perhaps, had never been at any kind of worship before.

Whilst the clergy raved both in the pulpit and in print against this novel doctrine, as they styled it, and with what justice may be seen above, this laborious preacher, despising all danger and fatigue, not only formed societies in England of his followers, but traversing, time after time, immense tracks of land and water, proselyted multitudes in all parts of North America, and extended his cares even to the inhabitants of the infant colony of Georgia, where that wise and excellent governor, Mr. Oglethorpe, well knowing an attachment to religious principles, and a life of virtue and self-denial, were spurs to industry and economy, received him with open arms, and gave him all manner of assistance. Here he at length erected an orphan-house for poor and deserted children; an institution that bids fair to be an extraordinary benefit in that country; the most authentic account of which establishment, by an impartial eye-witness, and published in justice to the Methodists, may be seen in the London Magazine for the year 1745, page 603.

In these Christian labours, perilous voyages, and painful journeys through the wilderness of America, he was followed by Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, his faithful and able coadjutors, who with a zeal and constancy second only to those which actuated the primitive apostles and the disciples of our Saviour, thought no hardships insurmountable, no dangers too terrifying in prosecuting the work they supposed themselves appointed to.

Of his own and his brother's conversation, &c. and of the necessity of becoming field preachers, Mr. John Wesley gives the following account:

"I was ordained deacon in 1725, and priest in the year following; but it was many years after this before I was convinced of the great truths above recited. During all that time I was utterly ignorant of the nature and condition of justification. Sometimes I confounded it with sanctification, particularly when I was in Georgia.

"At other times I had some confused notions of the forgiveness of sins; but then I took it for granted the time of this must be, either the hour of death, or the day of judgment. I was equally ignorant of the nature of saving faith, apprehending it to mean no more than a "firm assent to all the propositions contained in the Old and New Testament." As soon as, by the great blessing of God, I had a clear view of these things, I began to declare them to others also. I believed, and therefore I spake.— Wherever I was now desired to preach, salvation was my only theme. My constant subjects were, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. Him hath God exalted to be a prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins." These I explained and enforced with all my might, both in every church where I was asked to preach, and occasionally in the religious societies of London and Westminster; to some or other of which I was continually pressed to go, by the stewards or other members belonging to them.

"Things were in this posture when I was told, "I must preach no more in this, that, and other "churches." The reason was usually added without reserve, "Because you preach such doctrine." So much the more those who could not hear me there, flocked together when I was at any of the societies; where I spoke more or less, though with much inconvenience, to as many as the room I was in could contain. But after a short time, finding these rooms could not contain a tenth part of the people that were earnest to hear, I determined to do the same thing in England which I had often done in a warmer climate; namely, when the house would not contain the congregation, to preach in the open air. This I accordingly did, first at Bristol, where the society-rooms were exceedingly small, and at Kingswood, where we had no room at all; afterwards in or near London. And I cannot say I have ever seen a more awful sight, than when, on Rose-Green, or the top of Hannam-Mount, some thousands of people were calmly joined together in solemn waiting upon God, while "they stood, and under open air adored the God who made both air, earth, heaven, and sky." And whether they were listening to his word, with attention still as night, or were lifting up their voice in praise, as the sound of many waters, many a time have I been constrained to say in my heart, "How dreadful is this place! This also is no other than the house of God! This is the gate of heaven!"

"Be pleased to observe, 1. That I was forbidden, as by a general consent, to preach in any church, though not by any judicial sentence, for preaching such doctrine. This was the open, avowed cause: there was at that time no other, either real or pretended. 2. That I had no desire or design to preach in the open air, till long after this prohibition. 3. That when I did, as it was no matter of choice, so neither of premeditation. There was no scheme at all previously formed, which was to be supported thereby; nor had I any other end in view than this, to save as many souls as I could. 4. Field-preaching was therefore a necessary expedient, a thing submitted to, rather than chosen; and therefore submitted to, because I thought preaching, even thus, better than not preaching at all; first, in regard to my own soul, because a dispensation of the gospel being committed to me, I did not dare not to preach the gospel; secondly, in regard to the souls of others, who I every where saw seeking death in the error of their life."

The effects of their preaching are thus described by the same hand.—"Just at this time, when we wanted little of filling up the measures of our iniquities, two or three clergymen of the church of England began vehemently to call sinners to repentance. In two or three years they sounded the alarm to the utmost borders of the land. Many thousands gathered together to hear them; and in every place where they came, many began to shew such a concern for religion as they had never done before.

A stronger impression was made on their minds of the importance of things eternal, and they had more earnest desires of serving God, than they had ever had from their earliest childhood. Thus did God begin to draw them towards himself, with the cords of love, with the bands of a man. Many of these were in a short time deeply convinced of the number and heinousness of their sins. They were also made thoroughly sensible of those tempers which are justly hateful to God and man, and of their utter ignorance of God, and entire inability either to know, love, or serve him. At the same time, they saw in the strongest light the insignificance of their outside religion; nay, and often confessed it before God, as the most abominable hypocrisy. Thus did they sink deeper and deeper into that repentance which must ever precede faith in the Son of God. And from hence spring fruits meet for repentance. The drunkard commenced sober and temperate; the whoremonger abstained from adultery and fornication; the unjust from oppression and wrong. He that had been accustomed to curse and swear for many years, now swore no more. The sluggard began to work with his own hands, that he might eat his own bread. The miser learned to deal his bread to the hungry, and to cover the naked with a garment. Indeed the whole form of their lives was changed. They had left off doing evil, and learned to do well.

But this was not all. Over and above this outward change, they began to experience inward religion. The love of God was shed abroad in their hearts, which they continue to this day. They love him, because he first loved us, and withheld not from us his son, his only son: and this love constrains them to love all mankind, all the children of the Father of heaven and earth, and inspires them with every holy and heavenly temper, the whole mind that was in Christ. Hence it is that they are now uniform in their behaviour, unblamable in all manner of conversation; and in whatsoever state they are, they have learned therewith to be content: insomuch that now they can in every thing give thanks. They more than patiently acquiesce, they rejoice and are exceeding glad, in all God's dispensations towards them; for as long as they love God, and that love no man taketh from them, they are always happy in God. Thus they calmly travel on through life, being never weary nor taint in their minds, never repining, murmuring, or dissatisfied, casting all their cares upon God, till the hour comes that they should drop this covering of earth, and return into the great father of spirits: then especially it is that they rejoice with joy unspcakable and full of glory. You who credit it not, come and see."

In London, particularly, a great change was soon perceived in the majority of the common people; an unusual seriousness appeared in their countenances, they refrained from profane cursing and swearing, and the alehouses were deprived of their usual incriated guests. Mean time the more abandoned of the rabble, whom no precepts could reach, no future denunciations of punishment deter from wickedness, spared not reproaches, and even frequently proceeded to open insults and abuses of the preachers, who were as warmly defended by their partisans, so as often to occasion tumults and riots, that were mutually charged by the Methodists and their opposers on each other, and kept the public for years in perpetual dispute and agitation. But at length, now increased to a prodigious number, they began to form societies apart, for worship in their own way, and to appoint stewards and other officers for the better regulation and government of those societies; the principle of which, in London, are the Tabernacle and Foundery near Moorfields, the Tabernacle in Tottenham-Court-Road, with many others, in the city and suburbs. Their founders have increased their numbers in Scotland and Ireland also, where they pursued their mission with the utmost success; and in many places in England, where religion was seldom heard of, they have produced order, humanity, civility, and a serious regard to divine things, particularly amongst the colliers of Kingswood, and the fells about Newcastle. If the reader desires to enter into particulars with regard to their history, he would do well to peruse the several journals of Mess. Whitfield and Wesley, as we only propose here a general view of their rise &c. Indeed it is a peculiar circumstance, that no sect in so few years, ever became so numerous, though they have met with mild treatment from the government, and have endured no persecution for their opinions, which has generally helped to increase, rather than to decrease the followers of a new system of doctrines. With regard to the common people, or the mob, who are ever of the national religion, so far as drinking, swearing, and rioting extends, the appearance of the founders of Methodism, in the usual vestments of clergymen, captivated them, and prevented many disorders that would have risen, had persons not distinguished by that reverend garb endeavoured to exhort an instruct them; and yet, according to Mr. Wesley's account, he himself was, once particularly, in great danger of losing his life: and the Methodists suffered by the spoils and ravages of desperate and wicked mobs, in Staffordshire, in the year 1743, to the amount of five hundred and four pounds, seventeen shillings, at the lowest computation, owing to a shameful connivance, perhaps under-hand encouragement, of those who should have restrained or punished them for their diabolical excesses. In fact, too many of their opposers merit the character Mr. Wesley has given them. "I have heard some affirm, says he, that the most bitter enemies to the present work of God were Pharisees. They meant men who had the form of godliness, but denied the power of it. But I cannot say so. The sharpest adversaries thereof, unless we might except a few honourable men, whom I may be excused from naming, were the scum of Cornwall, and the rabble of Bilston and Darleston, the wild beasts of Walsal, and the turnkeys of Newgate."

In fine, the very enemies of these people will scarce deny that they have greatly contributed to reform and establish order and civility amongst the common people; that they are (I mean the real Methodists; for Presbyterians, Quakers, and every sect, have been personated as well as they, for interested or villainous purposes,) a peaceable, upright, and praise-worthy set of people; that they cannot upon their principles distress, but must add strength to the hands of government, and that their rise and amazing progress have roused the established clergy from that lethargy into which they had fallen, and invigorated them to be attendant on the charge to which they were so solemnly appointed.

Their favourite doctrines have found their way also into the pulpits of our churches, and many excellent preachers, who do not leave the church on that account, enforce them at this day from their pulpits. The great spread of Methodism has certainly contributed to set people in general upon thinking of matters of the greatest moment to them, and I will venture to assert, from my own observation, that there has been such an appearance of seriousness, and such a concern for religion, visible in all ranks of people, since it has so much prevailed, as cannot be remembered in any such period of time since the restoration.

We shall conclude this head with a brief account of their manner of worship, church-discipline, &c.

With regard to their manner of worship it is like that of the church of England, save that they allow themselves to continue long in extempore prayer, and that they sing such hymns as are approved by the society. Indeed they allow of lay-preachers, or suffer unlearned men to preach or exhort, in their places of worship. "I am bold to affirm, says Mr. Wesley, that these unlettered men have help from God for that great work, the saving souls from death, seeing he hath enabled, and doth enable them still to turn many to righteousness. Thus hath he destroyed the wisdom of the wise, and brought to nought the understanding of the prudent.

When they imagined they had effectually shut the door, and blocked up every passage, whereby any help could come to two or three preachers, weak in body as well as soul; who they might reasonably believe would, humanly speaking, wear themselves out in a short time: when they had gained their point, by securing, as they supposed, all the men of learning in the nation, He that sitteth in heaven laughed them to scorn, and came upon them by a way they thought not of. Out of the stones he raised up those who should beget children to Abraham. We had no more foresight of this than you. Nay, we had the deepest prejudices against it, until we could not but own, that God gave wisdom from above to these unlearned and ignorant men; so that the work of the Lord prospered in their hand, and sinners were daily converted to God.

Indeed in the one thing which they profess to know, they are not ignorant men. I trust there is not one of them who is not able to go through such an examination, in substantial, practical, experimental divinity, as few of our candidates for holy orders, even in the university, I speak it with sorrow and shame, and in tender love, are able to do."

There have been some difference amongst the leaders of these people, particularly between Mr. Whitfield and Mr. Wesley, relative to the doctrine of reprobation; but they agree in the terms of acceptance: in smaller points, each thinks and lets think: and Mr. Wesley says he reverences Mr. Whitfield, both as a child of God, and a true minister of Jesus Christ. We could wish all religious disputes had been managed with equal candour.

As to the discipline of the Methodists we cannot give a better account of it, than is contained in a small tract, entitled, The Nature, Design, and general Rules of the united Societies in London, Bristol, Kingswood, and Newcastle upon Tyne, 7th edit. 1762, which we shall therefore lay before our readers.

"1. In the latter end of the year 1739, eight or ten persons came to me in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired, as did two or three more the next day, that I would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come, which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together, which from henceforward they did every week, namely, on Thursday, in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them, (for their number increased daily,) I gave those advices from time to time, which I judged most needful for them; and we always concluded our meeting with prayer suited to their several necessities.

1. This was the rise of the United Society, first in London, and then in other places. Such a society is no other than "a company of men having the form and seeking the power of godliness, united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation."

3. That it may the more easily be discerned, whether they are indeed working out their salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons in every class, one of whom is stiled the leader. It is his business, 1.

To see each person in his class once a-week at the least, in order to enquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give toward the relief of the poor. 2. To meet the minister and the stewards of the society once a-week in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd; to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding, and to shew their account of what each person has contributed.

4. There is one only condition previously required in those who desire admittance into these societies "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, to be saved from their sins." But wherever this is really fixed in the soul, it will be shewn by its fruits. It is, therefore, expected of all who continue therein, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation.

First, by doing no harm, by avoiding evil in every kind, especially that which is most generally practised: such as, the taking the name of God in vain: the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling; drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity; fighting, quarrelling, brawling, brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling uncustomed goods; the giving or taking things on usury, that is unlawful interest; uncharitable or unprofitable conversation, particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers; doing to others as we would not they should do unto us; doing what we know is not for the glory of God, as the putting on of gold and costly apparel; the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus; the singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God; softness, and needless self-indulgence; laying up treasures upon earth; borrowing without a probability of paying, or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them.

5. It is expected of all who continue in these societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation.

Secondly, by doing good, by being in ever kind merciful after their power, as they have opportunity; doing good of every possible sort, and as is possible to all men: to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth, by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick, or in prison; to their souls by instructing, reprov'ing, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with; trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that "we are not to do good unless our heart be free of it:" by doing good especially to them that are of the household of faith, or growing so to be; employing them preferably to others, buying one of another, helping each other in business; and so much the more because the world will love its own, and them only; by all possible diligence and frugality, that the gospel be not blamed: by running with patience the race which is set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ, to be as the filth and off-scouring of the world; and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely, for their Lord's sake.

6. It is expected of all who desire to continue in these societies, that they should shew forth to their brethren that they desire salvation.

Thirdly, by attending upon all the ordinances of God; such as the public worship; the ministry of the word either read or expounded; the Supper of the Lord; family and private prayer; searching, and fasting, or abstinence.

7. These are the general rules of our societies, all which we are taught of God to observe, even in his written word, the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice; and all these we know his spirit writes on every truly awakened heart. If there be any among us who observes them not, who habitually breaks any one of them, let it be made known unto them who watch over that soul, as they must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways; we will bear with him for a season; but then if he repent not, he hath no more place among us. We have delivered our own souls.

The Methodists, of whom we are still speaking, in general terms, have in some places, as in Tottenham-Court-Road, built almshouses for their most destitute poor; but still they have a great many in the common workhouses. They have also at several times raised considerable sums for the relief of foreign Protestants; and their works of love during the late war, will ever be remembered to their honour.

We shall conclude this general history of the Methodists, with another quotation from Mr. Wesley, in answer to the current report of his receiving great emoluments from his situation, as being at the head of a religious body of people.

"But, perhaps you have heard, that we regard no church at all; that gain is the true spring of all our actions; that I, in particular, am well paid for my work, having thirteen thousand pounds a year at the Foundry alone, over and above what I have from Bristol, Kingswood, Newcastle, and other parts; and that whoever survives me, will find I have made a good use of my time, for I shall not die a beggar.

"I freely own this is one of the best devised objections which has ever yet been made, because it not only puts us upon proving a negative, which is seldom an easy task, but also one of such a nature as scarce admits of any demonstrative evidence at all. But for such proof as the nature of the thing will admit of, I appeal to the manner of my life from the beginning. Ye who have seen it, and not with a friendly eye, for these twelve or fourteen years last past, or for any part of that time, have you ever seen any thing like the love of gain therein? Did I not continually remember the words of the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Ye of Oxford, do you not know these things are so? What gain did I seek among you? Of whom did I take any thing? From whom did I covet silver, or gold, or apparel? To whom did I deny any thing which I had, even to the hour I departed from you?

"Ye of Epworth and Wroote, among whom I ministered for nearly the space of three years, what gain did I seek among you? Of whom did I take or covet any thing? Ye of Savannah and Fredrica, among whom God afterwards proved me, and shewed me what was in my heart, what gain did I seek among you? Of whom did I take any thing? Or whose food or apparel did I covet, for silver or gold ye had none; not more than I myself for months when I was in hunger and nakedness. Ye yourselves, and the God and father of our Lord Jesus Christ, know that I lie not."

Whatever truth may be in what Mr. Wesley here insinuates, by making appeals in writing, is not our business to determine; but certainly he took the worst of all methods to prove a negative. A negative can be well supported by granting one half of the positive.

This every Methodist will admit that Mr. Wesley received considerable sums annually. Might not he have acknowledged this, and convinced the public that it was spent in works of piety and charity.—Had he done so, he would have proved a negative, though not perhaps to the satisfaction of some strict inquirers.—Let such as think it worth their while to read the copy of Mr. Wesley's will, as published by Dr. Coke and Mr. Moore.

The giving the clergy, of any denomination, money to bestow upon the poor, is one of those weaknesses in human nature, which helped to form, and continues to support, popery. If a man is in possession of money, and has a heart capable of parting with some of it for the use of his fellow creatures, he ought, for two reasons, to be the donor himself. First, because he should know the person whom he relieves; and secondly, that he may keep himself from pride, by concealing his charity as much as possible.

The author of this work knew a lady of high rank, and of a charitable disposition. As is common in such cases, she was frequently beset by the clergy, who were constantly representing to her the state of the poor, and begging money for their relief. Her constant answer was, "I will speak to whom I relieve, send them to me."

But to go on with what Mr. Wesley advances further in his defence.

"But, it is said, things are fairly altered now. I cannot complain of wanting any thing, having the yearly income of the bishop of London, over and above what I gain at other places." At what other places, my friends? inform yourselves a little better, and you will find, that both at Newcastle, Bristol, and Kingswood, the only places, beside London, where any collection at all is made, the money collected is both received and expended by the stewards of those several societies, and never comes into my hands at all, neither first nor last. And you, or any who desire it, shall read over the accounts kept by any of these stewards, and see, with your own eyes, that by all these societies I gain just as much as you do.

The case in London stands thus: In November, 1739, two gentlemen, then unknown to me, Mr. Ball and Mr. Watkins, came and desired me once and again, to preach in a place called the Foundry, near Moorfields. With much reluctance I at length complied. I was soon after pressed to take that place into my own hands. Those who were most earnest therein, lent me the purchase-money, which was one hundred and fifteen pounds. Mr. Watkins and Mr. Ball then delivered me the names of several subscribers, who offered to pay, some four, or six, some ten shillings a year towards the re-payment of the purchase-money, and the putting the buildings into repair. This amounted one year to near two hundred pounds, the second to about one hundred and forty, and so the last.

The united society begun a little after, whose weekly contributions, chiefly for the poor, is received and expended by the stewards, and comes not into my hands at all. But there is also a quarterly subscription of many of the society, which is nearly equal to that above mentioned.

The uses to which these subscriptions have been hitherto applied, are, first, the payment of that one hundred and fifteen pounds; secondly, the repairing, might almost say rebuilding, that vast, uncouth heap of ruins at the Foundry; thirdly, the building galleries both for men and women; fourthly, the enlarging the society-room to near thrice its first bigness. All taxes and occasional expences are likewise defrayed out of this fund. And it has been hitherto so far from yielding any overplus, that it has never sufficed for these purposes yet. So far from it, that I am still in debt, on these accounts, near three hundred pounds, so much have I hitherto gained by preaching the gospel! besides a debt of one hundred and fifty pounds still remaining on account of the schools built at Bristol; and another of above two hundred pounds on account of that now building at Newcastle. I desire any reasonable man would sit down and lay these things together, and let him see, whether (allowing me a grain of common sense, if not of common honesty) he can possibly conceive, that a view of gain would induce me to act in this manner.

You can never reconcile it with any degree of common sense, that a man who wants nothing, who has already all the necessaries, all the conveniences, nay, and many of the superfluities of life, and these not only independent of any one, but less liable to contingencies than even a gentleman's freehold estate, that such an one should calmly and deliberately throw up his ease, most of his friends, his reputation, and that way of life, which of all others is most agreeable both to his natural temper, and education: that he should toil day and night, spend all his time and strength, knowingly destroy a firm constitution, and hasten into weakness, pain, diseases, death, to gain a debt of six or seven hundred pounds!

But supposing the balance on the other side, let me ask you one plain question, "For what gain, setting conscience aside, will you be obliged to act thus? to live exactly as I do? For what price will you preach, and that with all your might, not in an easy, indolent, fashionable way, eighteen or nineteen times every week? and this throughout the year? What shall I give you to travel seven or eight hundred miles, in all weathers, every two or three months? For what salary will you abstain from all other diversions, than the doing good and praising God? I am mistaken if you would not prefer strangling to such a life as this is, even with thousands of gold and silver.

From what is here advanced by Mr. Wesley, nothing conclusive can be drawn. In all disputed points, we are to hear both parties. We are not to be led away by the assertions of an individual, nor by all the opposition made by an adversary. It is certain, that much abuse has been poured out upon the people called Methodists. That some part of it might have been, and still is true, will appear from the concluding part of this narrative; that the greatest part is false, will appear to every unprejudiced reader. If some of the Methodists are uncircumspect, we can only say, that their religion does not teach them to be so. This will appear the more evident, if we consider what they themselves have written concerning their original, and which we shall deliver in their own words.

A short History of those Doctrines which are styled Methodism.

1. It is not easy to reckon up the various accounts which have been given of the people called Methodists: Very many of them as far remote from truth, as that given by the good gentleman in Ireland.—"Methodists! Aye they are the people, who place all their religion in wearing long beards."

2. Abundance of the mistakes which are current concerning them, have undoubtedly sprung from this: Men lump together under this general name many who have no manner of connection with each other: And then whatever any of these speaks or does, is of course imputed to all.

3. The following short account may prevent persons of a calm and candid disposition from doing this: although men of a warm or prejudiced spirit will do just as they did before. But let it be observed, this is not designed for a defence of the Methodists, so called, or any part of them. It is a bare relation of a series of naked facts, which alone may remove abundance of misunderstandings.

In November 1729, four young gentlemen of Oxford, Mr. John Wesley, fellow of Lincoln-college, Mr. Charles Wesley, student of Christ-church, Mr. Morgan, commoner of Christ-church, and Mr. Kirkham, of Merton College, began to spend some evenings in a week together, in reading, chiefly the Greek Testament. The next year, two or three of Mr. John Wesley's pupils desired the liberty of meeting with them; and afterwards one of Mr. Charles Wesley's pupils. It was in 1732 that Mr. Ingham, of Queen's College, and Mr. Broughton, of Exeter, were added to their number. To these, in April, was joined Mr. Clayton, of Brazen-nose, with two or three of his pupils. About the same time Mr. James Heavey was permitted to meet with them, and in 1735, Mr. Whitfield.

5. The exact regularity of their lives, as well as studies, occasioned a young gentleman of Christ-church to say, "Here is a new set of Methodists sprung up." Alluding to some ancient physicians who were so called. The name was new and quaint: So it took immediately, and the Methodists were known all over the university.

6. They were all zealous members of the church of England, not only zealous of all her doctrines, so far as they knew them, but of all her discipline, to the minutest circumstance. They were likewise zealous observers of all the university-statutes, and that for conscience sake. But they observed neither these nor any thing else, any further than they conceived it was bound upon them by their own book, the Bible; it being their own desire and design to be downright Bible Christians; taking the Bible, as interpreted by the primitive church and our own, for their whole and sole rule.

7. The one charge then advanced against them was, that they were righteous overmuch; that they were abundantly too scrupulous, and too strict, carrying things to great extremes. In particular, that they laid too much stress upon the rubrics and canons of the church; that they insisted too much on observing the statutes of the university; and that they took the scriptures in too strict and literal a sense; so that if they were right, few indeed would be saved.

8. In October 1735, Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, and Mr. Ingham, left England, with a design to go and preach to the Indians in Georgia.—But the rest of the gentlemen continued to meet, till one and another was ordained and left the university. By which means, in about two years time, scarce any of them were left.

9. In February 1738, Mr. Whitfield went over to Georgia, with a design to assist Mr. John Wesley, but Mr. Wesley just then returned to England.—Soon after he had a meeting with Messrs. Ingham, Stonehouse, Hall, Hutchins, Kinchin, and a few other clergymen, who all appeared to be of one heart, as well as of one judgment, resolved to be Bible Christians at all events, and wherever they were, to preach with all their might, plain, old, Bible Christianity.

10. They were hitherto perfectly regular in all things, and zealously attached to the church of England. Meantime they began to be convinced, that by grace we are saved through faith; that justification by faith was the doctrine of the church, as well as of the Bible. As soon as they believed, they spake, salvation by faith being now their standing topic. Indeed, this implied three things, 1. That men are all by nature dead in sin, and consequently children of wrath. 2. That they are justified by faith alone. 3. That faith produces inward and outward holiness. And these points they insisted on, day and night. In a short time, they became popular preachers. The congregations were large wherever they preached. The former name was then revived. And all these gentlemen, with their followers, were intitled Methodists.

11. In March 1741, Mr. Whitfield being returned to England, entirely separated from Mr. Wesley and his friends, "Because they did not hold the decrees." Here was the first breach, which warm men persuaded Mr. Whitfield to make, merely for a difference of opinion. Those indeed who believed Universal Redemption, had no desire at all to separate. But those who held Particular Redemption, would not hear of any accommodation, being determined to have no fellowship with men that "were in so dangerous errors." So there were now two sorts of Methodists, so called; those for Particular, and those for General Redemption.

12. Not many years passed, before William Cudworth and James Rely separated from Mr. Whitfield. These were properly Antinomians, absolute, avowed enemies to the law of God, which they never preached or professed to preach, but termed all Legalists who did. With them, preaching the law was an abomination. They had nothing to do with the law. They would preach Christ, as they called it; but without one word of holiness or good works. Yet these were still denominated Methodists, although differing from Mr. Whitfield, both in judgment and practice, abundantly more than Mr. Whitfield did from Mr. Wesley.

13. In the mean time, Mr. Venn and Mr. Romaine began to be spoken of: And not long after, Mr. Madan and Mr. Berridge, with a few other clergymen, who, although they had no connection with each other, yet preaching salvation by faith, and endeavouring to live accordingly, to be Bible-Christians, were soon included in the general name of Methodists. And so indeed were all others, who preached salvation by faith, and appeared more serious than others. Some of these were quite regular in their manner of preaching: Some were quite irregular, though not by choice; but necessity was laid upon them; they must preach irregularly, or not at all: And others were between both; regular in most though not in all particulars.

14. In 1762, George Bell, and a few other persons, began to speak great words. In the latter end of the year they foretold, that the world would be at an end on the 28th of February. Mr. Wesley, with whom they were then connected, withstood them in public and private. This they would not endure: So, in January and February 1763, they separated from him, under the care of Mr. Maxfield, one of Mr. Wesley's preachers. But still Mr. Maxfield and his adherents, even the wildest enthusiasts among them, go under the general name of Methodists, and so bring a scandal upon those with whom they have no connection.

15. At present, those who remain with Mr. Wesley are mostly church of England men. They love her articles, her homilies, her liturgy, her discipline, and unwillingly vary from it in any instance. Meantime, all who preach among them declare, we are all by nature children of wrath. But by grace we are saved through faith: saved both from the guilt and from the power of sin. They endeavour to live according to what they preach, to be plain, Bible Christians. And they meet together at convenient times, to encourage one another therein. They tenderly love many that are Calvinists, though they do not love their opinions. Yea, they love the Antinomians themselves, but it is with a love of compassion only, for they hate their doctrines with a perfect hatred; they abhor them as they do hell-fire; being convinced that nothing can so effectually destroy all faith, all holiness, and all good works.

16. With regard to these, Mr. Rely and his adherents, it would not be strange, if they should grow into reputation. For they will never shock the world, either by the harshness of their doctrine, or the singularity of their behaviour. But let those who determine both to preach and live in the gospel, expect that men will say all manner of evil of them. The servant is not above his master, nor the disciple above his Lord. If then they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household? It is their duty indeed, as lieth in them, to live peaceably with all men. But when they labour after peace, they will make themselves ready for battle. It is their constant endeavour to please all men, for their good, to edification. But yet they know it cannot be done. They remember the word of the apostle, If I yet please men, I am not the servant of Christ. They go on, therefore, through honour and dishonour, through evil report and good report; desiring only, that their master may say in that day, "Servants of God, well done."

As these people are extremely numerous in England; as there are undoubtedly among them many men of real piety, and as Mr. Wesley has declared himself to be an Arminian, we must here take notice of what he says on that subject.

We have already taken notice of the Arminian Presbyterians, but their notions are not the same with those of Mr. Wesley. Mr. Wesley's notions are the same as those taught by Arminius himself; and we must acknowledge he has defined them in a clear, as well as a judicious manner.

1. To say "This man is an Arminian," has the same effect on many hearers, as to say, "This is a mad dog." It puts them into a fright at once: they run away from him with all speed and diligence; and will hardly stop, unless it be to throw a stone at the dreadful and mischievous animal.

2. The more unintelligible the word is, the better it answers the purpose. Those on whom it is fixt, know not what to do. Not understanding what it means, they cannot tell what defence to make, or how to clear themselves from the charge. And it is not easy to remove the prejudice which others have imbibed, who know no more of it than that it is something very bad, if not all that is bad.

3. To clear the meaning therefore of this ambiguous term, may be of use to many; to those who so freely pin this name upon others, that they may not say what they do not understand; to those that hear them, that they may be no longer abused by men, saying they know not what; and to those upon whom the name is fixt, that they know how to answer for themselves.

4. It may be necessary to observe, first, that many confound Arminians with Arians. But this is entirely a different thing: the one has no resemblance to the other. An Arian is one who denies the godhead of Christ; we scarce need to say, the supreme, eternal godhead; because there can be no God but the supreme, eternal God, unless we will make two Gods, a great God and a little one. Now none have ever more firmly believed, or more strongly asserted the godhead of Christ, than many of the (so called) Arminians have done; yea, and do at this day. Arminianism, therefore, whatever it be, is totally different from Arianism.

5. The rise of the word was this, James Harmens, in Latin, Jacobus Arminius, was first one of the ministers of Amsterdam, and afterwards professor of divinity at Leyden. He was educated at Geneva; but in the year 1591, began to doubt of the principles which he had till then received. And being more and more convinced that they were wrong, when he was vested with the professorship, he publicly taught what he believed the truth, till the year 1609, he died in peace. But a few years after his death, some zealous men, with the prince of Orange at their head, furiously assaulted all that held what were called his opinions, and having procured them to be solemnly condemned in the famous synod of Dort, not so numerous or learned, but full as impartial as the council or synod of Trent, some were put to death, some banished, some imprisoned for life, all turned out of their employments, and made incapable of holding any office either in church or state.

6. The errors charged upon these, usually termed Arminians, by their opponents are five: 1. That they deny original sin. 2. That they deny justification by faith. 3. That they deny absolute predestination. 4. That they deny the grace of God to be irresistible. And 5. That they affirm, a believer may fall from grace.

With regard to the two first of these charges, they plead not guilty. They are entirely false. No man that ever lived, even John Calvin himself, even asserted either original sin or justification by faith, in more strong, more clear and express terms than Arminius has done. These two points therefore are to be set out of the question: In these both parties agree. In this respect there is not an hair's breadth difference between Mr. Wesley and Mr. Whitfield.

7. But there is an undeniable difference between the Calvinists and Arminians, with regard to the three other questions. Here they divide: The former believe absolute, the latter only conditional predestination. The Calvinists hold, 1. God has absolutely decreed, from all eternity, to save such and such persons, and no others, and that Christ died for these and none else. The Arminians hold, God has decreed from all eternity, touching all that have the written word, He that believeth, shall be saved: He that believeth not, shall be condemned. And in order to this, Christ died for all, all that were dead in trespasses and sins: that is, for every child of Adam, since in Adam all died.

8. The Calvinists hold, secondly, That the saving grace of God is absolutely irresistible: That no man is any more able to resist it, than to resist the stroke of lightning. The Arminians hold, that although there may be some moments wherein the grace of God acts irresistibly, yet in general any man may resist, and that to his eternal ruin, the grace whereby it was the will of God, he should have been eternally saved.

9. The Calvinists hold, thirdly, That a true believer in Christ, cannot possibly fall from grace. The Arminians hold, that a true believer may make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience: That he may fall, not only foully, but finally, so as to perish for ever.

10. Indeed the two latter points, irresistible grace and infallible perseverance, are the natural consequences of the former, of the unconditional decree. For if God has eternally and absolutely decreed to save such and such persons, it follows, both that they cannot resist his saving grace, else they might miss of salvation, and that they cannot resist. So that in effect, the three questions come into one, "Is predestination absolute or conditional?" The Arminians believe it is conditional: the Calvinists that it is absolute.

11. Away then with all ambiguity! Away with all expressions which only puzzle the cause. Let honest men speak out, and not play with hard words, which they do not understand. And how can any man know what Arminius held, who has never read one page of his writings? Let no man bawl against Arminians, till he knows what the term means.— And then he will know that Arminians and Calvinists are just upon a level. And Arminians have as much right to be angry at Calvinists, as Calvinists have to be angry at Arminians. John Calvin was a pious, learned, sensible man: and so was James Harmens. Many Calvinists are pious, learned, sensible men: and so are many Arminians. Only the former hold absolute predestination, the latter conditional.

12. One word more. Is it not the duty of every Arminian preacher, first, never in public or in private, to use the word Calvinist as a term of reproach; seeing it is neither better nor worse than calling names? a practice no more consistent with good sense, or good manners, than it is with Christianity. Secondly, to do all that in him lies, to prevent his hearers from doing it, by shewing them the sin and folly of it. And is it not equally the duty of every Calvinist preacher, first, never in public or in private, in preaching or in conversation, to use the word Arminian as a term of reproach? Secondly, to do all that in him lies, to prevent his hearers from doing it, by shewing them the sin and folly thereof. And that the more earnestly and diligently, if they have been accustomed so to do; perhaps encouraged therein by his own example.

The Arminian Methodists have several different sorts of societies, and likewise charitable institutions, of which we shall take notice as they lay in order, according to their seniority. The first of all these was called the Band Society, because they entered into it upon promises and engagements to abide by a certain number of rules.

The design of our meeting is to obey that command of God—Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that you may be healed.

To this end, we intend,

1. To meet once a week at the least.
2. To come punctually at the hour appointed, without some particular reason.
3. To begin, those of us who are present, exactly at the hour, with singing or prayer.
4. To speak each of us in order, freely and plainly the true state of our souls, with the faults we have committed in thought, word, or deed, and the temptations we have felt since our last meeting.
5. To end every meeting with prayer, suited to the state of each person present.
6. To desire some person among us to speak his own state first, and then to ask the rest in order, as many and as searching questions as may be, concerning their state, sins, and temptations.

Some of the questions proposed to every one before he is admitted among us, may be to this effect:

1. Have you the forgiveness of your sins?
2. Have you peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ?
3. Have you the witness of God's spirit with your spirit, that you are a child of God?

4. Is the love of God shed abroad in your heart?
5. Has no sin, inward or outward, dominion over you?

6. Do you desire to be told of your faults?

7. Do you desire to be told of all your faults, and that plain and home?

8. Do you desire, that every one of us should tell you, from time to time, whatsoever is in his heart concerning you?

9. Consider! Do you desire we should tell you whatsoever we think, whatsoever we fear, whatsoever we hear, concerning you?

10. Do you desire, that in doing this, we should come as close as possible, that we should cut to the quick, and search your heart to the bottom?

11. Is it your desire and design, to be on this and all other occasions, entirely open, so as to speak every thing that is in your heart without exception, without disguise, and without reserve?

Any of the preceding questions may be asked as occasion may offer: the five following at every meeting:

1. What known sins have you committed since our last meeting?

2. What temptations have you met with?

3. How was you delivered?

4. What have you thought, said, or done, of which you doubt whether it be sin or not?

5. Have you nothing you desire to keep secret?

You are supposed to have the faith that overcometh the world. To you therefore it is not grievous,

1. Carefully to abstain from doing evil: in particular,

1. Neither to buy or sell any thing at all on the Lord's day.

2. To taste no spirituous liquor, no dram of any kind unless prescribed by a physician.

3. To be at a word, both in buying and selling.

4. To pawn nothing, no, not to save life.

5. Not to mention the fault of any behind his back, and to stop those short that do.

6. To wear no needless ornaments, such as rings, ear-rings, necklaces, laces, ruffles.

7. To use no needless self-indulgence, such as taking snuff or tobacco, unless prescribed by a physician.

11. Zealously to maintain good works: in particular,

1. To give alms of such things as you possess, and that to the utmost of your power.

2. To reprove all that sin in your sight, and that in love and meekness of wisdom.

3. To be patterns of diligence and frugality, of self-denial, and taking up the cross daily.

III. Constantly to attend on all the ordinances of God: in particular,

1. To be at church, and at the Lord's table every week and at every public meeting of the bands.

2. To attend the ministry of the word every morning, unless distance, business, or sickness prevent.

3. To use private prayer every day, and family prayer, if you are the head of a family.

4. To read the scripture, and meditate thereon, at every vacant hour. And,

5. To observe, as days of fasting or abstinence, all Fridays in the year.

It is in general a maxim in morals, that there can be no existence of religion without knowledge, and knowledge must be acquired by education, by instructions from those advanced in years, and by conversation with the world. By the world, we mean those people who have a great deal of human knowledge, and behold human nature operating in practice. We shall take it for granted, that what Mr. Wesley says concerning his own schools is true; and indeed, there can remain little doubt of it, because, as the Methodists have many enemies, so if a falsehood was advanced in print, it would be no difficult matter to contradict it.

The following Account of the Methodist School near Bristol, is thus related.

1. Our design is, with God's assistance, to train up children in every branch of useful learning.

2. We teach none but boarders. These are taken in, being between the years of six and twelve, in order to be taught Reading, Writing, Arithmetick, English, French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, History, Geography, Chronology, Rhetoric, Logic, Ethics, Geometry, Algebra, Physics, Music.

2. The School contains eight classes:

In the first class the children read instructions for children, and lessons for children; and begin learning to write.

In the second class they read the manners of the ancient Christians, go on in writing, learn the short English grammar, the short Latin grammar, read Praelectiones Pueriles; translate them into English, and the instructions for children into Latin; part of which they transcribe and repeat.

In the third class they read Dr. Caves Primitive Christianity, go on in writing, perfect themselves in the English and Latin Grammar; read Corderii Colloquia Selecta and Historia Selectæ; translate Historia Selectæ into English, and Lessons for Children into Latin: Part of which they transcribe and repeat.

In the fourth class they read the Pilgrim's Progress, perfect themselves in writing, learn Dilworth's Arithmetic, read Castellio's Kempis and Cornelius Nepos: translate Castellio into English, and manners of the ancient Christians into Latin; transcribe and repeat Select Portions of Moral and Sacred Poems.

In the fifth class they read the life of Mr. Haliburton, perfect themselves in arithmetic; read Select Dialogues of Erasmus, Phædrus and Sallust: translate Erasmus into English, and Primitive Christianity into Latin; transcribe and repeat Select Portions of Moral and Sacred Poems.

In the sixth class they read the life of Mr. De Renty, and Kennet's Roman Antiquities: they learn Randal's Geography: read Caesar, Select Parts of Terence and Velleius Paternus; translate Erasmus into English, and the life of Mr. Haliburton into Latin; transcribe and repeat select portions of sacred hymns and poems.

In the seventh class they read Mr. Law's Christian Perfection, and archbishop Potter's Greek Antiquities: they learn Bengelii Introductio ad Chronologiam, with Marshall's Chronological Tables: read Tully's Offices and Virgil's Æneid: translate Bengelius in English, and Mr. Law into Latin: learn, those who have a turn for it, to make verses, and the short Greek Grammar: read the epistles of St. John: transcribe and repeat select portions of Milton.

In the eighth class they read Mr. Law's Serious Call, and Lewis's Hebrew Antiquities: they learn to make themes, and to declaim: learn Vossius's Rhetoric: read Tully's Tusculan Questions, and Selecta ex Ovidio, Virgilio, Horatio, Juvenale, Persio, Martiale: perfect themselves in the Greek Grammar: read the Gospels and Six Books of Homer's Iliad: translate Tully into English, and Mr. Law into Latin: learn the short Hebrew Grammar, and read Genesis: transcribe and repeat Selecta ex Virgilio, Horatio, Juvenale.

4. It is our particular desire, that all who are educated here, may be brought up in the fear of God; and at the utmost distance as far from vice in general, so in particular from idleness and effeminacy. The children therefore of tender parents, so called (who are indeed offering up their sons and their daughters unto devils), have no business here; for the rules will not be broken in favour of any person whatsoever. Nor is any child received unless his parents agree, 1. That he shall observe all the rules of the house; and 2. That they will not take him from school, no, not a day, till they take him for good and all.

5. The general rules of the house are these:

First, The children rise at four, winter and summer, and spend the time till five in private; partly in reading, partly in singing, partly in self-examination or meditation (if capable of it) and partly in prayer. They at first use a short form (which is varied continually) and then pray in their own words.

Secondly, At five they all meet together. From six they work till breakfast. For as we have no play-days (the school being taught every day in the year but Sunday), so neither do we allow any time to play on any day. He that plays when he is a child, will play when he is a man.

On fair days they work, according to their strength, in the garden; on rainy days in the house. Some of them also learn music: and some of the larger will be employed in philosophical experiments. But particular care is taken that they never work alone, but always in the presence of a master.

We have three masters; one for teaching reading, and two for the languages.

Thirdly, The school begins at seven, in which languages are taught till nine, and then writing, &c. till eleven. At eleven the children walk or work. At twelve they dine, and then work or sing till one. They diet nearly thus:

Breakfast, milk-porridge and water-gruel, by turns. Supper, bread and butter, or cheese, and milk by turns.

Dinner, Sunday, cold roast beef.

Monday, hashed meat and apple-dumplings.

Tuesday, boiled mutton.

Wednesday, vegetables and dumplings.

Thursday, boiled mutton or beef.

Friday, vegetables and dumplings: and so in lent.

Saturday, bacon and greens, apple-dumplings.

They drink water at meals: nothing between meals. On Friday, if they chuse it, they fast till three in the afternoon. Experience shews, this is so far from impairing health, that it greatly conduces to it.

Fourthly, From one to four languages are taught, and then writing, &c. till five. At five begins the hour of private prayer. From six they walk or work till supper. A little before seven the public service begins. At eight they go to bed, the youngest first.

Fifthly, They used to lodge all in one room, but now in two, in which lamps burn all night. Every child lies by himself. A master lies at each end of the room. All their beds have mattresses on them, not feather beds.

Sixthly, On Sunday, at six, they dress and breakfast; at seven, learn hymns or poems; at nine, attend the public service; at twelve, dine and sing; at two attend the public service, and at four are privately instructed.

6. The method observed in the school is this :

The First Class.

Morn. 7. Read. 10. Write till eleven.
 Aftern. 1. Read. 4. Write till five.

The Second Class.

- M. 7. Read the Manners of the Ancient Christians.
 8. Learn the English Grammar: when that is ended, the Latin Grammar.
 10. Learn to write.
 A. 1. Learn to construe and parse Prælectiones Pueriles.
 4. Translate into English and Latin alternately.

The Third Class.

- M. 7. Read Primitive Christianity.
 8. Repeat English and Latin Grammar alternately.
 9. Learn Corderius, and, when that is ended, Historia Selectæ.
 10. Write.
 A. 1. Learn Corderius and Historiæ Selectæ.
 4. Translate.

The Fourth Class.

- M. 7. Read the Pilgrim's Progress.
 8. Repeat the Grammar.
 9. Learn Castellio's Kempis, and when that is ended, Cornelius Nepos.
 10. Write and learn Arithmetic.
 A. 1. Learn Kempis and Cornelius Nepos.
 4. Translate.

The Fifth Class.

- M. 6. Read Mr. Haliburton's Life.
 8. Repeat the Grammars.
 9. Learn Erasmus; afterwards Phædrus: then Sallust.
 10. Learn Arithmetic.
 A. 1. Learn Erasmus, Phædrus, Sallust.
 4. Translate.

The Sixth Class.

- M. 7. Read Mr. Renty's Life.
 8. Repeat the Grammars.

9. Learn Caesar; afterwards Terence: then Velleius Paterculus.
 10. Learn Geography.
 A. 1. Learn Caesar, Terence, Paterculus.
 2. Read Roman Antiquities.
 4. Translate.

The Seventh Class.

- M. 7. Read Mr. Law's Christian Perfection.
 8. } M. W. F. Learn the Greek Grammar; and read the Greek Testament.
 } Tu. Th. Sat. Learn Tully; afterwards Virgil.
 10. Learn Chronology.
 A. 1. Learn Latin and Greek alternately, as in the Morning.
 3. Read Grecian Antiquities.
 4. Translate, and make verses alternately.

The Eighth Class.

- M. 7. Read Mr. Law's Serious Call.
 8. } M. Th. Latin.
 } Tu. Frid. Greek.
 } W. S. Hebrew; and so at one in the afternoons.
 10. Learn Rhetoric.
 A. 3. Read Hebrew Antiquities.
 Mond. Thurs. Translate.
 Tues. Friday, make verses.
 Wednesday, make a theme.
 Saturday, write a declamation.

All the other classes spend Saturday afternoon in arithmetic, and in transcribing what they learn on Sunday, and repeat on Monday morning.

The price for the board and teaching of a child, including his books, pens, ink and paper, is fourteen pounds a year, while he is in the school; after he has gone through the school, twenty, and he is then to find his own books.

The following method is to be observed by those who design to go through a course of academical learning.

Whoever carefully goes through this course, will be a better scholar than nine in ten of the graduates at Oxford or Cambridge.

The only remarks we would make on this plan of education is, that it is far from being a bad one; but some of the books are not well chosen, because they clash with each other in sentiment. It is true, that learning cannot be acquired properly without hearing both sides of the argument; but this would be much better in riper years, than when people are unacquainted with knowledge.

As for their Love-feasts, we shall only observe, that something of a similar nature was observed in the primitive times; but that arose from motives of necessity, when the poor-slaves who had been converted to the Christian religion, were entertained at the public expence. At present there can be no necessity for any such thing, because those who seek to relieve the poor, may do it at their own homes.

At these Love-feasts they eat a biscuit or bun, drink a glass of water, and sing about half a score of hymns. The expence for buns, water, and hymns, is defrayed by a subscription from their own body; and as no specific sum is required of any person, every one is left at full liberty to give according to ability or inclination: the overplus, if any, after defraying the above expences, is religiously devoted to the poor.

They have another ceremony which has been much complained of, and that is what they call their watch-nights; in which they sit whole nights, singing hymns in their meetings, of which the following is a specimen:

1. Join all ye ransom'd sons of grace,
The holy joy prolong,
And shout to the Redeemer's praise
A solemn midnight song.
2. Blessing, and thanks, and love, and might,
Be to our Jesus given,
Who turns our darkness into light,
Who turns our hell to heaven.

3. Thither our faithful souls he leads,
Thither he bids us rise,
With crowns of joy upon our heads
To meet him in the skies.
4. To seal the universal doom,
The skies he soon shall bow;
But if you must at midnight come,
O let us meet thee now.

It is true, the primitive Christians met in the night, as appears from the famous epistle written by Pliny the consul to the emperor Trajan, about the beginning of the second century: But this was owing to persecution, when they were prohibited from meeting in the day. The followers of Mr. Wesley are under no such necessity, for they are not persecuted, nor are they excluded from any of the benefits in the toleration act. It is very certain, that their sitting up a whole night in their meetings, must render them incapable of labour next day; and this, instead of being consistent with religion, is quite contrary to it. For God has ordered every thing so wisely, that one shall not clash with another.

The last thing to be taken notice of concerning these people is, the manner in which they are, or at least believe themselves to be, converted. And yet they are very contradictory in these things. A person of high rank shewed the author the following epitaph, which he copied from one of their grave-stones at Margate.

“Here lies A. B. who was sanctified from the womb, and whose sins were pardoned through the merits of Christ.”

Where the epitaph-maker learned his divinity we shall not say, but surely the absurdity is unparalled. A man was sanctified from the womb, which implies, that he had never been guilty of sin, and yet his sins were pardoned through the merits of Christ.

We could give many instances of these real or imaginary conversions; but some of them would rather offend a delicate ear, and others would afford matter of lamentation to those who love Christ in reality, and rejoice to do his will. We shall, however, insert the account of one written by a father relating to his son. It is an honour for a man to love his child, but it is a real happiness to see him going on in the fear of God through all the afflictions of this life.

Account of the Conversion and Death of Thomas Hitchens.

My son, Thomas Hitchens, was born April 14, 1723. He went to school till he was about ten years old. From school he went to work at the stamps in dressing of tin ore, in which employment he continued about six years. Afterwards he wrought in the tin-works under ground, till about a year before his death. Then he went to dress tin-leavings for me, having five or six boys under him. At the same time he ploughed, sowed, mowed, reaped, and managed my husbandry; understanding every thing both as to the tin and the land, so that we had scarce one in the neighbourhood like him.

He was from a child of a very sober and a very sweet behaviour, and remarkably dutiful to his parents. But about nineteen he began to go to revelings and hurlings, and sometimes to be merry with his companions. Of this I now and then told him, but not sharply: for I counted both him and his brother mighty good young men. And was not a little proud, when people told me, “I had two likely sons, and as stout men as any in the parish.” I thought it best, therefore, to let him have his liberty; especially as I then saw no great harm in these things.

But he had done with these from the hour he first heard the Gospel of the grace of God. He then chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than enjoy all the pleasures of sin. He had no fear in the hottest of the persecution. While the mob were pulling down the house in which we used to meet, he stood at a small distance all the time, being nothing terrified, and encouraged his brother, and said, “God will deliver us; only let us trust in him.” Nor was he at all moved, when the showers of stones obliged us to stop up all our windows with whole deals. One night we heard a great tumult and noise, as of much people and many cries; and it was told us, they were at the house of one of our brethren, who lived about a quarter of a mile off. Thomas did not take time to go the road way, though it was exceeding dark, but ran directly through the grounds and over the hedges, till he came to the house.

The mob, hearing the sound of feet, ran away, not one being left behind. So, said Thomas, the scripture is fulfilled; “One of you shall chase a thousand.” As he came into the house, the family too, were preparing to run out of it. But he soon convinced them they had no cause to fear, and they mightily rejoiced together, and praised God who had delivered them out of the hands of unreasonable and cruel men. All the windows and doors were dashed in pieces, but none of the family hurt at all, notwithstanding the vast quantities of stones which had fallen on all sides of them. One very large stone they found in the cradle, close by a little child. But the child was not hurt. So that in all things they saw the hand of God was over them for good.

About eighteen months ago, while his brother William and he were working in the pit with another man, who cried for help, and Thomas ran towards the place where he was. In running, his light went out; but he found the man by his voice, though not till he was almost covered in. Before he had cleared him, the earth calved in again, and he was very near covered himself. And but that it stopt, they knew not but in one minute more they must both have perished together. William hearing the noise, made up to the place, and in some time relieved them both. Of this Thomas often made mention, praising God for his wonderful deliverance.

Some account of the manner wherein he found peace with God, two or three months after his brother, I lately found in his pocket book. The substance of it was this:

"In reading the three first chapters of St. John, while I was in much trouble and heaviness of soul, the Lord gave me great comfort; especially from these words, "To as many as believe in his name, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." But soon after I was stript of all, and thought God had left me a final cast-away. Nevertheless I went into my closet, and with a heavy heart said, Lord I praise thee, that thou hast not given me over unto death. But how shall I appear before thee? While I spoke, the Lord answered and applied these words, I am thy righteousness; which burst the cords that before kept my spirit down.

He often complained, that when he found great joy, he was in the greatest danger, both of pride and lightness. And therefore said, he had much rather, if it were the will of God, be always in a mourning state. He likewise found great temptation to pride when he was most blest in speaking to the people. And this was the main reason of his not stirring up the gift of God which was in him.

He frequently repeated those words of St. Paul, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman."—And those of Job, "I have made my covenant with my eyes; why then should I think upon a maid?" He was very jealous over himself when he was in company with those of a different sex. And if no man besides himself was there, he generally quitted the company as soon as he could.

In the latter part of his life he was much grown in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. He sometimes saw, as he said, anger or pride in himself; but they had no power: Neither had they love or desire of any creature; they were all in subjection under his feet: he was more and more dead to all earthly things, and filled with the fire of God's love. The work of God had a deeper root in his heart, and he was more settled and established in the grace of God.

After his brother's death, he declared he could not rest through the earnestness of his desire to follow him. However in the mean time, he put in practice what Samuel spoke of, namely, meeting all the family once a week. He reproved me and his mother in several things; but we could not reprove him in any. I could not convince him or Samuel of sin, for two years or more.

On Wednesday September 10, in the evening he found himself out of order: He went to bed something earlier than usual, and soon appeared to be in a high fever. But his confidence in God was still the same, and all his words, both that night and the next day, convinced all who came near him, that the peace of God continually ruled in his heart.

On Thursday evening, between nine and ten, his sisters sitting by him, he said, "Lord, shall I call, and wilt thou not answer? No: It cannot be.—Thou hast promised, every one that asks in faith shall receive." Then he began praying for his father and mother; for his brothers and sisters, and in particular for her that sat by him. "O my God marry her to thyself. Make her all glorious within. Give her an undivided heart." He then prayed for himself. "Now come, O my God, and sanctify me wholly. Press me closer to thyself. Thou knowest, this is all my desire. Give me power to declare thy wondrous works before I go hence.—"O Death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory."

As Mary Bisvine came to the bed-side, he looked on her and said, "Now I am free. Now my heart is at liberty. I will praise my God as long as I have breath." After speaking much to the same effect, he lay still a small time, and then broke out into exceeding loud, vehement prayer, his voice being quite altered and every sentence pronounced with uncommon emphasis. He prayed first for all estates and conditions of men; that the church of Christ might spread over all nations; that ten thousand times ten thousand might be converted to God, and all the people of the earth praise him. Then he prayed for all the ministers of the gospel, from the greatest even to the least: especially for those whom God had lately employed to seek and save those that were lost in Cornwall. Afterwards he prayed for John Trembath that he might live to the glory of God, who had brought him back from the gates of death, and might be a means of saving many souls from the bitter pains of eternal death. He then prayed for the society, O Lord, unite them as the heart of one man. O Lord give them eyes to see whereinsoever they have departed from Thee. O take from them the spirit of unthankfulness, and suffer them not to bite or devour one another.—Heal thou their backslidings and spread over them the banner of thy love!”

With prayer there was continual praise intermixt. Sometimes he was blessing God for what he had done, then praying, “O my God finish thy work and take me into thy kingdom. Is this the day, O my God, that I shall kiss my brother in Paradise? O Lord, the angels have already praised Thee at my conversion. Is this the day that I shall praise Thee with them? Yes, O my God, I am now going to join them, to sing praises to thee for ever.”

Then he prayed with great earnestness for Mary Bisvine and his own sister, both whom he had in the beginning of the evening desired to stay with him till he was in eternity, that they might never grow weary or faint in their minds, that God would send down the spirit of sanctification into their hearts, and give them resigned wills to bear whatever his providence should lay upon them: Adding, They shall run and not be weary. I know we shall meet together, and sing praises unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever.”

He went on, “O how good is God to me, that he hath given me a tongue to praise him! A little while, yet a little while, and I shall praise him in heaven! O the goodness of God, that I a worm of the earth, shall stand there, upon Mount Zion, with the three hundred forty and four thousand, which have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb! Here is a privilege; here is a wonder, that I am made a son of God! I am a son of God and a joint-heir with Christ, and I shall soon be where I shall behold him for ever; I, even I, who have been a backslider from God! But he has healed my backslidings and loved me freely.”

Soon after he said, “I love thee, O my God, thou knowest I love thee, because thou hast first loved me. O what manner of love is this, that God should stoop to love me? And he is coming to carry me home. O! I see, thousands and ten thousands of angels! Do you not see them? O brother Trembath, do you not see what a glorious place I am going to? I am going to join with angels and arch-angels, and with all the company of heaven.—I am going to reign with God, among ten thousands of his saints, and to bask in the beams of his love for ever.”

Then looking on Mary Bisvine he said, “Canst you see Jesus Christ coming, with an innumerable company of angels, and the golden banner displayed? They are coming to carry me to the bosom of my God. Open their eyes O God, that they may see them. O what a good God have I served! I am sanctified, soul, body and spirit. I am whiter than snow. I am washed in the blood of my Redeemer. Why, I am all God. My heart is full of God! O let them who hear me now, praise thee for ever and ever.”

“And yet I have been unfaithful to my God.—For he gave me a gift, but I improved it not. I thought I was not worthy to stand in the highways and call sinners to repentance. But, O God, thou hast forgiven me this also, and I will preach thee now as long as I have breath.”

He ceased not thus praying and praising for an hour. His parents then coming in, early on Friday morning, he said, “O my mother, you will not weep to see me going to such a loving God. My father and mother will not be backsliders. No; I know God loves them, and that we shall all meet together in heaven, to praise him to all eternity.”—Then looking on his brother, about twelve years old, he said, “stand off for fear you should catch the distemper, for I fear you are not prepared to die. You have played away the grace of God.—The harvest may come before you are renewed in the image of God, and then how will you appear? Cry mightily to God. Strive with all your might.—Call upon him, and God will hear.”

He then said, “Right my feet, that I may lie straight, to resign my breath. When I am dead, do you sing me all the way, sing my body to the grave, lay me by my brother, and at the same time my spirit shall be joined to his, and to ten thousand times ten thousand of angels and spirits, singing praises to God and the Lamb for ever.”

Having spoken till he had no breath left, he paused; and in a short time began again. “Hear now the words of a dying man, a living wonder, a Christian triumphing over death! O what a God do the Christians serve! What a God I have served! Praise him with me for ever. Behold the immense goodness of our God. O that all the world knew our God! He hath now made my heart free, that I may praise him, and I cannot stop while I have breath. Go, tell all the world of this. O brethren! What a good God do we serve: Be not afraid to tell it abroad: Go, shew it to all people, that they may come and serve him too.”

When he stopped speaking, the oppression on his breast returned. This he took notice of, and said, “While I am praising God my heart is free; but when I cease I feel this load again. But I may well bear this, for this is all the hell I shall have.”—Then he broke out,

“See a soul escape to bliss,
“Keep the Christian festival.”

“He hath washed me, and I am whiter than snow. God is mine, and I am God’s. I shall soon be with him.” Thus he continued till he could speak no more.

ACCOUNT OF THE ANTINOMIANS.

THIS sect is so named from two Greek words, which mean contrary to the law; signifying a contradiction between two laws, and between two articles of the same law.

The first whom we read of was one John Agricola, who lived about the middle of the fourteenth century, and who taught that the law is no way necessary under the gospel: That good works do not promote our salvation, nor ill ones hinder it. That repentance is not to be preached from the ten commandments, but only from the gospel; or, in other words, he was for carrying gospel liberty above all moral rectitude, and for slighting the motives of virtue as insufficient to further salvation.

They were not, however, in England, till after the Reformation, and there were few of them till the time of the civil wars in the last century. Some of the Scottish Presbyterians wrote against them, and Rutherford in particular was for having them all hang'd. Rutherford was learnedly answer'd by several clergymen, among whom were the following:—Tobias Crisp, D.D. who died in the year 1641. He was a good preacher and a good man; was first zealously attached to the principles of Arminianism, but changing his opinions, ran into the contrary extreme of Antinomianism. The publisher of his works says, "That his life was so innocent, and free from all evil, so zealous and fervent in all good, that it seem'd to be design'd as a practical confutation of the slander of those who would insinuate, that his doctrine tended to licentiousness." He was possessed of a very large estate, with which he did a great deal of good.

Mr. John Saltmarsh, of Magdalen College, a man of a fine active fancy, says Neale, no contemptible poet, and a good preacher, and chaplain in the parliament-army. The manner of his death, as related by Rushworth, was very extraordinary.—December 4, 1637, being at his house at Ilford, in Essex, he told his wife that he had been in a trance, and received a message from God, which he must immediately deliver to the army. He went that night to London, and next day to Windsor. Being come to the council of officers, he told them, that the Lord had left them; that he would not prosper their consultations, but destroy them by divisions among themselves, because they had sought to destroy the people of God, those who had stood by them in the greatest difficulties. He then went to the general, and, without moving his hat, told him, that God was highly displeas'd with him for committing of saints to prison. The like message he deliver'd to Cromwell, and required him to take effectual measures for the enlargement of the members of the army, that were committed for not complying with the general council. He then took his leave of the officers, telling them, that he had now done his errand, and must leave them, never to see them any more. After which he went to London, and took leave of his friends there, telling them his work was done, and desiring some of them to be careful of his wife. Thursday, December 9, he return'd to Ilford, in perfect health; next day he told his wife that he had now finish'd his work, and must go to his father. Saturday morning, December 11, he was taken speechless, and about four in the afternoon he died.

It is certain, that in the two volumes of sermons published by Dr. Crisp's executors, and to which notes have been added by the late Dr. Gill, there are many things very exceptionable. It does not satisfy him to say, that Christ's sufferings were for the guilty, but he boldly asserts, that he was even sin itself; a sentiment we know not what to make of. It is true the Apostle says, "He hath made him to be sin for us; but in another place the Apostle explains what he means by these words; for he says, "He suffered the just for the unjust." Thus had Christ been sin itself, how could he have made an atonement for it? The words mean no more than imputation, or a vicarious sacrifice, by which Christ was the substitute in the room of sinners.

With respect to the writings of Saltmarsh, they are very engaging at first sight, but upon a sober review, the force of the argument wears off. As the Antinomians were never very numerous, so there are but few particulars relating to them worthy of notice till the present age. In the time of the civil wars, the churches were fill'd with preachers of many different denominations; some of whom were Antinomians; but from that time till the rise of Methodism, about forty years ago, they were not much heard of in England. Perhaps there were not two meetings; but we shall now proceed to point out what they then believ'd; and, secondly, what they are at present.

They believed, that the whole work of man's salvation was accomplished by Jesus Christ on the cross. That Christ's blood and our sins went away together. That then all our sins were taken away by Christ, and blotted out for ever. That nothing else beside faith is required in order to justification and salvation. That there is but one duty, which is that of believing: one must do nothing, but quietly attend the voice of the Lord. The gates of heaven are shut upon workers, and open to believers. If we do nothing for heaven, we do as much as God requires. To believe certainly that Christ suffered death for us, is enough; we want no more. We are justified by our submitting in our judgments to the truth of God's grace in Christ Jesus. It is not necessary that a man do any works that he may be justified and saved. God doth not require thee to do any thing that thou mayest be saved or justified. The law sets thee to work; but the gospel binds thee to do nothing at all. Nay, the works are not only not required, but forbidden. God forbids us to work for justification; and when the Apostle Paul pressed men to believe, it is as much as if he had bid them not to work.

That the moral law is nothing to man. From any demand of the law no man is obliged to go one step, to give away one farthing, to eat, or omit one morsel. For what did our Lord do with the law? He abolished it. That a spiritual man beholdeth justifying grace in believing, without his obedience to commands for external worship and good works, Col. ii. 20. That outward things do nothing avail to salvation. If love to God, and love to our neighbour, and relieving the poor, be altogether unprofitable and unavoidable, either to justification or salvation, then these outward works, in submitting to outward ordinances, viz. the ordinances of Christ, are much less available. Those persons bring in the most dangerous kind of popery, and pervert the gospel of Christ, who persuade men, that if they do not submit to the ordinances of the Lord Jesus, he will not confess them before his father. It is better not to practise them on these gospel destroying principles, to the ruining of our souls. A believer has no inherent righteousness: God will save us to the utmost without any righteousness or holiness of our own. To look for inherent righteousness is to deny the spirit, and trample under foot the blood of the covenant. But believers have not any inherent righteousness in them. Our righteousness is nothing but the imputation of the righteousness of Christ. A believer has no holiness in himself, but in Christ only. The trials of the spirit, commonly called sanctification, such as love, gentleness, long-suffering, goodness, meekness, temperance, neither make us holy before God, nor in our own consciences, that is, we are not made good or holy by any inward qualities or dispositions; but being made pure and holy in our consciences, by believing in Christ, we bear forth inwardly and outwardly the fruits of holiness. A believer does not increase in holiness as he increases in the love of God and man. The very moment he is justified, he is wholly sanctified, and he is neither more nor less holy from that hour to the day of his death. Entire justification, and entire sanctification, are in the same instant, and neither of them is, therefore, capable of increase or decrease. We are to grow in grace, but not in holiness. The moment we are justified, we are as pure in heart as ever we shall be. A new born babe is as pure in heart as a father in Christ; there is no difference.

In addition to this collective detail of the principles of the Antinomians, we shall give our readers the substance of a letter received from one of them, which, perhaps, is a more perfect view of the principles of the sect, and of many popular preachers, who yet do not separate from the church, or the sects with which they are united, on that account.

“ This I have occasion to observe, that no sooner does a person believe and profess salvation alone by Christ, without works of righteousness, as done by him, but immediately upon his embracing such a profession, he shall be branded with the name of an Antinomian, though he should be at the same time, notwithstanding his change of profession, as to his behaviour and deportment in life, as unblameable as the strictest legalist whatever; from whence it is pretty evident, that the name of an Antinomian is given to many by way of reproach or ridicule, and that there are many so accounted, to whom the charge does not justly belong; because they disown all their own works in point of merit or acceptance with God; yet that is no proof, but what they may be found in the practice of all such good works as are necessary for good government and economy in society. They own the reasonableness and necessity of these, but that they do not make up or constitute any part of that kingdom which is spiritual, and is not of this world. As I am far from thinking that the religion of Jesus consists merely in externals, neither do I think that an intricate system of doctrines, such as are superior to a common understanding, is in the least necessary, but rather prejudicial to those who would be edified by what they profess. There seems to me to be two very essential points absolutely necessary, namely, the knowledge of ourselves, of the true state of human nature, and the knowledge of salvation, in and through the promised Messiah or Redeemer; or, in other words, that Jesus is the son of God, that he died for our sins and rose again for our justification, agreeable to the scripture testimony; that man is a sinner, reason and revelation afford us the most ample proof; from whence it is likewise evident, that he stands convicted in his best doings and performances by the law of his maker, which spiritual and divine commandment entails condemnation on all who hope for mercy and acceptance by a partial and imperfect obedience. As opposites tend to illustrate, so does an acquaintance with ourselves, with the frailty and infirmity of our nature, serve to illustrate the beauty and extent of divine graces, as manifest in the person of Christ our Saviour. To speak with candour and impartiality for myself, without reference to any person or party whatever. As a Christian, I acknowledge Christ as the only foundation of my hope towards God, my acceptance with him, and rejoicing in him: I rest all my concerns for time and eternity with him, as my wisdom to guide me through all the mazes of life: I see mercy consistent with justice, and a plenitude of grace extending to the guilty, and all in harmony with every attribute of deity, and through the one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus. The harmony and consistency of the sacred pages I likewise see in him, of whom Moses and the prophets spake, every precept fulfilled by him, every threatening endured by him, and every promised blessing I lay claim unto, as my lawful inheritance, in and through him, my glorious and exalted head. In consequence of this relation between Christ, as the head and the church, his members, unspeakably great and extensive are the privileges which they have a claim unto, and yet with reverence they acknowledge the pre-eminence of their head in all things. The name of Jesus, a Saviour, is to me a sound more striking, more excellent, more harmonious, than the most melodious notes from the best tuned instruments. The whole creation, in its vast extent and variety, is to me as so many striking figures of that consummate beauty and perfection, which dwells in his adorable person; every amiable character by which he stands distinguished, is to me full fraught with instruction, admiration, and consolation; he is precious and honourable in my esteem, and the language of the apostle is with me very familiar; that is, "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, &c." While I hear of various sounds from the various sectaries, as having learned to distinguish the voice of the true shepherd, I know that never varies. I see no danger of running into error, while I have recourse to, and gather all my supplies from him, as the fountain of truth itself. Thus I go on in dependance upon, and intercourse with, my Lord and Saviour, as, having a glimpse of his glory, I sometimes contemplate the pleasures that must necessarily result from a happy and immortal existence. Till that period shall commence, my prevailing prayer and supplication is, that he would teach me in all things by his influence and spirit, that, under a sense of my own insufficiency, I may rely upon his fulness; that, with a becoming gratitude of soul, I may acknowledge every instance of his goodness in all the dispensations of his providence and grace; that I may have a continued sense of his presence, which contains the fulness of joy; the views of his reconciled countenance, which makes life pleasant, and gives a true relish for every rational enjoyment, in forming a just estimation of persons and things; imploring in all submission to the Divine will, so as to be able to justify him in the whole of his dealings towards the children of men. But perhaps you may say, what is all this without the external and practical part? I answer, as the lesser must of consequence be subservient to the greater, so, where the religion of Jesus has its proper influence on the mind, every thing that is commendable and praiseworthy, every thing becoming a reasonable man, becoming a Christian, will be the natural product, as much as good fruit is the natural product from a good tree."

Perhaps persons acquainted with the principles of the modern Antinomians will be surprised at some things in this letter, and the vein of Christian charity that is visible in it. In short, the writer seems not to be willing to be called by that name.

With respect to the present state of Antinomians, they are much on the decline. God has implanted something in human nature that teaches even the heathens to shudder at the thoughts of a religion which does not inculcate morality. Why did Christ do good here below, unless it was to shew us an example, as well as to make an atonement for our sins? Why did Christ teach his followers to do good, and at the same time point out to them the nature and necessity of holiness, if it was not to make a part of his religion. All the apostolical epistles are full of injunctions of that nature.

Religion has been defined by that great divine Mr. Clement Elias, in his Scripture Catechist, to be a dedication of the whole man to the will of God. Now, surely Christ never came into this world to establish a system of licentiousness, and licentiousness it must be, unless the subject matter is bordered by sanctions. The sanctions of all religions are obligations to duty; and the word duty implies three things, viz. our duty to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves. Our duty to God implies our attendance upon all such divine ordinances as are prescribed in his word. To be sincere and keep ourselves pure from all manner of pollution, and to wear ourselves as much as possible from the world. Our duty to our neighbour consists in doing them all the good offices we can, consistent with the nature of our consciences; and lastly, our duty to ourselves consists in attending to those two above-mentioned, because the more we do so, the more we promote our own temporal and eternal interests.

All these things are, however, despised by the Antinomians, and they teach, that men may sin as much as they please; because however God may hate sin, yet he takes pleasure in forgiving it. This sentiment will, perhaps, appear dreadful to those who have any idea of the divine perfections, of the state of human nature, and the Christian dispensation. Those who name the name of Christ, should depart from iniquity; but what encouragement can there be for virtue, or moral duties, while people are taught to believe, that they are altogether unnecessary.

So far as we know, these people have not above two or three meetings in England, but consistent with the nature of their practices, and indeed the practices of all those who believe in such sentiments, they discuss their religion in public houses.

As morality is an unnecessary thing, and as holiness, say they, can be no evidence of faith, so some of them meet in a room in a public house every Sunday evening, having before them that much despised book the Bible. Each member pays for a pot of beer, which is drank by the company in a social manner. Then a text of the sacred scripture is read, and every one in his turn is called to deliver his opinion concerning it. A great deal of jargon, with no meaning ensues, and every thing is said that can possibly be thought of against holiness or good works. The sacred scriptures are debased to the worst of purposes; namely, to set open the flood-gates of profaneness; and youth are corrupted under the prostituted name of religion.

A few foolish, weak and insignificant persons attend these meetings, and we may venture to affirm, that it is the worst thing they can do. They do all they can to pervert the scriptures, and to trample under foot every divine institution. Self-interest may teach or induce them to mind their duty in this world, but as for eternity, they are so unconcerned about it, that those awful thoughts which generally affect the minds of Christians, make no impression on them.

We are sorry to conclude this article with declaring, from the best information, that all the Antinomians in England, were originally what we commonly call Irregular Methodists. The warmth of the imagination often misleads the judgment, and induces men to take that to be true, which afterwards they find to be false. The knavish tricks practised by men who pretend to a superior rank in piety, prejudice weak minds against religion, and lead them into all sorts of absurdities. Constantine the Great used to say, that if he saw a bishop guilty of an irregularity, he would conceal it, lest it should give offence to those who were weak. Happy, if those who pretend to superior knowledge in religion, would attend to this maxim; but this naturally leads us to take notice of another sect not yet fully described.

ACCOUNT OF THE CALVINISTICAL METHODISTS.

THERE was nothing more necessary than that these people should follow after the Antinomians, for the two following reasons.

The Arminian Methodists have acted upon a plan which we shall not call consistent, though it is plausible. On the other hand, the Antinomians have ran into wide extremes, and set up a system of licentiousness.

We have already seen that the Arminian Methodists make faith the condition of salvation; that is, that every person who believes the gospel as revealed in the New Testament, and practises the duties enjoined, will be saved. On the other hand, we have considered the Antinomians as overthrowing all the sanctions by which religion is bounded, and trampling upon the rights of human society. Between these two extremes, we have seen the Calvinistical Dissenters, screwing things up to an ungovernable height, trampling on the right of private judgment, and establishing sentiments of a very disputed nature, with a dogmatical certainty.

Whether the Arminians, the Calvinists, and the Antinomians, are in some things mistaken, is not a matter of proper enquiry in this work: but certain it is, the Methodistical Calvinists have interwoven with their system something from Arminius, and something from Calvin. They were to abide by all the high points in disputed theology, but they were to draw from them what conclusions they pleased, and they thought proper to steer such a course as should take in those of different sentiments.

At the head of these Methodistical Calvinists was the late celebrated and reverend Mr. George Whitfield. He was, in all respects, an original. He had perhaps, never his fellow in England, or indeed in the world. From what motives he acted we shall not say, for to his own master he stood or felleth. We have read those letters which give an account of his conversion, but whatever may be contained in them, we shall draw no harsh conclusions. To preach, to write, and to live, all are different things. Preaching may nourish our pride, in consequence of public popularity. Writing accounts of God's dealing with us may cause us to be esteemed as saints of God, while we have no interest in his favour, and consequently do not live a life corresponding with the holy gospel of Jesus Christ, who requires sincerity in all our actions. But all these things we have nothing to do with, on the present occasion, nor do we think them at all applicable to Mr. Whitfield, whom we believe to have been an eminent servant of God, and a happy instrument in his hand of turning many from the evil of their ways.

Mr. Whitfield had been early connected with Mr. Wesley, but they separated their interests, on account of a difference in sentiments; Mr. Whitfield holding fast the Calvinistical doctrines, while Mr. Wesley embraced the Arminian system, and propagated his notions with the greatest assiduity.

Notwithstanding, at the decease of Mr. Whitfield, in consequence of an agreement made between themselves, that the survivor should preach the other's funeral sermon, Mr. Wesley delivered a discourse to his memory, at Tottenham-Court chapel, before a very crowded auditory. Adjoining to this chapel they have a burying ground, which has been properly consecrated, and where every office is observed in the most regular manner.

Considerable collections are made at this part of the town, and at the Tabernacle near Moorfields. The expences of carrying them on being very great, but the surplus is always employed in sending out ministers to various parts of the kingdom, and the residue divided amongst the poor and necessitous.

The followers of Mr. Whitfield are, in some of their practices, much the same as the adherents of Mr. Wesley. They have also their love-feasts, and preaching thrice on sabbath day, besides service at two or three times in the week.

The executors of Mr. Whitfield have the direction of these two very large places of worship in the neighbourhood of London, which we have already mentioned, and where vast numbers of people attend the ministrations of those who occasionally officiate.

These people have also a great number of other meetings, but so far as we know, they have no stated preachers, but admit all those who offer their services.

As they have been always patronized by the Countess of Huntingdon, so that lady has caused several chapels to be erected for them in the most populous towns in England. Here however it is necessary to observe, that in those chapels of Lady Huntingdon, the service of the church of England is used; so that none are admitted, but such as have received canonical ordination. In some of those chapels, clergymen preach who have been brought up in the university; but in general, they are such as have received a private education. To make up some of the deficiencies in the want of preachers, Lady Huntingdon has established an academy in South Wales, where young men are brought up, and when they have acquired the rudiments of learning, these young gentlemen get into orders; we are not certain how much this practice is approved of by many learned men in the church, who are of the same sentiments with her ladyship.

A little learning with much reading, a good memory and a sound judgment, might easily qualify a man to be a good preacher, and a very useful pastor. If these young men really serve God; if they are what they call themselves, regenerated persons, then they will by all means, teach their people equally by their examples as by their preaching; if it makes an impression on their hearts, they will be afraid to give any offence, so as to have the gospel blamed.

It is certain that the rules laid down by Mr. Wesley, for the regulation of his societies, have more the appearance of primitive Christianity, than those of Mr. Whitfield. Why the latter did not strike into the same line, we know not, but notwithstanding, the Whitfield, or rather the Calvinistical Methodist preachers are more popular than Mr. Wesley's Arminian ones.

Their public service in their meetings has little difference, and indeed the chief distinction consists in their hymns. The Calvinists use a set of hymns for themselves, calculated according to the doctrines they maintain; but Mr. Wesley has hymns for all occasions whatsoever. There is generally much heat among new converts. And thus it happened, that some years ago persons were employed to sing hymns in support of each other's doctrines.

We have an instance of a similar nature in ecclesiastical history:

When Chrysostom was bishop of Constantinople, he wrote hymns in defence of the Trinity in Unity, and employed several to sing them about the streets. The Arians did the same in favour of their opinions, and it frequently happened, that when two of these hymn-singers met, a battle ensued, a circumstance that might have been reasonably expected.

In their private families, the Methodists are all more or less, very fond of singing hymns. It was first proposed by their leaders as useful to take place of the common songs which are profanely sung, many of which contain much obscenity. In this respect the design of the Methodists seems to have arisen from pious motives; but then we should attend to what our Saviour says, "never to cast our pearls before swine."

Thus it too frequently happens, that as obscene ballads inflame the passions of youth, so the frequently singing of hymns, especially in the presence of a promiscuous company, takes off the force of religion, defeats its own intention, and without design opens the mouth of blasphemers.

We know but little of any public charities established by these people, except a few alms-houses in Tottenham-Court-Road. As for sentiments concerning church government, they are professed Latitudinarians. They look upon all forms of church government in the same point of view, which is as much as to say, that they look upon them as not of Divine institution. In this they are not singular, for Mr. Hooker, bishop Stillingfleet, and archbishop Leighton, were all of the same opinion.

It is certain, that we ought not to contend much about the externals of religion, so as we can only attend to the internals; but notwithstanding, there ought to be a form of church government, according to the original plan. But we shall conclude this article with one observation, namely, "That loose notions concerning the externals of religion, lead to loose practices in the internals."

ACCOUNT OF THOSE PROTESTANTS CALLED MORAVIANS.

IT is well known that every denomination of Christians in the world pretend, that their doctrine, worship, discipline and government, comes nearest to the primitive plan. And here it is necessary to observe, that the few lights we have to direct us for upwards of one hundred years after the death of the apostles, have rendered things very confused; for we may be almost certain, that the rites and ceremonies used in the third century, were, for the most part, human inventions.

That the Moravians should pretend to the same high original, is not to be doubted; and we find them doing so, and calling themselves by the name of United Brethren.

Count Nicholas Lewis Zinzendorf, prince of the German empire, gave rise to this sect. He was born in 1700, and in 1721, when he came of age, he began to put in practice a scheme he had formed some years before when he was very young. He was joined by several persons, who were of his own way of thinking, and settled at Bertholdsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, an estate which he had purchased, giving the curacy to a student of the same sentiments with himself.

Bertholdsdorf soon came to be known for this sort of piety. News thereof was brought to Moravia, by a carpenter named Christian David, who had been before in that country. He embraced every opportunity of instilling his sentiments into the minds of the people, with a distaste for the superstitions of the church of Rome, and an inclination to the Protestant religion.

Having engaged two or three of these proselytes to leave their native country, with their families, Count Zinzendorf received them kindly at Bertholdsdorf. They were directed to build a house in a wood, about half a league from that village, so that on St. Martin's Day, 1722, these people held their first meeting there. It is said, that they foresaw that God would kindle a light in this place that should enlighten all the country. Christian David was so sure of the future growth of this settlement, that he divided the spot of ground round it into quarters, and marked out in what directions the streets were to run.

The event has not contradicted his prognostication. A good many people from Moravia and elsewhere, to shelter themselves under the protection of Count Zinzendorf, flocked to this new settlement, and built houses, and the Count himself fixed his residence there. In a few years it became a considerable village, having an orphan-house, and other public buildings. Thirty-four houses were built there in the year 1728, and in 1730 the number of its inhabitants amounted to six hundred. An adjacent hill, called the Huth-Berg, gave occasion to these colonists to call their place Huth-dez-Heman, and afterwards Heth-Huth, which may be interpreted the guard or protection of the Lord, and from this the whole sect has taken its name.

The Herrnhuters soon established among themselves a sort of discipline, which closely unites them to each other, divides them into different classes, puts them under an entire dependence on their superiors, and confines them to customs, exercises of devotion, and to the observing of different sorts of little rules which, in some respects, may be called a proper bond of union.

The difference of age and sex, and the situation their members are in with respect to matrimony, constitute these different classes. There are classes of married men, married women, widowers, widows, maids, batchelors, and children. Each has its director chosen by its members. The same employments the men have among themselves, are also among the women, which are exercised by persons of their own sex.

Every member is daily visited by one of his class, who gives him exhortation, and takes care of the actual state of his soul, whereof he makes a report to the elders. Frequently particular assemblies are held in each class, and general ones by the whole society. The overseers, or leaders, have also their private meetings, to instruct one another concerning the guidance of souls. The members of each class are sub-divided in people that are unconverted, or, as they call it, dead, the awakened, the ignorant, willing disciples, and disciples that have made a progress. Proper progress in spiritual things is given to each of these sub-divisions: but above all, great care is taken of those that are spiritually dead.

They pay great attention to the instruction of youth. Besides those that have the care of orphans, there are others intrusted with the education of other children. Count Zinzendorf's zeal sometimes carried him so far, as to take children to his own house to instruct them, and these amounted in number to twenty, whereof nine or ten slept in his bed-chamber. There are assemblies held of little children, who are not in a condition to walk, and these are carried thither. Hymns are sung in these meetings, and prayers made, suitable to the capacity of these infant hearers.

The elder, co-elder, and vice-elder, superintend all the classes. There are likewise informers by office, some of them known, some of them kept secret, besides a great many other employments and titles, the detail of which would be too long and too tedious here.

A great part of their worship consists in singing. They pretend that children in particular are instructed in their religion by hymns. Count Zinzendorf relates a very extraordinary thing in his Natural Reflections, viz. "that the charters of the society must have received a particular and almost inimitable gift of God: for when they are obliged to sing at the head of the congregation, their songs are always a connected repetition of those matters that had been preached just before."

At all hours, whether day or night, some persons, of both sexes, are appointed by rotation to pray for the society. And what is most remarkable, these people, without call, clock or watch, are acquainted, by an inward feeling, when their hour comes in, which they are to perform their duty.

When the brethren perceive that the zeal of the society is declining, their devotion is revived, by celebrating Agapes or love-feasts.

The casting of lots is much practised among them. They make use of it to learn the will of the Lord.

The elders have the sole right of making matches. No promise of marriage is of any validity without their consent. The maids devote themselves to the Saviour, not that their intent is never to marry, but to marry only such a person, with respect to whom God shall have made known to them with certainty, that he is regenerated, instructed in the importance of the conjugal state, and appointed by the divine director to enter into that state.

All is extraordinary at Herrhut. The most stubborn diseases vanish there without help: very rarely one dies of a fever. But it is common to die there of a cold, defluxion, or such like other indisposition. These are at least things Count Zinzendorf affirms in a writing, dated January 24, 1732, and presented to the ministry of the court of Dresden.

We do not find that the Herrnhuters to the year 1729, pretended to be any thing more than members of the Lutheran church at Berthelsdorf. Indeed they were all of them either born among Lutherans, or converted from popery to the faith of the Augsburg confession; and if some amongst them entertained ideas of Calvinism, Count Zinzendorf took care to cure them of it. But from this time the Herrnhuters, mandentedly with a view to set their society off to better advantage, would pass for a sprig of those Bohemian and Moravian brethren, who, a long time before Luther, lived separated from the Romish church, and who in the time of the reformation entered into brotherly correspondence with the two great Protestant societies, but without uniting with either of them. And Count Zinzendorf has since that time ever talked in this strain. He pretends that these brethren originally were of the Greek church, and in process of time had united with the Waldenses, who derived their original from the Latin church.

He bestows the greatest encomiums on this Moravian church, so much renowned in former times, eclipsed and forgot afterwards, and at length, if credit may be given him, revived under his auspices at Herrhut. He gives her the most pompous titles; as The Church of the Cross, The Church of the Lamb, The Church of the Blood and Wounds, The Theocracy, A people wheremto never was seen the like, They are the hundred forty-four thousand servants of God marked on their foreheads, whereof St. John makes mention in his Revelation.

This descent would, without doubt, do honour to Herhutism, but there is a necessity of proving it first. Let us examine whether it has ever yet been proved? So far from it, that even setting aside the doctrine of the Herhutlers, which openly contradicts this vain-glorious pretension, it has been acknowledged and proved by one of their own bishops, that the ancient Moravian brethren mixed with the reformed in Poland, and that not one of those that professed their doctrine remained in Bohemia and Moravia, where it has been entirely extirpated ever since the year 1620. The Moravians, who retired to Herhut, and who are the most inconsiderable part of the inhabitants of that village, have nothing common with the ancient Bohemian and Moravian brethren. They are Roman Catholics converted to the Protestant religion, as the Herhutlers themselves acknowledge.

As the Herhut society was begun upon the estate of Count Zinzendorf, under his protection, by his care and benefactions, and according to his ideas and views, it was but natural he should have a great authority over it. And so it happens; he has always been the soul, the oracle, and the primum mobile of it. He tells us himself that he has always been at the head of his sect, both in temporals and spirituals, and his disciples say the same. Though titles could add nothing to his authority, yet he has not disdained them. He has even made alterations in them at different times. From the year 1726, he was called the Trustee or Guardian of the Brethren, which happened in a singular manner, as he tells us himself.

Christian David, the carpenter, of whom mention has been made, being once in the count's apartment to talk with him, all on a sudden gave him this title, which afterwards was confirmed by the unanimous consent of the society. In the month of March 1730, he resigned this dignity. In September 1732, the society pressed him to take it upon him, delivering to him an appointment or call for that purpose, in form of an act, signed by the brethren and sisters that were of the privy council of the society. At that time he refused to comply, but granted their request some months after, upon a new appointment, dated January 26, 1733.

In 1737, Count Zinzendorf, who, from the age of seventeen, had believed he had a call from providence to an ecclesiastical state or condition in life, and who had already publicly preached in some of the Lutheran churches, got himself consecrated bishop of his sect. From that time, according to the "Custom of Bishops," he made use of his Christian name, and that of his see, viz. Ludovicus Moravianus. The prelate of this new-fashioned creation, nevertheless did not suffer himself to be dazzled by the lustre of his mitre. He tells us himself, that he had very little forwardness to make a figure as a bishop; and in the third general synod of Herhutism, held in Gotha in 1729, he laid down his episcopal dignity; which however had made no change with respect to his office of trustee or guardian of the brethren. It appears at least, that he was still vested with it in 1742, because at that time the brethren discharged him from it. But this was only done with a view to give him a much more honourable title, viz. that of minister plenipotentiary and economist, with a power to nominate a successor, and an express clause, that nothing should be done or concluded without his consent. He did not accept this new promotion till towards the close of the following year. Lately we see him style himself Lord Advocate of the Unitas Fratrum.

Count Zinzendorf has very early been about extending his sect. He has sent his fellow-labourers throughout the world. He himself has been over all Europe, and at least twice in America. From the year 1733, a new society has been set up in Greenland; and before the end of the preceding year the missionaries of Herhutism had already passed the line. The society possesses Bethlehem in Pennsylvania; and has a settlement amongst the Hottentots. China is entered into its plan. But it has no where made better conquests than in the British European dominions, in the United Provinces, and in Wetteravia; in the last province, however, where their views were discovered, they have again lost ground. They have also been turned out of the Danish dominions, where they had made a settlement.

A discipline so much overburdened as that of Herhutism, could not very well take place but in a small society; and we find, that in proportion as this sect came to spread abroad, it was thought necessary to forego, in some measure, the rigour of its rule, in order to accommodate the institution to the taste, humour, and ideas of the new proselytes. This gave rise to the modifications, forms, and different usages now in being among these sectaries.—Count Zinzendorf calls them tropes, types, and at this very time there are three of them, viz. the Moravian trope, or type, which is the most ancient; the Lutheran, which appears to him the most salutary to the children of God; and the reformed or Calvinistic trope, for which he also has a great regard, and whereof Mr. de Watteville, his son-in-law, was elected bishop in 1742. We cannot exactly say wherein the above three modifications differ from each other: these are secrets probably known by the adepts alone.

Thus much they have thought fit to acquaint the public with, that the Bohemian confession is received by the first trope, the confession of Aughsburg by the second, and that of the reformed churches in the United Provinces by the third. Indeed from the year 1748, Count Zinzendorf has made all the tropes receive the Augsburg confession; however, it is pretended, that this has made no confusion among these several modifications.

Condescension being what has given rise to these tropes, Count Zinzendorf, from the same motive, shews a general inclination to all Christian communions. He would have wrote to the pope, had he known what title to give him. He has even been persecuted for having maintained that the pope was not the Antichrist. He has sent a deputation to the patriarch of Constantinople, which has been very well received. He shews a great attachment to Lutheranism, whereof he constantly pretends himself to be a member. He boasts of being a minister of that church, and affirms, in spite of all that can be said to the contrary, that he and his brethren believe no other doctrine than what is taught by that communion. He is of late become more favourable to Calvinism, than he was in the beginning. It was in his power, says he, to have rooted it out from among the brethren; he however declined it. Although, according to him, the taking of oaths is not prohibited; yet the society, wherever it settles, is known to be averse to them, and that probably out of complaisance to the Mennonists or Anabaptists. He declares in general, that whoever embraces Herhutism need not change his religion. Such advances as these cannot but infinitely facilitate the propagation of the sect, which already boasts of decimating all nations, and pretends it has a right to all the children of God, of whatever persuasion they be.

Though Count Zinzendorf tells us, that he has sometimes met with resistance from the brethren, and that they have contradicted him; yet it appears, in general, that they have shewed great docility both for him and those he has been pleased to make partakers of his authority. Submission to the will of the superiors of the society is a very essential article of his system.

He teaches, in his sermons to the synod of Zeist, that God obeys the voice of his servants, that is to say, of the brethren: but that it is required, that first of all they agree with their friends, that they act in concert with their chief. The tractableness which he prescribes them must go so far as to suffer themselves to be led, step by step, like little children, by men whom he calls ministers of the Holy Ghost, and of the church, representing them as being so many living images of our blessed Saviour. The irksomeness of thus obeying without reserve is great, it must be owned; but then it is much alleviated by the notion that is instilled into them, that their superiors receive from Christ himself the orders that are given. This the Count inculcates among his flock with equal care and assiduity. Every thing is done by the Saviour's injunction: "Jesus will have it so, the Lamb commands it:" this is the style of the ministers of the society. According to them the Saviour gives his orders on the very moment they are to be executed. He will not suffer that those who are to obey them have time to consider. "Thus business is done quickly, all at once, and, as it were, in post haste." These are the Count's own expressions, who looks upon this method of the Saviour, as a condescension he has for his children, with whose weakness he is not unacquainted. He knows, adds he, for instance, how it is with a maid, when she is apprised she is to marry; therefore he doth not willingly let persons know their destination much before-hand.

The sending of missionaries, according to this sect, is a business in which the Saviour is particularly concerned. Count Zinzendorf informs us minutely what the Saviour prescribes in this matter.—For instance, some of the society earnestly desiring that those of their brethren, who had been pitched upon to be sent away, should be dispatched a day sooner than the Saviour had appointed: the Count opposed this motion with so much steadiness, that it was dropped. It was to no purpose they objected, that the captains who were to take them on board at Rotterdam, would pay no regard to the day appointed by the Saviour: he resolutely answered, "They will do it; or if not, our missionaries will come in another manner, to the place for which they are destined." This example of the Count's boldness will appear less astonishing, when we attend to what he tells us further, viz. that he has found by experience, that the brethren, when the Saviour directed them in their travels, have performed amazing things; things which no art, no human precaution ever could attain to. He himself has once, without human assistance, made a voyage in eleven weeks, which another Herhutler could not compass in less than sixty-six, because he was in the hands of men.

"The Saviour," continues this great apostle, in a prophetic strain, in his 33d sermon, preached at Zeist, "protects his people in a quite wonderful manner. My wishes and desires are, that I could bring it to pass, that we could have a couple of ships, no matter of what bulk, that belonged solely to the society, and which the maritime powers might not suspect of carrying on a trade, or being employed in smuggling: which may be possible to obtain, and depends only on a favourable moment: then we could see wonders. For, at present, our affairs are too much blended with the business of men, with their interest and views; this makes a great alteration, and cannot but have, some way or other, an influence over the brethren. But were it once to become the Saviour's business alone, then he would let us see wonders on the sea. He would not only cause us to make voyages with great swiftness, but to land where never any body landed. A tempest would be sufficient to bring us to the intended place. In case leave was denied us to enter a port, we should be conveyed into some inaccessible bay, at some miles distance from the port, where we might land, and no body could find fault with it, because it would appear, that we were arrived there by stress of weather. This would cost nothing to the Saviour, it would be a play to his angels."

Count Zinzendorf tells us himself, that the conversion of the society was never calculated for a general conversion of the heathen; that the time of this great event is not as yet come; but that the society being an election, a chosen people, it must have the firstlings, or first fruits, here and there among the heathens.

The little number the brethren have hitherto converted to the Christian faith, is but a comfort which the Saviour has granted them to make them amends for their labours, and they believe themselves well rewarded for their toil, if in two hundred voyages they make but one hundred converts. He also tells us, that the Herhutens, in order to acquire the firstlings of paganism, chuse to look out for them amongst those heathens, that have had the least or no communication at all with the pretenders to Christianity, rather than among the last.

As the brethren have always a great number of labourers on the roads, oftentimes among these their chief himself with his family and retinue; and as, besides, their undertakings, and the acquisitions they make require considerable expence, it is necessary they should have what is called the sinew of all great schemes, money. Thus we find they have betimes established a fund called by them the Lamb's or the Saviour's chest, which is become very considerable by the contributions and donations of the proselytes of Herhutism, and its favourers. From the beginning, two brethren were trusted with it; of whom one kept the chest, and the other the key; but Count Zinzendorf has always had the principal direction over it. This addition of temporal concerns must infallibly have crushed him under its weight, he being already so much taken up with the spiritual one's of his society, had he not found in the countess, his spouse, a proper assistant to share his fatigues with him. In a manuscript history of the society, whereof the count gives us some abstracts in the appendix of his Natural Reflections, it is said, that his lady, during a time of twenty-six years, has so well husbanded the scanty funds of the society, that nothing was ever wanting either in his family, or amongst the brotherhood, though there had been a necessity of furnishing from thence above one million of crowns for sundry undertakings.— Upon the whole, it is well known, that whoever desires to be received as a brother, is not welcome among them unless he contributes to the chest. The count says himself, "That the economists of the society may say to a young rich man, Either give us all thou hast, or get thee gone; give us all thou hast or thou shalt not be with us."

We have already hinted at the rapid progress made by Herhutism. Here follows another curious detail, which Count Zinzendorf himself gives us in his Natural Reflections, &c. wrote in the years 1748 and 1749. This will shew if credit may be given to what he says, what situation the sect was in at that time. The society, says he, had almost a thousand labourers dispersed all over the world.— This number however, was not yet sufficient; for, in proportion as they worked, the harvest increased. Twenty-four nations had been awakened from their spiritual drowsiness, by the care of these apostles. "We preach, says he, to an innumerable number of souls in fourteen languages, amongst whom, without reckoning those that do not belong to the Protestant religion, nor the Jews and heathens, there are at least twenty thousand people that were not born Lutherans, whom we nevertheless convert to the Augsburg confession, and indeed we cannot recommend to them a better constitution, than the church of the brethren. We have, adds he, ninety-eight establishments, amongst which are castles that have 20, 50, or 90 apartments." The missionaries of the Herhutens do not go and preach in every place, where their ministry is required. On the 28th of February, 1748, they had received above one hundred and seventy invitations, only from Easter of the foregoing year, with regard to which they had not as yet taken any resolution.— In the mean while they are not idle. In the year 1740, they had already made two hundred voyages by sea. As to the progress the sect has made abroad for these three years, I shall not venture to speak of as we have not sufficient materials for the purpose; but as for the success they have met with in these kingdoms, and are daily making, every body is an eye witness of. It is to be supposed, that their success from the year 1749, must surpass that of the two years above mentioned."

Since the publication of the above account, the Moravians have not perhaps, increased, as the writings of Mr. Rinius, and the narrative of Andrew Frey, have done them great disservice with the sober part of mankind. They were established here, in England, by an act passed in June 1749, and are in considerable numbers in this kingdom and its plantations, as well as in Ireland and Scotland. The public have yet felt no inconueniency from their admission and toleration, nor are likely to feel any, as they are in general, an industrious set of people.

We come now to the tenets of Herulitism. As long as Heruluth belonged to the church of Bertholdsdorf, the society was held in great esteem, and not at all suspected to differ from the confession of Augsburg. This was the reason, for which the theological faculty at Tubingen, did not scruple to grant them those testimonials, to which Count Zinzendorf has since that time always referred himself, to prove the soundness of his doctrine. We do not know, nor is it material to enquire, whether Count Zinzendorf began to broach his new doctrine, immediately upon the beginning of the first establishment of the society at Heruluth; it seems more likely, that as he enlarged his plan, he enlarged his notions also. Thus much is certain, that it is no easy matter to come at the tenets of this sect, on account of the great obscurity affected by their teachers. They seem to make it their study, to speak and write that they may not be understood. It is a rule among them, to speak to those that are not initiated into the mysteries of the theology of blood and wounds, that is to say, their own theology, in a manner, that they may not be able to tell again any thing of what they have heard. They act, says Count Zinzendorf himself, in the same manner as one would do, who, to catch people that are too curious, writes in a character they are not able to decipher. They succeed wonderfully in this kind of style. Sometimes they are quite unintelligible. At other times they begin to express themselves clearly, but on a sudden become too obscure to be understood. They are seldom entirely clear, and nevertheless show often too great a clearness. For indeed those things that escape them, and are easy to be understood, do no honour either to their judgment or understanding. The reader will be convinced of it by the specimens we are going to lay before him. We shall take a great number of them from Count Zinzendorf's theological opinions, and his sermons preached in America, and at Zeist, in the province of Utrecht. These last, to the number of fifty-six, were delivered to the synod of the brethren, held at the last-mentioned place in 1746, and are printed and published by the society in one volume. The Count has not put his name to it; for, according to a letter inserted in Siegfried's Bescheidene Belichtung, directed by him to all kings, electors, princes, &c. he has, left off, long ago, to put his name to his writings. But it is impossible to read these sermons, without perceiving him to be the author; besides this he declares himself very clearly in the preface, where he says, that the business of the author of these sermons is to exercise the office of syndic of the synods, to superintend the records, to administer the liturgy, to prepare matters and propose them. We the more willingly make use of these sermons, as they have been preached for the instruction of several fellow-labourers, English and Dutch, lately received among the sect, and since the preacher proposes there to himself, to put into a better light certain central ideas, by which one ought to regulate one's actions, words and thoughts. If it be possible to meet any where with the tenets of Herulitism, it must be in them.

We begin with the idea this sect has of the scripture. Though Count Zinzendorf doth not, as yet, think proper to disown the scripture, yet the indifferent manner, in which he gives his opinion of it, shews what he aims at. He says in a sermon preached at Philadelphia, that the style of the scripture is sometimes like that of a carpenter, sometimes like that of a fisherman, or of a toll-gatherer. -- Christ himself had spoke very meanly, and used many a phrase becoming a peasant, which is now looked upon to imply something of quite a different nature, since we are unacquainted with the manner of speaking used by the journeymen of Nazareth. He prescribes a method to his missionaries, how to deal with the comptrollers of the scripture, by whom he means those that desire proofs of every doctrine out of the scripture, viz. that they ought to prove all such things by the defects or imperfections of these writings, which those comptrollers pretend to make good by the perfection and infallibility of the scripture. The reading of the scripture appears to him to be more dangerous than useful to the society.

According to Count Zinzendorf, the doctrine that God the Father is our Creator, the Son our Redeemer, and the Holy Ghost our Sanctifier, is a false doctrine, and one of the capital errors that reign in Christendom. Creation and sanctification ought not to be ascribed to the Father and the Holy Ghost. To avoid idolatry, people ought to be taken from the Father and Holy Ghost, and conducted to Christ, with whom alone we have to do. The ancients never dreamt of a Trinity; whoever adores the Father and the Holy Ghost, differs not from a servant of Jupiter, Mercury, Apollo, or of any great hero to whom the ancients gave the title God. Our great doctor appears so positive of the orthodoxy of his new opinion, that he calls the theology received among Christians, a dry one, and good for nothing else than to amuse dogs and swine, unbelievers and atheists, invented by the devil, and that such as teach us are Satan's professors. Satan has thought within himself, says he, "Men shall not come to see the Father," that is the true Father, who is the Saviour, according to Count Zinzendorf; "I'll conduct them round about the Saviour, I'll represent to them a phantom of a Father, and they shall think, as the Jews formerly did, that this is their God; thus the Saviour shall not get them.—By this means, I'll keep them in my power, whilst they think within themselves they are very wise. The mistake among Christians, adds he, arises from their not comprehending, that it is honour enough for the Father, to be the Father of God the Creator of all things, and to be his own and only Father.

The Holy Ghost is called by the Hernhutens, the eternal wife of God, the mother of Christ, the mother of the faithful, the mother of the church.—Count Zinzendorf, in the sixth part of his Natural Reflections, gives a long detail to justify this change he makes in the common theology. He looks upon it as important and necessary; complaining much, that, since the Reformation, people are in gross ignorance concerning the person of the Holy Ghost, and that the divines in this article commit a very palpable omission. He adds, that such as cannot comprehend the mystery of the Trinity in the manner he explains it, want undoubtedly uprightness of heart more than understanding.

Thus it appears, that the son is chiefly the object of the Hernhutens worship. Though Count Zinzendorf in plain words calls him the carpenter Jesus, having taken along with him, into his glory, the poor figure he made in this world, yet the most tender names are given him. He is called their Lamb, their little Lamb, their little Jesus. They make his name of the feminine gender, calling him their mother, their mamma Jesus. The creation, redemption, and sanctification is the work of Christ, but the Father and Holy Ghost minister to him in all of them, which is the identical word they use in expressing themselves on this head. "Whoever believes in Christ, though he knows nothing more of the Godhead, will be saved. The apostles, to avoid idolatry, had not baptized in the name of the Father, the Son and Holy Ghost, but in Christ's name only. God had darted his Son as a flash of lightning, and the Son by his incarnation had made a parenthesis in the Godhead. What in common life is called a grandfather, a father-in-law, such was the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Son had taken it as a favour, that he was allowed to become man and go out of the Godhead. Christ had not conquered as God, but as a man, with the same strength we conquer. God had assisted him, and he assists us also. Christ had not had the least power more than we have. He had laid aside his Godhead, and wrought miracles as men are able to do."

They have a great devotion for the five red wounds of the crucifixion, but that which Christ received in his side is extolled above all the rest.—This is "their favorite wound, the very dear little holy opening, the precious and thousand times pretty little side." They kiss this wound, they kiss the spear that made it, and would kiss the soldier whose hand had conducted the spear; they thank him for it. It is in this opening that the faithful reposes himself; there he breathes, there he sports, there he lays down sometimes length-wise, sometimes cross-wise: there is his country, his house, his hall, his little bed, his little table: there he eats, there he drinks, there he lives, there he praises the dear little Lamb.

The Hernhutens have this distinguishing character of fanaticism, that they reject reason, reasoning and philosophy. The children of God do not instruct themselves out of books. To demonstrate religion, to make it as evident as four times four are sixteen, is an useless and superfluous labour.—Faith does not require the least demonstration. It is brought forth in the heart by the Holy Ghost. The children of God believe, because they find pleasure in believing. Nevertheless this faith produced without reasoning, serves them instead of all other things. No other commandment should be preached to men, than that of believing. This is Count Zinzendorf's doctrine.

Regeneration comes of itself, without our being required to do any thing towards it. It is a capital truth, says our Moravian bishop, that such as have not received grace, that are not yet children of God, that have not yet a feeling of their reconciliation, that do not know yet upon what terms they are with their Creator and Saviour, ought not to be engaged to prepare themselves for it by any action, good works, good resolutions. They must be told, that all that has been believed hitherto to be a preparation for coming to God, is rather an hindrance to their salvation. Regeneration is brought about suddenly, all at once. One moment is sufficient to make us free to receive grace, to be transformed to the image of the little Lamb.

A person regenerated enjoys great liberty. He doth what the Saviour gives him an inclination to do, and what he has no inclination for, he is not obliged to do. He doth what the Saviour makes him do, for he is the master, in whose power it is to make laws and to repeal them; who at all times can change the oeconomy of salvation; make criminal what was virtuous, and virtuous what was criminal.

It is wrong to say that a regenerated person doth any thing; properly speaking they do nothing. It is the Saviour that acts for them. He is with respect to the Saviour as a child, whose hand one guides, yet who believes it is himself that works, and rejoices at it.

On the great day of judgment the Herhutlers will not be placed on the Saviour's left hand among those that are goats; this is to be understood of course. Nor will they be amongst those called the sheep on the right hand of the judgment seat, a place of honour they look upon too mean to be assigned them. Count Zinzendorf tells us, that the words, "Holy angels coming with the Saviour in his glory," denote the saints coming along with him, and that the Herhutlers will be those saints that accompany him. He adds, that such as do not die Herhutlers, will have mercy on that day, provided they think favourably upon their dying bed of those belonging to that sect.

The circumcision of the Saviour has, according to them, served to shew of what sex he was. It has likewise restored to honour that part of the human body, which as a consequence of Adam's fall, was become a disgrace to it; inasmuch, that it is at present the most noble, and the most respectable part of a man's body. The sisters are exhorted never to think of it, but with sentiments of the most profound veneration. They are even thought to make a scruple of respecting men for any other reason. The organ of generation of the other sex is no less honourable. It has been sanctified by the birth of the Saviour. We abate of the strength of our author's expressions whilst we abridge him, for fear of offending the modesty of our readers.

All the souls are of the feminine sex. There are only anima, and no animi, says the Moravian bishop with great elegance. To think that there are male souls, would be, according to this profound divine, the greatest folly, a chimera, which ought not to enter the thoughts of a Christian, were he even in the midst of an high fever. All that is of the male quality, and was adapted to our body, is detached from it as soon as it is interred. It belongs not to its natural and primitive state: it is an addition made to it afterwards: it is the seal of the office which the male sex is intrusted with. For, our sex is an employment, an office. Jesus is the spouse of all the sisters, and the husbands, in the most proper sense, are his procurators, his agents, in every respect like those ambassadors in ancient times, who, on marrying a princess in the name of their master, put a booted leg in the wedding-bed. A husband is also properly no more than a chamberlain of his wife; his office is but for a time, and ad interim. However, the titles which the count gives him are not less glorious: he is Vice-Christ, Vice-God. The sisters are conducted to Jesus by the ministry of their husbands, who thus are their saviours in this world. When therefore a marriage is made, what is the reason of it? Because there was a sister, who should be brought to the true spouse by the mediation of such a procurator. Count Zinzendorf, in a conference on this subject, held at Osy with the seventh-day men, made use of the following expressions, which, to avoid scandal as much as possible, we shall soften a little:

"Christ in his person, is not only espoused, but even wedded to every believer."

From what has been said, two consequences naturally result, which have not escaped the count.—The one is, that whoever knows himself to be a man ought to acknowledge the dignity that is in him, and honour the choice that has been made of his person. The other, that marriage is the most precious depositum the Saviour has intrusted with His church; that is to say, without doubt, to the society of Herhutlers, and the most important mystery to which he has given them the key. Considering this we cannot at all be surprised at being told, that they look upon all that are married out of their society to live in fornication and adultery.

The male sex consists of married men, unmarried men, and widowers. According to their original plan, all that had passed the twenty-first year, should be married. After these years, say they, the state of marriage is a brutish state, a state of madness, where no one knoweth himself.

Besides this division of men into these classes, there is another more general one, by which they are distinguished into two choirs; one instructs the married people of both sexes, and the other the unmarried ones. Zinzendorf was very strict in his discipline; and indeed he seems to have had all that austerity which constitutes the founder of a sect.—In this he differed much from Christ; for our Saviour not only went about doing good, but he never refused to eat or drink with men, although of most profane characters.

Such are the outlines of the history of these people; but we shall consider them in a more extensive point of view, after briefly stating some of their opinions, as drawn up by Mr. Wesley; and then, from their own writings, we shall see whether his assertions are true or false.

"They believe and teach, says Mr. Wesley, that Christ has done all that was necessary for the salvation of mankind; that consequently we are to do nothing, as necessary to salvation, but sincerely to believe in him; that there is but one command and one duty now, namely, to believe in Christ; that Christ has taken away all other commands and duties, having wholly abolished the law; that the believer is therefore free from the law, and is not obliged thereby to do or omit any thing, it being inconsistent with his liberty, to do any thing as commanded. That there is no such thing as degrees in faith, or weak faith, since he has no faith who has any doubt or fear. That we are sanctified, wholly the moment we are justified, and neither more nor less holy to the day of our death; entire sanctification and entire justification being in one and the same interest. That a believer is never sanctified or holy in himself, but in Christ only. He has no holiness in himself at all, all his holiness being imputed, not inherent. That a man may feel peace which passeth all understanding, may rejoice with joy un-speakable and full of glory, and have the love of God and of all mankind, with dominion over all sin; and yet all this may be only nature, animal spirits, or the force of imagination. That if a man regards prayer, or teaching the scriptures, is commonly as matters of duty; if he judges himself obliged to do these things, or is troubled when he does them not, he is in bondage, he has no faith at all, but is seeking salvation by the works of the law. That, therefore, till we believe, we ought not to pray, search the scriptures, or communicate.

We leave the reader to form what notion he pleases of these sentiments which border near upon the Antinomian scheme; but then he must hear what they have to say for themselves, which we shall relate with the strictest impartiality, after we have given the history of their missions.

History of the Missions of the United Brethren, as given by themselves.

The first mission sent out by the united brethren, was to the Island of St. Thomas, the occasion of which was as follows. A negro having come to visit Hernhuth in Germany, where these people were settled, he told the brethren that his mother, a negro woman, who lived in that island, would be glad to hear of the Saviour.

This stirred up a desire in some to go thither, and Leonard Dobec, afterwards a Moravian bishop, resolved for the sake of these poor heathens, even to become a slave himself, if he could find no other means of preaching the gospel to the Negroes. He went to St. Thomas's in the year 1732, and began to declare to them the word of revelation.

He was followed by others, and the testimony of the death of the Lord of life and glory, for the sins of the world, began to operate upon the hearts of the poor negroes. In 1736, the first of three negroes who had embraced the gospel, was baptized, and then a sort of opposition arose.

The white people, from some false principles, hindered the conversion of the negroes to Christianity. The missionaries, and those negroes who came to them to hear the gospel, were obliged to endure and suffer much. The late count Zinzen-dorf, whose zeal for the happiness of his fellow creatures, and particularly of the heathens, could not be restrained by any difficulties, arrived in the island of St. Thomas in the year 1739. He found some of the missionaries in prison; but, upon his request, the governor set them at liberty. From that time the gospel has been preached there unintercepted, although the negroes have, ever since then, undergone many hardships, and borne many afflictions for the sake of the gospel.

The ministry of the brethren of St. Thomas, and the two adjoining islands of St. Crux and St. Jan, has been crowned with great success, so that many thousands of poor benighted negroes have been enlightened, and have believed in the name of the Lord Jesus, and been brought to the enjoyment of the blessings purchased by his blood.

These negroes are also a proof that a genuine reformation in principles and practice is always inseparable from true conviction, and the proprietors of the estates acknowledge this to be the fruit of the gospel; that their slaves, since they have believed in Jesus, are become faithful, obedient, and diligent; yea, the magistrates themselves have more than once declared, that the baptized nations are a greater security to them than their forts. The brethren have built chapels for the negroes for divine worship in each of the three Danish islands, and the number of negroes who are now under the care of the brethren, amount to about six thousand. Many of these poor creatures are very pious, and when they die, it is generally in a triumphant manner, trusting for salvation in the merits of Christ.

In the year 1754, some gentlemen of considerable possessions in Jamaica, being much concerned for the salvation of the souls of their poor negroes, desired that a mission might be established in that island which was agreed to; and they, with a zeal that is uncommon this age, made the mission in the beginning to be attended with great success. This mission has been the only one begun by us that met with encouragement in the beginning. It was soon seen that the Holy Ghost had prepared the hearts of many of the negroes to receive the gospel, and some fruits appeared quickly. But though the difficulties from without were not of such a nature as to obstruct the labourers of the brethren, as was apparently the case in other places, yet in a few years, the seed which had sprung up seemed to wither and die away. But these last years, there has been a most blessed revival, and the word has been preached at several places in the island with such success, that there are now several congregations of baptized negroes, who adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.

In the island of Antigua a mission has also been established since the year 1756. Though the progress of the gospel has not been so rapid, nor the effects so striking here as in Jamaica; yet many negroes have received the word of atonement with joy and are become partakers of the redemption in the blood of Christ. The brethren have a house and chapel at St. John's, where, according to our latest accounts, many negroes attend the preaching constantly. The brethren preach also to the negroes on the several plantations.

The last mission sent to the Caribbee Islands was to Barbadoes. The negroes on this island were often the subject of the thoughts and prayers of many of the brethren; but when the way and manner of establishing a mission there was taken into consideration, we saw difficulties which seemed insurmountable. After-making an attempt which did not answer, in the year 1765, a brother in England resolved to go thither, to attempt to bring the negroes to the knowledge of the truth. He was joined soon by another brother from America. These missionaries found favour in the eyes of some of the gentlemen of the island, and many negroes shewed a desire to hear the glad tidings of redemption from sin by the blood of Christ. The work of the Holy Ghost was soon apparent. The missionaries were enabled to purchase a spot of ground, to fit up a dwelling for themselves, and a hall in which the negroes could meet. Many fruits already appear, and some negroes have been baptized.

Besides these islands on which missions are established, the brethren have visited several others; and as the negroes, who have received the faith, are often either sold or transported to estates of their masters' on other islands, they have brought the glad tidings of great joy to the negroes there; and we have reason to believe, that they prove a good savour, even where there are no established missions.

We will now turn our eyes to Asia, though we cannot give you so joyful an account from that quarter of the globe, as you have above from America.

In the year 1759, with the concurrence of the court of Denmark and the Asiatic Company at Copenhagen, a colony of brethren went to Tranquebar, in the neighbourhood of which they formed a settlement, with a view to a mission among the Indians on the coast of Coromandel, and particularly to establish a settlement on the Nicobar Islands. At length, in the year 1768, they accomplished what they had almost given up as impracticable, viz. the establishment of a small colony in the Nicobar islands. The Indians received them kindly, gave them land to live on, and, by the last accounts, we have reason to believe, that as our brethren learn the language, these poor Indians will reap the blessings of the gospel. Of the six who went the first time to these islands, two departed this life very soon.

Some brethren have also gone to Ceylon, at two different times, to try, if possible, to bring the gospel among the Cingalese; but they could not obtain their aim, though their abode there was not entirely without fruit.

In the year 1747, two brethren went to Persia, with the view of finding the followers of the ancient Magi or Gauri; but they could not obtain their aim, on account of the troubles of the war, which raged there at that time.

The empress of Russia having granted the brethren some land in the kingdom of Astracan, on the banks of the Wolga, a colony is now established there, and we are not without good hopes that God will bless and enable them to bring the gospel among the heathens who are on the borders of that country, and who already shew a particular affection for them.

Thus in Asia a beginning is made, and we cannot but hope that our Lord, who has opened the door, will grant us to see the same happy effects as are evident in so many other places.

The fruits of the travail of Christ's soul upon the natives of this quarter of the globe, are seen in the greatest numbers among the negroes in the American islands, who came from the coast of Guinea, and other parts of Africa. Even as early as in the year 1757, two brethren went to Guinea, to preach the gospel to the negroes there; but one of them departing this life soon after their arrival, no farther attempt was made to establish a mission on the coast of Guinea till the year 1767, when, at the desire of the African company at Copenhagen, and after an agreement had been made by the said company, and confirmed by his Danish majesty, five brethren went thither in one of the company's ships.

But very soon after their arrival, three of them, among the rest the chief missionary, were taken off by a malignant fever. The remaining two spent some time in a sickly state at the Danish fort; but last year three brethren more went to them, attended by another to assist them in settling in their proper habitation. One of the three who went last, departed this life soon after his arrival.

The Danish governor presented the brethren to the king of Achem, who received them into his friendship, and gave them leave to settle in any part of his territories wherever they might chuse. Thereupon they sought out a proper place, where, by the last accounts, they were employed in building a house, in order to enter upon the work of the mission.

An attempt has also been made to bring the gospel among the Hottentots at the Cape of Good Hope. Our brethren lived five years among them, begun a school for the children, and baptized also seven adult Hottentots. But certain circumstances interfering, this mission could not be continued.

I could also give you an account of some other attempts of the brethren towards the furtherance of the kingdom of Jesus in Africa, but as they do not properly belong to the class of missions among the heathens, I shall only name two to you.

One of these attempts has the Copta in Egypt, and Abyssinia for its special object; and three brethren are now resident at Cairo in Egypt, for that purpose.

The aim of the other was directed to the salvation of the poor Christian slaves in Algiers. Our brother Richter went thither in the year 1740, where he, while preaching to the slaves sick of the plague, got the same disorder, which proved the means of his dissolution. Another brother staid there from the year 1744 to 1748, serving, and preaching to the slaves.

I will not take up more of your time in relating many other important and striking incidents attending our mission. But I cannot conclude this part of my narrative without mentioning our present attempts to form a mission on the coast of Labrador, among the savage Esquimaux.

In the year 1752, some merchants in London fitted out a ship for that coast, and they had the good intention of assisting the brethren to form a mission among the Indians there. Accordingly four missionaries went with this ship, and took the frame of, and materials for, a house with them, intending to stay in that country, and to dwell among the Indians. They arrived safely upon the coast, and the missionaries erected their house on a convenient spot. The ship sailed further northwards, with a view to trade, some Esquimaux came on board, and appeared very kind and loving; but at length enticed the mate, who was a brother, and some others away from the ship, under the pretence of trade, and then murdered them.

After those on board had waited some days in vain for the return of their companions, they sailed back to the place where the four brethren had built their house, and from thence to Europe. The four missionaries were obliged to return with the ship, to help to work her; though some of them left Labrador with great reluctance, notwithstanding the imminent danger to which they would be exposed, by their staying alone among the cruel savages. The same vessel sailed thither again next year, and the bodies of those who had been murdered were found: but that was all they obtained by this voyage.

Still the Esquimaux were objects of our special attention; and in the year 1764, a brother, who had been in Greenland, and had learned the Green-landish language, being impelled in his own mind to go among the Esquimaux, went with the blessing of the congregation to Newfoundland, and from thence to Terra Labrador, where he, after surmounting many difficulties, got a sight of the Esquimaux. It was a great joy to him, and no less a surprize to them, that they could understand each other. By this means it was discovered, that the supposition of our brethren in Greenland, that the Esquimaux and Greenlanders were originally the same nation, was matter of fact; and thus a friendly intercourse commenced between the brethren and Esquimaux.

In the year 1765, the same brother, with three others, went again to Newfoundland and to the coast of Labrador, being encouraged thereto by the worthy governor of Newfoundland, commodore Palliser, by the Board of Trade and Plantations, and by the Lords of the Admiralty. Two of them went from Newfoundland in a small vessel, to reconnoitre the coast, but to little purpose. But the chief consequence of this voyage was, that at length the Esquimaux came down to Chateau bay, and our brethren had frequent opportunities to speak with them of their Creator and Redeemer. There was also a peace and treaty concluded between the Esquimaux and the English, and the former promised that they would be obedient to his majesty king George, &c. By this interval the brethren and the Esquimaux became better acquainted, and the latter invited the former to come and live among them.

As it was the wish of the brethren to be a blessing to this nation, and to reside among them, so we could not but desire to have it in our power to form a settlement among those heathens, and to have such a parcel of land, that the Esquimaux who sought their salvation, might dwell there together unmolested. Application being made to government for a grant of land, we met with all the encouragement we could wish; but the execution of the grant was delayed till the year 1769.

In the mean time a company of Esquimaux coming in the year 1768 to Chateau bay, began again their old practices of murdering and stealing. These were attacked by a party of English, and several were killed on the spot, and some taken prisoners and brought to Newfoundland. But a woman, and her son about six years old, and a boy of about thirteen or fourteen years old, were brought to England. This boy was given by governor Palliser to the brethren's society for the furtherance of the gospel. The woman and her son were treated with great kindness, and her Royal Highness the Princess dowager of Wales, the duke of Gloucester, and sundry persons of distinction took notice of her, and loaded her with presents. She was sent back with her son in the year 1769, by the officer with whom she came to England. The above-mentioned boy, whose name was Karpik, lived some time with us in Chelsea, and was a real pleasure to all those who saw him. He was lively, docile, and of quick natural parts; and though he had sometimes fits of sullenness and obstinacy, yet in general he was very good natured. He was in June 1769 sent to our settlement at Fulbeck in Yorkshire, under the care of one of the four brethren who had made the voyage to Labrador in 1765, and who could speak Greenlandish.

Karpik was taught there to read and write, and made a good proficiency. His kind guardian spoke much with him of the miserable state of an unreconciled sinner, and of the love of his Creator.—His heart was touched and often affected, and he could at last begin to ask questions upon these heads himself. At length he was taken ill with the small pox. The missionary finding he was a proper object, baptized him on his sick-bed, in the presence of as many as the room where he lay could conveniently hold; and the baptism was performed in the Esquimaux language: soon after he, as the first fruit of this savage nation, departed with joy, calling upon the name of the Lord. We felt pain on account of this loss; for we loved the youth, and hoped, that he would in time prove of real service to his nation.

Every thing touching the intended settlement being agreed upon, some brethren in London resolved to form a company, and fit out a ship to carry the missionaries to the coast of Labrador in order to visit the Esquimaux, to fix upon the land on which a future settlement should be made, and to prepare every thing in the best manner they could for that purpose. Accordingly a ship was bought, and fitted out and sailed in May 1770. Three brethren went as missionaries, and several accompanied them as assistants. Our Lord's providence procured us a captain fit for the purpose. This voyage has been crowned with success; they have been preserved from great danger, and have been favourably received by the Esquimaux. The missionaries have preached the gospel often to them in large and small companies, and they have reason to hope, not without effect. Thus far the Lord has graciously helped us.

Now we are preparing to form a settlement among them, and as the Esquimaux are noted for their thieving, treacherous and cruel disposition, we trust in the Lord, that he will protect our brethren, when they live among them, and help us also with regard to the considerable expences this expedition will be attended with. Having already greatly exceeded the bounds of this narrative, we will not dwell upon other attempts of the brethren which are now in hand, but proceed to the question: By what means are the brethren enabled to support such very large undertakings?

Our missions among the heathens have been furthered and supported with great zeal and concern of heart by the late Count Zinzendorf, from their very beginning, to his entering into the joy of his Lord. At first the missions were but few, and the expences required for their support did not amount to very considerable sums. But as the missions became more numerous from time to time, some members of the congregation, and other friends, found themselves moved to take share in, and promote, by voluntary contributions, the furtherance of the gospel; and this they did either by assisting the brethren's missions in general, or one or another mission in particular.

As these missions continually grew more and more numerous and considerable, God has caused his kind assistance also to increase. Yet now and then, particularly when new establishments were formed, the brethren who were appointed to provide for the missions, have been obliged to borrow money for the purchase of as much land as was needful for the building of dwellings for the missionaries, &c. till they were enabled to pay it off again, as it came in. But that every thing relating to the missions might be transacted in a suitable and orderly manner, sensible and faithful men are chosen from time to time, at the synods of the unity, who are appointed deputies to manage the diaconate of the missions. They have the general care of the external affairs of the missions in all parts of the world; they receive the voluntary contributions from the brethren's congregations and from other friends: for the missions have no other funds than those contributions; they do their utmost to defray the necessary expences by this means, and they keep regular accounts of the receipts and disbursements. The diaconate of the missions have not only the care of providing for the missionaries on their voyages and journeys by land and sea; of supporting them, as far as lies in their power, when they are among the heathens; but also of providing for their children in the schools appointed for the education of our children in Europe or America, and also for the widows of such who depart this life in the labour among the heathens.

The brethren who at present are employed in providing for the missions in general, have an arduous task; they serve joyfully the work of God among the heathens without any salary, and their only recompence is, that they are employed in such an important cause of our Lord, and that they assist in the propagation of the gospel.

It would be impossible for these brethren to provide all that is required for the support of the missions, if on the one hand the Lord had not unkindled a zeal in our congregations, and in the hearts of the members thereof, and of those friends out of our circle, who wish to see the kingdom of God come, and who have been informed of the circumstances of our missions, to take share in, and to lend real assistance to this work of God, so that the poorest are willing to throw in their mites: and if, on the other hand, our missionaries, and their assistants among the heathens, did not make it their concern to be as frugal as possible. The missionaries, as much as their occupation in preaching the gospel, and taking care of the souls of the poor heathens will permit, do their utmost to earn their own bread by their own hands, and thus to make the care of those employed in providing what is necessary for the missions, as easy as possible to them. This is more particularly the case in some places, as in St. Thomas, where our brethren have been able, through the regulations they have made, to provide for their maintenance almost entirely; so that now commonly nothing falls upon the diaconate of the missions, except the journeys and voyages thither and back again, and such extraordinary expences, as building of chapels, &c.

In the year 1742, some brethren, who lived in London, formed themselves into a society, by the name of the Brethren's Society for the furtherance of the Gospel, with a view to assist in this blessed work, to which they were the more encouraged, as a great part of the missionaries who pass and re-pass, naturally go by the way of London. This little society in the beginning did more than they themselves, at first, could have expected. It was, however, for several years in a declining state. But, about two years ago, the old members of the society formed themselves anew into a body, to which they added several others. Since then they have continued in a state of blessed activity, and been enabled, by their own voluntary contributions, by gifts from friends out of our circle, and by two small legacies, to lend real assistance to the missionaries who have passed through London, and among the rest they have defrayed the whole of the passage of the missionaries who went this year to the coast of Labrador; and they hope, by the blessing of the Lord, to lend considerable assistance to the establishment of the mission settlement on that coast next spring.

Thus they afford a great assistance to the general diaconate of the missions. You have a more full account of this Society for the furtherance of the Gospel, in a letter from J. H. to a friend, published in the year 1768.

I cannot conclude without observing, that as there is no fixed salary settled upon any missionary, nor any prospect of their ever gaining the least pecuniary advantage by their entering into this service, nothing but the love of Christ can constrain them to engage in this work; and their only reward is, when they see the heathens, overcome by Divine grace, bowing their knees unto, and joining already here below in praising "the Lamb that was slain, who has loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood."

Notwithstanding all the regulations made, as above related, we are often in pain that it is not in our power to give more effectual assistance to those who, in the service of our Lord among the heathens, venture their lives, and carry their souls in their hands, and to render their arduous work more easy to them.

Thus, my dear friend, I have given you a brief, though a much longer account, than I intended.

He who has bought the souls of men with his own blood, and who "shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession," be praised for what he has done by means of the brethren: and I am persuaded, that all those who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and wish for the happiness of their fellow-creatures, will join in prayer, that the Lord of the harvest may continue to bless and prosper this important work, until "the knowledge of the Lord covereth the earth even as the waters cover the sea."

The Esquimaux, who are the inhabitants of the coast of Labrador, have been hitherto known under no character but that of thieves, murderers, and savages; but the brethren of the mission found them much deficient from what they had been represented. They found they were the same with those in Greenland, from the similarity of their language, and the affinity of their customs. Many brethren offered themselves to enter upon this arduous undertaking, though they were not ignorant of the dangers that attended it. Out of these, three married couple, one widower, and seven single men were fixed upon to begin this settlement. The names of them were as follow:

Jens Haven, who was the first brother that went in search of the Esquimaux, felt that even before he went to Greenland, an impulse to carry to this savage nation the gospel of their redemption; and undismayed by the many difficulties and dangers which he had met with, and might still have to encounter, he went with his wife in his company.

The next was Christian Laersen Draht, an old missionary, who had served the Lord twelve years among the Greenlanders, waited as a widower many years, with earnest desire that the door might be opened to the Esquimaux, and that he might end his days in the ministry of the gospel among them. He accordingly set sail the third time for the coast of Labrador.

The third was Christopher Braasin, a physician and surgeon, who was stirred up in his visit to Greenland; he devoted himself to the service of the Lord, and amongst these savages went thither with his wife.

Next to him was John Shneider, born in Moravia, who had been also several years an assistant to the mission in Greenland, but afterwards waited a considerable time in America, till the door should be opened to the Esquimaux; but at length he obtained his wish to have his wife along with him to Labrador.

Joseph Necesser was another valuable and pious assistant, who had been many years in Greenland; and along with him was Stephen Senson, who had for some time the care of the mission. To these were added, four other brethren, who were all unmarried, but who did every thing in their power to promote the gospel amongst the heathens.

These came altogether from their different habitations to Lindsey-house, in Chelsea; and their simplicity, indefatigable zeal, and elevatedness of thought, were an edification to all those who conversed with them.

At the request of some of the brethren, it was resolved upon to send out more missionaries to convert the heathens, and to collect among themselves sums sufficient for that purpose. As it was necessary that the missionaries should be provided with every thing that was wanting, therefore the materials of a house were formed at Chelsea, and constructed in such a manner that the whole could be easily taken in pieces, and as easily formed together. This was done in order to accommodate them when they arrived at a distant shore, where they might be in want of the common necessaries of life. Bricks, mortar, boards, shingles, cast iron stoves, and all necessary furniture, was provided for them, partly here, and partly in Newfoundland. And as they had but very little hopes of procuring their subsistence by husbandry or fishing, therefore a quantity of suitable provisions for a year at least, and cloaks proper for that inhospitable climate were sent with them. Though what was provided was scanty, yet they received it with great thankfulness; and their joy in hopes of being a blessing to the Esquimaux, made them superior to all the difficulties and inconveniences.

Government shewed a kind attention to their safety; and Mr. Byron, who succeeded Sir Hugh Palliser in the government of Newfoundland and Labrador, was so good as to issue a proclamation, forbidding every one to molest the brethren in their settlement, or to give them any disturbance whatever. The owners, who had resolved to purchase a ship merely for this mission, had in the preceding years sustained a considerable loss, and yet they determined to purchase a larger ship, for the carrying the brethren to Labrador, they being paid by the brethren's society for propagating the gospel.

Every thing being prepared for the voyage, they were, at a solemn meeting at the brethren's chapel, in Fetter-lane, London, on May 5, 1771, recommended in a sincere and affecting prayer, to the gracious protection and keeping of our Father in heaven, and to the grace and presence of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to the kind guidance of the Holy Ghost. On the 8th of the same month, they went on board the ship with confident and joyful hearts, and arrived, after a tedious and troublesome voyage, at St. John's, in Newfoundland, on the first of July.

They met here with much kindness from some of the inhabitants; and having soon completed their stores, sailed on the 7th for Labrador.

This last part of their voyage was still more difficult and dangerous. They were often obliged, on account of storms, to run into bays between numberless islands and sunken rocks, with which this coast abounds. They were often environed with great mountains of ice, and ice-fields, which were terrible to the very mariners; but the Lord helped them out of all the dangers with which they were compassed, and gave them the joy to see, meet, and speak, at sundry times, with some of the Esquimaux. As soon as the Indians heard that they were brethren who would dwell among them, and that Jens Ingoak, little Jens, so they called brother Haven, was there, they expressed much joy, and were very ready to serve them, by giving them directions how to find the harbour which they had chosen the foregoing year. They cast anchor in the desired haven, on the 9th of August; and their first business was to return thanks and praises to the Lord, whose help they had so often experienced.

They went on shore the next day, being the 10th of August, to take a nearer view of the ground, and to fix upon the spot on which they would erect their house. One of the texts appointed for that day in all the brethren's congregations was particularly expressive and encouraging. It was,

“Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary which thine hands have established.”
Exod. xv. 16. To which was added the collect,

“We surely are a work of thine own hand, “Thy souls, on whom thou'st deign'd thy blood to spend,
“By thy holy spirit to thee directed,
“A covenant people, by free grace elected
“To endless bliss.”

They immediately set about erecting their house, inclosed it with palisades, and were so far ready, on the 22d of September, that they could enter into it and lodge in two rooms; and the worthy captain, who had, with his crew, given them all possible assistance, could set sail for England on the 24th of September.

The place which the brethren have chosen for their habitation upon the main land, is so situated, that both the Nununguak tribe, who dwell on the islands between them and the open sea, and the Esquimaux, who usually go from the south to the north and back again, pass by it, and thus they have an opportunity to hear the gospel there.

Brother Drachart began directly to preach the gospel of reconciliation to the savages, while the rest of the brethren were employed in building.— Their situation was critical, it was, as one of them writes, as if each with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other held a weapon; for it was necessary for them to use all precaution, and to be constantly upon their guard against the attempts of a nation, to whom stealing and murdering were become, through habit, a second nature. But, praised be God, who preserved them with such a powerful arm, and who turned the hearts of the Esquimaux to such friendship towards the brethren, that there was no occasion to make use of any kind of weapons against them. The brethren soon discovered a very considerable difference between the conduct of these savages now, and when they first saw them. Formerly they were bold and impudent, and looked upon the Europeans as upon dogs, giving them the appellation Kabluners, that is, barbarians, but called themselves Innuik, which signifies men. Now they expressed their desire to hear the good news, and shewed, of their own accord, that they had no secret murdering knives concealed in their sleeves, nor bows and arrows, nor darts hid in their kajaks, small boats, sharp at both ends, the ribs are made of wood; these are covered altogether with seal-skin, in the middle is a hole, into which the man thrusts his legs, and the lower part of his body, and sits with his legs extended. These boats hold but one man, who makes use of a paddle, and can get very speedily forward.

They began to prove by facts, that their usual address to the brethren, when they first met them, Ikingutekpegout, we are friends, was truth, and flowed from their hearts. The brethren therefore conclude the journal which they sent to Europe with these words: "We have reason to thank our Lord for preserving us hitherto beyond all our expectations, and all our brethren and sisters, and friends, who hear this, will praise the Lord with us."

The owners resolved to send the ship again in the spring of 1772, but as their former loss was considerably increased by the last voyage, they determined to send her to fish upon the banks of Newfoundland, before she sailed to Labrador with the provisions sent for the brethren's use this year.

The ship stayed longer out than was expected, and did not return to London until December. This delay gave us much concern, and we were not without painful apprehensions; but our good brethren in Nain had reason to have more frightful and anxious thoughts on account of the ship's remaining so long absent from them.

After the departure of the ship in the foregoing year, they had enough to do to finish their house, and to secure themselves against the cold which is much more intense there than in Greenland, although their house is almost seven degrees more to the south than our settlement in that country. The ice does not thaw, so as to clear the harbour, till towards the end of June.

Though they did all in their power to obtain fresh provisions by hunting, fowling, and fishing, yet they got but a very small quantity, having shot but two rein-deers, and about an hundred ruypers, a bird a little bigger than a partridge. This was certainly but a small pittance for such a large family.

As the ship, after having concluded the fishing on the banks, had a very slow passage to Labrador by reason of contrary winds and much ice, and did not reach Unity-harbour until the end of October, the brethren began to give up all hopes of her arrival, and of their getting any provisions this year. They had but two pieces of flesh-meat left, and very little of other provisions, and had the dismal prospect of starving for want of the necessaries of life. They therefore sought out and gathered all the red and black berries under the hills, dried them, and laid them carefully by. From the Esquimaux they could expect little or no assistance, notwithstanding the good will several of them testified; for these poor improvident savages suffer often themselves so great want, that some, almost every year, die through hunger.

Thus situated, their distress was turned into the greater joy, when the ship at last, contrary to their expectations, appeared in Unity-harbour on the 28th of October. In their letters they express themselves on this occasion thus:

"Had you seen the joy that reigned among us, when we heard that the ship was arrived, you would certainly never forget it; for we had given her up, and had devoted ourselves to the most extreme degree of poverty. I cannot say that a dejected spirit ruled among us before, but we were resolved to surrender ourselves up to all circumstances, hoping and trusting that he who has sent us hither, who has counted our hairs, and without whose permission none of them could fall the ground, would preserve us." In another letter it is remarked,

"The ship's staying away so long had two effects; first, it convinced us that nothing was impossible to the Lord, and that he can command the seas that they should remain open, that, though so late in the year, the ship could come hither. Secondly, it made us more thankful for the provision sent to us."

Touching the main object of their settlement, one of them writes as follows:

"The word of the cross, and of the great atoning sacrifice, has been, at every opportunity, yea without cessation, preached by us unto the Esquimaux. Brother Drachart has particularly shewn great faithfulness herein; for he scarcely ever speaks with them of any thing else. They hear it, and for the greatest part wonder at it. Sometimes they will not hear, but go away from him, and begin to laugh; yet he is still patient, and goes on in hope. We discover, however, joyful traces in some, that the word of the cross, which can even melt rocks, does not return without leaving some effects on one or another of them. May our Saviour grant that it may soon take deep root in their hearts!"

Notwithstanding the excessive cold in winter, some of the missionaries ventured to go over the ice and snow on a visit, and to preach the gospel to the Esquimaux in their winter houses, which are built of pieces of snow.

The manner of forming these houses is this: they chuse a large drift of snow, dig an oval hole in it as large as they want the house. They then cut out pieces of snow of three feet long, two feet broad, and one foot thick; with these they arch over this hole. Instead of a window, they cut a hole in the arch, and fix in a slab of ice, which gives tolerable light. They dig a long crooked low entry through the snow to the dwelling, and use a slab of frozen snow for the door. They leave an elevation of about twenty inches in the midst of the house, on which they lay skins and sleep.

The missionaries were not only received and lodged in a very friendly manner by the Esquimaux, but they were constantly visited by numbers of them as soon as they could drive from their habitations on the island to the brethren's dwelling, over the frozen sea, on sledges drawn by dogs. And as soon as the ice was gone, the visits were still more numerous.

These sledges are sometimes drawn by fourteen, by twenty, yea, they have seen twenty eight dogs before such a sledge. They run all abreast. Their harness is all bound together in a thick thong, which passing through a strong ring, is fastened to a sledge. The driver also binds all the reins together; his whip has a handle of about ten inches or a foot long, but the lash is from twenty to twenty-four feet in length, and he can govern his dogs tolerably expertly. These poor dogs are all half starved; they frequently eat their harness, and are then beaten most unmercifully.

The Esquimaux can go much more conveniently from place to place in their kajaks and women's boats, when the water is open, than on their sledges over the ice, and are not so much exposed to the cold. This is the reason of the visits being more numerous in summer than in winter.

The confidence of the savages to the brethren, had increased in such a manner, that they asked their advice in all their circumstances. A particular instance of their confidence and attention to the brethren had occurred this year. There arose such a quarrel between some of the Esquimaux of Nunengwak and Arbartok, that the latter threatened to murder the former. Those of Nunengwak therefore fled to the brethren and desired their protection.—The brethren would not disappoint their good confidence, but promised to protect them, upon condition that they would concur with them in endeavouring to make peace between them and their enemies. Not long after, one of their enemies, who was resolved upon murder, came also upon the brethren's land. By the desire of these Esquimaux, who complained of this man, and who were ten in number, among whom was Tugluina, the husband of the well-known woman Mikak, and his brother Seguliak, a meeting was appointed between him and them, in the presence of the brethren.

The ten accusers, one after the other, delivered their testimonies against the accused, and he defended himself as well as he could; but they pushed him so hard, that at length he began to weep. Then brother Drachart began to shew unto them, that God would, by this opportunity, convince them of their wretched condition, and bring them into another and happier way of thinking. He asked the accused, whether he was sorry for his wicked murdering thoughts and intentions? whether he would lay them aside, and would for the future love his countrymen as his brethren? and some more such questions. As he answered all these questions in the affirmative, and not without emotion, he then addressed the accusers, and asked them whether they would forgive all that had passed, make peace, and would also for the future love him as their count y-man? Nine of them expressed their readiness to forgive him, but one would not give an answer. Brother Drachart took this man aside into his chamber, and asked him why he would not forgive? At first he replied, that he did not believe that the accused meant honestly what he spoke with his lips. Drachart represented unto him, that God could change the hearts; that he himself had such a bad heart that God must change it, why then would he not forgive his countryman? Through this conversation he became so tender, that he declared his willingness to lay aside all enmity. He went back into the assembly with Drachart, and publicly declared his readiness to forgive. Thus peace was not only established among them, but the Esquimaux resolved among themselves, that when any differences should for the future arise, or evil reports be spread of each other, they would go directly to the brethren, beg to have such another meeting, and make up their differences amicably. Thus the Lord approved his servants to the savages as peace-makers, and thereby strengthened their faith, that he would, in his good time, open their hearts and ears, that they may become obedient to the faith.

With this hope, and with an emboldened mind, they concluded the first year of their abode among these savages; and by the accounts received of their preservation and cheerful perseverance in the work of the Lord, the congregations of the brethren were filled with praise and thanksgiving.

We cannot help mentioning, that sister Haven was delivered of a son, who was baptized in the Esquimaux language, and called John-Benjamin.—The Esquimaux were exceeding fond of this child. Another sister was delivered, but the child was still-born.

But with a view to come more to the assistance of the mission by council and deed, both in their internal and external affairs, the brethren to whom the synod has committed the government of the churches resolved to send one of their members to Labrador in the spring of 1773. For this purpose they pitched upon the Rev. Paul E. Layritz; and notwithstanding his age being then sixty-six, he declared with cheerfulness his readiness to undertake this difficult and dangerous voyage. His wife also determined to go with him, to be a comfort and pleasure to the three sisters at Nain.

They resolved to go on board a ship that was to sail for Newfoundland, and either to stay on board while they were fishing, or to wait at St. John's till the ship should return from the banks, and then embark for Labrador.

The owners of the ship were again losers, and therefore under the necessity of making an addition of fifty pounds to every hundred of the original stock, to enable them to fit out the ship for the next voyage. However, they ventured to resolve upon the purchase of a small vessel, which could carry brother and sister Layritz, and brother Beck to Labrador, as soon as the ice would permit.

Brother Beck was the eldest son of John Beck, the oldest missionary to Greenland, but was educated from his seventh year in Germany, and some years ago was sent back to be thoroughly instructed in the Greenland language by his father; and thus he was properly qualified to be employed among the Esquimaux.

They arrived safe and well in the harbour of St. John's on May 5th, and much kindness was shewn to them by Mr. Burnet, at that time judge of the Vice-admiralty court, to whom the worthy governor Shulldham had recommended Mr. Layritz, as also by several other worthy gentlemen. In all these undertakings they met with great success, and it may be justly said, that the gospel flourished under their preaching.

After Capt. Mugford and brother John Hill had purchased and fitted out a small sloop, brother Layritz and his company embarked on the 22d of May, on board this little sloop, from twenty-five to thirty tons burden, called the George, commanded by Mr. Wilson, and sailed for Labrador: but after sailing three days, they were stopt by a field of ice, which extended beyond the bounds of their sight, and were obliged to run with a contrary wind, and in a storm into the bay Notre-Dame.

Eight days after, they ventured, in company with another sloop from Fogo, to sail through the broken pieces of ice but were under the necessity of returning to the bay, and got back to their former place with great danger. At length they set forward on their voyage, sailing slowly along the coast, and on the 24th of June they made the southern coast of Labrador, and the next day got sight of the Esquimaux in the eight kajaks. These, on being called to, in the manner and words usual in Greenland, soon came on board, behaved friendly, and were very attentive while some Greenland verses were sung, concerning the redemption by our Saviour. They invited the brethren to visit them on Camp island, where they had pitched their tents. The sloop accordingly sailed thither, and although these Esquimaux, who dwell to the south, and are called Arbartoks, are of the worst kind, yet they received their visit in a very friendly manner, about fifty old and young Indians heard the gospel, which brother Layritz preached to them in their wooden tents, and brother Beck interpreted; they listened with eager attention, and promised to visit the brethren in Nain, and to hear more of these good words. Some days after, some of their countrymen, about two hundred in number, in six shallops, met the little sloop on the coast, surrounded her, and behaved so peaceably, that they did not look like the former thieving and murdering Esquimaux. They all knew of the brethren in Nain, and some related that they had slept there last winter, and that they had heard there, from brother Drachart, the very same good words which brother Layritz now told them.

At length they reached the latitude of Nain, after having escaped many dangers, and particularly one on the 15th of July, when they run upon a shoal, and were obliged to unload the vessel upon an island that lay near them; and thus, through the grace of God, they got off without damage. Here they were at a loss, not knowing how to steer safely through the islands and rocks which extend far into the sea before Unity-harbour; but they got sight of an Esquimaux woman's boat, the owner of which offered to pilate them through Byron's-Road to Nain.

What they call a woman's boat, is a large boat, the ribs of which are made of wood, but the whole is covered with seal-skin. One of these boats will hold a whole family, with their utensils, and a great number of dogs. They are always rowed by the women, and therefore called women's boats.

Thus they arrived safe and well in Unity-harbour on July 25th, and were received with the greatest joy, which the brethren and sisters expressed by floods of tears, as their visit was quite unexpected, and particularly because a sister was come to them. The very Esquimaux, who to the number of two hundred, had pitched twenty-one tents on the strand, were full of joy. Eighteen kajaks came to meet the sloop as she ran into the harbour, and were hung to the sloop on the right and on the left, and the Esquimaux came on board to welcome the visitors.-- When they landed, they were surrounded by two hundred, young and old, and escorted by them to the house of the missionaries with every token of joy.

At the numerous visits of the Esquimaux, of whom thirty-six tents full had been there at once in the beginning of July, the missionaries were used to visit them every morning in their tents, and to inquire, whether they had kept what they had heard, in an honest and good heart? Towards evening they had always a meeting with the Esquimaux, to which they were called by the sound of a bell. In these meetings, first a verse out of the Greenland Hymn-book, was given out and sung, which many of them retain, both as to the words and tune, so that they can join very well in singing them. After this the gospel was preached to them in a concise manner. Sometimes they were asked, whether they understood what they had heard? and upon their desiring it, it was farther explained to them. The Esquimaux themselves often asked for a more particular explanation. In the first meeting, at which brother Layritz was present, he delivered a short discourse, which brother Drachart interpreted; then one of the most distinguished heads of a family, (for there are no national chiefs or heads either among the Greenlanders or Esquimaux. They are all equals, though some Angekoks, who are cunning, and have bodily strength, have some influence upon their countrymen, but not as chief or head). The head of a family, who has naturally an authority over his family, stood up, and answered in the name of the rest, that they were not only very thankful to the brethren that they came unto them, dwelt among them, and told them such good words, but, he added, "we will give our hearts to the Saviour," whom they call Anausisok, "we will believe in, and love him."

They also declared the same, some days after, in the presence of lieutenant Curtis, who had been sent by the governor in a king's schooner, to see how the brethren went on, and at the same time to survey the coast.

Upon this occasion, about thirty of the heads of families were assembled. Mr. Curtis desired brother Drachart to inform them, that his excellency the governor had given orders to acquaint them, that they must leave off stealing and murdering; for whosoever should be found guilty of these crimes, for the future, must be punished with death. Further, they should go no more to the south under pretence of getting wood for their bows and arrows; but if they were under necessity to go thither, they should not do it without taking with them a certificate from the brethren. Hereupon they replied, It is right that a thief and murderer be punished with death, for he deserves it; but since they had heard the gospel of Jesus, they had no more stolen or murdered, and they would for the future, do so no more. They had not been at the south these three years, since they, the Nunenguaks, had heard the governor's proclamation; and if any of them should be obliged to go to the south, they would bring a letter from their brethren, meaning the missionaries. Mr. Curtis assured them of the love of the king and of the governor, and they expressed their thankfulness in a very hearty and friendly manner.

This testimony must, agreeable to the truth, be given to them, that they became from time to time more attached to, and more confident towards the brethren. When they go from Nain to the islands or the sea, they commit the goods they most value to the brethren to keep for them; yea, they often leave their wives and children under the inspection and care of the brethren until they return. On this account the brethren resolved to build a store-house for them, in which they can lay up such provisions as they can procure and spare in summer, that so they may be able to dwell with the missionaries in winter, and to hear the word of God daily and richly.

It cannot be said as yet with certainty that they are converted, and therefore the missionaries will not baptize any, till they find souls who are truly awakened by the Holy Ghost, and are indeed earnestly concerned and desirous to obtain grace, through the redemption by the blood of Christ. It must however be owned, that the preaching of the gospel unto them has not been in vain. The greatest part of those who dwell around the missionaries are often much affected at what they hear of the Saviour of sinners, and have a respect and awe for the name of Jesus. But it is very hard to convince them of their sinfulness and corruption; for although they were formerly the most abject slaves of their brutal passions, and committed all manner of fleshly sins, theft and murder, yet they know how to excuse themselves with all kind of subterfuges as well as the Europeans.

The liars comfort themselves and make use of the plea, that they are no thieves; the thieves that they are no murderers; and the murderers that they are not as bad as the Kabluets. And although they have some notion that there is a great Lord, who created heaven and earth, yet they have no kind of divine worship among them, or any way of paying devotion to this Creator.

They seem to be also without any sense of condemnation, and are always very expert at stifling remorse of conscience. But since they have heard the gospel, they begin to see and acknowledge the heinousness of sin, also to confess that they are sinners, and many feel the necessity of having a Saviour. The divine efficacy of the gospel has approved itself unto them. The example of the missionaries and their assistants, and their walking conformable to the gospel, is a confirmation of what is preached unto them, and attended with pleasing effect, that the Esquimaux instead of being as formerly, like a herd of wild boars on the forest, appear now, as brother Drachart expresses it, "like a flock of sheep round about the brethren."

Formerly, no European would have ventured himself alone with the Esquimaux, or have spent a night with them on any consideration: but now the missionaries visit them in their winter habitations at a considerable distance from Nain, sleep among them many nights successively, preach there the gospel to them, reprove them on account of their heathenish customs, and even stop the mouths of their Angekoks, or pretended conjurors, ordering them to be silent, in the midst of their incantations.

Nothing can be said to all this, but, This is the Lord's doing! For the poor Esquimaux are so bewitched with the fable of Tongarsuk, the evil spirit, and their Torngaks, or familiar spirits, that they undertake nothing without consulting them, and are terribly afraid of them. They have among them even women, called Hlisetsoks, who pretend to have such a spirit, that make a kind of rumbling noise in their bodies, which noise these women afterwards explain, and that is looked upon as a prediction. They are so attached to these old fables and deceits, that it is very difficult to turn them from them. They would gladly keep their Torngaks, and at the same time believe in our Saviour. The Angekoks observe, that by preaching of the gospel, their craft is in danger of being entirely ruined, and therefore use all their cunning and influence that the poor Esquimaux may not become believers.

All this makes the following example, which occurred in the foregoing year, the more remarkable:

A man, whose name was Annauke, departed this life, calling upon the name of the Lord Jesus. The brethren saw him the first time, four years before, at Chateau-bay, when the peace was made by governor Palliser with the Esquimaux. He then had all the appearance of a thief and murderer; but in the following years, heard the gospel frequently, and experienced the power thereof in a remarkable manner, so that his features were softened, and from a bear he became a lamb. He pitched his tent in Nain, stayed there, in the year 1772, till autumn, and in November removed to his winter-house, which was at a considerable distance from the brethren. He came sometime after from thence, and that on foot, to Nain, merely to hear the gospel.

Towards the end of the year and the beginning of January it is not possible, either for the Europeans or Esquimaux, to pass or repass, as there are then commonly the greatest falls of snow, the ice first sets in, but is not passable on the sea. Therefore the brethren heard nothing more of Annauke till brother John Schneider visited the Esquimaux in their winter-houses, and Annauke's wife came herself in February to the brethren in Nain. Then the brethren heard that Annauke fell sick in December, and it was soon evident that his end approached.

The Esquimaux are so extremely afraid of death, that they are shocked and terrified to hear even the name of a dead person mentioned. But Annauke turned to our Saviour, and declared that he did not chuse to stay any longer in the world, but would go unto him. His wife, Nivarsina, when she observed that his end approached, began, according to the custom of the Esquimaux, to howl and cry, and asked him, "O, my dear husband, wilt thou leave me and thy two children?" The dying Annauke answered, "Weep not, I go to the Saviour, who loves mankind so much."

This was the more striking, as he had no Christian at hand to instruct him, nor none near him whom he might be desirous to please, by speaking of Jesus and expressing his reliance upon, and love to him. And what was still a more clear proof that this was the effect of a real work of the Holy Ghost in his heart, was, that he, as the Angekoks who lived in the same place, related to brother Drachart with displeasure, would not have an Angekok to come to him in sickness, although the Esquimaux, as soon as they fall sick, send directly for an Angekok, who acts the physician, making use of certain spells over the sick for their recovery.—Yea, Annauke since his death, is commonly described by the Esquimaux themselves, as the man whom the Saviour took to himself. The missionaries, therefore, by all that they before had seen and heard of this man, and by the manner of his departure out of this life, can justly look upon him as the firstling in that country, upon whom our Saviour certainly fulfilled his word, “Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.”

The above instance gave the brethren more courage to form a class of catechumens of some in whose hearts there appeared evident traces of the work of the Holy Ghost. In this class they are to be more particularly instructed in the ways of God.

The brethren have also resolved to erect a proper church for the Esquimaux, in which the gospel may be preached to some hundreds at once, as the room in which they have preached in their house is much too small.

Certain it is, that the missionaries and their assistants lead a most difficult, inconvenient, and to flesh and blood, uncomfortable life in this rough and inhospitable climate. The cold is, as has been already mentioned, and as the thermometer proves, much more intense than in Greenland. And although they burn in their large stoves of cast iron great quantities of wood, by day and night, yet the windows and walls are all the winter covered with ice, and the bed-clothes freeze to the wall. Rum freezes in the air like water, and rectified spirits, in the coldest weather, soon become thick like oil. The thermometer is commonly from December to April seventy degrees below the freezing point. The sea freezes so far out, between the islands, that they cannot get a sight of open water from December to June. Some of the brethren ventured to go in February to the Esquimaux about forty miles distant from Nain, but they endured the most extreme hardships from the cold.

Though wrapped up in furs, yet their eye-lids froze in such a manner together, that they were obliged continually to pull the ice from them, and to keep their eyes open with their fingers. One of them returned with a pain in his side; another with his hand frozen and swelled like a bladder; and it was a mercy of the Lord whom they serve, that they were cured. The Esquimaux, who live chiefly on blubber, and who have probably fatter and more oily blood, can certainly endure cold better than the Europeans; but there are however instances that the Esquimaux themselves are frozen to death in winter. The few summer months are, on the other hand, so much the hotter, the thermometer rising to the eighty-sixth degree. But then they are plagued with an amazing swarm of malignant musketoes, which sting so violently, that they often return home with swelled faces.

There can be no expectations of any thing like agriculture, so as to produce grain; this is evident from the trials already made. Some small gardens which the brethren have laid out and cultivated, produce some sallad, turnips, hardy cabbages and radishes, but potatoes freeze when they have shot up no higher than about half a foot.

By hunting and fishing they have hitherto been able to procure but very little provision, because their situation upon the continent is not at all favourable thereto. Besides, the great number of Esquimaux dogs, that must seek their own maintenance, prevent the success they might have in catching fish, as these half-starved dogs, at low water, run into the nets, tear out and devour the fish, and moreover tear the nets to pieces.

Thus the brethren must be supported chiefly by the provision sent to them annually from Europe, such as flour, salt meat, rice, peas and barley, and are heartily thankful, partly, that friends are always found who contribute thereunto, and partly that they can earn something by the work of their hands to lighten in some measure the expence of supporting themselves. They begun last year to build boats for the Esquimaux, and to make sundry implemments for their work, and utensils for their houses, and receive in payment whale-bone and blubber, which they send hither towards their expences.

By building boats we have reason to hope that one great advantage will be obtained, namely, that the Esquimaux will be delivered from the temptation of going to the south to steal boats. And by the implemments and utensils made for them by the brethren, they will be from time to time more enabled to get and increase what is necessary for their own support.

Though, by these means the outward situation of these poor savages may be greatly improved and rendered more human, yet it is certainly of incomparably greater importance, that they be brought to Jesus Christ by the preaching of the gospel: that they be sanctified by the true faith in him; and thereby, with greater certainty, be civilized and made moral human creatures.

It is this consideration that enables the missionaries and their assistants, notwithstanding their most difficult situation outwardly to hold out with cheerfulness and full of faith, in that call which the Lord has given them, until the Esquimaux, in this remote part of the earth, shall see the salvation of God. Brother Layritz, on his safe arrival here with his wife on the 28th of October, assured us, as an eye witness, that this was the disposition of those brethren and sisters.

They had this last year, (1774,) by means of a sloop, an opportunity of visiting six habitations of the Esquimaux which lie farther north; they were received in a friendly and confident manner, and most pressingly entreated by the poor savages, many of whom had never seen an European before, to come and dwell among them, and to bring them the good words of their Creator and Saviour.

Is the acquiring wealth and fortunes, which last not for ever, but pass away, allowed every where, to be a sufficient motive for long voyages and the enduring great hardships? surely it is a more noble motive, yea, it is of infinitely greater use, if considered merely in a rational point of view, to endure hardships even the greatest, if souls, who are however our fellow-creatures, are thereby saved from death, brought into a state of peace and happiness, and obtain a well grounded hope of a blessed immortality. The love of Christ, who, though he thought it no robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation, took upon him the form of a servant, submitted to be despised and rejected, and became obedient unto death, yea, to the death of the shameful cross, to redeem us, must certainly impel the hearts of the missionaries, stimulate their zeal, and make them willing to persevere with patience in the midst of all, even the greatest hardships.

Blessed be the name of the Lord who has not permitted the labour and trouble of our brethren among the heathens to be in vain. We have now had many years experience, that our gracious Lord has crowned the simple preaching of the gospel of his incarnation, sufferings and death, with blessing, has owned it in grace, and thereby the eyes of the heathens have been opened, and they have been turned from darkness to light, and from the power of satan to the living God. What the most just and excellent moral precepts cannot effect, what all the power of philosophy cannot produce, what all the eloquence and arguments of men cannot accomplish, is done by the word of reconciliation through the blood of Christ. Of this the heathens, who have received the faith, are a living and incontestible proof.

To proselyte men from one superstition to another, from one speculative system to another, or from one sect or outward form of worship to another, whether by arguments, or outward pomp, or by any other methods, is indeed no business, for the sake of which our missionaries would give themselves so much trouble and undergo such difficulties. But to be instruments to direct and bring souls to him, in whom the Gentiles shall trust, and to whom every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things on earth, and things under the earth, it is well worth while to venture life and limb to effect this. For it is indubitable, that when men, though ever so wild and savage by nature, are brought to the knowledge of salvation in Christ Jesus, by the Holy Ghost, they will of course become good and useful subjects, and benevolent fellow-citizens of the world.

Rules and Articles for the Government of the Churches of the United Brethren.

Some of these articles are so plain and inoffensive, that little need be said concerning them.

ART. I. This society is not formed in opposition to any other of the like nature, nor is it to interfere with the charities of any society whatever.

II. This society is to consist of members of the brethren's church, and is properly established here in London, where they will regularly meet; yet members may also be chosen, who reside in other places of the British dominions or elsewhere.

III. But besides the aforesaid members of the society, persons who are not of the brethren's church, but are friends and well-wishers of the furtherance of the gospel among the heathens, may be chosen as honorary members of this society; to whom, from time to time, accounts will be communicated of the work of our Lord among the heathens through the brethren's missions; and such honorary members may be admitted occasionally to the meetings of the society.

There is something in this article, at first sight, glaringly engaging. It seems to promise a large share of charity; and yet, if we attend to it strictly, we shall find that it contains both ostentation and meanness. Ostentation, in holding it forth as an honour to be admitted into their society; and meanness, in looking for subscriptions to support their cause.

IV. The design of this society being to assist those missionaries and their helpers, whom the directors of the missions of the brethren's church may send to the heathens in different parts of the world, we will not confine our assistance of those missionaries to gifts and contributions only, but it will be our great pleasure to promote this amiable work with our best services, in all respects, by entertaining them during their abode in England, and also supplying them with all necessaries for their passage to the places of their destination, and during their residence at those places.

V. Although our chief aim is to further the gospel, and assist the missionaries in the British dominions in America, and other parts of the world, yet we are also desirous to give all possible aid to the brethren's missions among the heathens in other countries.

VI. And whereas the united brethren, for many years successively, have appointed deputies, and committed unto them the care of the heathen missions and the management of the contributions, which, for the unavoidable expences attending this work of God, are given freely, from time to time, by the brethren's congregations and by others; we will therefore act in connection and fellowship with these deputies; on which account our secretary and other brethren of the committee are to cultivate a constant correspondence with them, that we may be informed of the occasions requiring our assistance, and be ready to assist.

VII. And whereas the aforesaid deputies of the brethren's church have always a corresponding agent, who resides in London, to execute their commissions, we will always be ready to give him all the assistance we can therein.

VIII. Every one of us is willing to add his mite to those free gifts made at stated times, in the brethren's congregations, for the service of the missions among the heathens. But besides this, a box shall be placed in the room where we meet, into which every member of the society may put at any time what he thinks proper; all which is to be employed for the use of the said missions. The committee is to take an account of this money as well as what may come in by way of donation, legacy or otherwise, and also how it is expended; and this account is to be laid before the society once in three months.

It is remarkable, that the gospel was propagated at first without the assistance of power, money, or, indeed, any encouragement from men. And yet the tender plant grew, and spread far and wide.—Whereas, in modern times, thousands and ten thousands of pounds, are collected to propagate the gospel, and yet few converts are made. For this there must be some reason, but whatever we may imagine it to be, we shall leave the reader to form his own judgment.

IX. If this society, or one or more members thereof, should be appointed trustees of any lands, for a settlement among the heathens; in that case we engage to be faithful to our trust, and not claim for ourselves, at any time, what shall be settled upon us in trust.

X. The ordinary meeting of the society to be once a month, at a time and place to be determined upon by the society, and as soon as can conveniently be after the day, on which accounts of the progress of the gospel, especially among the heathens, are usually read in the brethren's chapel.

XI. The society is to chuse a committee, consisting of six members, a secretary and one or two servants; one of the committee is to be appointed treasurer, and all the ordained ministers of the brethren's church present in London, are to be looked upon as members of the committee, and each of them to have a vote.

XII. The members of the committee are to act as deputies of the society, and are to meet once a week, or as often as may be thought needful for the dispatch of business, and four of the committee are impowered to do business.

XIII. The committee may call an extraordinary meeting of the society when business requires.

XIV. The committee is impowered, upon any emergency, to borrow in the name of the society, or contract debts of any sum not exceeding fifty pounds.

We cannot approve of these money affairs in religion. There is some reason to imagine, that the passions of men, influenced by corrupt nature, have too much effect on modern religion. We are convinced, that God once gave his blessings on means of a different nature; and history tells us, that as the same means have not been used since the time of the emperor Constantine the Great, so the same ends have not been found.

XV. At the first meeting of the society in every year, the six members of the committee, the secretary and the servants are either to be continued in their offices, or others elected in their places.

This article has been copied from one of those belonging to a benefit society. There officers are very rich and greatly esteemed, otherwise they would not be eagerly sought after. All officers, court pride, and human passions will be as much gratified in a club of common mechanics, as in the first lord of the treasury, or the high chancellor of England. The reason is plain, learning and knowledge, improved by virtue and adorned by piety, lift the characters as it were, above every thing human.

XVI. Upon the decease or removal of any member of the committee, or any other incident requiring a new choice, the committee is to propose such person or persons to the society whom they think proper for the office.

XVII. Such persons ought to be members of the brethren's congregation, of a good capacity and a good character among the brethren as well as among their fellow-subjects.

XVIII. Persons proposed by the committee to the society, for members of the committee, are to be chosen by the majority of the members of the society then present.

XIX. Whenever any new member or members are to be proposed to the society, the committee is first to consider whether such person or persons, may be of use to the society in carrying on the above-mentioned purposes; and if the persons proposed by the committee are approved of by the unanimous choice of the society, by ballot, then such person or persons are to be admitted members.

XX. But if on the ballot, there should be any negative to the choice of the person proposed, the member or members objecting, are to mention his or their objection to some member of the committee, when the case is to be reconsidered; and if the objection can be removed, to the satisfaction of the objector, such person or persons may be proposed a second time to the society; and if no new negative appears upon the ballot, he or they are to be then admitted members.

XXI. No member of the society is to acquaint any one, either of his being proposed or chosen a member of the society, for this is to be done by the secretary, or some other member of the committee appointed for it, as circumstances require.

XXII. No person once admitted into this society is to be removed out of it, but after mature consideration of the committee, and with the consent of the majority of the society; and a person thus removed, not to be re-admitted but by ballot.

XXIII. When any new members are admitted, the rules of the society are to be read to them, and each new member is to subscribe them.

XXIV. The society may form new articles, which are consistent with the tenor of the above articles and the well-being of the society, as circumstances may hereafter require.

XXV. The above rules are not to be altered but on mature deliberation, and in a meeting of the society, and by a majority of votes; and previous to any alteration a month's notice shall be given, expressing the nature and design of the alteration proposed to be made.

Upon the whole, these articles are of a very carnal nature. They point out much of worldly wisdom, but little of that which is from above. We could wish there was nothing human in religion but just the common outward means, and we sincerely believe, that the real servants of God are frequently to be among those who are reputed to have no religion at all.

Account of all those Societies which the United Brethren have in different parts of the World.

It is very remarkable, that these people, although not much known in England, yet are extremely numerous. Of this we shall have occasion to take notice afterwards, so as to endeavour to account for that secrecy, which prevails among them.

The places where the congregations of the Brethren are at present settled, are of different kinds, and many of these congregations are not very numerous. Some have been settled by the brethren on spots which were not at all inhabited before, merely with this intent, that only members of the congregation shall dwell there, and that they might be entirely unmixed with others. These places are called in the strictest sense Congregation-places: for example, Hernhuth, Gnadenfrey, Fulneck, Bethlehem, Salem, Sarepta, &c.

Farther, the Brethren have built their place of worship and the dwelling-houses of the members of the congregation, contiguous to some towns and villages inhabited by other people, yet in such a manner, that their buildings stand together on one spot, or in the same street, and are, as such circumstances will admit, some more and some less separated from the rest of the public or private buildings of the town or village. These are called in a more extensive sense Congregation-places; such as Neusalze, Nenwied, Oehkbrook, &c.

Again there are other congregations of the Brethren, the members of which do not dwell together, but are scattered in the cities, or towns, or in the country round about; they however assemble in the same place of worship, and their regulations are suited to their circumstances. These are called City and Country Congregations, for instance London, Amsterdam, Philadelphia, &c.

The same distinction is to be made with regard to the missions of the Brethren among the heathens. Some of the congregations, gathered together by the gospel from the heathens, dwell together in one place; for instance, New Hernhuth and Lichtenfels in Greenland, at Langoutout-nunk, that is, the City of Peace, in North America; also at Sharon on the Samarica in Surinam. These may be properly called Town-Congregations of the converted heathens. Others of the heathens, who have been brought to Christ by the ministry of the Brethren, live dispersed, as the negroes in the West India Islands, and the Indians on the Gorentyn in Surinam; but they come to the preaching, and to partake of the sacraments, to the church or meeting-house, which the missionaries have built near their own dwellings: These may be called the most proper sense, Mission-Settlements. By this description every reader will be able to determine, to which of these classes each congregation or mission of the Brethren belongs. Now they shall be mentioned according to the countries and governments under which they dwell.

1. In the empire of Germany, and first under the elector of Saxony.

Hernuth in Upper Lusatia, on the high road between Lebau and Zittau, upon the manner of Bertselsdorf, lately the domain of Count Zinzendorf, and now of baroness de Watterville. This place was begun in the year 1722, and this congregation received afterwards a confirmation of its orders and regulations from government.

Niesky also in Upper Lusatia, upon the manor of Trebus, twelve miles from Goerlitz. This place was begun in the year 1742, by exiles from Bohemia. Here is at present the Pædagogium of the Unity of the Brethren.

Klein Welke, also in Upper Lusatia, about three miles from Budissin on the road to Berlin, was begun in 1756, and is built very near the old village of the same name. Most of the members of this congregation are of the Vandal nation.

At Barby, in the county of the same name, twenty-four miles from Magdeburg, a congregation of the Brethren has been gathered ever since the year 1748, after the government had given the palace and bailiwick to Count Henry the 28th Reuss, and others on a lease, and had granted the chapel of the palace to the congregation of the Brethren for their Divine worship. The theological seminary of the Unity is in this place; in this seminary or college, students are prepared for future service among Christians or heathens.

Gnadan, on the electoral domain Doeben, six miles from Barby, and eighteen from Magdeburg. In the year 1765, the government gave the palace of Barby, with its appurtenances, and the domain Doeben, to Count Henry the 25th Reuss, upon a perpetual lease, with a view that a settlement might be made here, after the manner of the Brethren's Congregation-places; whereupon a beginning was made to build such a place in the year 1767, not far from Doeben.

2. Under the government of the king of Prussia.

Gnadenberg, in the principality of Jauer in Silesia, on the manor called Gross Krausche, three miles from Bunzlau, was begun in the year 1743, after having received a special royal grant for it.

Gnadenfrey, in the principality of Schweidnitz in Silesia, about nine miles from Reichenbach, on the manor of Oberpeilau, was also begun in the year 1743. This congregation is at present the largest of the Brethren's congregations in Silesia.

Neusalz, is a new built place which the Brethren began to erect in 1745, near the town of Neusalze on the Ouder. This settlement of the Brethren was by order of the king, laid out in a regular manner in the year 1744, and was in a very flourishing condition before the last war in Silesia. But in the year 1749 it was plundered in a cruel manner and totally reduced to ashes. The loss the Brethren sustained hereby in worldly goods was great, but all the Brethren and Sisters, lying-in women, the sick and children, escaped from the flames, and after many and various difficulties, they arrived in the neighbouring congregations, in Silesia and Upper Lusatia, safe and well. In 1763, the rebuilding of this place was taken in hand by the desire of government, and a congregation of the Brethren has been again settled there since that time.

These Silesian congregations have their own bishop, who resides in Silesia.

In Berlin, a Bohemian congregation of the Brethren, adhering to the Augustin confession, has been gathered together ever since the year 1744, and they declared their sentiments before a royal commission in the year 1747. They have a public Congregation-House, in which they have Divine worship agreeable to the constitution of the Brethren's congregation.

Also in Rixdorf, three miles from Berlin, in the year 1737, a congregation of the Brethren of the Bohemian nation were collected, and have built a Congregation-House and place for Divine worship. The congregation here was plundered in a very severe manner in the year 1760, but at the same time experienced from the hands of God a gracious preservation of their persons.

At Nordean in East-Friesland is also a congregation of the Brethren. They have a public place of worship, and enjoy undisturbed liberty. This congregation was begun under the government of the last prince of the East-Friesland.

3. Under the government of the duke of Saxe-Gotha.

Neudietendorff, fifteen miles from Gotha and six from Erfurth. In the year 1742, a considerable number of the Brethren of the Lutheran troops came together here. After many difficulties they have been in a more prosperous state since the year 1753, and received in 1764 a grant from the government.

Since then the congregation has increased considerably in the number of their members and in their buildings.

4. Under the government of Count Reuss.

Ebersdorf in Voigtland. There has been in this place since the end of the former century, an Ecclesiola, a pious society, which increased from time to time, and after many vicissitudes, they sought in the year 1745 to establish an entire union with the congregations of the Brethren. Thus it came to pass, that a regular congregation of the Brethren was established there; a piece of land was ceded to them by the reigning count, that they might enlarge their settlement, and an act in favour of the evangelical Brethren's congregation was issued in the year 1761.

5. Under the government of the Count of Neuwied.

At Neuwied, a congregation of French reformed Brethren and Sisters, who emigrated from Herbaag, was begun. The reigning count gave them a grant of the necessary privileges in the year 1751, and renewed the said grant in a more ample manner in the year 1756. The Brethren were put in possession of a square of the city, for the use of the congregation, to erect on it their place of worship and Congregation-House, and other necessary buildings for the choirs and families; and since then a pretty numerous congregation is collected here. The greatest part of the congregation members are French reformed, yet as several Germans moved thither from time to time, Divine worship is performed there in both these languages alternately.

6. In the United Provinces.

In Zeyst, in the province of Utrecht, a beginning was made in 1748 to build a Congregation-place in two squares between the palace and the village.—The congregation has built in the year 1763, a new Congregation-House and place of worship, and enjoy complete church-liberty under the government of the states of Utrecht. The preaching of the gospel here, both in the German and Dutch languages, is attended by many from other places.

In Amsterdam there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1738. They have had a place of worship there these many years past, and live quiet and undisturbed.

In Haerlem is also a small congregation of the Brethren, who have also a public worship.

The United Brethren have also several missions in the province of Surinam in South America, they are the following:

In Paramaribo is a small House Congregation, who dwell there to receive the missionaries from Europe, to forward them to their posts among the heathens, and to provide them with necessaries.—They have a house of their own, and maintain themselves, as the Brethren seek to do every where, with the work of their hands.

In Sharon on the Saramica, is a congregation gathered out of the Arrawack nation. It was begun in the year 1757, and consisted of some baptized Indians, who were obliged to fly from the rebellious negroes in Berbice. The same was the case with Hope, on the river Corentyn, on the borders of Berbice; here the Indians, who live scattered on their Cassabi plantations, are ministered unto in the gospel, by some missionaries.

In Quama, not far from the head of the river Saramica, the brethren have a mission among the free negroes ever since the year 1765. This is, as may be easily conceived, one of the most toilsome and most difficult missions, but has however brought forth joyous fruit, as a negro captain Arabini, is become a believer in the Lord Jesus, is baptized, and walks worthy of the gospel.

7. Under the government of Great Britain there are, in Europe, in North America, and in the West India Islands, sundry congregations and missions of the Brethren.

In London there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1742. They have a chapel in Nevil's-court, Fetter-lane, and another in Chelsea; near the last is their burying-ground.—There is divine service in both of these chapels every Sunday.

At Bedford is likewise a congregation of the Brethren; they have built at one end of the town, since the year 1741, a chapel, a congregation-house, and houses for the single Brethren and single Sisters. The congregation itself was settled here according to the constitution of the Brethren in the year 1744. To this congregation belong the Brethren's chapels and societies at Northampton, Risley, &c. where the gospel is preached by the Brethren.

At Ockbrook, five miles from Derby, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1750. Since then they have erected on a small estate, bought for that purpose near the village, a chapel, a single Brethren's and a single Sister's house, and some other dwelling-houses.

Fulneck, near Pudsey, and six miles from Leeds, in Yorkshire, is a congregation-place, built particularly for that purpose. The beginning of the buildings was made in the year 1744, and in the following years the congregation-house, in which is the chapel, called Grace-hall, as also houses for the single Brethren, single Sisters, and Widows, were built. Here are also the economies or schools, in which the children of labourers, who cannot take care of their children on account of the duties of their offices, are educated.

The four following congregations are under the inspection and direction of the elders' conference of Fulneck, viz.—

Pudsey, to which the members of the congregation and societies in the neighbourhood of Leeds and Bradford belong.

Wyke, to which those who dwell in the places near Halifax belong.

Mirfield, to which those in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield and Wakefield belong.

Little Gumeral; but these four congregations have their own labours and chapels, in which meetings are kept on Sundays, and in the week days.

At Dukinfield, a village in Cheshire, about eight miles from Manchester, is also a congregation of the Brethren: they have a new chapel and two choir-houses, one for the single Brethren and one for the single Sisters.

At Leominster in Herefordshire, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1759; they have their own chapel.

At Haverfordwest in Pembrokehire, South Wales, a congregation of the Brethren was also collected in the same year.

At Bristol, in the year 1755, a number of the members of the society was formed in a congregation. They have a new-built chapel in the parish of St. James. To this congregation belongs the congregation at Kingswood, which lies about four miles from Bristol, and has a chapel; and in Bath, a city well known on account of its waters, there is a new-built chapel and a congregation ever since the year 1765.

At Tetherton in Wiltshire, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1748. But as some members of the congregation came to live near the chapel, they called their proper premises Lamb's-acre. The Brethren's chapel in Malmsbury belongs to this congregation.

Besides these congregations the United Brethren have chapels in several parts of England, where their ministers preach the gospel with blessing; for instance, at Apperly in Gloucestershire, Frome in Somersetshire, Plymouth in Devonshire, Fairfield, in Lancashire, as also at Air and Irwin in Scotland.

In Ireland are the following congregations of the Brethren.

In Dublin, the capital of the kingdom, since the year 1750, they have two chapels at each side of the river Liffy, which runs through the city, one in Great Booter-lane, the other in Stafford-street.

Upon the townland Ballikennedy, in the county of Antrim, the Brethren have begun to build a new congregation-place, which is called Grace-hill.— Beside the congregation-house, in which is the chapel and two choir-houses, several other private houses are built and inhabited.

Ballymaguigan, in the county of Derry, on the west side of the famous Lough-neagh, is also a new built congregation-place, to which belongs a chapel of the society at Lisnamara, where a congregation of the Brethren was settled in the year 1759.

Balloderry, on the east side of the aforesaid Lough-neagh: here has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1755. To this congregation belongs the little congregation at Kilwarlin; the latter has also its own chapel.

At Drumargan, about four miles from Armagh, has been a Brethren's congregation ever since the year 1759. And finally,

At Coot-hill, twenty-six miles from Armagh, a congregation of the Brethren was collected in the year 1765.

In America, and first, in the province of Pennsylvania, are the following congregations of the Brethren.

Bethlehem, the chief congregation-place of the Brethren in North America, in the county of Northampton, fifty miles from Philadelphia, on a branch of the river Delaware, which has retained the Indian name Lechai, or Lechi. The latitude of this place has been taken at sundry times, and found to be 40 deg. 37 min. N. L. This place was begun in the year 1741, at a time when few Europeans were in this district: a considerable number of missionaries have been sent from this congregation among the heathens.

At Nazareth, nine miles north of Bethlehem, a large building called Nazareth-hall, has been erected, in which is the chapel, where the congregation of the Brethren dwelling in their several habitations about Christiansbrun and Gnadenhall, meet and have divine service on Sundays and holidays. In Nazareth-hall is also the Pædagogium of the Unity in America. In the year 1771, the Brethren began to build a new congregation-place near the hall.

Litiz, a new congregation-place in the county of Lancaster, seventy miles from Philadelphia. The building of this place was begun in the year 1757, and there are now, besides the chapel and congregation-house, choir-houses for the single Brethren and single Sisters, and a good many houses for families.

At Lancaster, the county town of that name, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1746. The congregation here has a church, a congregation-house, and a burying-ground in the town.

In York-town, or, as it is sometimes called, York on the Cadoras, twenty-four miles from Litz, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1755, who have built a congregation house, as also in Mount Joy, formerly called Donnegal, sixteen miles from Litz. In the township of Bethel, twelve miles from Mount Joy, near the blue Mountains, a congregation of the Brethren was settled in the year 1755, but in the last war they were obliged to fly from the cruelties of the savage Indians, but after the conclusion of the peace they gathered again together around their congregation-house.

At Hebron, in the township of Libanon, sixteen miles from Litz, formerly called Quittope-hill, a beginning has been made of a congregation-place ever since the year 1757, near the congregation-house, as also,

At Emmaus in the township of Salisbury, formerly called Maguntsky, eight miles from Bethlehem. The Indian war proved an occasion, that those who had belonged to this congregation since the year 1742, and who lived scattered up and down, drew together, and erected habitations near their congregation-house.

In Heidelberg in the county of Berks, twenty-four miles from Litz, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1743.

Shoenck not far from Nazareth was erected as a congregation-place in the year 1757. The members of the congregation who live on their plantations beyond the limits of the land belonging to Nazareth, attend divine service there.

In Gnadenhuetten on the Mahoni, there was formerly a considerable settlement of the Brethren, but it was destroyed by the Indians in the year 1755, but a congregation of the Brethren now gathers again together there.

In the city of Philadelphia there has been a congregation of the Brethren, ever since the year 1741, of the English, and another of the German nation; but in time they united, and became one congregation. However divine service is performed in both languages alternately. They have a church, a congregation-house, and burying-ground.

In the province of new Jersey at Oldman's Creek, thirty miles below Philadelphia, there has been a congregation ever since the year 1765. And in Greenland, thirty miles from Bethlehem, is a new settlement of the Brethren, which was laid out in the year 1771.

In the province of New York, and in the capital of the province, there has been a congregation of the Brethren, ever since the year 1741, which has a church, a congregation-house, and also a burying-ground in the city.

In Dutchess county, an hundred miles from New York, upon the borders of New England is Schiem, a small Brethren's congregation ever since the year 1758.

In the province of Rhode Island at Newport, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1758, which has a new chapel and burying-ground in the town.

In the province of Maryland, six miles from Fredrick's town and one mile from the river Manakosy, there has been a congregation of the Brethren ever since the year 1757. They have also a chapel at Carol's manor, twelve English miles from thence, in which the gospel is preached by the Brethren to a company of English people.

In the province of North Carolina, on the lands of Wachovia, are three congregations of the Brethren.

Salem, the chief place in the centre of the land; the Brethren began to build this place in the year 1766.

Bethabara, the first place which the Brethren began to build in Wachovia, in the year 1753: it lies six miles north of Salem.

Bethany, nine miles north of Salem; the building of this place was begun in 1760.

Besides these, there are two places in Wachovia, Friedland, five miles south-east of Salem, and Friedberg, eight miles south of Salem, where the gospel is also preached by the Brethren.

The United Brethren have also established, in the English dominions, several missions among the heathens with blessed effects.

From these missions has arisen,

An Indian congregation in North America, which was gathered in Chekomekok, and was composed of Mahikanders and Wampanos. As this congregation was situated at different places from time to time, it is necessary to prevent a misunderstanding, as if different congregations were at those different places, to describe their removals more particularly.

When the above-mentioned Indian congregation were driven from Chekomekok in 1746, the greatest part of them went to Bethlehem, where many new converts from the Delaware nation joined them.— From thence they went, in 1748, to the Mahoni, and built Gnadenhuetten, twenty-five miles to the north of Bethlehem; and in 1754 they built a new place on the Lecha, a mile from Old Gnadenhuetten, and called it New Gnadenhuetten: but as this place was destroyed by the savage Indians in 1755, they fled to Bethlehem.

Part of them built in 1757, a new place called Nain: another part removed behind the Blue Mountains, and built habitations upon a spot purchased by the Brethren, on the rivulet Weckquetank, twenty miles from Nazareth. But upon the breaking out of a new Indian war, in the year 1763, they were, though entirely innocent, suspected by some white people of being secretly connected with their savage countrymen.

By these suspicions they were brought into the greatest danger, so that their lives were not secure, and were taken under the protection of government, and brought to Philadelphia, and first placed on Province Island, and then lodged in the barracks of the city. After the conclusion of the peace, they were sent by the governor and assembly up into the Indian country upon the Susquehanna, at the mouth of the creek Wikilusing. Here they built a village, and called it Friedenshuetten. This proved a means that many Indians believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, and part of them settled at this place, and part of them settled at a place thirty miles farther up the Susquehanna, called Tschedschequanik. But when, in the year 1768, the six nations sold a large district to the English, in which lay also Friedenshuetten, the English congregation could stay there no longer.

They accordingly forsook their new and fine built village, which consisted of thirty-nine good houses, and ten huts, and departed from thence in the month of June 1772, being upwards of two hundred, to settle beyond the Ohio on the Muskingum river, between Lake Erie and the Ohio. According to the last accounts, they arrived there safe, and have laid out a new place, called Wilkittuppek, that is, Schoenbrunn, a beautiful spring.

Another Indian congregation of the Brethren had collected themselves through the ministry of the missionary David Zeisberger, in the Indian town Gosegosing, not far from Venango, two days journey above Pittsburg. These removed, in 1771, to the Beaver Creek, which falls into the Ohio, a day's journey below Pittsburg, and built for themselves a village, called Langeoutentank, or city of peace.

On the island of Jamaica, belonging to Great Britain, a mission was begun in the year 1754, and soon was branched out into several missions, on account of the distance of the places from one to another; in each of these places the gospel is preached to the poor negro slaves in the English language, and they are embodied into the Christian church by holy baptism. The places where these missions are settled are, at present, six in number, viz. Carmel, Bogue, Mesopotamia, Elin, Eden, and Island.

On the Island of Antigua the Brethren began a mission among the negroes in the town of St. John in the year 1756. They have not only a church for the negroes in the town, but they preach with blessing on sandy plantations out of the city.

On the Island of Barbadoes the Brethren have a negro church a few miles from Bridge-town, but preach as in Antigua, upon several plantations.

This mission was begun in the year 1767.

Lastly, the Brethren made a mission-settlement under the British government in Esquimaux bay, on the coast of Labrador, in the year 1771, with a view to bring the glad tidings of the incarnation of God, and of his meritorious life and sufferings, to the Esquimaux. The place where they have settled and built a house is called Nain, and lies in the 57 deg. N. lat.

VII. Under the Danish Government.

By royal rescript dated December 10th 1771 leave was granted to the Evangelical Brethren, adhering to the unaltered Augustin confession, to establish a congregation-place of the Brethren in the duchy of Sleswick, and at the same time was granted to the missions of the Brethren in the Danish dominions out of Europe all necessary church liberty, and other immunities. According to this grant, a new place of the Brethren is laid out and begun on the late royal domain Tysstruploff, in the bailiwick of Hadersleben, and this place is called Christian's Field.

New Hernhuth, upon the West Indian Island of St. Thomas, is the oldest mission of the Brethren among the heathens. The first missionaries went thither so early as in the year 1732. The number of the negroes who are ministered unto by the Brethren with the word and sacrament, is so greatly increased, and their dwellings so distant from the negro church in New Hernhuth, that the Brethren have built,

In Niesky, formerly called Crumbay, a new negro church, as also dwellings for the missionaries.

The baptized negroes and catechumens are divided, as the nature of their situation required, into these two congregations, and each negro belongs to that congregation which is nearest to his habitation.

Friedensthal in St. Croix near to Bassin, or the town and haven. At this mission-establishment the brethren built a spacious negro church and dwelling-house in 1753. But there were missionaries of the brethren on this island twenty years before the church was built. Here also, as in St.

Thomas, the negro congregation increased so much that it was needful to divide it into two congregations:

Therefore a new negro church and dwelling for the missionaries was built in 1771; on the west end of the island, near Christianstadt and called Friedensberg. This gave occasion to a new awakening among the negroes.

In St. Jan the mission-settlement of the Brethren is called Bethany.

As St. Thomas and St. Jan lie but a league distant from each other, the mission in St. Jan was taken care of by the Brethren in St. Thomas. But as the negroes earnestly requested, that a missionary might reside there constantly, a proper negro church and a dwelling house were built there in the year 1753. Since then the number of the baptized is greatly increased.

New Hernuth in Greenland on Baal's River in the sixty-fourth degree north latitude, is the first congregation of the Brethren in Greenland. This mission of the Brethren was begun as early as the year 1733.

Lichtenfels, one hundred miles south of New Hernuth on the Fisher Fiorte, is the other congregation of the Brethren in Greenland, and was begun in the year 1758.

A full account of these two congregations of the Brethren in Greenland is to be found in Crantz's Hist. of Greenland, Octo. published in Germany in 1765.

In the Brethren's Garden near Tranquebar in the East Indies, is a settlement of the Brethren since the year 1760, from whence they take care of the mission among the heathens upon the Nicobar Island.

The mission at Nancaweri, one of the Nicobar islands, was begun in the year 1768. The missionaries wait there with great impatience till our Saviour shall open the ears and hearts of the heathens for the gospel.

9. In the Russian Empire.

A congregation of the Brethren was established at Sarepta in the kingdom of Astrachan in the year 1765.

The most gracious permission was given by an Imperial Ukase to the United Brethren to come into the empire and to enjoy a complete liberty of conscience, and of exercising their religion agreeable to their own church-constitution and discipline.—They chose for their settlement a piece of land twenty-four miles below Czarizin on the rivulet Sarpa, which runs into the Wolga, and since then have erected not only dwelling-houses for families, but also a single Brethren's and single Sisters' house, and in the year 1772 a congregation-house and a chapel.

In St. Petersburg also the empress of Russia, in the year 1766, made a present of a large house to the Brethren to perform divine service in according to their rites. Since then the Brethren preach in it every Sunday.

X. Lastly, it is not to be passed over in silence, that there are also five Brethren in Africa, at Grand Cairo in Egypt, with a view to serve the Copts with the gospel, and if our Lord pleases, to go in time to Abyssinia.

The present state of the United Brethren.

The whole of those congregations whom we have now mentioned, call themselves United Brethren, or Associated Brethren, and Protestants adhering to the Augustin confession. They are however, distinguished by different appellations, and are classed in different ranks. All those who are of the Bohemian church, are called the Ancient Brethren, and take place of the others. Proselytes or converts are generally admitted into this society after they have been in the others; for there are some mysteries in this, concealed from the other societies.

It is probable that they borrow this practise from the Christians who lived about the latter end of the fourth century. For at that time the heathens who were candidates to be admitted into the church, stood at the door till all those called Believers, passed by; then the heathens were admitted to hear the sermon, and were examined as to their knowledge; but were obliged to retire, before the Believers went to the communion. This practice did great hurt to the cause of Christianity; for the heathens said that they, the Christians, met to commit unnatural practices. This will be always the case, where there are secrets, while the different sexes meet together. Let us only consider the ridiculous stories that have been told concerning the Free-masons, and perhaps all of them are false. It has also happened that the nocturnal meetings of the Methodists have induced people to accuse them of what perhaps they never were guilty; but then there ought to be no secrets in religion. Am I to answer at the judgment seat of Christ for all my actions, before angels and men? and shall I be ashamed or afraid to be seen in my religious duties here below? we should not only avoid doing evil, but we should avoid seeming to do so.

It is certain that although these United Brethren pretend to follow the confessions set forth by Luther, yet they have embraced a variety of other sentiments.

As the Arians spend most of their time in the pulpit, in degrading the glories of the Lord Jesus Christ, so these people called United Brethren forget all that honour due to God the Father and the Holy Ghost, under pretence of extolling the Saviour. All extremes are connected with insanity; and therefore those who would understand true religion, so as to reap any benefit by it, must learn that God is not to be found in the tormenting fire, or the raging whirlwind, but in the still small voice of a holy life.

Every congregation among the United Brethren has its peculiar pastors; they are, in some measure, distinct from each other, and yet they are at the same time united. And thus to preserve the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, they have synods which meet at different times to regulate all their external affairs. The members of these synods have free liberty to declare their sentiments with freedom, upon whatever subject comes before them. Those who do not chuse to speak, may deliver their opinions in writing; but the votes are always balloted with the greatest care.

As this is a religion that admits both sexes into offices, so a great number of females generally attend. There may be many reasons for this besides natural inclinations, but we shall take no notice of them. Perhaps they are as innocent as the quakers are reputed to be, and we hope they are so.

When anything of a dubious nature is proposed concerning a disputed point in scripture, and the members of the synod cannot agree concerning the discussion of it, then they cast lots. The casting of lots is of great antiquity; but how far such a practice can be justified according to the Christian institution, the reader may judge.

In the rest of their discipline they have something like the Sandemansians, for as there is a great deal of washing of feet, so their conduct is very severe to those whom they excommunicate. They resemble the Methodists in singing a number of hymns, and they are so much attached to this practice, that their children are asked questions in versing by the elders, and answered by the young ones in the same manner.

As for their keeping many things secret, we shall not judge them strictly, being willing to think charitably of all men; but this much is certain, that it cannot be done in conformity with the primitive church. The primitive Christians were obliged to meet in private in the night, to avoid the fury of the heathens, but here these people called Brethren enjoy a free toleration. Whether they lock the doors of their meetings during any part of their worship, we know not; but if they do, they are guilty of a breach of the toleration act.

We could wish that all things were free and open, that there might be no concealment; for wherever things of a religious nature are concealed in private suspicions arise, and scandal is thrown upon men, who perhaps, may be totally innocent.

From the whole account we have given of them, we have learned but little concerning the method of treating their poor members. We have already seen, that there are several societies of Christians in the Protestant world, who take no care of their poor; and where popery is established, all charitable donations are given to the monks. The Sandemansians pretend to take great care of their poor; but when they think it too troublesome to support them, they have an easy method of parting.

The Friends really take care of their poor, whether old or young; and although these people are often treated with much contempt, yet they are, in the great article of unaffected charity, the most respectable in the world.

“True religion and undefiled before God, is this, to visit the fatherless children and widows, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world.”

No man will believe that person's religion to be genuine, whose heart is not open to the wants of his fellow-creatures, as well as to his brethren in his own profession. The primitive Christians were charitable to their persecutors, which was copying, in all respects, the character of their Divine Redeemer; who created bread to feed the hungry, who went about doing good.

As for the United Brethren, called Moravians, it appears they collect great sums of money, but we believe the greatest part of it, according to their own accounts, is expended in missions among the heathens. The Jesuits have done the same, and little success has attended either. Perhaps the Divine Providence frowns upon those practices, which are not undertaken in his way, and refuses to confer such upon them, because they look for the praise of men. But we will not dwell upon these things. God Almighty suffers many transactions to take place in this lower world, which our bewildered and circumscribed understandings cannot account for. Perhaps there are many things in the works of providence, which we look on as evil, but which in the end may be attended with the most beneficial consequences. It is likewise not improbable, (may we believe it to be true) that many persons in their religious characters have been grossly misrepresented, by those who know little or nothing concerning them. It was so with the primitive Christians, it is certainly so with some of the modern sects. We shall therefore take leave of the Moravian Brethren, and proceed to another sect.

ACCOUNT OF THE MUGGLETONIANS.

IN that fertile age for the propagation of new religions, 1657, the people of this country, especially the lower ranks of them, not only turned preachers, but likewise prophets. Some pretended to foretel future events; others said they were apostles risen from the dead; while a third sort had the assurance to assert, that they were some of those persons who had been prophesied of in the book of Revelation.

Among these were Lodovicus Muggleton, a journeyman taylor, in Rosemary-lane, and Wm. Reeves, a cobbler, in the same place. These two men meeting together at a public-house in the Minorics, projected a new scheme of religion, in order to impose on the people.

They knew that the religionists who had gone before them, had not carried their pretensions high enough, and therefore they gave out that they were the two witnesses prophesied of in the book of Revelation, who were to appear before the end of the world. They held forth to the misguided multitude on Tower-hill, and on all the places of eminence near the city. They were followed by a vast number of people, which gave, so much offence to the Presbyterians and Independents, that they procured an order from Oliver Cromwell to have them punished.

Oliver, it is well known, was never an enemy to toleration, and therefore, all that he would grant was, that these madmen should be whipped through the principal streets of the city. The culprits bore their punishment with that stubborn fortitude which ever distinguishes enthusiastic and ignorant characters.

As persecution is the life of religion, so these men were more followed by mad people than ever. It was found in vain to persecute them any longer; and it may be justly said of them, that they turned the brains of one quarter of the vulgar people in London. They published four volumes in 4to. which the author of this work has perused.

When we consider the nature of these compositions, and the characters of the men to whom they are ascribed, we are led to believe, that like Mahomet of old, they had some assistance. Probably some of the other sectarists drew them up, with the sole view of having it in their power to wreak their vengeance on these men; for among all interested preachers, there is the same antipathy as between cats and mice.

When the restoration took place, the Muggletonians were frequently dispersed by the Guards, and many of them put into prison. It was the great misfortune of these people, that although they pretended to the spirit of prophesy, yet they could not foretel what was to happen to themselves. Just like the fortune-tellers of the present age, who, although they pretend to help people to stolen goods, and tell a girl who is to be her husband, yet they cannot foresee when a constable will come to take them into custody.

However, they went on with their fanaticism, and continued making proselytes till after the revolution took place, and then they sheltered themselves under the toleration act. But they had powerful enemies to contend with. The Presbyterians hated them, because they treated their poor, mean, clerical characters with contempt; and the Independents did all they could to injure them, and traduce their characters, because they led away many silly old women, whose credulity and pockets often furnished them with a dinner.

And yet these people grew the more; and their leaders, in order to keep them to themselves, declaimed against the vices of the Presbyterians, and the pretensions of the Independents. They told them, that they were all impostors, and wretches who lived on the fruits of the people's honest industry. There might have been some truth in this, but we have some reason to believe, that the Muggletonian teachers were as mercenary as those whom they opposed. Opposition in disputes concerning religion, may shift the outward character of the man, but it cannot change his nature. We may add further, that in all polemical disputes concerning the exteriors of religion, the means are changed; but the end held in view is the same.

And that end is neither less nor more, than to triumph over the credulity of the people; to procure emoluments at their expence; to triumph over their ignorance, and to represent themselves under the characters of saints, while, in reality, they are like devils. This was the case with the Pharisees of old, and it will remain to the end of the world, as long as false religion is known, and while there is an hypocrite on earth.

At present we must compare the Muggletonians to those passionate lovers, who, after being cloyed with enjoyment, become as cold as the aged and infirm. At first they were fired with unbridled zeal of religion, inflamed with superstition; but they gradually cooled, and are now a set of jolly fellows, who drink their pot, and smoke their tobacco.

There is one thing, however, relating to them, that must not be forgotten.

When their first apostles found themselves drawing towards their end, they did the very same almost that Mahomet had done before. They called the people together, and told them they would come again on earth to visit them; but they did not, like the Arabian impostor, fix the time, which undoubtedly was a master stroke of policy.

Their followers, in the present age, still retain that notion; and they believe, that these two apostles, or witnesses, will meet them when they are assembled together. They meet in the evenings of Sundays, at obscure public-houses in the out-parts of London, and converse about those of their sect who have gone before them. They have very little serious discourse, but are extremely free, sometimes going home drunk.

It does not appear that ever they had any public places of worship, for their first founders preached any where. Those Muggletonians of the present age, make no account of either faith or duty, unless it can be called faith to believe in the coming of their founders. It is a sort of faith indeed, but it is not that which Christians are taught to believe.— Their conduct in treating religion in such an irreverent manner, has had very pernicious effects on the morals of the people. It has induced many of them to become deists and practical atheists; and we have known several persons, who, from Methodists, commenced Muggletonians, and at last reposed themselves quietly in the bosom of the church of Rome. These converted Muggletonians are employed by the priests to pervert as many Protestants as they can, and they generally have but too abundant success.

The origin of the Muggletonians exhibits to us a melancholy picture of those times when England was without government either in church or state.— The people were not content with hearing the Presbyterians, Independents, Anapabists, &c. &c. who shared the church livings among themselves, but they even encouraged tailors, cobblers, tinkers, and all sorts of low vulgar mechanics to mount their stools and chairs in the streets and on dunghills.— Nay, they collected money for the preachers, which answered their end much better than their trades.— As the conduct of the ministers in the churches had induced them to lend a helping hand to carry on the work of reformation, so when the restoration took place, both the established clergy and the court, let loose their fury upon all sects indiscriminately.

Some of the Muggletonians were thrown into prison, and others were put in the stocks, where they continued preaching to the people. Some of them were transported to the colonies in America; but as the Presbyterians had great power there, they harassed them from one province to another, till death relieved them from their hardships.

The intelligent reader will be able to assign a reason for their continuance in this age, when all religions are taught, but very few duties performed.

The last thing we shall take notice of concerning these people is, that it is a melancholy consideration that men should live in the world without enjoying the smallest share of sense arising from religion:— That instead of looking forward to the blessed hope of immortality, they believe in nothing but the resurrection of two impostors. To this we may add, that there must still be a considerable number of these people in different parts of England; for only a few years ago a new edition in three volumes quarto was printed, of the rhapsodies of Muggleton and Reeves, and had there not been people to purchase them, they would not have been printed.

ACCOUNT OF THE MYSTICS.

WE have left our account of these smaller sects, till the concluding part of this work, because they were never (to use a military phrase,) properly embodied.

So far as we know, the first Mystic writer was St. Austin, bishop of Hippo, in Africa; but this celebrated father did not dissent from the religion as established in the empire. It is true he collected together a considerable number of young men, who lived with him in cloisters adjoining to his church, and he taught them those notions that are to be found in his confessions.

Soon after his death, we hear of nothing but ignorance, occasioned by the inundations of the barbarians; and the first Mystic writer that lived after him, seems to have been Bede, an Anglo-Saxon monk, who lived in the abbey of Tinmouth, in Northumberland.

The next Mystic writer we meet with is St. Bernard, who flourished about the eleventh century, and was employed by the pope to preach up the crusades. In latter times we meet with Kempis, Bona, and Drexilius, in all of whose writings there are many fine things. But we must now consider them as a general sect; and strange as it may appear, a woman was chiefly concerned in the institution of them.

Madam Bourignon, a French lady, and a Roman Catholic, some time before the revocation of the edict of Nantz (1685), published several pieces on divine love, spiritual mindedness, the elevation of the soul to Christ, the looking above all earthly things, to reject, or at least consider, the externals of religion as mere trifles, and to retire within themselves for the purposes of contemplation.

As the popish religion consists chiefly in ceremonies, so the French clergy were greatly alarmed, and Madam Bourignon, not knowing what mischief they might do her, left her native country, and retired to Holland.

In the mean time the sect had spread far and wide, and the great Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray, wrote a book, entitled, the Maxims of the Saints, in which he attempted to vindicate many of those sentiments professed by Madam Bourignon. The Catholic clergy were alarmed, and notice was sent to the pope.

After two years consultation, the pope, with his cardinals, condemned the book, and the archbishop acquiesced in the censure. It does not seem, however, that he relinquished his opinions: for in his posthumous works, he left a vindication of what he had written before.

The proselytes to Madam Bourignon's opinions increased daily, and some of them came over to England. They did not set up separate congregations, but they published a considerable number of books, by which they disseminated their sentiments all over the kingdom. They ran into wild extravagancies, and although they were at first very inoffensive, yet in the end they became most mysterious indeed.

As all violent disorders in the human body either kill or cure, so violences in religion have the same tendency. This was the case with the Mystics, who, by their violent attachment to things above religion, lost what reason they had. Their successors, however, have become more sober, and several great men both in the church of England, and among the Dissenters, have embraced their opinions.

Among these were the late pious Mr. Law, and the amiable Mrs. Rowe. The writings, however, of these celebrated persons, are far from being contemptible. They contain the most elevated flights of fancy, and exalted thoughts of divine goodness.

We shall conclude this article with observing, that whoever would devote themselves to the study of religion, should take a little practical religion along with them. We are such a composition of flesh and spirit, that nothing less than human means can promote divine institutions.

If men would think soberly, and look into their own hearts, they would not be led into such extravagancies as they generally are. In the present age, mistakes are to be found in many of our sects, and the greatest part of them have been owing to the multiplicity of hymns. Of these we shall just give a specimen, and leave the reader to judge for himself. We could give stronger specimens, but think the following will be sufficient.

Jesus, God of our salvation,

Give us eyes thyself to see,
Waiting for the consolation,

Longing to believe on thee:

Now vouchsafe the sacred power,

Now the faith divine impart;

Meet us in this solemn hour,

Shine in every drooping heart.

Anna-like within the temple,

Simeon-like we meekly stay,

Daily with thy saints assemble,

Nightly for thy coming pray:

While our souls are bow'd before thee,

While we humbly sue for grace,

Come, thy people's light and glory,

Shew to all thy heavenly face.

If to us thy sacred spirit

Hath the future grace reveal'd,

Let us by thy righteous merit

Now receive our pardon seal'd:

To eternal life appointed,

Let us thy salvation see,

Now behold the Lord's anointed,

Now obtain our heaven in thee.

Upon the whole, the Mystics, who at present seem to have hearts inclined towards piety, but very confused heads, with minds susceptible of serious impressions of religion, by neglecting the use of reason they run into a vast number of absurdities.—By imagining themselves to be wrought upon by superior and supernatural influences, they neglect the use of divine revelation. They embrace the shadow for the substance, and although we would not call them criminal, yet we are certain that they are mistaken.

ACCOUNT OF THE FRENCH PROPHETS.

ALTHOUGH, so far as we are able to learn, there are none of these people now in London, nor in any part of Britain, yet they made no small figure about the beginning of the present century. Their origin was as follows:

After the revocation of the edict of Nantz, 1685, not less than fifteen hundred thousand Protestants left France, and settled in Protestant countries.—These men, who were for the most part very ingenious artists, carried the manufactories of France along with them. Many of these Protestants brought the silk trade along with them to England, and they received all that encouragement which is due to persecuted merit. The elector of Brandenburg, grandfather to the late king of Prussia, invited some thousands of them to settle in his dominions; and the kings of Denmark and Sweden, who had their own interest in a better light than the Gallic monarch, assigned them places to reside in.

This therefore weakened the trade of France, by lessening her power, in depriving the country of its most useful inhabitants. Here was a noble opportunity for the French ministry to revive the interest and honour of their country by putting an end to the iron hand of oppressive power, by restoring the subjects to their natural rights and privileges. Here, however, bigotry got the better of self-interest, and the love of superstition triumphed over all those duties which men owe to their fellow-subjects.

An edict passed, that every man who should be found making his escape out of France, should be condemned to the galleys for life, and some thousands of these people were apprehended and suffered the prescribed punishment. The violence of the persecution raged with the greatest severity in the south of France, which induced the people who had no opportunity of making their escape, to take shelter in those barren mountains called the Cevennes.—There they suffered many hardships, which naturally filled their minds with notions altogether superstitious. Fixing carnal senses on the most reputable providential passages in the Old Testament, they began to imagine they were divinely inspired, and assumed the name of prophets: pretending, at the same time, to that sacred character which ought always to be treated with respect.

Necessity furnished these people with an opportunity of making their escape to Geneva, where they were kindly received, and furnished with money to carry them to Holland, by the way of the Rhine.

From Holland, a whole cargo of these enthusiasts came over to London, and they began to shew their importance in a very remarkable manner indeed.—They laboured at the ends of the most remarkable and most conspicuous streets in London, declaiming against popery, and contumacious, with the bitterest violence, the whole frame of the church of England. They denounced the severest judgments on queen Anne for not extirpating all the papists in Europe; and they prophesied, that within a few months England would be destroyed.

On this subject of religious madness, Voltaire, contrary to his usual way of writing, has a very just remark. “Queen Anne (says this author) was well known to have a strong attachment to the church of England; and although a little superstition might be found in her conduct, yet she did not choose to have her favourite church ridiculed. She therefore ordered her attorney-general, Sir Thomas Parker, to proceed against these enthusiasts in a summary manner. Accordingly they were ordered to be whipped round St. Paul’s church-yard; and at every lash they received, they prophesied a curse against her majesty, and against the nation.” But this conduct had not the desired effect, for they had daily great numbers of converts, so that for some time London was little better than in a state of confusion.

It was not, however, sufficient for them to make converts in London, they sent missionaries as far as Scotland. Here one Cunningham, a common mechanic, preached in the streets of Edinburgh, to a tumultuous mob; and the Presbyterian ministers began to imagine, that the French Prophets were devils indeed. They were afraid they should lead away their people from their churches, and bring their ministry into contempt.

The magistrates of Edinburgh acted more prudently, for they caused Cunningham, and about a dozen of his followers to be apprehended and committed to prison, and like the Muggletonians, they were so ignorant of future events, that they did not know what was to happen to themselves. During his confinement, Cunningham wrote a book full of rhapsodies, bordering on blasphemy, pronouncing a thousand curses on Scotland; but the magistracy took no further notice of it, than to order him to be whipped through the city.

For some time after Cunningham had been released from his imprisonment, his followers attempted to disseminate their sentiments in the different towns in Scotland, but the Presbyterian ministers formed a plan to have them all knocked on the head. It is certain that enthusiasm will carry men to great lengths, even in a bad cause; but the French Prophets in Scotland had not fortitude sufficient to submit with patience to be massacred, according to the plan laid down by some zealous Presbyterian ministers. They had less zeal and more prudence than one would have expected from men, who, in all other respects, were darkened in their understandings.

Stimulated by motives of self-preservation from the fury of the enraged Presbyterians in Scotland, they wisely crossed the Tweed, and joined their friends in London. It does not appear, that, properly speaking, they had any meetings; for in their opinion, temples built with hands were places too profane for them to exhibit in. They had tents erected in the fields leading towards Islington, where they harangued every day to a promiscuous multitude. This created many disturbances, and frequently led the Middlesex Justices from their bottle to see them set in the stocks. Sympathy for the sufferers operated on the minds of the vulgar, and their bold pretensions to the spirit of prophecy induced the ignorant to consider them as divinely inspired. In proof of this, we shall mention the following fact, related to the author by an eminent surgeon now alive, and who enjoys two considerable places in public hospitals.

One of these madmen having asserted, that in proof of his divine mission, he would die on a particular day, and on the third day he would rise from the dead; a wag present, laid him a wager on the strength of his prophecy. The prophet, who knew not in what manner the materia medica operated, resolved to try the experiment, and the day was fixed. In the mean time the enthusiast went to the father of the gentleman already mentioned, who kept an apothecary's shop in Old-street. He asked for as much opium as would make him sleep one night. Having obtained that, he bought twice as much, vainly imagining that if one-third part of the quantity would make him sleep one night, consequently the remainder would make him sleep two nights more, after which he would arise from the dead, and give a convincing proof of his mission.

Accordingly he swallowed the three doses of opium, and his friends, who had been let into the secret of his design, and who were as ignorant as himself, had him interred in the burying-ground belonging to the parish church of Cripplegate, situated in White-Cross-street. The fraternity of prophets continued singing hymns round the grave till the expiration of the three days, and the people in the neighbourhood were driven to such a state of expectation, that they neglected their lawful employments to behold this miraculous event.

At last the appointed time arrived; thousands and ten thousands of fools attended, and the grave was opened; but, alas! instead of the prophet's making his appearance in the land of the living, the coroner issued his warrant for a jury to be summoned, to inquire in what manner he came by his death.—The verdict was found self-murder, and he was buried with a stake drove through his body, in the cross-way near Doghouse bar.

This was a most fatal stroke to the French Prophets; their credit sunk into contempt, and they soon after dwindled away. Indeed, for some time, the London prisons were filled with them; and the pillories exhibited scenes of amazement for the idle and the profligate. Some of them were transported to America, but they were soon driven out of that country, because both the Presbyterians and Independents threatened to have them brought to punishment. It is very probable this would have taken place, had not the civil governors taken part with these unhappy enthusiasts, and sent them again to England.

It seems that about this time, they began to cool in their zeal, and they dwindled away in such a gradual manner, that no remains of them are left.

ACCOUNT OF THE FIFTH MONARCHY MEN, COMMONLY CALLED MILLENARIANS.

IT is probable that many of our readers never heard of this sect, and therefore it is proper we should say something concerning them, especially as they are not only of great antiquity, but are likewise numerous in the present age. It is true, they are not considered as one body of people, because they are scattered through the different denominations of Protestants, and some of the same sentiments have often been found among the Roman Catholics.

It is not our business here to enter into that sort of controversy which might distract the minds of our readers; but we could say a thousand things concerning the conduct of the council of Nice, which, in the year 325, settled the canon of the sacred scripture. Mr. Toland has asserted, that if the council of Nice had a right to determine what was the canon of the sacred scripture, they must have been divinely inspired; for all the living witnesses and writers had been dead many years before the oldest members of that assembly was born.

Now it is well known, that even the council of Nice rejected some of those books which we now consider as canonical. And this has given rise to a question, viz. whether if the scriptures acknowledged to be canonical by the council of Nice were written by Divine inspiration? And secondly, whether Divine inspiration should guide the hand of every transcriber?

We shall not enter into the nature of this controversy; the learned are well acquainted with it, and we know the weak cannot bear it. There are subjects which particular persons may discourse on, but we must not make them known indiscriminately.

This leads us to consider the origin and progress of these people called Millenarians. The Apocalypse, or the book which we now call the Revelation of St. John the Divine, was not recognized in the church as canonical, till the end of the fifth century. It is certain, there are some expressions in that book which bear strong marks of a Divine original; but it is upon a particular expression that the doctrine of the Millenarians has been founded.

The passage alluded to is in Revelation xx.

“And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand,

And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and satan, and bound him a thousand years,

And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that, he must be loosed a little season.

And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them:

And I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, nor his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.

But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection.

Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God, and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison,

And shall go out to deceive the nations, which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea.

And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them.

And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophets are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.”

Now it is very probable, that these expressions are rather figurative than otherwise; for days are often mentioned as years in scripture; and it is said, that a thousand years are in the sight of God but as one day. However, it will appear that some of the ancient Christians, who never saw the book called the Apocalypse, or Revelation, believed the same sentiment contained in the above passage. The first of these was Irenæus, an author whose goodness of heart was far superior to the clearness of his head. The notion itself was carnal, but it was easily embraced and greedily swallowed by the weak Christians in those early ages.

But with respect to what had been advanced by Ireneus, it was trifling to the notions broached by Origen. That father, celebrated for his learning, became equally celebrated, or rather despised for his preaching doctrines unknown to the Christian church before his time. Origen had learning without knowledge, and piety without prudence. He was acquainted with human wisdom; he loved that which was divine; but his passions were too strong to be brought under proper restraints.

A little learning is a dangerous thing,
 Drink deep, or taste not the pierian spring;
 Their shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
 But drinking largely sobers us again.

However, it became an established notion among the primitive churches, that Christ, at his second coming, was to reign with his saints on earth a thousand years; and then the whole plan of redemption was to be completed. We are not certain how far this sentiment operated in the middle ages of Christianity; but we are certain that it was received soon after the Reformation from popery. We shall therefore proceed to consider in what manner these sentiments were propagated, who the persons were who embraced them, and by whom they are countenanced in the present age. This leads us into the history of the civil wars, an age when new religions grew up as fast as mushrooms do from their beds, and who vanish away like Jonah's gourd.

When the civil wars broke out, the views and designs of the Puritans were discovered both by the church-men, whom they opposed, and by the Republican party, who countenanced them. They had before that time been considered under the general name of Puritans, as men who sought for a purer reformation than had taken place in the reign of queen Elizabeth. To promote the destruction of church and state, they concealed their real sentiments; but no sooner had they got into the possession of the church livings, than they pulled off the mask, and, like Pandora's box, as many religions flew out as were sufficient to have darkened the air.

Among some of these Pseudo reformers were a great number of Fifth Monarchy Men, or Millenarians; and so fond were they of this notion, that they excommunicated their hearers who refused to be of the same sentiment with themselves. Many books were written on the belief of Christ's coming to reign with his saints a thousand years on earth, and it was considered as much an article of religion as the existence of God, or the incarnation of Christ.

Some of those men who taught this notion were, in other respects, considerable in the literary world; but whenever new religions are broached by men of learning, they must not expect to find it wholly engrossed by themselves.

They will find competitors to enter the lists with them, and it will frequently happen, as it too often does in the physical world, that the quacks will have more followers and greater fees, than those who have been regularly bred to the profession.

This was the very case with the Fifth Monarchy Men in England; for no sooner had they published their sentiments and procured a considerable number of followers, whose imaginations they wrought up into a state of confusion, than many of their hearers turned preachers, and taught for themselves. It might have been supposed, that a person of such a cool disposition as Oliver Cromwell certainly was, would have done something towards suppressing these people; but then it must be considered that the Independents, whom he always esteemed, supported his government. Now he could not, with propriety, have attacked the spawn of his own party, without giving them offence; and as mere nominal preachers have no mercy, consequently he might have been, for such an action, deprived of his life and his dignity.

The more sober part of the Millenarians, or Fifth Monarchy Men, only believed that Christ would reign a thousand years before the general resurrection; but the madmen who sprung up under them, carried the notion much higher. They were not content to wait till Christ's second coming; they had fixed a time for setting the crown on his head. Of this the following is a remarkable instance.

In 1660, and on the very day on which king Charles II. was crowned, a considerable number of these madmen met in Coleman-street, in London, where they were headed by one Venner, a fiery, ignorant preacher. In the morning he delivered a discourse to them, in which he told them, that the day was come when Christ was to ascend his throne. Having fired their imaginations with the highest raptures of enthusiasm, and finding them ready to obey him in every thing, he ordered them to sally forth into the streets, and kill every person who refused to join with them.

This was readily complied with, and these infatuated men made a more than dreadful havoc in the streets. The guards were brought to disperse them, and several of them were killed. A considerable number were taken into custody, among whom was Venner, the ringleader, who, with nine of his deluded followers, were executed in different parts of the city.

This instance of madness afforded a pretence for the corrupted court to wreak its vengeance upon the whole body of Non-conformists, although it is certain that they had no concern in it. Whatever might have been the sentiments of many of the Dissenters at that time, this much is certain, that they never intended to act in the same manner as Venner. They kept their opinions to themselves, but Venner reduced them to practice. This was a dreadful stroke to the Fifth Monarchy Men, and from that time they have made no great figure in England.

At present they are confined to writers, and there is now in the church of England a learned bishop who has embraced the sentiment concerning the Millenarians. We acknowledge the sentiment to be of a disputable nature, but still we think it too carnal to make a part of the Christian religion.— However, we shall leave every one to his own opinion, without pretending to judge of things above our comprehension.

ACCOUNT OF THE HUTCHINSONIANS.

THE further we proceed in our accounts of sects and parties in religion, the more the curiosity of our readers should be stimulated, because we are of opinion, that many of them were seldom heard of before. However, that they either exist, or did exist, we can make appear.

To understand the nature of this sect, we must consider, that about the time of the Reformation, or at least soon after it, there were some feint attempts made to improve the study of the Hebrew language. Laudable as a proposal of this nature might have been, yet it might have been entangled with a variety of difficulties, had not the attempts made to suppress the inquiry, defeated its own intention.

All the Hebrew manuscripts were written without the points or vowels, and these points or vowels were, at the same time, used by the Jews. The grand question was, whether the Hebrew language was to be read with the Masoretic points, or whether the letters Aleph, He, Vau, Jod, and Gvain, should be substituted in place of the common vowels.— These different methods of reading created much confusion; and the Jews, by the use of the points, had fixed a sense upon the scripture which had never been known before.

Our first reformers had learned the Hebrew according to the Jewish method, by the use of the Masoretic points; and as these points put a wrong construction on the sense of the scripture, consequently the deists took the advantage, while the Jews triumphed over the weakness of the Christians. In particular it was objected by the deists, that the Mosaic account of the creation was, in all respects, inconsistent with the principles of natural philosophy, according to the experiments that had been made in latter ages. Hence the interests of divine revelation were concerned, and therefore it was either necessary, that we should acknowledge that Moses never taught a system of philosophy, or that he was not divinely inspired, because he concealed from us those things which can be easily known by common experience, at least by the use of modern philosophy, which has been for some time reduced to a system.

This naturally leads us to the investigation of the sect of whom we are now treating.

John Hutchinson was the son of a farmer in Yorkshire, and as his father's sole design was to bring him up to be a land-steward to some nobleman, he sent him to school to be educated in those rules of mechanical science which naturally leads thereto. When he had completed himself in mensuration, and the other practical parts of the sciences, he returned from school to his father, and at that time the following circumstance took place.

In the village where Mr. Hutchinson's father lived, a stranger unknown to any person in the country, came to ask for lodgings, and old Mr. Hutchinson took him into his house. It was never known who this stranger was, but after he had been about three weeks in his new lodgings, he told Mr. Hutchinson, he would for his board and lodging teach his son the languages.

The father embraced the proposal, and in the compass of four years our young student was enabled to go through not only the Roman and Greek classics, but likewise to make a considerable figure in the Hebrew. The education of the young man being completed, the stranger left the place, and never was heard of afterwards. There are circumstances of this nature to be found in history, and reasons may be assigned for them, which none but the intelligent can answer.

Furnished with all the learning of the schools, though disseminated through the channel of a private education, Mr. Hutchinson made an amazing progress in the study of the ancient writers, and between all of them he ran such a parallel as to point out the difference between the Mosaic economy, and the mythology of the Greeks. To the knowledge of languages he added that of philosophy, and by comparing the ancient with the modern systems, he formed those notions which have made no inconsiderable figure in this nation. By inconsiderable we mean, that some celebrated persons, who shall be mentioned afterwards, have embraced them.

Mr. Hutchinson being, as it were, at leisure in the enjoyment of a secure place, under the duke of Somerset, master of the horse, began to compare the ancient and modern philosophy, and found that he could not find the truth in either. He examined the Hebrew language with great care, and from his inquiry, published a book under the title of Moses Principia, which he laid down as the ground work of all his other compositions.

The design of this work is to prove that Moses laid down a perfect system of philosophy; that the sacred scriptures of the Old Testament had never been rightly translated; that Moses never taught any thing contrary to the planetary system, but really established it; and whereas Sir Isaac Newton instituted the notion of there being a vacuum in nature, he opposed it by asserting there was a plenum. That all heavenly bodies went round the sun by a sort of compresure.

With respect to the terms of acceptance with God, he asserted, that they were clearly revealed by Moses and the prophets; but he strongly opposed the imputation of Christ's righteousness. He leaned more to the Arminian than the Calvinistical side of the question; but his notions were a mixture of both.

From these sentiments a new sect was formed, which has continued ever since. There are many learned men of his opinion, and three Hebrew Lexicons have been published to support all his sentiments. The Hutchinsonian writers are more severe against their antagonists, than the papists are against the Protestants. There is a certain harshness of expression used by them, that does not become the mild doctrines of the gospel. We know but of one single exception to this general charge, and that is, in the lord president Forbes. That learned gentleman has crossed the Hutchinsonians in the most amiable characters indeed. While he illustrates the principles laid down by Hutchinson, he vindicates, at the same time, all the great truths of the Christian religion, and supports divine revelation upon principles little attended to by Christian divines, and utterly unanswerable by the deists. It is certain that his works have been of more service in promoting the cause of religion and virtue, than one half of the books in the present age.

At present the Hutchinsonians are rather a sentimental than collective body of people; they are to be found among almost all denominations of Protestants, and the notion itself has been the means of reviving the study of the Hebrew language. It has stimulated many persons to inquire into the sacred oracles, and notwithstanding the levity of the present age, yet we are certain, that there are more persons in Britain at present acquainted with the oriental languages than ever were known at one time, since the Reformation.

As for places of worship, properly speaking, they have none; for those of the lower sort who reside in London, meet, like the Muggletonians, in public-houses. We have been present at one of these meetings, in a club-room up stairs, at a noted public-house in the Strand. The members consisted, for the most part, of discarded Methodists, Independents, and Saudemanians; but we could not find one person that had made choice of this scheme till he had been expelled out of another. And this leads us to consider the vast impropriety in the conduct of our modern Calvinistical Dissenters, in excommunicating their members.

The action is weak, foolish, and wicked. It is weak, because they turn out from among them those who have it in their power to expose some things that will not bear a proper scrutiny. It is foolish, because they turn away those who contribute towards supporting their ministers in a state of idleness. And, lastly, it is wicked, because no sooner have they discarded one of their members, than they do all in their power to promote his ruin. Here is a complication of guilt, attended with many aggravating circumstances. Some of them know themselves to be very irregular, and why then should they hunt down those who only go halves with them in a course of practical impiety?

This conduct of some Dissenters has been attended with two consequences: First, it has made the discarded members form schemes of new religions; and then finding nothing but knavery wherever they joined themselves, they have commenced either papists or deists.

At present, when the Hutchinsonians meet in their public assemblies, one of them reads, and another explains a passage of scripture as well as he can; then a third prays, and when they have drank a little porter they are dismissed.

Having already taken notice that most of our new religions are formed of the excommunicated members of other societies; we must now declare these members were once celebrated for their high attainments in piety and divine experience. They were celebrated for traducing the words morality, or good works. Grace, experience, the state of their souls, and such like expressions, made the whole of their conversation; but let them be once discarded, they treat with contempt all their boasted experiences, and when they are tired with dabbling in religion, they give themselves up to all manner of profaneness.

There are but few instances where it is otherwise, and where that does happen, it should be ascribed more to a gracious Providence, than to any thing else. This should caution young people to be upon their guard against the force of temptation, which will be sure to assault them if they are not serious in the matter of religion. If they can overcome the temptation, it will be to their everlasting honour, of which we shall give a single instance, wishing we had it in our power to produce many more.

About sixteen years ago, a person of an extraordinary turn, had read almost every book that he could lay hold of; and what was still more remarkable, he remembered almost every thing he read. Instructed in his early youth in the principles of Christianity, he had always the highest value for every thing of a serious nature. Brought up a Dissenter, and in sentiment a Calvinist; he entered into communion with the Independents. He had not been long among them when he began to point out to their leaders the necessity they were under of reforming many abuses; and among other things, that of providing for the poor. This was strongly opposed, and one of their ministers observed, that as they paid the poor rates, so the parishes ought to take care of those who were in want.

Another proposal was made by this person in the meeting, which met with the same fate as the former. It was, that the ministers should keep a list of the names of his people, their places of abode, and their circumstances; and that they should intimate upon their removal, what places they went to. That the minister should visit every person, at least four times in the year, to inquire into his circumstances, and to invite such as were poor, to come to the meeting, and in a tender and affectionate manner, be relieved by their brethren.

This was a dreadful proposal, and every means were thought of, to get rid of this troublesome guest. The worst of all was, he had done rather more good than any of them, so that it was difficult to fix the charge, so as to get him excommunicated. They had frequent consultations concerning these matters during the compass of six months; and at last, two favourable opportunities presented themselves.

London was at this time in an uproar, concerning the playing at blindman's-buff, and this obnoxious Independent went frequently to see their madness. As he was always free in his conversation, and sometimes imprudently satirical, he frequently ridiculed his brethren, so that he was reputed to be a Soudimanian. The next plea against him was, that in consequence of having a large family, most of whom had been long confined to sick beds, he had been under the necessity of contracting some debts. A peremptory demand of payment was made upon him, at a time when it was well known it was not in his power to comply, and thus the affair was brought to a conclusion. The offender was ordered to make his appearance before the congregation; but as he made it a fixed rule never to go where his temper might be ruffled, and well knowing what was plotting against him, he was immediately excommunicated.

As for this mean exercise of clerical power, the man would have made no account of it, but no sooner were they got quit of him, than they went about wherever he was known, and traduced his character in such a manner, that he was left with his family in distress. But notwithstanding that more than heathenish cruelty, yet this man never despised true religion. He gave up all connection with religious societies, and minded only religion itself.—He considered religion as a living principle, which must be reduced to actions, and traduced as a heathen, he went on in an uniform course of duty.

As what has been here advanced is the most solemn matter of fact, so it is hoped it will have a proper effect, and teach people, in the words of the apostle, to be well grounded in their own minds, before they change their religious sentiments.

ACCOUNT OF THE QUIETISTS.

OF all the sects we have hitherto treated of, this bears the nearest resemblance to that of the Mystics, only that this sect has been long confined to the Roman Catholic church, whereas the Mystics joined the Protestants.

The founder of this sect was one Michael de Molinos, a Romish priest, and a man of some learning, who lived in France, and afterwards in Italy, towards the latter end of the sixth century.

The name is taken from an absolute state of rest and inaction, which the soul is supposed to be in, when arrived at the state of perfection. This state of perfection is called by them the inactive life.

To arrive at this, a man is first to pass through the progressive way, that is, through a long course of uniform obedience, imposed by the fear of hell. Hence he is to proceed into the illuminative way before he arrives at perfection. He must go through combats and violent pains, that is, not only the usual business of the soul, and the common privations of grace, but also infernal pains.

He must believe himself to be damned, and the persuasion that he is so, must if he lives, be upon him several years.

St. Francis de Salis, a Jesuit says, the Quietists are so fully persuaded of this, that they will not suffer any body to convince them to the contrary. And indeed it is needless to make the experiment, for enthusiasts are seldom convinced, even by the most rational arguments that can be made use of, but remain obstinate to the last. They shut their eyes against the truth.

These men believe that they shall be amply repaid for all their sufferings, by the embraces of God, which they imagine will raise them to a state equal to their maker.

Their sentiments concerning God, are wonderfully pure and disinterested. They say they love him for himself, on account of his own perfection, independently of any rewards or punishments. The soul, says he, acquiesces in the will of God, even at the time when he precipitates it into hell. Nay, instead of begging mercy on this occasion; one of them, whose name was B. Angelo de Poligy, cried out, "Haste Lord to cast me into hell, do not delay if thou hast abandoned me; but haste my destruction and cast me into the abyss."

At length the soul, after long enduring many sufferings, enters into rest or quietude. Here it is wholly employed in contemplating its God. It acts no more, thinks no more, desires no more, but lies perfectly open and at large, to receive the grace of God, who, by means thereof, draws it where it will and as it will.

In this state it has no occasion for prayers, or hymns, or vows: because where the spirit labours, and the mouth is open, the soul is the most weak and impotent. The soul of the spirit is as it were laid in the bosom, and between the arms of God; where without the making motion or exerting any action, it waits and receives the Divine grace. It then becomes happy, quitting the existence it had before. It is now changed, and it is transformed, and, as it were, sunk and swallowed up in the Divine Being, insomuch, as not to know its being distinguished from God himself.

Bishop Burnet gives the following account of the Quietists, or Molinists, in one of his letters from Rome.

"The new method of Molinos doth so much prevail in Naples, that it is believed he hath above twenty thousand followers in this city; and since this has made some noise in the world, and yet is generally but little understood, I will give you some account of him: He is a Spanish priest that seems to be but an ordinary divine, and is certainly a very ill reasoner when he undertakes to prove his opinion. He hath writ a book, which is entitled il Guida Spirituale, or, The Spiritual Guide, which is a short abstract of the Mystical Divinity; the substance of the whole is reduced to this, that in our prayers and other devotions, the best methods are to retire the mind from all gross images, and so to form an act of faith, and thereby to present ourselves before God; and then to sink into a silence and cessation of new acts, and to let God act upon us, and so to follow his conduct: This way he prefers to the multiplication of many new acts, and different forms of devotion, and he makes small account of corporal austerities, and reduces all the exercises of religion to this simplicity of mind.

He thinks this is not only to be proposed to such as live in religious houses, but even to secular persons, and by this he hath proposed a great reformation of men's minds and manners; he hath many priests in Italy, but chiefly in Naples, that dispose those who confess themselves to them, to follow his methods. The Jesuits have set themselves much against this conduct, as foreseeing that it may much weaken the empire that superstition hath over the minds of the people, that it may make religion become a more plain and simple thing, and may also open a door to enthusiasm: they also pretend that his conduct is factious and seditious, that this may breed a schism in the church. And because he saith, in some places of his book, that the mind may rise up to such a simplicity in its acts, that it may rise in some of its devotions to God immediately, without contemplating the humanity of Christ, they have accused him, as intending to lay aside the doctrine of Christ's humanity, though it is plain that he speaks only of the purity of some single acts.— Upon all these heads they have set themselves much against Molinos; and they have also pretended, that some of his disciples have infused it into their penitents, that they may go and communicate as they find themselves disposed, without going first to confession, which they thought weakened much the yoke, by which the priests subdued the consciences of the people to their conduct: yet he was much supported both in the kingdom of Naples and Sicily; he hath also many friends and followers at Rome. So the Jesuits, as a provincial of the order, assured me, finding they could not ruin him by their own force, got a great king that is now extremely in the interest of their order to interpose, and to represent to the pope the danger of such innovations.

It is certain the pope understands the matter very little, and that he is possessed with a great opinion of Molinos's sanctity; yet upon the complaints of some cardinals, that seconded the zeal of that king, he and some of his followers were put in the Inquisition, where they have been now for some months, but still they are well used, which is believed to flow from the good opinion that the pope hath of him, who saith still, that though he may err, yet he is certainly a good man. Upon this imprisonment Pasquin said a pleasant thing in one week; one man had been condemned to the gallees for somewhat he had said, another had been hanged for somewhat he had writ, and Molinos was put in prison, whose doctrine consisted chiefly in this, that men ought to bring their minds to a state of inward quietness, from which the name of Quietists was given to all his followers. The Pasquinade upon all this was, If we speak we are sent to the gallees, if we write we are hanged, if we stand quiet we are put up in the Inquisition; what must we do then? Yet his followers at Naples are not daunted, but they believe he will come out of this trial victorious."

Some years after the cardinals had condemned the opinions of Molinos, most of them were driven out of Italy; but this persecution caused them to increase rather than decrease. Some of the popish clergy became converts to their opinions, which induced the famous Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, to write against them. They might, indeed, have suffered much in France, but the clergy were too much engaged in persecuting the Protestants.— However, no sooner was that persecution over, than the priests, who are seldom found idle while any one opposes them, let loose all their fury upon their own brethren the Molinists; for however mad these Molinists might have been in their speculative notions, yet they never denied the papal supremacy, nor did they refrain from any of the rites and ceremonies of the church of Rome. They set up no separate form of worship; they made no schism in that church; but the Roman Catholics punish people as well for their thoughts, as for their words or actions.

Some of these Quietists fled into Holland, where they published several books, but they still attended the Romish chapels in that country; for we do not find that any of them ever embraced the Protestant religion.

But notwithstanding all this, the Romanists never considered them as sound in the faith, nor did they always agree among themselves, so that it would be impossible to form a system of their speculative notions, without running into a variety of wild, absurd contradictions.

Many of these Quietists went up into Germany, where they were persecuted with as much violence by the Lutheran clergy as they had been formerly by the Romish priests. The pulpits thundered out against them; the learned wrote books, and drew up long lists of their heresies; and then gave them by decision the name of Pietists, and their religion Pietism.

These people are taxed in general as being indifferent to all the exteriors of religion, and in Germany despising the symbolical books of the Lutherans. Their notions concerning the Trinity are said not to be orthodox, and they look upon creation and providence as an inundation from the Deity.

They are accused of being Millenarians; of pretending that all religion consists in the contemplation of God; that in this state the soul is no ways guilty of the offences committed by the body; and that all actions are necessary, good or bad.

Jacob Bohem, a native of Poland, having read some of the books written by the Quietists, resolved to turn author himself. He was by trade a shoemaker, but he had acquired some knowledge in reading cabalistical and chemical books. His mind was well turned for enthusiasm and fanaticism; he bragged of visions and dreams, which he displayed in matters of divinity and philosophy; all which he pretended to clear up in a book entitled "The Grand Mystery," which is a theological, chemical comment on Genesis, written in the German language. This being printed, made a vast number of enthusiasts.

It is likely that this shoemaker, notwithstanding the superior genius he pretended to, did not well understand his own meaning. For he is always absurd, and often ambiguous, like one who has but confused notions of the subject. His followers endeavoured to clear up his notions, by substituting some of their own. Thus, for instance, they owned a perfect unity in the divine essence; and yet they imagined it contained a three-fold principle of all things. Thus fire was God; the light of the fire, the knowledge and wisdom of God, the son of God; and the Holy Ghost is the unity by which the light enlightens. This opinion was embraced by many of the ancient heretics, as well as by some of the heathen philosophers; for according to this system, God and the whole world is but one complete being. They have many other wild notions, and there are many persons in to the world who read their raptures of enthusiasm.

It does not appear, that there are any of them among the Roman Catholics in the present age; but vast numbers of sects have sprung from them in Germany, for almost every town or city has its meeting for them. They have no forms of worship, but in that particular pretty much resemble the Quakers. Indeed it would be unnecessary for them to have forms of worship, seeing they never pray but when they imagine themselves to be divinely inspired. It is the same in their sermons, which are always rhapsodies of wild nonsense, communicated as it were by madmen.

Although in some things they bear a near resemblance to the Mystics, yet those of the latter persuasion whom we have now in England, are far from being so extravagant as these. It is certain, however, that the English Mystics have given encouragement to the printing of some of Jacob Bohem's books, but what success they have had we know not.

Thus we have given the best account we could procure of the Quietists, which is extracted from impartial histories written of them; and here it appears that a system of enthusiasm, consisting of dreams and visions, has been embraced by a great number of Protestants, even after the Roman Catholics, who broached it, had returned back to the bosom of their holy mother church. Enthusiasm will be always sure to gain a great number of followers, but reason and good sense, we are sorry to say, seldom make many converts.

ACCOUNT OF THE PRE-ADAMITES.

WE have already taken notice of some ancient heretics who were called Adamites, and who were such abominable wretches, that they met naked in their assemblies, and committed the most indecent lascivious actions. This brought much trouble to the Christians, who, because they also met in the nights, were all included under the general censure. But the sect we are now going to treat of were very different; for their notions were purely of a speculative nature.

About the middle of the last century, one Pyrrhus, a foreign Protestant, wrote a book, in which he attempted to prove, that there were men in the world long before Adam; that when he was created, there were many thousands of people on this habitable world, and that God's making the world at that time was merely an allegory. He said, that Eve's being called the mother of all living, implied no more than that the whole race of the elect should descend from her. That as Seth was but the third son of Adam, it could not with propriety be said, that men should call upon the name of the Lord when he was born. These words, "Calling on the name of the Lord," mean no more than that men began at that time to call upon God by another name than that by which he was known before.—To this he adds, the account of Cain's marrying a wife in the land of Nod, and this he advances as a proof, that there were many families at that time in the world.

To these arguments, which have been made use of by many deistical writers, it may be reasonably supposed, that as the birth of Seth was not till many years after the fall, so there can remain little doubt but Adam had many children in that time.—But of these things we shall take particular notice afterwards, when we have stated more at large the history and sentiments of these people.

In the mean time, as the Pre-Adamites made some noise in Germany, the people of England sent for copies of the book written by Pyrierius; and as they were daily broaching new religions in this country, so they made one of this. It might be said of the sects in this country at that time, that, like Noah's dove, they could find no rest for the soles of their feet; that is, their various changes from one form of religion to another, had gradually disordered their minds, and the frame of moral duty was every day sinking into a state of weakness. This made them lay hold of every new scheme of religion that presented itself, but the more they sought to enjoy rest, the less they could find. They were, in some sense, like the ancient Athenians, who, having set up altars to all the gods they could hear of, and not being able to find a new one, erected an altar in one of their public places, with this inscription, "To the unknown God."

Several books were written to prove the doctrines advanced by Pyrierius, and many converts were made to his opinions. Some of these English Pre-Adamites had been Presbyterians, others Anabaptists, but all of them belonged to the sects.

They continued to increase till the restoration, but wonderful as it may seem, it does not appear, that even in those unsettled times, when every blockhead mounted the pulpit, that any of them obtained church livings. Perhaps there were none vacant, or which is more probable, Oliver Cromwell did not chuse to give encouragement to any new sects who would oppose the Independents.

At the restoration they were included under the general name of Dissenters, and some of them suffered the same hardships with all the other religious sectaries.

Having said thus much concerning their origin and progress, we shall now proceed to consider the remainder of their sects at large; and here we are sorry to say, that it most commonly happens, that those who undertake explaining the sacred scriptures, without understanding them, generally run into errors. There are two things to be attended to in reading the sacred scriptures, which must not be forgotten by those who would reap any advantage from them.

First, that there are many things in them above human comprehension, which so far from weakening their authority, serves only to confirm it. For if men cannot always understand the secret things of nature, how shall they comprehend the hidden mysteries of God.

Secondly, there is a sufficiency in them to make us wise unto salvation, and this is what we should give proper attention to.

Sin and death, according to this system, was long before Adam, but they did not live and reign over all mankind. Sin and death were dead, they had no sting. This is, say they, expressed by St. Paul in these words, "Until the law, sin was in the world, but sin is not imputed where there is no law."—And by consequence, death hath no power over mankind. But the same apostle says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men." However, to maintain this very strange and unaccountable system, they are obliged to admit, that before Adam men lived like beasts.

The election of the Jews is a consequence of the same system, for it began at Adam, who is their father; God is also the father of the Jews, having espoused their church to himself. He is likewise their mother, for the Gentiles are only adopted children, as being Pre-Adamites. The scriptures call them only men, or children of men; and sometimes they are compared to unclean beasts; whereas the Jews are said to be the children of God, as having been made of a more perfect nature than the other nations which he had created.

This distinction was very flattering, in regard to the Jews, who were thus raised to a superior order of men. The whole has the appearance of a wild romance, and yet they attempt to prove it.

In order to this, he compares the first chapter of Genesis, where it is said God created man by his word, with the second, wherein Adam is introduced as the work of God's own hands.

Again the forty-seventh psalm joined to the forty-ninth, in which the Gentiles are expressly called the sons of the earth; and this they believe to be an evident proof that God created two sorts of men; the Jews then being made of a finer mould, had all the reason on their side not to be inquisitive about the other nations, who drew their origin from the Pre-Adamites. This was not an effect of their pride, but a self-consciousness of their own dignity. They were by this second creation to live eternally, whilst the Pre-Adamites and their posterity were doomed to death, as a natural consequence of the corruptibility of the matter of which they were composed. Moreover, the Jewish genealogies are clearly traced from Adam their first father; whereas, in the pedigrees of the Gentiles, no order is kept, no knowledge is preserved of their origin.

From these proofs, as they call them, drawn from the scriptures, they proceed to others out of the Jewish Rabbies.

Adam, say the Rabbies, had a tutor named Samsocery, and who could this be but a Pre-Adamite?

Cain having killed his brother Abel, was afraid lest he should kill himself. He became captain of a band of robbers, who were they? He married, yet Adam had no daughter. What wife could he get? He built a town; what architects, masons, carpenters, and other workmen did he employ? The answer to all these questions is, in one, Pre-Adamites. They add further, that the Egyptian and Chinese chronologies, reach many thousand years backward before Adam was created; and the people who lived then must have been Pre-Adamites. It is certain that the Mahometans believe there were Pre-Adamites, and they have actually given us the names of some of them. The Pre-Adamites believe further, that there was to be two Messiahs, one of whom is come, but there is another in time to be sent to the Jews.

These are all the particulars we have been able to collect concerning this extraordinary sect; and the notion seems to have been collected in part from all the heresies that ever yet sprung up in the world. It is surprising that such men should call themselves Christians; for all Christians, let their notions in other respects be ever so invidious, still profess to believe the Bible.

Now, had no notice been taken of the creation and fall of man, except in the Old Testament, there might have been some reason to doubt; but throughout the New Testament the Mosaic account of the fall is frequently referred to, and considered as the fundamental article upon which the necessity for Christ's making an atonement is built. As for Cain's marrying a wife while Adam had no children, is but a silly objection; because this event might have happened above one hundred years after the creation of the world, and certainly Adam might have had many daughters in that time.

Their notion that men lived like beasts before Adam was created, they have taken from the pagan mythology, as appears from many of those poets; but what will men not do when left to the indulgence of their own corrupt fancies? The truth does not give them satisfaction, they seek out for something new, and then they are less satisfied than before.—They add one fiction to another, till their religion, if it deserves that name, would put a heathen to the blush. It is even more ridiculous than that of Sommono-Codom in the East Indies, or any of those we have treated of in other parts of the world.

We shall conclude this article in the words of the late learned lord president Forbes, in his excellent thoughts on religion, where he supports the Mosaic history with a strength of argument not known before.

“The thing Moses begins with, is the creation of the heavens and the earth by the Deity; which though true to the conviction of all mankind, no ancient wise-men ever found out. Here is no ridiculous theogonia, no eternal chaos, no fortuitous concourse of atoms, but a fair and true declaration,

“In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.”

He further takes notice of the institution of the sabbath; which, though the ancients observed, they knew not the reason or occasion of.

The declaration of this undiscovered truth gives strong prepossession in favour of the rest.

The next important thing is, that man fell from a state of innocence. This, as has been said, every living man must find to be true upon examination; and yet none of the wise, whose works have come to us, ever thought of it: nothing more certain, nothing more important to be attended to; nothing less known: but this Moses distinctly relates as the cause, or at least the occasion, of every thing that followed.

The third thing he remarks is, the confusion, and desperate state, in which man was upon the fall; ashamed of his fault, without hope in the mercy of God, and therefore studious to hide himself from him. This, the fall being true, must necessarily be true too; and therefore we readily believe Moses.

The fourth thing he relates is, that God revealed his purpose of mercy to mankind, and thereby delivered them from dread, despair, and confusion. The words, in which Moses relates the promise of mercy, are, that “the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent,” and “the seed of the serpent shall bruise his heel.”

These words, which are all that is said, do not, it is true, say that this seed of the woman should be sacrificed; though “bruising the heel” looks mighty like the suffering of the lower and least noble part of that seed; nor do they say that sacrifice, and the observances of the law, were then instituted. But it appears plainly, that soon after, Cain and Abel offered, and that at a stated or appointed time, it appears Noah sacrificed, and that, in his days, man was commanded to abstain from eating blood, as a thing sacred; it appears the patriarchs did so, without any precedent, institution, or commandment, recorded, and that their sacrifices were respected by the Deity; and it appears that all the nations of the earth, who sprung from the first parents, practised sacrifice with nearly the same rites: wherefore, it may fairly be concluded, that sacrifice, and the rites thereto belonging, were instituted upon the first promulgation of the evangelium, the tidings of mercy, and from that institution were transmitted to all mankind, and it would imply an absurdity to suppose, that this emblematical, commemorative observance was instituted without man's knowing the reason and meaning of it.

We know by history, without the help of Moses, that all mankind sacrificed in hope of mercy; from reason we discover, that those hopes must have been founded on revelation, and that sacrifice, which of itself could signify nothing, must have been no more than a memorial, by institution: and now from Moses we learn, that those hopes were actually founded on explicit revelation by the God of nature; and that sacrifice, which the same God says in itself signifies nothing, was practised just after, by the favourites of the Deity, and acceptable by him; and that he gave a new model of that institution, correcting abuses, in the wilderness.

We learn next, from Moses, that God was pleased at different times to appear to, and converse with men, Adam, Enoch, Noah; and that nevertheless, men corrupted themselves so monstrously, an early instance whereof is Cain's killing his brother Abel, that the Deity brought on a flood, which destroyed the whole earth, and with it all men, except Noah and his family.

This flood all ancient nations have confused traditions about; and though exuvia, still remaining near the surface of the earth, give very strong evidence of it, yet there is no sensible account of it, from the ancients; which strongly raises the credit and authority of Moses's writings.

By the direction to take into the ark a greater number of clean than unclean beasts, and by Noah's practice, immediately after the flood, of sacrificing of every clean beast and bird, it is evident the distinction of clean and unclean does not depend originally on the law of Moses, but has its origin before the flood, probably at the first publication of grace to Adam.

As the flood destroyed all the corrupted, and to Noah and his family was a demonstration of the power of, and obedience due to, the Deity, this great event was a total extirpation of all false religion; and, humanly speaking, it was to be hoped the faith and religious service of men would have continued long pure.

But that was not the case; for, as Adam's son Cain sinned early, so did Noah's son Ham; he merited to be pronounced accursed of his father, soon after the deliverance from the flood. And before the memory of that dreadful judgment was lost, men meditated the setting up a false religion and service to the heavens at Babel; which the Deity disappointed, by confounding and dividing their imaginations, so that they separated and dispersed at that time.

Such were the sentiments of this great man, and whoever reads his account of the creation of the world, will cease to reject the Mosaic history. It is the misfortune of all our Deists, and framers of new religions, that they set up their own reason in opposition to divine revelation. And they seal their argument with a fixed resolution not to pay any regard to what is proposed to them, so that they are left to the wickedness of their own hearts, and justly forsaken by their maker.

ACCOUNT OF THE LABADISTS.

LABADIE had been brought up a Jesuit in France, then became a Protestant, and was made a minister at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He was eloquent, but not very learned; which defect was supplied by art and cunning. His dispute against Wolsogue, minister at Utrecht, on account of his treatise concerning the interpretation of scripture, shews him to have been contentious and even seditious. His behaviour in that quarrel was unfair and deceitful; so that his enemies were not quite in the wrong, when they described him as an haughty, proud, self-conceited, stubborn hypocrite.

Yet he had admirers, who praised his humility and modest carriage, and undertook his defence with so much warmth, highly approving his project of reforming even the grand Calvinistical reformers of the United Provinces, that a schism had like to have ensued in the church of Middleburgh. But his design failed, notwithstanding all the endeavours of his friends. He was deposed from his ministry by the synod of Dort, in May 1609, having before that been suspended from his function by the synod of Norde.

The sentence of his deposition says, "That from his first coming into Holland, he designed to reform the church, and maintained that this was to be brought about by a separation, and setting up a new church of the elect;" which he actually began at Middleburgh, and in other places. He taught that whoever could, or thought fit, should have free liberty to speak in their assemblies, on whatever text was proposed.

"God has been pleased to hear at last the prayers, tears, and groans of his little ones, and opened a way to a happy separation. This separation has been and now is very advantageous to us, since we are about three hundred well chosen members in our assembly all elect, and breathing a true Christian spirit.

We give thanks to God who hath chosen us, all of one heart and soul, unanimous in speaking openly all truths, remedying all abuses, in doctrine, in administering the sacraments, and in morals, with a full intention to reform ourselves according to the model of the primitive Christians. We meet twice a day, morning and evening, and thrice on Sundays.

We do not preach in pulpits, but all sit on benches without any difference between the rich and the poor, excepting that the pastors, elders, or those who speak, sit on a bench made like the rest, but somewhat higher, in order to be seen and heard.—Modesty, union, humility, zeal and piety, are such amongst us, that we daily give God due praises for the establishment of our church. We have several doctors and eminent persons, humble, fervent, and pious.

No abuse is tolerated, no excess allowed in dress, ornaments and vanities; nor are the trades subservient to them encouraged. Our lives are marked in every point by the rule and standard of the gospel and apostolical doctrine, being firmly resolved to become a living representation of the primitive church, in our belief and practice.

Many are astonished, but many are drawn in from other places; for God has almost every where admitted some to us, and to our spirits.

Even this day, being the first of the year 1669, we met before day-light to explain the sixth and seventh verses of the fifth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, and are fully bent on casting away the old leaven."

Notwithstanding the opposition which Labadie met with, yet there were several persons of note who embraced his doctrines, and joined themselves to his party. Some of whom were expelled France. Labadie and Madam Bourignon were contemporaries, but their spirits did not unite. Labadie was not spiritual enough to be her colleague, and too stubborn to become her disciple. Both were of an artful, troublesome temper, and therefore it was impossible that they should agree together. The enlightened woman despised the regenerated man.

At last Labadie died at Alena, 1674, in the arms of his beloved Schurman, and left Peter Yvon to succeed him, who brought the Labadists together at Wiwert in Friesland, a manor belonging to the family of Somerdyke. He had before spread his fanaticism from Middleburgh to Amsterdam, and he had likewise a settlement near Ukrahist, where he set up a printing-house. From thence he went through Westphalia, and at last to Hamburg.—Every where he made proselytes of both sexes, till one Anthony de la Margue published his reasons for leaving his sect, which although it threw them into disrepute by the discovery then made, yet they are not extinct, for some of them are still to be found in Friesland and Groningen.

These Labadists were always by the Dutch considered as a sort of Quakers; but although they may resemble them in some things, yet in others there is a vast difference. We do not know that there were ever any of these Labadists in England, and the reason seems to be, their notions were not known during the civil wars, when the soil for new and unheard of religions was so rich, that every doctrine, however absurd, was embraced as soon as taught.

Connected with the Labadists were two small sects, formed by Voet, a great lawyer, and Cocceius, a celebrated divine. At first, they agreed in most things with the Labadists, but at last they quarrelled concerning a whimsical method of explaining the scripture. Cocceius pretended to teach the people to preach without study or labour, which strange things are always taking with the vulgar, and they think them sublime, for want of understanding them, and look upon them as deep mysteries, because they are obscure.

This singular method is reduced to the following heads.

First, the periodical changes of the church. Of the New Testament, which they find in every text.

Secondly, the types and figures without end or measure, drawn from the ancient history and worship.

Thirdly, an everlasting affectation of applying to Christ and the gospel.

Fourthly, discovering modern events in the ancient prophecies.

Lastly, the numberless and exaggerated distinctions betwixt the faithful under the Mosaical dispensation and Christianity.

The explanation of these types and figures always serves to amuse the vulgar, whereas to morality and sound divinity frequently prove tiresome. After all, we are not to condemn one side or the other, only that we must, according to the design of this work, take notice, that the followers of Cocceius maintain, that the command given to the Jews to keep one day in seven for rest, is part of the ceremonial law, from the observance of which Christ has freed us. That Christ will reign temporally on earth, after the destruction of Anti-Christ, and that the Jews are to be converted at that time.

One of the chief tenets of these people, is to banish morality from their sermons, which they look upon as unreasonable. For as St. Paul often mentions, that the law is abolished, and its opposition to the gospel; so they pretend, that preaching up duty and obedience, the justice of God and his rights, the awe in which we ought to stand of him and his judgments, which are relative to the law, is the same as giving a new law to the spirit of slavery, by reproaches and threatenings contrary to the gospel, which breathes only sweetness and grace.

They say, that Christ dying for us has not only taken upon him the punishment due to our sins, but our very sins themselves, and drawn from thence consequences against the necessity of repentance.

To conclude our account of this sect, we must observe, that many of the ancient heathens and primitive heretics were such; nay, they are to be found among the heathens in the East Indies, and among the Mahometans. All these novelties take their rise from an unsettledness of mind, from a vain desire to be wiser than God has ordained; and in this people copy exactly after the conduct of their first parents, who, to satisfy their curiosity, eat the forbidden fruit, and so involved themselves and their whole posterity in ruin.

From the beginning, a rational being, unaided by learning, and the experience of former ages, could easily discern the hand of an intelligent, wise, powerful, and very bountiful creator, in the whole and in every part of the fabric of this system that fell under his ken; and could as easily discover his own obligations to, and his dependence on that Being. And accordingly we see, by the earliest accounts of time that have come to our hands, all mankind, full of a persuasion of their dependence, full of reverence to the Deity, soliciting his favour and protection by prayer, by ceremonies, by sacrifices, sometimes human, nay, of their first-born; and imputing all their favourable or cross incidents that happened to them, to the good-will or displeasure of the sovereign Being whom it was their chief study to please.

It is true, that the notions they generally entertain of the Deity were imperfect, as well as their manner of serving him corrupted; circumstances that can easily be accounted for from the weakness and perverseness of those who took the lead in directing their religious opinions and practices. But still it is undeniably true, that the gross of mankind were serious in their belief of the existence of a Deity, of their dependence on him, and of the occasion they had for his protection and favour.

To this general disposition of mankind it was in part owing, that the gospel, upon its first publication, made so rapid and surprising progress. No man at that time doubted of the existence of a Deity, or of man's dependence on him. It was easy to satisfy every one who admitted these propositions, that mankind, by the corruption into which they had fallen, stood mightily in need of some intercessor, some means by which they might be saved from the weight of their sins. And it is no marvel, that evidence given to men so convinced, that salvation might be had through Jesus Christ, should be received with gladness.

And accordingly we see, that in a trifle of time, the herd of mankind, in defiance of all discouragement, and of the most severe persecutions from power, greedily embraced and professed this faith; and continued stedfastly in the profession of it, notwithstanding the monstrous absurdities with which the teachers of that faith loaded it, and the more monstrous and shocking lives and manners of the teachers; until of late years, that what ought to have been improved into a blessing to mankind, has unfortunately turned out to their destruction.

In the period just mentioned, wicked and voluptuous men pursued wicked and voluptuous courses; and many gross villainies and abuses were daily committed by profligate men, which the degenerate condition of mankind produced. But still these wickednesses were disguised, disowned, or some how sought to be atoned for. The villain dissembled at least, and was forced to wear a cloak of hypocrisy. No man dreamed of professing, openly, that he denied the being of a God, or his dependence on, and being accountable to him. And, if any one was indeed so foolish, as well as impious, as to entertain such a notion, which by-the-by is with us a question, there was no temptation for uttering it; because there was no chance that any one should concur in supporting such an opinion.

ACCOUNT OF THOSE WHO ARE CALLED IN HOLLAND, COLLEGIANTERS AND RHYSBURGHIERS.

THESE people have been settled at Rhysburgh above one hundred years, and they meet twice in every year.

This is not known in the country, for they seldom hold their assemblies in public; and it is not much to be wondered at, that foreigners should hardly be able to know their names. The following account, however, is authentic, as the author says he had been for several years one of the chief members of their society.

We must first take notice, that they are much mistaken who take it for granted, that the Collegianters and Rhysburghers are the same; but to clear up this matter, we must put them in mind, that the Collegianters owe their name to the manner in which their small societies were first formed.—The nature of these religious meetings cannot be better described, than by comparing them to the friendly societies which we call clubs. They have likewise some resemblance to the mystical schools, which we have already mentioned in our account of those people; but we shall call them clubs.

In these clubs, therefore, every man may, and has a right to speak concerning whatever religion he may outwardly profess, what system soever he may follow; and this he may do, let his notions be ever so much out of the common way of thinking. But this is only granted on condition that he allows the scriptures to be divinely inspired. Whether churchmen or laymen, every one explains what text he thinks proper, and may utter freely whatever he thinks concerning religion, either in general, or in regard to any particular sect. Women are not allowed the same privilege as among Quakers; for they must hold their peace, and, indeed, these clubs do not pretend to have any thing to do with the spirit, or with its impulses.

When any one of the club speaks, he pretends that it is the effect of his meditations on the sacred scriptures, or of his own ingenious discoveries.—Nor is the club to be kept under subjection by any one doctor, or by three or four, who in most other assemblies, keep all the discourse to themselves.

Besides the club at Rhysburgh, where they are most numerous, there are many others in several towns and villages in Holland, at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Haerlem, Groningen, Lewardin, and many others. As to the villages, the most noted club meets at Sardan, and is remarkable for being composed of members who belong to various sects.—For, lest our readers should forget it, we must once more put them in mind, that in those clubs only one essential point is agreed on, the divine inspiration of the scripture. They are at full liberty to explain it in what manner they please, and to build any system they think proper upon it.

Their public exercise begins by reading a psalm in prose, and singing one in verse. Then a prayer is repeated, which being ended, the text appointed for the Christian entertainment is read. The brethren present are then invited to make use of the freedom granted in those clubs, in stating such objections, in making what remarks, or giving what admonitions and exhortations they please. If no one rises to speak, then those who were appointed to handle that subject, rise and speak to it; for lest the club should separate without any discourse, two are always appointed to speak: when they have done, silence is kept for a considerable time, then any one may make what observations he pleases, to what has been said. The whole ceremony concludes with a suitable application and prayer.

No register is kept of the names of the members belonging to the club, and in reality they are composed of people borrowed from all sects, in order to meet every Sunday and Wednesday. If the divine authority of holy writ is owned, none of them are to be called heretics: just like the sectaries in England, who all acknowledge the authority of the sacred scriptures, and yet in their explications all differ from each other.

These clubs were begun about the year 1619, and owe their beginning to the spirit of persecution which then raged in Holland, and drove many of the people, as it always does, into the wildest extremes. Three brothers, of the name of Codde, all Arminians, were the first founders of these clubs; one of them was a professor of Hebrew, and the others were plain husbandmen. They were well versed in the scriptures, which they had carefully studied.

Arminianism was then at a low ebb, both because it had been condemned at the synod of Dort, and likewise upon political accounts, so that when any of that profession were discovered, they were treated as the enemies of God and society. The Arminian ministers were forbid preaching under the severest penalties. Many of them were banished, and others were thrown into prison. Many of them had their goods seized, and rewards were offered for apprehending their persons, while their wives and children were left unprovided for. All this was occasioned by the cruel acts of the Calvinistical synod of Dort, which had no more right to decide on such things than the man in the moon.

The first of these clubs was established at Worman, a village where one of the Vander Coddes lived. A great number of Arminians, who could not then meet openly, nor indeed privately, for fear of being cast into prison, were overjoyed at meeting with this opportunity of assembling together as friends, under the name of a society very common in that country, and in which religion is never supposed to be concerned.

When the heat of persecution abated, several of the Arminian clergy returned into their own country, and offered their services as pastors, but were told by Vander Codde, that their new institution being on the model prescribed by St. Paul, did not admit of pastors.

This club was soon removed to Rhynsburch, where it increased considerably, and was joined by two famous pastors belonging to the Arminians.—Several other places in Holland followed this example, and had also their clubs, which at first were frequently disturbed by the civil power, but at last connived at.

This is the best account we could get of these clubs, though others pretend that they are of an elder date, though established on the same plan, governed by the same rules, and grounded on the same expressions of St. Paul. This dispute may be ended by owning that the oldest of these clubs were made up of Baptists, and some other sectaries, and that after all, such meetings may be held during all persecutions, as has always been the case, and probably always will be.

But these clubs were not confined to Holland.—Grindal, archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of queen Elizabeth, gave great encouragement to them. Of these we shall say a few words by way of digression.

The time of their meeting was once a month, sometimes twice, only church-men were allowed to speak; the subject, and the persons who were to handle it, were appointed before-hand. The youngest of those preachers began, and the others followed according to their age, so that the oldest preached last, recapitulated what the others said, commended what deserved it, and censured faults with mildness.

Their whole discourse was in order to compare the text in hand with others, to settle its true and genuine sense to the sacred writers' aim, the exact confirmation of the words, the various translations, the consequences that flowed from them, and to expose the false glosses of heretics and quibbling doctors, who turn the meaning of the sacred scriptures to any sense they think proper.

But let us now return to the Dutch clubs.

They made an open profession of toleration so far, that in 1677 and in 1680, most of those clubs in Holland, contributed largely to the enriching and endowing at Amsterdam, the college of Orange, which is founded also for the maintenance of orphans, not only of their own sect, but of others, and the same has been done in other places of Holland. A glorious effect of that humane disposition which ought to influence men, notwithstanding all the disputes about religion.

As for the Rhynsburchers, they are composed of people of many different opinions, who from all parts meet at Rhynsburch, as they did in former times at Jerusalem. They assembled only twice a year, viz. at Whitsuntide, and on the last Sunday in August, to partake of the Lord's-Supper; and whoever leads a regular course of life according to the scripture precepts, may be admitted, whatever opinion he may otherwise have, even about the nature and essence of the sacrament.

The evening before the communion they are to spend in self-examination, and in reviewing their hearts and lives. Two discourses are preached before they receive it, the first on the Lord's Supper in general, and the second on the death of Christ in particular. They likewise explain their motives for meeting together in that village, to unite themselves as Christians and brethren, without distinction of parties, without declaring themselves some for Paul and some for Apallos, as the Jews celebrated their assemblies in their temples together, not minding the disputes between the Pharisees and Sadducees.—They deplore the evils which flow from schisms. "Is it not much better, say they, to admit every Christian, who believes the scriptures, and endeavours to live up to its rules according to the law of Christ, we therefore invite them all to take the communion with us, without minding the odious appellations with which they are bespattered, and without giving any room in our souls to that gall of bitterness, which most men look upon as a proof of their zeal for the doctrine of Christ."

These, and such discourses being ended, they perform the communion service in the same manner as the Calvinists. The alms collected from the faithful are deposited in the hands of the sexton of that village, who gives a receipt and distributes it to the poor of Rhynsburch. This solemnity is concluded with a thanksgiving sermon, just in the same manner as among the Calvinists.

Next morning they take leave of one another, with mutual exhortations to perseverance in the true religion and faithful service of God. All may speak, teach or administer the sacraments, yet their functions are generally performed by men who are prepared for it, and appointed thereto.

Next to the Lord's Supper, the only remarkable ceremony observed by them, is their baptism, of which one of their own members gives the following account. The candidate makes publicly his profession of faith, on a Saturday in the morning, before an assembly of the people held for that purpose. A discourse is delivered on the nature and excellency of baptism. The minister and candidate go together to a pond behind the house belonging to the sect which on some occasions, is used as a lodging-house for travellers who have no money to pay for resting at the inns. In that pond the catechumen is baptized by immersion; if he is a man he has a waistcoat and drawers; if a woman, a bodice and petticoat, with leads at the bottom, for the sake of decency, which is rather necessary than otherwise.

The minister, in the same dress as the men wear, is also in the water, and plunges them in it, pronouncing at the same time, the form used by most Christian congregations. This being over, they put on their clothes, go back to the meeting, and hear an exhortation to perseverance, in complying with the precepts of Christ. A psalm is sung, and the whole concludes with prayer.

These are the most singular customs observed by those people, who in Holland are called Collegianters and Rhynsburghers. Some have asserted, that these sects are much diminished, but this is only in the outward appearance, for all our modern sectaries have learned to dissemble better than their ancestors, and that this disguise makes some over credulous, but devoutly inclined people flatter themselves with the hopes that heresy and libertinism lose ground. But probably they are most in the right, who think that the religion of Manmon does get a superiority over all. We must, however, suspend our judgment, and desire that the grace of God may be granted to all mankind. This should be the pious wish of every Christian who desires the salvation of the human race, without spending his time in contentious controversy, which can never minister to edifying. Talking of religion is one thing, obeying its rules in sincerity is another. Let this mind therefore be in us, which was also in Christ Jesus, and let us be followers of him as dear children.

ACCOUNT OF THE POLISH BRETHREN.

THese people are a sort of Unitarians, and in other points of their doctrines they may be ranged among the Socinians; for they come the nearest to them of any sect whatever. They are called Polish, because they took their rise in Poland, although at present they have churches in many parts of Europe.

They assert, that the doctrine of the Trinity destroys the Unity of the Godhead, and the simplicity of the Supreme Being, adding, that if there are three persons, there may be three hundred: and thus a perfect system of Polytheism, or a plurality of Gods is established. They pretend likewise, that the texts made use of in support of the Trinity, ought to be understood in another sense. Thus, when Christ says, "I and the father are one," they say it means no more than that they had one object in view in the plan of man's redemption.

As for the incarnation of Christ and his two natures, they believe that doctrine to be useless to mankind, and maintain that it cannot be proved by scripture. For, say they, had it been necessary for obtaining eternal happiness to believe the mystery of the incarnation, the Bible would have mentioned it as clearly and distinctly as the other truths we are obliged to profess openly. But we must not dwell too long on such dangerous blasphemies. They say that God does not know before-hand what will happen to men, and that the cause of predestination is not in God but in man.

Christ's body was mortal, and therefore it was necessary that he should suffer death in common with the rest of mankind; for like the Arians and Socinians, they will not acknowledge his divinity.

In the preamble of their discipline, they give a definition of the Christian religion; it is, they say, a rational worship, God being the eternal reason, can require nothing unreasonable or absurd to be paid to him through Jesus Christ, there being no other name by which men are saved, in spirit to exclude ceremonies, and in truth to reject the types and shadows of the Mosaic law, with the hope of an immortal life, because such a worship must ensnare us with a study of trust in God's goodness and expectation of immortality, in consideration of our faithful compliance with it.

But for this end two things are required; first, to admit no doctrine but that of the gospel, and to own no other teacher but Christ. The other to raise no building, but upon the foundation of Christianity, that is, the true doctrine of Christ, who is, and ought to be, the theme of all those who profess it. Christ being gone to heaven, it became necessary that in his absence this doctrine should be preserved, and the faithful governed by wise, pious and learned persons, who should not be the masters, fathers or princes of the church; for there is one only father and sovereign which is God; one only master which is Christ; but they take up the deposit of faith, and deliver it to others as they received it. Our dependence is not on them but on Christ; we do not obey them, but Christ.

They ought not to exalt themselves above others, nor ought the faithful to prefer the one to the other, out of a bias or prejudice, in favour of a particular person, to the detriment and injury offered to another. Such behaviour would be a pernicious occasion of amission in the church. Obey those who are set over you, that is, shew them due respect, as being the dispensers of truth. Submit to this same doctrine they preach, as from Christ. In a word, the church is a monarchy, and Christ is its only monarch.

One of their writers divides the whole church into six different parts, of which four are to take care of the ecclesiastical policy.

- I. Patrons, or Protectors of the church.
- II. The Pastors.
- III. The Elders.
- IV. The Deacons.

The last-mentioned and the patrons, are to provide for the bodily wants; the pastors and elders are to take care of the spiritual wants.

We shall call those patrons or protectors of churches, who either build them or keep them in decent repair at their own expence. Whether they are the first founders or only carry on the work by others. Those also who provide a maintenance for the pastors or elders, or raise charitable contributions for the poor belonging to a particular church, are considered as props of the church. We detest anarchy as the root of great evils, but we do not allow any to usurp the supreme authority, which belongs only to Christ.

The protectors and pastors must, or ought, mutually, to support and pay a deference to each other, and all unanimously consent, with joint endeavours, to promote the glory of God, and the cause of religion. Pastors are the ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the mysteries of God. They hold the rudder of the ecclesiastical commonwealth, and watch for the safety of the church, along with the elders, and the other members of the consistory.—The pastors are all equal; their age and labour may draw respect and veneration, but do not give them any arbitrary authority. The young ones must pay great regard to those advanced in years; but they ought not to take occasion from thence to behave haughtily to their younger brethren. Age and experience must have some weight, when it promotes the interest of the church, but the advice of the younger must not be despised, when by common consent their counsels are found both profitable and adapted to the state of the brethren.

Such is the account that these people give of themselves; and were their doctrines equal to their discipline, we should not have much reason to find fault with them. But to bear the name of Christ so often mentioned with terms of respect, by those very men who mock at his mediatorial office, and despise all his glories, we are led to say with the psalmist, "All men are liars."

Their elders are described as persons of known probity, and great experience, who are jointly commissioned to govern the church. Age and riches are not considered in that choice, but virtue and abilities. The functions of deacons are well known; they are the treasurers of their respective churches, and are to give an exact account of what they receive for the maintenance of widows, orphans, and other poor.

These are the duties of the four orders, who govern the policy of their churches.

The chusing or ordaining of pastors, belongs to the synod or assembly, who meet by authority of their church, in order to examine representatives on this important occasion. Elders and deacons are chosen in the same manner. A good life and a solid judgment, are the chief qualities required in elders, preferably to learning. Their piety is a tacit condemnation of vice, and hinders its progress. A solid understanding helps them in giving advice, and composing differences. Deacons likewise may perform their duties without learning. Good sense and a good conscience, with tried fidelity, are the only necessary dispositions to that office.

When a pastor has a call, his election and ordination is performed in the following manner:

Whether this be done in a general convocation of the faithful, or in private and before a small assembly, prayers and a sermon, with psalms, are requisite as in the Sunday's office. They begin with singing and prayer; the faithful are warned and disposed by an exhortation, to the ceremony. The sermon is always concerning the duties of a pastor, which being ended, three pastors rise from their seats, and go to the person who is to be ordained, and who at that time is kneeling. They lay their hands upon him, and hold them on his head till prayers are ended. These prayers being finished, and the ordained person still kneeling, one of the three pastors desires the faithful to pray for him. Then all kneel, and conclude the ceremony with singing a psalm suitable to the occasion.

The sermon includes the mutual duties of pastors and elders, with those subsisting between them and their flocks. The union that should be found among them, which is not to be a blind obedience, or slavish, the pastors ruling like fathers with patience. That they prefer the interest and welfare of the flock to all other considerations, serving the church with joy and freedom, not as mercenary hired servants, but giving good examples in order to enforce their instructions, and avoiding to be concerned in temporal affairs, and worldly cares, lest their more essential duties should be neglected.

Pastoral functions consist in preaching, administering the sacrament, visiting the sick, exhorting and praying for the faithful. Preaching is one of the chief parts of their discipline. Prayers and psalms, which are said and sung before and after sermon, raises their hearts to the most elevated pitch of devotion, and inflame their minds with devout zeal.—The instructions are to be,

First, without any shew of erudition, wholly tending to edification.

Secondly, without disputes, and nothing to be mentioned in them but what is necessary to salvation.

Thirdly, without eloquence, or any ornament by flowers of speech, or any choice or fine expressions.

Fourthly, without confusion, clear and methodical, the arguments conclusive, earnestly moving sinners to repentance.

Lastly, without enlarging much on particular topics.

All their notions concerning divine things are very loose and carnal, and it may be justly said of them, that they have no more than the outside of religion.

As they deny all sorts of mysteries in religion, so they make very little use of the Bible but to suit their purpose.

In celebrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, they are plain and simple. They sit round a table covered with a linen cloth, on which is placed some bread, cut into small pieces, and an empty chalice, into which the deacon pours some wine; all this is decently covered till the hour of communion service.

The pastor stands at the table, and having administered the communion to the others, he then takes it himself sitting. Exhortation, prayer, and singing of psalms, accompany this ceremony, which ends with a general blessing.

They reject infant baptism, nor will they admit any to that sacrament till they have made a profession of their faith. When they meet for that purpose, the pastor explains the effects, excellencies, and dignity of baptism; makes an exhortation to the candidates, and desires that God will baptize them with his holy spirit. When all the people present have said Amen, the pastor goes into the water, and those who are to be baptised, go in likewise, and kneel. The minister then says, "I baptize thee with water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and may the Lord Jesus baptize thee with his holy spirit." While he pronounces these words, he puts one hand on the head, and another on the chin of the persons to be baptized, and dips them. He then comes out of the water, and a psalm is sung, and the whole concludes with prayer.

In the funerals of the Polish Brethren, the following ceremonies are observed. The relations of the deceased are left to their choice to bury either in church-yards, or any where else; for they consider that as an indifferent thing.

The body of the deceased is placed in its coffin, at the door, or in the ground-room of the house, till the time of burial. The pastor then begins a psalm, and sings it with the faithful present. He then preaches a sermon, to comfort the relations for their loss, and to exhort them to reflect on the uncertainty and short duration of human life.

Then prayers are said, but not for the deceased, for they never pray for the dead. All this being over, the assembly go out, and the pastor, standing at the door, takes leave of the company in the name of the deceased. Before the body is put into the ground, another exhortation is made, accompanied with a short encomium on the virtues of the deceased, which is generally a piece of fulsome flattery. The ceremony is concluded by eating and drinking. Wine is given in plenty to those who honour the funeral with their presence, to drown sorrow, as is the custom of all the northern countries, and as it was with many nations of old.

From what has been said of these people, it appears plainly, that they are a compound of Arianism and Socinianism. There is no doubt but they think they do God good service by inventing a new schisme of religion; nor is there less doubt but that they look with the most sovereign contempt on all those who differ from them in sentiment. We have our Saviour's authority to assert, that many shall say unto him, Lord, Lord, have we not cast out devils in thy name, and in thy name done wonderful things? but he will say unto them, depart from me, I know ye not, ye workers of iniquity. It would be happy for mankind, were they to attend more to the spirit and power of religion, than to the externals. But human nature has been the same in all ages, and will be the same to the last.

We shall conclude with one remark, which we do not remember ever to have heard made, and that is, that the numerous sects to be met with, all professing Christianity, and yet all in one thing or other differing concerning its most important articles, are a proof of its authenticity. Were there no real coin in the world, there would be none counterfeited; and had not Christianity been a divine institution, we should not have found so many men, from motives of interest or pride, setting up new imitations of the genuine original.

HISTORY OF DEISM.

BY Deists is meant those who acknowledge the being of one God, but deny all supernatural revelation.

We shall consider them in a two-fold light: first, as to their principles in general; and, secondly, their present state in Europe.

The generality of mankind know no difference between Deists and Atheists, yet they are widely different; not to say it is hard, even next to an impossibility, that there should be any real Atheists.—The existence of a Supreme Being is so evidently proved, the distinguishing characters of good and evil, and their consequences, are so deeply engraven in the consciences of every man, that they cannot entirely throw off the notion of a God. Accordingly we find, that the most unpolished and barbarous nations have always entertained some belief of a godhead, and cannot be looked upon as Atheists. The same must be said of the Chinese, of the inhabitants of Japan, and of all idolaters; for though Tertullian says, truly that there is no God if he is not one; yet it does not follow that all those who worshipped more than one, thought that there was none.

Atheism then is a chimera, but Deism is not so: to own the being of one God, to worship him, yet so as to embrace, out of policy, what religion soever is most in vogue, and favoured by the government, is as natural to the general bent of mankind, as to live under that government as long as our affairs require it, or our inclination leads us. As for those, if there be any such, whose principles are destructive of public society, they might be thought to go beyond Deism; but either they are not serious in their lawless schemes, which, if successful, would prove their own ruin, as well as of the rest of mankind; or rather they act against their own knowledge, to acquire an empty reputation of senseless wit.

On the other side, both in civil and ecclesiastical societies, several are accused of Deism, who are no ways guilty of it; and the more they complain of such usage, all their protestations serve only to strengthen the prejudice conceived against them.—Thus an indifferency as to the various opinions which divide Christendom, too extensive a toleration of all sects, persuasions of divers kinds, such as those of the Baptists, Socinians, Remonstrants, &c. Even too much freedom in censuring the faults of church-men, and the quibbles of the schools, are looked upon as the worst of Deism by fiery zealots, or over-scrupulous Christians.

But the sect we are now giving an account of, is, of a mixt Deism, as is evident by their tenets. The founders of it, were Pontian of Hattem, and another Dutchman named Woutelaer, who, they say, added some of their own notions to the system of Spinoza, and interlarded the whole with some mystical opinions of the Pietists. This sect of Hattem still meets, but with so much privacy, that no one is admitted to their assemblies unless he can give evident proofs of his being a trusty member of their society. This precaution is necessary to avoid the grievous penalties inflicted upon them by an edict of the states of Holland and West-Friesland, which orders, that they shall be banished or cast into prison, and severely punished as enemies to virtue, to divine worship, and disturbers of the public peace; that their books shall be suppressed, and the authors, printers and publishers proceeded against as directed in the edict about Spinosism.

Our curious readers may find a full account of Baruch or Benedict Spinoza in Bayle's Dictionary, to which may be added his life, published by Maximilian Lucas, one of his disciples; he was born at Amsterdam, son of a Portuguese Jew. His bold explications of scripture occasioned his being excommunicated, and cast out of the synagogue; to avoid their persecutions, after they had obtained his banishment, he retired to Rhyusburgh, then to Voorburgh, and lastly to the Hague, where he died. Lucas praises much his morals, as to his forgiving injuries, outward neatness, and disinterestedness.

He seems likewise, by a conversation which Lucas relates, to have been of opinion, that God had a body, and that there are no substances merely spiritual.

Pontian of Hattem had been a minister in Zealand, in the foggy air of which country he invented the system afterwards published by his disciple Wotelaer, who lived at Amsterdam beyond the age of thirty-four, and vented his doctrine whilst he sold linen. In the clandestine assemblies which he held, he entertained his audience with the following unintelligible paradoxes.

1. Every criminal thought, word, or action, is the effect of sin; sin is a privation of God, of soul, of life, it is the death of the soul; whoever is sorry for a bad thought or desire, is not sorry that he is a sinner, but that his sins are discovered, and that God has made him know the state in which he is.

2. Owing criminal thoughts, words, or actions, is not a confession of sins; on the contrary, it is a denial of being a sinner, since it is a denial of being dead; for to be dead and to be a sinner is one and the same thing.

3. All sinners are equally dead, being all equally sinners; sin may shew itself in one more than another; but it is essential to man, whoever is a sinner this day, shall not be more so to-morrow; the action of man is not to be called sin, that appellation belongs only to his state of death.

4. Actions therefore do not make the sinner; but they are sins only, because he was a sinner first; sin is the death of man, the actions are only his corruption, such corruption as manifests itself when bodies are naturally dead.

5. Works, good or bad, do not change a man; they only shew whether he be good or bad, as fruits change not the tree.

6. God is immutable, and suffers no change in regard to us, not even by our most criminal actions. "He is not angry at man because he has sinned, but man sinned because God was angry with him." Satan says, "Man has sinned, let him be punished." God says, "Man is a sinner, that is, he is dead, I must raise him to life." No man can be pleasing to God, till after his renunciation.

7. From thence he concludes that they who condemn their brethren are like the devil, and those who are merciful to them resemble God. Man is dead by sin, actions which are bad are the corruption flowing essentially from death: to be angry at bad actions is as extravagant, as to be angry at a dead corpse for stinking.

8. He calls Christ Peace-maker. It is foolish to enquire what faith a man professes; there is but one faith. Whoever thinks himself just is quiet, he rests, and works no more; his repose is the effect of his faith. Those who do not enjoy rest, and go on with works, and do not think themselves just yet, but endeavour it, those divide themselves into sects, as Catholics, Menonites, Socinians, Arminians, &c. they even belong to religions entirely opposite to Christianity, as Judaism, Mahometanism, and Paganism; yet all these divisions make no difference among them; they are all alike, says Hattem, they condemn Christ, crucify him over again, and make him a liar and an impostor.

9. Three persons are one God, who denies one, denies all three. Jews, Mahometans and Socinians deny the son, who is the second person of the Trinity; and therefore they reject God, therefore they are Atheists. Catholics, Menonites and Arminians are Atheists, says Hattem, because they are not at rest in quiet, but take pains to give God glory, and to do his will.

10. God alone can do his own will, man worships him and does his will only passively, by receiving his impressions, &c. Then all religion is only passive.

11. Whoever pretends to any other but this passive religion is an Atheist, by calling the will of God any other will but that of the Creator.

12. All those who believe that God has within himself a law which men are required by God and obliged to fulfil, are Atheists and idolaters; because all religion consisting in this being passive, it must be a wild and vain imagination, to pretend that religious worship consists in obeying laws, supposed to flow from God.

13. Then he concludes no one can believe in God, unless he is insensible, immoveable, and has no desires.

14. They have no faith in God, who are displeased at any thing that happens; who are not satisfied either with their own conduct, or that of others: who think they can do more, be more holy and happy, and enjoy a more desirable state.

15. So that whoever desires to be any thing else than what he is, does not believe in God, even though he should wish a sick person to recover, or a drunkard to leave off drunkenness: censures and punishments, repentance, desires and endeavours of amendment are useless; men by such sentiments resist the will of God, and become inflexible to it, and consequently are without true faith and Atheists.

16. This indifference ought, according to Hat-tem, to make a true faithful equally satisfied whether virtue or vice is predominant in himself or others; passiveness and quiet will be his only virtues, these will keep him even from knowing evil, and render him pleasing to God the Creator, whom by the first article of the creed we are to believe.

17. The actions of men are their fruits, and are such as those who do them: good fruits cannot be expected from bad trees, men are essentially bad; it is therefore a wicked opposition to the will of God, to require good fruits, and good actions from men.

18. The son is the word of God and his wisdom, our prophet and doctor, &c. all the expressions of scripture teach us, that believing in him consists in receiving his testimony as infallible. Now the testimony of the Son of God is that the will of God is not in precepts, that our actions are not the obedience we owe him; we obey by faith, and the will of God is his eternal decree. We are neither better nor worse by our actions.

19. The corruption of man is according to God's will, man is naturally dead, naturally wicked, naturally damned, &c. yet our works are the works of the Son of God, by which we know we are sinners, dead, without soul, without God, in a word, perfect Atheists, &c.

20. But a true faithful is not sorry for his sins, he owns them, humbles himself in the sight of God, acknowledges that he is dead, and that as such he can only spread infection, (commits sins) and this is all the repentance and confession required.—So says Hattem, and adds "That no one believes in the Son of God, but owns that he rejects the divinity; to own a God is to deny that one is dead. Who can understand this nonsense? and what dreadful consequences flow from such principles?"

21. The love of God and our neighbour does not consist in actions. This would be a denial of God's justice; and prove only as a disguise of our hating the Supreme Being.

22. The love of God consists in faith, and that is shewn by being pleased with the punishments he inflicts, and those are our bad actions. Probably Hattem himself did not understand his own expressions.

23. The faithful alone are filled, glad, and content, &c. All is the work of God, therefore every thing pleases them; they are always perfect, because they are such as God thought fit they should be. Their works; or their punishments, they own it and thus are justified: they alone are the regenerate children of God, his heirs, and are intimately united to him by the most tender affection; which Hattem and most Mystics express after the model of Solomon's Canticle by the most endearing words employed in love affairs.

These are the chief tenets of Hattem, a strange jumble of Quietism and other heresies, with which no doubt, our readers are sufficiently tired. These sectaries were accused of Atheism and libertinism, and no wonder; they supposed every body else to be Atheists, and by retaliation the same was objected to them: again, it was reported that they enlisted men in the devil's name, and made them swallow, in a glass of wine, a paper with the word devil wrote upon it; that their teachers were wizards, and used conjurations, which calumnies, if we believe this their apologist, had the desired success in reducing the Hattemites to fly their country, or to abscond. We must not omit letting our readers know that Pontian of Hattem had frequented the Cocceian schools.

Some pretended wits who have lately renewed in Holland the system of the soul of the world, and the eternity of both, might with justice be reckoned Spinosists and Deists more than Hattem. One of them indeed pretends to be far from a Spinosist, by establishing some difference betwixt God and nature. The same writer maintains also, that the Trinity is only three modifications of the Supreme Being, that extension is essential to God, and is the second person; that creation is from all eternity, &c. He and some others, namely one Deurhof, have had some followers, and held, as they do still, some assemblies, in a very private manner, to avoid the persecutions which the magistrates might make against them.

The ancient and modern wits have always endeavoured to bring into contempt the religions settled in every country; but never thought fit to break society upon that account with the rest of mankind. And after all their arguments, have been forced at last to own the necessity of some religion, not only to keep men in awe, and out of fear, but because they were convinced of the being of a God by dint of demonstration; when forced so far, they have denied revelation, yet could not avoid acknowledging that God might reveal himself by some means or other, that being so much above our reach of understanding, his authority must overcome all objections; thus these libertines, Deists, pretended wits, with their bold enquiries, are reduced to own the weakness of their boasted reasonings, and to humble themselves under the powerful hand of God. They ought likewise to be reckoned Deists, who believe that all religions are equally agreeable to God, provided they are not opposite to the laws of nature. God they say loves variety in religious worship; but if he has revealed any religion, that only can be agreeable which he has prescribed; and how can man know, without revelation, what exterior worship is acceptable to the Supreme Being? They also must be deemed Deists, who, as Toland and Woolston, under pretence of crying down superstition, have attacked religion itself, as being loaded with ancient errors, ancient frauds, ancient lies which by length of time have been taken for truths, and which the old heathenish Romans highly prized; and I wish, says Toland, I might not be forced to say that Christians do likewise. Superstition is no doubt a great evil, fables and stories have brought religion into disrepute, and cannot be countenanced by any rational man, unless actuated by avarice, ambition, ignorance, or an over-credulous fear. We must then conclude, that a truly religious man renders to God what is due to him, submits himself, and the whole extent of reason, to his infallible word; adores him in spirit and truth; loves him, without servile fear, out of gratitude, and duty; expects all good from his bountiful hand; despises the terrors of death, and rejects all false notions of an inexorable fate.

We come now to consider the present state of Deism in Europe, with its causes and consequences.

In Italy almost all the learned are Deists, except the clergy, whose interest it is to be otherwise.—The Italian Deists are, however, arrant hypocrites, for they conceal their real sentiments while at home, and go regularly to confession and mass. However, when any of them come into Protestant countries, they pull off the mask, and condemn the whole of Christianity.

In France they are more numerous than in Italy, and many of them have written considerable works, but then it must be remembered, that they get their works printed in Holland. There is not, that we know of, one polite French author in the present age but is a Deist, and we are sorry to add, that the worst of their books are translated into our language, and many of them have been recommended by a noble lord, more celebrated for what is vulgarly called wit, than for either virtue or piety.—Some of these books have been brought into our schools, and the youth of both sexes have greedily drank the deadly poison. What is here said, the author knows to be true; for going one day to visit a young person to whom he was guardian, he heard the dancing-master recommend some of these deistical books. Fired with indignation, he threatened to take the person under his care, together with five more, away from the school, which had such a good effect, that the books never made their appearance.

As for the cause which promoted Deism in Roman Catholic countries, we shall now consider them, because they differ much from what is attended with the same effect among Protestants. And here we are extremely happy in being assisted by the German traveller Keyser.

Every one knows, says Mr. Keyser, that no books in defence of the Protestant religion, are permitted to be sold in Roman Catholic countries.—Now as these men of learning read the Bible in the original, and as they are well acquainted with the fathers and church history, so they are convinced, that the Romish church at present, has no connection with what it was at the time of the emperor Constantine the Great. Under these circumstances they have no Protestants to converse with, nor have they an opportunity of perusing such elaborate treatises as have been written against the pope and the church of Rome.

Thus left in the dark, the poison sinks deep into their minds; their prejudices become strong, and although they dare not openly mock the priests and their trumpery, yet they secretly despise them, and in their writings let loose against them all the effusions of wit, and the virulence of satire. In vain are these men referred to the writings of Protestants, when they come into countries where they can be procured. These prejudices have sunk too deep, they shut the eyes of their understanding, and unfortunately it happens, that most of our controversial writings are not the most engaging. This is undoubtedly much to be lamented, but we have many things to lament that cannot easily be remedied.—Such are the causes which promote Deism in the Roman Catholic countries, and let us now see what are the effects.

A disregard for divine revelation first leads to a settled levity of temper, and that levity gradually carries on the person to pay but little regard to moral duties, although they profess themselves to be professors of natural religion. They loath every thing that is serious, because they have found the Romish priests to be erroneous. They have not that strength of mind to consider that the truth is not lost, though many impostors have done all in their power to darken it. Devotion is considered with them as a trifle, and their conduct, as well as their conversation, poisons the rising generation.

Let us now consider the state of Deism in our country, with its causes and consequences.

The first Deistical writer that ever appeared in England, was lord Herbert, of Cherbury, a great statesman, and brother to the pious Geo. Herbert, author of the Divine Poems. This learned nobleman, in his early youth, contracted the most inveterate prejudices against the Christian religion, and the cause seems to have been the following. When his lordship was a young man at the university of Oxford, he saw many melancholy instances of the abuse of clerical power, in the bishops of the established church persecuting the Puritans. He knew that this was contrary to the spirit of the gospel, and here was the rock upon which he split. Had he considered things in a calm, dispassionate manner, he would have been led to believe, that the unworthy conduct of corrupt priests should never injure the cause of Christianity; on the contrary, it seems rather to establish it, for if there was no truth in Christianity, why so many impostors from time to time, attempting to impose, under that sacred name, upon mankind?

His sentiments, however, took the wrong bias, and he considered the whole of Christianity as a cheat, and yet this nobleman was one of the most ardent enthusiasts in the world.

The next Deistical writer was the famous Hobbs, of Malmesbury, who opposed Christianity in consequence of having read some treatises written on absolute predestination. He said, that if God had appointed all things, consequently mankind laboured under an invincible necessity. In this instance, perhaps, Hobbs was not a fool, at least he acted consistent with the nature of the principles laid down by the Predestinarians; and we will venture to affirm, that no man can believe that doctrine, without admitting of a necessity. And if a necessity is once admitted, then there is an end of all exhortation, because the freedom of the human will is destroyed.

But the most striking case we shall mention is, that of lord Bolingbroke, and we may venture to affirm, that it applies to almost all the cases in Deism during the present age.

Bolingbroke had been brought up in the house of his grandfather, Sir Henry St. John, who was lord keeper of the great seal under Oliver Cromwell. The young man was of a lively disposition, but there were seldom less than thirty dissenting ministers at his grandfather's table every day.

The young man saw into the duplicity of some of these, he became tired of their insignificant exhortations, and more than mock prayers. He imagined that the Presbyterian ministers visited his grandfather with no other view besides that of filling their pockets and their bellies, while their poor at home were not considered. And is this Christianity said he? then let me be a heathen. We are sorry to say that his lordship was as good as his word; for he had no sooner completed his studies, than he undertook to publish a work in order to prove the falsity of the Mosaical history. It is certain, that his lordship's treatise on that subject is one of the most feeble in argument that ever yet was attempted. That celebrated Deist Voltaire, with all his errors, was sensible of what is here advanced, and therefore in his philosophy of history he has recourse to another way of argument.

Bolingbroke was gross in his attacks, merely because he had detected some hypocritical ministers; but Voltaire was sly and artful, because he knew that the only way to undermine the Christian system was to act in a double, concealed manner. This naturally leads us to consider the concluding part of the argument, by pointing out those modern practices which promote Deism in the present age.

It may perhaps seem strange to those who have not given themselves much trouble to think, that men, who have had the advantages of a liberal education, who have investigated every part of civil and ecclesiastical history, who know the tempers and dispositions of men, who are not in the least unacquainted with those evidences which support divine revelation; we say, it may seem strange, that such men should reject the Christian system. But there are causes, which although little understood, yet really exist.

And first, the conduct of many of our clergy contributes towards promoting Deism. The cold and indifferent manner in which they perform their duty, the little regard they pay to the pastoral care, and above all, their avaricious dispositions open the mouths of blasphemers, and induce them boldly to tell the clergy, that if they were not impostors, they would act in the same manner as they taught.

Again, in the second place, the wicked lives of those who make pretensions to high attainments in religion, serve much towards the promoting of Deism. The Deists have learned what is asserted in the New Testament, viz. that every Christian is a new creature. Now as these high pretenders to religion are so far from being better in their conversation than they were before they assumed this new character, consequently they tell them that their religion is no more than a system of imposition; for, say they, unless religion serves to make us better than we were before, where is the necessity for a change? Here the Deists do not consider that all mere pretenders to religious attainments, have no religion at all; whereas the life of the real Christian is hid with Christ in God. They should consider the tendency of religion, and not the conduct of its corrupt professors. Let them say, is it of divine origin? then let me embrace it, although I shall be obliged to sit down in this world with hypocrites, and be ranked among many thousands of those, who, professing the name of Christ, would put him to death were he to come in the flesh a second time as the Jews of old did.

Thirdly, as there is not a single crime that can disgrace human nature, but has been committed by those men who are called religious, so our poor, unthinking young gentlemen, who have received a good education, look upon the whole Christian religion as a cheat. The consequences flowing from all these baneful principles are many, but we shall only take notice of a few.

First, as men are led to consider religion with contempt, so they pay little regard to moral duties; and we have thousands of Deists amongst us, who know not the meaning of the word. To despise religion is no new thing, for ever since man lost his original righteousness, he has had a stronger desire to evil than to good. Strange contradictions in human nature, to prefer misery to happiness; for men to set their own knowledge up as superior to that of God.

A second consequence is, that men neglect, in general, all those duties they owe to their families; why should a man labour in this world who has no hopes in death. The believer looks upon himself as an accountable being; the Deist, notwithstanding his pretensions to a belief of a future state of rewards and punishments, dies without hope; not giving himself an opportunity to inquire, or time to consider things in a proper manner. He forms his notions of Christianity not from the religion itself, but from the wicked lives of corrupt professors.

A serious inquirer after truth would never seek for information but at the fountain head. He would go to the sacred scriptures; and having examined the evidences which support them, he would rest satisfied, and leave false professors to answer to God. We shall conclude this article concerning the Deists, in the words of the late pious and learned lord president Forbes, a gentleman who saw deeply into human nature, and who defeated the Deists with weapons they were unacquainted with.

"Atheism, Deism, and the whole train of opinions that attend what is commonly called free-thinking, flow from a settled disbelief and contempt of revelation.

"This belief is, in a great measure, owing to the want of a fair and unprejudiced examination of the numerous and various proofs and evidences, that support the truth and authority of the scriptures.

"But it is chiefly grounded on a firm persuasion, that human understanding is a sufficient guide to man, and the test and measure of matters of all belief: so that we are at liberty, nay indeed bound, to reject whatever does not answer those notions, which, by what we call reasoning, we have fixed.

"That modern discoveries, the fruit of genius and application only, have fixed and determined to a certainty the laws and causes of the principal operations, and phenomena of nature, which were wholly unknown to the ancients, and mistaken by the authors of the books which are received as revelation.

"That therefore these books, so far as they give accounts of nature, contrary to experience, and demonstration resulting from it, are false; and consequently can, in no other point, pass for infallible.

"That the scriptures relate a great many marvelous, improbable, nay incredible transactions, which do not seem to be directed to any purpose, suited to sovereign wisdom and goodness; and to contain a world of institutions, laws, observances, and ceremonies, which to freethinkers appear absurd, frivolous, and ridiculous; unworthy the supposed author, and improper to attain the proposed end.

"When any apparent mistake in natural philosophy is objected to the scriptures, the answer commonly given is, in my opinion, stronger than the objection, according to the views of the disputants on either side; that these things, being incidental only, are spoken ad captum humanum, and accommodated to the understandings of those to whom they were only delivered; though I confess, it would be a much more comfortable answer, if it could be said and proved, that the things objected to are true.

"When freethinkers ground themselves upon any improbable, or, as they will call it, incredible or absurd relation, there is no answering them without bringing together and laying before them, the whole evidence that serves for supporting revelation: which, when poised in the scale against all objections of this kind that ever have been made, in my opinion, may certainly outweigh them; but, the misfortune is, the objectionable glares can be taken in by a very moderate capacity, and requires no learning, and but little attention to comprehend it; whereas, without long study, great learning, close attention, and a dispassionate and unprejudiced examination, the evidence for revelation cannot be collected and weighed. Whoever, therefore, lets in the strength of the objection, and, for want of learning or attention, not to speak of natural prejudices, either cannot, or will not, give himself the trouble to collect and weigh the proofs on the other side, must necessarily give it against revelation, and fortify himself in his incredulity.

"And to this it is owing, that all those, who, in this indolent and luxurious age, pretend to politeness, and aim at knowledge, and the reputation of, understanding and science, without any interruption to their pleasures or pursuits, take up with objections against revelation, without the painful examination of the evidence that supports it, look down with contempt on believers, as a parcel of prejudiced enthusiasts, and insist themselves with freethinkers, as the honestest, wisest set of men living.

"And when men, carried by pleasures, or sunk in indolence, settle once upon these notions, every institution, ordinance, or ceremony, appointed in scripture, for which Christians cannot, or do not, assign an adequate use or end, becomes fresh matter of objection, and tends to rivet and confirm infidelity.

"This facility of receiving and taking up with objections, and the criminal indolence and neglect of those who do not give themselves the trouble to examine, with due care, the merits of the answer, has been long complained of, and lamented by all who wish well to mankind, but hitherto in vain: something more than argument must intervene to cool them in the pursuit of pleasures, to rouse their attention to their real interest, and to determine them to search with care and industry, before they will let in so much as a suspicion that their objections are ill founded; or those objections must be overthrown by some other and shorter mean than the complicated evidence for the authority of revelation, else the objectors will never give themselves the trouble to discover their mistakes."

To what has been here advanced concerning the Deists, we must add, that they have for some years had a chapel at Mary-le-bonne, where we can only say, that the discourses delivered are far below heathenism. We take up the writings of a Seneca and an Epictetus, &c. with pleasure, and we can find no fault with them, because they knew no better, but we lament to find men living under the gospel advancing notions subversive of it.

ACCOUNT OF THE PHILADELPHIANS.

THERE is not in the whole world, either a trade or a profession, whether civil or religious, but engrossers will be found among them. We have popular physicians, popular lawyers, and popular divines, all of whom may be considered as engrossers. But here we have an instance of one single sect engrossing as it were, to itself a title claimed in common by all the rest.

Philadelphians signify Lovers of the Brethren; and it is well known, that all sects whatever love their brethren, if we may believe themselves; nay they all acknowledge it as a duty to do so, although we know that very few of them pay any regard to it, unless they are rich; then indeed they have many friends, but to use the words of the wise man, "The poor is abhorred of his neighbour." However, let us proceed with this new religion.

The Philadelphians took their rise only a few years ago, having at their head a disaffected clergyman of the church of England. Their form of worship resembles that of the Dissenters in general; but as for their preaching, it is perhaps the most extraordinary thing in the world. But of that we shall take notice afterwards.

In the mean time, we have made ourselves perfectly acquainted with every thing belonging to these people; and so far are they from being what they call themselves, viz. Lovers of the Brethren, that properly speaking, they have no brethren at all.—This will appear the more evident, when it is considered, that they are not incorporated into one body, as most of the other sects are. Their congregation consists of all those who please to come, let them be of any denomination whatever. Indeed, there is one thing constantly expected, and that is, that they would bring some money along with them for the support of the preacher. And here it is necessary to observe, that among all the sects in this nation, we know of none who preach gratis, except the Friends and the Sandimanians. All others must have money, otherwise they can have no accommodation. Nothing is more common than to hear some of our modern sectaries condemn the conduct of Simon Magus, for offering money for the Holy Ghost, and yet we never find that they refuse to take money when they administer their spiritual consolations; nay, they frequently demand money, and that in a too peremptory manner.

All the money collected at the Philadelphia meeting is given to the minister, who agrees to pay the rent out of it; but he generally insinuates himself so far into the good graces of his hearers, that they pay it for him.

They have no church discipline, which indeed would be altogether unnecessary, especially where there is not a church; for these Philadelphians are not a church; they are not a body collective, but their meeting is open to all comers. The people do not so much as know one another, and the minister is so sensible of this, that he frequently advertises his sermons in the public papers. The novelty of the name leads many people to the place, who generally return as uninformed as they went.

When they first made their appearance, we were led to believe that they had chosen their name from the common meaning of the word, namely, that they lived in love and friendship together, as all Christians are commanded to do. But no such thing was intended, for the minister is with respect to church government, a Latitudinarian, that is, he does not desire to have any connection with church fellowship, but to range at large, submitting to any form that his people may chuse to prescribe.

This indeed is too much the characteristic of many modern sects. It discovers no small share of worldly wisdom, for when people enter into connections, as all churches should do, then it is generally expected that they walk by some rule and mind prescribed duties. And among these, what could be more important than that of providing for the poor. Now, in order to avoid this very disagreeable and very troublesome duty, nothing can better suit the purpose than to preach at large, without being concerned with any church whatever; for if the people will not come to hear them, and give them money, they can keep their sermons to themselves.

We come now to consider their manner of preaching, and previous thereto, we must ask our readers a few questions; for we have some reason to believe that we have more sorts of readers than one.

And now good reader, if you are a Roman Catholic, there can remain no manner of doubt but you have read Dr. Chaloner's Catholic Christian instructed. If you are a Lutheran, you must have read Dr. Rambach's treatise on the sufferings of Christ. If you are a Church of England man, you must have read Haywood and Attersole; and, if a Dissenter, Keach and Mather undoubtedly grace your library. These are admirable writings in their own way, and we are certain they have their admirers. But now reader we will lead thee within the veil, and shew things unknown to thee before.

The preacher of the Philadelphian meeting, not content with what has been advanced by the writers already mentioned, has improved the notions of all those who have gone before him. The fundamental principles upon which his religion is founded, are the following.

First, that there was an oral tradition, or unwritten law from the fall of man to the days of Moses: and that this unwritten law was what the patriarchs adhered to.

Secondly, that the delivery of the law to Moses, was nothing but a republication of the old oral law, and that there was no difference between the service of the tabernacle and the worship performed by the patriarchs.

Lastly, that there were so many mysteries contained under the Levitical ceremonies, that if people would carefully attend to them, they would every thing find in the gospel concealed under them.— Thus for instance, the crossing the Red sea, points out conversion; the journey through the wilderness, human life; the crossing of Jordan, death; and taking possession of the holy land, everlasting happiness. But these are trifles to what we are going to relate.

The Philadelphian minister sees wonders in the sounding of the ram's horns, in the new moons, in all the washings of the priests, in the turtle doves and young pigeons, in clean and unclean beasts, and a thousand other things too numerous to mention. This allegorical interpretation of scripture has however a strong effect on the intellects of weak people. And here it is surprising to consider, in what manner we poor bewildered creatures form our notions of religion on many occasions.

Thus we are not content with common explanations of the obvious sense of scripture, but we must have recourse to far-fetched allegories and hidden mysteries. However, the ceremonies were in part a type of the gospel, yet divine wisdom had something else in view, in prescribing them; namely, to keep the Jews a distinct people from the heathens around them. Nay, in some cases there was a physical necessity in it. Such was the state of the country, such was the effect of the climate, that had they been permitted to eat swine's flesh, it might have proved fatal and prejudicial to their health.

It was the same with blood, which they were prohibited from eating, because it filled the body with corrupt particles. Some of the types indeed were significant, but we are of opinion that a single allusion to them in a sermon occasionally, is enough. To dwell half an hour or an hour upon them, is to prevent the preacher from making practical improvements. It leads the people into all that wildness which is calculated to seduce their minds from the truth, and makes them believe they see wonders where none ever existed.

It is allowed, that in private meditation, allegory is delightful, and it may even serve to kindle devotion in the heart: but those things should be kept within proper bounds. There are many things that we may know, that ought not to be made public. We ought to be extremely cautious in all things of that nature, and therefore let our words be few.

We shall conclude our account of these people by observing, that as they are not properly a community, so there is reason to believe, they will die away with the present generation. We have, in the course of this work, said so much concerning new religions, that we shall not here re-assume the subject. If a general toleration of all religious sentiments has increased in this country the number of new religions, we must acknowledge that these new religions have soon fallen into decay. And here we cannot help remembering the words of the wise Dr. Gamalial; "Let all new religions alone, for if they are of men, they will vanish away to nothing; but if they are of God, they will flourish and be established."

When the toleration act first took place, there were but few sects among the Dissenters in England, but they increased amazingly soon after. The reason is obvious. Before the revolution they had no opportunity of planning schemes for new religions; but no sooner did that desirable event take place, than they all set up for themselves on separate foundations. And yet although some of these were greedily embraced at first, yet many of them are now sunk into oblivion, and probably more will soon follow their example. This much is certain, that the people of the present age have become as it were, tired of new religions. They have made experiments, and they have cut their fingers. In other words, they have been misled, and they are determined to be on their guard for the future.

ACCOUNT OF THE BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, COMMONLY CALLED GYPSIES.

THIS sort of people being the dregs and sink of all nations, our readers may wonder to see them placed among fanatics and enthusiasts; yet we are obliged to give an account of them, by reason of their origin, which has some remarkable particulars in it. We give them the appellation of Bohemians, but the Germans call them Zigenners, from which the Italians name them Cingares. Borel informs us, that Boem, in the old language of the Gauls, signifies bewitched, which seems to agree with the notion of common people, that they can foretel what is to happen, discover hidden things, and are well versed in witchcraft. They go from place to place, having no fixed abode, as the ancient Germans did, and, in the north, the Druïdesses, the Sybls, the Voles and Fairies, so often mentioned by the Gauls. Their first rise seems owing to the remains of the Druïds, who were brought into so much contempt by Christianity, that having lost all credit and power in the towns and cities, they were obliged to dwell in caves, and to wander about the country. Beggars and vagrants are apt to associate together, which renders it probable, that others from Africa and Asia may have joined themselves to those Druïds; for instance, the Kaulits of Persia, who, like our Bohemians, run about the country, live in other solitary places, and have no religion or public worship, or rules, or any laws. They swarmed over all Persia, and from thence spread southward to Arabia and Egypt, northward to Tartary, and more distant places. Accordingly they are called Gypsies, upon the same account for which the Saxons call them Tartars.—Our over-credulous ancestors vainly imagined, that those gypsies or Bohemians were so many spies for the Turks, and that in order to expiate for the crimes which they had committed in their own country, they were condemned to steal from and rob the Christians. A rare penance! We have performed such another, though in a nobler and more heroic manner, by taking the cross, and making war against those infidels. But our opinion, that the Bohemians come from the southern parts of Asia and Africa, which our forefathers did not distinguish from Egypt, before the way of going to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope was found out, is grounded on the testimony of one of the most ancient authors who wrote concerning them. He relates, "that in 1433, the Cingares, who pretended they were Egyptians, came into Germany;" and, according to another writer cited by Pasquier, they likewise came into France much about the same time. The story is somewhat curious. "They were (says that author), by extraction, of the lower Egypt, and having abjured the Christian faith, were driven from their native country, became miserable, and an abomination to all mankind; the then emperor rejected them also, as other Christian powers had done, and told them they should go to the holy father at Rome. They went, confessed their sins, and he enjoined them to go and travel about the world, doing penance, not lying in a bed, &c. This they performed for five years before they came to Paris; the chief of them arrived there on the 17th of August 1427, the rest on the day of the decollation of St. John." The same writer says, that the ears of all of them were bored through, and had a ring, sometimes two at each ear; their complexion was very black, and their hair frizzled; the women also very black and ugly, and their hair like a horse's tail. The habit of these women was of old coarse flax; some of them were witches, and looked into people's hands to tell their fortunes. In a word, these Egyptians, banished apostates, despised by all mankind, and condemned by the pope to a wandering life, bear a vast resemblance to our Bohemians. After all, the said author cited by Pasquier says, the pope did excommunicate them, and all those who had their fortunes told them, and that from Paris they went to Potoise, on Lady-day in September, 1428.

We are inclined to trace the origin of the Boherians still higher than those Egyptians, the ancient Druids, the Kaulits of Persia, or the Uxians of Armenia: Why may they not owe their rise to the Messalianians, wandering and dispersed in Thracia, Bulgaria, &c. who were mistaken for sectaries and heretics of divers kinds, under the name of Manichæans, and upon whom the compilers of heretical catalogues have liberally bestowed a great number of odious appellations, by which, in process of time, they became more black and hateful to orthodox Christians, than the very devils in hell. The Messalianians are supposed to have had their beginning under the reign of the emperor Constantius; They were but few at first, their number increased gradually, and when they were taken notice of, as the writers of the fourth age charged them with the most of the Manichæan principles, they were reckoned amongst those heretics. The first penal laws against Schismatics and heretics were enacted at that time, and put in execution against the Messalianians, who being prosecuted, from pagans and idolaters, as they were thought to be rather than Christians, became most orthodox Christians out of fear or self-interest.

As the Messalianians are mentioned here only as bearing some resemblance to the Bohemians, we shall only relate what may evidence their conformity of sentiments and practices. They did not work and lived by the alms which they received, to imitate the apostles whom Christ had forbid having any possession.

This constant idleness, their voluntary poverty, their contempt of all the conveniences of life, and of all government, could not but lead them by degrees into a total neglect of discipline, and of all laws: This occasioned great crimes and disorders in their society; and among the sincere Messalianians, many others crept in who minded nothing less than their prayers. They were therefore accused both of living together without observing any order, any rule, or even the most common decency, and of being true Cynics, who after wandering all day in the fields, met at night, and lay in the same place, without any regard to age, sex, &c. The orthodox moreover charged them with maintaining that we ought always to follow the dictates of nature, to eat, to drink, to ease one's self when it requires it, and that no fast is to be observed, but when necessary for the preservation or recovery of health:— Besides all this, the orthodox of those days reproached them with their meetings and nocturnal feasts, in which the Pagans had heretofore taxed the Christians, and which have since been laid to the charge of other modern heretics, to render them more odious to the Roman Catholics.

We find in Italy about the close of the thirteenth century, some Fraticelli, who were also called Bi-zoqui, that is, bigots or clownish, upon account of their unpolished way of life, or because they pretended to a greater and more refined devotion. The other name of Fraticelli, that is, little brothers, either was given them because the first of them were monks, or rather it is the same as the name of Adelphean, which was bestowed upon the Messalianians.— We shall soon see that there was some conformity of sentiments betwixt them: Their chief doctors were Pietro Mauro and Pietro di Fossombrone; but an apostate monk from the convent of Pongilupi, was their ringleader; at least it is so reported. Be that as it will, these Fraticelli wandered about the country like the Messalianians, to avoid the persecutions raised against them, upon account of their lewd life, and of the errors which they held, the necessary consequence whereof was their shocking disorderly behaviour. Both the Fraticelli and Messalianians pretended that all goods ought to be in common, and condemned living by the work of one's hands. They denied all obedience to magistrates, allowed a plurality of wives, and those to be in common; to which the Grecian and Italian orthodox added the heinous imputation of holding their meetings in the night, to be more at liberty to commit all sorts of crimes. We have informed our readers, that some ringleaders of the fanatical Baptists, and several of their followers, were guilty of those three capital errors; which may serve both as an indirect proof that the Fraticelli and Messalianians probably might not be accused without some grounds; and, by consequence, as a justification of the severities used against them. But, after all, it must be owned, that some particular persons might live and die in that sect, without being acquainted with the bad principles of their evil tendency, as but too many do even amongst the orthodox; and though heresies ought to be detested, certainly the inveterate hatred against the persons is highly to be avoided.

But to return to our Messalianians of Greece and of the East, and to our Italian Fraticelli. If there were amongst them so many professed libertines, as the historians and controvertists of those times mention, ignorance, joined to the persecutions raised against them, may have been the occasion of their actually putting in execution all the enormities of their false doctrine. A young person, for instance, commits a crime, and by that infamous action loses his reputation; he is despised, abandoned by every one; so out of despair runs head-long into ruin and misery. This example needs no further comment.

We must likewise take notice here, that both ancient and modern controvertists have often represented sects and heretical systems as more dangerous than they appear to have really been. Some may pretend to excuse this fault under colour of an unbounded zeal against heresy; but zeal ought not to be bitter, or to destroy charity; and whilst a fiery and subtle controvertist inveighs too harshly against the venom of an erroneous opinion, he often does more mischief to public society than the very person who had taken it up without much consideration; and probably might, as easily have dropped it, if pride and shame had not, such is human frailty! prompted him to maintain it with obstinacy. This same false zeal has often made the said writers tax one and the said sect with maintaining inconsistent and evidently contradictory opinions; it cannot be denied that iniquity belies itself; scripture says it, and we daily experience it. But that so many inconsistent propositions should so often be justly charged upon one and the same sect, is not very much to be credited. The authors of those imputations have been sensible of this defect in the accounts by them given; and instead of owning honestly their mistake, have invented new names of derision and contempt, to upbraid the sects which they had accused wrongfully of such palpable contradictions. Thus the Manichæans, the Messalians, &c. were called by a name which in Greek signifies a mixture of all sorts. Thus the Albigenses, the Waldenses, the Lutherans and Calvinists, have been nicknamed the sink and dregs of all prior heretics.

The name of Adelphians, bestowed on the Messalians, was taken from Adelphius, one of their teachers: Flavian, patriarch of Antioch, having with great art inveigled him to discover the most secret articles of the doctrine which he held and taught, obtained that he should be banished from Syria.

But to conclude our account of these sectaries; by wandering about, they in process of time went further and further, from the place of their origin. The persecutions they suffered, and ill treatment they received from the Catholics, and as we have said before, had as great a share in banishing them from cities and great towns, and rendering them as odious as their erroneous opinions and wicked life. As they spread, so did their doctrine; and it is highly probable, that in Europe, as well as in Asia, they met many libertines who gladly associated themselves with them, upon account of the idle and lazy life so much recommended by that sect. Tares soon grow amongst the good corn, and the common people, who are apt to form their judgment not from particular instances, but general conclusions, easily mistook the good corn for tares. Thus they settled in Greece, in Thracia, Bulgaria, Transilvania, Hungary, and at last in Boheunia. In all the countries where the Sclavonian language is understood, the Messalians took, or their enemies in derision gave them, the name of Bogomiles.

Their abode in Bulgaria and the neighbouring countries, has rendered the word Bulgare odious throughout Europe, chiefly in France and Italy.—It may likewise be presumed, that they went from Bulgaria and Hungary into Bohemia, at a time when the Bohemians began to rebel against the church, and upon that account the orthodox took the Bohemians to be the same as the Bogomiles or Messalians. This being also a critical time for the church of Christ, and many beggars and miserable wretches taking part in these divisions, all were blended under the same denomination. Thus at last the name of Bohemians is universally given to vagrants and runaways, who have no settled notions, laws or religion, who in well governed kingdoms are banished from all cities or towns, and dwell in caves and solitary places, and live only by begging or stealing. If the romantic stories mentioned in the public gazettes concerning some of these Bohemians, who, within a few years, have made inroads through high and low Germany, were of any authority, or to be credited, the proofs of courage which they are said to give, must appear very singular and strange.

HISTORY OF THE BRETHREN OF THE ROSY-CROSS.

THIS society took its rise in Germany.—About the year 1394, a young man, who from five years old had been brought up in a convent, became acquainted at the age of sixteen with some magicians, learned their art, travelled into the East as far as Arabia, where the doctors of that country taught him wonderful secrets, and foretold him he should be the author of a general reformation. From Arabia he went into Barbary, and from thence to Spain, where he frequented the Moors and Jews who were versed in the Cabala. He there pretended to begin his reformation, but being banished from Spain, he came back into his native country Germany, and died in the year 1484, being one hundred and six years old. His body was not buried, but only deposited in a grotto. Fate or some oracle had ordered that the corps should remain in that state one hundred and twenty years; in consequence of which decree, it was not found out till 1604.

A German chronicle of the Rosicrucians, relates this discovery as follows : A Rosicrucian being probably more cunning than his brethren, took notice of a stone with a nail in it. He took out the stone, and found the grotto in which was deposited the body of their founder, with this inscription, " At the end of one hundred and twenty years I shall be manifested." Over the monument, after these four letters, A. C. R. C. these words were written, " In my life-time I have chosen this compendium of the world for my tomb," and several hieroglyphical figures about them. The body held in its hand a book in gold letters, which contained the praises of the founder, and gave an account of the vast treasures he had found, and of his dying without sickness or pain, when aged above an hundred.

This discovery occasioned the establishment of the Brethren of the Rosy-Cross; and in 1615, a German printed and published their apology and profession of faith.

At first the number of the Brethren was only four, then eight; but it increased very much afterwards. They were to remain in a state of celibacy, and to make themselves known to the world by no other name than the enlightened of the Rosy-Cross.— Their laws and rules forbade them to receive any reward for practising physic, and ordered them to do it out of charity; to do good to all mankind; to apply themselves to wisdom and piety; to reform the religious worship, by retrenching all superfluous ceremonies; to maintain steadily all the principles of the confraternity, which was to subsist to the end of the world. Their chief customs and opinions were, to dress according to the fashion of the country in which they lived; to be present at least once a year at their meetings, or to give a good reason for absenting; to wear constantly the character or impression of the Rosy-Cross, as a token of the brotherhood; to look upon themselves as appointed to reform all things, and as having the whole and sole right to all the gifts of nature, upon that account. They were to declare openly, that the pope was Antichrist, and that a time would come, when they should pull down his triple crown. They rejected and condemned the doctrines of the pope and of Mahomet, calling the one and the other blasphemies of the east and west: they owned but two sacraments, and admitted only the ceremonies of the primitive church. They called their society the confraternity of the Holy Ghost. They pretended to a right of naming their successor, and bequeathing to them all their privileges and virtues, as being their representatives; to know by revelation those who were worthy to be admitted as members of their society; to keep the devil in a state of subjection, and to discover hidden treasures. They moreover said, that their confraternity could not be destroyed, because God always opposed an impenetrable cloud to screen them from their enemies. Neither hunger, thirst, sickness, or any other infirmity, could hurt them; if any brother died, his burying-place and their assemblies were to be kept secret for one hundred and twenty years. They believed as a fundamental article of their faith, that if the sect failed, it might be renewed at the founder's monument or tomb. They bragged of having invented a new language, by which they could describe the nature of every being; yet they did not make use of speeches or parables; they avoided being thought the inventors of novelties, and the account they gave of their wonderful performances, was not to be deemed either imprudent, foolish, malicious, or deceitful. But their bare word must be taken, and these enlightened Brethren very much resemble quacks and alchemists in this point, as they did in their jargons, and their boasted mysterious sciences: Accordingly they were all instructed, and had their education in Arabian or German schools.

Moreover, the Rosicrucians said, that another sun which borrowed its light from the sun of this world, enlightened the grotto in which their founder was deposited, and served to discover all the wonders of the said grotto, some of which were engraved on a copper-plate placed upon an altar; where, for instance, four figures are to be seen, with these four inscriptions, " Never empty, The yoke of the law, The liberty of the gospel, The glory of God." We shall not omit other strange things, which deserve and require the learned comments of some alchemists, or visionary cabalists; several of which have promised, as the Brethren of the Rosy-Cross, to repair the breaches and defects of the world; as if nature was subject to decay, or the divine providence by which it is governed, could possibly be so far weakened, as to suffer its own work to be destroyed. They likewise flatter themselves that they shall be able to restore the primitive strength of constitution, and innocency of life in mankind; plenty and community of goods, the universal knowledge of the sciences, and the general agreement of all nations, in an unity of the gospel, in unity of religion, and holiness of life.

Morhof mentions a diminutive sect, or a small swarm of the Rosicrucians, to which he gives the name of Collegium Rosianum, or society of Rosny, who was a visionary fanatic, and endeavoured to settle that confraternity in Savoy, near Dauphine about the year 1630. Their number was not to exceed three; one Mornius tried all possible ways of being admitted for a fourth, but was rejected, and could only obtain the favour of being reckoned as a servant. This small society was entrusted with three important secrets, perpetual motion; the art of changing metals; and an universal physic.

What can be thought of such a society, which is supposed perfect in itself, adorned with universal knowledge, possessed of all worldly treasures, exempt from all human infirmities; yet no more seen than if it had been composed of pure spirits? all we can say is, that it bears a great resemblance to, and deserves to be ranked among fairy-tales. We must own nevertheless, that the common people are delighted, and love to entertain themselves with such fooleries. So the world is like to be for ever pestered with quacks and fools.

The Rosicrusians were much talked of in France in the first fifteen or twenty years of the last age, and several who pretended to be of that society, were cast into prison. The foolish credulity of the people was raised by the following bill posted up in all public places: "We who are deputies from the Rosicrusians, and dwell visibly or invisibly in this town, by the grace of the most High —, shew and teach without books or notes, to speak all the languages of the country where we please to live, to deliver our fellow creatures from deadly error." In 1613, a Rosicrusian of Barbary, named Muley-Ibrahimet, with a handful of men, having overcome the king of Fez and Morocco, was, they said, to conquer Spain. Some pretended Enlightened Brethren appeared then in Spain, but were soon quelled by the Inquisition.

Much about that time, the pretended Enlightened Brethren, before mentioned, occasioned some tumults in Spain, as the Rosicrusians had done; and we must not omit giving our readers some account of them. The singularity of their notions, some points in which they either did, or other people were resolved to believe they did agree with the Rosicrusians, made them be esteemed one and the same sect. Neither shall we pretend to multiply parties and divisions, but rank these Enlightened Brethren amongst the most dangerous kind of contemplative men, and the most wicked Quietists; if what is reported of them be true, that they believed that when the mind is wholly absorbed in prayer, and intimately united to God, it does not become guilty of any of the crimes committed in that state by the body. They moreover held, that the sacraments were useless, &c. that all good works were supplied by raising the heart to God. The Inquisition taxed them with maintaining seventy-six, erroneous opinions; and this is not to be wondered at, since that tribunal is known to be very nice, and to require an extraordinary exactness in religious matters. These Enlightened Brethren made their appearance about the end of the sixteenth age; but the Inquisition put an early stop to the progress of their fanaticism. They shewed themselves again in the neighbourhood of Seville, in the beginning of the seventeenth age, at which period of time they were esteemed to be Rosicrusians.

The Low Countries and Picardy, produced likewise, about 1525, some such Enlightened Brethren as those of Spain. A tailor named Quintin, and one Copin of much the same trade, were the ring-leaders of the Enlightened Flemish men; for in those days, every man was thought qualified to preach. They are accused of holding, that intention alone makes sin, that the spirit of God partakes of all the actions of men, and that innocency of life consists only in being calm and easy, without giving way to any doubts or scruples. This intention, which alone makes the sin, does not differ very widely from the mind intimately united to God, whilst the body wallows in crimes. What dreadful consequences might not follow from such doctrine, in a state governed by fanatics so united to God, and so perfectly weaned from matter.

ACCOUNT OF THE MODERN ANTI-TRINITARIANS.

WE have already taken notice of the Anti-trinitarians in the primitive times of Christianity; and likewise of those among the Protestant Dissenters. We shall now proceed to give an account of another set of Arians, which have sprung up in the present age; nay indeed, not many years ago. It is well known that this vast species of Arianism, Socinianism, and Deism, has induced many of the clergy to seek to be excused from subscribing to the thirty-nine articles. This was, perhaps, one of the most extraordinary efforts of madness that ever took place; for how could those men expect to enjoy pecuniary emoluments from the church, while they refused to comply with her commands. They knew that every civil establishment of religion has its system, which must be subscribed by its members, particularly the clergy. This is done in order to preserve uniformity, that they may all preach the same doctrine, and not broach new opinions.

Had these men laboured under any scruple of conscience, they would have left their livings, and either joined the Presbyterians, or set up separate meetings. But no such event took place; for they went and took possession of their livings. It is true we have two or three exceptions; particularly in the conduct of a clergyman in the north of England, who resigned his living, and was received in London by those who longed for something out of the common way.

This was a happy event to our Arians, for although, in order to point out his disinterestedness, he boasted that he had left a benefice worth three hundred a year, from motives of conscience; yet he had no objection to accept of double that sum from those who followed him in London.

A nobleman of a very popular character, became one of this preacher's first hearers in London, and his example was followed by several persons of considerable rank. As our preacher had been brought up to read prayers, and consequently could not pray without book, and as the Common Prayer-book of the Church of England, every where asserts the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, so he could not with propriety make any use of it, as it would have condemned his own principles.

To remedy this defect, he set to work and compiled a liturgy, partly out of the Common Prayer-book, and partly from his own invention. This liturgy suits all the purposes for which it was intended; for it is made according to the sentiments of the Arians and Socinians.

Great care has been taken by the compiler to convince his hearers, that he does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity. In some of his collects he blesses God for sending his son into the world to save sinners; but it may be asked, what does he mean by salvation here? The answer is neither less nor more than that Jesus, as a created being, came to shew us a good example both in his life and sufferings.

That he did so is certain, but surely this could never constitute a mediatorial office. A mediator is one who stands between the offender and offended, to reconcile the difference that has taken place. Now, according to the whole scripture account, Christ was to execute these offices for sinners.

First, he was to be unto them a prophet, to convince them of sin, and point out to them the whole will and purpose of God.

Secondly, in order to restore the honour of a broken law, and reconcile sinners to God, he was to suffer what no created being could suffer, namely, the whole wrath of God for sin. This is called his priestly office, and it was for this reason that he took upon him a human body, and a rational soul.

Thirdly, as a king and supreme head of his church, he was, by the power of his spirit, to subdue the wills and passions of his people; he was to make them a willing people in the day of his power; he was not only to rule over them, but he was to rule in their hearts, by the Holy Ghost.— To renew their nature, to fill their minds with a desire to do good to their fellow-creatures, to be clothed with humility, and to go on from one degree of perfection to another, till such time as they arrive before the Lord in glory.

Now, what has been here advanced concerning Christ's offices, could not have been performed by a human being. Part of the prophetic office might, indeed, have been performed; but no mortal could have executed that of the priest, or the king. What human being could endure the whole wrath of God in his body and soul, for the sins of a guilty world, it was utterly impossible for any person less than God to make an atonement. If sin was committed against an infinite being, then it must be a power equally great that could satisfy Divine justice.

But according to the notions of the modern Anti-trinitarians, there was no necessity for such an atonement, nor did Christ come to do any thing more than to shew us a good example, and to instruct us in the way of duty. Why, the apostle Paul could have done this, and so could the other apostles; for we are certain they taught the same doctrines as were taught by our Saviour, and so far as we know, every one of them sealed his testimony with his blood, except St. John the evangelist.

These Anti-trinitarians are composed of persons who have no knowledge, in general, concerning religion. Many of them are in very elevated stations in life; and they have of late built a grand meeting for their preacher, with an elegant house for his residence. And here we would observe, that any man who can strike out something new, is generally sure of success. This will in all respects, apply to the case of religion; and for the honour of our Anti-trinitarian adventurer, he is endeavouring to make hay while the sun shines.

Thus, besides a considerable subscription from his hearers, he has as much provision, of the best sort, sent him in from different parts of the country every week as would support several families.— There are no poor belonging to his meeting, for charity and new religions seldom have much connection together. This we know to be true, and much more, though we would not be thought too censorious.

Before we conclude this account, we would willingly make one observation, and the rather, because it is new. And that is, that in most cases in religion, the vulgar enthusiastic preacher, draws after him the greatest number of followers. But these are among the lower ranks of the people.

However, let not the great and the learned, in this instance, triumph over the weak and ignorant. The great can find as much pleasure in running after a man who is seeking every opportunity in his power to traduce the gospel of Christ, as the vulgar can in running after the ignorant teacher, who does not so much as understand what he is speaking of.

Many are carried away with a notion, that they are the elected children of God, and therefore look with contempt on the rest of mankind. On the other hand, the lukewarm in religion, who follow the preacher, who despise the glories of Christ, will not acknowledge that there is any thing supernatural. In this manner they stifle the agonizing pains of a guilty conscience, and live as if there was not a God to whom they are to be accountable.

If these men were to consider the following sentiments of a great author, it might put them to the blush.

“The words Trinity and Persons are terms not to be met with in the sacred book, and yet to those terms, and the application of them, the revolt against the doctrine is chiefly owing.

What the scripture acquaints us with, is this, and no more: That it characterises the Father, who is the avenger of wrong, and rewarder of right, God; that what it characterises the Son, the Word, the Creator of the world, the Redeemer of mankind, sent for that purpose by the Father, is God; that the Holy Spirit, the Correspondent with, and Comforter of the spirits of men, is God; and that nevertheless the Deity, the self-existing Being, is but One. That these matters are so, the scripture expressly declares; and the manner in which it expresses the last proposition, Deut. vi. 4. is worth attending to. Our translators render it, “Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is our Lord.” The original says, “Jehovah our God is one self-existent Being;” for so the word translated Lord signifies. Now, what is there in our knowledge, in our conceptions, or in our reason, that can qualify us to determine the modus of the existence, or of the action of the invisible Deity? That we have no sort of idea of the substance of that soul which acts in us, or of the manner of its existence or actions, is an agreed point: What impudence then must it be in us, to pretend to determine, from our conceptions, or rather inability to conceive, the condition, or manner of existence and acting of the Supreme Being, the least of whose works are in very deed beyond our comprehension?

The ancients, less refused than we, disputed about the figure and form of the Deity; and, knowing none more perfect or noble, as they apprehended, than that of man, bestowed upon the Deity a human shape and figure. The impropriety of this gross imagination we see; as we perceive, that the ideas of extension, shape, and figure, are not applicable to spirit, according to the notions which we have of it. But though we have not eyes to discover the substance or properties of spirit, does it certainly follow, that they have nothing in them analogous to shape or figure, no properties by which they can be discerned, and distinguished the one from the other, by God, or even by other spiritual beings, to whom he may have given eyes and understanding fit to perceive what we cannot? And as it is not on the other hand, clear, that there may be somewhat analogous to figure, some particular modus of existence of the Deity, of which our want of ideas will not permit us to form any notion.

Had nature produced to our view such living creatures as wild fiction can present to our fancy, composed of three or more distinct bodies, absolutely separated from each other, without any bodily connection, but actuated by one and the same principles, moving by one will, acting with one consent, each affected by the accidents that touch either, the one wounded by the blow that wounds the other, and all dying by the killing of one; we should have had no distinct conception of what the scripture represents concerning the Deity. But then, habituated to the sight of such an extraordinary creation as has been mentioned, the scripture-doctrine would cease to be so shocking as it is to our wise men: and yet, from their knowledge of the machinery of nature, they will hardly take upon them to say, that the Deity could not have created such an animal as has been feigned.

ACCOUNT OF THE SWEDENBORGIANS.

THE Swedenborgians, commonly so called, denote that particular denomination of Christians, who admit the testimony of Baron Swedenborg, and direct their lives in agreement with the doctrines taught in the theological writings of that author.—

Not that they call themselves by that name, or wish it to be applied to them, since they rather choose to be considered as the disciples of Jesus Christ, and glory in the name of Christians, in preference to any other title whatsoever.

The author from whom this denomination of Christians derive their name, was the son of a bishop of West Gothia, in the kingdom of Sweden, whose name was Swedenberg, a man of considerable learning and celebrity in his time.

The son was born at Stockholm, the 29th January, in the year of our Lord 1688. He enjoyed early the advantages of a liberal education, and being naturally endowed with uncommon talents for the acquirement of learning, his progress in the sciences was rapid and extensive; and he soon distinguished himself by several publications in the Latin language, which gave proof of equal genius and erudition. It may reasonably be supposed, that, under the care of his pious and reverend father, our author's religious instruction was not unattended to. This, indeed, appears plain, from the general tenor of his life and writings, which are marked with strong and lively characters of a mind deeply impressed with a sense of the Divine Being, and of all the relative duties thence resulting.

Perhaps the most authentic account of his general character and publications may be found in the funeral oration, or eulogy delivered after his decease, by Monsieur Sandel, Superintendent of the Mines, knight of the order of the Polish Star, and member of the Academy of Sciences, at Stockholm, in the great hall of the house of Nobles, in the presence of the said Academy, on the 7th of October, 1772. The oration was published by the Abbé Perneti, and is annexed to his French translation of Swedenberg's "Treatise on Heaven and Hell." From this oration, it appears that our author, at a very early age, became an object of royal attention and favour, being admitted to frequent converse with Charles XII. then king of Sweden, and appointed by him to the office of assessor of the Metallic College, a place of great public trust, and of considerable emolument. He was also emobled in the year 1719, by queen Ulrica Eleanora, and named Swedenborg, from which time he took his seat with the nobles of the Equestrian order, in the triennial assembly of the states. He was made a fellow, by invitation of the Royal Academy of Sciences, at Stockholm, and had a like honour conferred on him by foreign societies. He lived in much esteem with the bishops and nobles of his own country; and his acquaintance was sought after by the most distinguished characters in various parts of Europe, with many of whom he continued to correspond till his death.

To the above account of Monsieur Sandel, respecting the character of Baron Swedenborg, may be added, the testimony of a learned and respectable clergyman of the church of England, the late Rev. Thomas Hartley, rector of Winwick, in Northamptonshire, who was intimately acquainted with our author, and who, in a letter to a friend, thus expresses himself: "It may reasonably be supposed that I have weighed the character of Swedenborg in the scale of my best judgment, from the personal knowledge I had of him, from the best information I could procure concerning him, and from a diligent perusal of his writings; and, according thereto, I have found him to be the sound divine, the good man, the deep philosopher, the universal scholar, and the polite gentleman."

The philosophical works, published in Latin, by Baron Swedenborg, are both numerous and important; and many of them form a principal branch of the literature cultivated in several universities on the continent. One of these works is entitled, Principia rerum Naturalium, sive novorum Tentaminum Phænomena mundi elementaris Philosophiæ explicandi, of which it is remarkable, that the writers of the French Encyclopédie have enriched their observations on chemical subjects, by various extracts from it. Another is entitled, Regnum Animale, and contains a learned discussion on the various parts and uses of the animal economy. But the theological works which issued from our author's pen, are still more numerous and more interesting. The principal of them are the following:—

1. Arcana Cælestia, or Heavenly Mysteries, in eight volumes quarto, which were published in different years, from 1749—1756, containing an exposition of the internal spiritual sense of the books of Genesis and Exodus.

2. A Treatise on Heaven and Hell, from things heard and seen, published at London, in the year 1758, in one volume quarto, containing a particular account of both kingdoms.

3. The Delights of Wisdom, concerning Conjugal Love, published at Amsterdam, in the year 1758, in one volume quarto, proving the sanctity and eternity of that love.

4. Angelic Wisdom, concerning the Divine Love and Divine Wisdom, published at Amsterdam, in the year 1763, in one volume quarto, being a metaphysical discussion on the divine nature and operation.

5. Angelic Wisdom, concerning the Divine Providence, published at Amsterdam, in the year 1764, in one volume quarto, demonstrating the operation of Providence in things most minute, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary.

6. The Apocalypse Revealed, published at Amsterdam, in the year 1766, in one volume quarto, containing an exposition of the internal spiritual sense of that extraordinary book.

7. True Christian Religion, or the Universal Theology of the New Church, predicted by the Lord in Daniel, chap. vii. 13, 14, and in the Apocalypse, chap. xxi. 1, 2, published at Amsterdam, in the year 1771, in one volume quarto, treating of God the Creator, and of Creation, of the Lord the Redeemer, and of Redemption, of the Holy Spirit, or the Divine Operation, of the Divine Trinity, of the Sacred Scripture, or Word of the Lord, of the Decalogue, of Faith, of Charity, and of Good Works, of Freewill, of Redemption, of Reformation and Regeneration, of Imputation, of Baptism and the Holy Supper, of the Consummation of the Age, the Lord's Advent, and a New Heaven and a New Church.

To the above may be added, several smaller treatises, as the Last Judgment and Babylon destroyed,—the White Horse treated of in the Apocalypse,—the New Jerusalem and its Heavenly Doctrine,—the Doctrine of the New Jerusalem concerning the Lord, concerning the Sacred Scriptures, concerning Faith, and concerning Life,—a Summary Exposition of the Doctrine of the New Church; and, lastly,—a Treatise on Influx, or concerning the Commerce of the Soul and Body.

It does not appear that the theological writings of Baron Swedenborg were much attended to during his life time, except by his particular friends; but after his decease they began to be translated into several modern languages, as the German, the English, and French, and were much sought after by the serious and well-disposed. The first translation of any note into English, was made by the Rev. T. Hartley, above named, from the Latin Treatise on Influx, and was accompanied by a learned and appropriate preface, and various notes, in the year 1770. This was followed, two or three years afterwards, by a translation of the Treatise on Heaven and Hell, with a preface and notes, by the same translator. The increasing demand for these works called for several new editions of each, and led to the translation, by degrees, of all the other theological works of our author, so that now there is not one but what has been rendered into the English language, and some of the larger ones have passed through several editions. There is reason to suppose, from the great demand for these publications, that they soon became very generally read throughout the kingdom; as it is a fact, that a society of gentlemen, in Manchester, only formed for the purpose of publishing and circulating them, have printed, in the course of a few years, upwards of 16,000 copies, as appears from the annual reports of the society. Various societies have also been formed in different parts of England, for reading and discoursing on these writings; and in some of the principal cities and towns, as in London, Bristol, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Hull, Bolton, and some other smaller towns, places of worship have been opened for the more public circulation of the doctrines contained in those writings, from the pulpit.

The first and principal distinguishing doctrine, contained in the writings of Baron Swedenborg, and maintained by his followers, relates to the person and character of Jesus Christ, and to the redemption wrought by that Great Saviour. On this subject it is insisted, that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, manifested in the flesh, and that he came into the world to glorify his human nature, by making it one with the divine. It is therefore insisted further, that the humanity of Jesus Christ is itself divine, by virtue of its indissoluble union with the in-dwelling Father, agreeable to the testimony of St. Paul, that, "In Jesus Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily," Coloss. ii. 9; and that thus, as to his humanity, he is the mediator between God and man, since there is now no other medium of God's access to man, or of man's access to God, but his divine humanity, which was assumed for this purpose. Thus it is taught, that in the person of Jesus Christ dwells the whole Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the Father constituting the soul of the above humanity, whilst the humanity itself is the Son, and the divine virtue, or operation proceeding from it, is the Holy Spirit, forming altogether one God, just as the soul, the body, and operation of man, form one man.

On the subject of the redemption wrought by this incarnate God, it is lastly taught, that it consisted not in the vicarious sacrifice of one God, as some conceive, to satisfy the justice, or, as others express it, to appease the wrath of another God, but in the real subjugation of the powers of darkness and their removal from man, by continual combats and victories over them, during his abode in the world; and in the subsequent descent to man of divine power and life, which was brought near to him in the thus glorified humanity of this combating God. The receivers, therefore, of this testimony concerning Jesus Christ, acknowledge no other God but him, and believe, that, in approaching his divine humanity, they approach at the same time, and have communication with all the fulness of the Godhead, seeing and worshipping the invisible in the visible, agreeable to the tenor of those words of Jesus Christ; "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me; and he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me." John xii. 44, 45.

2. The second distinguishing doctrine, taught by the same author, relates to the sacred scripture, or word of God, which is maintained to be divinely inspired throughout, and consequently to be the repository of the whole will and wisdom of the Most-High God. But then it is insisted, that this will and wisdom are not, in all places, discoverable from the letter or history of the sacred pages, but lie deeply concealed under the letter. For it is taught by the author under consideration, that the sense of the letter of the holy word, is the basis, the continent, and the firmament of its spiritual and celestial senses, being written according to the doctrine of correspondences between things spiritual and things natural; and thus designed by the Most High as the vehicle of communication of the eternal spiritual truths of his kingdom to the minds of men. This doctrine of correspondences is much insisted and enlarged on in the theological writings of Baron Swedenborg, especially in his Arcana Cœlestia, and Apocalypse Revealed, in which works, it is applied as a key to unlock all the hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge contained in the historical books of Genesis, Exodus, and the Revelations. It is further endeavoured to be shewn, that Jesus Christ spake continually according to this same doctrine, veiling divine and spiritual truths under natural images, especially in his parables, and thus communicating to man the most important mysteries, relative to himself and his kingdom, under the most beautiful and edifying figures, taken from the natural things of this world. Thus, according to Baron Swedenborg, even the historical parts, both of the Old and New Testament, contain vast stores of important and spiritual wisdom under the outward letter; and this consideration, as he farther asserts justifies the pages of divine revelation, even in those parts which, to a common observer, appear trifling, nugatory, and contradictory. It is lastly maintained on this subject, that the sacred scripture, or word of God, is the only medium of communication and conjunction between God and man, and is likewise the only source of all genuine truth and knowledge respecting God, his kingdom, and operation, and the only sure guide for man's understanding, in whatsoever relates to his spiritual or eternal concerns. And here it may not be improper to observe, that, by the respect paid to the guidance derived from the sacred pages, a striking line of distinction is drawn between this our author and the common enthusiasts of the day, since it is notorious that the latter are perpetually leading their deluded disciples to depend on the dictates of spirits, in preference to the precepts of the eternal truth; whereas Baron Swedenborg is perpetually pointing out the great danger of such leading, and calling all his readers to be taught of God, by and through the precepts of his holy word, intellectually and rationally comprehended.

3. A third distinguishing doctrine, which marks the character of the writings of Baron Swedenborg, is the doctrine relative to life, or to that rule of conduct on the part of man which is truly acceptable to the Deity, and at the same time conducive to man's eternal happiness and salvation, by conjoining him with his God. This rule is taught to be simply this, to shun all known evils as sins against God, and at the same time to love, to cherish, and to practise whatsoever is wise, virtuous and holy, as being most agreeable to the will of God, and to the spirit of his precepts. On this subject it is strongly and repeatedly insisted, that evil must of necessity remain with man, and prove his eternal destruction, unless it be removed by sincere repentance, leading him to note what is disorderly in his own mind and life; and when he has discovered it, to fight resolutely against its influence, in dependence on the aid and grace of Jesus Christ. It is insisted further, that this opposition to evil ought to be grounded on the consideration, that all evil is sin against God, since, if evil be combated from any inferior motive, it is not radically removed, but only concealed, and on that account is even more dangerous and destructive than before. It is added, that when man has done the work of repentance, by shunning his hereditary evils as sins against God, he ought to set himself to the practise of what is wise and good by a faithful, diligent, and conscientious discharge of all the duties of his station; by which means his mind is preserved from a return of the powers of disorder, and kept in the order of heaven, and the fulfilment of the great law of charity. For it is perpetually maintained in the writings of Baron Swedenborg, that the essence of charity consists in man's loving his neighbour as himself, and that its principal operation consists in every one's discharging the relative duties which he owes to society, by acting uprightly, and in the fear of God, in his particular employment, whether it be that of a priest, a judge, a soldier, a gentleman, a merchant, or a mechanic. This idea of charity is grounded in the consideration, that the society in which a man lives, and especially his country, and the church of God, are more properly his neighbour than any individual, and that consequently the highest act of charity is that which is exercised on those aggregate bodies of men, by a conscientious performance of the offices annexed to his particular function.

4. A fourth distinguishing doctrine, inculcated in the same writings, is the doctrine of co-operation on the part of man, with the divine grace or agency of Jesus Christ. On this subject it is insisted, that man ought not indolently to hang down his hands, under the idle expectation that God will do every thing for him in the way of purification and regeneration, without any exertion of his own; but that he is bound, by the above law of co-operation, to exert himself, as if the whole progress of his purification and regeneration depended entirely on his own exertions; yet, in exerting himself, he is continually to recollect, and humbly to acknowledge, that all his power to do so is from above, agreeable to the declaration of Jesus Christ, "Without me ye can do nothing." John xv. 5. He is therefore bound, according to this law, to enter fiely on the great work of self-examination, and with the same freedom to reject the evils which such examination discovers to his view; also to fulfil freely the duties of his station, of whatsoever kind they be. This law is shewn to be grounded on these two distinct considerations, first, the consideration of the freedom with which man is perpetually invested, either to work with God, or to work against him; and, secondly, the consideration, that all conjunction between God and man must needs be reciprocal, or mutual, agreeable to those words of Jesus Christ, where he says, "Abide in me, and I in you." John xv. 4. It is therefore shewn, that without perpetual freedom on the part of man, he would not be a man, but a machine, consequently incapable of living in conjunction with his heavenly Father. And it is further shewn, that, to effect this conjunction, it is not sufficient that Jesus Christ be in the will and purpose to accomplish it, or that he abides in his disciples, but it is necessary also that his disciples be mutually on their part in the will and purpose to accomplish it also, or that they should reciprocally abide in him. Lastly, it is insisted, on this interesting subject, that the doctrine of co-operation supplies no ground for the establishment of man's merit and independence on the divine aid, since it is continually taught in the writings in question, that all man's freedom, as well as all his power of co-operation, is the perpetual gift of the most merciful and gracious God, consequently that all merit, properly so called, belongs to Jesus Christ alone, and nothing at all to man.

5. A fifth and last distinguishing doctrine taught in the theological writings of our author, relates to man's connection with the other world, [and its various inhabitants. On this subject it is insisted, not only from the authority of the sacred scriptures, but also from the experience of the author himself, that every man is in continual association with angels and spirits, and that without such association he could not possibly think, or exert any living faculty. It is insisted further, that man, according to his life in the world, takes up his eternal abode, either with angels of light, or with the spirits of darkness; with the former, if he is wise to live according to the precepts of God's holy word, or with the latter, if, through folly and transgression he rejects the counsel and guidance of the Most High.

The author's experimental testimony on the subject is delivered very minutely in his Treatise on Heaven and Hell, and is likewise occasionally adverted to in most of his other writings, forming altogether, with those who can receive it, a most weighty demonstration of the existence of another world, also of its laws and government, and especially of man's interesting connection with it during his abode in this world. It is however to be noted, that this experimental testimony is never made the ground of the revelation of any new law for the guidance of man's life, because it is abundantly shewn that the word of God is completely competent to that purpose, containing every information which it is necessary for man to know, in order to secure eternal happiness. It is further to be noted, that an intercourse with the other world, similar to what was enjoyed by the author himself, is never insisted on as necessary or even expedient for others, since it is shewn, that the guidance of heavenly truth, derived from the word of God, is to be regarded as infinitely superior to every other knowledge, whether derived from visions like those of the prophets of old, or from a spiritual intercourse, resembling that which distinguished the author.

Some other peculiar doctrines of lesser importance, might be enlarged on in this place, if it was deemed necessary, such as—the doctrine concerning the human soul, as being in a human form;—the doctrine concerning the marriage of the good and the true, as existing in the holy word, and in all things in nature;—the doctrine of the divine Providence, as extending to things most minute, respecting man and the world which he inhabits;—the doctrine concerning the earths in the universe, by which it is taught, that all the planets in our system, and in other systems, unconnected with our sun, are inhabited by human beings: but to expatiate on these several doctrines might be thought tedious.

It was observed above, that in London, and some of the other cities and great towns in England, places of public worship have been opened, for the express purpose of preaching the above doctrines, and of offering up supplications to the Divine Being, and celebrating his praises. In all such places, particular forms of prayer have been adopted, in agreement with the ideas of the worshippers, as grounded in the religious sentiments above stated, especially respecting the supreme object of adoration, who is acknowledged to be the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in his divine humanity. But in no place have any peculiar rites and ceremonies been introduced, the worshippers being content with retaining the celebration of the two sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Supper, since no other rites are insisted on by the author whose testimony they receive.

It does not appear that on the subject of church government and discipline, any thing has been either recommended by Baron Swedenborg, or adopted by the receivers of his doctrines. For it is believed by a large majority of those receivers, and particularly by a numerous body of the clergy of the Church of England, who are disposed to think favourably of our author's testimony, that it was never his intention that any particular sect should be formed upon his doctrines, but that all who receive them, whether in the establishment, or in any other communion of Christians, should be at perfect liberty, either to continue in their former communion, or to quit it, as their conscience dictates. Accordingly the above-mentioned numerous body of the clergy, together with many individuals of their respective congregations, who are receivers of the above doctrines, think it proper still to continue in the use of the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and under the episcopal government established in that church.

England appears to have been the country where the above doctrines have been most generally received; nevertheless there are numerous readers of those doctrines both in Wales, Ireland, France, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Russia; also in America and the West India islands. At Copenhagen, it is well known, a magnificent church has been lately built for the propagating of those doctrines, as likewise at Baltimore, in North America. In regard to the numbers of the favourers of the above doctrines, it is impossible to ascertain them with any tolerable degree of correctness, especially as the majority of them do not think it right to separate themselves from that church communion in which they have been educated; but, from the increasing demand for the publications which contain those doctrines, there is every reason to believe the number of readers to be large, and increasing. At least, it is a fact, that this is the case in the town of Manchester and its vicinity, where the number of proselytes to the testimony of Baron Swedenborg has of late years swelled to a large amount, so as at present to be calculated at several thousands.

The three principal writers, who have opposed the theological tenets of Baron Swedenborg, are Dr. Priestley, the Abbé Barruel, and the editor of the Christian Observer. Dr. Priestley published his objections about the year 1791, in one small octavo volume, entitled, Letters to the Members of the New Jerusalem Church at Birmingham. His principal objection was to the doctrine which asserts the exclusive divinity of Jesus Christ, and he combats this doctrine with all the weight of those Socinian arguments which were so familiar to him.—His objections were answered immediately in a very able manner, by the Rev. J. Proud, the present minister of York Street Chapel, St. James's Square, Westminster, and in the following year, in a still more diffuse and more elaborate manner, by Mr. Robert Hindmarsh, who was at that time a printer in London, whose reply was entitled, Letters to Dr. Priestley, in Answer to his Letters to the Members of the New Jerusalem Church at Birmingham.—The next opponent to the above doctrines was the Abbé Barruel, who, in the fourth volume of his Memoirs of Jacobinism, inserted a violent invective against Baron Swedenborg and his tenets, endeavouring to prove him to be an impostor, a madman, an atheist, a materialist, and an enemy to all government both civil and ecclesiastic. His calumnies were presently refuted by the Rev. J. Clowes, rector of St. John's, Manchester, and late fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, in a work, entitled Letters to a Member of Parliament, on the Character and Writings of Baron Swedenborg, containing a full and complete Refutation of all the Abbé Barruel's Calumnies against the honourable Author, in one volume octavo. The last antagonist of our author, was the editor of the Christian Observer, who published his attack in that periodical work, for the Month of June 1806, under the title of Observations on a small Work, entitled A few plain Answers to the Question, Why do you receive the Testimony of Baron Swedenborg? addressed from a minister to his congregation, by the Rev. J. Clowes. This attack the Rev. author of the Plain Answers endeavoured to repel, in a small pamphlet, entitled, Letters to the Christian Observer, in reply to their remarks on his publication; in which letters the following subjects are discussed. 1. The person and character of Jesus Christ, as being exclusively the God of heaven and earth. 2. The internal sense of the sacred scriptures. 3. Justification. 4. The extraordinary mission of Baron Swedenborg, as an expositor of the sacred scriptures, and as a seer.

Amongst the assertors of the truth of the testimony of Baron Swedenborg, ought also to be mentioned the Rev. T. Hartley, Rector of Winwick, in Northamptonshire, a man of profound piety and learning, who vindicated the character of our author, and the tendency of his writings, in two prefaces to the Treatises on Heaven and Hell, and on Influx, accompanied with various notes and observations; also in a Letter to the translator of the True Christian Religion, which stands annexed as a preface to the English translation of that work.—The names likewise of the Abbé Pernetti, librarian to the king of Prussia, and of the Rev. Dr. Beyer, of Gottenburg, ought not to be overlooked on this occasion, since they were both of them very able and strenuous advocates in favour of the character and doctrines of Swedenborg, the former having published his remarks in the preliminary discourse prefixed to his French translation of the Treatise on Heaven and Hell; and the latter having manifested his partiality for the doctrines, by composing and publishing three copious indexes, in one volume quarto, of all the matter contained in the theological writings of our author, and of all the scripture passages referred to and elucidated in those writings.

We have only to observe on the subject of this article, that the doctrines under consideration, if true, must needs be acknowledged to be of the utmost importance to the general interests of mankind. Some persons, it is plain, will be disposed to doubt their credibility, on the ground of the utter improbability, that a mortal man, during his residence in a material body, should have been permitted to enjoy open intercourse with the world of departed spirits, during the uninterrupted period of twenty-seven years, and to have been instructed, during that period, in the internal sense of the sacred scriptures, hitherto undiscovered.

Others again (as appears from many respectable instances, both amongst the laity and the clergy), will see nothing improbable in all this, referring the case to those extraordinary dispensations of the providence of an All-wise and All-powerful Being, who, in all ages of the world, has been pleased to enlighten and instruct chosen servants concerning his will and kingdom. At all events, it is beyond a doubt, that every well-disposed Christian is bound, by every obligation of good conscience, to take the above testimony into serious consideration, and not to decide upon it, until he has weighed it impartially in the scale of his best judgment, and in the fear of God, following the prudent counsel of the Jewish doctor, on a similar occasion, where it is written,—“If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.” Acts v. 38, 39.

ACCOUNT OF THE UNIVERSALISTS.

UNIVERSALISTS, so termed from the belief they have that men will be universally saved; the following are some of the reasons they advance:—

“The Arminian proves from scripture, that God is love; that he is good to all; that his tender mercy is over all his works; that he gave his son for the world; that Christ died for the world, even for the whole world; and that God will have all men to be saved.

“The Calvinist proves also from scripture, that God is without variableness or shadow of turning; that his love, like himself, alters not; that the death of Christ will be efficacious towards all for whom it was intended; that God will perform all his pleasure, and that his council shall stand. The union of these scriptural principles, is the final restoration of all men.

“Taking the principles of the Calvinists and Arminians separately, we find the former teaching, or at least inferring, that God doth not love all; but that he made the greater part of men to be endless monuments of his wrath: the latter declaring the love of God to all: but admitting his final failure of restoring the greater part. The God of the former is great in power and wisdom, but deficient in goodness, and capricious in his conduct: who that views the character can sincerely love it? The God of the latter is exceeding good; but deficient in power and wisdom: who can trust such a thing? If, therefore, both Calvinists and Arminians love and trust the Deity, it is not under the character which their several systems ascribe to him; but they are constrained to hide the imperfections which their views cast upon him, and boast of a God whose highest glory their several schemes will not admit.”

The Universalists teach the doctrine of election; but not in the exclusive Calvinistic sense of it: they suppose that God has chosen some for the good of all; and that his final purpose towards all, is intimated by calling his elect the first born and the first fruits of his creatures, which, say they, implies other branches of his family, and a future in-gathering of the harvest of mankind.

They add, that the words rendered everlasting, eternal, for ever, and for ever and ever, in the scriptures, are frequently used to express the duration of things that have ended, or must end. This doctrine is not new. Origen, a Christian father, who lived in the third century, wrote in favour of it.

For still further information, the reader is referred to a critical work, entitled, “An Essay on the Duration of a Future State of Punishment and Rewards,” by John Simpson, who has written several excellent practical pieces for the illustration of Christianity.—Mr. Winchester and others have also ably defended this system.

ACCOUNT OF THE RELLYAN UNIVERSALISTS.

RELLYAN Universalists, the followers of Mr. James Relly, who first commenced the ministerial character in connection with the late Mr. George Whitfield, and with the same sentiments as are generally maintained at the tabernacle. They are not observers of ordinances, such as water baptism and the sacrament—professing to believe in only one baptism, which they call an immersion of the mind or conscience into truth, by the teaching of the spirit of God; and by the same spirit they are enabled to feed on Christ as the bread of life, professing that, in and with Jesus, they possess all things. They inculcate and maintain good works for necessary purposes, but contend that the principal and only works which ought to be attended to, is the doing real good without religious ostentation;—that to relieve the miseries and distresses of mankind, according to our ability, is doing more real good than the superstitious observance of religious ceremonies: in general they appear to believe that there will be a resurrection to life, and a resurrection to condemnation; that believers only will be among the former, who as first fruits, and kings and priests, will have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ in his kingdom of the millennium; that unbelievers who are after raised, must wait the manifestation of the Saviour of the world, under that condemnation of conscience which a mind in darkness and wrath must necessarily feel; that believers, called kings and priests, will be made the medium of communication to their condemned brethren—and, like Joseph to his brethren, though he spoke roughly to them, in reality overflowed with affection and tenderness; that ultimately—every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess, that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength:—and thus every enemy shall be subdued to the kingdom and glory of the great Mediator.

ACCOUNT OF THE JOHNSONIANS.

JOHNSONIANS, so called from the late Mr. Johnson, a respectable dissenting minister of Liverpool: they do not apply this name to themselves, but it is given to them by Christians of other denominations. They must be regarded as a distinct denomination, as they will have no religious fellowship with those who dissent from their views of the gospel, which are sufficiently discriminating, and have sometimes applied to themselves the words of Balaam, respecting the children of Israel, "The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations."

They deny the pre-existence of Christ, and at the same time believe that he is properly God: because all the fulness of the godhead dwells in him: consequently may be said to maintain the indwelling scheme. They assert that God cannot be divided into distinct persons: so far they agree with the Unitarians. They deny the doctrine of original sin; yet assert that no man will savingly believe the gospel, unless brought by the special influence of the spirit to receive it. They deny the natural immortality of the soul, and contend that the whole of man is at present mortal; yet maintain the separate existence of the soul between death and the resurrection. They believe that God elected Christ, and his people in him, from everlasting, that for Christ and his church all things were created; that Christ would have been manifested, his people born again and exalted to glory, though sin had never existed; that in that case the rest of mankind would all have been happy in an inferior capacity, as the servants of Christ, and his bride the church. Against the decree of sin and reprobation they are zealous. Faith they suppose to be a divine communication, the life of God in the soul. They contend that it is impossible for a real Christian to have any doubts or fears respecting his interest in Christ, or acceptance with God. Respecting the atonement and perseverance of the saints they agree with the Calvinists, and with other Baptists as to the mode and subject of baptism. Those passages of scripture which relate to the future restoration of the Jews, they suppose to have a spiritual meaning, and deny that prophecy authorizes our expectation of their being restored to their own land. Those who die in infancy they say will be raised to life in a pure state, not to inherit the heavenly kingdom, but to inhabit the new earth which will be formed after the conflagration, on which, say they, Christ and his church will reign a thousand years, and then be removed to some more glorious region. They contend for the restitution of all the animal creation; but believe that the wicked will be endlessly miserable. Positive punishment, as inflicted by God, they deny, and hold the language of scripture respecting the future punishment of the wicked to be figurative, and that their torment will naturally arise from their state, and exist in their minds.

ACCOUNT OF THE SOUTHCOTTIANS.

SOUTHCOTTIANS, from Joanna Southcott, their reputed prophetess. Her supposed mission began in 1792, and she has since obtained a number of followers. She professes to be the instrument under the direction of Christ, to announce the establishment of his kingdom on earth, as a fulfilment of all the promises in the scriptures, and of that prayer which he himself gave to his followers; and more particularly of the promise made to the woman in the fall, through which the human race is to be redeemed from all the effects of it in the end. She also professes to have direct communications with the Spirit of Truth; and the following are selected as containing the leading features of their sentiments:—That the seven days of the creation were types of the two periods in which the reign of Satan and of Christ are to be proved and contrasted; Satan was conditionally to have his reign tried for six thousand years, shadowed by the six days in which the Lord worked, as his spirit has striven with man while under the power of darkness; but Satan's reign is to be shortened, for the sake of the elect, as declared in the gospel; and Satan is to have a further trial at the expiration of the thousand years, for a time equal to the number of the days shortened. At the close of the seven thousand years the day of judgment is to take place, and then the whole human race will collectively bring forward the testimony of the evil they suffered under the reign of Satan, and of the good they enjoyed under the spiritual reign of Christ. These two testimonies will be evidence before the whole creation of God, that the pride of Satan was the cause of his rebellion in heaven, and that he was the root of evil upon earth; and consequently when these two great proofs have been brought forward, that part of the human race that has fallen under his power, to be tormented by being in the society of Satan and his angels, will revolt from him in that great day, will mourn that they have been deluded, will repent, and the Saviour of all will hold out his hand to them in mercy; and will then prepare a new earth for them to work righteousness, and prepare them ultimately to join his saints, who have fought the good fight in this world while under the reign of Satan.

The mission of Joanna, it is supposed, will be accomplished by a perfect obedience to the spirit that directs her, and so to be made to claim the promise of bruising the head of the serpent; and which promise was made to the woman on her casting the blame upon Satan, whom she unwittingly obeyed, and thus man became dead to the knowledge of the good; and so he blamed his Creator for giving him the woman, who was pronounced his helpmate for good. To fulfill the attribute of justice, Christ took upon himself that blame, and assumed his humanity to suffer on the cross for it, that he might justly bring the cross upon Satan, and rid him from the earth, and then complete the creation of man, so as to be after his own image. It is declared that the seed of the woman are those who in faith shall join with her in claiming the promise made in the fall; and they are to subscribe with their hands unto the Lord, that they do thus join with her, praying for the destruction of the powers of darkness, and for the establishment of the kingdom of Christ. Those who thus come forward in this spiritual war, are to have the seal of the Lord's protection, and if they remain faithful soldiers, death and hell shall not have power over them: and these are to make up the sealed number of one hundred and forty-four thousand to stand with the Lamb on mount Zion! The fall of Satan's kingdom will be a second deluge over the earth; so that from his having brought the human race under his power, a great part of them will fall with him; for the Lord will pluck out of his kingdom all that offend and do wickedly. The voice which announces the coming of the Messiah is ac-complicated with judgments, and the nations must be shaken and brought low before they will lay these things to heart. When all these things are accomplished, then the Desire of Nations will come in glory, so that every eye shall see him, and he will give his kingdom to his saints.

It is represented, that in the Bible is recorded every event by which the Deity will work the ultimate happiness of the human race; but that the great plan is for the most part represented by types and shadows, and otherwise so wrapt up in mysteries, as to be inscrutable to human wisdom. As the Lord pronounced that man should become dead to knowledge if he ate the forbidden fruit, so the Lord must prove his words true. He therefore selected a peculiar people, as depositaries of the records of that knowledge; and he appeared among them, and they proved themselves dead to every knowledge of him, by crucifying him. He will in like manner put the wild olive to the same test; and the result will be, that he will be now crucified in the spirit!

Joanna professes also to have had prophecies given her, shewing how the whole was to be accomplished. Among other things, the Lord said he should visit the surrounding nation with various calamities for fifteen years, as a warning to this land; and that then he should bring about events here which should more clearly manifest the truth of her mission, by judgments and otherwise; so that this should be the happy nation to be the first redeemed from its troubles, and be the instrument for awakening the rest of the world to a sense of what is coming upon all, and for destroying the Beast, and those who worship his image.

Her books are written principally in rhyme, which it must be confessed, is in a low, common, ballad style; very ungrammatical, but which she purports to be the language of the spirit of God. Some of her advocates, men of education, and who officiate in sacred things, declare that this doggrel versification is superior to Homer. That the reader may judge whether her rhyme merits so high a character, the following lines are selected, nor are they the most objectionable.

SPIRIT.

“ Simple among the sons of men
I always did appear;
And simple in the woman’s form
I’ve surely acted here.”

Again,

SPIRIT.

“ If you can judge the heav’nly sound,
Such woman ne’er on earth was found,
To give such challenge unto man
And say that I am in her form.
Look, here’s a woman, now believe it true,
That here’s a woman taken from my side,
That I’ve declared to man to be my bride.
I have chang’d the manhood and the Godhead’s here.”

ACCOUNT OF THE DESTRUCTIONISTS.

BETWEEN the system of restoration and the system of endless misery, a middle hypothesis of the final destruction of the wicked (after having suffered the punishment due to their crimes) has been adopted more particularly by the Rev. Mr. Bourne, of Norwich; and Mr. John Marsom, in two small volumes, of which there has been a second edition, with additions. They say that the scripture positively asserts this doctrine of destruction; that the nature of future punishment (which the scripture terms death) determines the meaning of the words everlasting, eternal, for ever, &c. as denoting endless duration; because no law ever did or can inflict the punishment of death for a limited period; that the punishment cannot be corrective, because no man was ever put to death either to convince his judgment or to reform his conduct; that if the wicked receive a punishment apportioned to their crimes, their deliverance is neither to be attributed to the mercy of God, nor the mediation of Jesus Christ, but is an act of absolute justice; and finally, that the mediatorial kingdom of Jesus Christ will never be delivered up, since the scripture asserts, that of his kingdom there shall be no end.

ACCOUNT OF THE COWHERDIANS.

THIS appellation they have not taken to themselves, it has been given to them by others, in consequence of their rigid adherence to the principles and discipline of the Rev. W. Cowherd, founder of a small chapel, which he calls Christ Church, in Salford, near Manchester. This clergyman is a literary character of considerable talent, and was formerly a curate in the established church—it has been supposed that he is an advocate and preacher of the doctrines of Swédenborg; this, it appears, is not the case; for although he speaks, at times, in terms of high commendation of the above author, yet he disclaims being one of his followers, and entertains views and opinions which the Swédenborgians (so called) totally discard—he seems to rank Swédenborg along with Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and other reformers and expositors, but that he possessed greater gifts and endowments. Whereas the real members of the New Jerusalem Church before treated of, see in Swédenborg not only the rational expositor and enlightened teacher, but the illuminated seer; and they rank him among the highly-favoured ones, who, as St. John, the prophets, and apostles of old, have been admitted into spiritual vision, that they might thereby be prepared and enabled, under the guidance of the divine influence, to make known the great dispensations of truth to mankind.

The manner in which this sect view the incarnation and redemption, we shall give in their own words, by an extract from “the Report of a Conference held” in their chapel above mentioned, “in June and July, 1809,” and which is laid down (though, perhaps, not in the plainest manner) as follows:

“1. That the divine spirit and the human spirit have been from eternity united in the ‘heaven of heavens,’ the ‘throne of God,’ as intimately as the soul and body of man are united into one person;—but not ‘exclusively’ even there.

“2. That on earth, the human was partially separated from the divine spirit, at the fall of man.

“3. That in Jesus Christ, the fallen, the carnal spirit of man was ultimately re-united with its appropriate degree of the divine spirit, as that exists—unseparated from the throne—down into our world.

“4. That this divine spirit, descending from the throne, and pervading the universe, is that ‘Holy Spirit’ which came upon the virgin, and assumed materiality at the incarnation.

“5. That when this spirit, the spirit of truth, the light that enlightens every man that comes into the world, had, through the fleshly tabernacle of Jesus Christ, diffused itself throughout this world of man, as ether diffuses itself in our atmosphere; it then began to exhibit the divine human appearance of the heaven of heavens, as ether exhibits the refracted image of the sun in our atmosphere.

“6. That this ‘Image’ of that divine human appearance, which is given in the glorified human spirit at the centre of creation, is the true Jesus Christ whom we shall ‘meet in the air;’—that ‘quickening spirit,’ the ‘Mediator between God and man,’ ‘by whom,’ as refracted to the ‘right hand of God,’ all the faithful shall apparently pass, when ‘he delivers up the kingdom to the Father,’ in the eternal heavens.

“7. That the glory investing this ‘express image of the Father’s person,’ is again the ‘holy spirit’ which was ‘not given’ forth in full manifestation from the ‘throne of Jesus,’ till he was fully glorified, or till his human spirit, leaving its fleshly tabernacle on the cross, became one with the right spirit of man as filled and united with the good spirit of God throughout the universe.

“8. That the material body re-assumed at the resuscitation, and ‘handled’ by the unbelieving Thomas, could spontaneously pass off from the spirit of Jesus, as the ‘flesh and blood’ which ‘cannot enter the kingdom of heaven,’ undoubtedly deflagrated from the prophet Elijah, in the fire be-held by Elisha.

“9. That in this way, the ‘body’ of Jesus, which had given offence to some, and might have caused idolatry to others, became truly and properly a ‘sacrifice for sin.’

“10. And that, finally, the atonement or reconciliation between God and man, was virtually effected when the human spirit was re-united with the divine, and fully accomplished against sin, when Jesus, by voluntarily ‘laying down his life,’ prevented his enemies from murdering him:—thus over-ruling their wicked design, for good to them and their posterity, by preventing sin,—particularly the sin of idolatry, among Gentiles as well as Jews, even to the remotest generations.

Their ideas of inspiration and of the Trinity are thus expressed in the same report.

"1. That the patriarchs, Moses, the prophets, the apostles, and other holy men of old, being possessed of that right human spirit ever filled with the divine, which, in their surrounding sphere, would receive and reflect the divine image, as it is received and refracted by the same spirit in our atmosphere; it must necessarily happen, in all their unobscured states of mind and spirit, that they would see the Lord, or what they called the word of the Lord, apparently standing near to them, and by the suggestions of his spirit, there apparently speaking to them as 'a man does to his friend.'

"2. That the reflected image of God is that personal holy Spirit, and the refracted image of God that personal Jesus Christ, by and in whom alone the Eternal Father has ever been manifested, and his will and wisdom revealed, to the sons of men.

"3. That the one God, thus appearing in his son and spirit, did actually speak all the laws and all the predictions contained in the Bible, and virtually perform all the things ascribed to him in the historical parts of the Old and New Testaments."

From this extract it appears, that with them Jesus Christ is termed the "REFRACTED IMAGE OF GOD," and the Holy Spirit the "REFLECTED IMAGE OF GOD." These ideas, and the phraseology in which they are expressed, are, perhaps, more novel than scriptural.

Respecting church discipline, it must be observed, that the reverend founder of this party, and a considerable number of his adherents, are strenuous advocates for the necessity of abstaining from animal food, and all kinds of fermented liquors;—and this abstinence is become the test of admission to the Holy Supper, as administered among them, a ticket being given to such as conform to this point of discipline;—these circumstances have caused the epithet of antiflesh-eaters to be applied to them.

To support this system, they endeavour to explain those passages of scripture which relate to the sacrifices and burnt offerings of old, as not importing that real animals were slain, but that the skins of animals were made use of to contain dried or preserved fruits and vegetables; as well as the juice or blood of the grape—hence, they think that they have the authority of scripture on their side, and it is not our province to dispute it with them; it is for us to be candid and faithful in the accounts we give of the various religious principles professed by different denominations—as, however, a little poetical argument appeared in some of the Manchester newspapers, we shall copy it for the information and entertainment of our readers. The first is ascribed to the pen of their leader, the Rev. W. C. and with some slight alterations, has been occasionally sung as a hymn.

HUMANITY AND RELIGION PLEADING AGAINST FLESH EATING.

'EATERS OF FLESH!' could you deary
Our food and sacred laws,
Did you behold the lamblin die,
And feel yourselves the cause?

Lo, there it struggles! hear it moan,
As stretch'd beneath the knife;
Its eye would melt a heart of stone!
How meek it begs its life!

Had God for man its flesh design'd;
Matur'd by death, the brute
Lifeless to us had been consign'd,
As is the ripen'd fruit.

Hold, daring man! thy hand restrain—
God is the life in all:

To smite at God, when flesh is slain!—
Can crime like this, be small? W. C.

See Proverbs xxiii. 20.

These verses produced the following reply, which is said to have been written by Mr. F. M. Hodson.

Mr. EDITOR—Having read in your paper of the 17th, a few verses in defence of the old doctrine against eating animal food, your insertion of the following in reply thereto, will oblige your Constant Reader, IGNORAMUS.

RELIGION NOT SHACKLED WITH MEATS AND DRINKS.

"Hear and understand, NOT that which goeth INTO the mouth, defileth a man."—JESUS.

"EATERS OF HERBS?"—now be it known,
Whatever plea you put on,
Turnips and greens are good alone,
But better far with mutton.

Eater of cabbage—"Kill and eat!"
Ate words once said to Peter;

Acts 10, 15

For thee, around, the flocks do bleat,
Thou may'st partake—Herb-cater.

Their flesh, if God did not approve
That we as food should eat,
Why say “all things that live and move
“To you shall be for meat?”*

Why was the “fatted Calf” once slain
To feed the joyous throng, †
When the lost son return'd again!
Would Jesus lead us wrong?

Why feed with barley-loaves (tho' few)
“And fish much as they would,” ‡
If barley-loaves and fishes too
Were not both proper food.

Who told thee, “that had God design'd
“Their flesh should be our food,”
“Lifeless to us they'd been consign'd
And thus been render'd good?”

“Hold, daring man!” thy pen restrain—
And hear thy God declare,
“The beast that dieth is unclean,”
“Ye shall from it forbear!” §

* Gen. 9. 3. † Luke 15. 23. ‡ John 6. 11. § Levit. 17. 15. ¶ Gen. 16. 9.

O Man! vain Reason's light how dim!
“As God's the life in all;”
Upon your plan, we “smite at him,”
When cows or cowslips fall.

Did Abraham, when with raised hand
“The beasts and birds he slew,”
Smiting—oppose divine command ¶
“Or covenant renew?”

Strange to invert, while on the road,
The order of our life!
He rather “smites against his God,”
Who feeds domestic strife.

The necessity and salutary effects of temperance must be universally acknowledged; and perhaps, it were well if those whose habits of life are given to excess, would adopt (at least for a time) this discipline; especially if they cannot so far refrain as to “prune what is superfluous”—but it is much lamented by many, that an attempt should at all be made to shackle religion with “what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed,” and we are sorry to learn, that rigorously enforcing this system of abstinence, has been the unhappy cause of much family discord—the writer of the reply seems to allude to this in his last stanza.

KILHAMITES; THE METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, OR NEW ITINERANCY.

MR. WESLEY professed a strong attachment to the Church of England, and exhorted the societies under his care to attend her service, and receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper from the regular clergy. But in the latter part of his life, he thought proper to assume the episcopal office, so as to consecrate some to the office of bishops and ordain several priests for America and Scotland; but as one or two of these his bishops have never left England, since their appointment to the office, some think that he intended a regular ordination should take place, when the state of the connection might render it necessary. During his life, some of the societies petitioned to have preaching in their own chapels in church hours, and the Lord's Supper administered by the travelling preachers. This request, however, he generally refused, and where it could be conveniently done, sent some of the clergymen who officiated at the New Chapel London, to perform these solemn offices.

The same request was renewed soon after his death by many of the societies, when they had the mortification to find that this question was decided by lot, and not by the use of reason and serious discussion; which, together with some other real or imaginary grounds of offence, soon brought on a division and separation.

The grounds of this separation, (which took place in 1797) the Methodist New Connexion, declare to be church government and discipline, and not doctrines, as affirmed by some of their opponents. They object to the old Methodists, for having formed a hierarchy or priestly corporation; and say, that in so doing, they have robbed the people of those privileges, that, as members of a Christian church, they are entitled to by reason and scripture. The New Connexion have, therefore, attempted to establish every part of their church government on popular principles, and profess to have united, as much as possible, the ministers and the people in every department of it. This is quite contrary, say they, to the original government of the Methodists, which, in the most important cases, is confined only to the ministers, as appears by considering their conference or yearly meeting; for of this meeting, no person, who is not a travelling preacher, has ever been suffered to enter as a member.—And indeed, this is the point to which the preachers have always stedfastly adhered with the utmost firmness and resolution, and on which the division at present is said entirely to rest. They are also upbraided by the members of the New Connexion, for having abused the power which they have assumed. The New Methodists have formally protested against most of these abuses, which are enumerated in various publications, and particularly in the Preface to the life of the late Mr. Alexander Kilham, who took so active a part in the separation, that he is considered by many, as the head and founder of the New Connexion; and its members are sometimes called Kilhamites from him.

Though these are the points on which the division seems principally to have rested, yet there are several other things that have contributed to it. It is frequently easy to foresee, and to calculate the future changes in society, that the lapse of time will produce; and in no instance is this observation better warranted than in this division, which most persons have long expected. The attachment of the old Methodists to the established church, which originated in Mr. Wesley, and was much cherished by him and many of the preachers, and also the dislike to the church, in many others of the preachers and of the societies, were never failing subjects of contention. As all parties are distinguished in their contests by some badge or discriminating circumstance, so here the receiving or not receiving the Lord's Supper, in the established church, was long considered as the criterion of Methodistical zeal or disaffection. Thus, the rupture that had been long foreseen by intelligent persons, and for which the minds of the Methodists had been undesignedly prepared, became inevitable when Mr. Wesley's influence no longer interfered.

The New Methodists profess to proceed upon liberal, open, and ingenuous principles, in the construction of their plan of church government; and their ultimate decision in all disputed matters, is in their popular annual assembly, chosen by certain rules, from among the preachers and societies. To them it appears agreeable, both to reason and the customs of the primitive church, that the people should have a voice in the temporal concerns of the societies, should vote in the election of church officers, and should give their suffrages in spiritual concerns. This subject, when discussed in the conference held at Leeds, in 1797, produced a variety of arguments on both sides of the question; and on its being given against them, the dissentients proposed a plan for a New Itinerancy, and formed themselves into a meeting in order to carry it into immediate; Mr. William Thom being chosen president, and Mr. Alexander Kilham secretary. A form of church government, suited to an itinerant ministry, drawn up at the request of the meeting by these two brethren, was soon printed, under the title of "Outlines of a Constitution proposed for the Examination, Amendment, and Acceptance, of the Members of the Methodist New Itinerancy," which, with a few alterations, was accepted by the conference of preachers and delegates.

The preachers and people are here incorporated in all meetings for business, not by temporary concession, but by the essential principles of their constitution; for the private members chuse the class leaders, the leader's meeting nominates the stewards, and the society confirms or rejects the nomination. The quarterly meetings are composed of the general stewards and representatives chosen by the different societies of the circuits; and the fourth quarterly meeting of the year, appoints the preacher and delegate of every circuit that shall attend the general conference.

Further information respecting their principles and discipline, may be found in a pamphlet, entitled, "General Rules of the United Societies of Methodists in the New Connexion." Their professions are at least plausible and liberal; but as the sect has yet been of but a few years continuance, little can be said of it at present; and it becomes matter of curious conjecture and speculation, how far its leading members, should they become firmly established in power and influence, will act agreeably to their present liberal professions.

In the year 1806, the New Methodists had 18 circuits, upwards of 30 preachers, and about 5918 members in their connexion. The names of the circuits then were,—Newcastle, Alnwick, Leeds, Huddersfield, Halifax, Manchester, Ashton, Hantley, Liverpool, Chester, Wigan, Blackburn, Nottingham, Leicester, Hull, Sheffield, London and Lisburn.

ACCOUNT OF THE BEREANS.

BEREANS, in modern church history, are a sect of Protestant Dissenters from the church of Scotland, who take this title, not from choice but necessity, as they foresaw, that if they did not distinguish themselves by some name, they would be distinguished by others, by applying to them the name of the founder of the sect. On this account, Mr. Barclay, whose modesty was such, that he did not wish his friends to be called by his name, thought, with them, the name Bereans as expressive and suited to the Christian character as any other, seeing the believers of the gospel at Berea were highly commended for their Christian conduct, in daily searching the scriptures, which is the duty and interest of all believers of the gospel.

The Bereans first assembled as a separate body of Christians in the city of Edinburgh, in autumn 1773, and soon after in the parish of Fettercairn.

The opponents of the Berean doctrines allege, that this new system of faith would never have been heard of, had not Mr. Barclay, the founder of it, been disappointed of a settlement in the church of Scotland. A respectable clergyman of the Established Church has even hinted something to this purpose, in Sir John Sinclair's "Statistical Account," (vol. ix. p. 599.) But the Bereans, in answer to this charge, appeal not only to Mr. Barclay's doctrine uniformly preached in the church of Fettercairn, and many other places in that neighbourhood, for fourteen years before that benefice became vacant; but likewise to two different treatises, containing the same doctrines, published by him ten or twelve years before that period. They admit, indeed, that previous to May 1773, when the General Assembly, by sustaining the king's presentation in favour of Mr. Foote, excluded Mr. Barclay from succeeding to the church of Fettercairn (notwithstanding the almost unanimous desire of the parishioners) the Bereans had not left the established church, or attempted to erect themselves into a distinct society; but they add, that this was by no means necessary on their part, until, by the Assembly's decision, they were in danger of being not only deprived of his instructions, but of being scattered as sheep without a shepherd. And they add, that it was Mr. Barclay's open and public avowal, both from the pulpit and the press, of those peculiar sentiments which now distinguish the Bereans, that was the first and principal, if not the only cause, of the opposition set on foot against his settlement at Fettercairn.— Since that time the sect of the Bereans have found converts in all the principal towns in Scotland, in London, and many other places in England, as well as in different states of America, &c.

The Bereans agree with the great majority of Christians, both Protestants and Catholics, respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, which they hold as a fundamental article of the Christian faith; and they also agree in a great measure with the professed principles of both our established churches, respecting predestination and election, though they allege that these doctrines are not consistently taught in either church. But they differ from the majority of all sects of Christians in various other important particulars, such as,—

First, Respecting our knowledge of the Deity.— Upon this subject they say, that the majority of professed Christians stumble at the very threshold of revelation; and, by admitting the doctrine of natural religion, natural conscience, natural notions, &c. not founded upon revelation, or derived from it by tradition, they give up the cause of Christianity at once to the infidels; who may justly argue, as Mr. Paine in fact does, in his Age of Reason, with all others of his infidel cast, that "there is no occasion for any revelation, or word of God, if man can discover his nature and perfections from his works alone."— But this, the Bereans argue, with other professors of Christianity, is beyond the natural powers of human reason, and therefore our knowledge of God is from revelation alone; and that, without revelation, man would never have entertained an idea of his existence.

Second, With regard to faith in Christ, and assurance of salvation through his merits, they differ from almost all other sects whatsoever. These they reckon inseparable, or rather the same, because (they argue) God hath expressly declared, "he that believeth shall be saved;" and therefore, it is not only absurd, but impious, and in a manner calling God a liar, for a man to say, "I believe the gospel, but have doubts nevertheless of my own salvation." With regard to the various distinctions and definitions that have been given of different kinds of faith, they argue, that "there is nothing incomprehensible or obscure in the meaning of this word as used in scripture; but that, as faith, when applied to human testimony, signifies neither more nor less than the mere simple belief of that testimony as true, upon the authority of the testifier; so when applied to the testimony of God, it signifies precisely the belief of his testimony, and resting upon his veracity alone, without any kind of collateral support from concurrence of any other evidence or testimony whatever." And they insist, that as this faith is the gift of God alone, so the person to whom it is given, is as conscious of possessing it, as the being to whom God gives life, is of being alive; and therefore he entertains no doubts, either of his faith, or his consequent salvation through the merits of Christ, who died, and rose again for that purpose. In a word, they argue, that the gospel would not be what it is held forth to be, "glad tidings of great joy," if it did not bring full personal assurance of eternal salvation to the believer; which assurance, they insist, "is the present infallible privilege and portion of every individual believer of the gospel."—These definitions of faith, and its inseparable concomitant assurance, they prove by a great variety of scripture evidence, which our limits will not allow us to quote.

Third, Consistently with the above definition of faith, they say, that the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has alarmed and perplexed so many in all ages, is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, that "it shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor that which is to come," means only, that a person dying in infidelity would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses, (the then present dispensation, kingdom, or government of God), nor under the gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Mosaic, was a kind of future world, or kingdom to come.

Fourth, The Bereans interpret a great part of the Old Testament prophecies, and in particular the whole of the Psalms, excepting such as are merely historical or laudatory, to be typical or prophetic of Jesus Christ, his sufferings, atonement, mediation and kingdom; and they esteem it a gross perversion of these psalms and prophecies to apply them to the experiences of private Christians, in the manner commonly done. In proof of this, they not only urge the words of the apostle, that "no scripture prophecy is of any private interpretation," but they insist, that the whole of the quotations from the ancient prophecies in the New Testament, and particularly those from the Psalms, are expressly applied to Christ. In this opinion, many other classes of Protestants agree with them.

Fifth, Of the absolute all-superintending sovereignty of the Almighty, the Bereans entertain the highest ideas, as well as of the uninterrupted exertion thereof over all his works, in heaven, earth, and hell, however unsearchable by his creatures. A God without election (they argue) or choice in all his works, is "a God without existence,—a mere idol,—a nonentity. And to deny God's election, purpose and express will, in all his works, is to make him inferior to ourselves."

For farther particulars respecting the Berean doctrines, we must refer the reader to the works of Messrs. Barclay, Nicol, and Brooksbank. And to these we have authority to add a work now preparing for the press (by Mr. James Donaldson, successor to the late Mr. Barclay in the Berean church at Edinburgh), wherein the leading points of difference betwixt the Bereans and other professing bodies around them, will be handled in the form of a dialogue, under the title of "Objector and Vindicator."

Having thus given a concise view of the origin and distinguishing doctrines of Bereanism, it only remains to mention a few particulars relative to the worship and practice of the Bereans, as a Christian society.

Infant baptism they consider as a divine ordinance, instituted in the room of circumcision; and they think it absurd to suppose, that infants, who all agree are admissible to the kingdom of God in heaven, should nevertheless be denied the initiating sign of that high privilege on earth. They commemorate the Lord's Supper in general once a month; but as the words of the institution fix no particular period, they sometimes celebrate it oftener, and sometimes at more distant periods, as may suit their general convenience. But they cannot agree with those who allege, that they cannot observe the Sabbath without shewing forth the Lord's death. In observing this ordinance, they follow the primitive apostolic plan, without any previous days of fasting or preparation, as they apprehend, that such human institutions only tend to make an idol of the ordinance, and to lead people to entertain erroneous ideas of its superior solemnity and importance. They discard also in this ordinance, as unscriptural, the popish, episcopal, and Presbyterian practice of consecrating the elements, or setting them apart from a common to a holy use; as also setting apart the water in baptism from a common to a holy use.—They say that no change is possible (more than needful), by any form of words that men can use.—The last and fullest account of that ordinance, 1 Cor. chap. xi. simply says, "And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat, &c." They insist, that the word thanks is incompatible with any notion of consecration in use among men; that the Lord, acting the part of the Father's servant, did not address the bread nor the cup, but his heavenly Father, with thankfulness; leaving thus an example to all his children, commemorating this ordinance, to give thanks to their God and Father, for his love shown in this, till their Lord come.

Bereans also hold in contempt the word sacrament, as commonly applied to this ordinance and baptism. The term, as expressed by the Latins, sacramentum, applies to the taking of an oath, which is not intended in showing forth the Lord's death, more than in the ordinance of prayer and praise.—All ordinances appointed by God, as proper for the notice of his children, are works of faith, and labours of love, while an oath is to put an end to strife. Equal and universal holiness in all manner of conversation, they recommend at all times as well as at the Lord's table. They meet every Lord's day for the purpose of preaching, prayer, praise, and exhortation to love and good works.

With regard to admission of members, their method is very simple.—When any person, after hearing the Berean doctrines, professes his belief and assurance of the truths of the gospel, and desires to be admitted into their communion, he is cheerfully received, upon his profession before the church, whatever may have been his former manner of life; because they know that all men, before they believe the gospel, are dead in trespasses and sins. Therefore they disclaim the practice of those who, making inquiry into the former character of those who apply for admission into their communion, admit or reject, according to the nature of that report. This they say is the very reverse of the conduct of the apostles, who preached the gospel to the vilest of men; and the moment such professed the truth of the gospel, to such they gave the right hand of fellowship, without farther ceremony. But if such an one should afterward draw back in his good profession, or discover a practice foreign to the precepts of the gospel, in that case he is first to be admonished, and if that has not the desired effect, he is to be withdrawn from, as a disorderly walker, and left to himself.

They do not think, as some professors do, that they have any power or authority from scripture to deliver such backslider to Satan; that power they consider as the exclusive right of the apostles, to whom it was said, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven," &c. Neither do they think themselves authorised, as a Christian church, to inquire into each others political opinions, any more than to examine into each others notions of philosophy. They both recommend and practise, as Christian duties, subjection to lawful authority; but they do not think that a man, by becoming a Christian, or joining their society, is under any obligation, by the rules of the gospel, to renounce his rights of private judgment upon matters of public or private importance.

Upon all such subjects, they allow each other to think and act as each may see it his duty. They require nothing more of their members, than an uniform and steady profession of the apostolic faith, and a suitable walk and conversation.

With regard to feet-washing, and the like practices, which some other sects of Christians consider as duties, the Bereans are of opinion, that they are by no means obligatory. They argue, that the example given by our Saviour of washing the feet of his disciples, was not an institution of an ordinance, but merely a familiar instance, taken from the custom of the country, and adopted by our Lord on that occasion, to teach his followers, that they ought, at all times, to be ready to perform even the meanest offices of kindness to each other.

ACCOUNT OF ATHEISM AND ATHEISTS.

THE word Atheist is of Greek original, and is compounded of two terms signifying without God. In the strict and proper sense of the word it is characteristic of those who do not believe in the existence of a God, or who own no being superior to nature. The same religionists, or rather anti-religionists, have been known also by the name of Infidels, yet the word Infidel is not confined to Atheists only, but is now commonly used to distinguish a more numerous sect, and is become almost synonymous with Deist. Atheism has ever been so unacceptable to mankind in general, that its abettors have frequently assumed a name more mild than that of Atheists. Thus, about the beginning of the last century, they, as well as the Deists, styled themselves Freethinkers, and of late they have adopted the name of Illuminati, or of Philosophers.

He who verily disbelieves the existence of a God, as an infinite, intelligent, and moral agent, is a direct or speculative Atheist: he who endeavours to instil atheistical principles into others, though they may not be his own principles; or rather, he who confesses a Deity and providence in words, but denies them in his life and actions, is a practical Atheist.

Although, in some things, both these are closely united, yet in many things they differ, and, in some respects, they are quite the reverse. Thus, the speculative Atheist confesses a Deity for the most part at least, in his life and actions, but denies him in his words; on the contrary, the practical Atheist confesses a Deity in his words, but denies him in his life and actions. The former is much better than his principles, the latter much worse; for the one does much good, which his principles do not enjoin, while the other does a great deal of evil, which his principles do not allow. The former is a practical Atheist in principle, the latter a speculative Atheist in practice. The error of the former seems to have its seat in the head, that of the latter in the heart; for the one generally becomes Atheist from affecting an appeal to his understanding, the other as frequently from following the dictates of his will.

Last, the former, if, in truth there ever have been any in the world, has been peculiar to some ages, yet to none more than to the present; the latter hath been too common in most ages of the world.

As far as conduct is concerned, they differ only in this, that the conduct of the practical Atheist is attended with greater moral depravity, as it implies that a man acts contrary to the conviction of his own understanding. "There is but one thing in the world worse than a speculative Atheist," says Picus, earl of Mirandola, "and that is a practical Atheist."

When and where Atheism first took its rise, we do not pretend to say. That it existed, in some sense, before the flood, may be suspected, both from what we read in scripture, and from heathen tradition; nor is it very unreasonable to suppose, that the deluge was partly intended to evince to the world a heavenly power as Lord of the universe, and superior to the visible system of nature. This was at least a happy consequence of that fatal catastrophe; for, as Dean Sherlock observes, "The universal deluge, and the confusion of languages, had so abundantly convinced mankind of a Divine Power, and Providence, that there was no such creature as an Atheist, till their ridiculous idolatries had tempted some men of wit and thought, rather to own no God, than such as the heathens worshipped."

It is a good argument ad hominem, against the Atheists, that Lucretius himself, the poet of Atheism, pretends to tell us when Atheism began, and who he was who first dared to despise and deny the being of a God. This, he says, was his hero and master, Epicurus. Yet this is not true in fact.—What Plato tells a young philosopher of his day, has much more the appearance of truth.—"Not thou alone," says he, "nor thy friends, have been the first who have entertained this (atheistical) sentiment of God, but from time immemorial there have been more or fewer who have laboured under this disease."

Atheistical principles were long nourished and cherished in Greece, and especially among the atomical, peripatetic, and sceptical philosophers; and hence it is that some have ascribed the origin of Atheism to the philosophy of Greece; and if they mean that species of refined Atheism, which contrives any impious scheme of principles, by which it attempts to account for the origin and government of the world, without a Divine Being, they are certainly in the right. For, notwithstanding there might have been in former ages, and in other countries, some persons irreligious in principle as well as in practice, yet we know of none who, forming a philosophical scheme of impiety, and pretending to defend their hypotheses by principles of reason, grew up to a sect and erected colleges of atheistical learning, till the arrogant and enterprising geniuses of Greece undertook that detestable province.—Carrying their presumptuous and ungoverned speculations into the very essence of the divinity, and straining their eager sight to penetrate the pavilion of darkness which encircles the eternal throne, at first they doubted, and at length denied, the existence of a First Cause independent of nature, and of a Providence that superintends its laws, and governs the concerns of mankind.

These principles, together with the other improvements of Greece, were translated to Rome; and, excepting in Italy, we hear but little of Atheism for many ages after the Christian era. At Rome an inflexible Atheist occasionally started up, for popes John 24th and Alexander 6th, are both said to have been accused of the crime.

Archbishop Tillotson, in his sermon on Proverbs xiv. 34, says, "For some ages before the Reformation, Atheism was confined to Italy, and had its chief residence at Rome. All the mention that is made of it in the history of those times, the papists themselves give us, in the lives of their own popes and cardinals, excepting two or three small philosophers that were retainers to their court. So that this atheistical humour amongst Christians was the spawn of the gross superstition and corrupt manners of the Romish church and court. And, indeed, nothing is more natural than for extremes in religion to beget one another, like the vibrations of a pendulum, which, the more violently you swing it one way, the farther it will return the other. But, in this last age, Atheism has travelled over the Alps, and infected France, and now of late it hath crossed the sea, and invaded our nation, and hath prevailed to amasement."

But to this able writer, in conjunction with many other clergy of the establishment and others, we owe its suppression amongst us; for they pressed it down with a weight of sound argument, from which it has never been able here, and we trust never will, be able in this nation, to raise itself. Indeed "this country, thank God, is not a soil fitted for so rank a weed; where scarce one solitary Atheist has appeared, like a comet, once in a century, and, after appalling and terrifying the inhabitants with a tremendous but momentary blaze, has sunk at once into obscurity and oblivion."

It is said, that, in the year 1623, there were in Paris alone, 50,000 Atheists; but had this been the case, their principles would no doubt have unchristianised France, long before the time they really did so. Dr. Priestley observes, that when he visited France, in 1774, "all her philosophers and men of letters were absolute infidels; and that he was represented by one of them, in a mixed strain of censure and compliment, as the only man of talent he had met, who had any faith in the scriptures.—Nay, Voltaire himself, who was then living, was considered by them as a weak-minded man; because, though an unbeliever in Revelation, he believed in a God."

That nation has tried of late to govern mankind without any religion at all; to make reason the only object of worship, and philosophy the only guide of life. But the experiment has only proved, what common sense might have taught them, that to establish Atheism in any nation, is a vain attempt; for mankind in general will have some religion, whether true or false.

But modern Atheism is not confined to ei-devant most Christian ground; we have reason to apprehend that the abettors of Atheism and irreligion were never more numerous, nor more widely scattered over Europe, than of late years, if not at this present day, when our religion suffers with its author, between two thieves, Atheism and Deism, and it is hard to say which is the greater enemy of the two.

Atheism, in its primary sense, is a whole-length picture of every heresy in the world; if it does not comprehend, at least, it goes beyond them all, for it professes to acknowledge no religion, true or false.

As a religious sect, the very idea of Atheism, so taken, involves a paradox, if not an absurdity; for religion implies every thing that Atheism denies.—It is as impossible to conceive of such a sect, as it is difficult to believe that there ever have been in the world any speculative Atheists from real principle and theory. Most people deny that nature could bring forth such an unnatural, monstrous production. They will allow those that are accounted such, to be only "Atheists in ostent." "Speculative Atheism," says Dr. Bentley, "does only subsist in our speculation; whereas really human nature cannot be guilty of the crime."

Like the members of most other sects, Atheists, or pretenders to Atheism, are divided among themselves: so far are they from holding the same sentiments, that their systems of opinion, if their hypotheses may be so called, are multifiform and inconsistent, as visionary and irrational.

Some, with Protagoras and the sceptics, are satisfied with doubting and living in suspense as to the grand article of human belief, the existence of a God. Among others, who more confidently deny his existence, or who would be thought to do so, some, with Mr. Hume, have, at the same time, denied a First Cause; of those who allow a First Cause, some have, however, denied it to be an intelligent agent, supposing it to act by necessity, or, more properly speaking, a being that never acts, but is acted upon. Others who, with Epicurus, allowing the First Cause to be an intelligent agent, may be said to admit a God, notwithstanding deny his providence, and, of course, his moral attributes.—Some again, who allow a general providence, have rejected an universal or particular providence; confining it, at their pleasure, to the heavens, to the human race, or to the genera of beings; thus excluding, by their respective hypotheses, with Aristotle, this earth,—with Pythagoras, every irrational being; or, with the Stoics and others, all species and individuals. Lastly, others who may be said to be orthodox, respecting their belief of God's providence, have, however, unworthy notions of his attributes, and such as, by remote, and often by immediate, consequence, must destroy his very existence.

Thus, many have promoted the cause of Atheism in the world, without intending it, by their framing to themselves such notions concerning God, as have no foundation, either in his nature, or in his word.

With respect to this world and its origin, the two leading false hypotheses that have prevailed, are—that of Ocellus Lucanus, adopted and improved by Aristotle, that it was eternal; and that of Epicurus, that it was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. But, should we wait till they prove either of these hypotheses, by evident and demonstrative reasons, the world may have an end before Epicurus and his followers prove their atoms could have given it a beginning; and we may find it eternal, a parte post, before Aristotle and his followers can prove it was so, a parte ante.

The principal tenets of the Freethinkers, may be seen thrown together in the 1st volume of the Connaisseur, under the contradictory title of "The Unbeliever's Creed."

"That the soul is material and mortal, Christianity an imposture, the scripture a forgery, the worship of God superstition, hell a fable, and heaven a dream, our life without providence, and our death without hope, like that of asses and dogs,—are part of the glorious gospel of Atheists.”

Several moderns have believed in the eternity of the world; among others, Sir W. Temple, according to Bishop Burnet, and Dr. G. H. Toulmin, author of a late work, entitled, “The Antiquity and Duration of the World.” The same doctrine is held by many disciples of Spinoza, in France, as Mr. Volney, and Mr. Dupuis; and perhaps by their brethren of the London Corresponding Society, who tell us, “Nature is our God, and the Universe our Bible.”—See Anti-Jac. Review, vol. i. p. 231.

As to their worship we can say nothing, till we receive information from the Atheists themselves; or till we have seen a work published about the beginning of the last century, by Mr. John Toland, entitled, “A Form of Divine Service to the infinite and eternal Universe.”

Lactetius and Spinoza have defended Atheism.—The latter wrote in the 17th century, and believed that the universe is God. As Toland, Woolston and Hume, used generally to pretend that they were friends to Christianity, while they were secretly aiming to overthrow it; so most of the abettors of Atheism, unwilling openly to avow their principles, have used arts equally disingenuous, to support their feeble cause.

Half our danger does not arise from tracts professedly penned in favour of Atheism and irreligion, but from writings of other kinds, carrying nothing hostile in their appearance. The unsuspecting reader, who sat down to inform or amuse himself with a piece of natural or civil history, biography, a poem, a tale, or a fable, if he have not his wits about him, finds his reverence for the doctrines of religion, and those who teach them, filched from him; rises, to his great surprise, half an infidel; and is not sure whether he has a soul, a Saviour, or a God.

The dangerous tendency of several writings, some of which were, perhaps, but little suspected of Atheism, has been shewn by Mr. Witherspoon, an able writer of the last century, and the principles contained in them briefly scanned up, in what he calls “The Athenian Creed.”

It is well known that Bayle’s Dictionary contains, under the mask of religion and science, a whole mass of atheistical principles; and since the above was written, the same spawn of irreligion has been industriously scattered all over the world, and especially on the continent of Europe, in the wretched productions of modern philosophers, of various shapes and sizes, under the name of essays, letters, novels, histories, &c. from the bulky quarto to the meagre pamphlet.

An infallible antidote against atheistical tenets may be found in the sermons preached at Boyle’s lecture, collected in three volumes folio,—Bishop Wilkins’s Principles and Duties of Natural Religion,—Dr. Cadworth’s Intellectual System,—Abernethy on the Divine Attributes,—Fenelon and Bate on the existence of a God,—More’s Antidote against Atheism,—Knight’s Being and Attributes of God, demonstrated, &c.

All the ablest laymen, and most profound philosophers of our nation, have been the firmest believers in the existence and superintendance of a Deity. Indeed, as Lord Bacon has well remarked in his Essays, “A little philosophy inclineth man’s mind to Atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men’s minds about to religion; for, while the mind of man looketh upon second causes scattered, it may rest in them and go no farther; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederated and linked together, it must needs fly to Providence and Deity.”

The being of a God may be proved, 1st, From the marks of design, and from the order and beauty visible in the world; for, as Cato very justly says,—“And that he is, all nature cries aloud.” 2dly, Confirmed by universal consent—See Bishop Stillingfleet’s Origines Sacrae. 3dly, Proved scientifically from the relation of cause and effect. 4thly, From internal consciousness. 5thly, From the necessity of a final as well as efficient cause. And the arguments from these heads may be confirmed from the history of the creation, and from the prophecies and miracles of scripture.

The arguments for the being of a God are distributed into two kinds: 1st, Arguments a priori, or those taken from the necessity of the divine existence. 2d, Arguments a posteriori, or those taken from the works of nature.

Most people agree with Lord Chesterfield in believing, that the divine existence cannot be proved a priori, and that it cannot be doubted a posteriori. On the former species of proof, however, Dr. S. Clarke’s Essay on the Being and Attributes of God, has been generally considered a master-piece; and of the latter, the following passage from Dr. Balguy is a beautiful illustration:

“Of all the false doctrines and foolish opinions which ever infested the mind of man, nothing can possibly equal that of Atheism, which is such a monstrous contradiction to all evidence, to all the powers of understanding, and the dictates of common sense, that it may be well questioned, whether any man can really fall into it, by a deliberate use of his judgment.

“All nature so clearly points out, and so loudly proclaims a Creator of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, that whoever hears not its voice, and sees not his proofs, may well be thought wilfully deaf, and obstinately blind.

"If it be evident, self-evident to every man of thought, that there can be no effect without a cause, what shall we say of that manifold combination of effects, that series of operations, that system of wonders, which fill the universe, which present themselves to all our perceptions, and strike our minds and our senses on every side! Every faculty, every object of every faculty, demonstrates a Deity. The meanest insect we can see, the minutest and most contemptible weed we can tread upon, is really sufficient to confound Atheism, and baffle all its pretensions. How much more that astonishing variety and multiplicity of God's works with which we are continually surrounded! Let any man survey the face of the earth, or lift up his eyes to the firmament; let him consider the nature and instincts of brute animals, and afterwards look into the operations of his own mind: will he presume to say or suppose, that all the objects he meets with are nothing more than the result of unaccountable accidents and blind chance? Can he possibly conceive that such wonderful order should spring out of confusion; or that such perfect beauty should be ever formed by the fortuitous operations of unconscious, unactive particles of matter? As well, nay better, and more easily, might he suppose that an earthquake might happen to build towns and cities; or the materials carried down by a flood fit themselves up without hands, into a regular fleet. For what are towns, cities, or fleets, in comparison of the vast and amazing fabric of the universe!

"In short, Atheism offers such violence to all our faculties, that it seems scarce credible it should ever really find any footing in the human understanding."

It must be owned on all hands, that the existence of a God is desirable and highly expedient; every argument to the contrary refutes itself, and evidently demonstrates what it is brought to deny. For, when it is said, as by Mr. Hobbes and his followers, that the notion of a God is not from nature, nor from revelation, but from policy and state craft, then it is owned to be for the good of society. When it is supposed that the world came into existence by chance, and is every moment liable to be destroyed by it, then is it dangerous to live in such a world. When it is alleged that the world is eternal, and that all things are by fatal necessity, then liberty and choice are infinitely better. When it is argued from supposed defects in the frame of nature, and in the government of the world, then it is better that the world had been made, and were governed by a perfectly wise and gracious Being.

But, indeed, the being of a God is so necessary, and withal, a truth so evident, that an Atheist, almost in any sense of the word, had been a creature unheard of in the world, at least in the civilized world, had he been guided solely by instinct and common sense, had not human reason, or rather the abuse of it, lowered some men to a level with the brute creation, from which we are more distinguished by our sense of religion, than by our reason.

The force of the argument from universal consent, will appear when thus stated, according to the method used by Aristotle in his Topics, in arguing from authority. That which seems true to some wise men, ought to appear a little probable; what most wise men believe, is yet further probable; that in which most men, both wise and unwise, do agree, is still more highly probable;—but what is received as truth by the general consent of all mankind, in all ages of the world, hath certainly the highest degree of evidence of this kind that it is possible for it to have.

In short, the arguments in proof of a Deity are so numerous, and at the same time so obvious to every thinking mind, that to waste time or paper in disputing with a downright Atheist, is making too great approaches towards that irrationality, which may be considered as one of the most striking characteristics of the sect.

As to number, and the countries where found, little can be said with certainty, unless perhaps by themselves. Atheists in general lurk in secret, their conscience and fears will seldom allow them to shew themselves: to be open and appear, is the property of truth, the daughter of the light and of the day. It may however be affirmed, that the abettors of Atheism and irreligion were never more numerous than they now are, or, than they have been of late. They have compassed sea and land to find one nation or whole people of brethren, and once thought they had really discovered one, and stood with open arms ready to give that polite people, the Hottentots, the fraternal embrace. But we have reason to believe, that, as has always been the case, they are more numerous in Europe, and particularly in France, Germany, and Italy, than any where else; and, if there is any thing criminal in their principles and conduct, those of Europe have, of all others, the greatest danger to fear. But, whatever may become of their persons, on their emigration, we cannot help believing, with the epigrammatist Owen, that their principles are confined to the four corners of this world alone:

"Descendat tristem licet Atheus in Orcum.

"Nullus in inferno est Atheus, antè fuit."

The more noted Atheists, since the Reformation, are, Machiavel, Spinoza, Hobbes, Blount, and Vanini. And to these we may add Hume and Voltaire, the Coriphæus of the sect, and the great nursing father of that swarm of them, which, in these last days, had well nigh eaten out the vitals of Christianity, and had they been encouraged, would have left unconsumed not even the skeleton of religion, or of any real virtue among men.

"The raison of Voltaire," says the great and good bishop Horne, "was to right reason what a monkey is to a man. And his religion, by which I mean his speculations about the Deity, (for he had no other), was, as near as we can discover, the same with that of the Atheist Vanini, whose principles he expressly defended."

This Lucilio Vanini was an Italian; and, notwithstanding it is said that he had proved to his judges, in a strong and moving manner, the existence of a Deity, from a straw which he had picked up at the bar before them, yet the parliament of Toulouse pronounced on him sentence of death, and he was accordingly burnt there for his atheistical tenets, A. D. 1619. He confessed that he was one of twelve who set out from Naples to spread their doctrines in all parts of Europe. Yet, after all, few will be inclined to defend his punishment, any more than his principles; for the man's eccentricities through life, as well as his ravings after he had heard his cruel fate, evidently shew that his sentence should have been confinement rather than death.

Even in this country, direct Atheism, if openly avowed, is a capital offence; for in an act of Parliament in 1661, c. 21, there is a clause to this purpose: "Like as his Majesty, with advice foresaid, finds, statutes and ordains, that whosoever shall deny God, or any of the persons of the blessed Trinity, and obstinately continue therein, shall be processed, and being found guilty, that they be punished with death." Yet, in open defiance of this act (for I am not aware that it is repealed), and with an unusual effrontery and assurance, we are told that a Mr. William Hammon of Liverpool, publicly declared himself to be an Atheist.—Thus, "Whereas some have doubted whether there ever was such a thing as a proper Atheist, to put them out of all manner of doubt, I do declare, that, upon my honour, I am one. Be it therefore remembered, that, in London, in the kingdom of England, in the year of our Lord, 1781, a man has publicly declared himself an Atheist."

The conduct of this man, too, creates a suspicion that the faculties of his mind were at that time not so perfectly sound as might be wished.

Cato Zwack declared himself a downright Atheist, and Dupont exclaimed, in the French Convention, "I am an Atheist!" but these are the mere ebullitions of that intellectual process which was then carrying on, and were said at a time when the observance of religious worship was punished, in France, as an offence against the laws.

The period of implicit reception, in that country, appears to be over; the period of implicit rejection has succeeded; and the period of just discrimination, it is hoped, will yet take place, however little ground we may have to conclude, from present appearances, that it is near at hand.

Meantime we close this article with the following supplication, which the church of England, (whose charity embraces all mankind), puts into the mouth of all her members; and we can readily believe, that every reader of this volume, who calls himself a Christian, whether churchman or dissenter, or of whatever denomination he be, will sincerely and fervently join us in it, and add his hearty amen:—

"O God, the Creator and Preserver of all mankind, we humbly beseech thee, for all sorts and conditions of men, that thou wouldst be pleased to make thy ways known unto them, thy saving health unto all nations.

"More especially, we pray for the good estate of the Catholic Church; that it may be so guided and governed by thy good spirit, that all who profess and call themselves Christians, may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life!" Amen.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS, a name derived from the Greek, signifying the love of God and man. We rank these with the enthusiasts of the day, though they were of a more dangerous cast.—They professed their principles in France, at the beginning of the revolution. They were properly Deists, had their places of worship, as they called them, and for a time attracted some notice in Europe. It was an effort to make Deism the religion of France, instead of Christianity, but they have dwindled into obscurity, and are known only by the common term of Deists.

ENTHUSIASTS.

IT was not our intention to say any thing concerning the religious enthusiasts of the day, because such cannot be acknowledged as belonging to any sect of the Christian religion, who asserts things inconsistent with those plain truths held forth in the gospel; had not a modern writer introduced the misguided followers of an ignorant, presumptuous woman to the notice of the public. It may however serve to caution the well-meaning Christians to avoid the senseless clamor of fanatics; and this is the only apology we can offer to the intelligent reader for intruding on his time and patience.

In all ages from the time of the prophets to the present day, in all ancient nations, and among the moderns, from Joan of Arc, to Joanna Southcott, some infatuated men and women, preferring their own proud dogmas to the plain scriptures, have pretended to divine communication. Not in the way which God appointed under the Mosaic dispensation, nor by living faith, as under the gospel; but they have impiously asserted that it is by a vocal and an externally audible conversation with the awful Majesty of Heaven. And notwithstanding this is sufficient of itself to procure them a residence in Bedlam, yet numbers of individuals have fallen, as it were, a sacrifice to the pride and vanity of these impostures.

If the intelligent reader will turn over the pages of ancient and modern history, he will find that, when nations were involved in war, witch-ridden enthusiasm, treading on reason and scripture, has always found advocates among the hordes of inferior society. These tinder-brained mortals, fired with the expectation of an easy life, high posts, and golden plunder, have hurled their anathemas at churches and states, at all sects and parties who have opposed them; and have consigned them to destruction with the impious blasphemy of, thus saith the Lord. In the times of the prophets, when people of this description made their appearance, so deeply was human nature sunk in the sink of its own vanity, that the prophet was commanded to say, Prophecy against the prophets of Israel, that prophesy, and say unto them that prophesy out of their own spirit, Thus saith the Lord God, woe unto the foolish prophets that follow their own spirits, and have seen nothing. They have seen lying divination, saying, the Lord saith, and the Lord hath not sent them.

In the time of the ancient Greeks and Romans, during the abomination of the Delphian and Sybilian oracles; and among the Mahometans, numbers have pretended to be inspired by the oracular gods, and by the spirit of Mahomet. Even in the Pagan nations there are those famous above others, for their intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the wooden god they worship. More modern times have also furnished us with serious proofs of the weakness, folly, and blasphemy of this description of men among the Christian nations: a short account of them may not be unsatisfactory to the reader.

THOMAS OF MUNSTER,

In 1522, boasted that he had immediate communication with God, that by his means the empires and principalities of this world were to be destroyed; that the sword of Gideon was put into his hands, to be employed against all tyrants, and for the restoration of the kingdom of Christ! He excited the people to rebellion, and fought the landgrave; five thousand were slain. The hypocrite was taken and put to death.

JOHN MATTHIAS,

In the year 1532, a baker at Haerlem, professed himself to be "Enoch the second high priest of God, raised a rebellion, published edicts, and commanded every man to bring his gold and silver into the common stock." He was put to death by the besieging army.

JOHN OF LEYDEN,

In the year 1534, by these pretensions, raised a considerable army, who being besieged in the city of Munster, caused himself to be made king; some thousands were killed. He was taken and suffered a painful death. To these succeeded

HERMAN THE COBBLER,

Who declared himself to be a true prophet; and at last the son of God.

THEODORE,

Of Amsterdam, preached the doctrines of the Pre-Adamites, and ran naked with his followers through the city.

DAVID GEORGE,

In the year 1556, asserted that he was the true

Messiah, sent down from heaven to be the horn, redeemer, and builder of the tabernacle of Israel. The following particulars are taken from his writings. That the doctrines of Moses, the prophets, and Christ, were not sufficient for salvation, but his, doctrines only. That he was invested with authority to bind and loose, and that at the last day he should judge the tribes of Israel. That the scriptures of the Old Testament, that Christ and the apostles, referred to the coming of David George. We might introduce many more of these fanatics, who made their appearance in Germany, France, Holland, and different nations, but the blasphemies of David George seem to have outdone every other continental pretender to divine communication.

RICHARD BROTHERS

Pretended to divine communications, and although there appeared but little either in his writings or conversation to recommend him to support, yet he found an advocate in an Hon. Member of Parliament, who, both in the house and out of it, held him up to public notice. Brothers foretold the destruction of London, and that this sad catastrophe was to take place on a certain day. The period arrived, and proved the fallacy of his weak predictions. Other circumstances concurred to shew that he laboured under a mental derangement; eventually it was found expedient to confine him in a lunatic asylum, where he still remains.

Of Joanna Southcott and her communications, we have already given a description, leaving the reader to judge for himself, and to draw his own conclusions.

OF SCRIPTURE AND DIVINE REVELATION.

WHEN we say that the sacred scripture is the word of God, we do not mean that it was all spoken by him, or that it was written by him, or that all that is contained therein is the word of God; but a distinction is to be made between those precepts which inculcate justice, mercy, and holiness of life, and the historical parts which show the consequence of a life in opposition to those principles. The first are properly sacred, because they not only lead man to happiness even in this life, but give him an evidence of things not seen, in the life to come; and thus are called the word of God, as these perfections can only have their origin from the fountain of all goodness. The last, though some are the words of good men—wicked men—the speeches of Satan; or in other words, the personification of an evil spirit, and on this account cannot be called the word, or words of God; yet even these parts have a similar tendency, as they show the malice, pride, and blasphemy of the spirit of wickedness; and on the other hand, the beauty of that spirit of divine philanthropy, which throughout the whole Bible breathes nothing but peace on earth and good will towards men.

Deists think it inconsistent with the dignity of the Divine Being, that he should commission certain men to write his laws in a book; but it will appear, when duly considered, that there was an absolute necessity for such a proceeding. Suppose the precepts of morality which were first given by God to man, and handed to us by the Hebrew law-giver; suppose the blessings of religion, which are the bands of civil society, had never reached the shores of our happy land; what knowledge could we have boasted of more than “The untought Indian whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind.”

And, notwithstanding the Bible of nature had been before our eyes, not a single precept of morality should we have been able to have gathered from the pages of this book. What was the state of the ancient eastern nations 1600 years before Christ? rude, barbarous, and uncivilised; until Licurgus and Solon introduced their code of laws in the west, the greatest part of which were taken from the books of Moses; they then became a refined and scientific nation. From the Greeks, the Romans copied their precepts of morality, and from the Romans, the ancient people of Europe received the greatest part of their moral laws. From which it appears evident, that every precept of morality was taken from the Bible.

There is one argument to prove the authority of the word of God, which cannot be overturned by all the Deists in the world. If the Bible be not the word of God, it must have been written, or invented, either by good men, or wicked men; but if it can be proved that it was neither written nor invented, either by good men, or wicked men, it must be the word of God. That it was not written, or compiled by wicked men, will appear from its own evidence, for if it is to be judged, we must suffer that evidence to appear in its defence. Can any Deist be so weak as to suppose that wicked men who were in the love and practice of evil, would frame laws to punish their own vices in this world, and condemn themselves to everlasting punishment by declaring, the wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God? And again, Thou shalt not covet: this reaches the thoughts and desires of the heart. These restrictions and declarations are opposite to those things, which are contained in the religious books of the Mahometan and Pagan nations, which are the production of men, in which permission is given to indulge in sensuality. This, so far, is a certain proof of the divine origin of the Bible.

As evident it is that good men could not be the authors of the Bible. For had it been compiled by good men, the same good men neither could, nor would have given a lie to their profession by calling it the word of God, as it would only have been the word of men: consequently the Bible must be the word of God, inspired by him and thus given to man.

It must be allowed that God created the first of men; this being admitted, as it cannot be denied, we cannot doubt but he would give him a law, or knowledge to conduct himself in life. Now whether the divine author of our being condescended to speak it with an audible voice,—to write it on the heart, as is said in scripture, or whether he commissioned man by that spoken law, or from that writing on the heart, to write it in a book for the instruction of posterity, it amounts to the same; for the law, or word of God, first spoken, or written on the heart, and from thence written in a book, still remains to be the word of God, first given by him.

The possibility of such inspiration must necessarily be allowed, for certainly it was no more wonderful for God to inspire man to write his will in a book, than it was to inspire him, or enable him to receive by continual influx, a regular train of ideas.

The question has long been asked by Deists, How shall we know that the Bible is the word of God? first, by being convinced from the Bible, that the precepts therein contained are worthy of God; that the pure spirit which runs through the whole, inculcates nothing but love to God and charity to all mankind, viz. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. Deut. vi. 5. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Levit. xix. 18. Matt. vii. 12. Luke x. 27. These are the two great commandments which pervade every page of the Bible, and which on this account is truly called saered: these are sacred duties. For the recorded wickedness of the Jews, or of any other nation mentioned in the Bible, makes no part of the word of God, any farther than it shews that a departure from those precepts of true religion recorded therein, necessarily draws after it that train of fatal consequences, which is the result of that disobedience to the divine command, when the whole sum and substance of true religion contained in those two great propositions, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself; are not manifested in the life of man.

Secondly, from the accomplishment of those things foretold by the prophets, beginning with Moses, and which, to the astonishment of every impartial man, have been fulfilling from their times to the present day. Now as it must be evident, that none but God could open to man those scenes of futurity, which have been realising for the space of 3300 years, and as those precepts of morality, contained in the Bible could never be gathered from the book of nature, as man must have been totally ignorant in a savage state; and as it is clear that he could not have been reformed, or civilised without a knowledge of those precepts, they must have been given by the Creator: consequently, as far as demonstration can make truth appear, it is undeniable proof that the sacred scripture is the word of God.

CHRIST, THE TRUE MESSIAH.

IT is now 1800 years since the dispersion of the Jews took place, agreeably to the words of Moses, and during this great length of time, they have been expecting their Messiah to make his appearance. And notwithstanding that the whole of the prophecies which foretold the coming of the true

Messiah, have been fulfilled in the person of Christ, they contend that the Messiah is yet to come, and that he will restore them to their own land, with greater privileges than their progenitors enjoyed under the most prosperous reign of their kings.—They say, that he will subjugate all nations to them, and that Jerusalem is to be the grand centre of government, from whence they are to send forth laws to the whole world. Therefore in order to shew, so as not to admit of a refutation, that the Messiah is already come, and that the prophecies were accomplished in him, we shall lay before the reader a summary of those particulars, which it was foretold by the prophets, should take place at his coming; that those things were accomplished at the coming of Christ: and that all those circumstances and things which were to take place at the coming of the Messiah, and which took place at the coming of Christ, were of such a nature, that they never can take place again. This will, without the possibility of a contradiction, prove that he was the true Messiah.

In pursuing this important subject, I shall in a great measure confine myself to the objections of a modern writer among the Jews, viz. David Levi, who in his "Dissertations on the Prophecies," has collected the most formidable arguments from the writings of the Rabbies and learned Jews, ancient and modern, to prove that Christ was not the true Messiah.

In the 24th chapter of Numbers, from the 15th to the 24th verses, these writers say that Balaam delivered four prophecies. The first concerning the noble descent of the nation. But how this can be called a prophecy we know not. The second concerning their righteousness, but it was not possible to apply this at any period to the nation of the Jews, for the pages of their own history charge them with a character the very reverse to that of piety. Moses calls them "a wicked, and a stiff-necked generation," and the prophets are uniform in representing them as a most rebellious people, from the time that they came out of Egypt, to their captivity in Babylon. Amos 3. 1. to the end of the chapter. And the prophet in the 9th chapter foretels that they should ever continue in their rebellion against God, to the time of their utter dispersion over the whole world, verse 8th. Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth: so much for the righteousness of the ancient Jews, according to their own prophets.

In the 25d chapter, verse 22d, the Jews translate the beth which is prefixed to Jacob, by the word in, and the same to Israel, and read the passage thus, surely there is no enchantment in Jacob, neither is there any divination in Israel. But in the English translation, the beth is rendered by the word against, which is undoubtedly, with this construction, the true rendering; viz. Surely there is no enchantment (can succeed) AGAINST Jacob, neither is there any divination (can succeed) AGAINST Israel. For as Balaam and Balak were using enchantments against Jacob and Israel, it is absurd to translate the beth by in, and apply it to mean that there were no enchantments among them.

In the next prophecy they inform us, that Balaam foretels the coming of the Messiah, and the restoration of the Jewish nation to their own land; and as this was not to be accomplished till the latter days, he therewith consoles Balak by informing him, that he would not at present receive any injury from this people, for that the thorough subjection of Moab by them would not take place till the latter days. From this prophecy of Balaam, Levi and all the Jewish writers attempt to shew, that the subjugation of Moab and Edom was not accomplished at the coming of Christ, and that as it was to be accomplished at the coming of the true Messiah, Christ cannot be the true Messiah; but that it remains to be fulfilled when the true Messiah shall come. As proof that these kingdoms were to be subjected to the Jews, at the coming of their Messiah, their writers refer to Obadiah, verse 17th. and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions. But their Rabbies have altogether mistaken the application of these words of the prophet; for, from the first to the end of the 16th verse, is contained a prophecy against Edom, and the 15th and 16th verses positively say, that the heathen, and not Jacob, were to take possession of Edom. For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen, as thou hast done, so shall it be done unto thee, thy reward shall be upon thine own head. For as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually. The prophet, after he has declared that the heathen should take possession of Edom, says, but upon mount Zion shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness. If this is not a prophecy concerning Christ, it can neither have meaning nor application, for it certainly cannot have respect either to the Jews or to their Messiah. Surely the Jews will not be hardy enough to declare, that holiness, which is only applicable to God, who alone is holy, can in any sense be applied to them, or to any people: but it is literally applicable to Christ, who was tempted in all points like unto us, and yet without sin. So that instead of the prophet prophesying that the Jews should take possession of the land of Edom at the coming of their Messiah, it is a prophecy concerning the coming of Christ, in whom holiness was only to be perfected. For the government of Edom is evidently said by the prophet to be in existence at the fulfilment of this prophecy, verse 16th, as thou hast done, so shall it be done unto thee, which words would have been unnecessary, without meaning and application, if the government and people of Edom were extinct, when the Messiah came. The ancient government and people of Edom must therefore have been in existence at the fulfilment of this prophecy: but where is the government of Edom now? where are the people of Edom now? This incontrovertibly proves that it does not refer to the Messiah who, the Jews say, is to come, because the ancient government and people of Edom are no more. Edom is, as it has been for 1800 years, in possession of the heathen, bands of strangers, while the Edomites are sunk into eternal oblivion. But all this was accomplished at the coming of Christ the true Messiah, when the heathen, agreeably to the words of the prophet, took possession of Idumea; when every one of the mount of Esau were cut off by slaughter, verse 9. and, all the heathen have drunk continually upon the holy mountain, to the present day.

The next in order are the prophecies of Moses. The Jews have selected two, which treat on the restoration of the nation, and the destruction of their enemies. But they have introduced one of the most extravagant notions that ever entered into the mind of man.

We are told of two descriptions of people among the Jews; one, known to be such; the other, who are secretly mixed with the people of other nations, called, "the compelled ones." These, "as soon as they can escape from the popish countries, return to Judaism;" and to these they say, Moses addresses himself in the 30th chap. of Deut. ver. 1st. And it shall come to pass when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee. But we ask any one who may be weak enough to entertain such an opinion, why cannot these compelled ones, as they are pleased to call them, in any popish country, return to Judaism? they have had the privilege of doing so, and of being protected in that worship in all popish countries. Therefore as there is no ground for such an opinion, to apply the words of the inspired penman to confirm such a fallacy, is no better than profanation.

"Nothing (say they) of this nature took place at the coming of Jesus;"—true, but Moses does not say that they shall return to Judaism. That the Jews will be called, we believe, and that they will finally hear the prophet, whom God was to raise up from among them, we believe also; but Moses has no where said that this prophet should be raised up to conduct them to Jerusalem, and to instruct them in the rites and ceremonies of the dispensation, which was given by him, and which has been understood by Jews in all ages since the dispersion. Had this been the meaning of the sacred writer, that they were to be called to Jerusalem, and that all the ceremonies and sacrifices of the Mosaic dispensation were to be celebrated as described in the books of Moses, there would not have been any necessity for those words of the Lord to him, chap. 18. 18, 19. I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him; because those words clearly and incontrovertibly apply to a new dispensation, viz. and I will put my words in his mouth, not the old words, or law—and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him, not the old law and ceremonies given to Moses. Neither would there be any necessity for them to hearken to the words of a new prophet according to the 19th verse, if this prophet had only to communicate to them what they were already well acquainted with, viz. the rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices, even the whole body of old Judaism. On the other hand, we have an account of thousands of Jews being converted to Christianity at this important period; which is a sufficient proof that those ancient Jews were sensible how ineffectual the Jewish sacrifices were as to the reuniting of the heart. The modern Jews are also sensible of this, as they say, that they are to be converted, the heart circumcised, and brought to the same state of innocency as Adam was in before the fall, and all this is to be done by miracles, signs, and wonders in the heavens, and in the earth, blood, fire, and pillars of smoke. O ye Rabbies, what miserable interpreters of the scripture are ye! If external signs, and wonderful operations, were calculated to carry rational conviction to the mind, in order to bring about the circumcision of the heart, it might have been expected with the greatest confidence when the law was given at Sinai,—*when the whole nation saw the awful descent of the divine majesty—when the mountain shok at the approach of the hallowed influence—*when the people solicited Moses that he would speak to them instead of God, lest they should die. Also in their journey through the wilderness for forty years, when they saw so many signs, wonders, and miracles. But these were soon forgotten, from which it must be evident that something more interior than what affects the outward senses, is required, in order to produce so desirable an end as the circumcision of the heart.

But this circumcision of the heart, they inform us, "was not accomplished during the continuance of the second temple, nor at the coming of Jesus," from which they infer, that as it was to be done at the coming of the Messiah, he is not yet come. But these writers are not consistent; they say, "this circumcision of the heart is not to be brought about by God's depriving man of his free will;" then as many as believed in Christ through the preaching of the apostles, and saw the necessity of a "circumcision of the heart"—instead of an outward circumcision; a circumcision of the heart which taught them, that to obey was better than sacrifice, and to hearken, than the fat of rams, and which circumcision of the heart could not be brought about by the Jewish sacrifices, as is plain from the above words, without a belief in the great sacrifice, Christ. I say with such, this circumcision of the heart spoken of by Moses was accomplished at the coming of Christ. It is not said that the hearts of all the Jews should be so circumcised, it would be a good thing indeed, if not only the hearts of all the Jews, but also if the hearts of all who profess Christianity were so circumcised. Daniel is of a different opinion; for he declares, not only concerning the Jews, but also other nations, that notwithstanding all the signs and miracles which have been done, or which may be done, the wicked shall do wickedly.

We are told by Levi and the Rabbies, that all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest, which they apply to the Jews; but it is evident what the prophet's meaning is in this passage. In all nations where God is worshipped agreeably to the scriptures, wicked men know God; the devils know God, the devils believe and tremble. But the prophet was taking a retrospect of the wickedness of the Jews, when they were so involved in idolatry that the people from the least unto the greatest, did not know the true God from the idol Gods, because they were not taught the knowledge of the God of heaven, but were taught to worship the idol Gods of the nations around them, and therefore he says, speaking of this time to come, all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest, even their children who were then instructed in the worship of idols, were to be made sensible that the God who was to be worshipped was not an idol, but he who made the heavens.

That this is the plain meaning of the above passage, and that it refers to Christ, will appear from what follows. The Jews expect that when the Messiah comes, the old covenant, the law, sacrifices, and worship, are to be again restored as at the first temple. But the prophet expressly denies this in the preceding verses, 31, 32, 33. Behold the days come saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: NOT according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt. But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, saith the Lord. I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts. Thus does the prophet declare that the covenant was not to be like that which was established with their fathers when they came out of Egypt at Sinai; not the Mosaic covenant, but it was to be a new covenant, altogether different from the other, which was to be entirely abolished. All this was accomplished at the coming of Christ, the old covenant was destroyed, and he made a new covenant; he taught them that his law was to be of an internal, and not of an external nature, that it was to be written on their hearts.

"Moses (we are told) informs us of three most important, and wonderful events which are to take place at the coming of the Messiah, viz. the resurrection of the dead, the restoration of the Jews, and the punishment of their enemies. The first is expressed by his saying, I will kill and I will make alive; the second by the expression, I have wounded and I will heal; the third, neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand." The application of these clauses is too absurd for notice. This notion that the dead Jews are to rise again when the Messiah comes, must raise a blush among the living Jews. The application of the second to the restoration of the Jews, is as absurd, viz. I have wounded and I will heal; but to apply the third, viz. neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand, to God's whetting his glittering sword, and ripping up the nations, who by Levi, and these Rabbinical writers, are charged with being enemies to the Jews, is making God a most merciless being, and could never have been published by men of sane intellect respecting divine things. I think it charitable to impute such a conclusion to this cause, for if the Jews as a body cordially believed it, it would prove them monsters indeed; and in such case, we may consider it as a happy circumstance that they have not the power to act in conformity with such opinions.—But the Jews, as a body, are not to be charged with such base intentions, they are no doubt the whims of a few intemperate individuals; with credit to the Christian religion, we may adopt the words of Levi, "this was not accomplished at the coming of Christ."

Again.—These writers declare, that "all the glory will be restored as in the first temple, viz. the shechinah, or divine presence, the ark, and cherubim, the spirit of prophecy, fire from heaven, &c." and all the proof they bring that this will be done, is from the following passage, For thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments, and his statutes, which are written in the book of this law, because thou wilt turn unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. But many persons, or even a whole nation, turning to the Lord their God, and keeping his commandments, is no proof that these things will be again restored; if the old covenant, the old law, the old sacrifices, the old ordinances, and the whole body of old Judaism, (as observed) were to be again restored: there would be no occasion for another teacher like Moses, no necessity for that promise, "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall teach unto them all that I command him." From which it is evident, that this teaching was to be something new, and very different from the old law, and the old teaching; for the Jews are all well acquainted with the old teaching. This is also said to be a future command, viz. "he shall teach unto them all that I shall command him," not all that has been commanded in the old law: from all which it is as plain as demonstration can make truth appear, that a new law, and not the renewal of the old Mosaic law, was to be given, agreeably to these words of Moses, a total abolition of all the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies was to be accomplished at the coming of the true Messiah, which was fulfilled at the coming of Christ, and which is undeniable proof that Christ was the true Messiah.

Levi says, "The third who prophesied of the redemption, and future restoration of the nation, was Isaiah, which is contained in the 2d, 3d, and 4th verses of the second chapter, for as the prophet makes use of the expression, "in the latter days," it is clear that he thereby meant the days of the Messiah, and thus say Kimchi and Abarbanal."—Very well, and so say all Christians, for this is no proof that Christ was not the true Messiah. On the contrary, it must be admitted on all hands to be confirming proof that he was the true Messiah, for these are allowed to be the latter days of Isaiah according to the prophet.

These writers condemn all the Christian writers who say, that Christ, or the religion, Christ, was to convince many nations of the return errors, and that it was to be a religion which of do the strongest tendency to promote peace, but in such universal peace as foretold by the prophets has ever taken place." It is reasonable to suppose that Levi, and the Rabbies he quotes, had never read the New Testament. Christ says, "do unto others as ye would they should do unto you;" if this precept were observed by all nations, there certainly would be universal peace, but if man, from motives which are opposite to Christianity, will do those things to others which he would not have others to do to him, no wonder there are wars and fightings: "Whence come wars and fightings?" says the apostle, his answer is contained in three words, Of your lusts.—The religion of Christ has convinced many nations of their errors, and it must be acknowledged by the whole world, that he has founded a religion, which when its precepts are observed, has the strongest tendency to promote universal peace. Not so under the Mosaic dispensation, for that was a system of warfare from the time of their coming out of Egypt, to their final dispersion, and which must be very strong evidence with the Jews, that Christ was the true Messiah.

But the Jewish writers say, that "as the temple was not rebuilt when Christ came, which was not to be destroyed any more (agreeably to the words of the prophet), Christ cannot be the true Messiah."—The passage they quote to prove this, is the second verse of the same chapter. "It shall come to pass in the latter days, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills." They say, "by the word established, it is plain that he meant, it was to be fixed unalterably, of course it was not to be destroyed any more." As the Jews are led to understand this literally, we ask them how it is possible for the mountain of a house to be established on the top of mountains? This is plainly a figurative expression, the prophet reminds them of their idolatrous worship, which was established, or performed on the tops of mountains, or hills, and he informs them, that instead of worshipping idols on the tops of mountains, as heretofore they had done, the worship of the Lord, called the house of the Lord, should be greater in its numbers and excellency than all the idolatrous worship on the mountains, and that it should be exalted above the worship of the gods of the hills.

The word Beroesh, when it is applied to time, means, in the beginning, when it is applied to persons and things, it means, the most excellent, and with the prefix beth, which means in, it will read, "the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the most excellent of the mountains." No one can doubt but that this is a figurative expression, signifying the Christian church which was to be promulgated from Jerusalem, and which was to be established at the coming of Christ, agreeably to be his own word. But to apply this prophecy to the building of a temple, or place of worship on the top of a mountain, where all nations were to flow unto it, literally, is not only contradictory in point of possibility, but it shows what a lamentable opinion the Jews must have concerning the sanctity, and the true understanding of the scriptures. In the original the passage is not the mountain of the Lord's house, but the mountain of the house of the Lord, and the masculine pronoun he, which in the translation is rendered by the neuter pronoun it, refers to the word Lord, and not to house. This verse truly reads, "The mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flock unto him."

The Jewish writers assert, that the prophet addresses the nation, ch. lv. 6. "Behold thou shalt

"all a nation that thou knowest not," viz. a nation not in existence evidently; "and nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee, because of the Lord thy God, and for the holy one of Israel, for he hath glorified thee." But this is a most profound mistake, for the Jewish nation was then known, and the prophet is addressing God, and not the Jewish nation. The prophecy is directed to a single person under the title of the Redeemer, beginning at the 49th chap. ver. 7. "Thus saith the Lord, the Redeemer of Israel, and his holy one, to him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nations abhorreth." Surely no Jew in his senses will again tell us, that this Redeemer, this person despised by man, and abhorred by the Jewish nation, is to be their Messiah? Levi, from the Rabbies, observes in another place, "that he will bring with him such evident marks of his Messiahship, that the nation will receive him with open arms," instead of abhorring him. But this scripture was literally accomplished in Christ, who was despised by man, and abhorred by the Jewish nation.

If we pursue the prophecy, we find in the next chapter that the same person is spoken of, for this cannot be a personification of the Jewish nation.—How can it be said, "they gave their back to the smiters, and their cheeks to them that plucked off the hair?" But the prophet evidently refers to the Christian Redeemer, who literally gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair.

In the 4th and 5th verses of the following chapter, the same divine person speaks by the prophet thus: "A law shall proceed from me, and I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the people, my righteousness is near, my salvation is gone forth, and mine arm shall judge the people, the isles shall wait on me, and on mine arm shall they trust." A moment's reflection would convince any one that these words cannot mean, either the Jews, or the Messiah they expect to come. How can it be said that the righteousness of the Jews, or that the righteousness of the Messiah they expect to come, is gone forth? As to the righteousness of the Jews, we have not seen any thing of it in them more than in Christians; and as to the second, viz. the righteousness of their Messiah who they say is yet to come, his righteousness has not gone forth. It must appear equally as clear that the words, "and on mine arm shall they trust," cannot mean that we the Gentiles are to trust on the arm of the Jews: we are commanded to trust in the arm of God, and not in the arm of man.—Again, ver. 8. "My righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation."—From which it is obvious that the righteousness of the Jews is not meant, nor can the righteousness of their visionary Messiah be understood; but it refers to Christ whose righteousness only is for ever, and whose salvation is from generation to generation? Let but the Jew look at the fruit of this righteousness of Christ, and he will be convinced that it is the righteousness spoken of by the prophet, viz. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself; to which is added, do unto others, as ye would they should do unto you—sell all thou hast, give to the poor, and take up thy cross and follow me.

The same vein of prophecy is pursued by the prophet in the following 53d chapter, where the same person the Redeemer, is mentioned, and continued throughout the whole. Here the Redeemer is again introduced as having his visage more marred than any man, and that he shall sprinkle many nations. But can this be said of the Jews? are their visages more marred than the visages of others? have they, or are they likely to sprinkle many nations from uncleanness? which must necessarily be the case with them if this prophecy were applied to the Jewish nation. But we see that their visages are not more marred than any man's, and it is truly absurd to suppose that they are to sprinkle the nations from uncleanness.

The same order is observed, as the prophecy goes on in the next chapter. "He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows." In the name of common sense, can it be said, that the Jewish nation has borne the griefs, and carried the sorrows of the Gentile nations? that the Jews are wounded for our transgressions? that they are bruised for our iniquities? that the chastisement of our peace is upon them? and that with their stripes we are healed?

But that which renders it conclusive, that the whole prophecy cannot mean the Jewish nation, or the Messiah they expect to come, is the following clause, ver. 8. "Who shall declare his generation? for he was cast out of the land of the living, for the transgression of my people was he stricken," for all know the origin and the generation of the Jews who sprang from Abraham. Neither can they suppose that the words, "he was cut off out of the land of the living," can apply to the Jews, or to the Messiah who is expected by them; because they vainly imagine he is to restore them to universal empire, therefore they cannot allow that either the Jewish nation or this Messiah is to be cut off out of the land of the living. Again, "for the transgression of my people was he stricken;" if by the words my people, we are to understand the Jewish nation, then certainly they cannot be applied to mean their Messiah also; and if on the other hand, we were to understand that these words, my people, mean the Gentile nations, for whom the Jewish nation was stricken, as these writers inform us, they must acknowledge that the Gentile nations are the people of God, which will not be granted by them. For then, instead of the nations "running to the Jews to be instructed in the true word of God," as we are told by Jews that they will, the Jews must apply to them for such knowledge. Both these statements are against so unscriptural a conclusion, which is a proof to what a pitch of folly and blasphemy these writers have worked themselves up; folly, in supposing that a few Jews are to teach all nations the true understanding of the word of God; and blasphemy in declaring that the Jewish nation is meant instead of the Redeemer, when it is obvious throughout the whole prophecy, that the person of the Redeemer, and not the Jews, is mentioned by name.

These writers inform us, that at the return from what they call the captivity, "the ark, the shechinah, or visible symbol of the divine presence, will be again restored to them, as it was in the first temple." But the prophet Jeremiah expressly says in the 16th verse of the 3d chap. "In those days saith the Lord, they shall say no more, the ark of the covenant of the Lord; neither shall it come to mind, neither shall they remember it, neither shall they visit it, neither shall that be done any more." If this be not a plain contradiction to such an assertion, then there is no meaning in language. The lame tale that is invented by the Jews to meet this declaration of the prophet, who says that the ark which was destroyed with the first temple, is never to be restored, is that as it was customary for them to swear before the ark and the altar, they are to be so holy at this period, that they shall not have occasion even to come before the ark, or to remember it, but they shall do strict justice, and always adhere to the truth without an oath. Surely every rational Jew must see the weakness, folly, and presumption of such a perverted application of the original text.

The prophet Haggai says, ch. ii. Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory? and how do you see it now? is it not in your eyes in comparison of it, as nothing? Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts. The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of Hosts. But this certainly was not the case, as it related either to the building, or to the glorious manifestations at the time of the first temple, for at the return from Babylon, they had not the Urim and Thummin, the Shechinah, or divine glory, as at the time of the first temple. Therefore these words of the prophet must evidently refer to a new and spiritual dispensation, which was to be manifested during the continuance of this second temple, for the words of the prophet are positive, that the glory of this latter house should be greater than of the former, and as this was not so as to the external part, nor as to any thing it contained, it plainly refers to a new religion, which did not consist in outward ceremonies only, but which reached the thoughts and desires of the heart. Such is the religion of the true Messiah, the Lord Jesus Christ. And in full and decided confirmation of this view I ask, Where is the second temple now? where is this building in which a display of the divine goodness was to fill it with glory? in which the divine glory was to be greater than the former? It is not possible to understand that the words of the prophet can apply to any circumstance at this time of the world, because the second temple in which this superior glory was to appear, was laid in ashes by the Roman army 1800 years since.

The prophet Micah also says, ch. v. 2. But thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel: whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting: which prophecy was literally fulfilled by the Christian Redeemer, who came out of Bethlehem. But what is become of Bethlehem now? Bethlehem is no more; nor can any one tell us where ancient Bethlehem stood. Where are the thousands of Judah? How inconsistent then it is; for the Jews to contend for the coming of the Messiah, and how plainly contradictory to the express declarations of their own prophets to believe he is yet to come, when all these signs of his coming are unequivocally, and for ever past: and the whole accomplished agreeably to the express declaration of the prophets, in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ.

But if we add to the above, the accomplishment of all those things foretold by Christ, concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem, the dispersion of the nation, and the abolition of their sacrifices, which were to take place among that generation; every argument for a Messiah yet to come, must fall to the ground. For Jerusalem was taken, plundered, and destroyed by the Romans; the cities of Judah were depopulated, the whole nation was dispersed over the earth agreeably to his words, and all their sacrifices and burnt-offerings, which only constituted the Jewish church according to divine appointment, as representatives of the coming of the Messiah, have ceased for 1800 years.

In the 59th chap. and the 21st v. we are told by Levi, and the Jewish writers, that the prophet proceeds to inform us, that the covenant which God had made with them; and the prophecies delivered by the prophet, should never depart from them, so as to become void, but should surely be accomplished,—As for me, this is my covenant with them, said the Lord; my spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put into thy mouth; they shall not depart from thy mouth, nor from the mouth of thy seed, nor from the mouth of thy seed's seed, said the Lord, from henceforth for ever.

“ Thus we are assured (say these writers) that the law of Moses, which is the covenant God made with the nation, as also the prophecies delivered by the mouth of the prophets, shall never depart from the nation, but remain as an everlasting witness of their future restoration.”

Can any thing be so preposterously absurd as to suppose that this covenant here mentioned by the prophet, by the words, and my words which I have put into thy mouth, is the law of Moses? the prophet is told in express words what was the covenant, viz. this is my covenant, my spirit which is upon thee, and my words, which I have put into thy mouth. For it must be plain to every Jew, that the law of Moses, which comprehended the immediate communication by the Urim and Thummim, departed from them at the Babylonish captivity, and never was restored: and what is also evident proof that the covenant which is said to be the spirit of the Lord, and the words he had put into the mouth of the prophet, was not the law of Moses; the whole ceremonial law of Moses, containing the sacrifices, has departed from them and their seed's seed for ever, at their dispersion. Do the sons of Aaron, the priests, as it is said they shall, blow with the trumpets, which was to be an ordinance for ever, throughout their generations? Numb. 10. 8. Do the sons of Levi stand to minister before the Lord, as it is expressly said they should for ever? Is it not infatuation in any Jew to suppose, that he can prove his descent from the tribe of Levi, which was carried away captive before the captivity in Babylon, and has never been heard of since?

It was commanded as a statute to be observed for ever, that if a man killed an ox, a lamb, or a goat, he was to bring it to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, for an offering to the Lord, when the priest was to sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the Lord, and whoever did not do this was to die. Lev. 17. 7. Is this, which was ordained as a statute for ever, now observed among the Jews? Surely it must be clear to every rational Jew, that all these statutes and ordinances are passed away for ever—consequently the above words of this prophecy cannot refer to the future restoration of the Jews, as some of the Rabbies with Levi say they do, because the law of Moses is not here referred to, as the covenant which God made with the prophet, but his spirit and his words, which he had put into his mouth, viz. the prophecy given to the prophet, which is not the law of Moses.

If we attend to the true meaning of le olam, which is in the translation, and also by Levi, translated, for ever, we shall find that in these passages it has no such meaning, for this word is used to signify a hidden or concealed time, both indefinite and finite, past and future. Exod. 21. 6. and he shall serve him for ever, viz. until the jubilee, because at the jubilee he was to be free from servitude. 1 Kings, 8, 13. a settled place for thee to abide in for ever; but which temple of Solomon was destroyed 2500 years since. Eccles. 1. 10. It hath been already of old time. Hence the word olam, when applied to things of time, never means that they shall endure for ever, but to the end or final duration of the thing spoken of, and which here plainly means the Mosaic dispensation in all its fullness, with the communication of the spirit of God by Urim and Thummim. So that we are here given plainly to understand, that the words of God by the mouth of the prophet, and his spirit which was known by the communication by Urim, should not depart but with the end of that dispensation. This has been literally accomplished, for the Shechinah, or the divine communication, has never been visibly manifested since the captivity in Babylon.

Levi and the Rabbies inform us, that all the nations will come, “not in pride and arrogance, but in a low, humble, and submissive manner, prostrating themselves to them, not on account of their great power, but for the sanctity and holiness of the divinity that will then be in the midst of them, and which (they say), is a demonstrative proof that this prophecy was not fulfilled at their return from Babylon.” It would be a pleasant thing indeed, not only for the Jews, but also for Christians, to see them in this state, that people should “prostrate themselves before them, because of their holiness and sanctity.” But if some Jewish writers have been so weak and infatuated as to fancy, that they shall be a kind of demi-gods, surely the more intelligent among them must be ashamed to carry such a badge of consummate vanity. This passage has no reference to the Jews. In the first verse of this chapter, the prophet declares that the dawn of this glorious state had then taken place in the following words, “Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.” Now if there be any meaning in language, these words cannot signify the future restoration of the Jews by the coming of their supposed Messiah, because the light which Levi and the Rabbies suppose to mean their restoration, has not risen upon them yet, though it is now near 3000 years since this prophecy was delivered. The obvious meaning of this prophecy is, that God by the prophet made known his will respecting the Gentile nations, that they should be called to a knowledge of the true God.—Ver. 3. “And the Gentiles shall come to thy light.” The accomplishment of this prophecy is before the face of the whole world, for the Gentile nations, those who were worshippers of idols, have received the scriptures, and have come to the knowledge of the true God, while the Jews remain a dispersed people among all nations: consequently they can lay no claim to this light rising upon them to enlighten the Gentile nations.

Levi and the Rabbies have attempted, and a miserable attempt it is, to define the whole of this chapter agreeably to their sensual passions and appetites. Thus they say, "the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah, shall bring gold and frankincense, the flocks of Kedar, and the rams of Nabaioth shall be brought to them, the sons of the strangers are to build up their walls"—while the Jews are to be idle gentlemen, and lookers on, blessing themselves that they are not sweating beneath a scorching sun.—Alas, ye Rabbies, what miserable interpreters are ye! but they have not attended to this circumstance, viz. that if one part of the prophecy is to be understood agreeably to the letter, every other part of the same prophecy must be understood literally also, which cannot be the case in this prophecy, for the 19th verse says, "The sun shall be no more thy light by day: neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee." Now, if by the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah, the flocks of Kedar, and the rams of Nabaioth, and the sons of the strangers who are to build up their walls, we are to understand that these things are to be literally understood; then by the same rule we must necessarily understand, that the same literal sense is to be understood in every other part of the same prophecy. And then, in such case, the sun must no more give light to them by day, nor the moon by night, for it is absurd to tell us that this metaphorical passage refers to the prosperity of the Jews, when every other part of the prophecy is by them literally understood. Again, verse 20. it certainly does not refer to the Jews, for a very few years after the delivery of this prophecy, their sun, which they understand to mean their national privileges, went down, when they were carried captive, and made to bow the knee to the idols of Babylon. Neither did their sun ever rise again, for at the return from the captivity, they were governed by strangers, the Herodians and Asmoneans. The glory of the first temple, the Urim and Thummim, the Shechinah and visible communication never returned, and finally they were dispersed over the face of the earth. How then can these writers have confidence to tell the world, that the words, "thy sun shall no more go down," have reference to the endless government of the Jewish nation?

But should they continue to say that this has reference to the future happiness of the Jewish nation, this view of the prophecy is altogether inconsistent with the express words of the prophet, as above, for the fact proves that this prophecy refers to the coming of Christ, the true Messiah, to that light which was to enlighten every man: "The Gentiles have come to his light, and kings to the brightness of his rising." From which it must appear, that this prophecy has no reference to the future temporal state of the Jews, but to the calling of the Gentile nations to the knowledge of the true God.

But "Strangers (say they) are to stand up and feed their flocks, the sons of the alien are to be their vine-dressers," while they are to be called the priests of the Lord—that they "are not to be engaged in such servile services, but in the mediation of the law of God, and in his service as priests, and being thus at leisure, they are to eat the riches of the Gentiles." Surely this is too absurd for remark, the thinking and rational Jew must be ashamed of it. If these infatuated writers had recollected that in Great Britain, which is twice as large as the land of Canaan, there are but a few thousands of priests, and it is found they are too numerous, though the flock is five times as large as the whole population of the Jews in all the world, what then is to become of a whole nation, of millions of priests, who are to have nothing to do but to play at religion, and priest preach to priest? If on the other hand, they suppose that the country is to be stocked with laborious foreigners, and that every priest is to have a congregation, what must be the extent of a country capable of holding a population to employ such a numerous conclave? the whole earth would not be large enough. For if to each priest were allotted five hundred persons, as a congregation, and the number of priests were estimated at two millions only, then these would be sufficient for one thousand millions of people, being far more than the population of the whole world. Alas ye Rabbies, how have ye for ages mistaken the obvious meaning of the sacred scriptures! how long will ye continue to blow up the ignorant among you with vanity? with the vain hope of being the lords of the creation, trees of the Lord's planting, while your views go no farther than the gratification of the sensual appetite, to have the riches of the Gentiles, "the gold and frankincense of Midian and Ephah, the flocks of Kedar, and the rams of Nabaioth,"—to be "clothed in purple and fine linen," and to "fare sumptuously every day;" while all the world, as you say, are to come "bending and bowing themselves down at the soles of your feet."

Levi thus concludes this dissertation by saying—"from the explanation here given of this prophecy, the following principles are obvious: 1st, God will take vengeance on the different nations; 2nd, all the tribes of the nation will be gathered together; 3d, the different nations of the earth will be subject to Israel—now as none of these important events took place at their return from Babylon, as is clear from all history both sacred and profane; and as it is clear that they were not accomplished at the time, nor in the person of Jesus, it is manifest that he could not be the Messiah, and that these great and glorious promises remain yet to be fulfilled in the latter times, when the true Messiah will come to redeem the nation"—This writer has very judiciously said, "from the explanation here given of this prophecy, the following principles are obvious"—But as it is proved above agreeably to the original, the obvious meaning of the words of the prophet, that no such events were to take place at the return from the Babylonish captivity; and as the fact is proved in profane history, even in the histories of all nations, that when Christ came, the Gentile nations were called from idolatry to the worship of the true God, that even Asia, Africa, and Europe, received the gospel; agreeably to the express words of the prophet in the third verse, viz. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising. It is incontrovertible evidence that this prophecy was accomplished in the person of the true Messiah, the Redeemer of man, the Lord Jesus Christ, and that the Jews have no foundation whereon to rest their hopes, that the Messiah is yet to come.

Supplementary Additions.

Having in the foregoing pages given a full account of the various systems of religion prevailing, or which have prevailed in the world, at least so far as they are known; we shall now add some interesting documents not to be found in the former editions; these, our readers will doubtless consider as contributing very essentially to the utility and value of the work.—Indeed, it must be observed, that since its first publication a number of new sects of religious professors have arisen, of which a clear account will be found in the present edition, and in no other.

*The dissertation on "CHRIST, THE TRUE MESSIAH," is also new, for which we are indebted to Mr. John Bellamy, the author of Biblical Criticisms, &c.*

OF THE BIBLE, AND THE TRANSLATIONS THEREOF;

Especially of the present English Translation.

AS it is of the utmost importance to every professor of that religion which is founded on the Bible, that the Bible itself should not only be well understood by him, but that its authority as a work communicated by inspiration from heaven should be well ascertained, and moreover that the authenticity of such copies of it as are now procurable, and the correctness of those translations from such copies, as are usually read and appealed to by us should be established, we have thought it might be proper to offer an inquiry of some length into these latter particulars, not less for the use of the biblical student, than for the satisfaction of general readers.

Of the authority of the Bible, as received by inspiration from God, we shall at present say nothing, presuming it is fully admitted by the reader; and being aware that the necessary proofs requisite to do this subject tolerable justice, would extend these summary hints to an inconvenient length,

Of the original writers of the Bible.

It is very credible, that the patriarch Abraham, to go no higher into antiquity, possessed and brought away, what information the books, or records, of his original country could communicate. For our own part, we do not know that we should say any thing improbable, if we considered Noah himself as practising the art of writing; but, as great doubts have been entertained, whether this art be more ancient than the intercourse of Moses with the Divinity on Mount Horeb, we are unwilling to be thought too sanguine, or too overweening on this subject.

We think the remarks "on the nature of seals," are determinate for the nature of the seal of Judah, Gen. xxxviii. that it contained his name, or appropriate mark, engraved on it. We assume this as fact. But we think we discern traces of a still more early employment of this noble art, in the days of Abraham. We read, Gen. xiv. 17. a passage which has all the air of an abridgement of a title deed, or conveyance of an estate, which indeed is its import. "And the 1. field of Ephron, 2. which was in Machpelah, 3. which was before Mamre, 4. the field, 5. and the cave which was therein, 6. and all the trees in the field, 7. that were in all the borders thereof round about, 8. were made sure to Abraham, 9. for a possession, 10. in the presence of the children of Heth, 11. before all that went in at the gate of his city." A modern attorney would desire no more than the introduction of a few phrases, to make a deed of many skin from this passage; and the whole history of this purchase and payment, strikes us, as being not only according to the local usages of the country, in the present day, but also so minutely described, that we scarce think it would have been so amply, and even punctiliously, inserted into an epitomised history of the times, had not the original laid before the writer, who, finding himself able to communicate this ancient document to his readers, embraced with pleasure the opportunity of abridging it.

If this be admitted as an instance of the art of writing, and of such an art being practised in the days of Abraham, we may justly consider, whether that patriarch could be the first possessor of it? we think not: and if, as the Rabbins say, Abraham himself learned of Shem, and they say decidedly, that "Isaac went to Shem's school," we think we may hesitate before we deny the possibility, at least, that Shem had preserved a history of former events, which history he communicated to Abraham, from whence it descended to Isaac, to Jacob, to Levi, to Moses. We have sometimes gone so far as to suppose we discerned a difference of style between the early parts of the book of Genesis, and the original writings of Moses; but we say no more on this subject; we merely mention this by the bye.

We do not see that any injury is done to the just arguments on behalf of the inspiration of scripture, if we suppose that Shem wrote the early history of the world; that Abraham wrote what concerned himself; Jacob what concerned himself, &c. and that, at length, Moses compiled, arranged, and edited a copy of the holy works extant in his time. We shall see that a procedure perfectly analogous to this was conducted by Ezra in after times; on whose edition of holy scripture our faith now rests, as it rests in like manner on the prior edition of Moses, if he was the editor of some parts; or, on his authority, if he was the writer of the whole.

Accepting Moses as the writer of the Pentateuch, we may nevertheless consider Joshua as adding some small matters to it, such as the history of the death of Moses, &c. and Ezra in later times, as adding some other small matters to it, such as, various minor observations, changes of names which had happened during a lapse of many ages, particular directions where such or such objects were situated, &c. for the benefit of his readers; and let us say, for the benefit of remote posterity.

When we come to the days of Moses, we have clear evidence of written documents being composed, purposely to deliver down to posterity the history of past events. Moses not only was willing to write, but he is specifically directed to write, by way of record, and to take special care for the preservation of those records, by placing them in the most sacred of the national repositories; and under the immediate care of those most intimately concerned in their preservation.

We find this custom of composing Public Records was continued in after-ages in Israel; under the Judges, under the Kings, and when the schism took place between Israel and Judah, each of those kingdoms preserved copies of the writings esteemed sacred, whether historical or devotional. We have, indeed, reason to be thankful, that beside the Jewish copy of the Pentateuch, the Samaritans have preserved their copy also, which if it be, as many learned men suppose, written in the truly ancient Hebrew character, is so much the more valuable, as it has had less risk and less occasion of error, than a copy transcribed into another dialect.

But this is not the only use which we think should be made of this circumstance: we ought to recollect the natural effects of party, in matters of religion, especially when heightened by political rancour; we may be sure that the Samaritans would suffer no alterations to be made in their copies by any authority from the Jewish governors, and the Jews, we well know, would have hardly received even a palpable truth from "that foolish people which dwelt in Samaria."

Wherefore, when we find the copies preserved by these two people generally correspondent, and differing only in some few minor matters, we ought to admire the providence of God, which has thus "made even the wrath of man to praise him," by transmitting more than one copy of this leading portion of holy writ, in a manner more certain, and less liable to doubt, or collusion, or equivocation, than if a single copy had come through the hands of one set of friends only, or had been preserved only by those whose unsupported testimony might have been suspected of undue partiality, or of improper bias.

We find the kings of Judah attentive to the arrangement of their sacred code in after-ages; David no doubt, authenticated the books of the prophet Samuel, and we read that Hezekiah employed several persons to collect and arrange the Proverbs of Solomon, and even to add to them, others which that prince had left behind him. It is usually understood, that the Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, were added under Hezekiah; also the book of Job, perhaps, though others think Isaiah.

The prophecies of Jeremiah were public; many of them were read to all the people, and before the king, so that copies could not be rare: the same may be said of most of the minor prophets; and in short, of all that were near to the days of Nehemiah and Ezra.

It is very natural to suppose that those chiefs of the Jewish people, after their return from captivity, would do their utmost to collect, preserve, and maintain the dignity, of all the writings of their sacred code; and indeed, excepting the prophet Malachi, we may confidently consider Ezra, as not only collecting, but collating the copies of former writings, and composing additions to the historical narrations; not in the books themselves, withheld perhaps, by their prior sanctity, but in that separate history which we call the Chronicles.

Here we ought to make a pause; because here our faith rests on Ezra's edition: and I doubt not that this "scribe, well instructed in the law," had not only divine guidance, but good reasons too, for what he did, and for his manner of doing it.

I suspect that we have so many instances of Ezra's modesty, as we have marginal readings in our Hebrew Bibles; which in all amount to 840.—These occur in various places of the works extant before Ezra; but there are none in the prophet Malachi, who has been supposed to be Ezra himself; if so, the reason for this exemption from various readings is evident.

From the time of Ezra, the Hebrew canon was esteemed as concluded; but between the times of Ezra and Christ, the books of the Jews became objects of enquiry to neighbouring nations; and translations of them during this interval, being undertaken by those whose language we also study, these translations become very important to us: who by their means have additional sanction to the articles of our enquiry, and additional means of answering the purposes to which our enquiry is directed.

Translations of the Hebrew Scriptures.

The first translation in order of time, and indeed in point of importance to us, is that Greek version usually called the Seventy or Septuagint.

The Chaldee translations come next in order: they are not so much translations as paraphrases.

The Syriac translation has been, by some, referred to the time of Solomon; by others to the time of Abgarus, king of Edessa; this is certainly more probable, but is not universally admitted. It unquestionably is ancient; and Dr. Prideaux thinks, it was made within the first century of A. D. and that it is the best of all translations.

Latin translations do not date before the introduction of Christianity into Rome.

We are now to add to our consideration, beside the Hebrew copies of the Old Testament, the several books which compose the New Testament; these were studied, copied, and translated, together with the Hebrew scriptures, by Christians, while the Jews studied and copied only those which contained the principles of their ancient system.

Jewish labours on Hebrew copies.

The attention of the Jews was by no means confined to writing copies of the holy word; they made almost incredible exertions to preserve the genuineness and integrity of the text.

This produced what has been termed the Masora, the most stupendous monument in the whole history of literature, of minute and persevering labour.—The persons employed in it, and who afterwards received from it the name of Masorites, were Jewish literati, who flourished after the commencement of the Christian æra. With a reverential, not to say superstitious, attention, of which history does not furnish an instance to be urged in comparison with it, they counted all the verses, words, and letters, of all the twenty-four books of the Old Testament, and of each of those twenty-four books, and of every section of each book, and of all its subdivisions.—“The matter of the Masora,” says Mr. Lewis, in his Origines Hebrææ, vol. iv. p. 156, “consists in critical remarks upon the verses, words, letters, and vowel points of the Hebrew text. The Masorets were the first who distinguished the books and sections of books into verses, and marked the number of the verses, and of the words and letters in each verse; the verses where they thought there was something forgot; the words which they believed to be changed; the letters which they thought superfluous; the repetitions of the same verses; the different readings; the words which are redundant or defective; the number of times that the same word is found in the beginning, middle, or end of a verse; the different significations of the same word; the agreement or conjunction of one word with another; the number of words that are printed above; which letters are pronounced, and which are turned upside down; and such as hang perpendicular; they took the number of each: it was they, in short, who invented the vowel points, the accents, and made divers critical remarks upon the punctuation, and abundance of other things of equal importance.

“A great part of the labour of these Jewish doctors consisted in counting the letters of the Hebrew of Michaelis in 1720. A critical edition was published by Raphael Chajim Basila, a Jew in Mantua, in four parts, 1742—1744.

The most celebrated edition of the Hebrew with a Latin translation, was that of Sebastian Munster. The first volume of the first edition was printed in 1534, the second volume in 1535; the second edition was printed in 1546. It was the first Latin translation by one of the separatists from the see of Rome. Santes Pagninus was the first of the Catholics who made an entirely new Latin version. It was published at Lyons, in 1528, and has often been republished. That it is an accurate and faithful translation, all acknowledge,—that the Latinity is barbarous, cannot be denied; but, as it was the author's plan, to frame a verbal translation, in the strictest and most literal sense of that word, its supposed barbarism was unavoidable, and cannot, therefore, be imputed to it, as a fault. The celebrated edition of the Rev. Charles Francis Houbigant, of the oratory, was published in four volumes folio, with a Latin version and prolegomena, at Paris, in 1753. The prolegomena and the Latin version have been printed separately. The merit of this edition is celebrated by all, who are not advocates for the Masora. By them it is spoken of in the harshest terms. Several manuscripts were occasionally consulted by the author: but it is evident, that he did not collate any one manuscript throughout. Prior to Houbigant's edition, was that of Reinecius, at Liepsic, in 1725, reprinted there in 1739. A new edition of it was printed in 1793, under the inspection of Dr. Doederlein, and Professor Meisner. It contains the most important of the various readings collected by Dr. Kennicott and De Rossi, printed under the text. For the purpose of common use, it is an excellent edition, and supplies the want of the splendid but expensive editions and collations, of Houbigant, Kennicott, and De Rossi.

Those who extend their biblical researches into Rabbism, are recommended by the learned in this branch of biblical literature, to the Biblia Rabbinnica of Rabbi Moses, published at Amsterdam, in four volumes folio, in 1721—1727, which entirely superseded the Biblia Rabbinnica of Bomberg and Buxtorf. The purchasers of it should see, that the copy offered to them contains the treatise of the Rabbi Abdias Sporno, de Scopo Legis, which, in the copies designed for sale to Christians, is generally omitted.

The reader will perceive, that the Hebrew language, though lost as a spoken language among the Jews, yet has been cultivated among them by their men of learning: while the Christians, under all the disadvantages of receiving the principles of this language from Jewish instructors, have laboured with great assiduity, in acquiring a competent acquaintance with it, and even a deep knowledge of its powers. They have also been the first to collate MSS. and to apply general learning to sacred literature: both these principles are honourable to their skill and industry; but both may be carried too far, if they should be substituted for accurate understanding of the holy language itself, and correct attention to its peculiarities, properties, and idioms.

But while we recommend strongly the closest attention to the Hebrew language itself, we admit frankly, that very great light has been obtained from its sister dialects, of which the Chaldee is one, and the Arabic is another, which cannot be too highly prized. The Jews despise this Arabic dialect, but the disadvantage of despising it is to themselves.

The reader may now form a tolerable idea of the state of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Old Testament: we are next to direct our attention to the Scriptures of the New Testament, which are written in Greek.

Of the present state of the Greek Manuscripts.

The Greek manuscripts, according to Wetstein's account, are written either on parchment (or vellum) or on paper. The parchment or vellum is either purple-coloured, or of its natural colour; and either thin or thick. The paper is either silken, or of the common sort; and its superficies are either glazed, or of the ordinary roughness. The letters are either capital (generally called uncial) or small. The capital letters are either unadorned and simple, and the strokes of them very thin and straight; or they are of a thicker kind, uneven and angular. Some of them are supported on something like a base, others are ornamented, or rather burthened, with a top. Letters of the first description are of the kind generally found on the ancient monuments of Greece; those of the last resemble the paintings of half barbarous times. Manuscripts, therefore, written in the first kind of letter, are generally supposed to be of the sixth century, at the latest; those written in the second kind of letter are generally supposed to be of the tenth century. The manuscripts written in the small letters are of a still later age. But even in the earliest manuscripts some words are abbreviated. At the beginning of a new book, the four or five first lines are often written in vermilion. There are very few manuscripts of the entire New Testament. The greater part contain the gospels only; very few have the Apocalypse.

The curious and extensive collations, which have been made of manuscripts within this century, have shewn, that certain manuscripts have an affinity to each other, and that their text is distinguished from others by characteristic marks. This has enabled the writers on this subject to arrange them under certain general classes. They have observed, that, as different countries had different versions, according to their respective languages, their manuscripts naturally resembled their respective versions, as the versions, generally speaking, were made from the manuscripts in common use. Pursuing this idea, they have supposed four principal exemplars: 1st, the western exemplar, or that used in the countries where the Latin language was spoken; with this the Latin version coincides: 2d, the Alexandrine exemplar; with this the quotations of Origen coincide: 3d, the Edessene exemplar, from which the Syriac version was made: and 4th, the Byzantine or Constantinopolitan exemplar: the greatest number of manuscripts written by the monks on mount Athos, the Moscow manuscripts, the Slavonian or Russian versions, and the quotations of St. Chrysostom and Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria, are referrible to this edition. The readings of this exemplar are remarkably different from those of the other exemplars; between which a striking coincidence appears. A reading supported by all three of them is supposed to be of the very highest authority; yet the true reading is sometimes found only in the fourth.

From the coincidence observed between many Greek manuscripts and the Vulgate, or some other Latin translation, a suspicion arose in the minds of several writers of eminence, that the Greek text had been assimilated throughout, to the Latin. This seems to have been first suggested by Erasmus; but it does not appear that he supposed the alterations were made before the fifteenth century; so that the charge of Latinizing the manuscripts did not, in his notion of it, extend to the original writers of the manuscripts, or, as they are called, the writers a primâ manu, but affected only the subsequent interpolators, or, as they are called, the writers a secundâ manu. Father Simon and Mill adopted and extended this accusation; and it was urged by Wetstein with his usual vehemence and ability, so that it came to be generally received. Bengel expressed some doubts of it; and Semler formally called it in question. He was followed by Griesbach and Woide, and finally brought over Michaelis, who, in the first edition of his Introduction to the New Testament, had taken part with the accusers; but in the fourth edition of the same work, with a candour of which there are too few examples, he declared himself persuaded that the charge was unfounded, and totally abandoned his first opinion.

Besides the manuscripts which contain whole books of the New Testament, other manuscripts have been consulted; among these are the Lecti-onaria, or collections of detached parts of the New Testament, appointed to be read in the public service of the church. These are distinguished into the Evangelistarium, or lessons from the gospels, and the Apostolos, or lessons from the acts and epistles. The quotations from the New Testament, in the works of the ancients, have also been consulted.

Principal Greek Manuscripts now extant.

These are the Codex Alexandrinus, in the British Museum; the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or Codex Bezae, and the Codex Vaticanus. The Codex Alexandrinus consists of four volumes; the three first of them contain the Old Testament; the fourth the New Testament, together with the first epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, and a fragment of the second. The Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, is a Greek and Latin manuscript of the four gospels, and the Acts of the apostles. The Codex Vaticanus, contained, originally, the whole Greek Bible.

The respective ages of these venerable manuscripts have been a subject of great controversy, and have employed the ingenuity and learning of several biblical writers of great renown. After a profound investigation of the subject, Dr. Woide fixes the age of the Codex Alexandrinus between the middle and the end of the fourth century; after a similar investigation, Dr. Kipling fixes the age of the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, at the second century; but Mr. Herbert Marsh, in his notes to Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 708—715, seems to prove demonstratively, that it was not written earlier than the fifth century. Montfaucon and Blanchini refer the Codex Vaticanus to the fifth century. In 1786, a fac-simile edition of the New Testament in the Codex Alexandrinus was published in London, at the expence of the University of Oxford, by Dr. Woide. In 1793, a fac-simile edition of the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, was published at Cambridge, at the expence of the University, by Dr. Kipling. These editions exhibit their respective prototypes, page for page, line for line, word for word, contraction for contraction, rasure for rasure, to a degree of similarity hardly credible. The types were cast for the purpose, in alphabets of various forms, that they might be varied with the manuscript, and represent it more exactly.

Polyglott editions of the Bible.

The first Polyglott is that of Complutum, or Alcalá. It is divided into six parts, and comprised in four volumes folio. It has the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, in three distinct columns; the Chaldee paraphrase, with a Latin interpretation, is at the bottom of the page, and the margin is filled with the Hebrew and Chaldee radicals: the fourth volume contains the Greek Testament, with no other translation than the Latin. It was begun in 1502, the impression was printed off in 1517, and it was published in 1522. The expence of the work, which amounted (it is said) to 50,000 ducats, was wholly paid by Cardinal Ximenes, of Spain.

It is certain, that Cardinal Ximenes spared no expence in collecting manuscripts; but, whether he had any that were truly valuable, has been much doubted. In 1784, when Professor Birch was engaged in his edition of the Bible, Professor Moldenhawer went to Alcalá, for the purpose of discovering the manuscripts used in the Ximenes Polyglott. After much inquiry, he discovered, that about thirty-five years before, they had been sold to a rocket-maker, of the name of Toryo; and the receipt given to him for his purchase was produced!! The Complutensian Polyglott was followed and excelled by the Polyglott of Antwerp, printed in that city in 1569—1572, in eight volumes folio, under the direction of Arias Montanus. It contains, besides the whole of the Complutensian edition, a Chaldee paraphrase on part of the Old Testament, which Cardinal Ximenes, having particular reasons for not publishing it, had deposited in the Theological Library at Complutum. The New Testament has the Syriac version, and the Latin translation of Santes Pagninus, as reformed by Arias Montanus. Less beautiful, but more accurate, and comprehending more than any of the three preceding Polyglotts, is the Polyglott of London, printed in 1652—1657, in six volumes, to which the Lexicon Heptaglotton of Castell, in two volumes folio, is usually added. Dr. Bryan Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, was the editor of it. Twelve copies of it were printed on large paper: one, of great beauty, is in the library of St. Paul's cathedral; another was in that of the Count de Lauraguais; another is in the library of St. John's College at Cambridge. It was published by subscription, and is said to be the first book printed in that manner in England. Dr. Walton had leave from the protector to import his paper duty free.

Greek editions of the New Testament.

The first in point of time, was that of Erasmus, with a new Latin translation. He published five editions of it, in 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. The edition of 1519 is most esteemed.

The next edition of the New Testament in Greek, is that inserted in the Complutensian Polyglott. The learned agree in wishing the editors had described, or, at least, specified the manuscripts they made use of. The editors speak highly of them; but this was, when the number of known manuscripts was small, and manuscript criticism was in its infancy; so that, without impeaching either their candour or their judgment, their assertions, in this respect, must be understood with much limitation. It has been charged on them, that they sometimes altered the Greek text, without the authority of a single manuscript, to make it conform to the Latin. Against this charge they have been defended by Goeze, and, to a certain extent, by Griesbach.

The editions of Robert Stephens are next to be considered. For exquisite beauty and delicacy of type, elegance and proper disposition of contractions, smoothness and softness of paper, liquid clearness of ink, and evenness of lines and letters, they have never been surpassed, and, in the opinion of many, never equalled. There are four editions of them published by himself, in 1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551. His son published a fifth edition in 1569. The third of these is in folio, and has the readings of sixteen manuscripts, in the margin.—The two first are in 16^{mo}, and of those, the first (that in 1546) is the most correct.

The first edition of Beza was printed in 1565; he principally follows in it the third edition of Robert Stephens. He printed other editions in 1582, 1589, 1598. They do not contain, every where, the same text. In his choice of readings he is accused of being influenced by his Calvinism.

The celebrated edition of the Elzevirs was first printed at Leyden, in 1624. It was printed from the third edition of Robert Stephens: where it varies from that edition, it follows, generally, the edition of Beza. By this edition, the text, which had fluctuated in the preceding editions, acquired a consistency. It was generally followed in all the subsequent editions. It has deservedly, therefore, obtained the appellation of Editio recepta. The editors of it are unknown.

Editions with various readings.

The celebrated edition of the Rev. John Mill was published at Oxford in 1707, after an assiduous labour of thirty years. He survived the publication of it only fourteen days. He inserted in his edition all the collections of various readings, which had been made before his time; he collated several original editions; procured extracts from Greek manuscripts, which had never been collated; and, in many instances, added readings from the ancient versions, and from the quotations of them in the works of the ancient fathers. The whole of the various readings collected by him, are said, without any improbability, to amount to 30,000. He has enriched his work with most learned prolegomena, and a clear and accurate description of his manuscripts. He took the third edition of Stephens for his text.

The edition of John Albert Bengel, abbot of Alspirspack, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, was published in 1734. He prefixed to it his "Introductio in Crisim Novi Testamenti;" and subjoined to it his "Apparatus Criticus & Epilogus." He altered the text, where he thought it might be improved; but, except in the Apocalypse, he studiously avoided inserting in the text any reading, which was not in some printed edition. Under the text he placed some select readings, reserving the whole collection of various readings, and his own sentiments upon them, for his Apparatus Criticus.

All former editions of the Greek Testament were surpassed by that of John James Wetstein: it was published in two volumes folio, in 1751, at Amsterdam. He adopted for his text the editio recepta of the Elzevirs. His collection of various readings far surpasses that of Mill or Bengel. His notes are particularly valuable, for the copious extracts he has made from the Rabbinical writers. These greatly serve to explain the idiom and turn of expression used by the Apostolic writers and Evangelists.

Dr. John James Griesbach, whose edition of the New Testament was first published in 1775—1777, in two volumes octavo, at Halle. In the year 1795, the first volume was reprinted, under the patronage, and at the expence of his grace the duke of Grafton. It has extracts from two hundred manuscripts, in addition to those quoted in the former edition. He has collated all the Latin versions published by Sabatier and Blanchini. His object is to give a select and choice collection of the various readings, produced by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and of his own extracts, omitting all such as are trifling in themselves, supported by little authority, or evidently only errata.

There are many other respectable editions of the Greek Testament; but those we have mentioned are confessedly the principal. The edition by Erasmus, with a slight intermixture of the edition in the Complutensian Polyglott, are the principal editions, from which almost all the subsequent editions have been taken.

Every person, to whom the sacred writings are dear, must wish them edited in the most perfect manner. It would reflect disgrace on the learned of the Christian world, that any Pagan author should be published in a more perfect manner than the word of God.

An Englishman must view with pleasure the useful and magnificent exertions of his countrymen in this respect. Bishop Walton's Polyglott ranks first in that noble and costly class of publications; foreign countries can shew nothing equal to Dr. Kennicott's edition of the Bible, or similar either to Dr. Woide's edition of the Codex Alexandrinus, or Dr. Kipling's edition of the Codex Bezae; and in the whole republic of letters, nothing is now so impatiently expected, as the completion of Dr. Holmes's edition of the Septuagint, of which the books of Genesis and of Exodus are published.

Where the word of God is concerned, the greatest moderation should be used; and care should be taken, that the assertions made, are expressed accurately, and in such terms as prevent improper conclusions being drawn from them.

Where the number of the various readings is mentioned before persons, to whom the subject is new, or in any work likely to have a general circulation, it should be added, that their importance is rather of a literary than a religious kind; and that, whether considered collectively or individually, they do not affect the genuineness of the text, or the substance of its history or doctrine. The improvements, which proposed alterations are thought to make, should not be exaggerated; it should be remarked, that alterations of that description are confessedly few; and that none of them affect the gospel as a history, as a rule of faith, or as a body of morality. Conjectural emendations should almost always be resisted.

We proceed now to a subject more particularly interesting to us as Britons, which is, the history of our national translations; this has already engaged the attention of the learned, by whose labours we shall profit on this subject, as we have done on the foregoing.

English translations of the Bible.

It would be very difficult to ascertain every English translator, or when the Scriptures were first translated into the language of this country:—that the Saxons read the Bible in their own language, is an opinion well authenticated; some parts at least having been translated by Adelm, bishop of Sherborne, Eadfrid (or Ecbert) bishop of Lindisferne, the venerable Bede, and king Alfred. Ælfric, abbot of Malmesbury, translated the Pentateuch, Judges, and Job, which were printed in the year 1699. And the four gospels were printed from an ancient MS. now in the Bodleian library, 1571, under the care of the martyrologist John Fox, assisted and encouraged by Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury. The title is, "The Gospels of the Four Evangelists, translated in the olde Saxons tyme out of Latin, into the vulgare toung of the Saxons, and now published for testimonie of the same. At London by John Daye, dwelling ouer Aldersgate, 1571. Cum privilegio regie majestatis per decemium." And several parts of the scriptures had been from time to time translated by different persons; proofs of which, if not the very translations themselves, exist in different libraries of this kingdom. In particular, in the year 1349, the Psalms, translated by Richard Rolle, a hermit of Hampole in Yorkshire; and in the Barleian and the king's libraries, are specimens of other and different versions: and soon afterwards John Wiclif translated the New Testament.

John Wiclif was born about the beginning of the fourteenth century, at Wiclif, in Yorkshire. Being bred to learning, he was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, and admitted a commoner; but soon after removed to Merton College, where he was a probationer, but not a fellow. In 1356, he is said to have written a tract "Of the Last Age;" in which he exposed the many corrupt ways used to obtain ecclesiastical benefices. He gained considerable reputation by defending the interest of the University against the encroachments of the begging friars, and was chosen warden of Baliol-hall, and presented to the rectory of Fylingham in Lincolnshire, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Lotegarshall. December 14, 1365, he was nominated warden of Canterbury College, incorporated into Christ Church in Oxford, by archbishop Islip the founder; but at the death of the archbishop, he, with three secular fellows, were, in 1367, ejected from thence, and on appeal the sentence was confirmed by the pope's bull in 1370. After his ejection, he read lectures in divinity in that University with such applause, that almost every thing he said was received as an oracle. In 1374, king Edward III. nominated him, with the bishop of Bangor and others, to be his ambassador to treat with the pope's nuncios concerning the provisions of ecclesiastical benefices here in England, claimed by the pope, and long complained of by our parliament as very injurious to the rights of the English church. As a reward for his faithfulness in executing this commission, which was held at Bruges, the king gave him the prebend of Aust, in the collegiate church of Westbury, in the county of Gloucester, and then in the diocese of Worcester (Gloucester was elevated into a bishopric by king Henry VIII.) with the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire. But having shewed himself a defender of the king's supremacy, and freely exposed the artifices and encroachments of the papal power, nineteen articles of accusation were extracted from his lectures and sermons, and transmitted to the pope (Gregory XI.) who, on the 21st of May, 1377, dispatched to Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, and William Courtney, bishop of London, three bulls; by the first of which, these prelates were directed to cause John Wiclif to be apprehended, imprisoned, and put in irons: this gave the doctor a great deal of trouble, and would, in all probability, have ended in his death, if he had not been protected by the duke of Lancaster, uncle to Richard II. who was then king.— It seems that about this time he set about translating the whole Bible in English from the Latin; probably not being sufficiently skilled in Hebrew and Greek to translate from the original tongues. In 1383, he was seized with a palsy, which, however, did not prevent his attending the duties of his function till the 28th of December 1384, when he was again attacked, and died the 31th of the same month.— There are several copies of this translation of the New Testament in different libraries, both public and private, though with some degree of variation. In the year 1731, the New Testament was printed in folio, under the care of the Rev. John Lewis, minister of Margate, and chaplain to Lord Malton, with a glossary.

In the year 1526, William Tyndal printed the first edition of his New Testament.

William Tyndal, or Tyndale, or Tyndall, otherwise Hitchens, was born somewhere in Wales; and being bred to learning, was placed in Magdalen Hall, in Oxford, where now remains an original picture of him. Here he took his degrees, and read lectures privately in divinity to several of the students of that hall, and fellows of the adjoining college. His manners and conversation, says Fox, in his "Acts and Monument," were such, that all who knew him reputed and esteemed him to be a man of a most virtuous disposition, and life unspotted. Wood says, he was expelled for his Lutheran tenets; and whether he took any degree in that University does not appear.

From Oxford he removed to Cambridge, whence, after some stay, he went to Little Sudbury, in Gloucestershire, where he was entertained in the family of Sir John Welch, as tutor to his children. But being suspected of heresy by the neighbouring clergy, with whom he had sometimes disputes about religion, and being by them threatened and persecuted in the ecclesiastical courts, he, with the consent of Sir John, left the family, and went to London, where he for some time preached in the church of St. Dunstan's in the west. Here he obtained the recommendation of Sir Henry Guildford, master of the horse, to Dr. Cuthbert Tunstal, bishop of London, to whom he presented an oration of Isocrates, translated by himself out of the Greek, with an epistle to the bishop, which he wrote by the advice of Sir Henry. But the bishop's answer was, that his house was full; that he had more than he could provide for; and advised him to seek out in London, where he could not fail of employment. Not being able to obtain any, he was supported by Mr. Humphry Monmouth, a draper and alderman of London, a favourer of Luther's opinions; with whom he abode half a year, behaving in the most sober and temperate manner; studying night and day, and bending his thoughts towards the translation of the New Testament into English. But being sensible of the hazard he would run by printing it in England, he resolved to go into Germany, as a place of greater security and more liberty. And this he was better enabled to do by the assistance of his friend Mr. Monmouth, who gave him an annuity of ten pounds a year, then a sufficient maintenance for a single man, and as much as Tyndal desired. At his first leaving England, he went as far as Saxony, where he conferred with Luther, and other eminent reformers. From thence he returned, and settled at Antwerp, where was at that time a considerable factory of English merchants, many of which were zealous professors of Luther's doctrine. Here he immediately set himself about his favourite work, the English translation of the New Testament, in which he had the assistance of John Fry, (or Frith) and a friar named William Roye, who wrote for him, and helped him to compare the texts together; and in the year 1526, it was printed in octavo without a name, with an epistle at the end, wherein he desired them that were learned to amend if ought were found amiss. This edition is very scarce; for soon after its first appearance, the bishop of London, being at Antwerp, desired Augustus Packington, an English merchant, to buy up all the copies that remained unsold; and on the bishop's return, they with many other books, were burned at Paul's Cross, says Fox. This, Dr. Jortin, in his life of Erasmus, thinks was done by the bishop to serve Tyndal; however that be, the sale of these copies put a good sum of money into Tyndal's pocket, and enabled him to prepare another edition for the press more correct than the former, which however was not printed till 1534, he being probably hindered by his avocations as clerk to the English merchants, in which capacity he was received on his first going to Antwerp.

From the first edition 5000 copies were reprinted by the Dutch printers in 1527, 1528, and in 1530; but all these editions are represented to be exceedingly incorrect. In 1534, the Dutch printed a fifth edition, corrected by George Joye, who not only corrected the typographical errors, but ventured to alter, and amend as he thought, the translation; and soon after the second edition by Tyndal himself appeared, in which he complains of Joye's forestalling him, and altering his translation.

George Joye, who corrected the Dutch edition of Tyndal's New Testament in 1534, (for this he was paid, according to his own account, 3 stivers, or 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per sheet, receiving only 14s. Flemish for the whole,) was an English refugee, born in Bedfordshire, and educated in Peter-house, Cambridge, where he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1512, and that of Master in 1527, in which year also he was admitted fellow; but being accused of heresy, he fled to Strasburg. He published a translation of Isaiah in 1531; the Psalter, and Jeremiah, with the song of Moses in 1534. In the reign of king Edward VI. he returned to England, and died in his native country in the year 1553.

Besides purchasing the copies of Tyndal at Antwerp, other means were tried: orders and monitions were issued by the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London, to bring in all the New Testaments translated into the vulgar tongue, that they might be burned, and to prohibit the reading of them.

His brother, John Tyndal, was prosecuted, and sentenced to do penance; his patron, alderman Monmouth, was imprisoned, and almost ruined.

In 1553, king Henry VIII. ordered all the books containing several errors, &c. with the translation of the scriptures corrupted by William Tyndal, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, to be utterly expelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to go abroad among his subjects: a proclamation was issued to the same purpose.

Tyndal's translation of the Pentateuch was printed at Marlborough in Hesse, the year before, and that of Jonah this year. Some are of opinion these were all he translated, and Fox mentions no more; but Hall and Bale, his contemporaries, say, that he likewise translated Joshua, &c. to Nehemiah; which, unless Matthew's be so far a new translation, is most probable. Fuller presumes, that he translated the Old Testament out of the Latin, as his friends allowed him not to have any skill in Hebrew; but in this he might be mistaken. He finished his translation of the Pentateuch in the year 1528; but going by sea to Hamburg, he suffered shipwreck, with the loss of all his books, papers, &c. so that he was obliged to begin the whole again.

Tyndal himself, in a letter to John Frith, written January 1583, says, "I call God to recorde against the day we shall appear before our Lord Jesus, to give a reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one syllable of God's word against my conscience; nor would do this day, if all that is in earth, whether it be honour, pleasure, or riches, might be given to me. Moreover, I take God to witness to my conscience, that I desire of God to myself in this world, no more than that without which I cannot keep his laws."

It appears however, that the king, in pursuance of his own settled judgment, thinking a great deal of good might come of people's reading the New Testament with reverence, and following of it, commanded the bishops to call to them the best learned of the two Universities, and to cause a new translation to be made that the people should not be ignorant of God's law: but nothing being done, the people still read and studied Tyndal's; therefore, according to the policy of the times, it was determined to get rid of so dangerous a heretic; and the king and council employed one Henry Phillips, who insinuated himself into the acquaintance of Mr. Tyndal, and Mr. Thomas Pointz, an English merchant, at whose house he lodged: and at a favourable opportunity he got the procurator-general of the emperor's court to seize on Tyndal, by whom he was brought to Vilvorden, or Filforde, about 18 miles from Antwerp; and after being imprisoned a year and a half, notwithstanding letters in his favour from secretary Cromwell and others, to the court at Brussels, he was tried, and none of his reasons in his defence being admitted, he was condemned by virtue of the emperor's decree made in the assembly at Augsburgh, in the year 1536. His friend Mr. Pointz also was for some time kept in prison, but afterwards made his escape. Being brought to the place of execution, he was first strangled, calling out in his last moments, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes!" and then was burned. Thus died William Tyndal, with this testimony to his character given him by the emperor's procurator or attorney-general, though his adversary, that he was "Homo doctus, pius, et bonus;" which Fox translates, a learned, good, and godly man: and others who conversed with him in the castle, reported of him, that "if he were not a good Christian man, they could not tell whom to trust."

The first English Bible, or complete translation of the scriptures printed, was that by Myles Coverdale, the first edition of which bears date 1535, dedicated to king Henry VIII. This edition is printed in folio, and the title, ornamented with an emblematical border cut in wood, is

"Biblia, the Bible; that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and newly translated out of Douche and Latyn into English. M.D.XXXV."

"St. Paul, 2 Thess. iii. Praise for us, that the word of God maie have free passage and be glorified, &c."

"St. Paul, Coloss. iii. Let the word of Christ dwell in you plentifully in all wisdom, &c."

"Josue i. Let not the boke of this law departe out of thy mouth, but exercise thyselfe therein day and night." A copy is in the British Museum.

In bishop Coverdale's Bible we meet with the following judicious remark, which shews the very respectable knowledge and temper of that great man. "Now whereas the most famous interpreters of all these sondry judgmentes on the texte (so far as it is done by the spiryete of knowledge in the Holye Gooste) methynke no man shoulde be offended thereat, for they referre theyr doynge in mekenes to the spiryete of trueth in the congregation of God: and sure I am, that there commethe more knowledge and understandinge of the scripture by their sondrye translations, than by all the gloses of our sophisticall doctours. For that one interpreteth somthyng obscurely in one place, the same translath another (or els he himselfe) more manifestly by a more playne vocable of the same meaning in another place."

More than common care seems to have been taken by Myles Coverdale in the language of his translation: we have some, but they are very few, instances of barbarism, and none which are not authorised by the purest writers of the times in which he wrote. To him and other translators of the scriptures, especially of the present Bible, by the authority of king James, our language owes perhaps more than to all the authors who have written since: and even though some of the expressions may appear uncouth, their fewness renders them not offensive; they are never vulgar, they preserve their ancient simplicity pure and undefiled, and in their circumstance and connexion perhaps but seldom could be exchanged for the better: nor will this opinion be condemned when it is considered, that that elegant writer and learned prelate, bishop Lowth, has constantly used the words where he has not differed from the translation; and whenever amendments have been intended in the language of the scriptures, if we have gained any thing in elegance, we have almost assuredly lost in dignity.

Myles Coverdale was born in Yorkshire, in the reign of king Richard III. or beginning of king Henry VII. about the year 1484, and being educated in the Romish religion, became an Augustine monk. But afterwards embracing the Reformation, he entered into holy orders. He seems little noticed during the reign of Henry VIII.; but soon after the accession of Edward VI. he was one of the first, upon the revival of the church of England, together with Dr. Robert Barnes, that taught the purity of the gospel, and dedicated himself to the service of religion; and in the year 1551 was, on the decease of Dr. John Harman, consecrated bishop of Exeter, being promoted for his singular knowledge in divinity, and his unblemished character. "Propter singularem sacramentum literarum doctrinam, moresque probatissimos."

Under the change of religion in queen Mary's reign, our bishop was, like others, ejected from his see, and thrown into prison; but M. Machabæus, superintendent in Denmark, and related to Coverdale's wife, obtained of Christian, king of Denmark, who also had some knowledge of him, having seen him at his court in Henry VIII.'s time, to intercede with queen Mary in his behalf; which he did with such perseverance, that after some considerable time, and not without difficulty, he was released, and permitted to go into banishment. Two letters written by Christian to queen Mary on this occasion, are preserved by Fox in his Acts and Monuments.

Coverdale took up his residence principally at Geneva, where he engaged with some Protestant refugees in a new version of the scriptures from the Hebrew and Greek languages with notes, called from the place, The Geneva Bible; and after the death of queen Mary, when the affairs in religion took a different turn, he came back to England, but not immediately, probably because the translation was not then finished, and (says the author of his life in the Biographia Brit.) refused to be restored to his bishopric; but this is hardly reconcilable with the state of his poverty and complaints related by Mr. Strype, who says, “Old Myles Coverdale, D.D. formerly bishop of Exon, and an exile, famous for translating the Bible into English in the reign of king Henry VIII. and other good services to religion, had been hitherto without any place of preferment, living privately in and about London, and often preaching in the churches there. For this very reverend man, that had so well deserved of religion, our bishop had a great concern; and it troubled him much to see such an one as it were, cast by, without that notice taken of him that was due; and once cried out about it, “I cannot excuse us bishops;” but somewhat, he said, he had to speak for himself, that he had offered him divers things, which nevertheless he thought not meet to accept of.

“This man, notwithstanding his great years, had gotten the plague this year, and recovered, as though God had some more work for him to do in the church before his death. Grindal acquaints the secretary herewith; telling him, that surely it was not well, that father Coverdale, as he styled him, Qui ante nos omnes fuit in Christo; i. e. who was in Christ before us all, should now be in his age without stay of living. And therefore, Landall being void, he recommended him to the secretary for that see, if any competency of living might be made of it, after it had been so spoiled and stripped by the last incumbent: putting him in mind here, that it would be well if any means might be found, that things wickedly alienated from that see might be restored. But, I suppose, Coverdale cared not now to enter upon the charge of a bishopric, considering his own age, and his want of strength and activity, required to execute such an office. But, in fine, in the month of February, our bishop collated Coverdale to the parish of S. Magnus, at the bridge foot; and withal, sued to the secretary to obtain the favour of the queen to release him his first-fruits, which came to sixty pounds and upwards. And the venerable man pleaded himself for this favour to be shewn him, for these reasons, viz. that he had been destitute ever since his bishopric had been taken away from him (which was upon the death of king Edward); and that he never had pension, annuity, or stipend of it, for ten years now past. And that he was unable either to pay the first-fruits, or long to enjoy the same living; not able to live over a year, and going upon his grave. And lastly, adding these words, that if poor old Myles might be thus provided for, he should think this enough to be as good as a feast. And he enjoyed his request.

The contents of his letter to the archbishop, which will set forth his present condition were,

“That it would please him to join with the bishop of London in suit for him to the queen, that, in favourable consideration, how destitute he had been of a competent living in the realm, ever since his bishopric was violently taken away from him; I being, said he, compelled to resign, and how I never had pension, annuity, or stipend of it, these ten years and upwards; how unable also I am to pay the first-fruits, or long to enjoy the said benefice, going upon my grave, as they say, and not like to live another year; her majesty, at the contemplation of such revered, honourable, and worthy suitors, will most graciously grant me her warrant and discharge for the first-fruits of the said benefice. And as I am bold most humbly to crave your Grace's help herein, so am I fully persuaded, (God willing) to shew myself again as thankful, and in my vocation, during my short time, as fruitful, and as quiet as I can.

“MYL. COV. quond. Exon.”

“29th Jan. New Year.”

It is to be observed, that many of the first reformers had a great objection to the ecclesiastical habits, and to almost every kind of ceremony; holding them remnants of popery. The refugees, who settled at Geneva, were particularly tenacious in this respect. The expression, “as quiet as I can,” seems to imply that such objections had been made by Coverdale, and some arguments used to prevail on him to conform; to which not consenting, his other merits might not be sufficient to his re-establishment in the church.

“He wrote also in the beginning of February to Cecyl the secretary, to the same import, to be a means for him to the queen, to grant him the first-fruits of the said S. Magnus, which the bishop of London had gently granted him the pastoral office and benefice of. That heretofore (he praised God for it) his honour had ever been his special help and succour in all his rightful suits. And that, if now (that poor old Myles might be provided for) it would please him to obtain this for him, he should think this enough to be as good as a feast. And so beseeching him to take this his boldness in good part, he committed him and all his to the gracious protection of the Almighty.

“MYL. COV. quond. Eron.”

“From London, 6th Feb.

Coverdale wrote a month or six weeks after to the archbishop again, signifying that the Lord Robert Dudley sent him a message, that the queen had granted him his first-fruits. He lived little more than two years after, and died aged 31, living, as he promised the archbishop, quiet, though not coming up to the uniformity required, which had occasioned so much inquietness in others: and perhaps relinquishing his parish before his death. For he was buried not at S. Magnus, but S. Bartholomew.

At the convocation, 1536, probably, the clergy agreed upon a petition to the king, that he would be graciously pleased to grant unto the laity the reading of the Bible in the English tongue; and that a new translation might be made for that purpose; and soon after were issued injunctions to the clergy by the authority of the king's highness, the seventh article of which commands,

“That every person or proprietary of any parish church within this realm, at this great feast of St. Peter ad vincula, [Aug. 1.] next coming, provide a boke of the whole Bible, both in Latin and also in English, and laye the same in the quire for every man that will look thereon: and shall discourage no man from the reading any part of the Bible, either in Latin or English; but rather comfort, exhort, and admonish every man to read the same, as the very word of God, and the spiritual food of man's soul; whereby they may better know their duties to God, to the sovereign lord the king, and their neighbour: ever gently and charitably exhorting them, that using a sober and modest behaviour in the reading and inquisition of the true sense of the same, they do in no wise stiffly or eagerly contend or strive one with another about the same, but refer the declaration of those places that be in controversy, to the judgment of them that be learned.”

The first edition of Matthew's Bible generally known was printed in the year 1537. The title is, in an emblematical frontispiece cut in wood, “The Byble, which is all the Holy Scripture, in which are contained, the Olde and Newe Testament, truly and purely translated into English by Thomas Matthew.”

“Esaye 1. Hearken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, heave care, for the Lorde speaketh.—M.D.XXXVII.”

“Set forth with the king's most gracious lycence.”

At the end.

“¶ The Ende of the Newe Testament of the whole Byble.”

“¶ To the honour and praise of God was this Byble prynted and fyneshed in the yere of our Lorde God, a. M.D.XXXVII.”

The name of Thomas Matthew is said to have been fictitious, and used by the real editor John Rogers from motives of prudence or fear; for although no clamour was raised against Myles Coverdale for his translation, the name of Tyndal was exceedingly odious to the clergy; and much trouble might reasonably have been expected from an acknowledged republication of his translation.

“None will deny, says Fuller, but that many faults needing amendment are found in the [Tyndal's] translation, which is no wonder to those who consider; first, such an undertaking was not the task for a man, but men. Secondly, no great design is invented and perfected at once. Thirdly, Tyndal, being an exile, wanted many necessary accommodations. Fourthly, his skill in Hebrew was not considerable; yea, generally learning in languages was then but in the infancy thereof. Fifthly, our English tongue was not improved to that expressiveness, wherat at this day it is arrived. However, what he undertook, was to be admired as glorious; what he performed to be commended as profitable; wherein he failed, is to be excused as pardonable, and to be scored on the account rather of that age, than of the author himself. Yea, Tyndal's pains were useful, had his translation done no other good than to help towards the making of a better; our last translators having in expresse charge from king James to consult the translation of Tyndal.”

Matthew's Bible is composed partly from Tyndal's, and partly from Coverdale's translations, with some alterations, taking Tyndal's New Testament, and such parts of the Old as were translated by him, except that the prophecy of Jonah is of Coverdale's translation; neither is Tyndal's prologue prefixed to Jonah, or any other prologue inserted, except to the Romans, in that which is supposed to be the first edition. Sundry alterations are made from Coverdale, and some have been of opinion, that it was a new work undertaken by Coverdale, Tyndal and Rogers, and that the latter translated the Apocrypha; but Mr. Lewis thinks that Coverdale had none to assist him in his translation, and that he was not concerned in that called Matthew's, but only John Rogers, who made a few alterations, but not a new translation.

John Rogers was a native of Lancashire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1525. From thence he was the same year chosen junior canon in Cardinal Wolsey's College (now Christ church), in Oxford, but on the publication of the six articles, he fled to Germany, and was appointed chaplain to the merchants at Antwerp, in whose service he resided some years. Here falling into company, and conversing with Tyndal, and Coverdale (says Fox), he joined with them in that painful and most profitable labour of translating the Bible into the English tongue, (which is entitled, The translation of Thomas Matthew) married, and renounced popery. He was afterwards chosen pastor of a congregation of Protestants at Wittenberg, in Saxony, having attained a knowledge of the language. In the reign of king Edward VI. he came back to England, and was preferred to the vicarage of St. Sepulchre's in London. Bishop Ridley likewise gave him a prebend in the church of St. Paul's, and the Dean and Chapter chose him to be reader of the divinity lesson there. Thus he continued till the reign of queen Mary, when, preaching a sermon at St. Paul's, warning the people to guard against popery, he was called before the council, and soon after tried and condemned as an heretic. He was the first martyr who suffered in that reign, being burned at Smithfield, Feb. 4, 1555.

Archbishop Cranmer's Bible was printed in the year 1539, though perhaps first proposed in convocation six years before, but had at that time proved abortive; and now published with a prologue by the archbishop. In this Bible, the translations of Coverdale and Matthew seem to be revised and corrected. The Psalms are those now used in the Liturgy.

In the year 1538, Grafton and Whitchurch had obtained permission of king Henry VIII. to print the Bible at Paris; but when the work was nearly finished, by an order of the Inquisition, dated the 17th of December the same year, the printers were inhibited under canonical pains to proceed; and the whole impression of two thousand five hundred copies was seized and confiscated; but by the encouragement of the Lord Cromwell, some Englishmen returned to Paris, recovered the presses, types, &c. and brought them to London, where the work was resumed, and a Bible was finished in 1539, the title of which is,

“¶ The Byble in Englyshe, that is to saye, the content of all the Holy Scripture both of the Old and New Testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrew and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the sayde tonges.

This was called Cranmer's Bible, on account of the preface, or prologue, which was written by the archbishop.

Thomas Cranmer was born at Arslacton in Nottinghamshire, in the year 1489. He was educated at Cambridge, admitted a fellow of Jesus College, and made one of the examiners of those who took degrees in divinity. By marrying he lost his fellowship; but his wife dying within a year he was reinstated. The occasion of his preferment was his opinion concerning the king's divorce, “That it might be decided from the Scriptures, by learned men in England, as well as at Rome;” in consequence of which Mr. Cramer was sent for to court, and made king's chaplain; and writing in favour of the divorce, he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Taunton. In 1550, being sent to Italy, Germany, and France, to discuss the king's marriage, the pope constituted him his plenipotentiary throughout England, Ireland, and Wales. In 1532, he married again; and on the death of archbishop Waiham, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and consecrated in 1533. In 1545—1546, he procured a repeal of the six articles, the establishment of the communion in both kinds, and a public liturgy, &c. Upon king Edward's death he appeared for lady Jane Gray, for which he was summoned before queen Mary's council, and committed to the Tower. In the ensuing parliament he was attainted, and found guilty of high treason.—His treason being pardoned, he was next tried at Oxford as an heretic, and burned on the 21st of March 1555-6, in the 67th year of his age.

There are several editions of archbishop Cranmer's Bible; in particular, one in 1541, under the care of Tonstal, bishop of Durham, and Heath, bishop of Rochester; and another, printed at Rouen, at the charge of Richard Camarden, 1556.

In November 1539, the king appointed lord Cromwell to take especial care and charge, that no manner of person or persons within this his realm, shall enterprise, attempt, or set in hand to print any Bible in the English tongue of any manner of volume, during the space of five years next ensuing the date thereof, but only such as shall be deputed, assigned, and admitted by the said lord Cromwell; and it is not improbable but this might have been done in favour of Taverner's Bible, which appeared at this time: Bale calls it, Sacrorum recognitio, seu potius versio nova; but Mr. Lewis says, that it is neither a bare revision, nor a correct edition of the English Bible; nor yet strictly a new version, but between both; it is what may be called a correction of Matthew's Bible, wherever the editor thought it needful. He takes in great part of Matthew's marginal notes, but omits several, and inserts others of his own.

Richard Taverner was born at Brisley in Norfolk, in the year 1505, and first studied at Benet-college in Cambridge; after a year and a half spent in academical studies, he was chosen one of the junior canons of Christ-church (then Cardinal-college) in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, 1529. From thence he went to Staire-Inn, otherwise called Strand-Inn, destroyed for the purpose of building Somerset-house, to study the law, and from thence to the Inner Temple, where, it is said, his way was to quote the law in Greek when he read any thing thereof. In 1534 he went to court, being taken into the service of Sir Thomas Cromwell; and in 1537 was made one of the signet in ordinary: in which situation he made this recognition of the Bible, which was authorised to be read in churches.

After lord Cromwell's death in 1540, he was committed prisoner to the Tower for publishing the Bible; but he was soon acquitted, and restored to the king's favour, and to his place at court, in which he continued till the accession of queen Mary; from which time till her death, he retired to his seat called Norbiton-hall, in Surrey. He was afterwards a great favourite of queen Elizabeth, and received from her the honour of knighthood. He died at Woodeaton in Oxfordshire, in July 1575.

The title of Taverner's Bible is,

"The Most Sacred Bible, which is the Holy Scripture, conteyning the Old and New Testament, translated into English, and newly recognized with great diligence after most faythful exemplars, by Rychard Taverner.

"Harken thou heaven, and thou earth gyve care: for the Lorde speaketh. Esaie i.

"Prynted at London in Fletestrete at the sygne of the sonne, by John Byddell, for Thomas Barthlet.—Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum.
M.D.XXXIX."

In the convocation held February 6, 1542, the archbishop in the king's name required the bishops and clergy to revise the translation of the scriptures; and for that purpose different parts of the New Testament were put into the hands of several bishops for their perusal: the archbishop took the gospel of St. Matthew; Mark was given to Longland, bishop of Lincoln; Luke, to Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; John, to Goodrich, bishop of Ely; Acts, to Heath, bishop of Rochester; Romans, to Samson, bishop of Chichester; I. and II. Corinthians, to Capon, bishop of Sarum; Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, to Barlow, bishop of St. David's; I. and II. Thessalonians, to Bell, bishop of Worcester; Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, to Parfew, bishop of St. Asaph; I. and II. Peter, to Holgate, bishop of Landaff; Hebrews, to Skip, bishop of Hereford; James, the three epistles of John, and Jude, to Thyrleby, bishop of Westminster; and the Revelation, to Wakeman, bishop of Gloucester, and Chambers, bishop of Peterborough.

Many objections were raised on various pretences, and bishop Gardiner read a list of ninety-nine Latin words, which he said would not admit of being translated into English. By this the archbishop found that this motion of translation would come to nothing. And a determination of the king's to wrest the work from the bishops, and place it in the hands of the Universities, seems to have had a similar fate; for the next year an act was passed which condemned all Tyndal's translation as crafty, false, and untrue; and enacted, that all books of the Old and New Testament of his translation should, by the authority of this act, be abolished, extinguished, and forbidden to be kept and used in this realm, or elsewhere in his majesty's dominions. But it was provided,

"That the Bibles and New Testaments in English, not being of Tyndal's translations, should stand in force, and not be comprised in this abolition or act. Nevertheless, if there should be found in anie such Bibles or New Testaments anie annotations or preambles, that then the owners of them should cut or blot the same in such wise as they cannot be perceived or read, on pain of losing or forfeiting for every Bible, &c. 40s. Provided that this article should not extend to the blotting, &c. any quotations or summaries of chapters in any Bibles."

It was likewise enacted, "That no manner of person or persons, after the first day of October then next ensuing, should take upon him or them to read, openly to other in any church or open assembly, within any of the king's dominions, the Bible or any part of the scripture in English, unless he was so appointed thereunto by the king, or by any ordinary, &c. on pain of suffering a month's imprisonment.—Provided, that the chauncellor of England, capitaines of the warres, the king's justices, the recorders of any city, borough, or town, the speaker of the Parliament, &c. which heretofore have been accustomed to declaire or teache any good, vertuous, or godly exhortations in anie assemblies, may use any part of the Bible or holic scriptures as they have been wont; and that every nobleman, and gentleman, being a householder, may read, or cause to be read by any of his familie, servants in his house, orchardes, or garden, and to his own familie, anie text of the Bible or New Testament: and also every merchant-man, being a householder, and any other persons other than women, prentises, &c. might read to themselves privately the Bible, &c. But no woman (except noblewomen and gentlewomen, who might read to themselves alone, and not to others, any texts of the Bible, &c.), nor artificers, prentises, journeymen, serving-men, of the degrees of yomen or under, husbandmen, nor labourers, were to read the Bible or New Testament in English to himself or any other privately or openly, upon paine of one month's imprisonment."

Grafton was called to account for printing Matthew's Bible 1537, and examined as to the great Bible, what notes he intended to set to it; to which he replied, "that he added none to the Bible he printed, when he perceived the king and the clergy not willing to have any." Yet he was confined a prisoner in the Fleet six weeks, and then released on being bound in a bond of 300*l.* neither to imprint or sell any more English Bibles till the king and clergy should agree upon a translation.

And again another act was passed, July 8, 1546, whereby the having and reading Tyndal's and Coverdale's translations was prohibited, as well as the use of any other than what was allowed by act of Parliament. Thus matters continued so long as king Henry lived; but, on the accession of his son Edward VI. they took another turn; the Reformation was encouraged, and the acts which prohibited the translation of the scriptures, were repealed. Injunctions were issued, and sent into every part of the kingdom, among other things enjoining, that within three months a Bible of the larger volume in English, and within twelve months Erasmus's Paraphrase on the Gospels, be provided, and conveniently placed in the churches for the people to read in.

Common Prayer.

The same year also, 1549, was printed the Book of Common Prayer, compiled by Cramer, archbishop of Canterbury; Day, bishop of Chichester; Goodrich, bishop of Ely; Skip, bishop of Hereford; Holbeach, bishop of Lincoln; Ridley, bishop of Rochester; Thyrleby, bishop of Winchester; Dr. May, dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Taylor, dean of Lincoln; Dr. Haines, dean of Exeter; Dr. Robertson, dean of Durham; Dr. Redman, master of Trinity-College, Cambridge; and Dr. Cox, almoner to the king.

Division into verses.

On the death of Edward, when Mary came to the crown, many of the reformed fled into divers parts of Germany, and some of them who resided at Geneva, setting about a new translation of the Scriptures, in the year 1557 the New Testament was printed at Geneva by Conrade Badius, and is said to be the first in English divided into verses.

Whatever the antiquity of the Hebrew vowel points may be, the division of verses in the Old Testament is antecedent to the discovery of printing, or any manuscripts that are known to exist; but in the Greek manuscripts of the New Testament, there is no distinction of verses, and when they were first used by printers, is perhaps not very accurately ascertained.

Robert Stephens is thought to have been the author or inventor of verses in the New Testament, which (says his son in the preface to his Concordance) he performed in a journey on horseback [inter equitandum] from Paris to Lyons.

Father Calmet says, "the first division of the New Testament was made by Robert Stephens in 1551, and of the whole Bible in 1555." Michaelis says, "verses were first used in the New Testament by Robert Stephens in 1551, and in the Old Testament by Hugo de St. Claro, a Dominican monk in the twelfth century." But a Latin Bible, translated by Sanctus Pagninus, and printed at Lyons in the year 1527 or 1528, before Robert Stephens had printed any Bible, on his own account, at least, is divided, the verses being numbered in the margin, and distinguished in the text, by paragraphical marks, both in the Old and New Testament, and in the Apocrypha. The New Testament is indeed made into fewer divisions. St. Matthew's gospel, in this edition, is divided into 576 verses (the first chapter containing 49, each of the present genealogical verses making 3) while the present division amounts to 1071. The gospel of St. Mark is as 257 to 678. In the Old Testament the difference is small; in Genesis only 22 verses. Father Calmet notes this Bible, but not the division of verses. In the title page the date is 1528, but the imprint at the end is, "Veteris ac novi instrumenti nova translatio per Reverendum sacre Theolo. docto. Sanctem Pagninum Lucen. nuper edita, explicit. Impressa est autem Lugduni per Antonium du Ry. calcographum diligentissimum impensis Francisci Turchi, et Domini Berticinium Lucensium, et Jacobi de Giuntis bibliopole civis Florentini. Anno Domini 1527, Die vero xix Januarii." Is there not then reason to conclude, that Robert Stephens had seen this Bible, foresaw the utility of verses, imitated, and improved thereon? The great advantage of such a division is allowed by all to whom the use of a concordance is known.

Punctuation of the Bible.

The punctuation of the Bible is a modern invention. In the ancient manuscripts no marks are found, except a point and a blank space. The comma was invented in the eighth century; the semicolon in the ninth; the other stops were introduced afterwards. The spirits and the accents are not earlier, in the opinion of most writers, than the seventh century.

Concordance to the Bible.

The first English concordance that we read of is that of Marbeck, printed in the year 1550, by Richard Grafton, compiled, as it seems, from the great Bible, i. e. archbishop Cramer's Bible.

John Marbeck was an organist in Windsor choir, and much befriended by bishop Gardiner. He was accused and condemned on the statute of the Six Articles, but pardoned.

Another edition of the Geneva Testament was printed in 1560, in which year the whole Bible was also printed at Geneva by Rowland Harle, or Hall, in quarto. The persons who translated the Geneva Bible, are supposed to have been Coverdale, Goodman, Gilby, Whittingham, Samson, and Cole; to which some add Knox, Bodleigh, and Pullan.—The principal were, Coverdale, Whittingham, and Gilby, who did not return to England till the whole was finished in 1560.

Christopher Goodman was born in Cheshire, and after a grammatical education sent to Brazen-Nose-College at Oxford. In 1544 he took his Master of Arts degree, and in 1547 he was chosen one of the senior students of Christ-church, and professor of divinity, (whether of the Margaret lectures or of those founded by Henry VIII. does not appear) but quitted his preferment, and went abroad on Mary's coming to the crown, first to Francon; but afterwards he removed to Geneva, with Whittingham and other dissentients, on account of some ecclesiastical disputes, where he abode till the reign of queen Elizabeth, when he returned to England, and died at Chester in the year 1602.

Anthony Gilby was likewise a refugee.

Singing Psalms.

William Whittingham was a Cheshire man, and educated at the same college with Christopher Goodman; in 1545 he was elected fellow of All Souls, and two years after a senior student of Christ-church. He went abroad at the death of Edward VI. and returning in the reign of queen Elizabeth, he was made dean of Dunholme, (Durham) in 1563. He was one of those who assisted with Sternhold and Hopkins in translating the Psalms into metre, and his are distinguished by the initials W. W. Thomas Norton, of Sharpshole, or Sharpshoe in Bedfordshire, was another of the translators.

The first edition of Sternhold's Psalms was probably in 1552. But before this the Psalms in metre were printed 1549, said to be translated by John Keper; and another version by Robert Crowley, the same year.

Thomas Sampson born about the year 1517, was educated at Oxford; and renouncing popery, he was ordained by Dr. Ridley, bishop of London.—In 1551, he was collated by the archbishop of Canterbury to the living of All Hallows, Bread-Street, which he resigned in 1553, being, it is said, promoted to the deanery of Chichester. In the reign of queen Mary, being married, (his wife was the niece of Hugh Latimer) he left the kingdom, and retired to Geneva; but on the accession of queen Elizabeth, returning to England, in 1561, he was promoted to the deanery of Christ church, Oxford, of which dignity he was deprived in 1564, for not wearing the habits then enjoined. The queen offered him the bishopric of Norwich, which he refused, for no other reason but his averseness from the ceremonies and habits of the church.

Thomas Cole was, during the reign of queen Mary, a refugee at Geneva; but returning into England in the next reign, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Essex, in January 1559, by Grindal, bishop of London, and had the rectory of High-Ongar in Essex given him.

That which was done in the Geneva Bible was as follows:—

"1. Because some translations read after one sort, and some after another, they noted in the margin the diversities of speech, and reading, especially according to the Hebrew.

"2. Where the Hebrew speech seemed hardly to agree with ours, they noted in the margin, using that which was more intelligible.

"3. Though many of the Hebrew names were altered from the old text, and restored to the true writing, and first original, yet in the usual names, little was changed, for fear of troubling the simple readers.

"4. Whereas the necessity of the sentence required any thing to be added, whether verb, or other word, they put it in the text with another kind of letter, that it might easily be discerned from the common letter of the text.

"5. As touching the division of the verses, they followed the Hebrew examples, adding the number to each verse.

"6. The principal matters were noted; and the arguments, both for each book, and for each chapter.

"7. They set over the head of every page, some notable word, or sentence, for the help of memory.

"8. They set brief annotations upon all the hard places, as well for the understanding of obscure words, as for declaration of the text. And for this purpose they diligently read the best commentaries; and had much conference with godly and learned brethren.

"9. They set forth with figures certain places in the books of Moses, of the Kings, and Ezekiel; which seemed so dark, that by no other description they could be made easy to the reader.

“10. They added certain maps of cosmography, of divers places and countries, partly described, and partly by occasion touched, both in the Old and New Testament.

“11. They adjoined two profitable tables: the one of interpretations of Hebrew names, and the other containing all the chief and principal matters of the whole Bible.

But in the year 1565 the Bible was preparing for a second impression. As this Bible had been set forth before by a joint company of men, (the name of one whereof, and we think the chief undertaker, was John Bodleigh) so about the beginning of March they had finished a careful review and correction of this translation, in order to the reprinting it. Bodleigh had applied himself to the queen's secretary Cecyl, for the renewing of his privilege, with longer term of years than was at first granted them, for the new printing of this Bible, that had been by him and his associates before published.—But the secretary suspended giving his furtherance, until he had heard the advice of the archbishop and bishop of London. Whereupon Bodleigh repaired unto them, and signified the charge he and the rest had been at, by the last impression, and by the late review, desiring their letter to the secretary. They secretary, I suppose, might make some scruple at the encouragement of this new impression; because the bishops had intended themselves speedily to publish a fair and accurate English translation. But both the archbishop and bishop willingly gave their letters to the secretary in Bodleigh's behalf: writing to him, that they thought so well of the first impression, and the review of those who had since travailed therein, that they wished it would please him to be a means, that twelve years longer term might be by special privilege granted to him in consideration of the charges by him and his associates in the first impression, and the review since sustained. And that though one other special Bible for the churches were meant by them to be set forth, as convenient time and leisure hereafter might permit; yet should it nothing hinder, but rather do much good, to have diversity of translations and readings. And that if the license hereafter to be made went simply forth, without proviso of their oversight, as they thought it might so pass well enough, yet they told the secretary, they would take such order with the party, in writing [under his hand] that no impression should pass but by their direction, consent, and advice.—This was writ from Lambeth, signed by the archbishop, and bishop of London, March 9. Strype.

The reign of queen Mary was too unfavourable for any translation of the scriptures to be printed in England; and except the Geneva Testament before mentioned, we meet with nothing but a quarto primer, Latin and English, after the use of Sarum, with the epistles and gospels in English, printed by John Kingston and Henry Sutton, 1557.

In the first parliament of queen Elizabeth, held January 1558, an act passed for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical and spiritual; and another for the uniformity of common prayer, and service in the church, &c. The queen also appointed a royal visitation, and gave her injunctions, as well to the clergy as laity, by which it was ordered, as in the reign of Edward VI. that they should, at the charge of the parish, within three months, provide one book of the whole Bible of the largest volume in English, and within twelve months the Paraphrase of Erasmus.

The following year the liturgy was reviewed, and altered in some passages; and being presented to parliament, was by them received and established.—The persons employed were, according to Fuller, Master Whitehead, once chaplain to queen Ann Boleyn; Parker, archbishop of Canterbury; Grindal, bishop of London; Cox, bishop of Ely; Pilkington, bishop of Durham; Dr. May, dean of St. Paul's; and Sir Thomas Smith, principal secretary of state. And soon after a design was formed to make a new translation of the scriptures, under the direction of archbishop Parker; which, however, was not printed before the year 1568, when it first appeared in folio: this is called The Bishops' Bible.

The work was divided into several parcels, and assigned to men of learning and character, picked out for the purpose. Most of the divisions are marked with great initial letters, signifying either the titles or names of the persons employed. William Ally, bishop of Exeter, had the Pentateuch for his proportion, and at the end there stands the capital letters W. E. Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and the two books of Samuel, were given to Richard Davies, preferred to the see of St. David's, when Young was translated to York: it is marked R. M. The four books of Kings, and Chronicles, were assigned to Edwin Sandys, then bishop of Worcester. The books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Job, were done by one whose name is marked A. P. C. which probably might stand for Andrew Person, one of the archbishop's chaplains, and prebendary of Canterbury. The book of Psalms is signed with T. B. whether this was Thomas Bentham, bishop of Coventry, or Thomas Becon, prebendary of Canterbury, is somewhat uncertain, but most probably the latter. The Proverbs were translated by one who subscribes A. P. C. the C stands at some distance, probably to distinguish the person from the former A. P. C. Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song, are marked with A. P. E. for Andrea Pernic Eliensis.—

Esajah, Jeremy, and Lamentations, were done by Robert Horn, bishop of Winchester, as may be conjectured from the letters R. W. Ezekiel and Daniel, were translated by T. C. L. which is supposed to stand for Bentham, bishop of Litchfield. Hosea, Joel, and so forward through all the minor prophets, is signed E. L. and was done by Edmund Grindal, bishop of London. The Apocrypha, as it is said, was translated by Parkhurst, bishop of Norwich; the capitals subjoined are T. N. Bishop Burnet relates, Barlow, bishop of Chichester, began with Esdras, and translated to the book of Wisdom. The four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistle to the Romans, were given to Cox, bishop of Ely; the capitals are R. E. for Ricardus Eliensis.—The first epistle to the Corinthians is subscribed G. G. which probably may stand for Gabriel Goodman, then dean of Westminster. The remainder of the New Testament has no capitals subjoined. Archbishop Parker had the main direction of this affair, reviewed the performance, and, it may be, gave the finishing hand. He employed several cities in the Hebrew and Greek languages to review the old translation, and compare it with the original. One Lawrence, an eminent Grecian, was made use of to examine the version of the New Testament. He seems to have been well qualified for this undertaking, managed with great exactness, and made several animadversions upon the performances of Beza and Erasmus in this way.

The bishop of Worcester, who was well skilled in the oriental languages, when he had finished his part, sent it to the archbishop, with his letter, dated Worcester, February 6, 1565.

My duty remembered: according to your Grace's letter of instruction, I have perused the book you sent me, and with good diligence; having also, in conference with some other, considered of the same, in such sort, I trust, as your Grace will not mislike of. I have sent up with it my clerk, whose hand I used in writing forth corrections and marginal notes. When it shall please your Grace to set over the book to be viewed by some one of your chaplains, my said clerk shall attend a day or two, to make it plain unto him how my notes are to be placed. In mine opinion, your Grace shall do well to make the whole Bible to be diligently surveyed by some well learned, before it be put to print; and also to have skilful and diligent correctors at the printing of it. That it may be done in such perfection, that the adversaries can have no occasion to quarrel with it. Which thing will require a time; sed sat cito, si sat bene.—The setters forth of this our common translation followed Munster too much, who doubtless was a very negligent man in his doings, and often swerved very much from the Hebrew. Thus, trusting that your Grace will take in good part my trifles, wherein wanted no good will, I commend the same to the grace of Almighty God. From my house at Worcester. Your Grace's in Christ at commandment.

EDW. WIGORN.

And in another letter the same pious bishop puts the archbishop in mind of this great work to proceed earnestly forward in it:—

Your Grace (said he) should much benefit the church in hastening forward the Bible, which you have in hand: those that we have, be not only false printed, but also give great offence to many by reason of the depravity in reading."

To Guest, bishop of Rochester, the archbishop sent the book of Psalms to revise; and he sent it back again with his notes and advertisements, as the bishop of Worcester had done. In his letter to the archbishop, he said, "He had not altered the translation, but where it gave occasion of an error. As at the first Psalm, at the beginning, I turn the preterperfect tense into the present tense, because the sense is too harsh in the preterperfect tense. Where, in the New Testament, one piece of a psalm is reported, I translate it in the Psalms according to the translation thereof in the New Testament, for the avoiding of the offence that may rise to the people upon divers translations.—Where two great letters be joined together, or where one great letter is twice put, it signifieth that both the sentences of the words be expounded together."

To Parkhurst, bishop of Norwich, the archbishop sent another part of the Bible, to make his notes and advertisements upon, who wrote back to the archbishop, "That he would travail therein with such diligence and expedition as he might."

Davies, bishop of St. David's, had another portion, and he wrote to the archbishop, "That he was in hand with that part of the Bible he sent him."—And again, not long after the year 1566, he wrote the archbishop, "That he would finish it with as much speed as he could; and that he bestowed for his performance of the same all such time as he could spare."

This bishop was now very busy in translating the Bible into Welch, together with William Salisbury, bishop of Man, a man very learned in the British antiquities.

This business in correcting the former translation of the Bible went forward the next year 1566.

Cox, bishop of Ely, who seems to have had another part of the holy scripture committed to him, in a letter dated May 3, 1566, had these words concerning this noble work: "I trust your Grace is well forward with the Bible by this time. I perceive the greatest burden will lie upon your neck, touching care and travail. I would wish that such usual words as we English people be acquainted with, might still remain in their form and sound, so far as the Hebrew will well bear; inhorn terms to be avoided. The translation of the verbs in the Psalms to be used uniformly in one tense, &c. And if ye translate bonitas, or misericordia, to use it likewise in all places of the Psalms, &c. God send this good travail a blessed success."

We shall hear more of the archbishop Parker's care and pains in this translation, under the years 1568, 1569, and 1572, when it seems first to have been printed in the largest folio, according to Dr. Fulk, in his Defence of the English Translation against Gregory Martin, where he speaks of the Bible revised by divers bishops to be first printed in the large volumes, and authorised for the churches."

Matthew Parker was born at Norwich in the year 1504, and was sent by his mother (his father dying when he was but twelve years old) to the University of Cambridge. He was first a Bible clerk in Corpus-Christi-College, and afterwards a fellow. His first preferment was the deanery of Stoke, which he obtained by the favour of queen Ann Boleyn to whom he was chaplain. At her death king Henry VIII. appointed him chaplain to himself, in which capacity he also served his son Edward VI. By the former he was promoted to a prebend of Ely, and the mastership of Corpus-Christi, (by the election of the fellows, at the command of the king.) Edward VI. gave him the deanery of Lincoln, with the prebend of Coldingham; which preferments he enjoyed till the reign of queen Mary, in which, for being married, he was deprived, and lived poorly during her reign. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, the see of Canterbury being vacant by the death of Cardinal Pole, he was thought the properest man for that high place and preferment, and consecrated December 17, 1559, and held the same 15 years and 5 months, dying May 17, 1575, in the seventy-second year of his age.

A translation of the New Testament by Laurence Tomson, who was under-secretary to Sir Francis Walsingham, was printed in 1576. This was afterwards reprinted frequently in the Geneva Bible, instead of the former translation.

These labours of the Protestants had their effect on the Catholics; who, as they would not use the versions of those whom they thought heretics, yet were ashamed of having no version of Scripture for use, set themselves to translate, so far as they lawfully might.

In the year 1582, was printed the New Testament, translated by the English college at Rheimes; and twenty-seven years after, in 1609, appeared the first volume, and in 1610, the second volume of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, printed at Doway, and thence called the Doway Bible. Both these have been reprinted several times; but an edition in five volumes 12mo, 1750, is much improved in point of language, especially from the Doway, which is in many instances very obscure. The translators were, William Allen, Henry Holland, Gregory Martin, and Richard Bristol. The notes by Dr. Worthington. Le Long says, the New Testament was principally translated by Wm. Raynold, or Reynolds.

Dr. William Allen was born in Lancashire, and educated at Oriol College Oxford. In the reign of queen Mary, he was principal of St. Mary-Hall, and canon of York; but on the accession of queen Elizabeth, he went to Lovain, was made canon of Cambray and Rheimes, and in 1587 he was promoted by pope Pius V. to be cardinal priest of St. Martin's, and archbishop of Mecllin: he died at Rome in 1594, and was buried in the English school.

Gregory Martin was born at Macfield near Winchelsea in Sussex, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford, as one of the original scholars placed there by the founder Sir Thomas White in 1557, where he took the degree of Master of Arts, in 1564. Quitting Oxford, he was taken into the family of the duke of Norfolk as tutor to his son. Being a papist, he went to Doway; where applying himself to the study of divinity, he was made licentiate in that faculty in 1575, and not long after going to Rheimes, he was chosen divinity professor to that university; and died in 1592.

Henry Holland was a Worcestershire man, and fellow of St. John's in Oxford; from whence he went to Doway, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and the order of priesthood.— He was living in 1611.

Richard Bristol, or Bristow, was born in the city of Worcester, commenced Master of Arts at Oxford in 1562, was afterwards fellow of Exeter, and in 1569 he left the college and the kingdom. Going to Lovain, he abjured the Protestant religion, and became acquainted with Dr. Allen; who made him "the first moderator or prefect of the divinity study," at Doway, and afterwards committed to his care his new seminary at Rheimes, where he lived two years, and then coming to England for his health, died in 1582.

Thomas Worthington, a native of Lancashire, and well-descended, after taking the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Oxford about 1570, went to the college of Doway, and some years after was translated thence to Rheimes: a little before the intended Spanish invasion, he came over to England, was taken up for a spy, and committed prisoner to the tower, yet escaped with his life. Returning to Doway, he reviewed and published the English translation of the Old Testament above-mentioned, which had been made at Rheimes some years before. He commenced D. D. at Triers, and was made president of the English college at Rheimes. He was alive in 1611.

At a convocation in the year 1603, soon after the accession of James I. complaints were made that many and great faults existed in the translation authorised to be read; and Fuller says, one of the best things produced by the Hampton-court conference was a resolution to his Majesty for a new translation of the Bible; and to this purpose the king writes thus to the archbishops and bishops:—

“Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we have appointed certain learned men, to the number of four and fifty, for the translation of the Bible, and that in this number divers of them have either no ecclesiastical preferment at all, or else so very small, that the same is far unmeet for men of their defence. And yet we of ourself in any convenient time cannot well remedy it. Therefore we do hereby require you, That presently you write in our name, as well to the archbishop of York, as to the rest of the bishops of the province of Canterbury, signifying unto them, that we do well and straightly charge every one of them, as also the other bishops of the province of York, as they tender our good favour towards them, that (all excuses set apart) when any prebend or parsonage being rated in our book of taxations, the prebend to twenty pounds at the least, and the parsonage to the like sum and upwards, shall next upon any occasion happen to be void, and to be either of their patronage or gift, or the like parsonages so void to be of the patronage and gift of any person whatsoever, they do make stay thereof, and admit none unto it, until certifying us of the avoidance of it, and of the name of the patron (if it be not of their own gift), that we may commend for the same some such of the learned men as we shall think fit to be preferred to it; not doubting of the bishops’ readiness to satisfy us herein, or that any of the laity, when we shall in time move them to so good and religious an act, will be unwilling to give us the like due contentment and satisfaction: we ourself having taken the same order for such prebends and benefices as shall be void in our gift, what we write to you of other, you must apply to yourselves, as also not forget to move the said archbishop, and all the bishops, with their deans and chapters of both provinces, as touching the other point to be imparted by you unto them.

“Furthermore, we require you to move all our bishops to inform themselves of all such learned men within their several dioceses, as having especial skill in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, have taken pains in their private studies of the scriptures, for the clearing of any obscurities, either in the Hebrew or in the Greek, or touching any difficulties or mistakings in the former English translations, which we have now commanded to be thoroughly viewed and amended; and thereupon to write unto them, earnestly charging them, and signifying our pleasure therein, that they send such their observations, either to Mr. Lively, our Hebrew reader in Cambridge; or to Dr. Harding, our Hebrew reader in Oxford; or to Dr. Andrews, dean of Westminster; to be imparted to the rest of their several companies, that so our said intended translation may have the help and furtherance of all our principal learned men within this our kingdom. Given under our signet, at our palace of Westminster, the two and twentieth day of July, in the second year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland; and of Scotland the thirty-seventh.”

This letter being written about three years before, it is probable seven of the persons nominated for this performance died in the interval, or that so many might have been employed in revising the translation; for Fuller’s list of the translators amounts but to forty-seven. This number, ranged under six divisions, entered upon the work this spring. The names of the persons, the places where they met, together with the portions of scripture assigned each company, are as follow:—

Westminster 10. The Pentateuch, the history from Joshua to the first book of the Chronicles exclusively.—Dr. Andrews, fellow and master of Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge, then dean of Westminster, afterwards bishop of Winchester. Dr. Overall, fellow of Trinity-college, master of Katherine-hall, in Cambridge, then dean of St. Paul’s, after bishop of Norwich. Dr. Saravia, prebendary of Canterbury. Dr. Clarke, fellow of Christ’s-college in Cambridge, vicar of Mynstre and Monckton in Thanet, and one of the six preachers in Canterbury. Dr. Laifield, fellow of Trinity in Cambridge, and parson of Clement Danes: being skilled in architecture, his judgment was much relied on for the description of the tabernacle and temple. Dr. Leigh, archdeacon of Middlesex, parson of All-Hallows, Barking. Master Bargley, Mr. King, Mr. Tompson, Mr. Bedwell, of Cambridge, and vicar of Tottenham nigh London.

Cambridge 8. From the first of the Chronicles, with the rest of the history and the Hagiographia, viz. Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes.—Mr. Lively. Mr. Richardson, fellow of Emanuel, after D. D. master first of Peter-house, then of Trinity-college. Mr. Chadderton, after D. D. fellow first of Christ-college, then master of Emanuel.—Dillingham, fellow of Christ-college, beneficed at — in Bedfordshire, where he died. Mr. Andrews, after D. D. brother to the bishop of Winchester, and master of Jesus-college. Mr. Harrison, the Rev. vice-master of Trinity-college. Mr. Spalding, fellow of St. John’s, in Cambridge, and Hebrew professor therein. Mr. Bing, fellow of Peter-house, in Cambridge, and Hebrew professor therein.

Oxford 7. The four greater Prophets, with the Lamentations, and the twelve lesser Prophets.—Dr. Harding, president of Magdalen-college. Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi-college. Dr. Holland, rector of Exeter-college, and king's professor. Dr. Kilby, rector of Lincoln-college, and regius professor. Mr. Smith, after D.D. and bishop of Gloucester; he made the learned and religious preface to the translation. Mr. Brett, beneficed at Quainton in Buckinghamshire. Mr. Fairclowe.

Cambridge. The Prayer of Manasseh, and the rest of the Apocrypha.—Dr. Dupont, prebendary of Ely, and master of Jesus-college. Dr. Braithwaite, first fellow of Emanuel, then master of Gonvil, and Caius-college. D. Radclyffe, one of the senior fellows of Trinity-college. Mr. Ward, of Emanuel, after D. D. master of Sidney-college, and Margaret professor. Mr. Downes, fellow of St. John's-college, and Greek professor. Mr. Boyse, fellow of St. John's-college, prebendary of Ely, parson of Boxworth, in Cambridgeshire. Mr. Ward, of King's-college, after D. D. prebendary of Chichester, rector of Bishop's Waltham in Hampshire.

Oxford. The four Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and Apocalypse.—Dr. Ravis, dean of Christ-church, afterwards bishop of London. Dr. Abbot, master of University-college, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. Eedes, [instead of Dr. Eedes, Mr. Lewis has James Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells]. Mr. Thompson, Mr. Savill, Dr. Peryn, Dr. Ravens, Mr. Harmer.

Westminster. The epistles of St. Paul, and the other canonical epistles.—Dr. Barlowe, of Trinity-hall, in Cambridge, dean of Chester, afterwards bishop of Lincoln. Dr. Hutchinson, Dr. Spencer, Mr. Fenton, Mr. Rabbet, Mr. Sanderson, Mr. Dakins.

And that they might proceed to the best advantage in their method and management, the king suggested the instructions following:—

1. The Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, was to receive as few alterations as might be; and to pass throughout, unless the original called plainly for an amendment.

2. The names of the prophets and the inspired writers, with the other names in the text, to be kept as near as may be, as they stand recommended at present by customary use.

3. The old ecclesiastical words to be retained.—For instance, the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.

4. When any word has several significations, that which has been commonly used by the most celebrated fathers should be preferred; provided it be agreeable to the context, and the analogy of faith.

5. As to the chapters, they were to continue in their present division, and not be altered without apparent necessity.

6. The margin not to be charged with any notes, excepting for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot be turned without some circumlocution, and therefore not so proper to be inserted in the text.

7. The margin to be furnished with such citations as serve for a reference of one place of scripture to another.

8. Every member of each division to take the chapters assigned for the whole company; and after having gone through the version or corrections, all the divisions was to meet, examine their respective performances, and come to a resolution which parts of them should stand.

9. When any division had finished a book in this manner, they were to transmit it to the rest to be farther considered.

10. If any of the respective divisions shall doubt or dissent upon the review of the book transmitted; they were to mark the places, and send back the reasons of their disagreement: if they happen to differ about the amendments, the dispute was to be referred to a general committee, consisting of the best distinguished persons drawn out of each division.—However, this decision was not to be made till they had gone through the work.

11. When any place is remarkably obscure, letters were to be directed by authority to the most learned persons in the Universities, or country, for their judgment upon the text.

12. The directors in each company were to be the deans of Westminster and Chester, and the king's professors in Hebrew and Greek in each University.

13. The translations of Tyndal, Matthew, Coverdale, Whitechurch, and Geneva, to be used when they came closer to the original than the Bishops' Bible.

Lastly, Three or four of the most eminent divines in each of the Universities, though not the number of the translators, were to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, to consult with other heads of houses for reviewing the whole translation.

A copy of these instructions being sent, as has been said, to Mr. Lively at Cambridge, and, it is to be supposed, other copies of them to Dr. Harding, the king's reader of Hebrew at Oxford, and Dr. Andrews, dean of Westminster; it seems as if (some other doubts arising concerning them) application was made by the vice-chancellor to the bishop of London, for the resolution of them. To which his lordship replied, "That to be sure, if he had not signified so much unto them already, it was his Majesty's pleasure, that besides the learned persons employed with them for the Hebrew and Greek, there should be three or four of the most eminent and grave divines of their University, assigned by the vice-chancellor upon conference with the rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translations, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observation of the rules appointed by his Highness, and especially concerning the third and fourth rule: and that when they had agreed upon the persons for this purpose, he pray'd them to send him word thereof."

This letter is inscribed, 'To the right worshipful Dr. Cowell, vice-chancellor,' and dated at Fulham, the 30th of August 1604; and to it is added, by way of postscript, "That at the very writing thereof, a learned epistle was delivered unto him of Mr. Broughton, which though it was of an old date, yet he thought good to send it unto them, that Mr. Lively and the rest might have the perusal of it, if they had not before seen it.' This letter seems to be that before mentioned, to the learned nobility of England, touching translating the Bible, or else that to king James, written on occasion of this translation being ordered by him, as is before-mentioned.

The bishop of London, at the same time that he wrote to the vice-chancellor, &c. at Cambridge, sent letters to the several bishops, with copies of the king's letter before-mentioned: A copy of one of these to the bishop of Norwich, which immediately follows the king's letter, runs thus:

"Your lordship maie see how carefull his Majestie is for the providing of lyvings for theis learned men. I doubt not therefore but your lordship will have that due regarde of his Majestie's request herein as is fit and meete, and that yow will take sutch order with your chancellor, register, and sutch your lordship's officers who shall have intelligence of the premisses, as also with the deane and chapter of your cathedrale church, whom his Majestie likewise requireth to be putt in mynde of his pleasure therein, not forgettinge the latter parte of his Majestie's letter touchinge the informinge of yourselfe of the fittest linguist within your dioces for to performe and speedily to returne that which his Majestie is so carefull to have faithfully performed. I could wish your lordship would for my discharge returne me in some few lynes the tyme of the receipte of this letters, that I may discharge that dutie which his Majestie by theis his letters hath layed upon me. And soe I bidd your lordship right hartely farewell. From Fulham, this 31st of July, 1604. Your lordship's loving friend and brother,

"RICHARD LONDON.

"Delibat. apud Ludham, 16 Augusti 1604.

"His Majestie's meaning is, that two lyvings should be stayed, one of your owne, and one of a lay patron's."

In his Majesty's letter was a clause, that R. L. and the archbishops of both provinces, should not forget to move the deans and chapters as touching the other points to be imparted otherwise by them unto the said deans, &c. This in another letter to the bishop of Norwich, wrote at the same time with the other, his lordship tells him is referred to his relation.— And this he said it was,

"There are manie, as your lordship perceyveth, who are to be employed in this translatinge of the Bible, and sundry of them must of necessitie have their charges borne, which his Majestie was very ready of his most princely disposition to have borne, but some of my lords, as things now goe, did howlde it inconvenient. Whereuppon it was left to me to move all my brethren, the bishops, and likewise every severall deane and chapter, to contribute toward this worke. According therefore to my dutie, I hartely pray your lordship not only to thinke yourselfe what is meete for yow to give for this purpose, but likewise to acquaint your deane and chapter not onely with the said clause of his Majestie's letter, but likewise with the meaninge of it, that they may agree upon sutch a somme as they meane to contribute. I doe not thinke, that a thousand marks will finishe the worke to be employed as is aforesayd; whereof your lordship with your deane and chapter having due consideracion, I must require you in his Majestie's name, accordinge to his good pleasure in that behalfe, that assoon as possibly you can, yow send me word what shall be expected from you and your said deane and chapter. For I am to acquaint his Majestie with every man's liberality towards this most godly worke. And thus not doubtinge of your especial care for the accomplishment of the premisses, and desyringe your lordship to note the date to me of your receipt of this letter, I commit your lordship unto the tuicion of Almighty God. From Fulham this 31st of July, 1604.

"Delibat. apud Ludham, 16 Augusti 1604."

What success these last letters met with does not appear; but it seems as if they had but a very cold reception. The two Universities, we have seen, were before ordered to entertain in their colleges such as came out of the country thither on this occasion, without any charge unto them, &c. Accordingly, the writer of John Bois's life in MS. who was rector of Boxworth near Cambridge, tells us, that part of the Apocrypha was allotted to him, and that all the time he was about his own part, his diet was given him at St. John's, where he abode all the week till Saturday night, and then went home to discharge his cure, and returned thence on Monday morning; and that when he had finished his own part, at the earnest request of him to whom it was assigned, he undertook a second, and then was in common at another college. As for those who were appointed to meet at Westminster, they seem, for the most part, to be very well provided for. What then was to be done with the thousand marks which were to be raised, by way of contribution, on the bishops, and deans, and chapters?

However this be, almost three years it seems were spent in this service, the entering on which was, perhaps, somewhat delayed by Mr. Edward Lively's death. At the end thereof, the writer of Mr. Bois's life tells us, the whole work being finished, and three copies of the whole Bible sent to London, viz. one from Cambridge, a second from Oxford, and a third from Westminster; a new choice was to be made of two out of each company, six in all, to review the whole work, and polish it, and extract one out of all the three copies, to be committed to the press. For the dispatch of this business, Mr. Andrew Downes, fellow of St. John's-college, and the king's Greek professor at Cambridge, and the aforesaid Mr. John Bois, were sent for up to London out of the Cambridge company; where, meeting their four fellow-labourers, they went daily to Stationers'-hall, and in three quarters of a year fulfilled their task. All which time they received thirty pounds each of them by the week from the company of stationers, though before they had nothing; which seems a confirmation of what was before observed, that the proposal of raising one thousand marks on the bishops, &c. was rejected by them. Last of all, Bilson, bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Myles Smith, who from the very beginning had been very active in this affair, again reviewed the whole work, and prefixed arguments to the several books; and Dr. Smith, who for his indefatigable pains taken in this work, was soon after the printing of it deservedly made bishop of Gloucester, was ordered to write a preface to it, the same which is now printed in the folio editions of this Bible; the first of which was at London, A.D. 1611.

Much the same account of the manner of making and finishing this translation was given afterwards by the English divines at Dort, in a paper which they delivered to the Synod, Nov. 20, 1618, only with this difference, that in this paper the translators are said to be divided into six companies, consisting of seven or eight each, or about forty-eight in all; and that out of these, twelve select men met together to review and correct the whole work.

This translation was first printed in the year 1611, (so says Fuller, but Dr. Durell says 1612) on a black type. The title-page to the Old Testament is a copper-plate, with an emblematical border, engraved by Boel. The title of the New Testament is in a border cut in wood, with the heads of the twelve apostles, tents of the tribes, &c. It has been a matter of doubt, and an object of no small inquiry, to ascertain the exact date of this edition. The scarcity of title-pages began the doubts, which were still strengthened by the total want of the folio dated 1612, and the date 1613 frequently found to the letter-press title of the Old Testament, with a wooden border, in the same Bible where the date to the New Testament is 1611.

We can only account for this by supposing, what is very reasonable, that the copper-plate was soon worn out, and absolutely unfit to afford half the number necessary to supply the churches throughout the kingdom. As many therefore as could be, were wrought off and published, probably enough to supply the sale till the year 1613, when a new title-page is placed to this very impression, and likewise to another folio printed on a black type of a different size. But the title-page of the New Testament being letter-press, and the border engraved on wood, would serve for as numerous an impression as the rest of the Bible, and consequently the whole number was wrought off at once to serve for the whole edition. But a new title-page being absolutely necessary to the old, was probably dated, according to the time of printing, in 1613. The engraved titles are scarce; we have heard of four, namely, at the British Museum, at the Bodleian, in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Harper at the British Museum, and in the possession of Mr. Denyer. The first is much damaged, the date of the last seems to have suffered some kind of erasement, but the other two are perfectly fair, and beautiful engravings.

In 1612, a quarto edition was printed on Roman type, with an engraved title copied from the folio by Jasper Isaac.

At the beginning of the present century, we read in Le Long an account related, seemingly with good credit, that Athias, the celebrated Jew printer at Amsterdam, printed an edition of the English Bible, (probable the Old Testament only, and for the use of the Jews), during the whole impression of which he did not, for the sheets in succession, distribute the types, but kept the whole forms standing; and that of this impression Athias himself boasted he had sold more than a million of copies.

We have now seen what difficulties the translation of the Bible had to struggle with, before it could be accomplished: the perseverance of its friends is entitled to our most grateful acknowledgments.

Marginal References.

In the year 1664, John Canne published a Bible of the present translation in octavo, with many marginal references. Mr. Blayney examined these for his edition of the Oxford Bible in 1769. John Canne was a leader of the English Brownists, at Amsterdam, by whom he was chosen pastor at the death of Dr. Ainsworth.

In 1677, a Bible was printed by Hayes, at Cambridge, with many references added to the first edition; and in 1678, a Bible also was printed at Cambridge with still more references, the labour of Dr. Scattergood, rector of Wilwick and Elverton in Northamptonshire, and one of the compilers of the Critici Sacri: Probably the former of 1677, might likewise have been by his care. According to Le Long, this Bible was reprinted at London in octavo, 1679; at Oxford in folio, 1680; at Oxford in folio and quarto, with Usher's chronology, 1682; at London in octavo, 1683; at Cambridge in quarto, 1683; at Oxford in folio, 1684; at London in 12mo. 1684; at Oxford — 1686; at Oxford in folio, 1638; and at London in 12mo. 1717; but as to the Oxford edition of 1680, there is certainly a mistake, unless there be two folio editions of that year, for the copies in the British Museum and the Bodleian libraries, most certainly do not contain Dr. Scattergood's marginal references.

In the year 1699, a new edition of the Royal Bible in quarto was printed at London, with a great addition of parallel texts, and a new chronological index, by Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Lloyd, bishop of Worcester, which has been many times reprinted in folio and quarto.

It is not to be understood that archbishop Tenison and bishop Lloyd were at all concerned in the printing or editing of this Bible, further than sending to the printers the additional parallels and new tables, having no superintendance of the press: and this is but justice to their memory to declare; for the first edition was so full of typographical errors, that a complaint was exhibited against the printers by the clergy of the lower house of convocation.

The gradual increase of parallels from the first edition, by different editors, will appear from the following scale:—

Mr. Purver's translation of the Bible was published in 1764, in two volumes folio.

Anthony Purver was one of the people called Quakers, and born at Up-Husborne, near Andover in Hampshire, of very poor parents. He was apprentice to a shoemaker in the same place, and followed that business for some years; while he was apprentice, journeyman, and master, it was his constant custom to study the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages; but he never took much pains in his English, confining his reading in that language chiefly to old authors. He kept a school some time in his native place, and about the year 1740 went and settled, as a school-master, at Frenchay near Bristol, and continued there, and at Fish-ponds in Stapleton, for about twenty years, when he removed to Andover, where he died about the years 1777, or 1778.

The object of his insatiable pursuit after the dead languages, was a desire of understanding the scriptures in the original; and after he was tolerably versed in the Hebrew, he formed a resolution of translating the whole Bible, which, as it seems, was at first intended to have been printed in occasional numbers: for in the year 1746, that eminent physician the late Dr. Fothergill, wrote a letter to the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he strongly recommends him as the author of a work then publishing, which was to be continued in numbers if it met with encouragement; being a translation of the scriptures, under the title of "Opus sacra in Biblia elaboratum."—Dr. Fothergill in his letter, after speaking in high terms of his learning, says, "As to his personal character, he is a man of great simplicity of manners, regular conduct, and a modest reserve; he is steadily attentive to truth, hates falsehood, and has an unconquerable aversion to vice: and to crown the portrait, he is not only greatly benevolent to mankind, but has a lively sense of the divine attributes, and a profound reverence of, and submission to, the Supreme Being." Mr. Purver is not named: but that it is applicable to him, we are obliged to Mr. Joseph Fry of Bristol, as well as for other circumstances relating to this extraordinary man.

The mode of publication in numbers seems to have been unsuccessful, and in all probability soon dropped; yet it did not prevent his going on with his translation which, after thirty years, he finished, but was unable to publish it, nor could he meet with a bookseller who would run the hazard of assisting him: at length Dr. Fothergill stood his friend, gave him a thousand pounds for the copy, and published it at his own expense.

Mr. Purver afterwards revised the whole, and made considerable alterations and corrections for a second edition, which, however, has not yet taken place; but the MS. remains in the possession of his grandson John Purver Bell.

Thus have we endeavoured to set before the reader such a history of the Bible as may answer most of the principal questions usually asked on the subject.—The length of this article must be justified by its importance. There are many collateral inquiries which might be entered into, but what we have already given we conceive sufficient.

RELIGION OF WHOSE INHABITANTS ARE MENTIONED

In this Work.

(Page 29.) EGYPT, situate in the N. E. part of Africa, between 29 and 38 degrees of E. long. and between 21 and 31 degrees of N. lat. bounded by the Levant, or Mediterranean sea, on the N. by the Red sea, and the Isthmus of Suez, which divides it from Arabia, on the E. by Abyssinia, or Ethiopia Superior, on the S. and by the desarts of Barca and Nubia, on the W. being 600 miles in length, from N. to S. and from 100 to 200 in breadth, from E. to W.; the river Nile, which rises in Abyssinia, running the whole length of it, from S. to N. and overflowing it annually, beginning to rise in the months of May or June, and is at the height usually in September, from which time the waters decrease till May or June again. There being no other water in the country (or not more than two springs), they were under a necessity of building their towns on the banks of the Nile, on some eminences, natural or artificial; so that on the overflowing of the river, they look like so many islands, which have no other communication but by boats. The Lower Egypt is contained in a triangular island, made by the Levant, and the two chief branches of the Nile, which, dividing five miles below Cairo, one branch takes its course to the N. W. and falls into the Levant at Rosetta, and the other N. E. falling into the sea at Damietta, an ancient Pelusium; these mouths being about 100 miles asunder. This part of the country called the Delta, or Lower Egypt, having the greatest advantage by the overflowing of the Nile, is much the most fruitful, but not the most healthful; the mud which covers it, after the flood is gone, sending up an unwholesome vapour. The mountains and sands which inclose Egypt on the E. and W. would render the valley between excessive hot, if it were not for this annual flood; nor would the soil produce much without it, for the country is naturally barren, where the waters do not reach, and they have seldom any rain, unless in the Lower Egypt, though travellers relate, that they have sometimes seen heavy showers even in Upper Egypt. They have canals cut quite through Upper Egypt, to distribute the water to their fields and gardens, and preserve it in the dry season; and these they fill with great ceremony annually, when the river rises to a certain height; and by these means Egypt is rendered the most fruitful country of Africa, supplying Constantinople, and other towns in European Turkey, with corn, as it did Rome and Italy of old. They only harrow their grain into the mud, on the retiring of the waters, and in March following, usually have a plentiful harvest. As to their rice fields, they supply them with water from their canals and reservoirs constantly, this grain usually growing in water. Those lands that are not sown, yield good crops of grass for their cattle.

No place in the world, says Mr. Sandys, is better furnished with grain, flesh, fish, sugar, fruits, melons, roots, and other garden stuff, than the Lower Egypt; oranges, lemons, figs, dates, almonds, cassia, and plantains, abound here, and they have some grapes, but not proper for wine; which defect is, in some measure, supplied with palm-wine. The country is excessive hot for two or three months before the flood rises, and the musketoes, or gnats, will not suffer people to sleep in the night. The sands also are extremely troublesome, insinuating themselves into the closets, chests, and cabinets, and even into the bed-clothes, making them as hot as if they had been warmed with coals; and these sands are probably the occasion of sore eyes, with which the natives are almost universally afflicted in summer. Fevers and fluxes are frequent in autumn, and the swelling of the scrotum; but the greatest misfortune is the plague, which visits them at least once in seven years; but when the Nile begins to overflow, it is said the plague and all other diseases are abated. It must not be forgotten, also, that the hot winds are very troublesome in April and May, and occasion their sore eyes, as well as the sands.

Among the curiosities of Egypt, the pyramids are the most considerable; they are built of stone, but by whom, or when, no one knows; the base of the largest taking up ten acres of ground, and running up to 700 feet perpendicular height; eye witnesses frequently differ 100 feet as to their height, and indeed the sands are driven up so high on the sides, that it is impracticable to take the height exactly. The mummy-pits are another curiosity, which, with the pyramids, are on the W. side of the river, opposite to Cairo: in these pits have been thousands of embalmed bodies interred, which have continued three or 4000 years at least: the coffins are set upright, in niches in the walls, and never laid at length. Egypt is generally held to be subject to the Grand Seignior, and so it is in part, but his authority is extremely limited by the Egyptian princes, who are all of them absolute in their respective territories, and assemble at Cairo, in a kind of parliament, or great council, which submits to the Grand Seignior's Bassa, or viceroy, no farther than they see fit, and sometimes they depose him, and demand another of the Grand Seignior, who is more acceptable to them; however, they suffer the Grand Seignior to collect a revenue in their several districts, but by no means equal to what the country is able to pay; and, if more is demanded, or any innovations attempted, it endangers a revolt. They come to Cairo with such bodies of troops as protect them against the arbitrary administration of the Bassa, and the only way he has to manage them, is by dividing them into parties, and siding with that party which is most devoted to the Grand Seignior. These Egyptian princes are not natives of the country, neither are they ever succeeded by their children in their respective governments, but by some slave, whom they appoint their successor, and these are usually slaves purchased in Georgia or Circassia. This is their constitution, as was that of the ancient Mamalukes; no man could be sovereign who had not been a slave, and purchased in some foreign country; but out of these we must except some Chicks, or Arab chiefs, who are proprietors of villages, or small districts in the country; these are succeeded by their children, on paying a fine, or small rent, to the government. The religion of the governors of the country is Mahometan; but the Coptis, the posterity of the ancient Egyptians, the Greeks and Latins, are Christians, but of different sects; and there is a great number of Jews at Cairo, and in the great towns where any thing is to be got.

(p. 33.) TYRE, a seaport of Syria, in that part formerly called Phœnicia, once a place of exceedingly great trade. It is also famous for a shellish, which dyes a fine purple, thence called the Tyrian dye.—Tyre was destroyed by Alexander the Great, in the year 332 B. C. and (in exact conformity to the prophecies in the Old Testament) is now nothing but a heap of ruins. It has two harbours, one exceedingly good, the other choked up by the ruins of the city. It is 60 miles N. W. of Damascus. Long. 35 20, E. lat. 33 0 N.

(p. 37.) ASSYRIA anciently comprehended those provinces of Turkey and Persia, which are now called Kurdistan, Diarbec, and Irac-Arabic; being bounded by Armenia on the N. Media and Persia on the E. Arabia on the S. and the river Euphrates, which divides it from Syria and Asia Minor, on the W.—This was one of the first empires we have any knowledge of, and continued upwards of 1200 years; Nimrod was supposed to be the first sovereign, and Sardanapalus the last, who had many more kingdoms and provinces under their dominion, than those already enumerated.

(p. 40.) BABYLON, once the capital of the Babylonish empire, has now no remains of it left, but is supposed to have lain in 44 deg. of E. long. and 32 deg. of N. lat. on the river Euphrates, but not on the present channel; and hereabout is supposed to have been the seat of paradise.

(p. 43.) PERSIA, or ELAM; an ancient kingdom in Middle Asia, on the south of Media, and south-east of Assyria and Chaldea. The Persians were anciently called Elamites, and sprung from Elam the eldest son of Shem, and their original residence was called Elymais. Chedorlaomer, one of their first kings, was a noted conqueror. About the time of Jehoshaphat, one Memnon the son of Aurora, seems to have been their king. The Assyrians extended their conquest over the Persians; but under Achmerides, they revolted about the same time with the Medes. The government continued in his family till the Chaldeans ravaged their country. After this, the country was in a wretched condition, till Cyrus appeared on the stage. He connected it with the kingdom of Media, and subdued the kingdoms of Assyria, Egypt, and Lybia; and by his great wisdom, settled the empire on so very solid a foundation, that notwithstanding the folly of many of his successors, it continued about 208 years. His son Cambyzes during the seven years of his reign, was famous for almost nothing, besides mad murders, and the furious ravage of Egypt. Darius Hystaspes soon killed the pretended Smerdis, and reigned 36 years. He took and demolished part of the walls of Babylon, but supplied the inhabitants who survived his cruelties, with 50,000 women, instead of their wives, which themselves had murdered during the siege. To revenge the Scythian invasion of Upper Asia about 120 years before, he invaded Scythia. He conquered Thrace in Europe, and part of East India; reduced the rebellious Ionians in Asia; but his expedition into Greece cost him the ruin of a great part of his army. Xerxes his son having fallen heir to the kingdom, and excessive wealth of his covetous father, reduced the rebellious Egyptians; stirred up the Carthaginians to attack the Greeks in Sicily, while himself with an army of about 5,283,000 persons, but not half of them warriors, invaded Greece. These were mostly cut off by the Greeks at Thermopylae, Plataea, Salamis, and Mycale.—After 12 years, he was succeeded by Artaxerxes Longimanus his son, who sent Ezra and Nehemiah to promote the welfare of the Jews. He reduced the Egyptians to a still more grievous servitude. After a reign of 41 years, he was succeeded by Xerxes his son. He after one year, was murdered by Sogdianus his bastard brother; and he, in another seven months, by Darius Nothus, or Ochus, another bastard brother. After a reign of 18 years, he was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. His defeating of his brother Cyrus, his victory over the Macedonians, his difficult reduction of Cyprus, and his struggles with the Egyptians, are the most noted events of his long reign of about 45 years. Artaxerxes Ochus his son, after murdering his two elder brethren, succeeded him. After a cruel reign of 23 years, in which he ravaged Egypt, Phœnicia, and part of Judea, he, and soon after, Arses his son, were murdered by Bagoas an eunuch; and Darius Cadomannus, a very distant relation, was placed on the throne, in whose time the Persian empire was quite overturned by Alexander and the Greeks. From A. M. 3675 to 3754, Persia was wholly under the dominion of the Greeks; and Elymais, and other of the western parts, were so long afterwards; but the Parthians gradually rendered themselves masters of the whole of it. About A. M. 4236, or A. D. 232, Artaxerxes, a noble prince of the Persians, siezed the kingdom. Twenty-eight kings of his family reigned in succession above 400 years. Some of them were noted persecutors of the Christians. Many of them had violent struggles of war with the Roman emperors.

Hitherto a kind of Deism had been the established religion of Persia. They had neither temples, nor statues, nor altars, nor did they believe there was need for any, as God was every where. They sacrificed to the elements and heavenly luminaries, as symbols of him. They learned not a little of idolatry from the Assyrians and Chaldeans; but Zoro-aster or Zerdush, a crafty fellow, perhaps an apostate disciple of the prophet Ezekiel, about the time of Darius Hystaspes, mightily reformed their religious system. His scheme continued as long as their kingdom: nay, these who call themselves Persees, and pretend to be the true Persians, still retain it. They hold one eternal God, and a good and evil principle under him: light they reckon the symbol of the good, and darkness of the bad one. They maintain that the world was created in six days, and one man and one woman made for the parents of mankind; and that the good principle of light withdrawing himself, the child of darkness will, at the last day, produce a dissolution of nature.

About A. D. 634, the Saracens spread themselves into Persia, and established their Mahometan delusion: but for the most part, the Persians have been of the sect of Ali, the son-in-law of Mahomet; and are heartily despised by the Turks, and other of the sect of Omar. After the Saracen Calipha had governed Persia by their sultans about 420 years, the Turks, who for some ages before had poured themselves into it while it was under the government of the Buides, siezed the sovereignty, A. D. 1055. Tangrolipix, and his Seljukian successors, ruled it till about A. D. 1260, when Halon, the son of Jenghizkan the famed Tartar, wrested it from them. After he, and eight of his descendants, had swayed the sceptre, Tamerlane, another Tartarian prince siezed it, about A. D. 1400, and left it to Mirza his son. Contention raged in his family till they were all driven from the throne, and Usumcassan, the Turkman king of Armenia siezed on it, A. D. 1472. His male line quickly failed; but Ishmael, his grandson by his daughter, whom he had married to Shiek Eidar the famed preacher, after his father had been murdered, struggled into the throne, A. D. 1499. The sovereignty continued in his family for eleven generations. Some of his successors were absolute infernals in cruelty and murder. Husseyn, the last, and one of the best of them, was wickedly dethroned in 1723, and afterwards murdered by the wretch Myr-weis. Not long after his death, the famous Kuli-kan mounted the throne, subdued the Moguls, chastised the Turks, and attempted to change the religion of his country into a conformity with that of other Mahometans; but he was murdered. With terrible struggling, Keimkhan, we hear, got himself enthroned about 1763, after the country had almost 40 years been a shocking scene of treachery and murder. Millions had perished in ways the most wretched. At present, the Persian empire is very large, bounded with the Turkish on the west, with the Russian on the north, and with that of the Mogul on the south, and with Tartary on the east. We know of few Christians in it except the Arminians, who have 15 or 16 churches at Zulpha, the famed suburb of Isaphan the capital; and some others on the south and west of the Caspian sea, who scarce deserve the name.

(p. 46.) CANAAN was the name of the country where Canaan and his posterity dwelt. It is about 200, or rather 160 miles in length, from Dan on the north, to Beersheba on the south; and from east to west, about eighty; and so comprehended, in all, about 9,231,000 acres of ground; of which each of the 601,730 Hebrew warriors, who conquered it, might have about 12 acres allotted him for his share. It lies in the 32, 33, and 34th deg. of N. lat. and in the 36th and 37th of E. long. from London. It has the Mediterranean Sea on the west; Lebanon and Syria on the north; Arabia the Desart, and the land of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Midianites, on the east; the land of Edom, and wilderness of Paran, on the south; and Egypt on the south-west. No more than this was wont to be called Canaan; and this only was promised to the Hebrews in possession; but if we take in the whole extent of territory promised to them in dominion, from the river Euphrates on the north-east, to the river Nile on the south-west; it comprehended all these countries which David reduced, Syria, Ammon, Moab, Edom, &c.; and in this sense, it may be readily granted to the learned Dr. Shaw, that its south borders were the gulfs of the Red Sea; and that it comprehended the land of Goshen in Egypt. Whatever the land of Canaan, properly so called, be now, when it lies under a curse, and lies almost wholly uncultivated, it was anciently a most beautiful and fertile country. The Jordan running southward through it, and forming the lakes of Merom and Tiberias; and a multitude of brooks and rivulets crossing the country on both sides the Jordan; and a multitude of valleys and hills, pleasantly diversified the form thereof. The rich pastures produced prodigious quantities of milk and honey. The arable grounds, which, according to Hecateus, (but we suppose his account too low), amounted to about 3,000,000 of acres, produced the richest crops. The mines of the mountains produced plenty of iron and brass. When God, by seasonable warmth and rains, concurred with the laborious improvers of this soil, it is abundantly credible, how it supported the numerous millions that dwelt therein.

(p. 46.) SYRIA, or SURISTAN, a part of Asiatic Turkey, is bounded by Natolia and Turcomania, on the N. by Diarbee, or Mesopotamia, on the E. by Arabia, and Palestine on the S. and by the Levant Sea on the W. The Turks divide Syria into 3 beglerbeglies, or viceroalties, viz. Those of 1. Aleppo; 2. Tripoli; and 3. Damascus, or Scham; the seats of the respective viceroys. That of Aleppo takes in the N. part of Syria, Tripoli the middle, and Damascus the S. of Syria. This country produces corn, wine, oil, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, pease, beans, and all kinds of pulse and garden-stuff, and has a good trade in silks, camblets, and Turkey leather, and they export vast quantities of salt, with which the surface of the earth, as well as the lakes, is covered, in some places. Damascus is the capital city.

(p. 46.) ARABIA, a country of Asia, having Turkey on the N. Persia and the gulph of Persia on the E. the Indian ocean on the S. and the Red sea and Isthmus of the Suez on the W. a country of very great extent, divided amongst many Arabian princes and states, most of them living in tents, and wandering from place to place to find pasture and water for their cattle, most of the country being a barren desert, without water or vegetables, in many places. The impostor Mahomet was a native of this country, and made the Arabs his first proselytes; who, within 40 years after his death, subdued great part of Asia, Africa, and Europe, and established their religion wherever they came. Arabia is situated between 35 and 60 degrees of E. long. and between 11 and 30 deg. of N. lat. the three grand divisions whereof are, 1. Arabia Felix. 2. Arabia Deserta. and 3. Arabia Petrea.

(p. 52.) ETHIOPIA SUPERIOR, a country of Africa, comprehending the greatest part of it, viz. Abyssinia, Nubia, and Abex, as it did in its most flourishing state; is bounded by Egypt and the desert of Barca on the N. by the Red sea and the Indian ocean on the E. by Anian and the unknown parts of Africa on the S. and by another desert and unknown countries on the W. Abyssinia Proper has now little communication with the rest of the world, the Turks having possessed themselves of Abex, which runs along the western coast of the Red sea. The river Nile rises from a lake almost in the middle of Abyssinia, and being swelled by the rains, which annually fall at a certain season between the tropics, overflows Egypt, and all the lower grounds which border on the river, which is the case of all rivers that rise within the tropics, though the ancients were at so great a loss for the occasion of this periodical flood; and what increases the flood still more, are the torrents that fall from the numerous hills with which this country is encumbered, though they have this advantage from their hills, that they can remove thither in the hot season, and enjoy a cooler air than they do in Egypt, which lies several degrees N. of Abyssinia. Their valleys are also rendered fruitful by the annual rains and the numerous rivulets, producing plenty of corn, rice, wine, flax, sugar, and fruits proper for the climate; and gold is in plenty here; but the Turks have shut up all the avenues to the country, that no other people ean traffic with them for it at this day. Their cattle are camels, horses, oxen, sheep, and asses, with which they abound. As to the persons of the Ethiopians, or Abyssinians, they are perfectly black, but their features more agreeable than their southern neighbours, having neither flat noses, nor thick lips, like other Caffies. The sovereign of this country was once absolute, but at present the great men set up for princes in their respective governments, and the king can transact nothing without them of any consequence. It was the king of this country that the Europeans used to style Prestor John. The Portuguese, it is said, when they first discovered this country, seeing a cross always carried before him, styled him priest, or Presbyter Maximus. He took upon him the supreme ecclesiastical, as well as civil powers; others say, the Turks gave him the name of Prestor Cham, or Cam, i. e. king of slaves, because they purchased most of their negro slaves in this country. The government appears now to be a republic, or rather a mixed monarchy, in which the prince's power is extremely limited by the great men. As to the common people, it is not very material whether the power be lodged in the king or lords, for they are all slaves either to one or the other.—This is the country from whence it is supposed the queen of Sheba came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and from whence the Eunuch, the prime minister of queen Candace came, who was converted to Christianity, and baptized by St. Philip.

(p. 56.) GEORGIA, a country of Asia, called by the Persians Gurgistan, and by the Turks Gurthi. It is one of the seven Caucasian nations, in the countries between the Black Sea and the Caspian, and comprehends the ancient Iberia and Colchis. It is bounded on the N. by Circassia, on the E. by Daghestan and Schirvan, on the S. by Armenia, and on the W. by the Cuban, or new Russian government of Caucasus. It is divided into nine provinces.—Of these, five form the kingdom of Georgia; and four the kingdom or principality of Imeretia. This country is extremely beautiful. The hills are covered with forests of oak, ash, beech, chestnuts, walnuts, and elms, encircled with vines, growing perfectly wild, but producing vast quantities of grapes. From these is annually made as much wine as is necessary for their yearly consumption; the remainder are left to rot on the vines. Cotton grows spontaneously, as well as the finest European fruit trees. Rice, wheat, millet, hemp, and flax, are raised on the plains, almost without culture. The valleys afford the finest pasturage; the rivers are full of fish; the mountains abound in minerals, and the climate is delicious: so that nature appears to have lavished on this favoured country every production that can contribute to the happiness of its inhabitants. On the other hand, it labours under great disadvantages from the want of navigable rivers, the incursions of predatory nations, &c. The inhabitants are Christians of the Greek communion, and appear to have received their present name from their attachment to St. George, the tutelary saint of these countries. Teflis is the capital.

(p. 56.) CIRCASSIA is situated between 40 and 50 degrees of E. lon. and between 45 and 50 degrees of N. lat. bounded by Russia on the N. by Astracan and the Caspian sea on the E. by Georgia and Dagistan on the S. and by the river Don and the Palus Meotis on the W. The Circassian Tartars are a kind of republic, but sometimes put themselves under the protection of Persia, and sometimes of Russia, or the Turks. They live in tents most commonly, rambling from place to place with their flocks and herds. Their country is now most taken notice of for its beautiful children, from whence, and the neighbouring country of Georgia, the serafios of Turkey and Persia are usually supplied with boys and young virgins.

(p. 59.) MOGULAS, Country of the, or WESTERN CHINESE TARTARY, is bounded on the N. by Siberia, on the E. by Eastern Tartary, on the S. by the Wall and the Leo-tong, and on the W. by Independent Tartary. The Mogul Tartars have neither towns, villages, nor houses: they form themselves only into wandering herds, and live under tents, which they transport from one place to another, according as the temperature of the different seasons, or the wants of their flocks require: they pass the summer on the banks of their rivers, and the winter at the foot of some mountain, or hill, which shelters them from the cutting north wind.—They are naturally clownish, and dirty in their dress, as well as in their tents, where they live amid the dung of their flocks, which, when dried, they use for fuel instead of wood. Enemies to labour, they choose rather to be satisfied with the food with which their flocks supply them, than take the trouble of cultivating the earth: it even appears that they neglect agriculture from pride. During the summer, they live only on milk, which they get from their flocks, using without distinction that of the cow, mare, ewe, goat, and camel. Their ordinary drink is warm water, in which a little coarse tea has been infused; with this they mix cream, milk, or butter, according to their circumstances. They have also a method of making a kind of spirituous liquor of sour milk, especially of that of the mare. The Moguls are free, open, and sincere. They pride themselves chiefly on their dexterity in handling the bow and arrow, mounting on horseback, and hunting wild beasts. Polygamy is permitted among them, but they generally have but one wife. They burn the bodies of their dead, and transport the ashes to eminences, where they inter them, and cover the grave with a heap of stones, over which they plant a great number of small standards. They are unacquainted with the use of money, and trade only by barter.

Although the Moguls might appropriate to themselves the spoils of a great number of animals, the skins which they use for clothing are generally those of their sheep. They wear the wool inmost, and the skin on the outside. All the Moguls are governed by kans, or particular princes, independent of each other, but all subject to the emperor of China, whom they consider as the grand kam of the Tartars.—When the Mantchews subdued China, they conferred on the most powerful of the Mogul princes the titles of vang, peilè, peizè, and cong, which answer to our titles of king, duke, count, and marquis; each of them had a revenue assigned him, but far inferior to the appointments of the Mantchew lords at Peking; the emperor settled the limits of their respective territories, and appointed them laws, according to which they are at present governed. All the Mogul nations under the Chinese government, may be divided into four principal tribes, which are the Moguls, properly so called, the Kilkas, the Ortous, and the Tartars of Kokonor.

(p. 67.) CHINA, including Chinesian Tartary, is situated between 95 and 135 degrees of E. lon. and between 21 and 35 degrees of N. lat. being bounded by Russian Tartary on the N. by the Pacific ocean on the E. and S. and by Tonquin, Tibet, and the territories of Russia on the W. from which it is separated by the river Argun, being about 2000 miles in length from N. to S. and 1500 in breadth from E. to W. It is usually divided into 16 provinces, which will be described in their alphabetical order, as occur. In these provinces it is computed there are 155 capital cities, 1312 of the second rank, 2357 fortified towns, and upwards of ten millions of families, which may amount to fifty millions of people; and some have computed them at fifty-eight millions.—There are several very large rivers, and where these are wanting, the whole country is cut through with navigable canals; and a brisk trade is driven on from one end of the kingdom to the other.—There is a long wall of stone, 1500 miles in length, which the Chinese built to defend themselves against the incursions of the Tartars; but the Tartars, notwithstanding, made a conquest of their country, about 160 years since; and they are now governed by Tartar princes, who permit them however to retain their own laws, obliging them only to cut off their hair. The chief produce of this country is silk, tea, china, japan-ware, and gold-dust, of which every maritime people of Europe, almost, import a great deal, sending them silver in return. The Europeans complain of them as very tricking unfair dealers, and that their custom-house officers take all opportunities of extorting money from foreigners. Their writing and painting is a sort of short-hand, every character expressing a word, and sometimes a sentence. They have not the use of letters. The emperor is an absolute prince, but all his laws and acts must be passed by a certain great council of his nobility, before they are of any force; however he does not want means to oblige them to yield their assent to what he proposes, any more than the sovereigns in this part of the world. The government requires a profound submission of children to their parents; they even make statues and images to represent their ancestors and worship them in their houses; and mutual civility among all men is enjoined by law, which seems to have made them a nation of hypocrites, having very little regard to the solemn professions they make of their friendship. The revenues of the crown are computed at 21,000,000l. sterling, which is not difficult to know, because an account of every man's family, estate, and substance, is taken every year and enrolled. Their forces are said to consist of 5,000,000 of men in time of peace; a militia that are very seldom raised, having few enemies since the union of Tartary with China. Peking is the capital of the whole empire.

(p. 77.) GOLCONDA, a country of the Decan of Hindostan, between the lower parts of the rivers Kistna and Godavery, and the principal part of Dowlatabad. It was formerly called Tellingana, or Tilling, and is subject to the Nizam of the Decan. It is most remarkable for its diamond mines, the most considerable in the world. Hydrabad is the capital.

(p. 77.) BISNAGER, E. lon. 78. 0. lat. 13. 20. the cap. of the pr. of Bisnagar, in the lither peninsula of India, sit. 254 m. N. W. of Madras, or Fort St. George, and 240 m. S. E. of Goa, sub. to the Mogul.

(p. 77.) DECAN, a pr. of the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia, is bounded by the pr. of Cambaya Guzurat on the N. by Golconda, and Berar on the E. by Visapour on the S. and by the Indian Ocean on the W. The chief inland town Aurengabad, and upon the coast the town of Bombay. The principal trade consists in cotton and silk.

(p. 81.) AVA, a country of Asia, on the Bay of Bengal, extending from the S. extremity of Aracan to Cape Negraias, divided from Pegu on the E. by the river Ava. The kingdom of Burmah has been erroneously called Ava, from its capital so named.

(p. 81.) ARACAN, or RECCAN, a country of Asia, bounded on the N. by Roshaan, on the E. by Burmah, on the S. by the river Ava, and on the W. by the Gulf of Bengal. It is a fertile, but not populous country, governed by 12 princes, subject to the chief king; who resides in his capital. They have only two seasons; the rainy season, which continues from April to October, and the fair season, which includes all the rest of the year, and is called the summer. The inhabitants are idolaters, and the women tolerably fair; but the longest ears are reckoned the most beautiful, and in these they wear many rings. There are such numbers of elephants, buffaloes, and tigers, that but few places are inhabited, on account of the ravages made by these animals.

(p. 84.) PEGU Kingdom, is sit. on the S. E. side of the Bay of Bengal, in the E. Indies, in Asia, bounded by the kingdom of Ava on the N. by the mountains, which separate it from Laos on the E. by the kingdom of Siam, and the Bay of Bengal, on the S. and by another part of the Bay of Bengal on the W. This country, like others between the tropics, is flooded when the sun is vertical, but the mud and slime, which the waters leave when they retire, render the low lands fruitful, as the Nile does those of Egypt. As to the higher grounds, they are parched up soon after the rains are over; and if they sow wheat on them, (as they sometimes do) they are forced to water them by little channels, which convey the water to them, from their cisterns and reservoirs. But they sow much more rice than wheat, which is more suitable to the flooded soil. They have not many of the European fruits, unless figs, oranges, lemons, citrons, and pomegranates: But they have bananos, goyyas, durions, mangoes, tamarinds, annanas or pine-apples, cocoa-nuts, and other tropical fruits; they have also pepper, and sugar-canes, and great variety of melons, cucumbers, roots, and other garden-stuff, which is their principal food. Their hills are covered with wood, and they have a great deal of good timber; but their bamboes, a kind of hollow cane, which grows to the bigness of a foot diameter, is of the greatest use; this they bend and form while it is young, making it fit for whatever they design it, and particularly to hang their palanquins upon: These are couches on which they lie when they travel, carried upon men's shoulders. They have few horses or sheep, but plough with oxen and buffaloes, and carry burdens upon them, as well as camels; nor does any place abound more in elephants than this and the adjacent countries; they compute the strength of their armies by the number and size of their elephants. The English from Fort St. George traffic pretty much with this country; and, besides furs and skins, import from thence rubies, sapphires, and other precious stones. The houses here are built frequently on pillars, by the river side; and, in the time of the rains, they have no communication with one another but by boats, in the flat country. According to late accounts, the king of Ava is now master of Pegu. The government is arbitrary; yet it is said, he seldom abuses his power. There is one thing that seems peculiar to the people on the E. side of the Bay of Bengal, they are so far from resenting a foreigner's being free with their women, that they will offer their daughters to them for temporary wives while they remain in the country. They are of a copper colour, though the women are whiter than the men. Their priests are called Talapoins, and they worship idols; yet they inculcate charity as the highest virtue; are strict observers of morality, and hold that religion to be best, which teaches men to do most good.

(p. 85.) SIAM, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N. E. by that of Laos, on the E. by Cambodia, on the S. by a gulf of the same name, and on the W. by the Bay of Bengal. It is 550 miles in length, and 250 in breadth, though in some places, not above 50. It is divided into higher and lower, and some French authors have extolled it as the finest and richest country in the world; but the inhabitants both men and women, go almost naked; the better sort indeed, wear rich garments. The king shows himself but once a year to the common people. He is proprietor of all the lands in the country, and keeps a numerous army, among which are 1000 elephants. It is a flat country, which, in the rainy season is overflowed; for which reason most of the houses are built on pillars, and they have no communication for some months but by boats.— They are Pagaus, but have some ideas of integrity and benevolence. There are mines of gold, silver, tin, and copper, and they have plenty of pepper, aloes, benjamin, and musk. The woods abound with elephants, rhinoceroses, leopards, and tigers; beside which there are large crocodiles, and serpents 20 feet long.

(p. 95.) TONQUIN, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N. by China, on the E. by China and the Bay of Tonquin, on the S. by Cochinchina, and the W. by Laos. It is 120 miles in length, and 500 in breadth, and is one of the finest and most considerable kingdoms of the east, on account of its population and commerce. The country is thick set with villages, and the natives are of a middling stature, with a tawny complexion. Their faces are oval and flattish; their noses and lips well proportioned. Their hair is black, long, lank, and coarse; and they let it hang down their shoulders. They dye their teeth black. They are dexterous, active, and ingenious in mechanic arts.— They weave a multitude of fine silks, and make curious lacker works, which are exported to other countries. They are so addicted to gaming, that when every thing else is lost, they will stake their wives and children. Their houses are small and low, and the walls either of mud, or hurdles daubed over with clay. They have only a ground floor, with two or three partitions, and each room has a square hole to let in the light. The villages consist of 20 or 40 houses, surrounded by trees, and in some places are banks to keep the water from overflowing their gardens. In the rainy season they cannot pass from one house to another, without wading through the water. The language is spoken very much in the throat, and some of the words are pronounced through the teeth: it has a great resemblance to the Chinese. They have schools of learning, and their characters are the same, or like those of China; and like them, they write with a hair pencil. Their commodities are gold, musk, silks, calicões, drugs of many sorts, woods for dyeing, lackered ware, earthen ware, salt, &c.—The lackered ware is not inferior to that of Japan, which is accounted the best in the world. With all their merchandise one would expect the people to be very rich; but they are in general, very poor, the chief trade being carried on by the Chinese, English, and Dutch. The kingdom is an absolute monarchy. Tong-tou is the capital.

(p. 99.) COCHIN-CHINA, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the E. by the Eastern ocean, on the N. by Tonquin, on the W. by Cambodia, and on the S. by Ciampa. It abounds in gold, raw silk, and drugs. Their towns have gates at the end of each street, which are shut every night. If any fire break out in a ward, all the inhabitants are destroyed, except the women and children.

(p. 99.) CAMBODIA; E. lon. 04. 15. Lat. 2. 40. the capital of a kingdom of the same name, in India beyond the Ganges, in Asia situate near the western shore of the river Mecon (by some said to be the largest in the world), about 150 miles N. of the mouth of that river. Cambodia kingdom extends from the 9th to the 15th degree of N. lat. being bounded by the kingdom of Laos on the N. Cochin China and Chiampa on the E. the Indian ocean on the S. and the bay of Siam on the W. A country annually overflowed in the rainy season, viz. between June and October, as most countries are which lie within the tropic of Cancer, and north of the equator, producing rice, and such fruits as are usually found between the tropics.

(p. 102.) PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, islands in the Indian ocean, discovered by Magellan, in 1521. The principal islands are, Manila, or Luconia; Mindanao; Samar, or Tandago, sometimes called Philippina; Masbate; Mindoro; Luban; Paragoia, or Paragos; Panay; Leyta; Bohol; Sibn, Cibn, or Zebu; Negro's island; St. John's; Xolo; and Abyo. They are chiefly subject to the Spaniards. Lon. from 113 13 to 120 50 E. lat. from 6 30 to 18 15 N.

(p. 105.) MOLUCCAS, or SPICE ISLANDS, a cluster of small islands in the eastern ocean, the largest not more than 30 miles in circumference.—

The principal are, Ternate, Tydore, Machian, Motyr, and Bachian. They lie between Gilolo to the E. and Celebes to the W. They are most remarkable for spices, especially cloves, and are subject to the English. Lon. from 125 to 130 E. lat. from 2 0 N. to 1 50 S.

(p. 108.) CEYLON island, situated between 73 and 82 degrees of E. lon. and between 6 and 10 N. lat. being 250 miles long, 195 broad, situate in the Indian sea near the S. E. coast of the continent of the Hiber India. The Dutch are possessed of all the sea coast, and have shut up the king in the middle of the island, who resides at the capital city of Candy, while the Dutch monopolize all the cinnamon which this island only produces, and suffer no other nation to trade with the natives, or get any cinnamon but what they purchase of them. They pretended to assist the king of Ceylon against the Portuguese, who had several towns and fortresses on the coast; and when they had driven the Portuguese out, usurped the dominion of the country, and in 1765, they attacked the city of Canada also, and have established a governor there of their own. The island is full of woods, which abound in wild beasts and very dangerous serpents, some of whom are so large that they will kill a tyger, and swallow him whole afterwards, having first broken all his bones, by twisting themselves round him. The most extraordinary vegetable production is the tree called the Tallipot, one of whose leaves will cover ten men, and keep them from the rain; they are very light, and travellers carry them from place to place, and use them as tents.

(p. 115.) JAPAN, a large empire in the most eastern part of Asia. It is composed of several islands, the principal of which is Nippon. It was discovered, in 1542, by the Portuguese, who were cast on shore by a tempest. This empire is the richest in the world for gold. The inhabitants are naturally ingenious, and have a happy memory; but their manners are diametrically opposite to those of the Europeans. The sciences are highly esteemed among them, and they have several schools at different places, in which are taught arithmetic, rhetoric, poetry, history, and astronomy. Some of their schools at Meaco have each above 5000 scholars.— They treat the women with great severity, and punish adultery with death. They formerly carried on a trade with the neighbouring countries; but now all communication is forbidden, except with the Chinese and Dutch. Their emperor is called Dairo; and in the minority of one of them, in 1150, when they had civil wars, one of the competitors for the crown assumed the ecclesiastical government, retaining the same title; while the other, who ruled in civil affairs, was called Cuba: and things have remained on the same footing to this day. The Dairo is the chief emperor, and confer the dignity upon the other, as if he were his vassal. The religion is paganism; but there are two different sects. There was once a great number of Christians in different parts of the empire; but, in 1638, they were all extirpated. The palace of the emperor is at Jedo, in the island of Niphon, and it is the capital of the whole. The merchandise which the English carry to Japan, are spices, sugar, silks, linen and woollen cloth, elephants' teeth, and haberdashery wares, for which they receive gold, silver, cabinets, and other japanned and lackered wares.

(p. 124.) COREA, an island or peninsula on the N. E. of China, between 29 and 109 degrees of E. lon. and between 36 and 46 degrees of N. lat. bounded by Tartary on the N. by the Indian ocean, which separates it from Japan, on the E. by the Kang sea, and bay of Nankiu on the S. and by the province of Leatong on the W. said to have good mines of gold and silver; subject to China.

(p. 124.) JESSO, or Yedso, E. lon. 140, N. lat. 40, a country of Asia, which lies north of Japan, and is conjectured to extend N. E. to the American continent; but we have little knowledge either of the country, or of the people who inhabit it.

(p. 176.) ROME, a famous city, formerly three times as large as it is at present, but still one of the largest cities of Europe. It contains 170,000 inhabitants, which, though greatly inferior to what it could boast in the days of its ancient power, is more than it has been able to number at some former periods since the fall of the empire; there being reason to think, that, at particular times since, it has been reduced below 40,000. The numbers have gradually increased during the present century.—Rome exhibits a strange mixture of magnificent and interesting, and of common and beggarly objects.—The former consists of palaces, churches, fountains, and the remains of antiquity. The latter comprehend all the rest of the city. The church of St. Peter, in the opinion of many, surpasses, in size and magnificence, the finest monuments of ancient architecture. Its length is 730 feet, the breadth 520; and the height from the pavement to the top of the cross, which crowns the cupola, 450. A complete description of this church, and of its statues, basso-relievs, columns, and other ornaments, would fill volumes. The Pantheon is the most perfect of the Roman temples which now remain. From its circular form, it has obtained the name of the Rotundo. There are no windows, the central opening in the dome admitting sufficiency of light. The rain which falls through this aperture, immediately drills through holes which perforate a large piece of porphyry, that forms the centre of the pavement. Being converted into a Christian temple, the Pantheon, originally erected to the honour of all the gods, is now dedicated to the Virgin, and to all the martyrs and saints. As the Pantheon is the most entire, the Amphitheatre of Vespasian is the most stupendous monument of antiquity in Rome. One-half of the external circuit remains, from which a pretty exact idea may be formed of the original structure: by a computation of Mr. Byres, it could contain 85,600 spectators. But the antiquities of Rome are too numerous to be minutely described; we shall, therefore, pass over the ancient forum, now a cow-market; the beautiful column of Trajan, 120 feet high, &c. The pope has three superb palaces, of which the principal is the Vatican. The library of this palace is the largest and most complete in the world. In Rome the connoisseur will meet with innumerable paintings by the greatest masters, and with the chief de-œuvres of sculpture, &c. The castle of St. Angelo serves only to keep the city in awe. Rome is seated on the Tiber, which runs through a part of it; and it is 600 miles S.E. of Paris, 410 S.S.W. of Vienna, and 780 S.E. of London. Long. 12.55 E. lat. 41.54 N.

(p. 400.) TARTARY, a country of Asia, which taken in its utmost limits, reaches from the Eastern ocean to the Caspian, and from Cocra, China, Thibet, Hindostan, and Persia, to Russia and Siberia. It lies between 55 and 135 E. long. and between 35 and 55 N. lat. being 3600 miles in length, and 960 in breadth; but in the narrowest part not above 330 broad. It may be considered under two grand divisions, namely, Eastern and Western Tartary.—The greatest part of the former either belongs to the emperor of China, is tributary to him, or is under his protection; and a very considerable part of Western Tartary has been conquered by the Russians. These vast countries include all the middle part of Asia, and are inhabited by Tartars of different denominations and manners.

(p. 410.) LAPLAND, a country of Europe, bounded on the N. by the North sea and the Frozen ocean, on the E. by the White sea, on the S. by Sweden and the gulf of Bothnia, and on the W. by Norway. It is situate between 69 and 75 of N. lat. Swedish Lapland occupies the south division, which is the largest; Russian Lapland is situate in the east part; and Danish Lapland, which is the smallest, extends the whole length of the Severnoi, a chain of lofty mountains, on their northern side. The Laplanders are of a middling stature. They have generally a flattish face, fallen cheeks, dark grey eyes, thin beard, brown hair, are stout, straight, and of a yellowish complexion, occasioned by the weather, the smoke of their habitations, and their habitual filthiness. Their manner of life renders them hardy, agile, and supple, but, at the same time, inclined to indolence. They are so proud of their country and constitution, that, when removed from the place of their nativity, they usually die of the nostalgia, or longing to return. Their women are short, often well made, complaisant, chaste, and extremely nervous; which is also observable sometimes among the men. The men are divided into Fishers and Mountaineers. The former make their habitations in the neighbourhood of some lake, whence they draw their subsistence. The others seek their support on the mountains, possessing herds of reindeer, which they use according to the season; but they go generally on foot. The Fishers, who are also called Laplanders of the woods (because in summer they dwell upon the borders of the lakes, and in winter in the forests) live by fishing and hunting, and choose their situation from its convenience for either. All the Swedish and Norwegian, as well as the greatest number of the Russian Laplanders, bear the name of Christians; but their religion is full of superstition, a compound of Christian and Pagan ceremonies.

(p. 427.) GUINEA Coast, in Africa, is situate between 15 E. and 15 W. long. and between 4 and 10 degrees of N. lat. bounded by Nigritia, or Negroeland, on the N. by unknown lands, on the E. by Congo and the Atlantic Ocean on the S. and by the same ocean on the W. comprehending, 1, The Grain Coast, from its producing chiefly Guinea-grain, 2, The Ivory Coast, from the plenty of elephants' teeth found there; 3, The Gold Coast, from its furnishing most gold; 4, The Slave Coast, so designated from the quantity of slaves that used formerly to be purchased from thence; which, previous to the abolition of that infernal traffic by the British government, are said to have amounted to nearly 40,000 annually in English vessels. Every one of these divisions produces some of the above-said articles. The English, Dutch, Portuguese, and other European nations, previous to this war, had numerous forts and factories on this coast; but they are now chiefly occupied by the English.—There is abundance of little princes and states in the inland country, who are usually at war, and who sold their prisoners to the Europeans for slaves. The African traders do not only visit this coast, which is properly called Guinea, but all the W. coast of Africa, from Cape Verd at the mouth of the river Nigre, in 15 degrees N. lat. to Cape Negro, in 18 degrees S. lat. where they meet with the same merchandize they do in Proper Guinea.

(p. 433.) BENIN, a kingdom of Africa, bounded on the W. by Dahomy and the Atlantic; on the N. by Biafara; on the E. by parts unknown; and on the S. by Loango. It begins in 1 S. lat. and extends to about 9 N. lat. The women use great art in dressing their hair, in a variety of forms. The people are skilful in making various sorts of dies, and they manufacture and export cotton cloths.—

They eat the flesh of dogs and cats in preference to that of any other animal. Though jealous of each other, they are not so of the Europeans, thinking it impossible that the taste of the women can be so depraved as to grant any liberties to a white man. Their religion is paganism. Their king is absolute, and has a great number of petty princes under him.

(p. 439) CONGO, a country of Africa, between the equinoctial line and 18 degrees of S. lat. containing the countries of Loango, Angola, and Benguela. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1481, and is bounded on the N. by Benin, by the inland part of Africa on the E. by Matamion on the S. and by the Atlantic on the W. It is sometimes called Lower Guinea; and the Portuguese have a great many settlements on the coast, as well as in the inland country. The inhabitants go almost naked, worshipping the sun, moon, and stars, beside animals of different kinds; but the Portuguese have made many converts. Congo, properly so called, extends 150 miles along the coast, and 372 inland. From March to September is called the winter season, when it rains almost every day; and the summer is from October to March, when the weather is serene. The inhabitants are skilful in weaving cotton cloth, and trade in ivory, cassia, and tamarinds. The river Zaire is full of crocodiles and river-horses. The principal town is S. Salvador.

(p. 439.) ANGOLA, a kingdom of Africa, bounded on the N. by Congo Proper, on the E. by Malemby, on the S. by Benguela, on the W. by the Atlantic. The country is divided among some petty princes, and the Portuguese have several settlements on the coast; the English and Dutch also traffic with the natives.

(p. 452.) CAFFRARIA, (South) a country of Africa, lying to the S. of the tropic of Capricorn, and extending along the Indian Ocean to the mouth of the Great Fish River, in lat. 30 30 S. By this river it is divided from the country of the Hottentots. Its other boundaries cannot, at present, be ascertained, it having never been visited by any European, before the voyage which lieutenant Patterson made in these parts in 1779. The Caffres are tall and well proportioned; and, in general, evince great courage in attacking lions and other beasts of prey. Their colour is a jet black; their teeth white as ivory. They are so fond of dogs, that if one particularly pleases them, they will give two bullocks in exchange for it; and their whole exercise through the day is hunting, fighting, or dancing. They have great pride in their cattle; and cut their horns in such a way as to be able to turn them into any shape they please; when they wish their cattle to return, they go a little way from the house and blow a whistle, which is made of ivory of bone, and in this manner bring them all home, without any difficulty. The women make a curious kind of baskets, of a texture so compact as to contain milk. Industry is the leading trait in the character of the Caffres, who are distinguished from their neighbours to the S. by their fondness for agriculture. They are governed by an hereditary king, whose power is very limited, receiving no tax, and having no troops at his command; but being permitted to take as many wives as he pleases, it is necessary that he should have a larger portion of land to cultivate, and a greater number of cattle to tend and feed. His cabin his neither higher, nor better decorated than the rest; and his whole family live around him, composing a group of about 15 huts. The distance of the different hordes make it necessary that they should have inferior chiefs, who are appointed by the king.

(p. 461.) MONOMOTAPA, a kingdom of Africa, bounded on the N. by Monomngi, on the E. by Sofala, on the S. by Caffraria, and on the W. by unknown regions. The air is temperate, and the soil fertile in rice and sugar-canes, which last grow without cultivation. There are a great many ostriches and elephants, with several mines of gold and silver. It lies on the E. coast of Africa, between 14 and 25 S. lat. Its capital is of the same name.

(p. 466.) SOFALA, a kingdom on the E. coast of Africa, extending S. of Zanguebar, from the river Cuama to the river Del Espirito Santo; that is, from 17 to 25 S. lat. It contains mines of gold, and is tributary to the Portuguese.

(p. 469.) SOCOTORA, an island of Asia, between Arabia Felix and Africa, 50 miles in length, and 22 in breadth. It is noted for its fine aloes.

(p. 472.) MADAGASCAR, the largest of the African islands, lies between 44 and 51 degrees E. lon. and 12 and 25 S. lat. It is 40 leagues E. of the continent of Africa, from which it is separated by the straits of Mosambique. It extends 900 miles from N. to S. and is from 200 to 300 broad. The natives are commonly tall, well made, of an olive complexion, and some of them pretty black. Their hair is not woolly, like that of the negroes of Guinea; but it is always black, and for the most part curls naturally: their nose is small, though not flat, and they have not thick lips. There are a great many petty kings, whose riches consists in cattle and slaves, and they are always at war with each other. They have neither temples nor priests.— They have no rules relating to marriage; for the men and women cohabit for some time, and then leave each other as freely. Here is a great number of locusts, crocodiles, cameleons, and other animals common to Africa. They have corn and grapes, and several sorts of excellent honey; as also minerals and precious stones. The French have attempted to settle here, but have always been expelled. There are only some parts on the coast yet known.

(p. 483.) FLORIDA, a country of N. America, bounded on the N. by Georgia, on the E. by the Atlantic, on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the W. by the Mississippi. It is 600 miles long, and 130 broad, lying between 25 and 31 degrees N. lat. and 82 and 92 W. long. It is divided into E. and W. Florida; St. Augustine, the capital of the former, and Pensacola of the latter. In some parts, two crops of Indian corn are annually produced: the banks of the rivers are well adapted to the culture of rice and corn; the interior country abounds with wood of almost every kind; the intervals between the hilly parts produce spontaneously the fruits common to Georgia and the Carolinas; and the whole country is valuable, in a particular manner, for the extensive rangers for cattle. Florida was discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in 1497. Having often changed masters, belonging alternately to the French and Spaniards, it was ceded by the latter to the English in 1763; but in 1781, it was taken by the Spaniards, and ceded to them in 1783; and under whose dominion they have uninterruptedly continued, till the recent troubles that have overwhelmed the mother-country; when, the revolutionary principles of the inhabitants of the United States, having been disseminated among the people, a majority of them have solicited to be admitted into the Union, and there is little doubt, but it will soon be carried into effect.

(p. 489.) HUDSON'S BAY, a bay of N. America, lying between 51 and 69 N. lat. and discovered, in 1610, by captain Henry Hudson, in endeavouring to find a N. W. passage into the Pacific Ocean. Repeated attempts have been since made to find that passage, but hitherto without effect. The entrance of the bay, from the ocean, after leaving to the N. Cape Farewell and Davis' Straits, is between Resolution isles on the N. and Button's isles on the Labrador coast to the S. forming the E. extremity of the strait, distinguished by the name of its great discoverer. This bay communicates on the N. by two straits, with Baffin's bay; on the E. side it is bordered by Labrador, on the S. by Canada, on the S. W. by New South Wales, and on the W. by New North Wales. In 1670 a charter was granted to a company, which does not consist of above ten persons, for the exclusive trade to this bay. This company possess three forts on the S. coast of James's Bay, by which the southern termination of Hudson's Bay is distinguished. These factories are called Rupert, Moose, and Albany, and they lie from 50. 50. to 52. 0. N. lat. On the W. side of Hudson's Bay, considerably up Hayes' river, is a factory called Flamborough.— Beyond this is York Fort, on Nelson's river, in lon. 92. 30. W. lat. 57. 25. N. but the most northern settlement is Prince of Wales's Fort, at the mouth of Churchill river, in lon. 94. 7. W. lat. 58. 48. N. In 1782, these factories were destroyed by a French squadron under the command of M. de la Peyrouse, but the damage has been since repaired, and the commerce is again in a flourishing situation.

(p. 491.) CARIBBEE ISLANDS [West Indies], the name given to a number of islands in the Atlantic ocean, which extend across the entrance of the gulf of Mexico, from the north west extremity of the Bahama islands, off the coast of Florida, in lat. 27. 45. N. in a south easterly direction to Tobago, 120 miles from the coast of Terra Firma, in lat. 11. 30. N. They lie between 59 and 86 W. long. Cuba being the most western, and Barbadoes the most eastern of these islands. When Columbus discovered them in 1492, he considered them as part of those vast regions in Asia, comprehended under the general name of India, to reach which, by a westerly coast across the Atlantic, had been the object of his voyage; and this opinion was so general, that Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Castile, in their ratification of an agreement, granted to Columbus upon his return, gave them the name of The Indies. Even after the error which gave rise to this opinion was detected, and the true position of the New World was ascertained, the name remained, and the appellation of the West Indies is given by all Europeans to these islands, and that of Indians to the inhabitants, not only of the islands, but of the continent of America. They are likewise called the Caribbee Islands, from the aborigines of the country; and the sea in which they lie, is sometimes called, by modern geographers, the Archipelago of the Caribbees. By the French they are called the Antilles; and nautical men distinguish them, from the different courses taken by ships, into the Leeward and Windward Islands. The name of the Caribbees should properly be confined to the smaller islands, lying between Porto Rico and Tobago. These were inhabited by the Caribbees, a fierce race of men, nowise resembling their timid neighbours in the larger islands. Columbus was a witness to their intrepid valour. The same character they have maintained invariably in all subsequent contests with the Europeans. The British islands are, Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbadoes, St. Christopher, Antigua, Nevis, Montserrat, Barbuda, Anguilla, Dominica, St. Vincent, Grenada, and the Grenadines, Tobago, Martinico, Guadaloupe, St. Lucia, Maricagalante, Curacao, St. Eustatia, the Virgin Islands, and the Bahama Islands. The Spanish Islands are, Cuba, Porto Rico, and Margarita.

(p. 498.) BRASIL; a country of South America, which gives the title of prince to the heir apparent of the crown of Portugal. It lies between the equinoctial line and the tropic of Capricorn. The air, though within the torrid zone, is temperate and wholesome. The soil is fertile, and more sugar comes thence, than from all other parts of the world. It produces tobacco, Indian corn, several sorts of fruits, and medicinal drugs. The wood brought from Brasil, and hence so called, is of great use in dying red; and within the country there is gold, and several sorts of precious stones. The cattle, carried over from Europe, increase prodigiously. They have several animals not known in Europe; among the rest a beautiful bird, called Colibri, whose body is not much larger than that of a May-bug. The Portuguese chiefly inhabit the coast, for they have not penetrated far into the country. Brasil is divided into fifteen governments, which are governed by the Prince Regent of Portugal, who, in 1808, fled hither for security against the tyranny of Bonaparte, who threatened the house of Braganza with destruction. Since his arrival, this colony has been greatly improved in its trade and population.

(p. 501.) PERU, a large country of South America, bounded on the N. by Popayan, on the W. by the Pacific ocean, on the S. by Chili, and on the E. by the Andes. It is 1500 miles in length, from N. to S. and 125 in breadth, between the Andes and the ocean, but in other places it is much broader. When the Spaniards landed in this country in 1530, they found it governed by sovereigns called Incas, who were revered by their subjects as divinities; and the inhabitants were found to be much more polished than the natives of other parts of America, those of Mexico excepted. These were soon subdued by a few Spaniards, under the command of Francis Pizarro. Peru is now divided into the three audiences of Quito, Lima, or Los Reyes, and Los Charcos; the whole under the government of a viceroy, whose authority once extended over all South America possessed by the Spaniard; but as some of these countries in this vast jurisdiction are above 2000 miles distant from the supreme seat of justice at Lima, the inhabitants were subject to the greatest inconveniences; to remedy which two new viceroyalties have been established. The first is fixed at Santa Fe de Bogota, the capital of the new kingdom of Granada, and extends over the whole of Terra Firma, and the audience of Quito. In the jurisdiction of the second, established in 1776, are the provinces of Riocla-Plata, Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, Tucuman, Potosi, Santa Cruz de la Sierra, and the towns of Mendoza and St. Juan. Peru has been long celebrated for its mines of gold and silver, all the quicksilver used in the refining of which is extracted from the famous mine of Guancabelica. Quinquina, or Jesuits Bark, the virtues of which are so well known, is found only in this country.

The fiercest beasts of prey in Peru are the Puma and Jaquar, inaccurately called lions and tigers by the Europeans, but possessing neither the undaunted courage of the former, nor the ravenous cruelty of the latter: they are hardly formidable to man, and often turn their backs on the least appearance of resistance. A quadruped, called the lama, peculiar to this country, was tamed to domestic purposes by the ancient Peruvians. In form it bears some resemblance to a deer, and some to a camel, and is of a size somewhat larger than a sheep. Its wool furnished the Peruvians with clothing, its flesh with food. It was even employed as a beast of burden, and carried a moderate load with much patience and docility; but it was never used for draught. Among the birds, the most remarkable is the condor, which is entitled to pre-eminence over the flying tribe, in bulk, strength, and courage. The river Guyaquil abounds with alligators, and the neighbouring country swarms almost as much with snakes and vipers, as that round Porto Bello does with toads. Notwithstanding the vast numbers of the original natives that perished from various causes, since the conquest of the country by the Spaniards, their numbers are still very great; and several districts, particularly in the audience of Quito, are occupied almost entirely by Indians. Lima is the capital.

(p. 514.) CANADA, a large country of North America, bounded on the N. by New Britain, on the E. by the gulf of St. Lawrence, on the S. by Nova Scotia and the United States, and on the W. by unknown lands. It lies between 61 and 81 degrees W. long. and 45 and 52 N. lat. and was discovered by the Cabots, father and son, in 1497. The winter continues for six months very severe. The land that is cleared is fertile, and the wheat sowed in May is reaped at the end of August. Of all their animals, the beaver is the most useful and curious. Canada turpentine is greatly esteemed for its balsamic qualities, and for its use in disorders of the breast and stomach. Canada was conquered by the English in 1759, and confirmed to them by the French at the peace of 1763. In 1774, this country was formed into a province, called Quebec, from the name of the capital; a government was instituted conformably to the French laws of Canada, and the Roman Catholic religion was established. In 1791, it was divided into two provinces, namely, Upper Canada and Lower Canada, of which latter province Quebec is the chief town; and a constitution, in imitation of that of England, was given to each of these provinces.

(p. 518.) CALIFORNIA, a peninsula of North America, in the North Pacific ocean, separated from the west coast of America by the Vermillion sea, or gulf of California, extending S. E. from lat. 32 N. to Cape St. Lucar, in lat. 23 N. It was discovered by Cortes, in 1536, and is said to have been visited by Sir Francis Drake in 1578, and to have received from him the name of New Albion. This latter name, however, belongs to no part of the peninsula, but to a country farther north between 37 and 45 N. latitude; the harbour of Sir Francis Drake being situate in about 110 23 W. long. and 38 23 N. lat. During a long period, California continued to be so little frequented, that even its form was unknown; and in most charts it was represented as an island. Though the climate of this country, if we may judge from its situation, must be very desirable, the Spaniards have made small progress in peopling it.—Towards the close of the last century, the Jesuits, who had great merit in exploring this neglected province, and civilizing its rude inhabitants, imperceptibly acquired a dominion over it, as complete as that which they possessed in their missions in Paraguay; and they laboured to govern the natives by the same policy. In order to prevent the court of Spain from conceiving any jealousy of their designs, they seem studiously to have depreciated the country, by representing the climate as so disagreeable and unwholesome, and the soil so barren, that nothing but a zealous desire of converting the natives could have induced them to settle there. Several public-spirited citizens endeavoured to undeceive their sovereigns, and to give them a better view of California, but in vain. At last, on the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish dominions, the court of Madrid appointed Don Joseph Galvez to visit this peninsula. His account of the country was favourable; he found the pearl fishery on its coasts to be valuable, and he discovered mines of gold of a very promising appearance. At present, however, California (the natural history of which is very little known) still remains among the most desolate and useless districts of the Spanish empire.

(p. 519.) VIRGINIA, one of the United States of North America, bounded on the S. by North Carolina, on the W. by the Mississippi, on the N. by Pennsylvania and the Ohio, and on the E. by the Atlantic. It is 758 miles in length, and 224 in breadth. The principal rivers are, James, York, Rappahannock, and Potomac. The soil and climate are various. The principal produce is tobacco, wheat, and Indian corn; but the culture of tobacco has considerably declined in favour of that of wheat. Virginia is divided into 74 counties, and the capital town is Richmond.

(p. 522.) HISPANIOLA (or St. Domingo), one of the richest islands in the West Indies, 400 miles in length, and 75 in breadth; is now solely possessed by the revolted negroes, who style it Hayti, from its original. It was discovered by Columbus in 1492. The Spanish name of it is Hispaniola, originally given to it by Columbus. The western part of it belongs to the French, and the east to the Spaniards. Since the revolution in France, the French part of this fine island has been subject to the most dreadful calamities, as well from an insurrection of the negroes, as from a civil war between the patriots and the royalists. The latter called in the assistance of the English, who landed in September, 1793, and provisionally took possession of Jeremie and Cape St. Nicholas Mele. Several other places submitted soon after; but some of them have been retaken by the republicans, who seemed, at the commencement of 1795, to be gaining the ascendancy. This island lies between Jamaica to the W. and Porto Rico to the E.

(p. 524.) MEXICO (Old or New Spain), an extensive country in North America, bounded on the N. by New Mexico, and on the S.E. by the Isthmus of Darien, where its breadth is not more than 60 miles; its western coast being washed by the Pacific ocean and the gulf of California, and its eastern by the gulf Mexico and the Caribbean sea. It lies between 83 and 110 degrees W. long. and extends from 7 30 to 30 40 N. lat. being 2000 miles long, and, in its widest part to the north, above 600 broad. Although Mexico is within the torrid zone, the climate is temperate and healthy. No country abounds more with grain, fruits, roots, and vegetables; many of them peculiar to the country, or, at least, to America. It is celebrated for its mines of gold and silver, and has quarries of jasper, porphyry, and exquisite marble. Cochineal is almost peculiar to this country, its indigo and cocoa are superior to any in America; and its logwood has been long an important article of commerce. Among the quadrupeds are the puma and jaguar, bears, elks, wolves, deer, &c. The puma and jaguar have been inaccurately denominated by Europeans, lions and tigers; but they possess neither the undaunted courage of the former, nor the ravenous cruelty of the latter.

The domestic animals of Europe, particularly horned cattle, have multiplied here almost with incredible rapidity. Numbers of these having been suffered to run wild, now range over the vast plains, in herds of from 30 to 40,000; they are killed merely for the sake of their hides, and the slaughter at certain seasons is so great, that the stench of the carcasses which are left in the fields, would infect the air, if large packs of wild dogs, and vast flocks of gallinazos, or American vultures, the most voracious of birds, did not instantly devour them: these hides are annually exported, in vast quantities, to Europe. New Spain is divided into the three audiences of Guadalajara, Mexico, and Guatemala, subdivided into provinces, the principal of which, in each audience, being Guadalajara Proper, Mexico Proper, and Guatemala Proper. The whole country is governed by a viceroy, the extent of whose jurisdiction, however, has been wisely circumscribed, in the course of this century, by the erection of the four remote provinces of Sonora, Cinaloa, California, and New Navarre, into a separate government.

(p. 527.) DARIEN, (or Terra Firma Proper), a province of Terra Firma, in South America. It lies along the coast of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and is particularly distinguished by the name of the Isthmus of Darien, and, by some writers, the Isthmus of Panama. It extends, in the form of a crescent, round the bay of Panama, being bounded on the N. by the gulf of Mexico, on the E. by the river and gulf of Darien, on the S. by Popayan and the Pacific ocean, and on the W. by the same ocean and Veragua. It is not above 60 miles broad; but this Isthmus, which binds together the continents of North and South America, is strengthened by a chain of lofty mountains, stretching through its whole extent, which renders it a barrier of solidity sufficient to resist the impulses of two opposite oceans. The mountains are covered with forests almost inaccessible. The valleys in this moist climate, where it rains during two-thirds of the year, are marshy, and so often overflowed, that the inhabitants, in many places, build their houses upon trees, to be elevated from the damp soil, and the odious reptiles engendered in the putrid waters. The principal towns are Panama and Porto Bello.

(p. 529.) ANDALUSIA, a province of New Spain, 250 miles in length, and 150 in breadth.— It is bounded on the S. by Granada, on the W. by Algarva and the Atlantic, on the N. by Estramadura, and on the E. by Murcia. The Guadalquivir runs through its whole length, and it is the finest country in Spain. The capital is Seville.

(p. 558.) ENGLAND, a kingdom of Great Britain, bounded on the N. by Scotland, on the N.E. and E. by the German ocean, on the S. by the English Channel, and on the W. by St. George's Channel, the principality of Wales, and the Irish Sea. It lies between two degrees E. and 7 W. long. and between 49 and 56 N. lat. It is of a triangular form. The longest day in the northern parts contains 17 hours 50 minutes; and the shortest in the southern near eight hours.

The situation, by the sea washing it on three sides, renders England liable to a great uncertainty of weather, so that the inhabitants on part of the sea coasts are often visited by agues and fevers. On the other hand, it prevents the extremes of heat and cold, to which other places, lying in the same degree of latitude, are subject; and it is, on that account, friendly to the longevity of the inhabitants in general, especially those who live on a dry soil. To this situation likewise we are to ascribe that perpetual verdure for which England is remarkable, occasioned by refreshing showers, and the warm vapours of the sea.

When the Romans provinciated England, they divided it into,

1. Britannia Prima, which contained the southern parts of the kingdom.

2. Britannia Secunda, containing the western parts, comprehending Wales. And,

3. Maxima Caesariensis, which reached from the Trent as far northward as the wall of Severus, between Newcastle and Carlisle, and sometimes as far as that of Adrian in Scotland, between the Forth and Clyde.

To these divisions some add the Flavia Caesariensis, which they suppose to contain the midland counties.

When the Saxons invaded England about the year 450, and when they were established in the year 582, their chief leaders appropriated to themselves, after the manner of the other northern conquerors, the countries which each had been the most instrumental in conquering; and the whole formed a heptarchy, or political republic, consisting of seven kingdoms. But in time of war, a chief was chosen out of the seven kingdoms; for which reason we call it a political republic, its constitution greatly resembling that of ancient Greece.

Besides the 52 counties into which England and Wales are divided, there are counties corporate, consisting of certain district, to which the liberties and jurisdictions peculiar to a county have been granted by royal charter. Thus the city of London is a county distinct from Middlesex; the cities of York, Chester, Bristol, Exeter, Norwich, Worcester, and the towns of Kingston upon Hull and Newcastle upon Tyne, are counties of themselves, distinct from those in which they lie. The same may be said of Berwick upon Tweed, which lies in Scotland, and hath within its jurisdiction a small territory of two miles, on the north side of the river.

The industry of the English is such, as to supply the absence of those favours which nature has so lavishly bestowed upon some foreign climates, and in many respects even to exceed them. No nation in the world can equal the cultivated parts of England in beautiful scenes. The variety of high-lands and low-lands, the former generally swelling, and both of them forming prospects equal to the most luxuriant imagination, the corn and meadow ground, the intermixtures of inclosures and plantations, the noble seats, comfortable houses, cheerful villages, and well-stocked farms, often rising in the neighbourhood of populous towns and cities, decorated with the most vivid colours of nature, are inexpressible. The most barren spots are not without their verdure; but nothing can give us a higher idea of the English industry, than observing, that some of the pleasantest counties in the kingdom are naturally the most barren, but rendered fruitful by labour. Upon the whole, it may be safely affirmed, that no country in Europe equals England in the beauty of its prospects, or the opulence of its inhabitants.

Though England is full of delightful rising grounds, and the most enchanting slopes, yet it contains few mountains. The most noted are the Peak in Derbyshire, the Pendle in Lancashire, the Wolds in Yorkshire, the Cheviot hills on the borders of Scotland, the Chiltern in Bucks, Malvern in Worcestershire, Cotswould in Gloucestershire, the Wrekin in Shropshire; with those of Plinlimmon and Snowdon in Wales. In general, however, Wales and the northern parts may be termed mountainous.

The vegetable and animal productions are subjects so copious, and such improvements have been made in gardening and agriculture, ever since the best printed accounts we have had of both, that much must be left to the reader's own observation and experience. Excellent institutions for the improvements of agriculture are now common in England; and their members are so public-spirited as to print periodical accounts of their discoveries and experiments, which serve to shew that agriculture and gardening may be carried to a much higher state of perfection than they are in at present. Honey and saffron are natives of England. It is almost needless to mention to the most uninformed reader, in what plenty the most excellent fruits, apples, pears, plums, cherries, peaches, apricots, nectarines, currants, gooseberries, raspberries, and other hortulant productions, grow here; and what quantities of cider, perry, methglin, and the like liquors, are made in some counties. The cider of Devon and Herefordshire, when kept, and made of proper apples, and in a particular manner, is often preferred by judicious palates, to French white wine. It is not enough to mention those improvements, did we not observe the natives of England have made the different fruits of the world their own, sometimes by simple culture, but often by hot-beds, and other means of forcing nature. The English pine-apples are delicious, and now plentiful. The same may be said of other natives of the East and West Indies, Persia, and Turkey. The English grapes are pleasing to the taste, but their flavour is not exalted enough for making of wine; and indeed wet weather injures the flavour of all the other fine fruits raised here. Our kitchen gardens abound with all sorts of greens, roots, and salads in perfection; such as artichokes, asparagus, cauliflowers, cabbages, coleworts, brocoli, peas, beans, kidney-beans, spinnage, beets, lettuce, celery, endive, turnips, carrots, potatoes, mushrooms, leeks, onions, and shallots.

Wood for dyeing is cultivated in Bucks and Bedfordshire, as hemp and flax are in other counties. In nothing, however, have the English been more successful than in the cultivation of the clover, cinquefoil, trefoil, sainfoin, lucern, and other meliorating grasses for the soil. It belongs to a botanist to recount the various kinds of useful and salutary herbs, shrubs, and roots, that grow in different parts of England. The soil of Kent, Essex, Surrey, and Hampshire, is most favourable to the difficult and tender culture of hops, which are now become a very considerable article of trade.

The exemption of the English constitution from the despotic powers exercised in foreign nations, not excepting republics, is one great reason why it is very difficult to ascertain the number of inhabitants in England; and yet it is certain that this might occasionally be done, by parliament, without any violation of public liberty, and probably soon will take place. With regard to political calculations, they must be very fallible, when applied to England. The prodigious influx of foreigners who settle in the nation, the emigrations of inhabitants to America and the islands, their return from thence, and the great number of hands employed in shipping, are all of them matters that render any calculation extremely precarious. Upon the whole, we are apt to think, that England is more populous than the estimators of her inhabitants are willing to allow. The war with France and Spain before the last, annually employed about 200,000 Englishmen, exclusive of Scots and Irish, by sea and land; and its progress carried off by various means, very near that number. The decay of population was indeed sensibly felt, but not so much as it was during the wars of queen Anne's reign, though not half of the numbers were then employed in the sea and land service.

At the same time, we are not of opinion that England is at present naturally more populace than she was in the reign of Charles I. though she is accidentally so. The English of former ages were strangers to the excessive use of spirituous liquors, and other modes of living that are destructive of propagation. On the other hand, the vast quantities of cultivated lands in England, since those times, it might reasonably be presumed, would be favourable to mankind; but this advantage is probably more than counterbalanced by the prevailing practice of engrossing farms, which is certainly unfavourable to population; and, independent of this, upon an average, perhaps a married couple has not such a numerous progeny now as formerly. We will take the liberty to make another observation, which falls within the cognizance of almost every man, and that is, the incredible increase of foreign names upon our parish books, and public lists, compared to what they were even in the reign of George I.

After what has been premised, it would be presumptuous to pretend to ascertain the number of inhabitants of England and Wales; but, in our own private opinion, there cannot be fewer than 7,000,000.

The antiquities of England are either British, Roman, Saxon, Danish, or Anglo-Norman; but these, excepting the Roman, throw no great light upon ancient history.

The Roman antiquities in England consist chiefly of altars and monumental inscriptions, which instruct us as to the legionary stations of the Romans in Britain, and the names of some of their commanders. The Roman military ways give us the highest idea of the civil as well as military policy of those conquerors. Their vestiges are numerous; one is mentioned by Leland, as beginning at Dover, and passing through Kent to London, and from thence to St. Alban's, Dunstable, Stafford, Towcester, Littleburn, St. Gilbert's Hill near Shrewsbury, then by Stratton, and so through the middle of Wales to Cardigan. The great Via Militaris, called Herman-Street, passed from London through Lincoln, where a branch of it, from Pontefract to Doncaster, strikes out to the westward, passing through Tadcaster to York, and from thence to Aids, where it again joined Herman-Street.—There would, however, be no end of describing the vestiges of the Roman roads in England, many of which serve as foundations to our present highways. The great earl of Arundel, the celebrated English antiquarian, had formed a noble plan for describing those which pass Sussex and Surrey towards London; but the civil war breaking out, put an end to the undertaking. The remains of many Roman camps are discernible all over England; one particular very little defaced, near Dorchester in Dorsetshire, where also is a Roman amphitheatre. Their situations are generally so well chosen, and their fortifications appear to have been so complete, that there is some reason to believe, that they were the constant habitations of the Roman soldiers in England; though it is certain, from the baths and tessellated pavements, that have been found in different parts, that their chief officers or magistrates lived in towns or villas. Roman walls have likewise been found in England, and perhaps, upon the borders of Wales, many of their fortifications and castles are bluded with those of a later date; and it is difficult for the most expert architect to pronounce that some halls and courts are not entirely Roman.—The private cabinets of noblemen and gentlemen, as well as the public repositories, contain a vast number of Roman arms, coins, fibulae, trinkets, and the like, which have been found in England; but the most amazing monument of the Roman power in England, is the prætecture, or wall of Severus, commonly called the Picts wall, running through Northumberland and Cumberland; beginning at Tinnmouth, and ending at Solway Frith, being about eighty miles in length. The wall at first consisted only of stakes and turf, with a ditch; but Severus built it with stone forts, and turrets at proper distances, so that each might have a speedy communication with the other, and it was attended all along by a deep ditch or vallum to the north, and a military highway to the south.

The Saxon antiquities in England consist chiefly in ecclesiastical edifices, and places of strength.—At Winchester is shewn the round table of king Arthur, with the names of his knights. The antiquity of this table has been disputed by Camden, and later writers, perhaps with reason: but if it be not British, it certainly is Saxon. The cathedral of Winchester served as the burying-place of several Saxon kings, whose bones were collected by bishop Fox, in six large wooden chests. Many monuments of Saxon antiquity present themselves all over the kingdom, though they are often not to be discerned from the Norman; and the British Museum contains several striking original specimens of their learning. Many Saxon charters, signed by the king and his nobles, with a plain cross instead of their names, are still to be met with. The writing is neat and legible, and was always performed by a clergyman, who affixed the name and quality of every donor, or witness, to his respective cross. The Danish erections in England are hardly discernible from the Saxon. The form of their camps is round, and they are generally built on eminences, but their forts are square.

All England is full of Anglo-Norman monuments, which we chuse to call so, because, though the princes under whom they were raised were of Norman original, yet the expence was defrayed by Englishmen, with English money. York-minster, and West-minster-hall and abbey are perhaps the finest specimens to be found in Europe, of that Gothic manner which prevailed in building, before the recovery of the Greek and Roman architecture. All the cathedrals and old churches in the kingdom, are more or less in the same taste, if we except St. Paul's. In short, those erections are so common, that they scarcely deserve the name of curiosities. It is uncertain, whether the artificial excavations, found in some parts of England, are British, Saxon, or Norman. That under the old castle of Ryegate in Surrey is very remarkable, and seems to have been designed for secreting the cattle and effects of the natives in time of war and invasion. It contains an oblong square hall, round which runs a bench, cut out of the same rock, for sitting upon; and tradition says, that it was the room in which the barons of England met during the wars with king John.—The rock itself is soft and very practicable; but it is hard to say where the excavation, which is continued in a square passage, about six feet high, and four wide, terminates, because the work is fallen in in some places.

Derbyshire is celebrated for many natural curiosities. The Mam Tor, or Mother Tower, is said to be continually mouldering away, but never diminishes. The Elden Hole, about four miles from the same place: this is a chasm in the side of a mountain, near seven yards wide, and fourteen long, diminishing in extent within the rock, but of what depth is not known. A plummet once drew 884 yards of line after it, whereof the last eighty were wet, without finding a bottom. The entrance of Poole's-Hole, near Buxton, for several paces is very low, but soon opens into a very lofty vault, like the inside of a Gothic cathedral. The height is certainly very great, yet much short of what some have asserted, who reckon it a quarter of a mile perpendicular, though in length it exceeds that dimension; a current of water, which runs along the middle, adds, by its sounding stream, re-echoed on all sides, very much to the astonishment of all who visit this vast concave. The drops of water which hang from the roof, and on the sides, have an amusing effect; for they not only reflect numberless rays from the candles carried by the guides, but, as they are of a petrifying quality, they harden in several places into various forms, which, with the help of a strong imagination, may pass for lions, fountains, organs, and the like. The entrance into that natural wonder at Castleton, which is from its hideousness named the Devil's Arse, is wide at first, and upwards of thirty feet perpendicular. Several cottagers dwell under it, who seem in a great measure to subsist by guiding strangers into the cavern, which is crossed by four streams of water, and then is thought impassible. The vault, in several places, makes a noble appearance, and is particularly beautiful, by being chequered with various coloured stones.

London is the metropolis of the British empire, and appears to have been founded between the reigns of Julius Cæsar and Nero, but by whom is uncertain; for we are told by Tacitus, that it was a place of great trade in Nero's time, and soon after became the capital of the island. It was first walled about with heavy stones, and British bricks, by Constantine the Great, and the walls formed an oblong square, in compass about three miles, with several principal gates. The same emperor made it a bishop's see, for it appears that the bishops of London and York, and another English bishop, were at the council of Arles, in the year 314: he also settled a mint in it, as is plain from some of his coins.

London, in its large sense, including Westminster, Southwark, and part of Middlesex, is a city of a very surprising extent, of prodigious wealth, and of the most extensive trade. This city, when considered with all its advantages, is now what ancient Rome once was; the seat of liberty, the encourager of arts, and the admiration of the whole world.—London is the centre of trade; it has an intimate connection with all the counties in the kingdom; it is the grand mart of the nation, to which all parts send their commodities, from whence they are again sent back to every town of the nation, and to every part of the world. From hence innumerable carriages by land and water are constantly employed; and from hence arises the circulation in the national body, which renders every part healthful, vigorous, and in a prosperous condition; a circulation that is equally beneficial to the head and most distant members. Merchants are here as rich as noblemen; witness the incredible loans to government; and there is no place in the world where the shops of tradesmen make such a noble and elegant appearance, or are better stocked.

It is situated on the banks of the Thames, a river which, though not the largest, is the richest and most commodious for commerce of any in the world.—It being continually filled with fleets, sailing to or from the most distant climates; and its banks extend from London-bridge to Blackwall, almost one continued great magazine of naval stores, containing three large wet docks, 52 dry docks, and 33 yards for the building of ships for the use of the merchants, beside the places allotted for the building of boats and lighters; and the king's yards down the river for the building of men of war. As this city is about sixty miles distant from the sea, it enjoys, by means of this beautiful river, all the benefits of navigation, without the danger of being surprised by foreign fleets, or of being annoyed by the moist vapours of the sea. It rises regularly from the water side, and extending itself on both sides along its banks, reaches a prodigious length from east to west in a kind of amphitheatre towards the north, and is continued for near 20 miles on all sides, in a succession of magnificent villas, and populous villages, the country seats of gentlemen and tradesmen; whether the latter retire for the benefit of fresh air, and to relax their minds from the hurry of business. The regard paid by the legislature to the property of the subject, has hitherto prevented any bounds being fixed for its extension.

The irregular form of this city makes it difficult to ascertain its extent. However, its length from east to west is generally allowed to be above seven miles, from Hyde-park corner to Poplar; and its breadth in some places three, in others two, and in others again not much above half a mile. Hence the circumference of the whole is almost eighteen miles; or, according to a modern measurement, the extent of continued buildings, is 35 miles two furlongs, and 39 roods. But it is much easier to form an idea of the large extent of a city so irregularly built, by the number of the people, who are computed to be near a million! and from the number of edifices devoted to the service of religion.

Of these, beside St. Paul's cathedral, and the collegiate church at Westminster, here are 102 parish churches, and 69 chapels of the established religion; 21 French protestant chapels; 11 chapels belonging to the Germans, Dutch, Danes, &c. 26 independent meetings; 34 presbyterian meetings; 20 baptist meetings; 19 popish chapels, and meeting houses for the use of foreign ambassadors, and people of various sects; and three Jewish synagogues. So that there are 305 places devoted to religious worship, in the compass of this vast pile of buildings, without reckoning the 21 out-parishes usually included in the bills of mortality, and a great number of methodist tabernacle.

There are also in and near this city 100 almshouses, about 20 hospitals and infirmaries, three colleges, 10 public prisons, 15 flesh-markets, one market for live cattle, two other markets more particularly for herbs, and 23 other markets for corn, coals, hay, &c. 15 inns of court, 27 public squares, besides those within single buildings, as the Temple, &c. three bridges, 49 halls for companies, eight public schools, called free schools, and 131 charity-schools, which provide education for 5034 poor children, 207 inns, 447 taverns, 551 coffee-houses, 5975 ale-houses, 1200 hackney-coaches, 400 ditto chairs, 7000 streets, lanes, courts, and alleys, and 150,000 dwelling houses, containing, as has been already observed, about 1,000,000 inhabitants.

London-bridge was first built of stone in the reign of Henry II. about the year 1163, by a tax laid upon wool, which in course of time gave rise to the notion that it was built upon wool packs; from that time it has undergone many alterations and improvements, particularly since the year 1756, when the houses were taken down, and the whole rendered more convenient and beautiful. The passage for carriages is 31 feet broad, and seven feet on each side for foot passengers. It crosses the Thames where it is 915 feet broad, and has at present 19 arches, of about 20 feet wide each, but the centre one is considerably larger.

Westminster-bridge is reckoned one of the most complete and elegant structures of the kind known in the world. It is built entirely of stone, and extended over the river at a place where it is 1,223 feet broad; which is above 300 feet broader than at London-bridge. On each side is a fine balustrade of stone, with places of shelter from the rain. The width of the bridge is 45 feet, having on each side a fine foot-way for passengers. It consists of 14 piers, and 13 large, and two small arches, all semicircular, that in the centre being 76 feet wide, and the rest decreasing four feet each from the other; so that the two least arches of the 13 great ones are each 52 feet. It is computed that the value of 40,000*l.* in stone and other materials, is always under water.— This magnificent structure was begun in 1738, and finished 1750, at the expence of 389,000*l.* defrayed by the parliament.

Blackfriars-bridge falls nothing short of that of Westminster, either in magnificence or workmanship; but the situation of the ground on the two shores obliged the architect to employ elliptical arches; which, however, have a very fine effect, and many persons even prefer it to Westminster-bridge. This bridge was begun in 1760, and finished in 1770, at the expence of 152,840*l.* to be discharged by a toll upon the passengers. It is situated almost at an equal distance between those of Westminster and London; commands a view on the Thames from the latter to Whitehall, and discovers the majesty of St. Paul's in a very striking manner.

The cathedral of St. Paul's is the most capacious, magnificent, and regular protestant church in the world. The length within is 500 feet, and the height, from the marble pavement to the cross, on the top of the cupola, is 340. It is built of Portland stone, according to the Greek and Roman orders, in the form of a cross, after the model of St. Peter's, at Rome, to which it in some respects is superior. St. Paul's church is the principal work of Sir Christopher Wren, and undoubtedly the only work of the same magnitude that ever was completed by one man. He lived to a great age, and finished the building in 37 years after he himself laid the first stone. It takes up six acres of ground, though the whole length of this church measures no more than the width of St. Peter's. The expence of rebuilding it, after the fire of London, was defrayed by a duty on coals, and is computed at a million sterling.

Westminster Abbey, or the collegiate church of Westminster, is a venerable pile of building, in the Gothic taste. It was first built by Edward the Confessor; king Henry III. rebuilt it from the ground, and Henry VII. added a fine chapel to the east end of it. This is the repository of the deceased British kings and nobility: and here are also monuments erected to the memory of many great and illustrious personages, commanders by sea and land, philosophers, poets, &c. In the reign of queen Anne, 4000*l.* a year out of the coal duty was granted by parliament for keeping it in repairs.

Westminster-Hall, though on the outside it makes a mean, and no very advantageous appearance, is a noble Gothic building, and is said to be the largest room in the world, whose roof is not supported with pillars, it being 230 feet long, and 70 broad. The roof is the finest of its kind that can be seen. Here are held the coronation feasts of our kings and queens; also the courts of chancery, king's-bench, and common-pleas, and above stairs that of the exchequer.

That beautiful column called the Monument, erected at the charge of the city, to perpetuate the memory of its being destroyed by fire, is justly worthy of notice. This column, which is of the Doric order, exceeds all the obelisks and pillars of the ancients, it being 202 feet high, with a staircase in the middle to ascend to the balcony, which is about 30 feet short of the top, from whence there are other steps, made for persons to look out at the top of all, which is fashioned like an urn, with a flame issuing from it. On the base of the monument, next the street, the destruction of the city, and the relief given to the sufferers by Charles II. and his brother, is emblematically represented in bas relief. The north and south sides of the base have a Latin inscription, the one describing its dreadful desolation, and the other its splendid resurrection; and on the east side is an inscription, shewing when the pillar was begun and finished. The charge of erecting this monument, which was begun by Sir Christopher Wren in 1671, and finished by him in 1677, amounted to upwards of 13,000*l.*

The Royal Exchange is a large and noble building, and is said to have cost above 80,000*l.*

The terrace in the Adelphi is a very fine piece of architecture, and has laid open one of the finest prospects in the world.

This great and populous city is happily supplied with abundance of fresh water, from the Thames, and the New-River; which is not only of inconceivable service to every family, but by means of fire-plugs every where dispersed; the keys of which are deposited with the parish officers, the city is in a great measure secured from the spreading of fire, for these plugs are no sooner opened than there are vast quantities of water to supply the engines.

With regard to the commerce of England, the exports have been computed at seven millions sterling, and its imports at five, of which above one million is re-exported; so that, if this calculation be true, England gains, annually, three millions sterling in trade; but this is a point upon which the most experienced merchants and ablest calculators differ.

Yet our foreign trade does not amount to one-sixth part of the inland; the annual produce of the natural products and manufactures of England amounting to above forty-two millions. The gold and silver of England is received from Portugal, Spain, Jamaica, the American colonies, and Africa, but great part of this gold and silver we again export to Holland and the East Indies; and it is supposed that two-thirds of all the foreign traffic of England is carried on in the port of London.

We shall conclude this account of our trade with the following comparative view of shipping, which, till a better table can be formed, may have its uses.

If the shipping of Europe may be divided into twenty parts, then
Great Britain, &c. is computed to have	- 6
The United Provinces	- 6
Denmark, Sweden, and Russia	- 2
The trading cities of Germany, and the Austrian Netherlands.	- 1
France	- 2
Spain and Portugal	- 2
Italy, and the rest of Europe	- 1

Our bounds will not afford room to enter into a particular detail of the places where those English manufactures, which are mentioned in the above account are fabricated.

Tacitus, in describing such a constitution as that of England, seems to think, that however beautiful it may rise in theory, it may be found impracticable in the execution. Experience has proved this mistake; for by contrivances unknown to antiquity, the English constitution has existed for above 500 years. It must at the same time be admitted, that it has received, during that time, many amendments, and some interruptions; but its principles are the same with those described by the above-mentioned historian, as belonging to the Germans, and the other northern ancestors of the English nation, and which are very improperly blended under the name of Gothic. On the first invasion of England by the Saxons, who came from Germany and the neighbouring countries, their laws and manners were pretty much the same as those mentioned by Tacitus.—The people had a leader in time of war. The conquered lands, in proportion to the merits of his followers, and their ability to serve him, were distributed among them; and the whole was considered as the common property which they were to unite in defending against all invaders. Fresh adventurers coming over, under separate leaders, the old inhabitants were driven into Wales; and those leaders, at last, assumed the titles of kings, over the several districts they had conquered. This change of appellation made them more respectable among the Britons, and their neighbours the Scots and Picts, but did not increase their power, the operations of which continued to be confined to military affairs.

All civil matters were proposed in a general assembly of the chief officers and the people, till, by degrees, sheriffs and other civil officers were appointed. To Alfred we owe that master-piece of judicial policy, the subdivision of England into wapentakes and hundreds, and the subdivision of hundreds into tithings, names that still subsist in England; and overseers were chosen to direct them for the good of the whole. The sheriff was the judge of all civil and criminal matters within the county, and to him, after the introduction of Christianity, was added the bishops. In process of time, as business multiplied, itinerant and other judges were appointed; but by the earliest records, it appears that all civil matters were decided by 10 or 12 men, living in the neighbourhood of the place where the dispute lay; and here we have the original of English juries. It is certain that they were in use among the earliest Saxon colonies, their institution being ascribed by bishop Nicholson to Woden himself, their great legislator and captain. Hence we find traces of juries in the laws of all those nations which adopted the feudal system, as in Germany, France, and Italy; who had all of them a tribunal composed of 10 good men and true, equals or peers of the party litigant. In England we find actual mention made of them so early as the laws of king Ethelred, and that not as a new invention.

Before the introduction of Christianity, we know not whether the Saxons admitted of juries in criminal matters; but we are certain that there was no action so criminal as not to be compensated for by money. A mulct was imposed in proportion to the guilt, even if it was murder of the king, upon the malefactor, and by paying it he purchased his pardon. Those barbarous usages seem to have ceased soon after the Saxons were converted to Christianity; and cases of felony and murder were then tried even in the king's court, by a jury.

Royalty, among the Saxons, was not, strictly speaking, hereditary, though in fact, it came to be rendered so through the affection which the people bore for the blood of their kings, and for preserving the regularity of government. Even estates and honours were not strictly hereditary till they were made so by William the Norman.

In many respects, the first princes of the Norman line afterwards did all they could to efface from the minds of the people the remembrance of the Saxon constitution; but the attempt was to no purpose. The nobility, as well as the people, had their complaints against the crown, and, after much war and bloodshed, the famous charter of English liberties, so well known by the name of Magna Charta, was forcibly (in a manner) obtained from king John, and confirmed by his son Henry III. who succeeded to the crown in 1216. It does not appear, that till this reign, and after a great deal of blood had been split, the commons of England were represented in parliament, or the great council of the nation; so entirely had the barons engrossed to themselves the disposal of property.

The precise year when the house of commons was founded is not known; but we are certain there was one in the reign of Henry III. though we shall not enter into any dispute about their specific powers. We therefore now proceed to describe the CONSTITUTION as it stands at present.

In all states there is an absolute supreme power, to which the right of legislation belongs; and which by the singular constitution of these kingdoms, is here vested in the king, lords and commons.

The supreme executive power of Great Britain and Ireland is vested by our constitution in a single person, king or queen; for it is indifferent to which sex the crown descends: the person entitled to it, whether male or female, is immediately entrusted with all the ensigns, rights, and prerogatives of sovereign power.

The grand fundamental maxim upon which the right of accession to the throne of these kingdoms depends, is, "that the crown, by common law and constitutional custom, is hereditary, and this in a manner peculiar to itself; but that the right of inheritance may, from time to time, be changed, or limited, by act of parliament; under which limitations the crown still continues hereditary."

That the reader may enter more clearly into the deduction of the following royal succession, by its being transferred from the house of Tudor to that of Stuart, it may be proper to inform him, that on the death of queen Elizabeth, without issue, it became necessary to recur to the other issue of her grandfather Henry VII. by Elizabeth of York his queen, whose eldest daughter, Margaret, having married James IV. king of Scotland, king James the Sixth of Scotland, and of England the First, was the lineal descendant from that alliance. So that in his person, as clearly as in Henry VIII. centred all the claims of the different competitors, from the Norman invasion downward; he being indisputably the lineal heir of William I. And, what is still more remarkable, in his person also centred the right of the Saxon monarchs, which had been suspended from the Norman invasion till his accession. For Margaret, the sister of Edgar Atheling, the daughter of Edward the Outlaw, and grand-daughter of king Edmund Ironside, was the person in whom the hereditary right of the Saxon kings, supposing it not abolished by the conquest, resided. She married Malcolm III. king of Scotland; and Henry II. by a descent from Matilda their daughter, is generally called the restorer of the Saxon line. But it must be remembered, that Malcolm, by his Saxon queen, had sons as well as daughters; and that the royal family of Scotland, from that time downwards, were the offspring of Malcolm and Margaret. Of this royal family king James I. was the direct and lineal descendant; and therefore united in his person every possible claim, by hereditary right, to the English as well as the Scottish throne, being the heir both of Egbert and William the Norman.

At the Revolution in 1688, the convention of estates, or representative body of the nation, declared that the misconduct of king James II. amounted to an abdication of the government, and that the throne was thereby vacant.

In consequence of this vacancy, and from a regard to the ancient line, the convention appointed the next Protestant heirs of the blood royal of king Charles I. to fill the vacant throne, in the old order of succession; with a temporary exception of preference to the person of king William III.

On the impending failure of the Protestant line of king Charles I. (whereby the throne might again have become vacant), the king and parliament extended the settlement of the crown to the Protestant line of king James I. viz. to the princess Sophia of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants; and she is now the common stock from whom the heirs of the crown must descend.

The true ground and principle, upon which the Revolution proceeded, was entirely a new case in politics, which had never before happened in our history; the abdication of the reigning monarch, and the vacancy of the throne thereupon. It was not a defeasance of the right of succession, and a new limitation of the crown, by the king and both houses of parliament; it was the act of the nation alone, upon a conviction that there was no king in being. For, in a full assembly of the lords and commons, met in convention, upon the supposition of this vacancy, both houses came to this resolution, "that king James II. having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and by the advice of Jesuits, and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and having drawn himself out of this kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant." Thus ended at once, by this sudden and unexpected revolution, the old line of succession: which from the Norman invasion had lasted above 600 years, and from the union of the Saxon heptarchy in king Egbert, almost 900.

Though in some points the Revolution was not so perfect as might have been wished, yet from thence a new era commenced, in which the bounds of prerogative and liberty have been better defined, the principles of government more thoroughly examined and understood, and the rights of the subject more explicitly guarded by legal provisions; than in any other period of the English history. In particular, it is worthy of observation, that the convention, in this their judgment, avoided with great wisdom the extremes into which the visionary theories of some zealous republicans would have led them. They held that the misconduct of king James amounted to an endeavour to subvert the constitution, and not to an actual subversion, or total dissolution of the government. They, therefore, very prudently voted it to amount to no more than an abdication of the government, and a consequent vacancy of the throne; whereby the government was allowed to subsist, though the executive magistrate was gone: and the kingly office to remain, though James was no longer king. And thus the constitution was kept entire; which, upon every sound principle of government, must otherwise have fallen to pieces, had so principal and constituent a part as the royal authority been abolished, or even suspended.

Hence it is easy to collect, that the title to the crown is at present hereditary, though not quite so absolutely hereditary as formerly; and the common stock or ancestor, from whom the descent must be derived, is also different. Formerly the common stock was king Egbert; then William the Conqueror; afterward, in James I's time, the two common stocks united, and so continued till the vacancy of the throne in 1689; now it is the princess Sophia, in whom the inheritance was vested by the new king and parliament. Formerly the descent was absolute, and the crown went to the next heir, without any restriction; but now, upon the new settlement, the inheritance is conditional; being limited to such heirs only, of the body of the princess Sophia, as are Protestant members of the church of England, and are married to none but Protestants.

And in this due medium consists the true constitutional notion of the right of succession to the imperial crown of these kingdoms. The extremes between which it steers, have been thought each of them to be destructive of those ends for which societies were formed, and are kept on foot. Where the magistrate, upon every succession, is elected by the people and may by the express provision of the laws be deposed (if not punished) by his subjects; this may sound like the perfection of liberty, and look well enough when delineated on paper, but in practice will be ever found extremely difficult. And on the other hand, divine indefeasible hereditary right, when coupled with the doctrine of unlimited passive obedience, is surely of all constitutions the most thoroughly slavish and dreadful. But when such an hereditary right as our laws have created and vested in the royal stock, is closely interwoven with those liberties, which are equally the inheritance of the subject, this union will form a constitution in theory the most beautiful of any, in practice the most approved, and in all probability will prove in duration the most permanent. This constitution it is the duty of every Briton to understand, to revere, and to defend.

The principal duties of the king are expressed in his oath at the coronation, which is administered by one of the archbishops or bishops of the realm, in the presence of all the people; who, on their parts, do reciprocally take the oath of allegiance to the crown. This coronation is conceived in the following terms:—

“The archbishop, or bishop, shall say,—Will you solemnly promise and swear, to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereunto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same? The king or queen shall say,—I solemnly promise so to do.

“Archbishop or bishop.—Will you, to the utmost of your power, cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments? King or queen, —I will.

“Archbishop or bishop.—Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel, and the protestant reformed religion established by the law? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by the law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them? King or queen,—All this I promise to do.

“After this, the king or queen, laying his or her hands on the holy gospels, shall say,—The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep: so help me God. And then kiss the book.”

This is the form of the coronation oath, as it is now prescribed by our laws: and we may observe, that in the king's part, in this original contract, are expressed all the duties that a monarch can owe to his people; viz. to govern according to law, to execute judgment in mercy, and to maintain the established religion. With respect to the latter of these three branches, we may further remark, that by the act of union, 5 Anne, c. 8. two preceding statutes are recited and confirmed, the one of the parliament of Scotland, the other of the parliament of England; which enact, the former, that every king at his succession, shall take and subscribe an oath, to preserve the protestant religion, and presbyterian church government in Scotland: the latter, that, at his coronation, he shall take and subscribe a similar oath, to preserve the settlement of the church of England within England, Ireland, Wales, and Berwick, and the territories therunto belonging.

The king of Great Britain, notwithstanding the limitation of the power of the crown, already mentioned, is the greatest monarch reigning over a free people. His person is sacred in the eye of the law, which makes it high treason so much as to imagine or intend his death; neither can he, in himself, be deemed guilty of any crime, the law taking no cognizance of his actions, but only in the persons of ministers, if they infringe the laws of the land. As to his power, it is very great, though he has no right to extend his prerogative beyond the ancient limits, or the boundaries prescribed by the constitution; he can make no new laws, nor raise any new taxes, nor act in opposition to any of the laws; but he can make war or peace; send and receive ambassadors; make treaties of league and commerce; levy armies and fit out fleets, for the defence of his kingdom, the annoyance of his enemies, or the suppression of rebellions; grant commissions to his officers, both by sea and land, or revoke them at pleasure; dispose of all magazines, castles, &c.; summon the parliament to meet, and, when met, adjourn, prorogue, or dissolve it at pleasure; refuse his assent to any bill, though it had passed both houses; which, consequently, by such a refusal, has no more force than if it had never been moved; but this is a prerogative that the kings of England have very seldom ventured to exercise. He possesseth the right of choosing his own council; of nominating all the great officers of state, of the household, and the church; and, in fine, is the fountain of honour, from whom all degrees of nobility and knighthood are derived. Such is the dignity and power of a king of Great Britain.

Parliaments, or general councils, in some shape, are, as has been before observed, of as high antiquity as the Saxon government in this island, and coeval with the kingdom itself. The parliament is assembled by the king's writs. Its constituent parts are, the king sitting there in his royal political capacity, and the three estates of the realm; the lords spiritual, the lords temporal (who sit together with the king in one house), and the commons, who sit by themselves in another.

The lords spiritual consist of two archbishops and twenty-four bishops. The lords temporal consist of all the peers of the realm, the bishops not being in strictness held to be such, but merely lords of parliament. Some of the peers sit by descent, as do all ancient peers; some by creation, as do all the new made ones; others, since the union with Scotland, by election, which is the case of the sixteen peers, who represent the body of the Scottish nobility. The number of peers is indefinite, and may be increased at will by the power of the crown.

The commons consist of all such men of any property in the kingdom, as have not seats in the house of lords, every one of which has a voice in parliament, either personally, or by his representative. The number of English representatives is 513, Scotch 45, and Irish 100; in all 658. And every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned, serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general; not merely to serve his constituents, but also the commonwealth, and to advise his majesty, as appears from the writ of summons.

These are the constituent parts of a parliament the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons: Parts, of which each is so necessary, that the consent of all three is required to make any new law that should bind the subject. Whatever is enacted for law by one, or by two only, of the three, is no statute, and to it no regard is due, unless in matters relating to their own privileges.

The power and jurisdiction of parliament, says Edward Coke, is so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined either for causes or persons, within any bounds. It hath sovereign and uncontrollable authority in making, confirming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviving, and expounding of laws, concerning matters of all possible denomination, ecclesiastical or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal; this being the place where that absolute despotic power, which must in all governments reside somewhere, is entrusted by the constitution of these kingdoms. And it is a matter most essential to the liberties of the kingdom, that such members be delegated to this important trust, as are most eminent for their probity, their fortitude, and their knowledge; for it was a known apophthegm of the great lord treasurer Burleigh, "that England could never be ruined but by a parliament;" and as Sir Matthew Hale observes, this being the highest and greatest court, over which none other can have jurisdiction in the kingdom, if by any means a misgovernment should any way fall upon it, the subjects of this kingdom are left without all manner of legal remedy.

In order to prevent the mischiefs that might arise, by placing this extensive authority in hands that are either incapable, or else improper to manage it, it is provided, that no one shall sit or vote in either house of parliament, unless he be twenty-one years of age. To prevent innovations in religion and government, it is enacted, that no member shall vote or sit in either house, till he hath, in the presence of the house, taken the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration; and subscribed and repeated the declaration against transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass. To prevent dangers that may arise to the kingdom from foreign attachments, connexions, or dependencies, it is enacted, that no alien born out of the dominions of the crown of Great Britain, even though he be naturalized, shall be capable of being a member of either house of parliament. Some of the most important privileges of the members of either house, are privileges of speech, of person, of their domestics, and their lands and goods. As to the first, privilege of speech, it is declared by the statute of 1 Wm. & Mary, st. 2. c. 2. as one of the liberties of the people, "that the freedom of speech, and debates, and proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament." And this freedom of speech is particularly demanded of the king in person, by the speaker of the house of commons, at the opening of every new parliament. So are the other privileges of person, servants, lands, and goods. This includes not only privilege from illegal violence, but also from legal arrests, and seizures by process from the courts of law. To assault by violence a member of either house, or his menial servants, is a high contempt of parliament, and there punished with the utmost severity. Neither can any member of either house be arrested and taken into custody, nor served with any process of the courts of law; nor can his menial servants be arrested, nor can any ntry be made on his lands, nor can his goods be distrained or seized, without a breach in the privilege of parliament.

The house of lords have a right to be attended, and consequently are, by the judges of the courts of king's bench and common pleas, and such of the barons of the exchequer as are of the degree of the coif, or have been sergeants at law; as likewise by the masters of the court of chancery, for their advice in point of law, and for the greater dignity of their proceedings.

The speaker of the house of lords is generally the lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal, which dignities are commonly vested in the same person.

Each peer has a right, by leave of the house, as being his own representative, when a vote passes contrary to his sentiments, to enter his dissent on the journals of the house, with the reasons of such dissent, which is usually styled his protest. Upon particular occasions, however, these protests have been so bold as to give offence to the majority of the house, and have therefore been expunged from their journals. But this has always been thought a violent measure, and not very consistent with the general right of protesting.

The house of commons may be properly styled the grand inquest of Great Britain impowered to inquire into all national grievances, in order to see them redressed.

The peculiar laws and customs of the house of commons relate principally to the raising of taxes, and the election of members to serve in parliament.

With regard to taxes: it is the ancient indisputable privilege and right of the house of commons, that all grants of subsidies, or parliamentary aids, do begin in their house, and are first bestowed by them; although their grants are not effectual to all intents and purposes, until they have the assent of the other two branches of the legislature. The general reason given for this exclusive privilege of the house of commons is, that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves.

The method of making laws is much the same in both houses. In each house the act of the majority binds the whole; and this majority is declared by votes publicly and openly given, not as at Venice, and many other senatorial assemblies, privately or by ballot.

From the above general view of the English constitution, it appears, that no security for its permanency, which the wit of man can devise, is wanting.

The king of England, besides his high court of parliament, has subordinate officers and ministers to assist him, and who are responsible for their advice and conduct. They are made by the king's nomination, without either patent or grant; and on taking the necessary oaths, they become immediately privy-counsellors during the life of the king that chooses them, but subject to removal at his discretion.

The duty of a privy-counsellor appears from the oath of office, which consists of seven articles: 1. To advise the king according to the best of his cunning and discretion. 2. To advise for the king's honour and good of the public, without partiality, through affection, love, need, doubt, or dread. 3. To keep the king's council secret. 4. To avoid corruption. 5. To help and strengthen the execution of what shall be there resolved. 6. To withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary. And lastly, in general, 7. To observe, keep, and do all that a good and true counsellor ought to do to his sovereign lord.

With regard to the capital acts of government which were formerly entrusted with the secretaries of state, a committee of the privy council, commonly called a cabinet council, are chiefly entrusted.—This cabinet generally consists of a select number of ministers and noblemen, according to the king's opinion of their integrity and abilities, or attachment to the views of the court.

It is generally agreed that the first inhabitants of Britain were a tribe of the Gauls, or Celts, that settled on the opposite shore; a supposition founded upon the evident conformity in their language, manners, government, religion, and complexion.

In their manner of life, as described by Cæsar, and the best authors, they differed little from the rude inhabitants of the northern climates that have been already mentioned; but they certainly sowed corn, though perhaps, they chiefly subsisted upon animal food and milk. Their clothing was skins, and their fortifications beams of wood. They were dexterous in the management of their chariots beyond credibility; and they fought with lances, darts, and swords. Women sometimes led their armies to the field, and were recognized as sovereigns of their particular districts. They favoured a primogeniture of seniority, in their succession to royalty, but set it aside on the smallest inconyeniency attending it. They painted their bodies with wood which gave them a bluish or greenish cast; and they are said to have had figures of animals, and heavenly bodies on their skins. In their marriages they were not very delicate, for they formed themselves into what we may call matrimonial clubs. Twelve or fourteen men married as many wives, and each wife was in common to them all, but her children belonged to the original husband.

The Britons lived, during the long reign of Augustus Cæsar, rather as the allies than the tributaries of the Romans; but the communications between Rome and Great Britain being then extended, the emperor Claudius Cæsar, about forty-two years after the birth of Christ, undertook an expedition in person, in which he seems to have been successful against Britain. His conquests, however, were imperfect; Caractacus, and Boadicia, though a woman, made noble stands against the Romans. The former was taken prisoner after a desperate battle, and carried to Rome, where his undaunted behaviour before Claudius gained him the admiration of the victors; and is celebrated in the histories of the times. Boadicia being oppressed in a manner that disgraces the Roman name, and defeated, disdained to survive the liberties of her country; and Agricola, general to Domitian, after subduing South Britain, carried his arms northwards, where his successors had no reason to boast of their progress, every inch of ground being bravely defended.—During the time the Romans remained in this island, they erected those walls so often mentioned, to protect the Britons from the invasion of the Caledonians, Scots, and Picts; and we are told, that the Roman language, learning and customs, became familiar to Britain.

About the year 800, most of the Anglo-Saxons, tired out with the tyranny of their petty kings, united in calling to the government of the heptarchy, Egbert, who was the eldest remaining branch of the race of Cerdic, one of the Saxon chiefs, who first arrived in Britain. On the submission of the Northumbrians in the year 827 he became king of all England.

Egbert was succeeded by his son Ethelwolf, who divided his power with his eldest son Athelstan.—By this time, England had become a scene of blood and ravages, through the renewal of the Danish invasions; and Ethelwolf after some time bravely opposing them, retired in a fit of devotion to Rome, to which he carried with him his youngest son, afterwards the famous Alfred, the father of the English constitution.

Ethelred being killed, his brother Alfred mounted the throne in 871. He was one of the greatest princes, both in peace and war, mentioned in history. He fought several battles with the Danes with various success, and when defeated, he found resources that rendered him as terrible as before. Among the other glories of Alfred's reign, was that of raising a maritime power in England, by which he secured her coasts from future invasions. He rebuilt the city of London, which had been burnt down by the Danes, and founded the University of Oxford about the year 895; he divided England into counties, hundreds, and tithings; or rather he revived those divisions, and the use of juries, which had fallen into disquitude by the ravages of the Danes. He died in the year 901, and his character is so completely amiable and heroic, that he is justly distinguished with the epithet of Great.

Alfred was succeeded by his son Edward the elder, under whom, though a brave prince, the Danes renewed their barbarities and invasions. He died in the year 925, and was succeeded by his eldest son Athelstan. This prince was such an encourager of commerce as to make a law, that every merchant who made three voyages on his own account to the Mediterranean, should be put upon a footing with a thane, or nobleman of the first rank. He caused the scripture to be translated into the Saxon tongue. He was engaged in perpetual wars with his neighbours, the Scots in particular, and was generally successful, and died in 941. The reigns of his successors, Edmund, Edred, and Edwy, were weak and inglorious, they being either engaged in wars with the Danes, or disgraced by the influence of priests. Edgar, who mounted the throne 959, revived the naval glory of England, and is said to have been rowed down the river Dee by eight kings his vassals, he sitting at the helm; but, like his predecessors, he was the slave of priests, particularly St. Dunstan. He was succeeded in 975, by his eldest son Edward, who was barbarously murdered by his step-mother, whose son Ethelred mounted the throne, in 978.

Edward, who is commonly called the Confessor, now mounted the throne, though Edgar Atheling, by being descended from an elder branch, had the lineal right, and was alive. Upon the death of the Confessor, in the year 1066, Harold, son to Godwin, earl of Kent, mounted the throne of England.

William, duke of Normandy, though a bastard, was then in the unrivalled possession of that great duchy, and resolved to assert his right to the crown of England. He collected 40,000 of the bravest and most regular troops in Europe, and while Harold was embarrassed with fresh invasions from the Dunes, William landed in England without opposition. Harold returning from the north, encountered William in the place where the town of Battel now stands, which took its name from it, near Hastings in Sussex, and a most bloody battle was fought between the two armies; but Harold being killed the crown of England devolved upon William, in the year 1066.

The succession to the crown of England, was disputed between the Conqueror's sons Robert and William, (commonly called Rufus, from his being red haired) and was carried in favour of the latter, but was accidentally killed as he was hunting in New-Forest in Hampshire, in the year 1100, and the 44th year of his age. This prince built Westminster-hall as his now stands, and added several works to the tower, which he surrounded with a wall and a ditch. He was succeeded by his brother Henry I. surnamed Beauclerc on account of his learning. His reign in a great measure restored the clergy to their influence in the state, and they formed as it were, a separate body, dependent upon the pope, which afterwards created great convulsions in England. Henry died of a surfeit, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, in 1135.

The crown of England was claimed and seized by Stephen earl of Blois, the son of Adela, fourth daughter to William the Conqueror. But his brother Henry, who was in fact invested with the chief executive power, was acknowledged his successor.

Henry distinguished his reign by the conquest of Ireland; and by marrying Eleanor, the divorced queen of France, but the heiress of Guienna and Poitou, he became almost as powerful in France as the French king himself, and the greatest prince in Christendom.

During the reign of Henry, corporation charters were established all over England; by which the power of the barons was greatly reduced. Henry, about the year 1176, divided England into six parts called circuits, appointing judges to go at certain times of the year, and hold assizes, or administer justice to the people, as is practised at this day.

Richard I. surnamed Cœur de Lion, from his great courage, was the third, but eldest surviving son of Henry II. The reign of his brother John, who succeeded him is infamous in the English history. He is said to have put to death Arthur the eldest son of his brother Geoffry, who had the hereditary right to the crown. John, notwithstanding, in his wars with the French, Scots, and Irish, gave many proofs of personal valour; but became at last so apprehensive of a French invasion, that he rendered himself a tributary to the pope, and laid his crown and regalia at the foot of the legate Pandulph, who kept them for five days.

The great barons resented his meanness, by taking arms; but he repeated shameful submissions to the pope; and after experiencing various fortunes of war, John was at last brought so low, that the barons obliged him, in 1216, to sign the great deed so well known by the name of Magna Charta. The city of London owes some of her privileges to him.

England was in a deplorable situation when her crown devolved upon Henry III. the late king's son, who was but nine years of age. The king was of a soft pliable disposition, and had been persuaded to violate the great Charter. Indeed, he seemed always endeavouring to evade the privileges which he had been compelled to grant and confirm. An association of the barons was formed against him and his government, and a civil war breaking out, Henry seemed to be abandoned by all but his Gascons and foreign mercenaries.

Edward returning to England, on the news of his father's death, invited all who held of his crown in capite, to his coronation dinner, which consisted (that the reader may have some idea of the luxury of the times) of 278 bacon hogs, 450 hogs, 440 oxen, 430 sheep, 22,600 hens and capons, and 13 fat goats. Alexander III. king of Scotland was at the solemnity, and on the occasion 500 horses were let loose, for all that could catch them to keep them.

Edward was a brave and politic prince, and being perfectly well acquainted with the laws, interests, and constitution of his kingdom, his regulations, and reformations of his laws, have justly given him the title of the English Justinian.

His son and successor Edward II. showed early dispositions for encouraging favourites; but Gaveston, his chief minion, a Gascon, being banished by his father Edward, he mounted the throne with vast advantages, both political and personal, all which he soon forfeited by his own imprudence. He recalled Gaveston, and loaded him with honours, and married Isabella, daughter of the French king, who restored to him part of the territories which Edward I. had lost in France. The barons, however, obliged him once more to banish his favourite, and to confirm the great charter, while king Robert Bruce recovered all Scotland, excepting the castle of Stirling; near to which, at Bannockburn, Edward in person received the greatest defeat ever England suffered, 1314. Gaveston being beleaded by the barons, they fixed upon young Hugh Spencer as a spy upon the king, but he soon became his favourite. He through his pride, avarice, and ambition, was banished, together with his father, whom he had procured to be earl of Winchester. The queen, a furious, ambitious woman, persuaded her husband to recal the Spencers, while the common people, from their hatred to the barons, joined the king's standard, and after defeating them, restored him to the exercise of all his prerogatives. A cruel use was made of those successes, and many noble patriots, with their estates, fell victims to the queen's revenge; but at last she became enamoured of Roger Mortimer, who was her prisoner, and had been one of the most active of the anti-loyalist lords. A breach between her and the Spencers soon followed, and going over to France with her lover, she found means to form such a party in England, that, returning with some French troops, she put the eldest Spencer to an ignominious death, made her husband prisoner, and forced him to abdicate his crown in favour of his son Edward III. then fifteen years of age. Nothing now but the death of Edward II. was wanting to complete her guilt; and he was most barbarously murdered in Berkley castle, by ruffians, supposed to be employed by her and her paramour Mortimer, in the year 1327.

Edward III. mounted the throne in 1327. He was then under the tuition of his mother, who cohabited with Mortimer; and they endeavoured to keep possession of their power by executing many popular measures, and putting an end to all differences with Scotland, for which Mortimer was created earl of March. Edward, young as he was, was soon sensible of their designs. He surprised them in person at the head of a few chosen friends, in the castle of Nottingham. Mortimer was put to a public death, hanged as a traitor on the common gallows at Tyburn, and the queen herself was shut up in confinement twenty-eight years, to her death. It was not long before Edward found means to quarrel with David king of Scotland, though he had married his sister, and he was driven to France by Edward Baliol, who acted as Edward's tributary, king of Scotland, and general, and did the same homage to Edward for Scotland, as his father had done to Edward I. Soon after, upon the death of Charles the Fair, king of France, (without issue,) who had succeeded by virtue of the Salic law, which the French pretended cut off all female succession to that crown, Philip of Valois claimed it as being the next heir male by succession; but he was opposed by Edward, as being the son of Isabella, who was sister to the three last-mentioned kings of France, and first in the female succession. The former was preferred, but the case being doubted, Edward pursued his claim, and invaded France with a powerful army.

On this occasion, the vast difference between the feudal constitutions of France, which were then in full force, and the government of England, more favourable to public liberty, appeared. The French officers knew no subordination. They and their men were undisciplined and disobedient, though far more numerous than their enemies of the field.—The English freemen on the other hand, having now vast property to fight for, which they could call their own, independent of a feudal law, knew its value, and had learned to defend it by providing themselves with proper armour, and submitting to military exercises, and proper subordination in the field. The war, on the part of Edward, was therefore a continued scene of success and victory. In 1340, he took the title of the king of France, using it in all public acts, and quartered the arms of France with his own, adding this motto, Dieu & Mon Droit, "God and my right."

Dr. John Wickliffe, a secular priest, educated at Oxford, began in the latter end of this reign to spread the doctrines of reformation by his discourses, sermons, and writings; and he made many disciples of all ranks and stations. His disciples were distinguished by the name of Wickliffites, or Lollards.

Richard II. son of the Black Prince, was no more than eleven years of age when he mounted the throne. He faced the storm of the insurgents at the head of the Londoners, while Walworth the mayor, and Philpot an alderman, had the courage to put Tyler, the leader of the malcontents, to death, in the midst of his adherents. Richard carrying over a great army to quell a rebellion in Ireland, a strong party formed in England, the natural result of Richard's tyranny, who offered the duke of Lancaster the crown. He landed from France at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, and was soon at the head of 60,000 men, all of them English. Richard hurried back to England, where his troops refusing to fight, and his subjects, whom he had affected to despise, generally deserting him, he was made prisoner with no more than twenty attendants; and being carried to London, he was deposed in full parliament, upon a formal charge of tyranny and misconduct; and soon after he is supposed to have been starved to death in prison, in the year 1399.

Henry the Fourth, son of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, fourth son of Edward III. being settled on the throne of England, in prejudice to the elder branches of Edward III's family, the great nobility were in hopes that this glaring defect in his title would render him dependent upon them. At first some conspiracies were formed against him among his great men, as the dukes of Surrey and Exeter, the earls of Gloucester and Salisbury, and the archbishop of York; but he crushed them by his activity and steadiness, and laid a plan for reducing their overgrown power; but the ambition of the duke of York at last prevailed, and after being proclaimed protector of the kingdom, he openly claimed the crown, and the Lancastrian party were defeated by the earl of Warwick.

A parliament upon this being assembled, it was enacted, that Henry should possess the throne for life, but that the duke of York should succeed him to the exclusion of all Henry's issue. It is pretty extraordinary, that though the duke of York and his party openly asserted his claim to the crown, they still professed allegiance to Henry; but the duke of York's son, afterwards Edward IV. prepared to revenge his father's death, and obtained several victories over the royalists. After prodigies of valour had been performed on both sides, victory remained with young king Edward, and Margaret and her husband were once more obliged to fly to Scotland, where they met with generous protection.—Margaret, by the concessions she made to the Scots, soon raised a fresh army there, and in the north of England, but met with defeat upon defeat, till at last her husband, the unfortunate Henry, was carried prisoner to London.

The duke of York, now Edward IV. being crowned on the 29th of June, fell in love with, and privately married, Elizabeth, the widow of Sir John Gray, though he had some time before sent the earl of Warwick to demand the king of France's sister in marriage, in which he was successful, and nothing remained but the bringing over the princess into England. When the secret of Edward's marriage broke out, the haughty earl deeming himself affronted, returned to England inflamed with rage and indignation; and from being Edward's best friend, became his most formidable enemy, and gaining over the duke of Clarence, Edward was made prisoner, but escaping from his confinement, the earl of Warwick, and the French king, Lewis XI. declared for the restoration of Henry, who was replaced on the throne, and Edward narrowly escaped to Holland. Returning from thence, he advanced to London under pretence of claiming his dukedom of York; but being received into the capital, he resumed the exercise of royal authority, made king Henry once more his prisoner, and defeated and killed Warwick in the battle of Barnet. A few days after he defeated a fresh army of Lancastrians, and made queen Margaret prisoner, together with her son prince Edward, whom Edward's brother, the duke of Gloucester, murdered in cold blood, as he is said (but with no great show of probability) to have done with his father Henry VI. then a prisoner in the tower of London, a few days after, in the year 1471.

Henry VIII. entered with great advantages on the exercise of royalty. Young, vigorous, and rich, without any rival, he held the balance of power in Europe, but was the dupe of all parties. His avarice and lusts gained a complete ascendancy over him, and many acts of his reign were marked with the grossest cruelties; particularly to his wives, from whom, with the greatest facility, he obtained divorces, and with as little difficulty brought to the scaffold. One great event was however, brought about in his reign, viz. the Reformation. He died in 1547, in the 56th year of his age, and the 38th of his reign.

Edward VI. was but nine years of age at the time of his father's death; and after some disputes were over, the regency was settled in the person of his uncle the earl of Hertford, afterwards the protector, and duke of Somerset, a declared friend and patron of the Reformation, and a bitter enemy to the see of Rome. He died of a deep consumption in 1553, in the 16th year of his age, and the 7th of his reign.

Mary being settled on the throne, recalled cardinal Pole from banishment, made him instrumental in her cruelties, and lighted up the flame of persecution, in which archbishop Cranmer, the bishops Ridley, Hooper, and Latimer, and many other illustrious confessors of the English reformed church, were consumed; not to mention a vast number of other sacrifices of both sexes, and all ranks, that suffered through every quarter of the kingdom.—She died in 1558, in the 42d year of her life, and 6th of her reign.

Elizabeth, daughter to Henry VIII. by Anne Boleyn, mounted the throne under the most discouraging circumstances, both at home and abroad. Elizabeth was no more than 25 years of age at the time of her inauguration; but her sufferings under her bigoted sister, joined to the superiority of her genius, had taught her caution and policy, and she soon conquered all difficulties. It is well known how unfaithful Elizabeth was to professions of friendship to her cousin Mary, and that she detained the unhappy prisoner 18 years in England, then brought her to a sham trial, pretending that Mary aimed at the crown, and without sufficient proof of her guilt, cut off her head; an action which greatly tarnished the glories of her reign.

The same Philip who had been the husband of her late sister, upon Elizabeth's accession to the throne, offered to marry her, but she dexterously avoided his addresses; and when Philip was no longer to be imposed upon by Elizabeth's arts, which had amused and baffled him in every quarter, it is well known that he made use of the immense sums he drew from Peru and Mexico, in equipping the most formidable armament that perhaps ever had been put to sea, and a numerous army of veterans, under the prince of Parma, the best captain of that age; and that he procured a papal bull for absolving Elizabeth's subjects from their allegiance. The largeness of the Spanish ships proved disadvantageous to them on the seas where they engaged; the lord admiral Howard, and the brave sea officers under him, engaged, beat, and chased the Spanish fleet for several days; and the seas and tempests finished the destruction which the English arms had begun, and few of the Spanish ships recovered their ports. Next to the admiral lord Howard of Effingham, Sir Francis Drake, captain Hawkins, and captain Frobisher, distinguished themselves against this formidable invasion, in which the Spaniards are said to have lost 81 ships of war, large and small, and 13,500 men.

Elizabeth in her old age, grew distrustful, peevish, and jealous. Though she undoubtedly loved the earl of Essex, she teased him by her capriciousness into the madness of taking arms, and then cut off his head. She complained that she had been betrayed into this sanguinary measure, and this occasioned a sinking of her spirits, which brought her to her grave in 1603, the seventieth year of her age, and forty-fifth of her reign, having previously named her kinsman James VI. king of Scotland, and son to Mary, for her successor.

James I. and his ministers were continually inventing ways to raise money, as by monopolies, benevolences, loans, and other illegal methods. Among other expedients, he sold the titles of baron, viscount, and earl, at a certain price, made a number of knights of Nova Scotia, each to pay such a sum, and instituted a new order of knights, baronets, which was to be hereditary, for which each person paid £1095.

The death of the duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, who was assassinated by one Felton a subaltern officer, in 1628, did not deter Charles from his arbitrary proceedings, which the English patriots in that enlightened age justly considered as so many acts of tyranny. He, without authority of parliament, laid arbitrary impositions upon trade, which were refused to be paid by many of the merchants and members of the house of commons. Some of them were imprisoned, and the judges were checked for admitting them to bail. The house of commons resented those proceedings by drawing up a protest and denying admittance to the gentleman usher of the black rod, who came to adjourn them, till it was finished. This served only to widen the breach, and the king dissolved the parliament; after which he exhibited informations against nine of the most eminent members, among whom was the great Mr. Selden, who was as much distinguished by his love of liberty, as by his uncommon erudition. They objected to the jurisdiction of the court, but their plea was over-ruled, and they were sent to prison during the king's pleasure.

Every thing now operated towards the destruction of Charles. In the fourth year of his reign, Charles had passed the petition of right into a law, which was intended by the parliament as the future security of the liberty of the subject, which established particularly, "That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament;" but he afterwards violated it in numerous instances, so that an universal discontent at his administration prevailed throughout the nation.— Charles was ill enough advised to go in person to the house of commons, January 4, 1642, and there demanded that lord Kimbolton, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Haselrig, and Mr. Stroud, should be apprehended; but they had previously made their escape. This act of Charles was resented as high treason against his people, and the commons rejected all the offers of satisfaction he could make them.

Notwithstanding the many acts of tyranny and oppression of which the king and his ministers had been guilty, yet, when the civil war broke out, there were great numbers who repaired to the regal standard.

The first fatal blow the king's army received, was at Marsion-moor, July 2d, 1644, where, through the imprudence of prince Rupert, the earl of Manchester defeated the royal army, of which 4000 were killed, and 1500 taken prisoners. This victory was chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Cromwell; and though it might have been retrieved by the successes of Charles in the west, yet his whole conduct was a string of mistakes, till at last his affairs became irretrievable. The independents seized the king's person, brought him prisoner to London, carried him before a court of justice of their own erecting, and, after an extraordinary trial, his head was cut off, before his own palace at Whitehall, on the 30th of January, 1648-9, being the 49th of his age, and the 24th of his reign.

By this time Cromwell, who hated subordination to a republic, had the address to get himself declared commander in chief of the English army. April 20, 1653, without any ceremony, with about 300 musqueteers, he dissolved the parliament, opprobriously driving all the members, about a hundred, out of their house. He next annihilated the council of state, with whom the executive power was lodged, and transferred the administration of government to about 140 persons, whom he summoned to Whitehall, on the 4th of July, 1653. He was, however, declared lord protector of the commonwealth of England, a title under which he exercised all the power that had been formerly annexed to the regal dignity. After a most uncomfortable usurpation of four years, eight months, and thirteen days, he died on the 3d of September, 1658, in the 60th year of his age.

The fate of Richard Cromwell, who succeeded his father Oliver as protector, sufficiently proves the great difference there was between them, as to spirit and parts in the affairs of government. Richard was placed in his dignity by those who wanted to make him the tool of their struggle or opposition, into obscurity. General Monk, a man of military abilities, but of no principles excepting such as served his ambition or interest, had the sagacity to observe this; and after temporising in various shapes, being at the head of the army, he made the principal figure in restoring Charles II. For this he was created duke of Albemarle, confirmed in the command of the army, and loaded with honours and riches.

Charles II. being restored in 1660, seemed to wish the happiness of his people. In some things Charles acted very despotically. It was thought, however, that he repented of some of his arbitrary steps, and intended to have executed some measures for the future quiet of his reign, when he died, Feb. 6th, 1684-5, in the 55th year of his age, and 25th of his reign. He had married Catharine infanta of Portugal, by whom he received a large fortune in ready money, besides the town and fortress of Tangier in Africa, but he left behind him no lawful issue.

All the opposition which, during the late reign, had shaken the throne, seems to have vanished at the accession of James II. The popular affection towards him was increased by the early declaration he made in favour of the church of England, which, during the late reign, had formally pronounced all resistance to the reigning king to be unlawful; but he made the most provoking steps to render popery the established religion of his dominions. He sent an embassy to Rome, and received at his court the pope's nuncio. The encroachments he made upon both the civil and religious liberties of the people, are almost beyond description, and were disapproved of by the pope himself, and all sober Roman Catholics. His sending to prison, and prosecuting for a libel, seven bishops for presenting a petition against reading his declaration for liberty of conscience, and their acquittal upon a legal trial, alarmed his best Protestant friends.

In this extremity, many great men in England and Scotland, though they wished well to James, applied for relief to William prince of Orange, in Holland, a prince of great abilities, and the inveterate enemy of Lewis XIV. who then threatened Europe with chains. The prince of Orange was the nephew and son-in-law of James, having married the princess Mary, that king's eldest daughter; and he at last embarked with a fleet of 500 sail for England, avowing it to be his design to restore the church and state to their true rights. Upon his arrival in England, he was joined not only by the Whigs, but by many whom James had considered as his best friends; and even his daughter the princess Anne, and her husband, George prince of Denmark, left him and joined the prince of Orange, who soon discovered that he expected the crown. James might still have reigned, but he was surrounded with French emissaries, and ignorant Jesuits, who wished him not to reign rather than not restore popery.— They secretly persuaded him to send his queen and son, real or pretended, then but six months old, to France, and to follow them in person, which he did; and thus, in 1688, ended his reign in England, which event in English history is termed the Revolution.

William, notwithstanding the vast service he had done to the nation, and the public benefits which took place under his auspices, particularly in the establishment of the bank of England, and the reclaiming the silver money, met with so many mortifications from his parliament, that he actually resolved upon an abdication, and had drawn up a speech for that purpose, which he was prevailed upon to suppress. He long bore the affronts he met with in hopes of being supported in his war with France, but at last, in 1697, he was forced to conclude the peace of Ryswick with the French king, who acknowledged his title to the crown of England. By this time William had lost his queen, but the government was continued in his person. After peace was restored, the commons obliged him to disband his army, all but an inconsiderable number, and to dismiss his favourite Dutch guards. Towards the end of his reign, his fears of seeing the whole Spanish monarchy in possession of France at the death of the Catholic king Charles II. which was every day expected, led him into a very impolitic measure, which was the partition treaty with France, by which that monarchy was to be divided between the houses of Bourbon and Austria. This treaty was highly resented by the parliament, and some of his ministry were impeached for advising it. It is thought that William saw his error when it was too late. His ministers were acquitted from their impeachment, and the death of king James discovered the insincerity of the French court, which immediately proclaimed his son king of Great Britain.

Anne, princess of Denmark, by virtue of the act of settlement, and being the next Protestant heir to her father James II. succeeded king William in the throne. The capital measure of continuing the war against France being fixed, the queen found no great difficulty in forming her ministry, who were for the most part Tories; and the earl of Godolphin, who (though afterwards a leading Whig) was thought all his life to have a predilection for the late king James and his queen, was placed at the head of the treasury. His son had married the earl of Marlborough's eldest daughter, and the earl could trust no other with that important department.

In the course of the war, several glorious victories were obtained by the earl, who was soon made duke of Marlborough. Those of Blenheim and Ramillies gave the first effectual checks of the French power. By that of Blenheim in 1704, the empire of Germany was saved from immediate destruction.

Conferences were opened for peace at Utrecht, in January 1712, to which the queen and the French king sent plenipotentiaries; and the allies being defeated at Denain, they grew sensible that they were no match for the French, now that they were abandoned by the English. In short, the terms were agreed upon between France and England. Upon the queen's death, the succession took place in terms of the act of settlement, and George I. elector of Hanover, son of the princess Sophia, granddaughter of James I. was proclaimed king of Great Britain; his mother, who would have been next in succession, having died but a few days before.—He came over to England with strong pre-possessions against the Tory ministry, most of whom he displaced. This did not make any great alteration to his prejudice in England; but many of the Scots, by the influence of the earl of Mar, and other chiefs, were driven into rebellion in 1715, which was happily suppressed the beginning of the next year.

Sir Robert Walpole was considered as first minister of England when George I. died, and some differences having happened between him and the prince of Wales, it was generally thought, upon the accession of the latter to the crown, that Sir Robert would be displaced. That might have been the case, could another person have been found equally capable as he was to manage the house of commons and to gratify that predilection for Hanover which George II. inherited from his father. No minister ever understood better the temper of the people of England, and none perhaps, ever tried it more.

It was about 1753 that Mr. Pitt was placed, as secretary of state, at the head of administration.—He had long been known to be a bold, eloquent, and energetic speaker, and he soon proved himself to be as spirited a minister.

Mr. Pitt introduced into the cabinet a new system of operations against France, than which nothing could be better calculated to restore the spirits of his countrymen, and to alarm their enemies. Far from dreading an invasion, he planned an expedition for carrying the arms of England into France itself; and the descent was to be made at Rochfort, under general Sir John Mordaunt, who was to command the land troops. Nothing could be more promising than the dispositions for this expedition. It sailed on the 8th of September 1757, and admiral Hawke brought both the sea and land forces back on the 6th of October, to St. Helen's, without the general making any attempt to land on the coast of France. He was tried and acquitted, without the public murmuring, so great an opinion had the people of the minister; who, to do him justice, did not suffer a man or a ship belonging to the English army or navy to lie idle.

The English bore the expences of the war with cheerfulness, and applauded Mr. Pitt's administration, because their glorious successes in every part of the globe demonstrated that he was in earnest.—Admiral Boscawen and general Amherst, in August 1758, reduced and demolished Louisburgh in North America, which had been restored to the French by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and was become the scourge of the British trade, and took five or six French ships of the line; Frontenac and Fort du Quesne, in the same quarter, fell also into the hands of the English; acquisitions that far overbalanced a check which the English received at Ticonderago, and the loss of above 300 of the English guards, as they were returning under general Bligh from the coast of France.

The English affairs in the East Indies this year proved equally fortunate. Three capital expeditions had been planned for this year in America, and all of them proved successful. One of them was against the French islands in the West Indies, where Guadaloupe was reduced. The second expedition was against Quebec, the capital of Canada. The command was given, by the minister's advice, to general Wolfe, a young officer of a truly military genius. Wolfe was opposed, with far superior force, by Montcalm, the best and most successful general the French had. Though the situation of the country which Wolfe was to attack, and the works which the French threw up to prevent a descent of the English, were deemed impregnable, yet Montcalm never relaxed in his vigilance. Wolfe's courage and perseverance, however, surmounting incredible difficulties, he gained the heights of Abraham, near Quebec, where he fought and defeated the French army, but was himself killed, as was Montcalm.

General Amherst, who was the first English general in command in America, conducted the third expedition. His orders were to reduce all Canada, and to join the army under general Wolfe on the banks of the river St. Lawrence. It is to the honour of the minister, Mr. Amherst in this expedition was so well provided with every thing that could make it successful, that there scarcely appeared any chance for its miscarriage; and thus the French empire in North America became subject to Great Britain.

The war in Germany, however, continued still as undecided as it was expensive, and many in England began to consider it now as foreign to the internal interests of Great Britain. A negotiation was entered upon, which proved abortive, as did many other projects for accommodation; but on the 25th of October, 1760, George II. died suddenly (from a rupture in the right ventricle of the heart), full of years and glory, in the 77th year of his age, and 34th of his reign, and was succeeded by his grandson, now George III. eldest son to the late prince of Wales.

King George III. ascended the throne with great advantages. His being a native of England prejudiced the people in his favour; he was in the bloom of youth, in his person tall and comely, and at the time of his accession, Great Britain was in the highest degree of reputation and prosperity, and the most salutary unanimity and harmony prevailed among the people.

The most important event to be recorded in this reign, is one of the most disastrous kind, viz. the war with the American colonies. This was produced by the legislature of this country attempting to impose taxes without the consent of America, which was so extremely offensive to them, that they resisted the king's officers in the exercise of their duty, and at last broke out into open rebellion.

It is not consistent with the limits of this sketch, to detail the sieges, battles, and various successes attendant on this disastrous conflict, suffice it to say, that after having brought into war with us France, Spain, and Holland, America fully established her independence, which was recognized at the peace of 1783, by Great Britain.

The American war brought odium and disgrace upon his majesty's ministers, the first of whom was lord North. A coalition, however, was formed between the latter nobleman and Mr. Fox, which, being very unpopular, was soon broken, and Mr. Pitt, son of the late earl Chatham, succeeded as chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury, which place he retained till his death, which happened in 1806.

The calamitous war in which we are at present engaged with France, would of itself require a volume to detail. We must therefore pass it over in silence, and conclude our short account with expressing our hearty desire for the return of the blessings of peace.

(p. 609.) SCOTLAND.—The Celta or Gauls are supposed to have been the original inhabitants of this kingdom. It is termed, by the Italians, Scotia; by the Spaniards, Escotia; by the French, Escosse; and Scotland by the Scots, Germans, and English.

Scotland, which contains an area of 27,794 square miles, is bounded on the south by England; and on the north, east, and west, by the Deucealedonian, German, and Irish seas, or more properly, the Atlantic ocean.

Scotland is divided into the countries south of the Firth of Forth, the capital of which, and of all the kingdom, is Edinburgh; and those to the north of the same river, where the chief town is Aberdeen.

Eighteen counties, or shires, are allotted to the southern division, and fifteen to the northern; and those counties are sub-divided into sheriffdoms, stewartries, and bailiwicks, according to the ancient tenures and privileges of landholders.

In the northern parts, day-light, at midsummer, lasts 18 hours and 5 minutes; and the day and night in winter are in the same proportion. The air of Scotland is more temperate than could be expected in so northerly a climate. This arises partly from the variety of its hills, valleys, rivers, and lakes; but still more, as in England, from the vicinity of the sea, which affords those warm breezes that not only soften the natural keenness of the air, but by keeping it in perpetual agitation, render it pure and healthful, and prevent those epidemic distempers that prevail in many other countries. In the neighbourhood of some high mountains, however, which are generally covered with snow, the air is keen and piercing, for about nine months in the year.—The soil in general is not so fertile as that of England, and in many places fitted less for agriculture than for pasture.

The principal mountains in Scotland are the Grampian-hills, which run from east to west, from near Aberdeen to Cowal in Argyleshire, almost the whole breadth of the kingdom. Another chain of mountains, called the Pentland-hills, runs through Lothian, and joins those of Tweeddale. A third, called Lammer-Muir, rises near the eastern coast, and runs westward through the Merse. Besides those continued chains, among which we may reckon the Cheviot or Tiviot hills, on the borders of England, Scotland contains many detached mountains, which, from their conical figure, sometimes go by the Saxon word Laws. Many of them are stupendously high, and of beautiful forms, but too numerous to be particularised here.

The largest river in Scotland is the Forth, which ris in Monteith near Callendar, and discharges itself near Edinburgh into that arm of the German sea, to which it gives the name of Frith of Forth. Second to the Forth is the Tay, which issues out of Loch Tay, in Broadalbin, and running south-east, passes the town of Perth, and falls into the sea at Dundee. The Spey, the Tweed, and the Clyde, are the principal rivers.

The face of Scotland, even where it is most inviting, presents us with the most incontrovertible evidences of its having formerly abounded with timber. Fir trees grow in great perfection all over Scotland, and form beautiful plantations. The Scots oak is excellent in the Highlands, where some woods reach 20 or 30 miles in length, and 4 or 5 in breadth; but, through the inconveniency already mentioned, without being of much emolument to the proprietors.

Though Scotland does not at present boast of its gold mines, yet it is certain that it contains such, or at least that Scotland formerly afforded a considerable quantity of that metal for its coinage.

Several landlords in Scotland derive a large profit from their lead-mines, which are said to be very rich, and to produce large quantities of silver, but we know of no silver-mines that are worked at present. Some copper-mines have been found near Edinburgh; and many parts of Scotland, in the east, west, and northern counties, produce excellent coal of various kinds, large quantities of which are exported, to the vast emolument of the public. Lime-stone is here in great plenty, as is free-stone; so that the houses of the better sort are constructed of the most beautiful materials.

The soil in general produces wheat, rye, barley, oats, hemp, flax, hay, and pasture. In the southern counties the finest garden fruits, particularly apricots, nectarines, and peaches, are said to fall little, if at all, short of those in England; and the same may be said of the common fruits. The uncultivated parts of the Highlands abound in various kinds of salubrious and pleasant tasted berries; though it must be owned, that many extensive tracts are covered with a strong heath.

The fishes on the coast of Scotland are much the same with those of the islands and countries already described: but the Scots have improved in their fisheries as much as they have in their manufactures and agriculture; for societies have been formed, which have carried that branch of national wealth to a perfection that never was before known in that country, and bids fair to emulate the Dutch themselves in curing, as well as catching their fish. Their salmon, which they can send more early, when prepared, to the Levant and southern markets, than the English or Irish can, are of great service to the nation, as the returns are generally made in specie, or beneficial commodities.

This country contains few or no kinds, either of wild or domestic animals, that are not common with their neighbours. The red deer and the roe-buck are found in the Highlands, but their flesh is not comparable to English venison. Hare, and all other animals for game, are here plentiful; as are the grouse and heath-cock, which is a most delicious bird, as likewise are the capperkaily, and the ptarmacan, which is of the pheasant kind; but these birds are scarce even in the Highlands, and when discovered, are very shy. The numbers of black cattle that cover the hills of Scotland towards the Highlands, and sheep that are fed upon the beautiful mountains of Tweedale, and other parts of the south, are almost incredible, and formerly brought large sums into the country; the black cattle especially, which, when fattened on the southern pastures, have been reckoned superior to English beef.

The population of Scotland may be estimated at about two millions of souls, or more. If we consult the most ancient and credible histories, the population of Scotland, in the thirteenth century, must have been excessive, as it afforded so many thousands to fall by the swords of the English, without any sensible decrease of the inhabitants.

The peasantry have their peculiarities, their ideas are confined; but no people can form their tempers better than they do to their stations. They are taught from their infancy to bridle their passions, to behave submissively to their superiors, and live within the bounds of the most rigid economy. Hence they save their money and their constitutions, and few instances of murder, perjury, robbery, and other atrocious vices, occur at present in Scotland. They seldom enter singly upon any daring enterprise; but when they act in concert, the secrecy, sagacity, and resolution, with which they carry on any desperate undertaking, is not to be paralleled; and their fidelity to one another, under the strongest temptations arising from their poverty, is still more extraordinary.

The common people of Scotland retain the solemn decent manner of their ancestors at burials.—When a relation dies in town, the parish beadle is sent round with a passing-bell; but he stops at certain places, and with a slow melancholy tone, announces the name of the party deceased, and the time of his interment, to which he invites all his fellow-countrymen. At the hour appointed, if the deceased was beloved in the place, vast numbers attended. The procession is sometimes preceded by the magistrates and their officers, as the deceased is carried in his coffin, covered with a velvet pall, with chair-poles, to the grave, where it is interred, without any oration or address to the people, or prayers, or farther ceremony, than the nearest relation thanking the company for their attendance. The funerals of the nobility and gentry are performed in much the same manner as in England, but without any funeral service. The Highland funerals were generally preceded by bagpipes, which played certain dirges, called coronachs, and were accompanied by the voices of the attendants of both sexes.

Dancing is a favourite amusement in this country, but little regard is paid to art or gracefulness: the whole consists in agility, and in keeping time to their own tunes, which they do with great exactness. The diversion of hurling is likewise, we believe, peculiar to the Scots. It is performed upon ice, with large flat stones, often from twenty to two hundred pounds weight each, which they hurl from a common stand to a mark at a certain distance; and whoever is nearest the mark is the victor.— These two may be called the winter and summer diversions in Scotland. The natives are expert at all the other diversions common in England, cricket excepted, of which they have no notion; the gentlemen considering it as too athletic and mechanical.

The Highland plaid is composed of a woollen stuff, sometimes very fine, called tartan. This consists of various colours, forming stripes which cross each other at right angles; and the natives value themselves upon the judicious arrangement, or what they call setts, of those stripes and colours, which, when skillfully managed, produce a pleasing effect to the eye. Sometimes they wear a petticoat of the same variegated stuff, buckled round the waist, and they term it the phelibeg, which seems to be of Milesian extraction. Their stockings are likewise of tartan, tied below the knee with tartan garters formed into tassels. The poorer people wear upon their feet brogues made of untanned or undressed leather; for their heads a blue flat cap is used, called a bonnet, of a particular woollen manufacture. From the belt of the phelibeg hung generally their knives and a dagger, which they called a dirk, and an iron pistol, sometimes of fine workmanship, and curiously inlaid with silver. A large leathern purse, richly adorned with silver, hanging before them, was always part of a Highland chieftain's dress.

The dress of the Highland women consisted of a petticoat and jerkin, with strait sleeves, trimmed or not trimmed, according to the quality of the wearer; over this they wore a plaid, which they either held close under their chins with the hand, or fastened with a buckle of a particular fashion. On the head they wore a kerchief of fine linen of different forms. The women's plaid has been but lately disused in Scotland by the ladies, who wear it in a graceful manner, the drapery falling towards the feet in large folds.

The attachment of Highlanders to this dress rendered it a bone of disunion, which often proved dangerous to the government. Many efforts had been made by the legislature, after the rebellion in 1715, to disarm them, and oblige them to conform to the Low-country dresses. The disarming scheme was the most successful; for, when the rebellion in 1745 broke out, the common people had scarcely any other arms than those which they took from the king's troops. Their overthrow at Culloden rendered it no difficult matter for the legislature to force them into a total change of their dress. Its convenience, however, for the purposes of the field, is so great, that some of the Highland regiments still retain it. Even the common people have of late resumed it; and for its lightness, and the freedom it gives to the body, many of the Highland gentlemen wear it in the summer time.

The dress of the higher and middle ranks of the Low-country, differ little or nothing from the English; but many of the peasantry still retain the bonnet, for the cheapness and lightness of the wear. The dress of the women of all ranks are much the same in both kingdoms, but not so as to their neatness, and the cleanliness of the female servants.

The English spoken by the Scots, notwithstanding its provincial articulations, which are as frequent there as in the more southern countries, is written in the same manner in both kingdoms. At present the pronunciation of a Scotchman is greatly improved, and with some does not differ from the pronunciation of a Londoner, more than that of a Londoner does from an inhabitant of Somersetshire, and some parts of Worcestershire.

Punishments are pretty much the same in Scotland as in England; only that of beheading was formerly performed by an instrument called the Maiden; the model of which, it is well known, was brought from Halifax in England to Scotland, by the regent earl Morton, and it was first used for the execution of himself.

Ancient Scottish historians, with Bede, and other writers, generally agree that Christianity was first taught in Scotland by some of the disciples of St. John the apostle, who fled to this northern corner to avoid the persecution of Domitian, the Roman emperor; though it was not publicly professed till the beginning of the third century, when a prince, whom Scottish historians call Donald the first, his queen, and several of his nobles, were solemnly baptised. It was farther confirmed by emigrations from the south of Britain, during the prosecution of Aurelius and Dioclesian, when it became the established religion of Scotland, under the management of certain learned and pious men, named Culdees, who seem to have been the first regular clergy in Scotland, and were governed by overseers or bishops chosen by themselves, from among their own body, and who had no pre-eminence of rank over the rest of their brethren.

Thus, independent of the church of Rome, Christianity seems to have been taught, planted, and finally confirmed in Scotland as a national church, when it flourished in its native simplicity, till the arrival of Palladius, a priest sent by the bishop of Rome in the fifth century, who found means to introduce the modes and ceremonies of the Romish church, which at length prevailed, and Scotland became involved in that darkness which for ages overspread Europe.

It is worthy of observation, that the opposition to popery in this island, though it ceased in Scotland upon the extinction of the Culdees, was in the same age revived in England by John Wickliffe, a man of parts and learning, who was the forerunner in the work of Reformation to John Huss and Jerome of Prague, as the latter were to Martin Luther and John Calvin.

For learning and learned men, we may refer to the literary history of Europe for 1400 years past. The western parts and isles of Scotland, produced St. Patrick, the celebrated apostle of Ireland; and many others since, whose names would make a long article. The writings of Adamnanus, and other authors, who lived before and at the time of the Norman invasion, which are come to our hands, are specimens of their learning. Charles the Great, or Charlemagne, most unquestionably held a correspondence with the kings of Scotland, with whom he formed a famous league; and employed Scotchmen in planning, settling, and ruling his favourite universities, and other seminaries of learning in France, Italy, and Germany. It is an undoubted truth, though a seeming paradoxical fact, that Barbour, a Scottish poet, philosopher, and historian, though prior in time to Chaucer, having flourished in the year 1368, wrote, according to the modern ideas, as pure English as that bard, and his versification is perhaps more harmonious. The letters of the Scottish kings to the neighbouring princes, are incomparably the finest composition of the times in which they were written, and are free from the barbarisms of those sent them in answer. This has been considered as a proof that classical learning was more cultivated at the court of Scotland than any other in Europe.

The discovery of the logarithms, a discovery, which, in point of ingenuity and utility, may vie with any that has been made in modern times, is the disputable right of Napier of Merchistone. And since his time, the mathematical sciences have been cultivated in Scotland with great success. Keil, in his physico-mathematical works, to the clearness of his reasoning has added the colouring of a poet, which is the more remarkable, not only as the subject is little susceptible of ornament, but as he wrote in an ancient language. Of all writers on astronomy, Gregory is allowed to be one of the most perfect and elegant. Maclaurin, the companion and the friend of Sir Isaac Newton, was endowed with all that precision and force of mind, which rendered him peculiarly fitted for bringing down the ideas of that great man to the level of ordinary apprehensions, and for diffusing that light through the world, which Newton had confined within the sphere of the learned. His Treatise on Fluxions is regarded by the best judges in Europe as the clearest account of the most refined and subtle speculations on which the human mind ever exerted itself with success. While Maclaurin pursued this new career, a geometer no less famous distinguished himself in the sure, but almost deserted, tract of antiquity. This was the late Dr. Simpson, so well known over Europe for his illustration of the ancient geometry. His elements of Euclid, and above all his Conic Sections are sufficient of themselves to establish the scientific reputation of his native country.

This however, does not rest on the character of a few mathematicians and astronomers; the fine arts have been called sisters to denote their affinity. There is the same connection between the sciences, particularly those which depend on observation.—Mathematics and physics, properly so called, were in Scotland accompanied by the other branches of study to which they are allied. In medicine, particularly, the names of Pitcairn, Arbuthnot, Monro, Snellie, Whytt, Cullen, and Gregory, hold a distinguished place.

Nor have the Scots been unsuccessful in cultivating the Belles Lettres. Foreigners who inhabit warmer climates, and conceive the northern nations incapable of tenderness and feeling, are astonished at the poetic genius and delicate sensibility of Thompson.

But of literary pursuits, that of rendering mankind more virtuous and happy, which is the proper object of what is called morals, ought to be regarded with peculiar honour and respect. The philosophy of Dr. Hutcheson, not to mention other works more subtle and elegant, but less convincing and less instructive, deserves to be read by all who would know their duty, or who would wish to practise it. Next to Locke's essay on the human understanding, it is perhaps the best dissection of the human mind that hath appeared in modern times; and it is likewise the most useful supplement to that essay.—

Hume, Robertson, and Stuart, are among the many and illustrious names of the historians of modern times.

The universities of Scotland are four, viz. St. Andrews, founded in 1411. Glasgow, 1454. Aberdeen, 1477. And Edinburgh, 1582.

Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, naturally takes the lead in this division, which the bounds of our work obliges us to contract. The castle, before the use of artillery, was deemed to be impregnable by force. It was probably built by the Saxon king Edwin, whose territory reached to Frith of Forth, and who gave his name to Edinburgh, as it certainly did not fall into the hands of the Scots till the reign of Indalphus, who lived in the year 953.

In former times, the town was surrounded by water, excepting towards the east; so that when the French landed in Scotland, during the regency of Mary of Guise, they gave it the name of Lislebourg. This situation suggested the idea of building very lofty houses divided into stories, each of which contains a suite of rooms, generally large and commodious, for the use of a family; so that the High-street of Edinburgh, which is chiefly of hewn-stone, broad, and well paved, makes a most august appearance, especially as it rises a full mile in a direct line, and gradual ascent from the palace of Holyrood-house on the east, and is terminated on the west by the rude majesty of its castle, built upon a lofty rock, inaccessible on all sides, except where it joins to the city. The castle not only overlooks the city, its environs, gardens, the new town, and a fine rich neighbouring country, but commands a most extensive prospect of the river Forth, the shipping, the opposite coast of Fife, and even some hills at the distance of 40 or 50 miles, which border upon the Highlands. This crowded population, however, was so shockingly inconvenient, that the English, who seldom went farther into the country, returned with the deepest impression of Scottish nastiness, which became proverbial.

Facing the castle, as we have already observed, at a mile distance, stands the abbey, or rather palace of Holyrood-house. The inner quadrangle of this palace, begun by James V. and finished by Charles I. is of magnificent modern architecture, built according to the plan, and under the direction of Sir William Bruce, a Scottish gentleman of family, and one of the greatest architects of that age.

The chapel belonging to the palace, as it stood when repaired and ornamented by James II. is thought to have been a most elegant piece of Gothic architecture. It had a very lofty roof, and two rooms of stone galleries, supported by curious pillars. It was the conventual church of the old abbey. Its inside was demolished and rifled of all its rich ornaments, by the fury of the mob at the Revolution, which even broke into the repositories of the dead, and discovered a vault till that time unknown, which contain the bodies of James V. his first queen, and Henry Darnley. The walls and roof of this ancient chapel gave way and fell down on the 2d and 3d of December, 1768, occasioned by the enormous weight of a new stone roof, laid over it some years before, which the walls were unable to support.

The hospital founded by George Herriot, goldsmith to James VI. commonly called Herriot's Work, stands to the south side of the castle, in a noble situation. It is the finest and most regular specimen which Inigo Jones (who went to Scotland as architect to queen Anne, wife of James VI.) has left us of Gothic manner, and far exceeding any thing of that kind to be seen in England. One Balcanquhille, a divine, whom Herriot left his executor, is said to have prevailed upon Jones to admit some barbarous devices into the building, particularly the windows, and to have insisted that the ornaments of each should be somewhat different from those of the others.

Among the other public edifices of Edinburgh, before the revolution, was the college, which claims the privileges of an university, founded by king James VI. and by him put under the direction of the magistrates, who have the appointing of the chancellor and vice-chancellor. Its buildings were calculated for the sober literary manners of those days; but with pleasure we inform our readers, that a new university has been erected at Edinburgh, to which our most gracious sovereign has been a liberal benefactor. This edifice is a noble monument of national taste and spirit. What is of far more importance, it is supplied with excellent professors in the several branches of learning; and its schools for every part of the medical art are reckoned equal to any in Europe.

The Parliament Square, or, as it is there called, Close, was formerly the most ornamental part of this city; it is formed into a very noble quadrangle, part of which consists in lofty buildings; and in the middle is a fine equestrian statue of Charles II.—The room built by Charles I. for the parliament-house, though not so large, is better proportioned than Westminster-hall; and its roof, though executed in the same manner, has been by good judges held to be superior.

This equals any thing of the kind to be found in England, or perhaps in any part of Europe, and was at first entirely founded and finished by lawyers.—The number of printed books it contains are amazing; and the collection has been made with exquisite taste and judgment. It contains likewise the most valuable manuscript remains of the Scottish history, chartularies, and other papers of antiquity, with a series of medals.

The High Church of Edinburgh, called that of St. Giles, is now divided into four churches, and a room where the general assembly sits. It is a large Gothic building, and its steeple is surmounted by arches, formed into an imperial crown, which has a good effect to the eye.

The modern edifices in or near Edinburgh, such as the exchange, public offices, its hospitals, bridges, and the like, demonstrate the vast improvement of the taste of the Scotch in their public works. Parallel to the city of Edinburgh, on the north, the nobility, gentry, and others, have almost completed a new town, upon a plan which does honour to the present age.

Between the old and new town lies a narrow bottom or vail, which, agreeable to the original plan, was to have been formed into a sheet of water, bordered by a terrace walk, and the ascent towards the new town covered with pleasure-gardens, shrubberies, &c. But this elegant design fell to nothing, through the narrow ideas of the magistrates, who, finding greater benefits by letting the ground to inferior tradesmen, upon building leases, this plot, formed by nature as an agreeable opening to a crowded city, became a nuisance to those gentlemen who had been so liberal in ornamenting the buildings upon the summit. A decision of the house of lords (in which a certain great luminary of the law, equally distinguished for his taste and good sense, heartily concurred), put a stop to these mean erections. At the west, or upper end of this vale, the castle, a solid rock, not less than twenty stories high, looks down with awful magnificence. The eastern extremity is bounded by a striking object of art—a lofty bridge, the middle arch being ninety feet high, which joins the new buildings to the city, and renders the descent on each side the vale (there being no water in this place), more commodious for carriages.

Edinburgh may be considered, notwithstanding its castle and an open wall which encloses it on the south side of a very modern fabric, but in the Roman manner, as an open town; so that, in fact, it would have been impracticable for its inhabitants to have defended it against the rebels, who took possession of it in 1745.

Edinburgh is governed by a lord provost, four bailiffs, a dean of guild, and a treasurer, annually chosen from the common council. Every company, or incorporated trade, chooses its own deacon, and here are fourteen: namely, surgeons, goldsmiths, skippers, furriers, hammer-men, wrights or carpenters, masons, tailors, bakers, butchers, cordwainers, weavers, fullers, and bonnet-makers. The lord provost is colonel of the town guard, a military institution to be found in no part of his majesty's dominions but at Edinburgh; they serve for the city watch, and patrol the streets; are useful in suppressing small commotions, and attend the execution of sentences upon delinquents.

The revenues of the city consist chiefly of that tax which is now common in most of the bodies corporate in Scotland, of two Scottish pennis, amounting in the whole to two-thirds of a farthing, laid on every Scottish pint of ale (containing two English quarts) consumed within the precincts of the city. This is a most judicious impost, as it renders the poorest people insensible of the burden. Its product, however has been sufficient to defray the expense of supplying the city with excellent water, brought in leaden pipes at the distance of four miles; of erecting reservoirs, enlarging the harbour of Leith, of completing other public works of great expense and utility.

Leith, though near two miles distant, may be properly called the harbour of Edinburgh, being under the same jurisdiction. It contains nothing remarkable but the remains of two citadels (if they are the same) which were fortified and bravely defended by the French, under Mary of Guise, against the English, and afterwards repaired by Cromwell.

About four miles from Edinburgh is Roslin, noted for a stately Gothic chapel, containing one of the most curious pieces of workmanship in Europe, founded in the year 1440, by William St. Clair, prince of Orkney, and duke of Oldenburgh.

Glasgow, in the shire of Lanark, situated on a gentle declivity, sloping towards the river Clyde, 44 miles west of Edinburgh, is, for population, commerce, and riches, the second city of Scotland, and, considering its size, the first in Great Britain, and perhaps in Europe, as to elegance, regularity, and the beautiful materials of its buildings. The streets cross each other at right angles, and are broad, straight, well paved, and consequently clean. The houses make a grand appearance, and are in general four or five stories high, and many of them, towards the centre of the city, are supported by arcades, which form piazzas, and give the whole an air of magnificence. Some of the modern built churches are in the finest style of architecture, and the cathedral is a stupendous Gothic building, hardly to be paralleled in that kind of architecture. It contains three churches, one of which stands above another, and is furnished with a very fine spire springing from a tower; the whole being reckoned a masterly and matchless fabric. It was dedicated to St. Mungo, or Kentigern, who was a bishop of Glasgow in the 6th century. The cathedral is upwards of 600 years old, and was preserved from the fury of the rigid reformers by the resolution of the citizens.

The town-house is a lofty building, and has very noble apartments for the magistrates. The university is esteemed the most spacious and best built of any in Scotland, and is at present in a thriving state. In this city are several well endowed hospitals; and it is particularly well supplied with large and convenient inns, proper for the accommodation of strangers of any rank. In Glasgow are seven churches, and eight or ten meeting-houses for sectaries of various denominations. The number of its inhabitants have been estimated at 50,000.

Aberdeen bids fair to be the third town in Scotland for improvement and population. It is the capital of a shire, to which it gives its name, and contains two towns, New and Old Aberdeen. The former is the shire town, and evidently built for the purpose of commerce. It is a large, well-built city, and has a good quay, or tide-harbour; in it are three churches, and several episcopal meeting-houses, a considerable degree of foreign commerce, and much shipping; a well frequented university, and above 12,000 inhabitants. Old Aberdeen, near a mile distant, though almost joined to the new, by means of a long village, has no dependence on the other; it is a moderately large market town, but has no haven. In each of these two places there is a well-endowed college, both together being termed the university of Aberdeen, although quite independent of each other.

Perth, the capital town of Perthshire, lying on the river Tay, contains 10,000 inhabitants; trades to Norway and the Baltic; is finely situated, has an improving linen manufactory, manufactories of cotton, print fields, paper mills, a great fishery, &c. and lies in the neighbourhood of one of the most fertile spots in Great Britain, called the Carse of Gowry.

Dundee, by the general computation, contains 16,000 inhabitants; it lies near the mouth of the river Tay; it is a town of considerable trade, exporting much linen, grain, herrings, and poultry, to sundry foreign parts; and has three churches.—Montrose, Aberbrothick, and Brechin, lie in the same county of Angus: the first has a great and flourishing foreign trade, and the manufactures of the other two are upon the thriving hand.

We omit a particular description of Dumfries, Air, Greenock, Paisley, Stirling, and about 50 other burghs and towns of very considerable trade in Scotland.

The ancient Scots valued themselves upon trusting to their own valour, and not to fortifications, for the defence of their country. This was a maxim more heroic perhaps than prudent, as they have often experienced; and, indeed, at this day, their forts would make but a sorry figure, if regularly attacked. The castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton, formerly thought places of great strength, could not hold out 48 hours, if besieged by 6000 regular troops, with proper artillery. Fort William, which lies to the West Highlands, is sufficient to bridle the inhabitants of that neighbourhood; as are Fort George and Fort Augustus, in the north and north-west; but none of them can be considered as defences against a foreign enemy.

The Roman and other antiquities found in Scotland, have of themselves furnished matter for large volumes. The stations of the Roman legions, their castella, their pretentures or walls reaching across the island, have been traced with great precision by antiquaries and historians; so that, without some fresh discoveries, an account of them could afford no instruction to the learned, and but little amusement to the ignorant, because at present they can be discovered only by critical eyes. Some mention of the chief, however, may be proper. The course of the Roman wall (or, as it is called by the country people, Graham's dyke, from a tradition that a Scottish warrior of that name first broke over it), between the Clyde and Forth, which was first marked out by Agricola, and completed by Antoninus Pius, is still discernible, as are several Roman camps in the neighbourhood. Agricola's camp, at the bottom of the Grampian hills, is a striking remain of Roman antiquity. It is situated at Ardoch, in Perthshire, and is generally thought to have been the camp occupied by Agricola, before he fought the bloody battle so well recorded by Tacitus, with the Caledonian king Galgacus, who was defeated.

The Roman temple, or building in the form of the Pantheon at Rome, or of the dome of St. Paul's at London, stood upon the banks of the river Carron, in Stirlingshire, but has been lately barbarously demolished by a neighbouring Goth, for the purpose of mending a mill-pond. Its height was twenty-two feet, and its external circumference at the base was eighty-eight feet; so that, upon the whole, it was one of the most complete Roman antiquities in the world. It is thought to have been built by Agricola, or some of his successors, as a temple to the god Terminus, as it stood near the pretenture which bounded the Roman empire in Britain to the north. Near it was some artificial conical mounts of earth, which still retain the name of Duni-pace, or Duni-pacis, which serve to evidence that there was a kind of solemn compromise between the Romans and the Caledonians, that the former should not extend their empire farther to the northwards.

Innumerable are the coins, urns, utensils, inscriptions, and other remains of the Romans, that have been found in the different parts of Scotland; some of them to the north of the wall, where, however, it does not appear that they made any establishment. By the inscriptions found near the wall, the names of the legions that built it, and how far they carried it on, may be learned. The remains of Roman highways are frequent in the southern parts.

Danish camps and fortifications are easily discernible in several northern countries, and are known by their square figures and difficult situations. — Some houses or stupendous fabrics remain in Ross-shire, but whether they are Danish, Pictish, or Scottish, does not appear. The elevations of two of them are to be seen in Gordon's Itinerarium Septentrionale. We are of opinion that they are Norwegian or Scandinavian structures, and built about the fifth century, to favour the descents of that people upon those coasts.

The vestiges of erections by the ancient Scots themselves are not only curious but instructive, as they regard many important events of their history. That people had amongst them a rude notion of sculpture, in which they transmitted the actions of their kings and heroes. At a place called Aberlemno, near Brechin, four or five ancient obelisks are still to be seen, called the Danish stones of Aberlemno. They are erected as commemorations of the Scottish victories over that people; and are adorned with bas-reliefs of men on horseback, and many emblematical figures and hieroglyphics, not intelligible at this day, but minutely described by Mr. Gordon. Many other historical monuments of the Scots may be discovered on the like occasions; but it must be acknowledged, that the obscurity of their sculptures has encouraged a field of boundless and frivolous conjectures, so that the interpretations of many of them are often fanciful. It would, however, be unpardonable, if we should neglect to mention the stone near the town of Forross, or Fortrose, in Murray, which far surpasses all the others in magnificence and grandeur, "and is (says Mr. Gordon) perhaps one of the most stately monuments of that kind in Europe. It rises about 23 feet in height above ground, and is, as we are credibly informed, no less than 12 or 15 feet below, so that the whole height is at least 35 feet, and its breadth near 5. It is all one single and entire stone; great variety of figures in relievo are carved thereon, and some of them still distinct and visible; but the injury of the weather has obscured those towards the upper part."

At Sandwick, in Ross-shire, is a very splendid ancient obelisk, surrounded at the base with large, well-cut flag stones, formed like steps. Both sides of the column are covered with various enrichments in well-finished carved work. The one face presents a sumptuous cross, with a figure of St. Andrew on each hand, and some uncouth animals and flourings underneath. The central division, on the reverse, exhibits a variety of curious figures, birds, and animals.

The ruins of the cathedral of Elgin are very striking; and many parts of that fine building have still the remains of much grandeur and dignity in them. The west door is highly ornamented, there is much elegance in the carvings, and the whole edifice displays very elaborate workmanship.

Among the remains of ancient castles, may be mentioned Kildrummy castle in the north of Scotland, which was formerly a place of great strength and magnificence, and often used as an asylum to noble families in periods of civil war. Invergue castle, the ancient seat of the earl-marschals of Scotland, is also a large and lofty pile, situated on a steep bank of the river, two very high towers bound the front, and even in their decaying state, give the castle an air of much grandeur and antiquity.

Near the town of Huntly are the ruins of Huntly castle. On the avenue that leads to it, are two large square towers which had defended the gateway. The castle seems to be very old, and great part of it is demolished; but there is a massy building of a more moderate date, in which some of the apartments, and in particular their curious ceilings, are still in tolerable preservation. They are painted with a great variety of subjects, in small divisions, in which are contained many emblematical figures.

Besides these remains of Roman, Pictish, Danish, and Scottish antiquities, many Druidical monuments and temples are discernible in the northern parts of Scotland, as well as in the isles, where we may suppose that paganism took its last refuge. They are easily perceived by their circular forms; but though they are equally regular, yet none of them are so stupendous as the Druidical erections in South Britain. There is in Perthshire a barrow which seems to be a British erection, and the most beautiful of the kind perhaps in the world. It exactly resembles the figure of a ship with the keel uppermost. The common people call it Ternay, which some interpret to be terra navis, the ship of earth. It seems to be of the most remote antiquity, and perhaps was erected to the memory of some British prince, who acted as auxiliary to the Romans; for it lies near Auchterarder, not many miles distant from the great scene of Agricola's operations.

The traces of ancient volcanoes are not unfrequent in Scotland. The hill of Finchaven is one instance: and the hill of Bergonium, near Dunstaffage castle, is another, yielding vast quantities of pumices or scoria of different kinds, many of which are of the same species with those of the volcanic Iceland.

Among other natural curiosities of this country, mention is made of a heap of white stones, most of them clear like crystal, together with great plenty of oyster and other sea-shells; they are found on the top of a mountain called Skorna Lappich, in Ross shire, twenty miles distant from the sea.—Slains, in Aberdeenshire, is said to be remarkable for a petrifying cave, called the Dropping cave, where water oozing through a spongy porous rock at the top, doth quickly consolidate after it drops to the bottom. Other natural curiosities belonging to Scotland have their descriptions and histories; but they generally owe their extraordinary qualities to the credulity of the vulgar, and vanish when they are skillfully examined. Some caverns that are to be found in Fifeshire, and are probably natural, are of extraordinary dimensions, and have been the scenes of inhuman cruelties.

In commerce and manufactures Scotland has, for some years, been in an improving state. We are to account for the long languor of the Scottish commerce and many other misfortunes which that country sustained, by the disgust the inhabitants conceived on account of some invasions of their rights, which they thought inconsistent with the articles of union. The entails and narrow settlements of family estates, and some remains of the feudal institutions, might contribute to the same cause.

Mr. Pelham, when at the head of the administration in England, after the extinction of the rebellion in 1745, was the first minister who discovered the true value of Scotland, which then became a more considerable object of governmental inquiry than ever. All the benefits received by that country for the relief of the people from their feudal tyranny, were effected by that great man. The bounties and encouragements granted to the Scots, for the benefit of trade and manufactures, during his administration, made them sensible of their own importance. Lord Chatham pursued Mr. Pelham's wise plan; and justly boasted in parliament, that he availed himself of the courage, good sense, and spirit of the Scots, in carrying on the most extensive war that ever Great Britain was engaged in.—Let me add, to the honour of the British government, that the Scots have been suffered to avail themselves of all the benefits of commerce and manufactures they can claim, either in right of their former independency, the treaty of union, or posterior acts of parliament.

This is manifest from the extensive trade they lately carried on with the British settlements in America and the West Indies; and with all the nations to which the English themselves trade; so that the increase of their shipping within these 30 years past has been very considerable. The exports of those ships are composed chiefly of Scottish manufactures, fabricated from the produce of the soil, and the industry of its inhabitants. In exchange for these they import tobacco, rice, cotton, sugar, and rum, from the British plantations; and from other countries, their products to the immense saving of their nation. The prosperity of Glasgow and its neighbourhood hath been greatly owing to the connexion and trade with Virginia and the West Indies.

The fisheries of Scotland are not confined to their own coast, for they have a great concern in the whale fishery carried on upon the coast of Spitsbergen; and their returns are valuable, as the government allows them a bounty of 40s. for every ton of shipping employed in that article. The late improvements of their fisheries, which we have already mentioned, and which are daily increasing, open inexhaustible funds of wealth; their cured fish being by foreigners, and the English planters in America, preferred to those of Newfoundland.

The busses, or vessels employed in the great herring fishery on the western coasts of Scotland, are fitted out from the north-west parts of England, the north of Ireland, as well as the numerous ports of the Clyde, and neighbouring islands. The grand rendezvous is at Cambletown, a commodious port in Argyleshire, facing the north of Ireland, where sometimes 300 vessels have been assembled. They clear out on the 12th of September, and must return to their different ports by the 13th of January. They are also under certain regulations respecting the number of tons, men, nets, &c. the whole being judiciously calculated to promote the best of national purposes, its strength and its commerce. But though the political existence of Great Britain depends upon the number and bravery of our seamen, this noble institution has hitherto proved ruinous to many of those who have embarked in it, and unless vigorously supported, will end in smoke.

To encourage this fishery, a bounty of 50s. per ton was granted by parliament: but whether from the insufficiency of the fund appropriated for this purpose, or any other cause, the bounty was withheld from year to year, while in the mean time the adventurers were not only sinking their fortunes, but also borrowing to the utmost limits of their credit. The bounty has since been reduced from 50 to 30s. with the strongest assurances of its being regularly paid when due. Upon the strength of these promises they have again embarked in the fishery, and it is to be wished, that no consideration whatever may tend to withdraw an inducement so requisite to place this fishery on a permanent footing.—The benefits of these fisheries are perhaps equalled by manufactures carrying on at land; particularly that of iron at Carron, in Stirlingshire.

Their linen manufactory, notwithstanding a strong rivalryship from Ireland, is in a flourishing state.—The thread manufacture of Scotland is equal, if not superior, to any in the world; and the lace fabricated from it, has been deemed worthy of royal wear and approbation. It has been said, some years ago, that the exports from Scotland to England, and the British plantations, in linen, cambrics, checks, Osmaburghs, mkle, and the like commodities, amounted annually to 400,000*l.* exclusive of their home consumption; and there is reason to believe that the sum is considerably larger at present. To these manufactures, that of cotton stuffs has been added since the American war. An immense capital, and a prodigious number of hands are now employed in this manufacture. The Scots are likewise making very promising efforts for establishing woollen manufactures; and their exports of caps, stockings, mittens, and other articles of their own wool, begin to be very considerable.—The Scots, it is true, cannot pretend to rival the English in their finer cloths; but they make at present some broad cloth proper for the wear of people of fashion in an undress, and in quality and fineness equal to what is commonly called Yorkshire cloth.

Among the other late improvements of the Scots we are not to forget the vast progress they have made in working the mines, and smelting the ore of the country. Their coal trade to England is well known; and of late they have turned even their stones of account, by their contracts for paving the streets of London. If the great trade in cattle which the Scots carried on of late with the English is now diminished, it is owing to the best of national causes, that of an increase of home consumption. The Scots have lately made the most successful efforts in the cotton trade.

The trade carried on by the Scots with England is chiefly from Leith, and the eastern ports of the nation; but Glasgow was the great emporium for the American commerce, before the commencement of the unhappy breach with the colonies. The late junction of the Forth to the Clyde will render the benefits of trade mutual to both parts of Scotland. In short, the more that the seas, the situation, the soil, harbours, and rivers of this country are known, the better adapted it appears for all the purposes of commerce, both foreign and domestic.

With regard to other manufactures, not mentioned, some of them are yet in their infancy. The town of Paisley alone employs an incredible number of hands, in fabricating a particular kind of flowered and striped lawns, which are a reasonable and elegant wear. Sugar-houses, glass-works of every kind, delft-houses, and paper-mills, are erected every where. The Scots carpeting makes neat and lasting furniture; and some essays have been lately made, with no inconsiderable degree of success, to carry that branch of manufacture to as great perfection as in any part of Europe.

After all that has been said, many years will be required before the trade and improvements in Scotland can be brought to maturity. In any event, they never can give umbrage to the English, as the interests of the two people are, or ought to be, the same.

Having said thus much, we cannot avoid observing the prodigious disadvantages under which both the commercial and landed interest of Scotland lies, from her nobility and great land-holders having too fond an attachment for England, and foreign countries, where they spend their ready money. This is one of the evils arising to Scotland from the union, which removed the seat of her legislature to London; but it is greatly augmented by the resort of volunteer absentees to that capital. While this partiality subsists, the Scots will probably continue to be distressed for a currency of specie. How far paper can supply that defect, depends upon an attention to the balance of trade; and the evil may, perhaps, be somewhat prevented, by money remitted from England for carrying on the vast manufactures and works now set on foot in Scotland. And it must be confessed, that the flow of wealth and trade from England, as a dear country, into Scotland, as a cheap country; now since obstacles have been removed by the union, &c.; seems, in a great measure, to compensate the above disadvantages.

The gentlemen who reside in Scotland, have wisely abandoned French claret and brandy, (though too much is still made use of in that country) for rum produced in the British plantations; and their own malt-liquors are now come nearly to as great perfection as those in England; and it is said that they have exported large quantities of their ale to London, Dublin, and the plantations.

In the reign of Edward II. of England, the value and denominations of coins were the same in Scotland as in England. Towards the reign of James II. a Scottish shilling answered to about an English sixpence; and about the reign of queen Mary of Scotland, it was not more than an English groat. It continued diminishing in this manner till after the union of the two crowns under her son James VI. when the vast resort of the Scots nobility and gentry to the English court, occasioned such a drain of specie from Scotland, that by degrees a Scottish shilling fell to the value of one-twelfth of an English shilling, and their pennies in proportion. A Scottish penny is now very rarely to be found; and they were succeeded by bodles, which was double the value of a Scottish penny, and are still current, but are daily wearing out. A Scottish halfpenny was called a babie; some say, because it was first stamped with the head of James III. when he was a babe or baby; but perhaps it is only the corruption of two French words, bas piece, signifying a low piece of money. The same observation that we have made of the Scottish shilling, holds of their pounds or marks: which are no coins, but denominations of sums. In all other respects, the eurrency of money in Scotland and England is the same, as very few people now reckon by the Scottish computation.

The order of the Thistle, as the Scottish writers assert, was instituted by their king Achais in the ninth century, upon his making an offensive and defensive league with Charlemagne, king of France; or, as others say, on account of his victory over Athelstan, king of England, when he vowed in the kirk of St. Andrew, that he and his posterity should ever bear the figure of that cross in their ensigns on which the saint suffered. It has been frequently neglected, and as often resumed. It consists of the sovereign, and 12 companions, who are called Knights of the Thistle, and have on their ensign this significant motto, "Nemo me impune lacesset," "None shall safely provoke me."

The ancient constitution and government in Scotland has been highly applauded, as excellently adapted to the preservation of liberty; and it is certain, that the power of the king was greatly limited, and that there were many checks in the constitution upon him, which were well calculated to prevent his assuming or exercising a despotic authority.-- But the Scottish constitution of government was too much of the aristocratic kind to afford to the common people that equal liberty which they had a right to expect. The king's authority was sufficiently restrained; but the nobles, chieftains, and great land-holders, had it too much in their power to tyrannize over and oppress their tenants, and the common people.

The ancient kings of Scotland, at their coronation, took the following oath, containing three promises, viz.

"In the name of Christ, I promise these three things to the Christian people my subjects; 1st, that I shall give order, and employ my force and assistance that the church of God, and the Christian people, may enjoy true peace during our time, under our government. 2dly, I shall prohibit and hinder all persons, of whatever degree, from violence and injustice. 3dly, In all judgments I shall follow the prescriptions of justice and mercy, to the end that our element and merciful God may shew mercy unto me, and to you."

The parliament of Scotland anciently consisted of all who held any portion of land, however small, of the crown by military service. This parliament appointed the time of its own meetings and adjournments, and committees to superintend the administration during the intervals of parliament; it had a commanding power in all matters of government; it appropriated the public money, ordered the keeping of it, and called for the accounts; it armed the people, and appointed commanders; it named and commissioned ambassadors; it granted and limited pardons; it appointed judges and courts of judicature; it named officers of state and privy-counsellors; it annexed and alienated the revenues of the crown, and restrained grants by the king. The king of Scotland had no negative voice in parliament, nor could he declare war, make peace, or conclude any other public business of importance, without the advice and approbation of parliament. The prerogative of the king was so bounded, that he was not intrusted with the executive part of the government. And so late as the minority of James IV. who was contemporary with, and son-in-law to, Henry VII. of England, the parliament pointed out to him his duty, as the first servant of his people; as appears by the act still extant. In short, the constitution was rather aristocratical than monarchical. The abuse of these aristocratical powers, by the chieftains and great land-holders, gave the king, however, a very considerable interest among the lower ranks; and a prince who had sense and address to retain the affections of his people, was generally able to humble the most overgrown of his subjects; but when, on the other hand, a king of Scotland, like James III. shewed a disrespect to his parliament, the event was commonly fatal to the crown. The kings of Scotland, notwithstanding this paramount power in the parliament, found means to awaken and elude its force; and in this they were assisted by the clergy, whose revenues were immense, and who had very little dependence upon the pope, and were always jealous of the powerful nobility. This was done by establishing a select body of members, who were called the lords of the articles. These were chosen out of the clergy, nobility, knights, and burghesses. The bishops, for instance, chose eight peers, and the peers eight bishops; and these sixteen jointly chose eight barons, (or knights of the shire) and eight commissioners for burghs; and to all those were added eight great officers of state, the chancellor being president of the whole.

Their business was to prepare all questions and bills, and other matters brought into parliament; so that, in fact, though the king could give no negative, yet being by his clergy, and the places he had to bestow, always sure of the lords of articles, nothing could come into parliament that could call for his negative. It must be acknowledged, that this institution seems to have prevailed by stealth; nor was it ever brought into any regular system; even its modes varied, and the greatest lawyers are ignorant when it took place. The Scots, however, never lost sight of their original principles; and though Charles I. wanted to form these lords of the articles into regular machines for his own despotic purposes, he found it impracticable; and the melancholy consequences are well known. At the revolution the Scots gave a fresh instance how well they understood the principles of liberty, by omitting all pedantic debates about abdication, and the like terms, and voting king James at once to have forfeited his crown, which they gave to the prince and princess of Orange.

This spirit of resistance was the more remarkable, as the people had groaned under the most insupportable ministerial tyranny ever since the restoration. It is asked, Why did they submit to that tyranny? The answer is, in order to preserve that independency upon England, which Cromwell and his parliament endeavoured to destroy, by uniting them to England; they therefore chose to submit to a temporary evil; but they took the first opportunity to get rid of their oppressors.

Scotland, when it was a separate kingdom, cannot be said to have any peers, in the English sense of the word. The nobility who were dukes, marquises, earls, and lords, were by the king made hereditary members of parliament; but they formed no distinct house, for they sat in the same room with the commons, who had the same deliberate and decisive vote with them in all public matters. A baron, though not a baron of parliament, might sit upon a lord's assize in matters of life and death; nor was it necessary for the assizers, or jury, to be unanimous in their verdict. The feudal customs, even at the time of the restoration, were so prevalent, and the rescue of a great criminal, was commonly so much apprehended, that seldom above two days passed between the sentence and execution.

Great uncertainty occurs in the Scottish history, by confounding parliaments with conventions; the difference was, that a parliament could enact laws as well as lay on taxes; a convention, or meeting of the states, only met for the purposes of taxation.— Before the union, the kings of Scotland had four great and four lesser officers of states; the great, were the lord high chancellor, high treasurer, privy-seal, and secretary; the four lesser were, the lords register, advocate, treasurer-deputy, and justice clerk. Since the union, none of those continue, excepting the lords privy-seal, register, advocate, and justice clerk; a third secretary of state has occasionally been nominated by the king for Scottish affairs, but under the same denomination as the other two secretaries. The above officers of state sat in the Scottish parliament by virtue of their offices.

The officers of the crown were, the high chamberlain, constable, admiral, and marshal. The offices of constable and marshal were hereditary. A nobleman has still a pension as admiral; and the office of marshal is exercised by a knight-marshal.

The office of chancellor of Scotland differed little from the same in England. The same may be said of the lords treasurer, privy-seal, and secretary. The lord-register was head-clerk to the parliament, convention, treasury, exchequer, and session, and keeper of all public records. Though this office was only during the king's pleasure, yet it was very lucrative, by disposing of his deputation, which lasted during life. He acted as teller to the parliament; and it was dangerous for any member to dispute his report of the number upon division. The lord advocate's office resembles that of the attorney-general in England, only his powers are far more extensive; because, by the Scottish laws, he is the prosecutor of all capital crimes before the judiciary, and likewise concurs in all pursuits before sovereign courts, for breaches of the peace, and also in all matters civil, wherein the king or his donor hath interest. Two solicitors are named by his majesty, by way of assistants to the lord advocate. The office of justice clerk entitles the possessor to preside in the criminal court of justice, while the justice-general, an office we will describe hereafter, is absent.

The ancient constitution of Scotland admitted of many other offices both of the crown and state; but they are either now extinct, or too inconsiderable to be described here. That of a Lyon king at arms, or the rex facialium, or grand herald of Scotland, is still in being; and it was formerly an office of great splendor and importance, inasmuch that the science of heraldry was preserved there in greater purity than in any other country in Europe. He was even crowned solemnly in parliament with a golden circle; and his authority, which is not the case in England, in all armorial affairs, might be carried into execution by the civil law.

The privy-council of Scotland, before the revolution, had, or assumed, inquisitorial powers, even that of torture; but it is now sunk in the parliament or privy-council of Great Britain; and the civil and criminal causes in Scotland are chiefly cognizable by two courts of judicature.

The first is, that of the college of justice, which was instituted by James V. after the model of the French parliament, to supply an ambulatory committee of parliament, who took to themselves the names of the lords of council and session, which the present members of the college of justice still retain. This court consists of a president and 14 ordinary members, besides extraordinary ones named by the king, who may sit and vote, but have no salaries, and are not bound to attendance. This court may be called a standing jury in all matters of property that lie before them. Their forms of proceeding do not lie within our plan, neither does any inquiry how far such an institution, in so narrow a country as Scotland, is compatible with the security of private property. The civil law is their directory in all matters that come not within the municipal laws of the kingdom. It has been often matter of surprise, that the Scots were so tenacious of the forms of the courts, and the essence of their laws, as to reserve them by the articles of the union. This however, can be easily accounted for, because those laws and forms were essential to the possession of estates and lands, which in Scotland are often held by modes incompatible with the laws of England. We shall just add, that the lords of council and session act likewise as a court of equity, but their decrees are (fortunately perhaps for the subject) reversible by the British house of lords, to which an appeal lies.

The justice court is the highest criminal tribunal in Scotland; but in its present form it was instituted so late as the year 1672, when a lord-justice-general, removable at the king's pleasure, was appointed.— This lucrative office still exists in the person of one of the chief nobility; but the ordinary members of the court are the justice-clerk and five other judges, who are always nominated from the lords of session. In this court the verdict of a jury condemns or acquits; but, as we have already hinted, without any necessity of being unanimous.

Besides these two great courts of law, the Scots, by the articles of the union, have a court of exchequer. This court has the same power, authority, privilege, and jurisdiction, over the revenue of Scotland, as the court of exchequer in England has over the revenues there; and all matters and things competent to the court of exchequer in England relating thereto, are likewise competent to the exchequer of Scotland. The judges of the exchequer in Scotland exercise certain powers which formerly belonged to the treasury, and are still vested in that of England.

The court of admiralty in Scotland was, in the reign of Charles II. by act of parliament, declared to be a supreme court, in all causes competent to its own jurisdiction; and the lord high admiral is declared to be the king's lieutenant and justice-general upon the seas, and in all ports, harbours, and creeks of the same; and upon fresh waters and navigable rivers, below the first bridge, or within flood mark; so that nothing competent to its jurisdiction can be meddle with, in the first instance, but by the lord high admiral and the judges of his court. Sentences passed in all inferior courts of admiralty may be brought again before this court; but no appeal lies from it to the lords of the session, or any other judiciary, unless in cases not maritime. Causes are tried in this court by the civil law, which in such cases is likewise the common law of Scotland, as well as by the laws of Oleron, Wisby, and the Hanse towns, and other maritime practices and decisions committed upon the continent. The place of lord-admiral of Scotland is little more than nominal, but the salary annexed to it is reckoned now 1000*l.* a-year; and the judge of the admiralty is commonly a lawyer of distinction, with considerable perquisites pertaining to his office.

The college, or faculty of advocates, which answers to the English inns of court, may be called the seminary of Scottish lawyers. They are within themselves an orderly court, and their forms require great precision and examination to qualify its candidates for admission. Subordinate to them is a body of inferior lawyers, or, as they may be called, attorneys, who call themselves writers to the signet, because they alone can subscribe the writs that pass the signet; they likewise have a bye government for their own regulation. Such are the different law-courts that are held in the capital of Scotland; we shall pass to those that are inferior.

The government of the counties in Scotland was formerly vested in sheriffs and stewards, courts of regality, baron courts, commissaries, justices of the peace, and coroners.

Formerly sheriffdoms were generally hereditary; but by a late act of parliament they are now all vested in the crown; it being there enacted, that all high sheriffs, or stewards, shall, for the future, be nominated and appointed annually by his majesty, his heirs and successors. In regard to the sheriff-deputies, and steward-deputies, it is enacted, that there shall only be one in each county, or stewardry, who must be an advocate of three years standing at least. For the space of seven years, these deputies are to be nominated by the king, with such continuance as his majesty shall think fit; after which they are to enjoy their office for life, unless guilty of some offence. Some other regulations have been likewise introduced, highly for the credit of the sheriffs court.

Stewardries were formerly part of the ancient royal domain; and the stewards had much the same power in them as the sheriff had in his county.

Courts of regality of old were held by virtue of a royal jurisdiction vested in the lord, with particular immunities and privileges; but these were so dangerous, and so extravagant, that all the Scottish regalities are now dissolved by an act of parliament.

Baron-courts belong to every person who holds a barony of the king. In civil matters they extend to matters not exceeding forty shillings sterling; and in criminal cases, to petty actions of assault and battery; but the punishment is not to exceed twenty shillings sterling, or setting the delinquent in the stocks for three hours in the day time. These courts, however petty, were in former days invested with the power of life and death, which they have now lost.

The courts of commissaries in Scotland answer to those of the English diocesan chancellors, the highest of which is kept at Edinburgh, wherein, before four judges, actions are pleaded concerning matters relating to wills and testaments; the right of patronage to ecclesiastical benefices, tithes, divorces, and causes of that nature; but in almost all other parts of the kingdom there sits but one judge on these causes.

According to the present constitution, justices of the peace in Scotland exercise pretty much the same power as those in England. In former times their office, though of very old standing, was insignificant, being cramped by the powers of the great feudal tyrants, who obtained an act of parliament that they were not to take cognizance of riots till fifteen days after the fact.

The institution of coroners is as old as the reign of Malcolm II. the great legislator of Scotland, who lived before the Norman invasion of England. They took cognizance of all breaches of the king's peace; and they were required to have clerks to register depositions and matters of fact, as well as verdicts of jurors; the office, however, is at present much disused in Scotland.

From the above short view of the Scottish laws and institutions, it is plain that they were radically the same with those of the English. The latter allege, indeed, that the Scots borrowed the contents of their Regiam Majestatem, their oldest law-book, from the work of Glanville, who was a judge under Henry II. of England. The Scots, on the other hand say, that Glanville's work was copied from their Regiam Majestatem, even with the peculiarities of the latter, which do not now, and never did, exist in the laws of England.

The royal burghs in Scotland form, as it were, a commercial parliament, which meets once a-year at Edinburgh, consisting of a representative from each burgh, to consult upon the common good of the whole. Their powers are pretty extensive, and before the Union they made laws relating to shipping, to masters and owners of ships, to mariners, and merchants, by whom they were freighted: to manufacturers, such as plaiding, linen, and yarn; to the curing and packing of fish, salmon, and herrings, and to the importing and exporting several commodities. The trade between Scotland and the Netherlands is subject to their regulations: they fix the staple port, which was formerly at Dort, and is now at Camperve. Their conservator is indeed nominated by the crown, but then their convention regulates his power, approves his deputies, and appoints his salary: so that, in truth, the whole staple trade is subjected to their management.

Upon the whole, this is a very singular institution, and sufficiently proves the vast attention which the government of Scotland formerly paid to trade.

It took its present form in the reign of James III. 1487, and had excellent consequences for the benefit of commerce.

Such are the laws and constitutions of Scotland; but our bounds do not permit us to descend to further particulars, which are various and complicated. The conformity between the practice of the civil law of Scotland, and that of England, is remarkable. The English law reports are of the same nature with the Scottish practice; and their acts of sederunt answer to the English rules of court; the Scottish wadsets and reversions, to the English mortgages and defeasances; their pouding of goods, after letters of horning, is much the same as the English executions upon outlawries; and an appeal against the king's pardon, in cases of murder, by the next of kin to the deceased, is admitted in Scotland as well as in England. Many other usages are the same in both kingdoms. We cannot however, dismiss this head without one observation, which proves the similarity between the English and Scottish constitutions, which we believe has been mentioned by no author. In old times, all the freeholders in Scotland met together in presence of the king, who was seated on the top of a hillock, which in the old Scottish constitution is called the Moot, or Mute-hill; all national affairs were here transacted; judgments given, and differences ended. This Moot-hill we apprehend to be of the same nature as the Saxon Folcmote, and to signify no more than the hill of meeting.

Though the writers of ancient Scottish history are too fond of system and fable, yet it is easy to collect, from the Roman authors, and other evidences, that Scotland was formerly inhabited by different people. The Caledonians were, probably, the first inhabitants; the Picts undoubtedly were the Britons, who were forced northwards by the Belgic Gauls, about fourscore years before the descent of Julius Cæsar; and who settling in Scotland, were joined by great numbers of their countrymen, who were driven northwards by the Romans. The Scots, most probably were a nation of adventurers from the ancient Scythia, who had served in the armies on the continent, and, as has been already hinted, after conquering the other inhabitants, gave their own name to the country. The tract lying southward of the Forth appears to have been inhabited by the Saxons, and by the Britons, who formed the kingdom of Alenuth, the capital of which was Dumbarton; but all these people in process of time were subdued by the Scots.

Having premised thus much, it is unnecessary for us to investigate the constitution of Scotland from its fabulous, or even its early ages. It is sufficient to add, to what we have already said upon that head, that they seem to have been as forward as any of their southern neighbours in the arts of war and government.

It does not appear that the Caledonians, the ancient Celtic inhabitants of Scotland, were attacked by any of the Roman generals before Agricola, anno 79. The name of the prince he fought with was Galdus, by Tacitus named Galgacus; and the history of that war is not only transmitted with great precision, but corroborated by the remains of the Roman encampments and forts, raised by Agricola in his march towards Dunkeld, the capital of the Caledonians. The brave stand made by Galdus against the great general does honour to the valour of both people; and the sentiments of the Caledonians, concerning the freedom and independency of this country, appeared to have warmed the noble historian with the same generous passion. It is plain, however, that Tacitus thought it for the honour of Agricola to conceal some part of this war; for though he makes his countrymen victorious, yet they certainly returned southward, to the province of the Horesti, which was the county of Fife, without improving their advantage.

Galdus, otherwise called Corbred, was, according to the Scottish historians, the 21st in the lineal descent from Fergus I. the founder of their monarchy; and though this genealogy has of late been disputed, yet nothing can be more certain, from the Roman histories, that the Caledonians, or Scots, were governed by a succession of brave and wise princes, during the abode of the Romans in Britain. Their valiant resistance obliged Agricola himself, and after him the emperors Adrian and Severus, to build the two famous pretences or walls, one between the Frith of Clyde and Forth already mentioned, and the other between Timmouth and the Solway Frith, which is described in our account of England, to defend the Romans from the Caledonians and Scots; and which prove that the independency of the latter was never subdued.

Christianity was introduced into Scotland about the year 201 of the Christian æra, by Donald I. The Picts, who, as before mentioned, were the descendants of the ancient Britons, forced northwards by the Romans, had at this time gained a footing in Scotland; and being often defeated by the ancient inhabitants, they joined the Romans against the Scots and Caledonians, who were of the same original, and considered themselves as one people; so that the Scottish monarchy suffered a short eclipse; but it broke out with more lustre than ever, under Fergus II. who recovered his crown; and his successors gave many severe overthrows to the Romans and Britons.

When the Romans left Britain in 448, the Scots, as appeared by Gildas, a British historian, were a powerful nation, and in conjunction with the Picts, invaded the Britons; and having forced the Roman walls, drove them to the very sea; so that the Britons applied to the Romans for relief; and in the famous letter, which they call their groans, they tell them, that they had no choice left, but that of being swallowed up by the sea, or perishing by the swords of the barbarians; for so all nations were called who were not Romans, or under the Roman protection.

Dongard was then king of Scotland; and it appears from the oldest historians, and those that are least favourable to monarchy, that the succession to the crown of Scotland still continued in the family of Fergus, but generally descended collaterally; till the inconveniences of that mode of succession were so much felt, that by degrees it fell into disuse, and it was at last settled in the descending line.

About the year 796, the Scots were governed by Achaius, a prince so much respected, that his friendship was courted by Charlemagne. The Picts still remained in Scotland as a separate nation, and were powerful enough to make war upon the Scots who, about the year 843, when Kenneth Mac Alpin was king of Scotland, finally subdued them; but not in the savage manner mentioned by some historians, by extermination. For he obliged them to incorporate themselves with their conquerors, by taking their names and adopting their laws. The successors of Kenneth Mac Alpin maintained almost perpetual wars with the Saxons on the southward, and the Danes and other barbarous nations towards the east: who being masters of the sea, harassed the Scots by powerful invasions. The latter, however, were more fortunate than the English; for while the Danes were erecting a monarchy in England, they were every where overthrown in Scotland by bloody battles, and at last driven out of the kingdom. The Saxon and Danish monarchs who then governed England were not more successful against the Scots, who maintained their freedom and independency, not only against foreigners, but against their own kings, when they thought them endangered. The feudal law was introduced among them by Malcolm II.

Malcolm III. commonly called Malcolm Canmore from two Gaelic words which signify a large head, but most probably from his great capacity, was the eighty-sixth king of Scotland, from Fergus I. the supposed founder of the monarchy; the forty-seventh from its restorer, Fergus II.; and the twenty-second from Kenneth III. who conquered the kingdom of the Picts. Every reader who is acquainted with the tragedy of Macbeth, as written by the inimitable Shakespeare, who keeps close to the facts delivered by historians, can be no stranger to the fate of Malcolm's father, and his own history, previous to his mounting the throne in the year 1057. He was a wise and magnanimous prince, and in no respect inferior to his contemporary, the Norman conqueror, with whom he was often at war. He married Margaret, daughter to Edward, surnamed the Outlaw, son to Edmund Ironside, king of England. By the death of her brother Edgar Atheling, the Saxon right to the crown of England devolved upon the posterity of that princess, who was one of the wisest and worthiest women of the age; and her daughter Maud was accordingly married to Henry I. of England. Malcolm, after a glorious reign, was killed, with his son, treacherously, it is said, at the siege of Alnwick, by the besieged.

Malcolm III. was succeeded by his brother Donald VII. and he was dethroned by Duncan II. whose legitimacy was disputed. They were succeeded by Edgar, the son of Malcolm III. who was a wise and valiant prince; he was succeeded by Alexander I. and upon his death David I. mounted the throne. Notwithstanding the endeavours of some historians to conceal what they cannot deny, (we mean the glories of this reign) it yet appears, that David was one of the greatest princes of his age, whether we regard him as a man, a warrior, or a legislator. The noble actions he performed in the service of his niece, the empress Maud, in her competition with king Stephen for the English crown, give us the highest idea of his virtues, as they could be the result only of duty and principle. To him Henry II. the mightiest prince of his age, owed his crown; and his possessions in England, joined to the kingdom of Scotland, placed David's power nearly on an equality with that of England, when confined to this island. His actions and adventures, and the resources he always found in his own courage, prove him to have been a hero of the first rank. If he appeared to be too lavish to churchmen, and in his religious endowments, we are to consider these were the only means by which he could civilize his kingdom; and the code of laws we have already mentioned to have been drawn up by him, do his memory immortal honour. They are said to have been compiled under his inspection by learned men, whom he assembled from all parts of Europe in his magnificent abbey of Melross.— He was succeeded by his grandson Malcolm IV. and he by William, surnamed from his valour, the Lion. William's son Alexander II. was succeeded in 1249 by Alexander III. who was a good king. He married first, Margaret daughter to Henry III. of England, by whom he had Alexander, the prince who married the earl of Flanders' daughter; David, and Margaret who married Hangowan, or, as some call him, Eric, son to Magnus IV. king of Norway, who bore to him a daughter named Margaret, commonly called the Maiden of Norway; in whom king William's whole posterity failed, and the crown of Scotland returned to the descendants of David earl of Huntingdon, brother to king Malcolm IV. and king William.

We have been the more particular in this detail, because it was productive of great events. Upon the death of Alexander III. John Baliol, who was great-grandson to David earl of Huntingdon, by his eldest daughter Margaret, and Robert Bruce, (grandfather to the great king Robert Bruce) grandson to the same earl of Huntingdon, by his youngest daughter Isabel, became competitors for the crown of Scotland. The laws of succession, which were not then so well established in England as they are at present, render the case very disagreeable. Both parties were almost equally matched in interest; but after a confused interregnum of some years, the great nobility agreed in referring the decision to Edward I. of England, the most polite, ambitious prince of his age. He accepted the office of arbiter; but having long had an eye to the crown of Scotland, he revived some obsolete absurd claims of its dependency upon that of England; and finding that Baliol was disposed to hold it by that disgraceful tenure, Edward awarded it to him; but afterwards dethroned him, and treated him as a slave, without Baliol's resenting it.

After this, Edward used many endeavours to annex their crown to his own, which were often defeated; and though Edward for a short time made himself master of Scotland, yet the Scots were ready to revolt against him on every favourable opportunity. Those of them who were so zealously attached to the independency of their own country, as to be resolved to hazard every thing for it, were indeed but few, compared to those in the interest of Edward and Baliol, which was the same; and for some time they were obliged to temporize. Edward availed himself of their weakness and his own power. He accepted of a formal surrender of the crown of Baliol, to whom he allowed a pension, but detained him in England; and sent every nobleman in Scotland, whom he in the least suspected, to different prisons in or near London. He then forced the Scots to sign instruments of their subjection to him, and most barbarously carried off or destroyed all the monuments of their history, and the evidences of their independency, and particularly the famous fatidical or prophetic stone, which is still to be seen in Westminster abbey.

These severe proceedings, while they rendered the Scots sensible of their slavery, revived in them the ideas of their freedom; and Edward finding their spirits were not to be subdued, endeavoured to caress them, and affected to treat them on a footing of equality with his own subjects, by projecting an union, the chief articles of which have since taken place between the two kingdoms. The Scottish patriots treated this project with disdain, and united under the brave William Wallace, the truest hero of his age, to expel the English. Wallace performed actions that entitled him to eternal honour, in executing this scheme. Being however no more than a private gentleman, and his popularity daily increasing, the Scottish nobility (among whom was Robert Bruce, the son of the first competitor) began to suspect that he had an eye upon the crown, especially after he had defeated the earl of Surrey, Edward's viceroy of Scotland, in the battle of Stirling, and had reduced the garrisons of Berwick and Roxburgh, and was declared by the states of Scotland their protector. Their jealousy operated so far, that they formed violent cabals against the brave Wallace. Edward, upon this, once more invaded Scotland, at the head of the most numerous and best disciplined army England had ever seen, for it consisted of 80,000 foot, 3000 horsemen completely armed, and 4000 light armed; and was attended by a fleet to supply it with provisions. These, besides the troops who joined him in Scotland, formed an irresistible body: Edward, however, was obliged to divide it, reserving the command of 40,000 of his best troops to himself. With these he attacked the Scottish army under Wallace at Falkirk, while their disputes ran so high, that the brave regent was deserted by Cumming, the most powerful nobleman in Scotland, and at the head of the best division of his countrymen. Wallace, whose troops did not exceed 30,000, being thus betrayed, was defeated with vast loss, but made an orderly retreat; during which he found means to have a conference with Bruce, and to convince him of his error in joining with Edward. Wallace still continued in arms, and performed many gallant actions against the English; but was betrayed into the hands of Edward, who most ungenerously put him to death at London, as a traitor; but he died himself as he was preparing to renew his invasion of Scotland with a still more desolating spirit of ambition, after having destroyed 100,000 of her inhabitants.

Bruce died soon after the battle at Falkirk; but not before he had inspired his son, who was a prisoner at large about the English court, with the glorious resolution of vindicating his own rights, and his country's independency. He escaped from London, and with his own hand killed Cumming, for his attachment to Edward; and after collecting a few patriots, among whom were his own four brothers, he assumed the crown, but was defeated by the English (who had a great army in Scotland) at the battle of Methven. After his defeat, he fled with one or two friends to the Western Isles and parts of Scotland, where his fatigues and sufferings were as inexpressible, as the courage with which he and his few friends bore them (the lord Douglas especially) was incredible. Though his wife and daughters were sent prisoners to England, where the best of his friends and two of his brothers were put to death, yet such was his persevering spirit, that he recovered all Scotland excepting the castle of Stirling, and improved every advantage that was given him by the dissipated conduct of Edward II, who raised an army more numerous and better appointed still than that of his father, to make a total conquest of Scotland. It is said that it consisted of 100,000 men; this is supposed to be an exaggerated computation: however, it is admitted that the army of Bruce did not exceed 30,000; but all of them heroes, who had been bred up in a detestation of tyranny.

Edward, who was not deficient in point of courage, led this mighty host towards Stirling, then besieged by Bruce, who had chosen with the greatest judgment a camp near Bannockburn. The chief officers under Edward were, the earls of Gloucester, Hereford, Pembroke, and Sir Giles Agenton. Those under Bruce were, his own brother Sir Edward, who, next to himself, was reckoned to be the best knight in Scotland; his nephew Randolph earl of Murray, and the lord Walter, high-steward of Scotland. Edward's attack of the Scottish army was exceeding furious, and required all the courage and firmness of Bruce and his friends to resist it, which they did so effectually, that they gained one of the most complete victories that is recorded in history. The great loss of the English fell upon the bravest part of their troops, who were led on by Edward in person against Bruce himself. The Scottish writers make the loss of the English amount to 50,000 men. Be that as it will, there certainly never was a more total defeat, though the conquerors lost 4000. The flower of the English nobility were either killed or taken prisoners. Their camp, which was immensely rich, and calculated for the purpose rather of a triumph than a campaign, fell into the hands of the Scots; and Edward himself, with a few followers, favoured by the goodness of their horses, were pursued by Douglas to the gates of Berwick, from whence he escaped in a fishing-boat. This great decisive battle happened in the year 1314.

The remainder of Robert's reign was a series of the most glorious successes; and so well did his nobility understand the principles of civil liberty, and so unfettered were they by religious considerations, that, in a letter they sent to the pope, they acknowledged that they had set aside Baliol for debasing the crown by holding it of England; and that they would do the same by Robert, if he should make the like attempt. Robert having thus delivered Scotland, sent his brother Edward to Ireland, at the head of an army, with which he conquered the greatest part of that kingdom, and was proclaimed its king; but by exposing himself too much he was killed. Robert, before his death, which happened in 1328, made an advantageous peace with England, and when he died, he was acknowledged to be indisputably the greatest hero of his age.

The glory of the Scots may be said to have been in its zenith under Robert I. who was succeeded by his son David II. He was a virtuous prince, but his abilities, both in peace and war, were eclipsed by his brother-in-law and enemy Edward III. of England, whose sister he married. Edward, who was as keen as any of his predecessors upon the conquest of Scotland, espoused the cause of Baliol, son to Baliol, the original competitor. His progress was at first amazingly rapid, and he and Edward defeated the royal party in many bloody battles; but Baliol was at last driven out of his usurped kingdom by the Scottish patriots. David had the misfortune to be taken prisoner by the English at the battle of Durham: and after continuing above eleven years in captivity, he paid 100,000 marks for his ransom, and died in peace without issue, in the year 1371.

The crown of Scotland then devolved upon the family of Stuart, by its head having been married to the daughter of Robert I. The first king of that name was Robert II. a wise and brave prince. He was succeeded by his son Robert III. whose age and infirmities disqualified him from reigning; so that he was forced to trust the government to his brother, the duke of Albany, an ambitious prince, who seems to have had an eye to the crown for his own family. Robert, upon this, attempted to send his second son to France; but he was most ungenerously intercepted by Henry IV. of England; and, after suffering a long captivity, he was obliged to pay an exorbitant ransom. During the imprisonment of James, in England, the military glory of the Scots was carried to the greatest height in France, where they supported that tottering monarchy against England, and the generals obtained some of the first titles of the kingdom.

James, the first of that name, upon his return to Scotland, discovered great talents for government, enacted many wise laws, and was beloved by his people. He had received an excellent education in England during the reigns of Henry IV. and V. where he saw the feudal system refined from many of the imperfections which still adhered to it in his own kingdom; he determined therefore to abridge the overgrown power of the nobles, and to recover such lands as had been unjustly wrested from the crown during his minority and the preceding reigns; but the execution of these designs cost him his life, he being murdered in his bed by some of his chief nobility in 1437, and the 44th year of his age.

A long minority succeeded; but James II. would probably have equalled the greatest of his ancestors both in warlike and civil virtues, had he not been suddenly killed by the accidental bursting of a cannon, in the thirteenth year of his age, as he was besieging the castle of Roxburgh, which was defended by the English.

Suspicion, indolence, immoderate attachments to females, and many of the errors of a female mind, are visible in the conduct of James III. and his turbulent reign was closed by a rebellion of his subjects, being slain in battle in 1488, aged thirty-five.

His son, James IV. was the most accomplished prince of the age; he was naturally generous and brave; he loved magnificence, he delighted in war, and was eager to obtain fame. He encouraged and protected the commerce of his subjects, so that they greatly increased in riches; and the court of James, at the time of his marriage with Henry VII.'s daughter, was splendid and respectable. Even this alliance could not cure him of his family distemper, a predilection for the French, in whose cause he rashly entered, and was killed, with the flower of his nobility, by the English, in the battle of Flodden, anno 1513, and the fortieth year of his age.

The minority of his son, James V. was long and turbulent: and when he grew up, he married two French ladies; the first being daughter to the king of France, and the latter of the house of Guise. He instituted the court of session, enacted many salutary laws, and greatly promoted the trade of Scotland, particularly the working of the mines. At this time the balance of power was so equally poised between the contending princes of Europe, that James's friendship was courted by the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and his uncle, Henry VIII. of England, from all which he received magnificent presents. But James took little share in foreign affairs; he seemed rather to imitate his predecessors in their attempts to humble the nobility; and the doctrines of the Reformation beginning to be propagated in Scotland, he gave way, at the instigation of the clergy, to a religious persecution, though it is generally believed, that, had he lived longer, he would have seized all the church revenues, in imitation of Henry. However, having rather slighted some friendly overtures made him by the king of England, and thereby given great umbrage to that prince, a war at length broke out between them.—A large army under the command of the duke of Norfolk, entered Scotland, and ravaged the country north of the Tweed. After this short expedition, the English army retired to Berwick, Upon this the king of Scotland sent 10,000 men to the western borders, who entered England at Solway Firth; and he himself followed them at a short distance, ready to join them upon occasion. But he soon after gave great offence to the nobility, and the army, by imprudently depriving their general, lord Maxwell, of his commission, and conferring the command on Oliver Sinclair, a private gentleman, who was his favourite. The army were so much disgusted with this alteration, that they were ready to disband, when a small body of English horse appeared, not exceeding five hundred. A panic seized the Scots, who immediately took to flight, supposing themselves to be attacked by the whole body of the English army. The English horse, seeing them flee with such precipitation, closely pursued them, and slew great numbers, taking prisoners seven lords, two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred soldiers, with twenty-four pieces of ordnance.— This disaster so much affected king James, that it threw him into a fit of illness, of which he soon after died on the 14th of December, 1542.

His daughter and successor, Mary, was but a few hours old at the time of her father's death. Her beauty, her misconduct, and her misfortune, are alike famous in history. It is sufficient here to say, that during her minority, and while she was wife to Francis II. of France, the Reformation advanced in Scotland: that being called to the throne of her ancestors while a widow, she married her own cousin german, the lord Darnley, whose untimely death hath given rise to so much controversy. The consequence of her husband's death, and of her marriage with Bothwell, who was considered as his murderer, was an insurrection of her subjects, from whom she fled into England, where she was ungenerously detained a prisoner for eighteen years; and afterwards, on motives of her state policy, beheaded by queen Elizabeth, in 1587, in the forty-sixth year of her age.

Mary's son, James VI. of Scotland, succeeded in right of his blood from Henry VII. upon the death of queen Elizabeth, to the English crown, after shewing considerable abilities in the government of Scotland. This union of the two crowns, in fact, destroyed the independency, as it impoverished the people of Scotland; for the seat of government being removed to England, their trade was checked, their agriculture neglected, and their gentry obliged to seek for bread in other countries. James, after a splendid, but troublesome reign over his three kingdoms, left them in 1625, to his son, the unfortunate Charles I. That prince, by his despotic principles and conduct, induced both his Scottish and English subjects to take up arms against him: and indeed, it was in Scotland that the sword was first drawn against Charles. But when the royal party was totally defeated in England, the king put himself into the power of the Scottish army; they at first treated him with respect, but afterwards delivered him up to the English parliament, on condition of their paying 400,000 pounds to the Scots, which was said to be due to them for arrears. However, the Scots afterwards made several bloody but unsuccessful attempts to restore her son Charles II. That prince was finally defeated by Cromwell, at the battle of Worcester, 1651, after which, to the time of his restoration, the commonwealth of England and the protector gave law to Scotland. We have, in another place, touched on the most material parts of Charles's reign, and that of his deluded brother, James VII. of Scotland, and II. of England, as well as of king William, who was so far from being a friend to Scotland, that, relying on his royal word to her parliament, she was brought to the brink of ruin.

The state of parties in England at the accession of queen Anne was such, that the Whigs once more had recourse to the Scots, and offered them their own terms, if they would agree to the incorporate Union as it now stands. It was long before the Scottish parliament would listen to the proposal; but at last, partly from conviction, and partly through the force of money distributed among the needy nobility, it was agreed to; since which event the history of Scotland becomes, in a great measure, the same with that of England.
