

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01246200 8

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

83

IVÁN TURGÉNIEFF

VOLUME II

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

II

385
Eka

THE NOVELS AND STORIES OF
(IVÁN TURGÉNIEFF)

Ivan Sergeevich Turgenev,
Vol. 2.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN ❖ ❖

II

TRANSLATED FROM THE RUSSIAN BY
ISABEL F. HAPGOOD

61338
2/1/04

NEW YORK
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
1903

Turgénieff and his dog in the avenue of trees planted by himself in front of the house on the estate at Spasskoe.

NOV 20 1907

Turgéniéff and his dog in the avenue of trees planted by himself in front of the house on the estate at Spásskoe,

305
Eha

THE NOVELS AND STORIES OF
(IVÁN TURGÉNIEFF)

Ivan Sergeyevich Turgenev, Vol. 2,

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN ❖ ❖

II

TRANSLATED FROM THE RUSSIAN BY
ISABEL F. HAPGOOD

*61385
2/1/04*

NEW YORK
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
1903

FORM BY PRESERVATION
SERVICES
DATE NOV 20 1987

Copyright, 1903, by
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

PG

3421

A15H36

V. 2

THE DE VINNE PRESS

CONTENTS

	PAGE
I LEBEDYÁN . . . . .	3
II TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA AND HER NEPHEW . . . . .	25
III DEATH . . . . .	47
IV THE SINGERS . . . . .	69
V PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF . . . . .	102
VI THE TRYST . . . . .	129
VII HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY COUNTY . . . . .	146
VIII TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF AND NEDOPIÚSKIN . . . . .	191
IX THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF . . . . .	224
X LIVING HOLY RELICS . . . . .	285
XI THE RATTLING . . . . .	310
EPILOGUE: FOREST AND STEPPE . . . . .	336

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

(1852)

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I

LEBEDYÁN <sup>1</sup>

ONE of the chief advantages of hunting, my dear readers, consists in this—that it forces you to go about constantly from place to place, which is extremely agreeable for an unoccupied man. In sooth, it is not always a very cheerful matter, especially in rainy weather, to roam about on the country roads, to go “cross-country,” to stop any peasant you may meet with the question: “Hey there, my good fellow! how can we get to Mordóvka?” and in Mordóvka inquire of a dull-witted peasant wife (for the labourers are all in the fields) whether it is far to the posting-stations on the highway, and how one is to reach them,—and, after having traversed ten versts, instead of a posting-house, to find one’s self in the extremely dilapidated little manorial hamlet of Khudobúbnovo, to the intense surprise of a whole herd of swine, buried to their ears in the dark-brown mud in the very middle of the street, and not at all expecting to be disturbed. Neither is it exhilarating to cross quaking little bridges, descend into ravines, and ford swampy brooks; it is not exhilarating to drive—for whole days to drive along the greenish sea of the highways, or, which God forbid, to get bemired for several hours in front of a striped mile-post with the figures “ 22 ” on one side and “ 23 ” on the other; it is not exhilarating to subsist for weeks on eggs, milk, and the vaunted sour rye bread. . . . But all these discomforts and misadventures are redeemed by another sort of benefits and pleasures. However, let us begin the story.

<sup>1</sup> Lebedyán is the capital of the Government of Tambóff, and is celebrated for its horse-fair, to which cavalry remount-officers resort to purchase horses.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

After all that has been said above, there is no necessity for my explaining to the reader, how I happened to come upon Lebedyán, five years ago, at the very height of the annual fair.<sup>1</sup> We sportsmen may drive forth, some fine morning, from our more or less hereditary estates, with the intention of returning by the evening of the following day, and, little by little, without ceasing to shoot woodcock, finally arrive on the blessed shores of the Petchóra River. Moreover, every one who is foúnd of dog and gun is a passionate respecter of the most noble animal in the world—the horse. Thus, I arrived at Lebedyán, put up at the inn, changed my clothes, and set out for the fair. (The waiter, a long and gaunt young fellow, of twenty years, with a sweet, nasal tenor voice, had already contrived to impart to me, that Their<sup>1</sup> Illustrious Highness, Prince N., remount-officer of the * * * regiment, was stopping at our inn; that many other gentlemen had arrived; that the gipsies sang in the evenings, and that "Pan Tvardovsky"<sup>2</sup> was being played in the theatre; that horses, 't was said, were selling for high prices,—and good horses had been brought to the fair.)

<sup>1</sup> There are innumerable annual fairs in Russia, in the governments and districts.—TRANSLATOR.

LEBEDYÁN

On the fair-ground, in interminable rows, stretched peasant carts, and behind the carts were horses of all possible sorts: trotters, stud-farm horses, bitiúki<sup>3</sup> draught-horses, posting-horses, and plain peasant-horses. Some, well-fed and smooth, assorted according to colour, covered with horse-cloths of varied hues, hitched short to a high rack, were apprehensively rolling their eyes backward at the too familiar whips of their owners, the horse-dealers; the horses of landed proprietors, sent by noblemen of the steppes one or two hundred versts away, under the supervision of some decrepit coachman and two or three hard-headed grooms, were flourishing their long necks, stamping their hoofs, and gnawing the posts out of boredom; roan Vyátka

<sup>1</sup>The respectful form for His.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup>The dramatisation of a novel of that title, published (1859) by Josphe Ignatius Krasçewsky (1812–1887).—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>3</sup>See note on p. 101, Vol. I.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

horses pressed close to one another; in majestic immobility, like lions, stood the broad-haunched trotters with waving tails and shaggy pasterns, dapple-grey, black, and brown. Experts paused respectfully in front of them. In the streets formed by the carts, people of all sorts of classes, stature, and aspect thronged: the horse-dealers, in blue kaftans and tall caps, craftily watched and waited for purchasers; goggle-eyed, curly-haired gipsies darted to and fro like madmen, inspected the horses' teeth, lifted their feet and tails, shouted, wrangled, served as go-betweens, cast lots, or fawned upon some remount-officer in military cap and cloak with beaver collar. A stalwart kazák towered up astride of a lank gelding with a deer-neck and sold it, "in one lot," that is to say, with saddle and bridle. Peasants, in sheepskin coats tattered under the armpits, descended by tens on a cart, drawn by a horse which must be "tried," or, somewhere apart, with the aid of a cunning gipsy, they bargained until they were worn out, struck hands on the deal a hundred times in succession, each insisting on his own price, while the object of their dispute, a wretched little nag covered with a shrunken rug, merely blinked its eyes, as though the matter did not concern it. . . . And, in fact, was it not all the same to it who would beat it! Broad-browed landed proprietors with dyed moustaches, and an expression of dignity on their faces, in braided jackets and camelot peasant-coats, worn with an arm in one sleeve, condescendingly conversed with pot-bellied merchants in beaver hats and green gloves. Officers of various regiments were discussing matters there also; a remarkably tall cuirassier, of German extraction, was coolly asking a horse-dealer how much he expected to get for that sorrel horse. A fair-haired young hussar, nineteen years of age, was picking out a trace horse to go with an emaciated pacer; a postilion, in a low-crowned hat, surrounded with peacock feathers, in a brown long-coat, and with leather mittens thrust into his narrow, greenish belt, was looking for a shaft-horse for a tróika. The coachmen plaited their horses' tails, dampened their manes, and gave deferential advice to their masters. On concluding the trade, they hastened to the eating-tavern or the dram-shop, according to their means. . . . And all this uproar, shouting, bustle, wrangling, reconciliations, cursing, and laughter was going on in mud knee-deep. I wanted to buy a tróika of fairly good horses, for my britchka: mine were beginning to shirk their work. I found two, but could not manage to match them with a third. After dinner, which I will not undertake to describe (even Æneas knew how unpleasant it is to recall bygone woe), I set out for the so-called coffee-house, where every evening the remount-officers, stud-farm men, and other visitors were wont to assemble. In the billiard-room, drowned in floods of leaden-hued tobacco-smoke, were about a score of men. There were free-and-easy young landed proprietors in braided hussar-jackets and grey trousers, with long mutton-chop whiskers and pomaded moustaches, gazing loftily and boldly about; other nobles in kazák coats, with remarkably short necks and little eyes swimming in fat, were painfully snoring away there also; the merchants sat apart, "pricking up their ears," as the saying is; the officers chatted freely among themselves. Prince N., a young man of five and twenty, with a merry and somewhat scornful face, clad in a coat thrown open on the breast, a red silk shirt, and full velvet trousers, was playing billiards; he was playing with Viktór Khlopakóff, a retired lieutenant.

LEBEDYÁN

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Ex-Lieutenant Viktór Khlopakóff, a thin and swarthy little man of thirty years, with thin, black hair, brown eyes, and a short, tip-tilted snub-nose, is a diligent attendant upon elections and fairs. He skips as he walks, sets his arms akimbo swaggeringly, wears his cap on one ear, and turns up the sleeves of his military coat, lined with bluish calico. Mr. Khlopakóff understands how to curry favour with the wealthy Petersburg rakes, smokes, drinks, and plays cards with them, and addresses them as "thou." Why they favour him is a good deal of a puzzle.

LEBEDYÁN

He is not clever, he is not even amusing; neither is he useful as a buffoon. To tell the truth, they treat him in an amicably-careless way, like a good-natured but empty-pated fellow; they haunt his society for the space of two or three weeks, and then suddenly cease even to bow to him, and he, also, no longer bows to them. A peculiarity of Lieutenant Khlopakóff consists in this: that he uses one and the same expression constantly for the period of a year, sometimes two years, appropriately and inappropriately, an expression not in the least amusing, but which, God knows why, sets every one to laughing. Eight years ago, he used to say, at every step, "My respects to you, I thank you most humbly," and his patrons of that epoch fairly expired with laughter every time and made him repeat, "My respects"; then he began to use a rather complicated expression, "No, now you know, keskese—that proves proved," and with the same dazzling success; two years later, he invented a new quaint saying, "Ne vous goryatchez<sup>1</sup> pas, you man of God, sewn up in a sheepskin," and so forth. And lo! as you see, his far from ingenious little remarks supply him with food, drink, and apparel. (He has long ago squandered his property, and lives exclusively at the expense of his friends.) Observe, that he possesses positively no other amiable characteristics: 't is true, that he will smoke a hundred pipes of Zhúkoff<sup>1</sup> tobacco a day, and, when playing billiards, he raises his right foot higher than his head, and as he takes aim, wriggles his cue violently in his hand;—well, but not every one is an admirer of such merits. He is a good drinker, also . . . . but it is difficult to distinguish one's self in Russia by that means. . . . In a word, his success is a complete mystery to me. . . . There may be one reason for it, perhaps: he is cautious, never tells tales out of school, never utters a bad word about anybody.

<sup>1</sup> Goryatchitsya, to get heated, angry.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Come,”—I thought, at sight of Khlopakóff:—“what's his catchword at present?”

The Prince pocketed the white.

“Thirty and nothing,” roared the consumptive marker.

The Prince drove the yellow ball into the furthest pocket with a crash.

“Ekh!” approvingly grunted, with his whole body, a fat merchant, who sat in one corner at a tottering little table on a single leg,—grunted and quailed. But, luckily, no one noticed him. He sighed and stroked his beard.

“Thirty-six and very little!”<sup>2</sup> shouted the marker through his nose.

<sup>1</sup>Equivalent to “navy-plug”—the coarsest sort of tobacco.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup>The game alluded to is a game with five balls. It is a fashionable fad for the marker to say, instead of “thirty and nothing,” “thirty and very little,” even substituting “nobody” for “nothing.”—TRANSLATOR.

LEBEDYÁN

“ Well, what do you think of that, brother? ” the Prince asked Khlopakóff.

“ Why, of course, rrrrakaliooon, a regular rrrrakaliooon! ”<sup>1</sup>

The Prince burst out laughing.

“ What, what ’s that? say it again! ”

“ Rrrrakalioon! ” repeated the ex-lieutenant, conceitedly.

“ That ’s the word! ” I thought.

The Prince pocketed the red.

“ Ekh! that ’s wrong, Prince, that ’s wrong, ” —suddenly stammered the fair-haired young officer with the reddened eyes, the tiny nose, and the childish sleepy face. . . . “ You don’t play right . . . . you ought to have . . . . that ’s wrong! ”

“ How so? ” asked the Prince over his shoulder.

“ You ought to have . . . . you know . . . .
with a triplet. . . . ”

“ Really? ” muttered the Prince through his teeth.

“ Well, Prince, shall we go to the gipsies today? ” put in the embarrassed young man.
“ Styóshka is going to sing. . . . Iliúshka . . . . ”

The Prince did not answer him.

“ Rrrrakaliooon, my good fellow, ” said Khlo-pakóff, cunningly screwing up his left eye.

<sup>1</sup> Rakaliya means a scamp or good-for-nothing. But it has no apparent connection with this nonsense.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And the Prince burst into a roar of laughter.

“Thirty-nine and nothing,” proclaimed the marker.

“All . . . . just look now, what I’m going to do with that yellow . . . .” Khlopakóff wriggled the cue in his hand, took aim, and missed.

“Eh, rrakalioon,” he shouted wrathfully.

Again the Prince laughed.

“What, what, what?”

But Khlopakóff did not wish to repeat his word: one must coquet a bit.

“You have made a miscue,”—remarked the scorer.—“Please to chalk . . . . Forty and very little!”

“Yes, gentlemen,” said the Prince, turning to the whole assembly, but not looking at any one in particular:—“you know, we must call out Verzhembítzkaya.”

“Of course, of course, without fail,” several visitors vied with each other in exclaiming, being wonderfully flattered by the possibility of replying to the remark of a Prince:—“Verzhembítzkaya. . . .”

“Verzhembítzkaya is a capital actress,—far better than Sopnyakóva,” squeaked a rascally-looking man, with moustache and spectacles, from one corner. Unhappy man! in secret he was sighing violently for Mme. Sopnyakóff, but the Prince did not deign even to look at him.

LEBEDYÁN

“Wai-er, hey, a pipe,” said a tall man in a stock, with a regular face, and the most noble of miens,—but yet by all the signs, a card-sharper.

The waiter ran for a pipe, and on his return announced to His Illustrious Highness: “Position Baklága is asking for you, sir.”

“Ah! well, order him to wait, and give him some vódka.”

“Very good, sir.”

Baklága (The Flask), as I was afterward told, was the nickname of a young, handsome, and extremely petted postilion; the Prince was fond of him, gave him horses, drove races with him, spent whole nights with him. . . . You would not recognise that Prince—formerly a scapegrace and a spendthrift—now. . . . How puffed up, tight-laced, and perfumed he is! How engrossed in the service,—and, chief of all, how sober-minded!

But the tobacco-smoke began to irritate my eyes. After listening to Khlopakóff’s exclamation and the Prince’s shout of laughter, for the last time, I betook myself to my chamber, where, on a narrow divan, with broken springs, covered with horse-hair, and with a tall, curved back, my man had already made up my bed.

On the following day I inspected the horses in the yards, and began with the well-known horse-dealer Sítnikoff. Through a wicket I entered a courtyard sprinkled with sand. In front of the wide-open door of the stable stood the proprietor himself, a man no longer young, tall and stout, in a short-coat of peasant shape, lined with hareskin, and with a standing collar turned down. On perceiving me, he slowly moved to meet me, held his cap above his head with both hands, and said, in a singsong tone:

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“ Ah, our respects to you. I suppose you want to look at horses? ”

“ Yes, I came to look at horses. ”

“ And what sort, exactly, may I venture to inquire? ”

“ Show me what you have. ”

“ With pleasure. ”

We entered the stable. Several white curs rose from the hay, and ran to us, wagging their tails; a long-bearded goat stalked off to one side, in displeasure; three grooms, in strong but dirty sheepskin coats, bowed to us in silence. On the right and the left, in cleverly raised stalls, stood about thirty horses, splendidly groomed and cleaned. Pigeons were hopping along the cross-beams and cooing.

“ For what, that is to say, do you require the horse: for driving or the stud-farm? ”—Sítnikoff asked me.

“ Both for driving and for the stud. ”

“ I understand, sir, I understand, sir, I understand, sir," articulated the horse-dealer, pausing between his words.—"Pétya, show the gentleman Ermine."

LEBEDYÁN

We went out into the yard.

"Would n't you like to have a bench brought out from the house? . . . . You don't want it? . . . . As you please."

Hoofs thundered over planks, a whip cracked, and Pétya, a man of forty years, pockmarked and swarthy, sprang forth from the stable, in company with a grey and fairly well-made stallion, allowed him to rear up, ran with him a couple of times round the yard, and cleverly pulled him up at the show spot. Ermine stretched himself out, snorted with a whistling sound, flirted his tail, twitched his muzzle, and gazed askance at us.

"A well-trained bird!" thought I.

"Give him his head, give him his head," said Sítnikoff and fixed his eyes on me.

"What do you think of him, sir?"—he asked, at last.

"He is n't a bad horse—his fore legs are not sound."

"His legs are splendid!"—returned Sítnikoff, with conviction.—"And his loins . . . . be so good as to look . . . . a regular oven; you might even sleep your fill on them."

"His cannon-bones are long."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“What do you call long—good gracious! Run, Pétya, run, and at a trot, trot, trot . . . don't let him gallop.”

Again Pétya ran round the yard with Ermine. We all maintained silence.

“Well, put him back in his place,” said Sítnikoff:—“and bring out Falcon.”

Falcon, a stallion black as a beetle, of Dutch pedigree, with a sloping back, and lean, proved to be little better than Ermine. He belonged to the category of horses of which sportsmen say that “they hack and cut and take prisoner,”—that is to say, in action they turn out and fling out their fore legs to the right and left, but make little headway.<sup>1</sup> Middle-aged merchants admire that sort of horses: their gait is suggestive of the dashing pace of an alert waiter; they are good in single harness, for a drive after dinner; stepping out cock-a-hoop, curving their necks, they zealously drag the clumsy drozhky, laden with a coachman who has eaten himself into a state of numbness, and a squeezed merchant<sup>2</sup> suffering from heart-burn, and a lymphatic merchant's wife, in a sky-blue silk sleeved coat, and with a lilac kerchief on her head.<sup>1</sup> I declined Falcon. Sítnikoff showed me several other horses. . . . At last one, a dappled-grey stallion, of Voiéikoff breed, pleased me. I could not refrain from patting him on the forelock with pleasure. Sítnikoff immediately feigned indifference.

<sup>1</sup> Dishing, in English.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup> The smaller the drozhky, the more popular and stylish it is. If the passengers bulge over, and the coachman, through his own admired fat and the tightness of the drozhky, has to straddle the dashboard with his knees, and keep his feet on iron supports outside, the height of fashion and happiness is assured. If not fat enough naturally, cushions are added to secure the “broad seat” which Russians consider stylish and safe.—TRANSLATOR.

LEBEDYÁN

“Does he drive well?”—I inquired. (The word “go” is not used of trotters.)

“Yes,”—replied the horse-dealer, calmly.

“Cannot I see him?” . . . .

“Why not?—certainly, sir. Hey, there, Kúzya, put Overtaker in a drozhky.”

Kúzya, the jockey, a master of his business, drove past us three times along the street. The horse went well, did not break, did not sway, his action was free, he held his tail up and stepped out firmly, with a long, regular stride.

“And what do you ask for him?”

Sítnikoff mentioned a preposterous price. We had begun to chaffer there, in the street, when, suddenly, from round the corner thundered swiftly a splendidly matched posting-tróika, and drew up in dashing fashion in front of the gate to Sítnikoff’s house. In the dandified sporting-cart sat Prince N.; beside him towered Khlopakóff. The Flask was driving,— <sup>1</sup>Old-fashioned women of the merchant class, no matter how wealthy they may be, still wear no bonnets, but merely a silk kerchief on the head.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

and how he drove! he could have got through an earring, the rascal! The brown side-horses, small, vivacious, black-eyed, black-legged, were fairly on fire, fairly gathered themselves together with nervous tension; if one had whistled, they would have vanished like a shot. The dark-bay shaft-horse stood firmly, with his neck curved like a swan's, his chest thrown forward, his legs like arrows; he shook his head and proudly screwed up his eyes.—Good! 'T was like some one taking a drive on the bright festival (Easter).

“Your Illustrious Highness! Deign to favour us!” cried Sítnikoff.

The Prince sprang from his cart. Khlopakóff slowly alighted on the other side.

“Good morning, brother. . . . Have you any horses?”

“Of course I have for Your Illustrious Highness. Be pleased to enter.—Pétya, bring out Peacock,—and let Meritorious be made ready. And you and I, dear little father,”—he continued, addressing me:—“will settle our business another time. . . . Fómka, a bench for His Illustrious Highness.”

Peacock was led out from a special stable, which I had not noticed before. The powerful dark-brown horse fairly reared with all four feet in the air. Sítnikoff even turned his head away and narrowed his eyes.

“Ugh, rrakalion!”—proclaimed Khlopakóff.—“Zhemsà ” (J'aime ça).

LEBEDYÁN

The Prince laughed.

Peacock was halted with difficulty: he fairly dragged the stablemen round the yard; at last they pressed him against the wall. He snorted, quivered, and gathered himself together, but Sítnikoff still teased him, flourishing a whip at him.

“Where art thou staring? I’ll give it to thee! ugh!” said the horse-dealer, with affectionate menace, himself involuntarily admiring his horse.

“How much?”—asked the Prince.

“For Your Illustrious Highness, five thousand.”

“Three.”

“Can’t be done, Your Illustrious Highness, upon my word—”

“You’ve been told three, rrakalion,” put in Khlopakóff.

I did not wait to see the end of the bargain, and went away. At the extreme end of the street I noticed at the gate of a greyish little house a large sheet of paper pasted up. At the top was a pen-and-ink sketch of a horse, with a tail in the shape of a trumpet and an endless neck, and under the horse’s hoofs stood the following words, written in old-fashioned script:

“For sale here, horses of various colours, brought to the Lebedyán fair from the well-known stud-farm on the steppe of Anastásey Ivánitch Tchernobáy, landed proprietor of Tambóff. These horses are of excellent form, perfectly trained, and of gentle disposition. Messrs. Buyers will be so good as to ask for Anastásey Ivánitch himself: should Anastásey Ivánitch be absent, then ask for his coachman, Nazár Kubýshkin. We beg the Messrs. Buyers to honour an old man."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I halted. "Come," I thought, "I'll take a look at the horses of the well-known horse-breeder, Mr. Tchernobáy."

I tried to enter the wicket-gate, but, contrary to custom, I found it locked. I knocked.

"Who's there? . . . . A buyer?"—piped a feminine voice.

"Yes."

"Directly, dear little father, directly."

The wicket opened. I beheld a peasant woman about fifty years of age, her hair uncovered, in boots and a sheepskin coat open on the breast.

"Please to enter, benefactor, and I'll go at once and announce you to Anastásey Ivánitch. . . . Nazár, hey, Nazár!"

"What's wanted?" mumbled the voice of an old man of seventy from the stable.

"Get the horses ready; a buyer has come."

The old woman ran into the house.

"A buyer, a buyer," Nazár growled after her in reply.—"I have n't got all their tails washed yet."

"Oh, Arkadia!" I thought.

LEBEDYÁN

“Good morning, dear little father, I beg your favour,”—a succulent and agreeable voice resounded behind my back. I glanced round: in front of me, in a long-skirted, blue cloak, stood an old man of medium height, with white hair, an amiable smile, and very handsome blue eyes.

“Didst thou want a horse? Certainly, dear little father, certainly. . . . But wilt not thou first come in and drink a cup of tea with me?”

I declined, with thanks.

“Well, as thou wilt. Thou must excuse me, dear little father: I hold to the old-fashioned ways, seest thou?” (Mr. Tchernobáy spoke without haste, with a rotund pronunciation of the o.<sup>1</sup>)—“Everything about me is very simple, thou knowest. . . . Nazár, hey, Nazár,”—he added in a drawl, and without raising his voice.

Nazár, a wrinkled little old man with a hawk-like nose and a wedge-shaped little beard, made his appearance on the threshold of the stable.

“What sort of horses dost thou require, dear little father?” went on Mr. Tchernobáy.

“Some that are not too dear, well broken to harness, for my kibítka.”

“Very well—I have such . . . . certainly.

<sup>1</sup> Unless the accent—which is variable—happens to fall on the o, it is pronounced slightly, somewhat like a. This is the new-fangled, fashionable method. The other form indicates either rusticity, clinging to old fashions, or that the speaker belongs to the ecclesiastical class, the o being very rotund in the Old Slavonic, which is always used in the services of the Church.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

. . . Nazár, Nazár, show the gentleman the grey gelding, the one which stands at the end, thou knowest, and the bay with the star,—or no, not that one . . . . the other bay, the one of Beauty's get, knowest thou?"

Nazár went back into the stable.

"And do thou lead them out by their halters," shouted Mr. Tchernobáy after him.

"I don't do, dear little father," he went on, looking me frankly and gently in the face, "as horse-dealers do—confound them! they use ginger in various shapes, and salt and malt;<sup>1</sup> I wash my hands of them completely!—But I have everything aboveboard, without trickery, please to observe."

The horses were led out. I did not like them.

"Well, put them in their places, with God's blessing," said Anastásey Ivánitch. "Show us some others."

They showed some others. At last I selected one as cheap as possible. We began to haggle. Mr. Tchernobáy did not get heated, he talked so sensibly, with so much pompousness, that I could not help "honouring the old man"; I made a deposit.

"Well, now," said Anastásey Ivánitch:—"permit me, in accordance with ancient custom, to transfer the horse to thee from coat-skirt to coat-skirt. . . . Thou wilt thank me for it . . . .

<sup>1</sup> Salt and malt fatten a horse very quickly.

LEBEDYÁN

't is a fresh beast, sound as a nut . . . . without a flaw . . . . a gen-u-ine horse of the steppe!
It will go in any harness."

He crossed himself, laid the skirt of his great cloak on his hand, took the halter and transferred the horse to me.

"Possess it, with God's blessing, now. . . .
And thou still dost not wish any tea?"

"No, I'm greatly obliged to you: it is time I was going home."

"As thou wilt. . . . And shall my coachman lead the horse after thee now?"

"Yes, now, if you will permit."

"Certainly, my dear man, certainly. . . .
Vasily, hey, Vasily, go with the gentleman; lead the horse, and receive the money. Well, goodbye, dear little father, God bless thee."

"Good-bye, Anastásey Ivánitch."

My horse was led home. On the following day, it turned out to be foundered and lame. I undertook to harness it: my horse backed, and it was struck with the whip; it began to balk, kick, and lie down. I betook myself at once to Mr.
Tchernobáy. I asked:

"Is he at home?"

"He is."

"What do you mean by it?" said I:—"you have sold me a foundered horse."

"Foundered?—God forbid!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“And it’s lame to boot, and balks into the bargain.”

“Lame? I know nothing about that; evidently thy coachman has ruined it somehow,—but, I, as in the sight of God—”

“By rights, Anastásey Ivánitch, you ought to take it back.”

“No, dear little father, don’t be angry: once the horse has left the yard—there’s an end of it. Thou shouldst have looked at it before.”

I understood how the land lay, submitted to my fate, laughed, and departed. Fortunately, I had not paid so very dear for my lesson.

Two days later I drove away, and after the lapse of a week I passed through Lebedyán on my way home. In the coffee-house I found nearly the same persons as before, and Prince N. at the billiard-table. But the customary change in Mr. Khlopakóff’s fate had already had time to take place. The fair-haired young officer had replaced him in the Prince’s favour. The poor ex-lieutenant made an effort to set off his little word once more in my presence,—perchance, thought he, it will please as heretofore,—but the Prince not only did not smile, he even frowned and shrugged his shoulders. Mr. Khlopakóff dropped his eyes, shrunk together, stole into a corner, and began softly to stuff his pipe full. . . . .

II

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA AND HER NEPHEW

GIVE me your hand, my amiable reader, and come with me. The weather is magnificent; the May sky is of a soft azure hue; the smooth, young leaves of the willows glisten as though they had been washed; the broad, level road is all covered with that fine, reddish-bladed grass which the sheep are so fond of nibbling; to right and left, on the long declivities of the sloping hills, the green rye is waving gently; the shadows of small cloudlets slip across it in thin splotches. In the distance forests darkle, ponds glimmer, villages gleam yellow; larks soar upward by hundreds, warble, fall headlong downward, and perch upon small clods with outstretched necks; daws halt on the highway, stare at you, and cower down to the ground; they allow you to pass, and, giving a couple of hops, fly off to one side; on the height, beyond the ravine, a peasant is ploughing; a piebald colt, with a stubby tail and dishevelled mane, is running on unsteady legs after its mother; its shrill neighing is audible. We drive into a birch coppice; the strong, fresh odour agreeably oppresses our breath. Here is the boundary-fence; the coachman descends from his seat, the horses snort, the side-horses glance around, the shaft-horse flirts his tail, and leans his head against the arch<sup>1</sup> . . . . . the rude bars open with a squeak. The coachman resumes his seat. . . . Drive on! ahead of us is a village. After passing five homesteads, we turn to the right, descend into a hollow, and drive on the dam. Beyond the small pond, from behind the rounded heads of apple-trees and lilac-bushes, a board roof which has once been red, with two chimneys, is visible. The coachman directs his course along the fence to the left; accompanied by the hoarse and yelping barks of very aged curs, he drives through the wide-open gate, dashes adroitly round the spacious yard, past the stables and carriage-houses, bestows a swaggering bow upon the old housekeeper, who is stepping sideways over the lofty threshold into the open door of the storehouse, and draws up, at last, in front of the small porch of a tiny, dark house, with bright windows. . . . . We are at Tatyána Borísovna's. And yonder is she herself, opening the hinged pane, and nodding to us. . . . . Good morning, mátushka!<sup>2</sup>

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tatyána Borísovna is a woman about fifty years of age, with large, grey, prominent eyes, a rather blunt nose, red cheeks, and a double chin.

<sup>1</sup>The arch connecting the shafts.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup>Literally, "Dear little mother"; an affectionately respectful mode of address for any woman, of any class.—TRANSLATOR.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

Her face breathes forth welcome and cordiality. She was married oncé, but soon was left a widow. Tatyána Borísovna is an extremely remarkable woman. She resides on her tiny estate, never leaves it, has very little intercourse with her neighbours, and receives and likes only young people. She was the daughter of very poor gentry, and received no education whatever,—that is to say, she does not speak French; she has never even been in Moscow,—and, despite all these defects, she bears herself so simply and finely, she feels and thinks so freely, she is so little infected with the ordinary infirmities of the petty landed proprietress, that, in truth, it is impossible not to feel amazed. . . . And, in fact, think of a woman who lives the year round in the country, in the wilds—and does not gossip, does not squeal, does not courtesy, does not get excited, does not choke, does not quiver with curiosity. . . . She's a marvel! She generally wears a grey taffeta gown and a white cap with pendent lilac ribbons; she is fond of good eating, but not to excess; she leaves the preparation of preserves and dried and salted provisions to the housekeeper. “What does she do all day long?” you ask. . . . “Does she read?”—No, she does not read; and, to tell the truth, books are not printed for her benefit. . . . If she has no visitors, my Tatyána Borísovna sits at the window and knits stockings in winter; in summer

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

she strolls in the garden, plants and waters her flowers, plays with the kittens for hours together, feeds the pigeons. . . . She occupies herself very little with the housekeeping. But if a guest comes, some young neighbour whom she likes, then Tatyána Borísovna brightens up all over; she gives him a seat, treats him to tea, listens to his stories, laughs, pats him on the cheek from time to time, but she herself says little: in calamity, in grief, she will comfort, will give good advice. How many people have confided to her their domestic, their intimate secrets, and have wept in her arms! She will seat herself opposite a guest, lean softly on her elbows, and gaze into his eyes with so much sympathy, will smile in so friendly a manner, that the thought will, inevitably, occur to the visitor: "What a splendid woman thou art, Tatyána Borísovna! Come now, I'll tell thee what I have on my heart." A man feels at ease and warm in her small, cosy rooms; the weather is always fine in her house, if one may so express one's self. A wonderful woman is Tatyána Borísovna, but no one is surprised at her: her sound sense, firmness, and freedom, her ardent sympathy with the woes and joys of other people, in a word, all her fine qualities seem to have been born with her, to have cost her no labour or anxiety. . . . It is impossible to imagine her otherwise; consequently, there is nothing to thank her for. She is particularly fond of watching the games and pranks of young people; she will fold her hands on her lap, lay her head on one side, screw up her eyes, and sit smiling; then, all of a sudden, she will sigh and say: "Akh, you, my children, children!" . . . . . So that you feel like going to her, and taking her hand, and saying to her: "Listen, Tatyána Borísovna, you don't know your own value, for, with all your simplicity and lack of education, you are a remarkable being!" Her very name has a sort of familiar, cordial ring, one utters it with pleasure, it evokes a friendly smile. How many times has it happened to me, for instance, to ask a peasant whom I chanced to meet: "How am I to get to Gratchyóvko," let us say, "brother?"—"Well, dear little father, do you go first to Vyazovóe, and thence to Tatyána Borísovna's, and from Tatyána Borísovna's any one will point out the way to you." And at the name of Tatyána Borísovna the peasant will shake his head in quite a peculiar manner. She keeps only a small staff of servants, in consonance with her means. In the house, the laundry, storeroom, and kitchen are under the charge of the housekeeper, Agáfya, formerly her nurse, an extremely good-hearted, tearful, and toothless creature; two buxom maids, with strong, purplish-red cheeks, after the pattern of Antónoff (winter) apples, are under her orders. The duties of valet, butler, and pantry-man are discharged by Polikárp, a servant of seventy years, a remarkably eccentric person, a well-read man, a former violinist and worshipper of Viotti, a personal foe of Napoleon, or, as he says, of "Bonapartíshka,"<sup>1</sup> and a passionate adorer of nightingales. He always keeps five or six of them in his room; early in the spring, he sits beside their cages for whole days at a time, awaiting their first "warble"; and when it comes he covers his face with his hands and moans: "Okh, 't is pitiful, pitiful!"—and begins to weep as though his heart would break. Polikárp's grandson, Vása, a lad of twelve years, curly-haired and keen-eyed, is appointed to assist him; Polikárp loves him unboundedly, and grumbles at him from morning until night. But he busies himself with his education.—"Vása,"—he says, "tell me: is Bonapartíshka a brigand?"—"What wilt thou give, daddy?"—"What will I give? . . . I won't give thee anything. . . Who art thou, I'd like to know? Art thou a Russian?"—"I'm an Amtchanín, daddy; I was born in Amtchénsk."<sup>2</sup> "Oh, stupid head! and where's Amtchénsk?"—"How should I know!"—"Is Amtchénsk in Russia, stupid?"—"Well, and if it is in Russia, what then?"—"What dost thou mean by 'what

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup> The diminutive of scorn and utter worthlessness ends thus in shka.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup> In popular speech, the town of Mzensk is called Amtchénsk, and its citizens Amtcháni. The Amtcháni men are daring; not without reason is an enemy with us promised "an amtchanín."

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

then ' ? His Illustrious Highness the late Prince Mikhaílo Ilariónovitch Goleníshshtcheff-Kutúzoff-Smolénsky, with the help of God, was pleased to expel Bonapartíshka from the confines of Russia. On that occasion, also, the ballad was composed: ' Bonaparte does n't feel like dancing, he has lost his garters.' . . . . Dost understand? He freed thy fatherland."—" And what care I for that? "—" Akh, thou stupid boy, thou stupid! Why, if the most illustrious Prince Mikhaílo Ilariónovitch had not chased out Bonapartíshka, some ' mossoo ' or other would be whacking thee over the head with a stick, seest thou? He would come up to thee and say: ' Coman vu porte vu? '—and whack, whack!"—" Then I 'd hit him in the belly with my fist."—" And he 'd say to thee: ' Bonzhur, vene isi, '—and he 'd grab thee by the hair, by the hair!"—" And I 'd stamp on his feet, his feet, his knobby feet."—" That 's so, they do have knobby feet. . . . Well, and when he began to bind thy arms, what wouldst thou do then? "—" I would n't let him: I 'd call Mikhéi the coachman to my assistance."—" And dost thou think, Vása, that the Frenchman could not overpower Mikhéi? "—" Overpower him, indeed! just see how robust Mikhéi is!"—" Well, and what would you two do to him? "—" We 'd beat him on his back,—yes, on his back."—" And he 'd begin to shriek: ' Pardon! pardon, pardon, sivuplay! ' "—" And we 'd say to him: 'No sivuplay for thee, thou damned Frenchman! . . .'" "Brave lad, Vása! . . . Come, now, shout: 'Bonapartíshka is a brigand!'"—"Then do thou give me some sugar!"—"What a boy!" . . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tatyána Borísovna consorts very little with the landed proprietors: they go to her reluctantly, and she does not know how to entertain them; she falls into a doze at the noise of their remarks, gives a start, makes an effort to open her eyes, and again relapses into slumber. In general, Tatyána Borísovna is not fond of women. One of her friends, a fine, peaceable young man, had a sister, an old maid of eight and thirty years and a half, the kindest of beings, but unnatural, affected, and given to enthusiasms. Her brother frequently narrated to her anecdotes of their neighbour. One fine morning, my old maid, without saying a word to any one, ordered her horse to be saddled, and set out to see Tatyána Borísovna. In her long habit, with her hat on her head and a green veil and curls floating, she entered the anteroom, and dodging the panic-stricken Vása, who took her for a water-nymph, she ran into the drawing-room. Tatyána Borísovna was frightened, and tried to rise, but her limbs gave way beneath her.—"Tatyána Borísovna,"—began the visitor, in a tone of entreaty, "excuse my boldness; I am the sister of your friend, Alexyéi Nikoláevitch K * * *, and I have heard so much about you from him, that I made up my mind to become acquainted with you.”—“ I feel greatly honoured,” murmured the astounded hostess. The visitor threw off her hat, shook back her curls, seated herself beside Tatyána Borísovna, and took her hand. . . . “ So, this is she,”—she began in a pensive, touched voice:—“ this is that good, serene, noble, holy being! This is she! this simple and, at the same time, profound woman! How glad I am, how glad I am! How we shall love each other! I shall rest, at last. . . . She is exactly as I have pictured her to myself,”—she added, in a whisper, boring her eyes into the eyes of Tatyána Borísovna. “ You will not be angry with me, will you, my kind, my good one!”—“ Really, I am very glad. . . . Would not you like some tea?”—The visitor smiled condescendingly.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

“ Wie wahr, wie unreflechirt,”—she whispered, as though to herself. “ Permit me to embrace you, my dear.”

The old maid sat for three hours with Tatyána Borísovna, and never held her peace for a moment. She tried to expound to her new acquaintance her own significance. . . . Immediately after the departure of the unexpected visitor, the poor gentlewoman betook herself to the bath, drank a dose of linden-flower tea, and went to bed. But on the following day, the old maid returned, sat four hours, and withdrew promising to visit

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tatyána Borísovna every day. You will please to observe, that she had taken it into her head to develop, to put the finishing touches to the education of such a rich nature, as she expressed herself; and, probably, she would have completely exhausted it in the end, had it not been for the fact that, in the first place, she got “utterly” disenchanted as to her brother’s friend in the course of a fortnight; and, in the second place, if she had not fallen in love with a passing student, with whom she instantly entered into an active and ardent correspondence; in her epistles, as was fitting, she blessed him for a holy and most beautiful life, offered “the whole of herself” as a sacrifice, demanded only the name of sister, plunged into descriptions of nature, alluded to Goethe, Schiller, Bettina, and German philosophy,—and, at last, drove the poor young man to grim despair. But youth asserted its rights: one fine morning, he awoke with such exasperated hatred for his “sister and best friend,” that he came near knocking his valet down, in the heat of passion, and, for a long time, all but bit at the slightest hint about exalted and disinterested love. . . . But, from that time forth Tatyána Borísovna began more than ever to avoid intimacy with her neighbours.

Alas! nothing is stable upon earth. Everything which I have related concerning my kind gentlewoman’s mode of life is a thing of the past; the tranquillity which reigned in her house has been destroyed forever. For more than a year now, her nephew, an artist from Petersburg, has been living with her. This is the way it came about.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

Eight years ago, there lived with Tatyána Borísovna a boy of twelve, orphaned of father and mother, Andriúsha, the son of her deceased brother. Andriúsha had large, bright, humid eyes, a tiny mouth, a regular nose, and a very handsome, lofty brow. He spoke in a soft, sweet voice, kept himself tidy and decorous, was cordial and attentive to visitors, and kissed his aunt's hand with an orphan's sensibility. No sooner would you make your appearance than, lo and behold, he was already bringing you an arm-chair. He never played any pranks at all; he never made any noise; he would sit by himself in a corner, over his book, so modestly and submissively, and not even lean against the back of the chair. A visitor would enter,—my Andriúsha would rise, smile courteously, and flush; the visitor would leave the room;—he would seat himself again, pull a little brush and mirror from his pocket, and arrange his hair. He had felt an inclination for drawing from his earliest years. If a scrap of paper fell into his hands, he would immediately ask Agáfya the housekeeper for her scissors, carefully cut from the paper a regular square, draw a narrow frame around it, and set to work; he would draw an eye with a huge pupil, or a Grecian nose, or a house with a chimney and smoke in the form of a screw, a dog "en face," resembling a bench, a tree with two doves, and sign it: "Drawn by Andréi Byelovzóroff, on such a date, of such a year, village of Máliya Brýki." He toiled with particular zeal, for a couple of weeks before Tatyána Borísovna's name-day,<sup>1</sup> was the first to present himself to congratulate her, and offered a roll tied up with a pink ribbon. . Tatyána Borísovna kissed her nephew on the brow, and untied the knot; the roll spread out, and disclosed to the curious view of the spectator a round temple with an altar in the middle, boldly washed in in India ink; on the altar lay a flaming heart and a wreath, and above, on an undulating scroll, in plain letters, stood written: "To my aunt and benefactress Tatyána Borísovna Bogdánoff, from her respectful and loving nephew, in token of the most profound devotion." Tatyána Borísovna kissed him again and gave him a ruble. But she felt no great affection for him: Andriúsha's obsequiousness did not altogether please her. In the meantime, Andriúsha was growing up; Tatyána Borísovna was beginning to grow anxious as to his future. An unexpected event rescued her from her dilemma. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup>The name-day—the day of the Saint after whom a person is named—is celebrated instead of the birthday.—TRANSLATOR.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

To wit: one day, eight years ago, a certain Mr. Benevolénsky, a collegiate assessor<sup>1</sup> and cavalier of an order, dropped in to call. Mr. Benevolénsky had formerly been in the service in the neighbouring county town, and had been an assiduous visitor at Tatyána Borísovna's; he had removed to Petersburg, had entered a ministry, had attained to a fairly important post, and during one of his frequent trips on government business he had recalled his old friend, and dropped in to see her, with the intention of resting for a couple of days from the cares of the service, "in the lap of rustic tranquillity." Tatyána Borísovna received him with her habitual cordiality, and Mr. Benevolénsky . . . . But before we go on with our story, permit us, dear reader, to make you acquainted with this new person.

Mr. Benevolénsky was a rather fat man, of medium height, soft in aspect, with small, short feet, and plump little hands; he wore a capacious and extremely neat swallow-tailed coat, a tall and broad neckerchief, snow-white linen, a gold chain on his silk waistcoat, a ring with a stone on his forefinger, and a blond wig; he talked persuasively and gently, walked noiselessly, smiled pleasantly, rolled his eyes about pleasantly, plunged his chin into his neckerchief pleasantly: altogether, he was a pleasant man. The Lord had also endowed him with the kindest of hearts: he wept and went into raptures easily; above all, he burned with disinterested ardour for art, and this ardour was genuinely disinterested, for, if the truth must be told, it was precisely in the matter of art that Mr. Benevolénsky had positively no understanding whatsoever. One even marvelled whence, by virtue of what mysterious and incomprehensible laws, he had become infected with that passion. Apparently, he was a sedate, even a commonplace man . . . . . however, there are quite a good many such people among us in Russia.

<sup>1</sup>Grade No. 8, corresponding to the (former) title of Major, in Peter the Great's famous Table of Ranks. There are fourteen grades in all.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Love for art and artists imparts to these people an inexplicable mawkishness; it is torture to know them, to converse with them: they are regular blockheads smeared with honey. For example, they never call Raphael Raphael, or Correggio Correggio: they say, "the divine Sanzio, the incomparable de Allegris," and invariably they pronounce their o's broadly. They laud every homespun, conceited, over-elaborated and mediocre talent as a genius, or, to be more accurate, "janius"; the blue sky of Italy, the southern lemon, the perfumed gales of the shores of the Brenta, are eternally on their lips. "Ekh, Ványa, Ványa," or "Ekh, Sásha, Sásha," they say to each other with ecstasy, "we ought to go to the south, to the southland . . . for you and I are Greeks in spirit, ancient Greeks!" They may be observed at exhibitions, in front of the productions of certain Russian painters. (We must remark, that the majority of these gentlemen are frightfully patriotic.) First they retreat a pace, and loll their heads on one side, then they approach the picture again; their little eyes become suffused with an oily moisture. . . "Phew, O my God,"—they say, at last, in a voice broken with emotion,—“what soul, what soul! What heart, what heart! how much soul he has put into it! a vast amount of soul! . . . . And how it is conceived! conceived in a masterly manner!”—And what pictures they have in their own drawing-rooms! What artists frequent them of an evening, drink their tea, listen to their conversation! What perspective views of their own rooms they offer them, with a brush in the right foreground, a pile of dirt on the polished floor, a yellow samovár on a table by the window, and the master of the house himself, in dressing-gown and skull-cap, with a brilliant spot of light on his cheek! What long-haired nurslings of the Muses, with feverishly-scornful smile, visit them! What pale-green young ladies squeal at their pianos! For that is the established order of things with us in Russia: a man cannot devote himself to one art alone—give him all! Hence, it is not in the least surprising, that these gentlemen-amateurs also display great patronage to Russian literature, especially to dramatic literature. . . . The "Jacob Sanpasaros" are written for them; the conflict of unrecognised talent with people, with the whole world, which has been depicted a thousand times, shakes them to the very bottom of the soul. . . .

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

On the day following the arrival of Mr. Benevolénsky, Tatyána Borísovna, at tea, commanded her nephew to show the visitor his drawings. "And does your relative draw?" ejaculated Mr. Benevolénsky, not without surprise, and turned sympathetically to Andriúsha. "Certainly he does!"—said Tatyána Borísovna:—"he's so fond of it! and he does it all alone, without any teacher, you know."—"Akh, show me, show me,"—interposed Mr. Benevolénsky. Andriúsha, blushing and smiling, brought his sketch-book to the visitor. Mr. Benevolénsky began, with the air of a connoisseur, to turn over the leaves. "Good, young man,"—he said at last:—"Good, very good." And he stroked Andriúsha's head. Andriúsha kissed his hand on the fly.—"Just see, what talent! . . . . I congratulate you, Tatyána Borísovna, I congratulate you!"—"But what is to be done, Piótr Mikhaílitch? I cannot find any teacher for him here. It costs too much to have one come from town; there is an artist at my neighbours', the Artamónoffs, and a capital one he is, they say, but the lady forbids him to give lessons to outsiders. She says he will spoil his taste.”—“H’m,”—ejaculated Mr. Benevolénsky, as he fell to meditating, and cast sidelong glances at Andriúsha. “Well, we will talk the matter over,”—he suddenly added, rubbing his hands. That same day he requested permission of Tatyána Borísovna to have a private conversation with her. They locked themselves up. Half an hour later, they called Andriúsha. Andriúsha entered. Mr. Benevolénsky was standing at the window, with his face slightly flushed and his eyes beaming. Tatyána Borísovna was sitting in one corner, and wiping away her tears.—“Well, Andriúsha,”—she began at last:—“thank Piótr Mikhaílitch: he is going to take thee under his charge, and carry thee off to Petersburg.” Andriúsha was fairly petrified where he stood.—“Tell me frankly,”—began Mr. Benevolénsky, in a voice permeated with dignity and condescension:—“Do you wish to become an artist, young man, do you feel a sacred vocation for art?”—“I do want to be an artist, Piótr Mikhaílitch,”—affirmed Andriúsha, tremulously.—“In that case, I am very glad. Of course,”—pursued Mr. Benevolénsky,—“you will find it hard to part from your respected aunt; you must feel the liveliest gratitude to her.”—“I adore my aunty,”—Andriúsha interrupted him, blinking his eyes.—“Of course, of course, that is very natural and does you much honour; but, on the other hand, just imagine, what joy, in course of time . . . . your successes. . .”—“Embrace me, Andriúsha,”—murmured the kind lady. Andriúsha flung himself on her neck.—“Well, and now thank thy benefactor. . . .” Andriúsha embraced Mr. Benevolénsky’s paunch, raised himself on tiptoe, and so managed to grasp his hand, which the benefactor, truth to tell, accepted, yet made no great haste to accept. . . . The child must be soothed, satisfied,—well, and one may indulge one’s self also. Two days later Mr. Benevolénsky departed, and carried with him his new protégé.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

During the first three years of his absence, Andriúsha wrote with tolerable frequency, sometimes enclosing drawings in his letters. Mr. Benevolénsky occasionally added also a few words from himself, chiefly of approval; then the letters became more and more infrequent, and, at last, ceased altogether. Tatyána Borísovna’s nephew maintained silence for a whole year: she had already begun to worry, when, suddenly, she received a note whose contents were as follows:

“DEAR AUNTY!

“Two days ago, Piótr Mikhaílovitch, my benefactor, died. A severe shock of paralysis has deprived me of my last support. Of course, I am already twenty years of age; in the course of seven years I have made notable progress; I have strong hopes of my talent and can earn my living by means of it; I am not downcast, but, nevertheless, if you can, send me, for present expenses, two hundred and fifty rubles. I kiss your hands, and remain,"—and so forth.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

Tatyána Borísovna sent her nephew the two hundred and fifty rubles. Two months later, he demanded some more; she gathered together her last resources, and sent again. Six weeks had not elapsed after the last despatch, when he asked for the third time, nominally for the purpose of purchasing paints for a portrait which a Princess Terteréshneff had ordered from him. Tatyána Borísovna refused. "In that case," he wrote to her, "I intend to come to you, in the country, to recuperate my health." And, in fact, in the month of May of that same year, Andriúsha returned to Máliya Brýki.

At first, Tatyána Borísovna did not recognise him. From his letters, she had expected a thin and sickly man, but she beheld a broad-shouldered, stout young fellow, with a broad, red face and curly, greasy hair. The pale, slender Andriúsha had been converted into sturdy Andréi Ivánoff Byelovzóroff. His external appearance was not the only thing in him which had undergone a change. The sensitive shyness, the caution and neatness of former years, had been replaced by a careless swagger, by intolerable slovenliness; he swayed to right and left as he walked, flung himself into arm-chairs, sprawled over the table, lolled, yawned to the full extent of his jaws, and behaved impudently to his aunt and the servants,—as much as to say: “I’m an artist, a free kazák! I’ll show you what stuff I’m made of!” For whole days together, he would not take a brush in his hand; when the so-called inspiration came upon him, he would behave as wildly as though he were intoxicated, painfully, awkwardly, noisily; his cheeks would burn with a coarse flush, his eyes would grow inebriated; he would set to prating about his talent, his successes, of how he was developing and advancing. . . . But, as a matter of fact, it turned out that his gift barely sufficed for tolerably fair petty portraits. He was an utter ignoramus, he had read nothing; and why should an artist read? Nature, freedom, poetry,—those are his elements. So, shake thy curls, and chatter away volubly, and inhale Zhukóff<sup>1</sup> with frenzy! Russian swagger is a good thing, but it is not becoming to many; and talentless second-rate Polezháeff’s are intolerable. Our Andréi Ivánitch continued to live at his aunt’s: evidently, gratuitous food was to his taste. He inspired visitors with deadly ennui. He would seat himself at the piano (Tatyána Borísovna had set up a piano also) and begin to pick out with one finger "The dashing Tróika"; he would strike chords, and thump the keys; for hours at a stretch he would howl Varlámoff's romances "The solitary Pine," or "No, Doctor, no, do not come," and the fat would close over his eyes, and his cheeks would shine like a drum. . . . And then, suddenly, he would thunder: "Be-gone, ye tumults of passion!" . . . And Tatyána Borísovna would fairly jump in dismay.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup> The coarsest sort of tobacco.—TRANSLATOR.

TATYÁNA BORÍSOVNA

"'T is extraordinary,"—she remarked to me one day,—“ what songs are composed nowadays, —they are all so despairing, somehow; in my day, they used to compose a different sort: there were sad ones then too, but it was always agreeable to listen to them. . . . For example:

“ Come, come to me in the meadow,
Where I wait for thee in vain;
Come, come to me in the meadow,
Where my tears flow hour after hour . . . .
Alas, thou wilt come to me in the meadow,
But then 't will be too late, dear friend!”

Tatyána Borísovna smiled guilefully.

“ “ I shall suf-fer, I shall suf-fer, ’ ” howled her nephew in the adjoining room.

“ Stop that, Andriúsha! ”

“ “ My soul is lan-guishing in part-ing, ’ ” continued the irrepressible singer.

Tatyána Borísovna shook her head.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“ Okh, those artists!” . . . .

A year has passed since then. Byelovzóroff is still living with his aunt, and still preparing to go to Petersburg. He has become broader than he is long in the country. His aunt—who would have thought it?—is perfectly devoted to him, and the young girls of the neighbourhood fall in love with him. . . .

Many of Tatyána Borísovna’s former acquaintances have ceased to visit her.

III

DEATH

I HAVE a neighbour, a young agriculturist and young sportsman. One fine morning I dropped in on him for a call, on horseback, with the suggestion that we should set out together in quest of woodcock. He consented. "Only," said he, "let us go through my tract of second growth of trees to the Zúsha; I'll take a look at Tchaplygino by the way. Do you know my oak forest? It is being felled."—"Come on."—He ordered his horse to be saddled, donned a green surtout with bronze buttons representing boars' heads, a game-bag embroidered in worsted, and a silver flask, threw over his shoulder a rather new French gun, turned himself about, not without pleasure, in front of the mirror, and called his dog Espérance, which had been presented him by his cousin, an old maid with an excellent heart, but without any hair. We set out. My neighbour took with him the village policeman Arkhip, a fat and extremely short peasant with a square face and cheek-bones of antediluvian development, and a recently-engaged superintendent from the Baltic provinces, a young fellow of nineteen years, thin, fair-haired, mole-eyed, with sloping shoulders, and a long neck, Mr. Gottlieb von der Koch. My neighbour himself had entered into possession of his estate not long before. It had come to him by inheritance from his aunt, the wife of Councillor of State <sup>1</sup> Kardón-Katáeff, a remarkably fat woman, who, even when she was lying in bed, groaned in a prolonged and plaintive manner. We rode into the tract of second growth trees. "Wait for me here, in the glade," said Ardalión Mikhaílitch (my neighbour), turning to his satellites. The German bowed, slipped off his horse, pulled a small book from his pocket, apparently a romance by Johann Schopenhauer, and sat down under a bush; Arkhíp remained in the sun, and never moved for the space of an hour. We made a circuit through the bushes, and found not a single covey. Ardalión Mikhaílitch announced that he intended to betake himself to the forest. For some reason or other, I myself had no faith in the success of our hunt on that day: I wended my way after him. The German noted his page, rose, put the book in his pocket, and mounted, not without difficulty, his bob-tailed, imperfect mare, which squealed and kicked out at the slightest touch; Arkhíp gave a start, jerked both reins simultaneously, flung his feet about, and, at last, <sup>1</sup> The fifth grade from the top, in Peter the Great's Table of Ranks.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

DEATH

got his stupefied and spiritless little nag to move from the spot. We rode off.

Ardali6n Mikha6litch's forest had been familiar to me from my childhood. In company with my French tutor, M—r. D6sire Fleury, the kindest of men (who, nevertheless, came near ruining my health for life, by making me drink De Roy's potion of an evening), I frequently walked to Tchaplygino. The entire forest consisted of about two or three hundred enormous oak-trees and maples. Their stately, mighty boles darkled magnificently against the translucent golden-green of the hickories and mountain-ashes; they rose higher, outlined themselves gracefully against the clear azure, and there, at last, flung wide the canopy of their broad, gnarled boughs; hawks, honey-buzzards, kestrels soared whistling over the motionless crests, spotted woodpeckers tapped vigorously on the thick bark; the resonant song of the black thrush suddenly rang forth in the dense foliage, following the variable cry of the oriole; down below, in the bushes, hedge-sparrows, finches, and pewits twittered and warbled; chaffinches hopped briskly along the paths; a white hare stole along the edge of the woods, cautiously "limping"; a reddish-brown squirrel leaped in an offhand way from tree to tree, and suddenly sat down, with tail aloft, over our heads. In the grass, near the tall ant-hills, beneath the light shadow of the deeply dented beautiful fronds of the ferns, violets and lilies of the valley bloomed, and mushrooms of various sorts; and crimson fly-agaric grew; in the little glades, amid the bushes, strawberries gleamed red. . . And what shade there was in the forest! In the very height of the heat, at noonday, it was perfect night: silence, perfume, coolness. . . . Cheerfully had I passed the time in Tchaplygino, and therefore, I confess, it was not without a feeling of sadness that I now rode into the forest which was but too familiar to me. The pernicious, snowless winter of 1840 had not spared my old friends, the oaks and maples; withered, stripped bare, here and there covered with consumptive foliage, they drooped mournfully over the young coppice which had "taken their place but not replaced them."<sup>1</sup> Some, still clothed with leaves below, reared their lifeless, broken boughs aloft as though with reproach and despair; in the case of others, from the foliage, still tolerably dense, though not abundant, not copious as of yore, thick, dry, dead branches protruded; the bark of others had fallen at a dis-

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup> In the year 1840, although there was a most rigorous frost, no snow fell until the very end of December; all the crops were frozen, and many fine oak forests were ruined by that ruthless winter. It is difficult to replace them: the productive power of the soil is evidently lessening; on "forbidden" winter-killed lands (around which there had been a procession with holy pictures), in place of the former noble trees, birches and aspens are springing up of themselves; and with us no one knows how to propagate woods otherwise.

DEATH

tance; others still had fallen altogether, and were rotting, like corpses, on the ground. Who could have foreseen it—that it would be impossible to find shade—shade in Tchaplygino—anywhere! Well, I thought, as I gazed at the moribund trees: I think you must feel ashamed and bitter. . . . Koltzóff's<sup>1</sup> verse recurred to my mind:

“What has become
Of the lofty speech,
The haughty power,
Th' imperial valour?
Where now is thy Green might . . . .”

“Why is this, Ardalión Mikhaílitch,”—I began:—“Why did n't you fell these trees last year? You will not get a tenth part as much for them now, you see, as you would have got then.”

He merely shrugged his shoulders.

“You 'd better have asked my aunt;—but the merchants came, brought their money, and importuned her.”

“Mein Gott!”—von der Koch exclaimed at every step.—“Vat a prank! vat a prank!”

“What prank do you mean?”—remarked my neighbour, with a smile.

“Dat is, vat a peety, I meanttt to zay.” (It is a well-known fact, that all Germans, when they have at last mastered our letter l, with hard pronunciation, throw remarkable stress upon it.<sup>1</sup>)

<sup>1</sup> Alexyéi Vasílievitch Koltzóff (1809–1842), a writer of extremely original national ballads.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

His regret was particularly aroused by the oaks which lay on the ground,—and, as a matter of fact, any miller would have paid a high price for them. On the other hand, Arkhíp, the village policeman, maintained imperturbable composure, and did not grieve in the least; on the contrary, he leaped over them not without satisfaction, and lashed them with his whip.

We were making our way to the spot where the felling was in progress, when suddenly, following the noise of a falling tree, a shout and talking rang out, and a few moments later a young peasant, pale and dishevelled, sprang out of the thicket toward us.

“What’s the matter?—Whither art thou running?”—Ardalión Mikhaílitch asked him.

He immediately came to a halt.

“Akh, dear little father, Ardalión Mikhaílitch, ’t is a catastrophe!”

“What has happened?”

“Maxím, dear little father, has been hurt by a tree.”

“How did that happen? . . . Maxím the contractor?”

“Yes, the contractor, dear little father. We began to fell a maple, and he stood and watched. . . . He stood and stood, then went off to the well for water: he wanted a drink, you see; when, all at once, the maple began to crack and fell straight toward him. We shouted at him, 'Run, run, run!' . . . He ought to have leaped to one side, but he took and ran straight toward it . . . he must have got frightened. And the maple covered him with its upper boughs. And why it fell so suddenly,—the Lord knows. . . . The heart must have been rotten."

<sup>1</sup>The hard l is so difficult of pronunciation that some Russians renounce the attempt, and substitute oo: e. g., ooáshad (horse) for lóshad. The word here is khotyélll, and I have trebled the t to represent the author’s trebled l.—TRANSLATOR.

DEATH

"Well, and did it injure Maxím?"

"It did, dear little father."

"Mortally?"

"No, dear little father, he is still alive,—but what of that? it has broken his arms and legs. So I'm running for Selivéstritch,—for the doctor."

Ardalión Mikhaílitch ordered the policeman to gallop to the village for Selivéstritch, and he himself rode forward at a swift trot to the clearing. . . . I followed him.

We found poor Maxím on the ground. Half a score of peasants were standing around him. We alighted. He was hardly groaning; from time to time he opened and dilated his eyes, gazed around him, as though in surprise, and bit his lips, which were turning blue. . . . His chin quivered, his hair adhered to his brow, his chest heaved unevenly: he was dying. The light shade of a young linden flitted across his face.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

We bent over him. He recognised Ardali6n Mikha6litch.

“Dear little father,”—he began, in a barely audible tone:—“order . . . . the priest . . . . . to be sent for. . . . . The Lord . . . . has punished me . . . . my legs and arms are all smashed. . . . To-day . . . . is Sunday . . . . and I . . . . and I . . . . you see . . . did not let the lads go.”

He ceased speaking. His breath failed him.

“And give . . . . my money . . . . to my wife . . . . to my wife . . . . after deducting . . . . for my debts. . . On6sim here knows . . . . to whom I . . . . . am in debt.”

“We have sent for the doctor, Max6m,”—said my neighbour:—“perhaps thou wilt not die yet.”

He tried to open his eyes, and raised his lids and his eyebrows with the effort.

“Yes, I shall die. Yonder . . . . yonder it is tapping, yonder it is, yonder . . . . . Forgive me, my lads, if in anything . . . . .”

“God pardons thee, Max6m Andr6itch,”—said the peasants dully with one voice, and took off their caps:—“do thou forgive us.”

He suddenly shook his head in a desperate way, painfully heaved his chest, and lowered it again.

“But he cannot be left to die here,”—exclaimed Ardali6n Mikha6litch:—“fetch hither a mat from the cart yonder, my lads,—let’s carry him to the hospital.”

A couple of men rushed to the cart.

DEATH

“I bought a horse . . . yesterday,”—stammered the dying man,—“from Efrím . . . . Sytchóvsky . . . . I gave him . . . . a deposit . . . . so the horse is mine . . . . give it . . . . to my wife . . . . also . . . .”

They began to lay him on the mat . . . . he quivered all over like a bird which has been shot, and straightened himself. . . .

“He is dead,”—muttered the peasants.

We mounted our horses in silence, and rode away.

The death of poor Maxím caused me to reflect. 'T is wonderful how the Russian man dies! It is impossible to call his condition before the end indifference or stupidity; he dies, as though he were performing a rite, coldly and simply.

Several years ago, in the village of another of my neighbours, a peasant was fatally burned in the grain-kiln. (He would have remained in the kiln, but a petty burgher who was passing by dragged him out,—he threw himself into a vat of water, and with the force of his flight he burst open the door beneath the flaming shed.) I went to see him in his cottage. It was dark, stifling, smoky in the cottage. I inquired where the sick man was.—“Why, yonder, dear little father, on the oven-bench,”—answered the grieving peasant-wife in a sing-song tone. I stepped up to him—the man was lying there, covered with his sheepskin coat, breathing heavily.—“Well, how dost thou feel?”—The sick man fidgeted about on the oven, and tried to raise himself, but was covered with wounds and on the verge of death. "Lie still, lie still, lie still. . . . Well, how goes it? how art thou?"—"Bad, of course," said he.—"Art thou in pain?"—No answer.—"Dost thou want anything?"—No answer.—"Shall not I send thee some tea?"—"It is n't necessary."—I left him, and seated myself on the bench. I sat there for a quarter of an hour. I sat for half an hour,—the silence of the grave reigned in the cottage. In the corner, at the table beneath the holy pictures,<sup>1</sup> a little maiden of five years was hiding, and eating bread. The mother shook her finger at her now and then. People were walking about, pounding and chattering in the anteroom. The brother's wife was chopping up cabbage.—"Hey, Aksínya!"—said the sick man at last.—"What is it?"—"Give me some kvas."—Aksínya gave him the kvas. Again silence reigned. I asked in a whisper: "Has he received the communion?"—"Yes."—Well, then everything was in due order: he was waiting for death, that was all. I could not endure it, and left the house. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I remember, too, that I once dropped in at the hospital in the village of Krasnogórye, to see my acquaintance, Peasant-Surgeon Kapitón, an ardent sportsman.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> That is, in the right-hand corner, facing the door.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup> The German feldsherr, a doctor's assistant; or (in cases like the one here referred to) an independent doctor, for the peasants, with minor diploma.—TRANSLATOR.

DEATH

This hospital consisted of a former wing of the signiorial manor-house; the lady-owner of the estate herself had arranged it,—that is to say, she had given orders that over the door should be nailed up a blue board, with the inscription in white letters, “The Krasnogórye Hospital,” and she had personally handed to Kapitón a handsome album wherein to jot down the names of the patients. On the first page of this album one of the philanthropic benefactress’s dish-lickers and servile fawners had traced the following lines:

“ Dans ces beaux lieux, où règne l’allégresse,
Ce temple fut ouvert par la Beauté;
De vos seigneurs admirez la tendresse,
Bons habitants de Krasnogorié!”

And another gentleman had added below:

“ Et moi aussi j’aime la nature!
“JEAN KOBYLIÁTNIKOFF.”

The doctor had purchased six beds with his own money, and had started out, invoking a blessing on himself with the sign of the cross, to heal God’s people. There were, in addition to himself, two persons attached to the hospital: Pável the carver, who was subject to fits of insanity, and a peasant woman with a withered hand, Melikitrísa, who discharged the functions of cook. Both of them prepared the medicines, and dried and infused the herbs; they also restrained the fever patients. The crazy carver was gloomy of aspect, and parsimonious as to words: at night he was wont to sing a song about "Venus most fair," and to appeal to every passer-by for permission to wed a certain maiden, Malánya by name, who had long been dead. The cripple-handed peasant-wife beat him, and forced him to tend her turkeys. Well, then, I was sitting one day with Doctor Kapitón. We had begun to chat about our last hunt, when, suddenly, there drove into the yard a peasant-cart drawn by a remarkably fat grey horse, such as millers use. In the cart sat a robust peasant, in a new long-coat, and with a streaky beard.—"Hey there, Vasíly Dmítritch,"—shouted Kapitón from the window:—"pray come in . . . 'T is the miller from Lybóff"—he whispered to me. The peasant descended, grunting, from his cart, entered the doctor's room, sought the holy pictures with his eyes, and crossed himself.—"Well, what now, Vasíly Dmítritch, what's the news . . . But you must be ill: your face does n't look right."—"Yes, Kapitón Timoféitch, something's wrong."—"What's the matter with you?"—"Why, this, Kapitón Timoféitch. Not long ago, I bought a mill-stone in town: well, I brought it home, and when I began to unload it from the cart, I strained myself, probably, or something of the sort, and there was a ripping in my belly, as though something had broken . . . and ever since then I have been ailing all the time. To-day I even feel very bad.”—“H’m,”—said Kapitón, and took a pinch of snuff: “that means, you’ve ruptured yourself. And did this happen to you long since?”—“Why, ten days ago.”—“Ten days?” (The doctor inhaled the air through his teeth, and shook his head.) “Allow me to feel of you. . . . Well, Vasíly Dmítritch,” he said at last: “I’m sorry for thee, my dear fellow, but thou’rt in a bad way, thou’rt seriously ill; remain here with me; I will use every effort, but I will guarantee nothing.”—“Is it as bad as that?”—muttered the astonished miller.—“Yes, Vasíly Dmítritch, it is very bad; you ought to have come to me a couple of days earlier, and it would n’t have amounted to anything; I could have relieved you easily; but now there is inflammation, that’s what’s the matter: the first you know, gangrene will set in.”—“But it cannot be, Kapitón Timoféitch.”—“But I tell you it is so.”—“But why?”—(The doctor shrugged his shoulders.)—“And must I die from that trifle?”—“I don’t say that . . . . but do stay here.” The peasant meditated, meditated, stared at the floor, then at us, scratched his head, then caught up his cap. “Whither art thou going, Vasíly Dmítritch?”—“Whither? home, of course, if matters are as bad as that. I must make my arrangements, if that is so.”—“But, good heavens! you will do yourself an injury, Vasíly Dmítritch; I’m amazed that you managed to get here, as it is. Do stay.”— “No, brother, Kapitón Timoféitch, if I must die, then I’ll die at home; for if I were to die here, the Lord only knows what would happen at my house.”—“We don’t know, as yet, Vasíly Dmítritch, how the affair will turn out. . . . . There is danger, of course, very great danger, there’s no disputing that . . . . . but that is precisely the reason why you ought to remain.” (The peasant shook his head.)—“No, Kapitón Timoféitch, I will not stay . . . . . but won’t you prescribe some medicine?”—“Medicine alone will not help.”—“I won’t stay, I tell you.”—“Well, do as you please . . . . . only, look out, that you don’t blame me afterward!”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

DEATH

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

The doctor tore a leaf out of the album, and, having written a prescription, he advised him what to do in addition. The peasant took the paper, gave Kapitón half a ruble, left the room, and climbed into his cart.—“Well, good-bye, Kapitón Timoféitch; don’t bear me ill-will, and don’t forget my orphans, if anything . . . . .” “Hey, stay here, Vasíly!”—The peasant merely shook his head, slapped his horse with the reins, and drove out of the yard. I went out into the street and gazed after him. The road was muddy and full of holes; the miller drove cautiously, without haste, guiding the horse skilfully, and nodding to the persons whom he met. . . . . On the fourth day he died.

DEATH

On the whole, it is wonderful how Russians die. Many dead now recur to my mind. I recall thee, my old friend, Avenír Sorokóúmoff, my fellow-student, who did not finish his course, a fine, noble man! Again I behold thy consumptive, greenish face, thy thin, reddish hair, thy gentle smile, thy ecstatic glance, thy long limbs; I hear thy weak, caressing voice. Thou livedst with the Great Russian landed proprietor, Gur Kupryánikoff; thou didst teach his children, Fófa and Zyózo, to read and write Russian, together with geography and history; thou didst patiently endure the heavy jokes of Gur himself, the coarse amiability of the butler, the stale pranks of the malicious little boys; not without a bitter smile, but also without complaint, didst thou comply with the capricious demands of the bored lady of the manor; on the other hand, when thou wert resting, how blissfully happy wert thou in the evening, after supper, when, having rid thyself, at last, of all obligations and occupations, thou wert wont to seat thyself at the window, and pensively smoke thy pipe, or eagerly turn over the leaves of a mutilated and soiled number of the thick journal brought from town by the surveyor, the same sort of homeless wight as thyself! How pleased wert thou then by all poems and novels, how easily did the tears well up to thine eyes, with what pleasure didst thou laugh, with what genuine love for mankind, with what noble sympathy for everything that was good and beautiful was thy soul—pure as that of a child—permeated! I must say, to tell the truth, thou wert not distinguished for extraordinary wit; nature had not gifted thee with either memory or studiousness; in the university thou wert reckoned one of the worst students; at the lectures thou wert wont to sleep,—at the examinations, to maintain a solemn silence; but whose eyes beamed with joy, whose breath came short over the success, over the good fortune of a comrade?—Avenír's. . . . Who believed blindly in the lofty mission of his friends, who extolled them with pride, who defended them with obduracy? Who was it that knew neither envy nor self-love, who was it that disinterestedly sacrificed himself, who was it that willingly yielded submission to people who were not worth the soles of his shoes? . . . . Always thou, always thou, our kind Avenír! I remember, that thou badest thy comrades farewell with broken heart, when thou wert setting off to become a tutor; evil premonitions tormented thee. . . . And, in fact, thou didst fare but ill in the country; in the country there was no one for thee to listen to adoringly, no one to admire, no one to love. . . . And those steppe-dwellers and cultivated gentry treated thee like a teacher: some roughly, others carelessly. And moreover, thou didst not predispose in thy favour by thine appearance; thou wert shy, thou didst blush, cast down thine eyes, stammer. . . . The country air did not even restore thy health: thou didst melt away like a candle, poor fellow! Truth to tell, thy chamber looked on the garden; bird-cherry trees, apple-trees, linden-trees shed their light blossoms on thy table, on thy ink-bottle, on thy books; on the wall hung a little blue silk cushion for thy watch, given to thee at the hour of parting by a kind, sentimental little German governess with blonde curls and small blue eyes; sometimes an old friend from Moscow dropped in to see thee, and wrought thee to ecstasy by other people's verses, or even by his own; but solitude, the intolerable slavery of the teacher's calling, the impossibility of winning freedom, the endless autumns and winters, importunate illness. . . . Poor, poor Avenír!

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

DEATH

I visited Sorokoúmoff not long before his death. He was hardly able to walk. Squire Gur Kupryánikoff did not eject him from his house, but he ceased to pay him any salary, and hired another tutor for Zyózo. . . . Fófa had been sent off to the cadet school. Avenír was sitting by his window, in an old Voltaire chair. The weather was magnificent. The bright autumnal sky gleamed blue above the dark-brown row of naked lindens; here and there the last bright-yellow leaves on them were rustling and whispering. The earth, penetrated with frost, was sweating and thawing in the sun; its slanting crimson rays beat obliquely on the pale grass; one felt conscious of a slight crackling in the air; the voices of the labourers resounded clearly and intelligibly in the garden. Avenir wore an old Bukhará dressing-gown; a green neckerchief cast a deathly hue upon his dreadfully emaciated face. He was extremely delighted to see me, stretched out his hand, and began to speak, and to cough. I allowed him to quiet down, and seated myself beside him. . . . On Avenir's lap lay a note-book filled with poems of Koltzóff, carefully copied; he tapped it with the other hand. "There was a poet," he faltered, with an effort repressing his cough, and tried to declaim, in a barely audible voice:

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"Or hath the falcon
Fettered wings?
Or are his paths
All ordered?"

I stopped him: the doctor had forbidden him to talk. I knew what would please him. Sorokoumoff had never, as the saying is, "kept in touch" with science, but he was curious to know what the great minds had done, and how far they had got now. He would, sometimes, take a comrade off in one corner, and begin to interrogate him: he would listen, and marvel, and believe him implicitly, and then repeat it all after him. German philosophy in particular possessed a strong interest for him.—I began to talk to him about Hegel (this happened long ago, as you see). Avenír nodded his head affirmatively, elevated his eyebrows, smiled, whispered: “I understand, I understand . . . ah! good, good! . . .” The childlike curiosity of the poor, dying, homeless, and discarded fellow touched me to tears, I admit. I must remark, that Avenír, contrary to the habit of most consumptives, did not deceive himself in the least as to his malady . . . and what then? He did not sigh, he did not grieve, he did not even once refer to his condition. . . .

DEATH

Collecting his forces, he talked of Moscow, of his comrades, of Púshkin, of the theatre, and of Russian literature; he recalled our merry-makings, the heated discussions of our circle, with regret he mentioned the names of two or three friends who had died. . . .

“Dost thou remember Dáshá?”—he added at last:—“that was a soul of gold! that was a heart! and how she loved me! . . . What has become of her now?—I think she must have withered away, gone into a decline, has n’t she, poor girl?”

I did not dare to undeceive the sick man,—and, in fact, why should he know that his Dáshá was now twice as broad as she was long, and consorted with merchants—with the brothers Kondatchkóff, powdered and painted herself, squealed and wrangled?

“But,” I said to myself, as I gazed at his exhausted face, "cannot he be got away from here? Perhaps there is still a possibility of curing him . . . ." But Avenir did not permit me to finish my proposal.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"No, brother, thanks,"—he said:—"it makes no difference where I die. I certainly shall not survive until the winter. . . . Why disturb people unnecessarily? I have become accustomed to this house. To tell the truth, the master and mistress here are . . . ."

"Are unkind, thou meanest?" I interpolated.

"No, not unkind! they are wooden creatures, somehow. However, I cannot complain of them. There are neighbours: Landed Proprietor Kasátkin has a daughter, a cultivated, amiable, extremely kind young girl . . . . not proud . . . ."

Again Sorokóúmoff had a fit of coughing.

"Nothing would matter,"—he went on, after resting:—"if I were only permitted to smoke my pipe. . . . But I'm not going to die like this. I will smoke my pipe!"—he added, with a sly wink.—"Thank God, I've lived enough, enough. I've known good people. . . ."

"But thou shouldst write to thy relatives,"—I interrupted him.

"What's the good of writing to my relatives? So far as helping is concerned,—they won't help me; when I die, they will hear of it. But what's the use of talking about this. . . . Tell me, rather, what hast thou seen abroad?"

DEATH

I began to narrate. He fairly bored his eyes into me. Toward evening I went away, and ten days later I received the following letter from Mr. Kupryánikoff:

“I have the honour to inform you herewith, my dear sir, that your friend, the student Mr. Avenír Sorokóú-moff, who resided in my house, died three days ago, at two o'clock in the afternoon, and was buried to-day in my parish church at my expense. He requested me to send you the accompanying seven books and note-books. It turned out that he had twenty-two rubles and a half, which, together with his remaining things, become the property of his relatives. Your friend died perfectly conscious, and, I may say, with equal lack of feeling, without having displayed any signs whatsoever of regret, even when our entire family bade him farewell. My consort, Kleopátra Alexándrovna, sends you her compliments. The death of your friend could not fail to have an effect upon her nerves; so far as I am concerned, I am well, thank God, and have the honour to be—

Your most humble servant

G. KUPRYÁNIKOFF.”

Many other instances occur to my mind,—but it would be impossible to recount them all. I will confine myself to one.

An aged landed proprietress died in my presence. The priest began to read over her the prayers for a departing soul, but suddenly observed that she was actually dying, and with all haste gave her the cross to kiss. The lady thrust it aside impatiently. "Why art thou in such a hurry, bá-tjushka?"—she said with her sluggish tongue:—"thou wilt have plenty of time." . . . She kissed the cross, tried to thrust her hand under the pillow, and drew her last breath. Under the pillow lay a silver ruble: she wanted to pay the priest for her own prayer-service. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Yes, wonderful is the way in which Russians die!

IV

THE SINGERS

THE small village of Kolotóvka, which formerly belonged to a landed proprietress who was known throughout the neighbourhood as the Planer on account of her energetic and evil disposition (her real name remained unknown), but now the property of some Petersburg Germans or other, lies on the slope of a bare hill, intersected from top to bottom by a frightful ravine, which, yawning like a bottomless pit, winds its way, cleft and excavated by torrents, through the very middle of the street, and separates the two sides of the poor little hamlet worse than a river,—for across a river a bridge may, at least, be built. A few spindling willows timidly descend its sandy slopes; at the very bottom, dry and yellow as brass, lie huge slabs of clayey stone. The aspect is cheerless, there's no denying that,—and yet, all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood are well acquainted with the road to Kolotóvka: they resort thither often and gladly.

At the very apex of the ravine, a few paces from the point where it has its beginning as a narrow cleft, stands a tiny four-square cottage,—alone, apart from the rest. It is roofed with straw thatch, and has a chimney; one window is turned to the ravine, like a vigilant eye, and on winter evenings, illuminated from within, it is visible from afar, athwart the dim mist of the frost, and twinkles forth as a guiding star to many a wayfaring peasant. Over the door of the cottage a blue board is nailed up: this cot is a dram-shop, called “The Prítynny.”<sup>1</sup> Probably the liquor in this dram-shop is not sold for any less than the current price, but it is much more diligently frequented than all the other establishments of the same character in the vicinity. Nikolái Ivánitch, the tapster, is the cause.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Nikolái Ivánitch, once upon a time a slender, curly-haired, rosy-cheeked young fellow, but now a remarkably obese man, already turning grey, with a face swimming in fat, cunning but good-natured little eyes, and a fleshy brow, intersected by thread-like wrinkles, has been living in Kolótovka for more than twenty years. Nikolái Ivánitch is a smart, shrewd man, like the majority of dram-shop keepers. Without being distinguished by any special amiability or loquacity, he possesses the gift of attracting and retaining his patrons, who, for some reason, find it particularly jolly to sit in front of his counter, beneath the calm and cordial, though keen gaze of the phlegmatic host. / He has a great deal of common sense; he is well acquainted with the ways of the gentry and of the peasantry and of the burghers; in difficulties, he might give advice which was far from stupid, but, as a cautious man and an egoist, he prefers not to interfere, and, at most, merely by distant hints uttered as though wholly devoid of intention, will he guide his patrons—and even then only his favourite patrons—into the way of truth. / He is a good judge of everything which is important or interesting to the Russian man: of horses and cattle, of forests and of bricks, of crockery and dry-goods and leather wares, of songs and dances. When he has no guests, he generally sits, like a sack, on the ground in front of his cottage, with his thin legs tucked up under him, and exchanges affable remarks with all the passers-by. / He has seen a great deal in his day, he has outlived scores of petty gentry who have come to him for “alcohol,” he knows everything that is going on for a hundred versts round about, and never blurts it out, never even has the appearance of knowing that which not even the most penetrating commissioner of rural police so much as suspects. He minds his own business, holds his tongue, smiles to himself, and shifts his drinking-glasses about. The neighbours respect him. The civilian General<sup>1</sup> Shshtcherspeténko, the leading squire of the district as to rank, always nods condescendingly to him whenever he passes his little house. Nikolái Ivánitch is a man of influence: he forced a well-known horse-thief to restore a horse which he had abstracted from the yard of one of his acquaintances, he brought to their senses the peasants of a neighbouring village who were unwilling to accept a new manager, and so forth. But it must not be supposed that he did this out of love for justice, out of zeal for his neighbours—no! he simply endeavours to prevent anything which may in any way disturb his tranquillity. Nikolái Ivánitch is married, and has children. His wife, an alert, sharp-nosed, and quick-eyed woman of the burgher class, has also grown rather heavy in body of late, like her husband. He relies upon her thoroughly, and she keeps their money under lock and key. Boisterous drunkards fear her; she is not fond of them: there is little profit from them, but much uproar; the silent, surly sort are more to her taste. Nikolái Ivánitch's children are still small; all the first-born have died, but the rest resemble their parents: it is a pleasure to look at the clever faces of these robust youngsters.

<sup>1</sup> Any place where people are fond of assembling, any agreeable (priyátny) place, is called “prítynny.”

THE SINGERS

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup> According to Peter the Great's famous Table of Ranks, civilians hold military titles (though they are rarely used, except in the case of "general") which correspond with the grade they have attained. In order of precedence, the "generals" run as follows: Actual Privy Councillor corresponds to General of Cavalry, Infantry, or Artillery; Privy Councillor, to Lieutenant-General; Actual Councillor of State, to Major-General.—TRANSLATOR.

THE SINGERS

It was an intolerably hot July day, when, slowly putting one foot before the other, and accompanied by my dog, I made my way upward along the Kolotóvka ravine in the direction of the Prítynny dram-shop. The sun was blazing in the sky, as though in a furious rage; it stewed and baked one unremittingly; the air was impregnated with stifling dust. The daws and crows, covered with gloss, with gaping bills stared at the passers-by, as though entreating their sympathy; the sparrows were the only ones who did not grieve, and puffing out their feathers, they twittered more violently than ever, and fought in the hedges, flew amicably from the dusty road, and soared in grey clouds above the green patches of hemp. I was suffering tortures from thirst. There was no water near; in Kolotóvka, as in many other villages of the steppes, the peasants drink a sort of liquid mud from the pond, in default of springs or wells. . . . But who would call that repulsive beverage water? I wanted to ask Nikolái Ivánitch for a glass of beer or kvas.

I must admit that Kolotóvka does not present a very cheerful spectacle at any season of the year; but it arouses a particularly sad feeling when the glittering July sun with its pitiless rays is heating the dark-brown, half-dispersed thatches of the houses, and that deep ravine, and the burnt-up, dusty pasture, across which hopelessly wander gaunt, long-legged hens, and the grey, aspen framework with holes in lieu of windows, the remnant of the former manor-house, completely overgrown with nettles, steppe-grass, and wormwood, and covered with goose-down, the black pond, red-hot as it were, with a fringe of half-dried mud, and a dam, twisted awry, by whose side, on the ash-like soil, trodden fine, sheep, barely breathing and sneezing with the dust, sadly huddle close to one another, and with dejected patience bow their heads as though waiting for that intolerable heat to pass off at last. With weary steps I approached the abode of Nikolái Ivánitch, evoking in the small brats, as was proper, a surprise which rose to the pitch of strainedly-irrational stares, and in the dogs wrath which was expressed by barking so hoarse and vicious, that it seemed as though all their entrails were being torn out of them, and they themselves coughed and panted after it,—when, all of a sudden, on the threshold of the dram-shop there made his appearance a peasant of lofty stature, capless, in a frieze cloak, girt low with a sky-blue girdle. From his appearance, he seemed to be a house-servant; his thick grey hair rose in disorder above his lean, wrinkled face. He called some one, hurriedly gesticulating with his arms, which, evidently, made more sweeping flourishes than he himself intended. It was obvious that he had already succeeded in getting intoxicated.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Come along, come along, I say!”—he stammered, elevating his thick eyebrows with an ef-fòrt:—"come along, Blinker, come along! deuce take thee, my good fellow, thou fairly crawlest, upon my word. 'T is not well, my good fellow. They are waiting for thee, and here thou art crawling. . . . Come along."

THE SINGERS

"Well, I'm coming, I'm coming,"—re-sounded a quavering voice, and from behind the cottage, on the right, a short, fat, lame man made his appearance. He wore a fairly clean woollen overcoat, with his arm in one sleeve only; a tall, conical cap, pulled straight down to his brows, imparted to his round, plump face a sly and jeering expression. His small, yellow eyes fairly darted about, a repressed, constrained smile never left his lips, and his long, sharp nose projected audaciously in front like a rudder.—"I'm coming, my dear fellow,"—he went on, hobbling in the direction of the dram-shop:—"why dost thou call me? . . . Who is waiting for me?"

"Why do I call thee?"—said the man in the frieze coat, reproachfully.—"Thou'rt a queer fellow, Blinker: thou art called to the dram-shop, and thou askest: 'Why?' Good men are waiting for thee: Turk-Yáshka, and Wild Gentleman, and the contractor from Zhísdra. Yáshka and the contractor have made a bet: they have wagered a gallon of beer as to which one of them will outdo the other,—that is to say, which will sing the best. . . . Dost understand?"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Is Yáshka going to sing?”—said the man called Blinker, with vivacity,—“And art not thou lying, Ninny?”

“I’m not lying,”—replied The Ninny, with dignity:—“but thou art talking crazy nonsense. Of course he’s going to sing, if he has made a bet, thou lady-bug, thou rogue, Blinker!”

“Well, come on then, silly,” retorted Blinker.

“Come, kiss me at least, my darling,”—stammered The Ninny, opening his arms widely.

“Pshaw, what a tender Æsop,”—replied Blinker, scornfully, repulsing him with his elbow, and both, bending down, entered the low-browed door.

The conversation I had overheard powerfully excited my curiosity. More than once rumours had reached me about Turk-Yáshka as the best singer in the vicinity, and an opportunity had now presented itself to me to hear him in competition with another master of the art. I redoubled my pace, and entered the establishment. In all probability, not many of my readers have had a chance to take a peep at country dram-shops; but into what places do not we sportsmen enter! Their arrangement is extremely simple. They usually consist of a dark anteroom and a light cottage, separated into two divisions by a partition, behind which no visitor has the right to go. In this partition, above the broad, oaken table, a large, oblong opening is made. On the table or counter the liquor is sold. Sealed square bottles of various sizes stand in rows on shelves, directly opposite the aperture. In the central part of the cottage, designed for patrons, are benches, two or three empty casks, and a corner table. The majority of country dram-shops are rather dark, and almost never will you see on their board walls any of the brilliantly coloured cheap pictures which are lacking in very few cottages.

THE SINGERS

When I entered the Prítynny dram-shop, a fairly numerous company was already assembled there.

Behind the counter, as was proper, almost to the full extent of the aperture, Nikolái Ivánitch was standing in a gay-coloured cotton shirt and with a languid smile on his plump cheeks, and pouring out with his fat, white hands two glasses of liquor for the friends who had just entered, Blinker and The Ninny; and behind him, in the corner, near the window, his brisk-eyed wife was to be seen. In the middle of the room stood Yáshka-the-Turk, a spare and well-built man of three-and-twenty years, clad in a long-tailed nankeen kaftan, blue in colour. He looked like a dashing factory-hand, and, apparently, could not boast of very robust health. His sunken cheeks, his large, uneasy grey eyes, his straight nose with thin, mobile nostrils, his white receding brow, with light chestnut curls tossed back, his large but handsome and expressive lips—his whole countenance denoted an impressionable and passionate man. He was in a state of great excitement: his eyes were winking hard, he was breathing irregularly, his hands were trembling as though with fever,—and he really had a fever, that palpitating, sudden fever which is so familiar to all people who speak or sing before an audience. Beside him stood a man about forty years of age, broad-shouldered, with broad cheek-bones, and a low brow, narrow Tatár eyes, a short, thick nose, a square chin, and shining black hair as stiff as bristles. The expression of his swarthy and leaden-hued face, especially of his pallid lips, might have been designated as almost fierce, had it not been so composedly-meditative. He hardly stirred, and only slowly glanced around him, like an ox from beneath his yoke. He was dressed in some sort of a threadbare coat with smooth, brass buttons; an old, black silk kerchief encircled his huge neck. He was called the Wild Gentleman. Directly opposite him, on the bench, beneath the holy pictures, sat Yáshka's competitor,—the contractor from Zhísdra: he was a thick-set peasant, low of stature, aged thirty, pockmarked and curly-haired, with a stubby, snub nose, small, lively brown eyes, and a small, thin beard. He cast bold glances about him, with his hands tucked under him, chattered incessantly, and kept tapping with his feet, which were shod in dandified boots with a border.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

THE SINGERS

He wore a new, thin armyák<sup>1</sup> of grey cloth, with a velveteen collar, against which the edge of a scarlet shirt, closely buttoned around the throat, stood out sharply. In the opposite corner, to the right of the door, at the table, an insignificant little peasant was sitting, clad in a scant, threadbare smock-frock with a huge hole in the shoulder. The sunlight streamed in a thin, yellowish flood through the dusty panes of two tiny windows, and, apparently, could not conquer the habitual gloom of the room: all the objects were scantily illuminated,—in spots, as it were. On the other hand, it was almost cool there, and the sensation of suffocation and sultry heat slipped from my shoulders, like a burden, as soon as I had stepped across the threshold.

My arrival—I could see it—somewhat disconcerted Nikolái Ivánitch's guests at first; but, perceiving that he bowed to me, as to an acquaintance, they recovered their composure, and paid no further attention to me. I ordered some beer, and seated myself in the corner, beside the peasant in the torn smock.

“Well, what now!”—suddenly roared The Ninny, tossing off a glass of beer at one gulp, and accompanying his exclamation with the same strange flourishing of the hands, without which,

<sup>1</sup> A coat which is fitted as far as the waist-line, folds diagonally across the front, and has considerable fullness imparted to the tails by plaits inserted at the waist where the curving seams from the shoulders join the skirt.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

evidently, he never uttered a single word.—
“What are we waiting for? If you’re going to begin, why begin. Hey? Yáshka? . . .”

“Begin, begin,”—chimed in Nikolái Ivánitch, approvingly.

“We will begin, if you like,”—said the contractor, coolly, and with a self-satisfied smile:—
“I’m ready.”

“And I’m ready,”—enunciated Yákoff, with agitation.

“Well, begin, my lads, begin,” piped Blinker.

But, despite the unanimously expressed desire, no one did begin; the contractor did not even rise from his bench,—all seemed to be waiting for something.

“Begin!”—said the Wild Gentleman, sharply and morosely.

Yákoff gave a start. The contractor rose, pulled down his girdle, and cleared his throat.

“But who’s to begin?”—he asked, in a slightly altered voice of the Wild Gentleman, who still continued to stand motionless in the middle of the room, with his thick legs straddled far apart, and his mighty arms thrust into the pockets of his full trousers almost to the elbow.

“Thou, thou, contractor,”—lisped The Ninny, —“thou, my good fellow.”

The Wild Gentleman darted a sidelong glance at him. The Ninny gave a faint squeak, grew confused, stared at some point on the ceiling, twitched his shoulders, and relapsed into silence.

THE SINGERS

“Cast-lots,”—said the Wild Gentleman with a pause between his words:—“and let the measure of beer be placed on the counter.”

Nikolái Ivánitch bent down, picked up the measure from the floor, with a grunt, and set it on the table.

The Wild Gentleman glanced at Yákoff, and said: “Go ahead!”

Yákoff fumbled in his pockets, drew forth a two-kopék piece, and bit a mark in it. The contractor pulled from beneath the tails of his kافتان a new leathern purse, deliberately untied the cords, and pouring out a quantity of small change into his hand, selected a new two-kopék bit. The Ninny held out his well-worn cap, with its broken and ripped visor; Yákoff tossed his coin into it, and the contractor tossed in his.

“’T is for thee to draw,”—said the Wild Gentleman, turning to Blinker.

Blinker laughed in a self-satisfied way, took the cap in both hands, and began to shake it.

Instantaneously a profound silence reigned: the coins, faintly jingling, clinked against each other. I cast an attentive glance around: all faces expressed strained expectation; the Wild Gentleman himself screwed up his eyes; my neighbour, the wretched little peasant in the torn smock, even craned out his neck with curiosity.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Blinker thrust his hand into the cap and drew out the contractor's coin; all heaved a sigh. Yákovf flushed scarlet, and the contractor passed his hand over his hair.

"There, did n't I say that thou shouldst begin,"—exclaimed The Ninny. "I told you so!"

"Well, well, don't squawk,"<sup>1</sup>—remarked the Wild Gentleman, disdainfully. "Begin,"—he added, nodding his head at the contractor.

"What song shall I sing?"—inquired the contractor, becoming flustered.

"Whatever one thou wilt,"—replied Blinker.—"Whatever song comes into thy head, sing that."

"Whatever one thou pleasest, of course,"—added Nikolái Ivánitch, slowly folding his arms on his chest.—"There's no decree for thee on that matter. Sing what thou wilt; only, sing well; and afterward, we will decide according to our consciences."

"According to our consciences, of course,"—put in The Ninny, and licked the rim of his empty glass.

"Let me clear my throat a bit, my good fellows,"—began the contractor, drawing his fingers along the collar of his kaftan.

"Come, come, don't dawdle—begin!"—said the Wild Gentleman, with decision, and dropped his eyes.

<sup>1</sup> Hawks squawk when they are frightened by anything.

THE SINGERS

The contractor reflected a while, shook his head, and advanced a pace. Yákoff riveted his eyes upon him. . . .

But before I enter upon a description of the contest itself, I consider it not superfluous to say a few words about each of the acting personages of my tale. The life of several of them was already known to me, when I encountered them in the Pritynny dram-shop; I collected information concerning the others later on.

Let us begin with The Ninny. This man's real name was Evgráf Ivánoff; but no one in all the country round about called him anything but The Ninny, and he alluded to himself by this nickname also: so well did it fit him. And, as a matter of fact, nothing could have been better suited to his insignificant, eternally alarmed features. He was an idle, unmarried house-serf, who had very long since been discarded by his owners, and who, although he had no duties and received not a penny of wages, found the means, nevertheless, to indulge in daily sprees at other people's expense. He had a multitude of acquaintances, who treated him to liquor and to tea, without themselves knowing why they did so, because he not only was not entertaining in company, but even, on the contrary, bored every one with his senseless chatter, his unbearable insolence, his feverish movements and incessant, unnatural laughter. He could neither sing nor dance; in all his life he had not uttered a witty nor even a sensible word: he did nothing but “tipple” and lie at random—a regular ninny! And yet, not a single drinking-bout took place within a circuit of forty versts without his long-limbed figure turning up among the guests,—so wonted had they become to him, and so tolerant of his presence as an inevitable evil. He was treated scornfully, it is true, but no one except the Wild Gentleman knew how to put a stop to his inopportune outbursts.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Blinker did not in the least resemble The Ninny. The name Blinker suited him also, although he did not blink his eyes more than other people: 't is a well-known fact that the Russian populace are master-hands at bestowing nicknames. Despite my efforts to investigate more circumstantially the past of this man, there yet remained for me—and, probably, for others also—dark spots in his life, places, as the men learned in book-lore express it, veiled in the profound gloom of obscurity. All I found out was, that he had formerly been the coachman of an old, childless landed proprietress, had absconded with the team of three horses entrusted to him, had disappeared for a whole year, and having become convinced by experience, it is to be presumed, of the disadvantages and miseries of a vagabond existence, had returned of his own accord, but lame, had flung himself at the feet of his mistress, and, having for the space of several years atoned for his crime by exemplary conduct, had gradually got into her good graces, had at last won her complete confidence, had been made overseer, and after the death of his mistress now turned out to have been emancipated, no one knew how, had inscribed himself in the burgher class, had begun to hire ground for raising melons and cucumbers from the neighbours, had grown rich, and now lived in clover. He was a man of experience, opinionated, neither good-natured nor malicious, but calculating, rather; he was a cunning rogue, acquainted with men's ways, and knew how to take advantage of them. He was cautious and, at the same time, enterprising, like a fox; loquacious as an old woman, yet never made a slip of the tongue, while he made every one else betray himself in speech; moreover, he did not pretend to be a simpleton, as some crafty persons of the same stamp do; and, indeed, it would have been difficult for him to dissimulate: I have never seen more piercing and clever eyes than his tiny, crafty "peepers."<sup>1</sup> They never simply looked—they were always watching or spying out. Blinker would sometimes consider for weeks at a stretch some apparently simple undertaking, and then suddenly decide upon some desperately-bold operation, in which, to all appearances, he was sure to break his neck . . . . And the first you knew,—everything had turned out a success, everything was running as though on oiled wheels. He was lucky, and believed in his luck, and believed in omens. Altogether, he was very superstitious. He was not beloved, because he cared nothing for any one, but he was respected. His entire family consisted of one small son, whom he fairly adored, and who, reared by such a father, would in all probability go far. “Little Blinker” (Morgatciónok) “takes after his father,” the old people already said of him, with bated breath, as they sat on the earthen banks around the cottages and chatted among themselves on summer evenings; and everybody understood what that meant, and added not a word more.

THE SINGERS

<sup>1</sup>The people of the Orel (Aryól) Government call eyes "peepers," as they call the mouth "the eater."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

There is no necessity for occupying ourselves long with Yákovff-the-Turk and the contractor. Yákovff, nicknamed the Turk, because he really was descended from a Turkish woman captive, was in soul an artist in every sense of the word, and by profession a moulder in the paper-mill of a merchant; as for the contractor, he seemed to me to be a resourceful and dashing town-dweller of the burgher class. But it is worth while to speak in more detail concerning the Wild Gentleman.

The first impression which the aspect of this man made upon you was a sensation of some coarse, heavy but irresistible force. He was awkwardly built, "flung together," as our expression runs, but he exhaled an atmosphere of invincible health, and, strange to say, his ursine figure was not devoid of a certain peculiar grace, emanating, possibly, from perfectly composed confidence in his own might. It was difficult to decide, off-hand, to what social class this Hercules belonged; he resembled neither a house-serf nor a burgher, nor an impoverished pettifogger out of a job, nor a ruined nobleman of small estate—a keeper of dogs and bully: in truth, he was a unique specimen. No one knew whence he had descended upon our district; it was said that his ancestors had been peasant-freeholders,<sup>1</sup> and it was supposed that he had formerly been in the government service somewhere, but no one knew anything definite in regard to that; and from whom were they to find out—certainly not from the man himself: there never was a more taciturn and surly person. Moreover, no one could say with authority what were his means of subsistence; he occupied himself with no handicraft, he visited no one, he knew hardly any one, yet he was supplied with money,—not much, to tell the truth, but enough. His demeanour was not precisely unassuming,—on the whole, there was nothing unassuming about him,—but quiet: he lived as though he did not notice any one around him, <sup>1</sup> See the sketch in Vol. I, "Freeholder Ovsyánikoff," p. 98.

THE SINGERS

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

and decidedly stood in no need of any one. The Wild Gentleman (such was the nickname which had been conferred upon him; but his real name was Perevlyésoff) enjoyed immense influence throughout the whole countryside; people yielded him instantaneous and willing obedience, although he not only had no shadow of right to issue orders to any one whomsoever, but did not even manifest the slightest pretensions to the obedience of the people with whom he came into contact. He spoke,—he was obeyed; power always asserts its rights. He drank hardly any liquor, did not consort with women, and was passionately fond of singing. There was a great deal that was mysterious about this man; it seemed as though some vast forces or other were morosely reposing within him, as though aware that, having once risen up, having once broken loose, they were bound to destroy both themselves and everything with which they should come into contact; and I am greatly mistaken, if such an outburst had not already taken place in that man's life, if he, taught by experience and barely rescued from perdition, were not now holding a very tight rein over himself. What especially struck me in him was the mixture of a certain innate, natural fierceness and an equally innate nobility,—a mixture which I have never encountered in any one else.

So then, the contractor stepped forward, half-closed his eyes, and began to sing in a high falsetto. His voice was tolerably agreeable and sweet, although somewhat husky; he played with his voice and flung it about like a whirligig, incessantly trilling and executing roulades in a descending scale, and incessantly returning to his upper notes, which he held and drew out with peculiar pains, then paused, and again suddenly took up his former refrain with a certain daring, spirited dash. His transitions were sometimes quite bold, sometimes quite amusing: they would have afforded connoisseurs great satisfaction; a German would have been enraged by them. He was a Russian tenore di grazia, tenor léger. He sang a merry dance-tune, the words of which, so far as I could make them out amid the interminable ornamentation, the supplementary consonants and exclamations, were as follows:

THE SINGERS

“ I ’ll plough, will I, the stripling young,
A little patch of ground:
I ’ll sow, will I, the stripling young,
A little flower of scarlet hue.”

He sang; all listened to him with great attention. He evidently felt that he had to deal with people who were good judges, and therefore, as the saying is, he fairly “ crawled out of his skin ” in his efforts. As a matter of fact, people in our parts are good judges of singing, and not without cause is the village of Sérgievskoe, on the great Orel highway, renowned throughout the whole of Russia for its peculiarly agreeable and harmonious melody. For a long time the contractor continued to sing, without evoking any special sympathy in his hearers.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

He lacked the support of a chorus; at last, at one particularly successful passage, which made even the Wild Gentleman smile, The Ninny could contain himself no longer, and shouted aloud with delight. Every one gave a start. The Ninny and Blinker began to hum in an undertone, to accompany him, and to shout: "That 's a dandy! . . . . Go ahead, thou rascal! . . . Go ahead, keep on, thou brigand! Lash out again! Split thy throat again, thou dog, thou hound! . . . Let Herod slay thy soul!" . . . and so forth. Nikolái Ivánitch, behind his counter, nodded his head to right and left in approbation. At last, The Ninny began to stamp his feet, to shift from foot to foot, and to twitch his shoulders,—and Yákoff's eyes fairly blazed up like coals of fire, and he quivered all over like a leaf, and smiled flabbily. The Wild Gentleman alone did not change countenance, and, as before, did not stir from his seat; but his gaze, riveted upon the contractor, became somewhat softer, although the expression of his lips remained scornful. Encouraged by these tokens of universal approval, the contractor became a perfect whirlwind, and began to emit such floriture, clicked and drummed so with his tongue, made his throat perform such frantic feats, that when, at last, exhausted, pale, and drenched in boiling perspiration, he threw his whole body backward and gave vent to a final expiring outcry, a general unanimous shout responded to him in a vehement outburst. The Ninny flung himself upon his neck, and began to choke him with his long, bony arms; on Nikolái Ivánitch's fat face a flush broke forth, and he seemed to have grown young again; Yákovff shouted like a madman: "Well done! well done!"<sup>1</sup>—even my neighbour, the peasant in the torn smock, could not contain himself, and smiting the table with his fist, he shouted: "A-ha! good, devil take it—'t is good!"—and spat decisively to one side.

THE SINGERS

"Well, brother, thou hast diverted us!"—cried The Ninny, without releasing the exhausted contractor from his embrace,—“thou hast diverted us, there's no denying that! Thou hast won, brother, thou hast won! I congratulate thee,—the measure of beer is thine! Yáshka is far behind thee. . . . Just mark what I am saying to thee: thou'rt far ahead of him. . . . Believe me!” (And again he clasped the contractor to his breast.)

“Come, let him go, let him go, thou nui-

<sup>1</sup> Literally: “Fine, dashing young fellow.” Possibly, “Bully for you!” would be the more accurate translation.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

sance . . .” said Blinker, with vexation:—“let him sit down on the bench; dost not thou see he’s tired! . . . What a ninny thou art, my good fellow,—really, a ninny! Why dost thou stick to him like a bath-leaf?”<sup>1</sup>

“Well, all right, let him sit down, and I’ll drink to his health,”—said The Ninny, stepping up to the counter.—“At thy expense, brother,”—he added, addressing the contractor.

The latter nodded in assent, seated himself on the bench, pulled a towel out of his cap, and began to mop his face; but The Ninny, with greedy haste, drained his glass, and, according to the custom of confirmed drunkards, he assumed a grieved and careworn aspect.

“Thou singest well, brother, well,”—remarked Nikolái Ivánitch, caressingly.—“And now ’t is thy turn, Yáshka: look out, don’t be timid. Let’s see who’s who; let’s see. . . But the contractor sings well,—by heaven, he does!”

“Very well, indeed,”—remarked Nikolái Ivánitch’s wife, glancing at Yákoﬀ with a smile.

“Very well indee-ed!” repeated my neighbour, in an undertone.

“Hey, Savage-Polyékha!”<sup>2</sup> suddenly roared

<sup>1</sup>The usual bath-besom, for agreeable massage after the steam-bath, is a fan-like bunch of birch-branches, with the leaves left on, and dipped in hot water to prevent their falling off. Sometimes the peasants use bunches of nettles.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup>The inhabitants of southern Polyésye are called Polyékhi. The Polyésye is a long forest tract which begins at the boundary of the Bolkhóﬀ and Zhízdra districts. Its inhabitants are distin-

THE SINGERS

The Ninny, and stalking up to the peasant with the hole on his shoulder, he pointed his finger at him, began to skip about, and burst into a peal of laughter. — “A Polyékha! a Polyékha! Ha, bádye,<sup>1</sup> drive on, Savage? Why hast thou favoured us with thy company?” he shouted, through his laughter. The poor peasant was disconcerted, and was making ready to rise and depart as speedily as possible, when suddenly the Wild Gentleman’s brazen voice rang out:

“Why, what intolerable animal is this?”—he ejaculated, gnashing his teeth.

“I did n’t do anything,”—mumbled The Ninny:—“I did n’t do anything. . . . I only just . . . .”

“Well, very good, hold thy tongue!”—retorted the Wild Gentleman.—“Yákoff, begin!”

Yákoff clutched his throat with his hand.

“Well, brother, you know . . . somehow . . . . H’m . . . . I don’t know, really, somehow, you know . . . .”

“Come, have done with that, don’t get frightened. Art ashamed? . . . Why dost thou wriggle? Sing as God prompts thee.”

And the Wild Gentleman lowered his eyes in anticipation.

gushed by many peculiarities in their manner of life, customs, and dialect. They are called savages because of their suspicious and dull disposition.

<sup>1</sup>The Polyékhi add the exclamation “ha!” to nearly every word, also “bádye.” The Ninny says “panyái” instead of “pogonyái” (“drive on”), also in mimicry.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Yákoff held his peace for a little, cast a glance round him, and covered his face with his hand. Every one fairly bored into him with his eyes, especially the contractor, upon whose countenance, athwart his wonted self-assurance, and the triumph of success, there broke forth a faint, involuntary uneasiness. He leaned back against the wall and again tucked both his hands under him, but he no longer swung his feet to and fro. When, at last, Yákoff uncovered his face, it was pale as that of a corpse, and his eyes barely gleamed through his lowered lashes. He heaved a deep sigh, and began to sing. . . . The first sound of his voice was weak and uneven, and, apparently, did not emanate from his chest, but was wafted from some distant place, as though it had flown accidentally into the room. This tremulous, ringing sound had a strange effect on all of us; we glanced at one another, and Nikolái Ivánitch's wife actually straightened herself up. This first sound was followed by another, more firm and prolonged, but still obviously tremulous, like a chord when, suddenly resounding beneath a strong finger, it quivers with a final, expiring tremor; the second note was followed by a third, and, gradually, warming up and broadening, a melancholy song poured forth.

“Not one path alone in the field is trodden,”

THE SINGERS

he sang, and we all felt sweetness and sadness in our hearts. I am bound to confess, that rarely have I heard such a voice: it was slightly broken, and had a cracked ring; at first it even had a sort of sickly sound; but it contained both genuine and profound passion, and youth, and power, and sweetness, and a certain captivatingly-care-free, despondent pain. An upright, burning, Russian soul resounded and breathed in it, and fairly gripped our hearts, laid hold directly upon their Russian chords. The song swelled and broadened. Yákovf, evidently, had been seized with a fit of rapture; he was no longer timid, he surrendered himself wholly to his bliss; his voice no longer trembled,—it quivered, but with that barely perceptible inward quiver of passion, which pierces the soul of the hearer like an arrow, and grew constantly stronger, firmer, more voluminous. I remember having seen, once upon a time, of an evening, at ebb-tide, on the flat, sandy shore of the sea, which was roaring menacingly and heavily in the distance, a large white sea-gull; it was sitting motionless, with its silky breast exposed to the crimson glow of the sunset, and only now and then did it slowly spread its long wings in the direction of its familiar ocean, toward the purpling sun: I recalled that sea-gull as I listened to Yákovf. He sang on, utterly oblivious of his rival, and of us all, but evidently upborne, like a vigorous swimmer by the waves,

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

by our silent, passionate interest. He sang, and every sound of his voice breathed forth something which was akin to us, and boundlessly vast, as though the familiar steppes were unrolling themselves before us, stretching out into the illimitable distance. I felt that tears were gathering in my heart, and welling up into my eyes; dull, suppressed sobs suddenly startled me. . . . I glanced around—the publican's wife was weeping, bent forward, with her bosom against the window. Yákovf shot a swift glance at her, and began to warble even more sweetly than before. Nikolái Ivánitch dropped his eyes; Blinker turned away; The Ninny, completely melted, stood with his mouth stupidly agape; the grey little peasant was sobbing softly in his corner, shaking his head with a bitter whisper; and across the iron face of the Wild Gentleman, from beneath his brows, which were completely contracted in a frown, a heavy tear was trickling slowly; the contractor raised his clenched fist to his brow, and did not stir. . . . I know not in what the universal anguish would have culminated, had not Yákovf suddenly wound up on a high, remarkably thin note—as though his voice had broken off short. No one cried out, no one even stirred; all seemed to be waiting to see whether he would not sing some more; but he opened his eyes, as though surprised at our silence, surveyed us all with an inquiring glance, and saw that the victory was his. . . .

THE SINGERS

“Yáshka,”—said the Wild Gentleman, laying his hand on his shoulder, and—said no more.

We all stood as though stunned. The contractor rose softly, and stepped up to Yákoff.—“Thou . . . . thy . . . . thou hast won,”—he enunciated at last with difficulty, and rushed headlong from the room.

His swift, decisive movement seemed to break the spell: all suddenly began to talk noisily, joyously. The Ninny gave an upward leap, stammered, fluttered his arms like the wings of a windmill; Blinker hobbled up to Yákoff and began to kiss him; Nikolái Ivánitch half rose, and solemnly announced that he would add an extra measure of beer on his account. The Wild Gentleman laughed with a good-natured sort of laugh, which I had never expected to encounter on his face; the wretched little peasant kept reiterating in his corner, as he wiped his eyes, cheeks, nose, and beard with both his sleeves: “But ’t is good,—by heaven, ’t is good! Well, now, I ’ll renounce my parents and become a dog if it is n’t good!” while Nikolái Ivánitch’s wife, all flushed, rose hastily and withdrew. Yákoff enjoyed his victory like a child; his whole face was transfigured; his eyes, in particular, fairly beamed with happiness. He was dragged to the counter; he called to him the tear-sodden peasant, despatched the tapster’s little son for the contractor, whom the boy did not find, however, and the carouse began.—“Thou wilt sing for us again, thou wilt sing for us until the evening," The Ninny kept repeating, raising his hands on high.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I cast one more glance at Yákovf, and departed. I did not wish to remain,—I was afraid of spoiling my impression. But the sultry heat was as unbearable as ever. It seemed to be hanging close to the very earth, in a dense, heavy stratum; in the dark-blue sky, certain tiny, bright flames seemed to be whirling about, athwart the very fine, almost black dust. All was silent; there was something hopeless, oppressive in that profound silence of debilitated nature. I wended my way to the hay-loft and lay down on the freshly-mown but already almost dry grass. For a long time I did not fall asleep; for a long time, Yákovf's irresistible voice rang in my ears. . . . . At last the heat and my fatigue asserted their rights, however, and I sank into a death-like slumber. When I awoke, all was dark; the grass scattered round about emitted a strong fragrance, and had grown somewhat damp; through the thin boards of the half-open roof pale little stars were twinkling. I went outside. The sunset glow had long since died out, and its last traces were barely visible, like a white streak on the horizon; but in the air, recently red-hot, warmth was still perceptible athwart the nocturnal coolness, and the lungs still thirsted for a cold blast. There was no breeze, there was not even a cloud; round about, the sky was perfectly clear and transparently-dark, softly scintillating with innumerable but barely visible stars. Lights gleamed in the village; from the brilliantly-lighted dram-shop hard by was wafted a confused, discordant uproar, amid which it seemed to me that I recognised Yákoff's voice. Shrill laughter arose thence in gusts, from time to time. I stepped up to the tiny window, and pressed my face to the pane. I beheld a cheerless, though motley and lively picture: everybody was drunk—everybody, beginning with Yákoff. He was sitting, with bared breast, on the wall-bench, and singing in a hoarse voice some dancing-tune of the street, as he lazily ran his fingers over and twanged the strings of a guitar. His damp hair hung in elf-locks over his horribly pale face. In the middle of the dram-shop, The Ninny, completely "unscrewed" and minus his kaftan, was dancing with leaps and squattings in front of the peasant in the greyish armyák; the miserable little peasant, in his turn, was stamping and shuffling his enfeebled feet with difficulty, and smiling foolishly through his dishevelled beard, and flourished one hand from time to time, as much as to say: "I don't care a rap for anybody!" Nothing could be more ridiculous than his face: no matter how much he twitched his brows upward, his fatigue-laden lids would not rise, and continued to lie upon the barely perceptible, intoxicated, but still very sweet little eyes. He was in the engaging condition of a man who has got thoroughly tipsy, when every passer-by, on glancing at his face, will infallibly say: "'T is good, brother, 't is good!" Blinker, all scarlet as a crayfish, and with his nostrils widely inflated, was jeering spitefully from a corner; Nikolái Ivánitch alone, as is befitting a genuine publican, preserved his invariable coolness. A number of new individuals had assembled in the room; but I did not see the Wild Gentleman among them.

THE SINGERS

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I turned away, and with swift steps began to descend the hill on which Kolotóvka lies. At the foot of this hill, the broad ravine spreads out; submerged in the misty billows of the evening fog, it appeared more limitless than ever, and seemed to merge into the darkened sky. I was proceeding with great strides on the road which runs along the precipice, when suddenly, far away in the ravine, there rang out the resonant voice of a boy.—"Antrópka! Antrópka-a-a!"—it shouted in persistent and tearful desperation, prolonging the last syllable for a very, very long time.

He stopped for a few moments, and again began to shout. His voice rang out sonorously on the motionless, lightly-slumbering air. Thirty times, at least, had he shouted the name of Antrópka, when suddenly from the opposite end of the field, as though from another world, the barely audible reply was wafted:

THE SINGERS

“Wha-a-a-aat?”

The boy's voice instantly shouted with joyous wrath:

“Come hither, thou devil, thou forest-fi-i-i-iend!”

“Why-y-y-y?”—replied the second voice, after a long pause.

“Why, because thy daddy wants to spa-a-a-a-ank thee,”—hastily shouted the first voice.

The second voice did not respond again, and again the boy began to call Antrópka. His shouts, which grew ever weaker and more infrequent, still continued to reach my ear, when it had already grown completely dark, and I was doubling the edge of the forest which surrounded my hamlet and was situated four versts from Kolótóvka. . . .

“Antrópka-a-a!” seemed to be still audible in the air, filled with the shades of night.

V

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

FIVE years ago, in autumn, I was compelled to sit for almost an entire day in a posting-house on the highway from Moscow to Túla, for lack of horses. I was returning from a hunting-expedition, and had been so incautious as to send my tróika on ahead. The superintendent, a surly fellow, already aged, with hair which hung over his nose, and tiny, sleepy eyes, replied to all my complaints and requests by a growl, slammed the door wrathfully, as though cursing his own office, and emerging upon the porch, set to berating the postilions, who were slowly tramping through the mud with arches weighing about forty pounds apiece in their arms, or were sitting on the bench, yawning and scratching their heads, and paid no particular attention to the angry exclamations of their superior. I had already set to work three times to drink tea, I had several times vainly endeavoured to get to sleep, I had perused all the inscriptions on the windows and on the walls; I was oppressed by frightful tedium. I was staring with chill and hopeless despair at the upturned shafts of my tarantás, when suddenly a small bell resounded, and a little cart, drawn by three weary horses, drew up before the porch. The newcomer sprang from his cart, and with the shout: "Horses, and be quick about it!" entered the room. While he listened, with the customary strange surprise, to the superintendent's reply, that there were no horses, I succeeded, with the eager curiosity of a bored man, in scanning my new companion from head to foot with a glance. Apparently, he was about thirty years of age. The smallpox had left ineffaceable traces on his face, which was harsh and yellow, with an unpleasant brazen tint; his long, bluish-black hair fell in rings upon his collar behind, in front it curled in dashing ringlets on the temples; his small, swollen eyes had sight, and that was all; on his upper lip, several small hairs stuck out. He was dressed like a dissolute landed proprietor, a frequenter of horse-fairs, in a flowered Caucasian overcoat, considerably soiled, a faded silk neckerchief of lilac hue, a waistcoat with brass buttons, and grey trousers with huge bell-bottoms, from beneath which the tips of his uncleaned boots were barely visible. He reeked strongly of tobacco and vódka; on his fat, red fingers, which were almost covered by the sleeves of the overcoat, silver and Túla rings of gold and black steel were discernible. Such figures are to be encountered in Russia not by the dozen but by the hundred; acquaintance with them, truth to tell, does not afford any pleasure whatever, but, in spite of the prejudice wherewith I surveyed the newcomer, I could not but notice the unconcernedly good-natured and passionate expression of his face.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“They<sup>1</sup> have been waiting here for more than an hour, sir,”—said the superintendent, pointing at me.

More than an hour!—The malefactor was making fun of me.

“But perhaps he does not need them so badly,”—replied the newcomer.

“We can’t tell about that, sir,”—said the superintendent, surlily.

“And isn’t it possible to manage it in some way? Are there positively no horses?”

“Can’t be done, sir. There isn’t a single horse.”

“Well, then, order the samovár to be brought for me. I’ll wait, there’s nothing else to be done.”

The newcomer seated himself on the wall-bench, flung his cap on the table, and passed his hand over his hair.

“And have you already drunk tea?”—he asked me.

“Yes.”

“Won’t you drink again, to keep me company?”

<sup>1</sup> Respectful form for “he.”—TRANSLATOR.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

I consented. The fat, reddish samovár made its appearance on the table for the fourth time. I produced a bottle of rum. I had made no mistake in taking my interlocutor for a noble of small estate. His name was Piótr Petróvitch Karatáeff.

We entered into conversation. Half an hour had not elapsed since his arrival before he, with the most good-humoured frankness, had related to me the story of his life.

“Now I ’m going to Moscow,”—he said to me, as he drained his fourth cup:—“there ’s nothing more for me to do in the country now.”

“Why not?”

“Just because there is n’t . . . not a thing. My farming operations are thoroughly disorganised, I have ruined the peasants, I must confess; we have had bad years; poor harvests, various calamities, you know. . . . And besides,”—he added, with a dejected glance aside:—“I ’m no sort of a landlord!”

“How so?”

“Because I ’m not,”—he interrupted me. “There are good landlords of a very different sort from me. See here, now,”—he went on, twisting his head on one side, and sucking diligently at his pipe:—“Perhaps you are thinking, as you look at me, that I—you know . . . . but I must admit to you, that I received a mediocre education; means were lacking. You must excuse me, I'm an outspoken man, and in short . . . ."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

He did not finish his remark and waved his hand. I began to assure him, that he was in error, that I was very glad that we had met, and so forth, after which I remarked that, for the management of an estate, too intense culture was not necessary, apparently.

"Agreed,"—he replied:—"I agree with you. But nevertheless, a certain special inclination is requisite! One man will do God knows what, and it's all right! but I . . . . Permit me to inquire, are you from Peter<sup>1</sup> or from Moscow?"

"I am from Petersburg."

He emitted a long wreath of smoke through his nostrils.

"And I'm going to Moscow to enter the government service."

"Where do you intend to establish yourself?"

"That I don't know: as fortune favours. I must confess to you, that I'm afraid of the service: the first you know, you incur some responsibility. I have always lived in the country; I'm used to that, you know . . . . but there's no help for it . . . . necessity compels! Okh, hang that necessity!"

"On the other hand, you will reside in the capital."

"Yes, in the capital . . . . well, I don't know what there is good there, in the capital. We shall see, perhaps it is good. . . . But I think that nothing can be better than the country.”

<sup>1</sup> Abbreviation of St. Petersburg.—TRANSLATOR.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

“But is it impossible for you to live in the country any longer?”

He heaved a sigh.

“It is. The village is hardly mine any more.”

“How is that?”

“Why, a kind man there—a neighbour has instituted . . . . a lawsuit . . . . . there was a note of hand. . . . .” Poor Piótr Petróvitch passed his hand over his face, meditated, and shook his head.

“Well, never mind! . . . . But I must admit,”—he added, after a brief pause:—“I have no complaint to make of any one, I myself am to blame. I was fond of having my own way,—devil take it, I was fond of showing my independence!”

“Did you live in jolly style in the country?”—I asked him.

“Sir,”—he answered me, pausing between his words, and looking me straight in the eye,—“I had twelve leashes of greyhounds,—such greyhounds, I must tell you, are rare.” (He pronounced this last word with a drawl.)—“They would shake the life out of a hare on the instant, and as for deer,—they were serpents, regular asps. But that’s a thing of the past now, there’s no use in lying about it. I used to hunt with a gun. I had a dog, Kontéska; a remarkable pointer, she took everything by her extremely fine scent. I used to approach the marsh, and say: 'Charge!' and she would n't hunt; even if you were to pass by with a dozen dogs,—you would waste your time, nothing would you find! but when she did begin,—you 'd simply be glad to die on the spot! . . . And she was so polite in the house. Give her bread with your left hand and say:—'A Jew bit it,'—and she would n't take it, but give it to her with your right hand, and say: 'A young lady tasted it,'—and instantly she 'd take it and eat it. I had a pup of hers, a capital pup, and I wanted to take it to Moscow, but a friend begged it of me, along with my gun; says he: 'In Moscow, brother, you will have no use for them; everything will be quite different there, brother.' So I gave him the pup, and the gun too; everything remained there—behind, you know."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"But you might have hunted in Moscow also."

"No; what's the use? I have n't known how to hold my ground, so now let me endure with patience. But here now, permit me rather to inquire, how is living in Moscow—dear?"

"No, not very."

"Not very? . . . But tell me, please, the gipsies live in Moscow, don't they?"

"What gipsies?"

PIOTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

“Why, the ones who travel round to the fairs?”

“Yes, they live in Moscow. . . .”

“Well, that’s good. I’m fond of gipsies,—damn it, I love them. . . . .”

And Piótr Petróvitch’s eyes sparkled with audacious jollity. But, all at once, he began to wriggle about on the bench, then grew thoughtful, drooped his head, and stretched out his empty glass to me.

“Give me some of your rum, pray,”—said he.

“But the tea is all gone.”

“Never mind, I’ll take it so, without tea. . . . . Ekh!”

Karatáeff laid his head on his hands, and propped his arms on the table. I gazed at him in silence, and waited for those emotional exclamations, probably, even, those tears, of which a man in a carouse is so lavish; but when he raised his head, the profoundly-melancholy expression of his face amazed me, I must confess.

“What is the matter with you?”

“Nothing, sir. . . . I have been recalling old times. There’s an anecdote, sir. . . . I’d tell it to you, only I’m ashamed to disturb you. . . .”

“Pray, do not mention it!”

“Yes,”—he went on, with a sigh:—“things happen . . . however, for instance, to me also. Here now, if you like, I’ll tell you the story. However, I don’t know. . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Tell me, my dear Piótr Petróvitch.” . . .

“Very well, although it’s rather . . . . Well, you see,”—he began:—“but really, I don’t know . . . . .”

“Come, enough of that, my dear Piótr Petróvitch.”

“Well, as you like. So then, this is what happened to me, so to say. I was living in the village, sir. . . . . All at once, I took a fancy to a young girl. Akh, what a girl she was! . . . . beautiful, clever, and so good-natured! Her name was Matryóna, sir. And she was a simple lass,—that is to say, you understand, a serf, simply a slave, sir. And she was n’t my girl, but the property of another,—and therein lay the misfortune. Well, and so I fell in love with her,—really, sir, the anecdote is of a sort,—well, here goes. So Matryóna began to entreat me to buy her from her mistress; and I was thinking of that same thing myself. . . . But her mistress was wealthy, a dreadful old woman; she lived about fifteen versts from me. Well, one fine day, as the saying is, I ordered my tróïka to be harnessed,—I had a pacer for a shaft-horse, a wonderful Asiatic beast, and his name was Lampurdos, by the way,—dressed myself in my best, and drove off to Matryóna’s mistress. I arrived: ’t was a big house, with wings, in a park. . . . Matryóna was waiting for me at the turn of the road, and tried to speak to me, but merely kissed my hand and stepped aside. So then, I entered the anteroom, and inquired: 'Is the lady at home?' . . . . And a footman as tall as that, says: 'What name shall I announce?' Says I: 'My good fellow, announce that Squire Karatáeff has come to talk over a matter of business.' The lackey withdrew; I waited, and thought to myself: 'How will it turn out? I suppose the beast will demand a frightful price, in spite of the fact that she's rich.' Well, at last, the footman returned, and said: 'Please come with me.' I followed him to the drawing-room. In an arm-chair sat a tiny sallow old woman, blinking her eyes. . . . 'What do you want?'—I thought it necessary first, you know, to declare that I came to make her acquaintance.—'You are mistaken, I am not the mistress of the house, I am a relation of hers. . . . What do you want?'—Thereupon I remarked to her, that I must speak with the mistress herself.—'Márya Ilínitchna is not receiving to-day; she is not well. . . . What do you want?' . . . . 'There's no help for it,' said I to myself, 'I'll explain the circumstances to her.' The old woman heard me to the end.—'Matryóna? what Matryóna?—Matryóna Feódoroff, the daughter of Kulikóff—Feódor Kulikóff's daughter? . . . . but how do you know her?' 'Accidentally.'—'And is she acquainted with your intention?'—'She is.'—The old woman was silent for a while.—'I'll give it to her, the wretch! . . .’—I was amazed, I must admit.—

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

‘What for, good gracious! . . . . I am ready to pay a good sum for her, only please to designate it.’—The old hag fairly frothed at the mouth.—
‘Well, a pretty way you’ve devised to astonish people: much we care for your money! . . . . but won’t I give it to her, though! I’ll deal with her. . . . I’ll thrash the folly out of her.’—The old woman fell into a fit of coughing with rage. ‘Is n’t she well off with us, I’d like to know? Akh, she’s a devil, Lord forgive my sin!’—I flared up, I must confess.—‘Why do you make threats against the poor girl? In what way is she to blame?’—The old woman crossed herself.—
‘Akh, O Lord, do you mean to say that I . . .’
—‘But she does n’t belong to you, you know!’
—‘Well, Márya Ilínitchna knows all about that; ’t is no business of yours, my good man; but just wait, I’ll show that wretched Matryóna whose slave she is.’—I must confess, that I came near flinging myself on the cursed old woman, but I remembered Matryóna, and dropped my hands. It is impossible to tell you how timid I became; I began to entreat the old woman. ‘Take what you will,’ I said.—‘But what do you want of her?’—‘I’ve taken a fancy to her, mátushka; put yourself in my place. . . . Permit me to kiss your little hand.’—And I actually kissed the villain’s hand!—‘Well!’ mumbled the old witch:—
‘I’ll tell Márya Ilínitchna; it will be as she com-

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

mands; and do you drop in again a couple of days hence.'—I drove home in great perturbation. I had begun to divine that I had managed the business badly, that I had made a mistake in allowing my affection to be seen, but I had thought of it too late. A couple of days later I set off to call on the lady. I was shown into her study. There was a profusion of flowers, the decorations were fine; the lady herself was seated in such a curious easy-chair, with her head reclining on cushions; and the relative whom I had seen before was sitting there also; and, besides these, some young lady or other with white eyebrows and lashes, in a green gown, a wry-mouthed creature, a companion, probably. The old woman snuffled out: 'Please sit down.' I sat down. She began to question me, as to how old I was, and where I had served, and what I intended to do; and all this in a patronising, pompous way. I replied in detail. The old woman took a handkerchief from the table, and fanned and fanned herself with it. . . . 'Katerína Kárpovna has made a report to me concerning your intentions,' said she; 'she has reported to me,' said she; 'but I have made it a rule,' said she, 'not to release my people to go out to service. It is not seemly, and it is not proper in a respectable house: it is n't good form. I have already taken the proper measures,' said she, 'and there is no necessity for troubling you further.'—'It is no trouble, I assure you. . . . But

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

perhaps you need Matryóna Feódorovna?'—
'No,' said she, 'I don't need her.'—'Then why will not you let me have her?'—'Because I don't choose, because I don't choose to do it, and that's all there is to be said. I have already made arrangements,' said she: 'she is to be sent to a village on the steppes.'—This was like a clap of thunder to me. The old woman said a couple of words in French to the green young lady: the latter left the room.—'I'm a woman of strict principles,' said she, 'and my health is not strong. I cannot endure being worried. You are still a young man, and I am already an old woman, and entitled to give you advice. Would not it be better for you to settle down, to marry, to hunt up a good match? Wealthy brides are rare, but a poor girl, and one of good moral character, can be found.'—Do you know, I stared at the old woman, and did n't understand a word of what she was jabbering; I heard her saying something about marriage, but the village on the steppes kept ringing in my ears. 'Marry! Marry!' . . . what the devil! . . ."

At this point the narrator suddenly halted, and cast a glance at me.

"You're not married, are you?"

"No."

"Well, certainly not, as a matter of course. I could n't bear it:—'Why, good gracious, má-tushka, what nonsense are you babbling? What has marriage to do with it? I simply want to know, whether you will sell your maid Matryóna or not?'—The old woman began to groan.—'Akh, he has worried me! Akh, order him to go away! akh! . . . .' The relative sprang to her assistance, and began to scream at me. And the old woman kept on moaning:—'How have I deserved this? . . . Am I no longer mistress in my own house? Akh, akh!' I seized my hat, and rushed out of the house like a madman.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

"Perhaps," pursued the narrator, "you will condemn me for having become so attached to a girl of the lower classes: and I have no intention of defending myself. It was no fault of mine! If you will believe it, I had no peace day or night. . . . I tortured myself! 'Why have I ruined the unhappy girl?' I thought. As soon as I called to mind that she was herding the geese in a coarse, collarless smock, and ill-treated by her mistress's command, and the overseer, a peasant in tarred boots, was swearing at her and calling her names, the cold sweat would begin fairly to drip off me. Well, I could n't endure it: I found out to what village she had been sent, mounted my horse, and rode thither. I did not arrive until toward evening of the second day. Evidently, they had not expected such a caper on my part, and no orders had been given concerning me. I went straight to the overseer, like a neighbour; I entered the farm-yard, and behold, there sat Matryóna on the steps, with her head propped on her hand. She was on the point of crying out, but I shook my finger at her, and pointed to the back-yard, to the fields. I entered the cottage, chatted with the overseer, told him a devilish lot of lies, took advantage of a good opportunity, and went out to meet Matryóna. She, poor girl, fairly hung upon my neck. She had grown pale, and thin, my dear little dove. And, do you know, I said to her: 'Never mind, Matryóna, never mind, don't cry;'—but my own tears were flowing all the while. . . . Well, anyway, at last I felt ashamed; I said to her:—'Matryóna, tears will not help: we must act with decision, as the saying is; thou must flee with me; that's the way we must act.'—Matryóna almost swooned. . . . 'How can I do that? why, I shall be ruined, and they will persecute me worse than ever!'—'Thou silly, who will find thee?'—'They will find me, they will find me without fail. I thank you, Piótr Petróvitch,—so long as I live I shall never forget thy kindness, but do thou leave me now; evidently, such is my fate.'—'Ekh, Matryóna, Matryóna, I had thought that thou wert a girl of firm character.'—And, in fact, she had a lot of firmness . . . . she had a soul, a soul of gold!—'Why shouldst thou stay here? it will make no difference; thou wilt be none the worse off. Come now, tell me: hast thou tasted the overseer's fists, hey?'—Matryóna fairly boiled with wrath, and her lips began to quiver.—‘But my family will be persecuted on my account.’—‘Damn thy family. . . Will they exile it, pray?’—‘Yes, they will certainly send my brother into exile.’—‘And thy father?’—‘Well, they will not exile my father; he is a very good tailor.’—‘There now, seest thou; and thy brother will not be ruined by that.’—‘If you will believe me, I prevailed upon her by force; she tried to argue a while longer, saying: ‘They will hold thee to account for it. . . .’ ‘But that’s no business of thine,’ said I. . . . So I just carried her off . . . . not on that occasion, but on another: I came by night, in a cart—and carried her off.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

“You carried her off?”

“I did. . . . Well, and so she settled down with me. My house was not large, my servants were few. My people, I will say it without circumlocution, respected me; they would n’t have betrayed me for any sort of good fortune. I began to live like a fighting-cock. My dear little Matryóna got rested, and recovered her health; and I got so attached to her. . . . And what a girl she was! she could sing, and dance, and play the guitar. . . . I did n’t show her to the neighbours: they’d have proclaimed the affair abroad the very first thing! But I had a friend, a bosom-friend, Panteléi Gornostáeff — perhaps you are acquainted with him? He simply adored her: he used to kiss her hand as though she had been a well-born lady, he really did. And I must tell you, that Gornostáeff was no mate for me: he was an educated man, he had read Púshkin all through; when he began to talk to Matryóna and me, we would fairly prick up our ears. He taught her to write, such an eccentric fellow he was! And how I used to dress her,—better than the Governor's wife, and that's all there is to it; I had a fur-lined cloak of crimson velvet, with a fur border, made for her. . . . And how becoming that cloak was to her! A Moscow mantua-maker madame made that fur cloak after a new pattern, fitted in at the waist.<sup>1</sup> And how wondrously beautiful Matryóna was! She used to sit for hours at a time, staring at the floor, and never moving an eyelash: and I would sit there also, and gaze at her, and never could gaze my fill, just as though I had never beheld her before. . . . She would smile, and my heart would fairly quiver, as though some one had tickled it. And then all of a sudden, she would set to laughing, and jesting, and dancing; she would embrace me so warmly, so strongly, that my head would grow dizzy. From morning till night, the only thing I used to think about, was: 'How can I give her pleasure?' And if you will believe me, I used to give her presents simply for the sake of seeing how she, my darling, would rejoice, and blush all over with joy, and begin to try on my gift, and come to display herself to me in her new things, and kiss me. I don't know how her father, Kulík, ferreted out the business; the old man came to take a look at us, and began to cry. . . . Thus we lived for five months, and I had no objections to spending my whole life with her, but my fate is such an accursed one!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

<sup>1</sup>The ordinary Russian "shúba" is of the old-fashioned "circular" shape, reaching from the neck to the ground, fur-lined, and with a long "shawl"-shaped fur collar, which can be drawn up around the ears.—TRANSLATOR.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

Piótr Petróvitch paused.

"What happened?"—I asked him with interest.

He waved his hand.

"Everything went to the devil. And it was I that ruined her. Matryóna was excessively fond of sleigh-riding, and used to drive herself; she would don her fur cloak, and embroidered Torzhók<sup>1</sup> mittens, and do nothing but shout. We always drove in the evening, so that we might not meet any one, you know. So, once we picked out a magnificent day; very cold and clear, with no wind . . . and set off. Matryóna took the reins. So I looked to see where she was going. Could it be to Kukuévko, the village of her mistress? Exactly so, it was to Kukuévko. I said to her: 'Thou crazy girl, whither art thou going?' She glanced over her shoulder <sup>1</sup>The leather wares made in Torzhók, not far from Moscow, are an imitation of the beautiful, many-hued and embroidered goods made at Kazán by the Tatárs. In comparison with the latter, they are coarse, and the embroidery in silks, gold, and silver is very perishable.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

at me, and laughed. As much as to say: 'Let me show my daring!' 'Ah!' I thought: 'well, here goes!' . . . . 'T was a nice thing to drive past the manor-house, was n't it? tell me yourself—was n't it nice? Well, we drove on. My pacer fairly floated along, and the trace-horses went like the wind, I can tell you,—and soon the church at Kukuévko came in sight; and behold an old green coach on runners is crawling along the road, and a footman is towering up on the footboard behind. . . . 'T was the lady, the lady driving! I was frightened, but how Matryóna slapped the reins on the horses' backs, and how we did dash straight at the coach! The coachman! He, you understand, saw that some wild phantom or other was flying to meet him,—and tried to turn out, you know, but turned too short, and overturned the coach into a snow-drift. The window was smashed, the lady shrieked: 'Aï, ái, ái! ái, ái, ái!' the companion squealed: 'Stop, stop!' but we drove past as fast as we could go. As I galloped on I thought: 'Harm will come of this; I ought n't to have allowed her to drive to Kukuévko.' And what do you think? the lady had recognised Matryóna, and had recognised me, the old thing, and she made a complaint against me: 'My fugitive serf-girl is living with nobleman Karatáeff;' and thereupon she showed the proper gratitude.<sup>1</sup> And behold, the rural chief of police comes to me; and this chief of police was a man I knew, Stepán Sergyéitch Kuzóvkin, a nice man; that is to say, in reality not a nice man. So he comes and says: thus and so, Piótr Petróvitch,—how came you to do this? . . . 'T is a heavy responsibility, and the laws are clear on this point.—I said to him: 'Well, of course, you and I will talk this over, but won't you have a bite after your journey?' He consented to have a bite, but said: 'Justice demands, Piótr Petróvitch, judge for yourself.'—'It's all right about justice, of course,'—said I: 'that's understood . . . but see here, I have heard, that you have a black horse, so would n't you like to swap it for my Lampurdos? . . . And I haven't got the girl Matryóna Feódorova in my house.'—'Well, Piótr Petróvitch,' says he; 'the girl is in your house, we are n't living in Switzerland, you know . . . but I might swap my horse for your Lampurdos; I might take him now, if you like.' So I managed to get rid of him that time, somehow. But the old lady made a bigger fuss than before; 'I won't hesitate to spend ten thousand rubles,' said she. You see, as she looked at me, she had suddenly taken it into her head, to marry me to her green companion,—I found that out afterward; and that is why she made such a row. What whims those well-born ladies do take into their heads! . . . Out of boredom, I suppose. I was in a bad fix: I did not spare my money, and I concealed Matryóna,—in vain! They harassed me to death, they got me completely tied up in a snarl. I got into debt, I lost my health. . . . So, one night I lay in my bed and thought: ‘O Lord my God, why do I endure it? What am I to do, if I can’t renounce my love for her? . . . Well, I can’t, and that’s all there is about it!’—and Matryóna walks into my room. All this time I had been hiding her at my farm, a couple of versts from my house. I was frightened.—‘What’s the matter? have they discovered thee there?’—‘No, Piótr Petróvitch,’—says she: ‘no one is troubling me at Búbnova; but can this continue long? My heart,’ says she, ‘is breaking, Piótr Petróvitch; I’m so sorry for you, my darling: as long as I live I shall never forget your kindness, Piótr Petróvitch, but I have come now to bid you farewell.’—‘What art thou saying, what art thou saying, thou madwoman? . . . What dost thou mean, what dost thou mean, by bidding me farewell?’—‘Why, so . . . I’ll go and surrender myself.’—‘But I’ll lock thee up in the garret, thou mad creature. . . . Hast thou taken it into thy head to ruin me? dost thou wish to kill me, pray?’—The girl said nothing, but stared at the floor.—‘Come, speak, speak!’—‘I don’t want to cause you any more trouble, Piótr Petróvitch.’—Well, it was no use talking to her. . . . ‘But knowest thou, fool, knowest thou, thou cra . . . crazy woman. . . .’”

<sup>1</sup>That is, bribed in the proper quarter.—TRANSLATOR.

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

And Piótr Petróvitch burst out sobbing bitterly.

“And, what do you think?”—he went on, smiting the table with his fist, and trying to frown, while the tears continued to stream down his flushed cheeks:—“the girl actually gave herself up,—she went and gave herself up. . . .”

“The horses are ready, sir!”—cried the superintendent solemnly, entering the room.

We both rose.

“And what did they do with Matryóna?”—I asked.

Karatáeff waved his hand.

A year after my meeting with Karatáeff, I happened to go to Moscow. One day, before dinner, I entered a café which is situated behind the Okhótny Ryády,<sup>1</sup>—an original, Moscow café. In the billiard-room athwart the billows of smoke, one caught fleeting glances of reddened faces, moustaches, crest-curles, old-fashioned hussar-jackets, and the newest-patterned coats. Gaunt old men in plain coats were reading the Russian newspapers. Waiters were flitting briskly about with trays, treading softly on the green carpets. Merchants were drinking tea with painful assiduity. All at once there emerged from the billiard-room a man who was somewhat dishevelled, and not quite steady on his legs. He thrust his hands into his pockets, hung his head, and stared stupidly around him.

<sup>1</sup> Or, “game-market.”—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Ba, ba, ba! Piótr Petróvitch! . . . . How are you?”

Piótr Petróvitch fairly hurled himself on my neck, and drew me aside with somewhat staggering steps, into a private room.

“Here now,”—he said, solicitously seating me in an easy-chair:—“Here you will be comfortable. Waiter, beer! No, I mean champagne! Well, I admit, that I was n’t expecting, I was n’t expecting. . . . Have you been in town long? are you here for long? Here, God has brought, as the saying is, the man . . .”

“But, do you remember . . . .”

“How could I fail to remember? how could I fail to remember?”—he hastily interrupted me:—“’t is an affair of the past . . . . an affair of the past. . . .”

“Well, what are you doing here, my dear Piótr Petróvitch?”

“I am living, as you are pleased to observe. Life is good here, the people are cordial. I have recovered my composure here.”

And he sighed, and raised his eyes to heaven.

“Are you in the service?”

“No sir, I ’m not serving yet, but I ’m thinking of finding a position soon. And what ’s the service? . . . . People—that ’s the principal thing. What fine people I have made acquaintance with here!" . . . .

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

A boy entered with a bottle of champagne on a black tray.

"Here, he's a fine man too . . . thou art a fine man, art thou not, Vása? To thy health!"

The lad stood still for a moment, shaking his little head decorously, then smiled, and left the room.

"Yes, the people here are nice,"—went on Piótr Petróvitch:—"they have sentiment, they have soul. . . . I'll introduce you, shall I? Such splendid fellows. . . . They will all be delighted to know you. I must tell you. . . . Bobróff is dead, and that's a pity."

"What Bobróff?"

"Sergyéi Bobróff. He was a splendid man; he took care of me, an ignoramus, a steppe-dweller. And Panteléi Gornostáeff is dead too. All are dead, all!"

"Have you been living all the time in Moscow? Have you not made a trip to your village?"

"To the village . . . . they have sold my village."

"Sold it?"

"At suction.<sup>1</sup> It's a pity that you did not buy it!"

"What are you going to live on, Piótr Petróvitch?"

<sup>1</sup> AUCTION.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Why, I shall not die of hunger. God will provide! If I have no money, I shall have friends. And what is money?—dust! Gold dust!”

He screwed up his eyes, fumbled in his pocket with his hand, and held out to me on his palm two fifteen-kopék pieces, and a ten-kopék piece.

“What’s that? Dust, is n’t it?” (And the money flew to the floor.) “But do you tell me, rather, have you read Polezháeff?”

“Yes.”

“Have you seen Motchálóff in Hamlet?”

“No, I have not seen him.”

“You haven’t seen him, you have n’t seen him. . .” (And Karatáeff’s face turned pale, his eyes roved uneasily; faint convulsive twitches flitted across his lips.)

“Akh, Motchálóff, Motchálóff! ‘To die, to sleep’”—he quoted, in a dull voice:

“No more; and by a sleep to say we end
The heart-ache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to. . . . ’T is a consummation Devoutly to be wished! To die,—to sleep. . . .

“‘To sleep, to sleep!’”—he muttered, several times in succession.

“Tell me, please,”—I began; but he went on fervidly:

“For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor’s wrong, the proud man’s contumely,

PIÓTR PETRÓVITCH KARATÁEFF

The pangs of dispriz'd love, the law's delay,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? . . . . Nymph, in thy orisons
Be all my sins remembered!"

And he dropped his head on the table. He was beginning to hiccough and to talk at random.

" 'And in one month,' " he enunciated, with fresh force:

" A little month, or ere those shoes were old
With which she followed my poor father's body,
Like Niobe, all tears,—why, she, even she,—
O God! a beast, that wants discourse of reason,
Would have mourned longer. . . ."

He raised his glass of champagne to his lips, but did not drink the wine, and continued:

" For Hecuba!
What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? . . . .
Yet I . . . . a dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak,
Like John-a-dreams! Who calls me villain?
Gives me the lie i' the throat?
'Swounds, I should take it; for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered, and lack gall
To make oppression bitter. . . ."

Karatáeff dropped his glass and clutched his head. It seemed to me that I understood him.

" Well, never mind,"—he said at last:—" when sorrow is asleep, wake it not. . . . Isn't that true?" (And he began to laugh.)—"To your health!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"Shall you remain in Moscow?"—I asked him.

"I shall die in Moscow!"

"Karatóeff,"—shouted some one in the adjoining room—"Karatóeff, where art thou? come hither, my dear fe-ow!"<sup>1</sup>

"They are calling me,"—he said, rising heavily from his seat.—"Good-bye; drop in to see me if you can, I live in * * *."

But on the following day, owing to unforeseen circumstances, I was obliged to leave Moscow, and never saw Piótr Petróvitch Karatóeff again.

<sup>1</sup>It is rather fashionable to pronounce tchelovyék tche-a-ék. Thereby, also, the "hard l" is avoided, which is as difficult to pronounce, for some Russians (not to mention foreigners), as the r is for many Englishmen and Americans.—TRANSLATOR.

VI

THE TRYST

I WAS sitting in a birch grove in autumn, about the middle of September. A fine drizzling rain had been descending ever since dawn, interspersed at times with warm sunshine; the weather was inconstant. Now the sky would be completely veiled in porous white clouds; again, all of a sudden, it would clear up in spots for a moment, and then, from behind the parted thunderclouds, the clear and friendly azure would show itself, like a beautiful eye. I sat, and gazed about me, and listened. The leaves were rustling in a barely audible manner overhead; from their sound alone one could tell what season of the year it was. It was not the cheerful, laughing rustle of spring-time, not the soft whispering, not the long conversation of summer, not the cold and timid stammering of late autumn, but a barely audible, dreamy chatter. A faint breeze swept feebly across the tree-tops. The interior of the grove, moist with the rain, kept changing incessantly, according to whether the sun shone forth, or was covered with a cloud; now it was all illuminated, as though everything in it were suddenly smiling:

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

the slender boles of the not too thickly set birches suddenly assumed the tender gleam of white silk, the small leaves which lay on the ground suddenly grew variegated and lighted up with the golden hue of ducats, and the handsome stalks of the tall, curly ferns, already stained with their autumnal hue, like the colour of over-ripe grapes, seemed fairly transparent, as they intertwined interminably and crossed one another before one's eyes; now, of a sudden, everything round about would turn slightly blue: the brilliant hues were extinguished for a moment, the birches stood there all white, devoid of reflections, white as newly fallen snow, which has not yet been touched by the sparkling rays of the winter sun; and the fine rain began stealthily, craftily, to sprinkle and whisper through the forest. The foliage on the trees was still almost entirely green, although it had faded perceptibly; only here and there stood one, some young tree, all scarlet, or all gold, and you should have seen how brilliantly it flamed up in the sun, when the rays gliding and changing, suddenly pierced through the thick network of the slender branches, only just washed clean by the glittering rain. Not a single bird was to be heard; they had all taken refuge, and fallen silent; only now and then did the jeering little voice of the tom-tit ring out like a tiny steel bell. Before I had come to a halt in this birch-forest I and my dog had traversed a grove of lofty aspens. I must confess that I am not particularly fond of that tree, the aspen, with its pale-lilac trunk, and greyish-green, metallic foliage, which it elevates as high aloft as possible, and spreads forth to the air in a trembling fan; I do not like the eternal rocking of its round, dirty leaves, awkwardly fastened to their long stems. It is a fine tree only on some summer evenings when, rising isolated amid a plot of low-growing bushes, it stands directly in the line of the glowing rays of the setting sun, and glistens and quivers from its root to its crest, all deluged with a uniform reddish-yellow stain,—or when, on a bright, windy day, it is all noisily rippling and lipping against the blue sky, and its every leaf, caught in the current, seems to want to wrench itself free, fly off and whirl away into the distance. But, on the whole, I do not like that tree, and therefore, without halting to rest in that grove, I wended my way to the little birch-cop-pice, nestled down under one small tree, whose boughs began close to the ground, and, consequently, could protect me from the rain, and after having admired the surrounding view, I sank into that untroubled and benignant slumber which is known to sportsmen alone.

THE TRYST

I cannot tell how long I slept, but when I opened my eyes,—the whole interior of the forest was filled with sunlight, and in all directions, athwart the joyously rustling foliage, the bright-blue sky seemed to be sparkling: the clouds had vanished, dispersed by the sportive breeze; the weather had cleared, and in the atmosphere was perceptible that peculiar, dry chill which, filling the heart with a sort of sensation of alertness, almost always is the harbinger of a clear evening after a stormy day. I was preparing to rise to my feet, and try my luck again, when suddenly my eyes halted on a motionless human form. I took a more attentive look: it was a young peasant maiden. She was sitting twenty paces distant from me, with her head drooping thoughtfully, and both arms lying idly on her knees; on one of them, which was half bare, lay a thick bunch of field flowers, which went slipping softly down her plaid petticoat at each breath she drew. Her clean white chemise, unbuttoned at the throat and wrists, fell in short, soft folds about her figure: two rows of large yellow pearl-beads depended from her neck upon her breast. She was very comely. Her thick, fair hair, of a fine ash-blond hue, fell in two carefully brushed semi-circles from beneath a narrow, red band which was pulled down almost on her very brow, as white as ivory; the rest of her face was slightly sunburned to that golden tint which only a fine skin assumes. I could not see her eyes—she did not raise them; but I did see her high, slender eyebrows, her long eyelashes; they were moist, and on one of her cheeks there glittered in the sunlight the dried trace of a tear, that had stopped short close to her lips, which had grown slightly pale. Her whole little head was extremely charming; even her rather thick and rounded nose did not spoil it. I was particularly pleased with the expression of her face: it was so simple and gentle, so sad and so full of childish surprise at its own sadness. She was evidently waiting for some one; something crackled faintly in the forest. She immediately raised her head and looked about her; in the transparent shadow her eyes flashed swiftly before me,—large, clear, timorous eyes, like those of a doe. She listened for several moments, without taking her widely opened eyes from the spot where the faint noise had resounded, sighed, gently turned away her head, bent down still lower than before, and began slowly to sort over her flowers. Her eyelids reddened, her lips moved bitterly, and a fresh tear rolled from beneath her thick eyelashes, halting and glittering radiantly on her cheek. Quite a long time passed in this manner; the poor girl did not stir,—only now and then she moved her hands about and listened, listened still. . . . Again something made a noise in the forest,—she gave a start. The noise did not cease, grew more distinct, drew nearer; at last brisk, decided footsteps made themselves audible. She drew herself up, and seemed to be frightened; her attentive glance wavered, with expectation, apparently. A man's figure flitted swiftly through the thicket. She glanced at it, suddenly flushed up, smiled joyously and happily, tried to rise to her feet, and immediately bent clear over once more, grew pale and confused,—and only raised her palpitating, almost beseeching glance to the approaching man when the latter had come to a halt by her side.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

THE TRYST

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I gazed at him with interest from my ambush. I must confess that he did not produce a pleasant impression on me. From all the signs, he was the petted valet of a young, wealthy gentleman. His clothing betrayed pretensions to taste and foppish carelessness: he wore a short overcoat of bronze hue, probably the former property of his master, buttoned to the throat, a small pink neckerchief with lilac ends, and a black velvet cap, with gold galloon, pulled down to his very eyebrows. The round collar of his white shirt propped up his ears, and ruthlessly sawed his cheeks, and his starched cuffs covered the whole of his hands down to his red, crooked fingers, adorned with gold and silver rings with turquoise forget-me-nots. His fresh, rosy, bold face belonged to the category of visages which, so far as I have been able to observe, almost always irritate men and, unfortunately, very often please women. He was, obviously, trying to impart to his somewhat coarse features a scornful and bored expression; he kept incessantly screwing up his little milky-grey eyes, which were small enough without that, knitting his brows, drawing down the corners of his lips, constrainedly yawning, and with careless, although not quite skilful ease of manner he now adjusted with his hand his sandy, dashingly upturned temple-curls, now plucked at the small yellow hairs which stuck out on his thick upper lip,—in a word, he put on intolerable airs. He began to put on airs as soon as he caught sight of the young peasant girl who was waiting for him; slowly, with a swaggering stride, he approached her, stood for a moment, shrugged his shoulders, thrust both hands into the pockets of his coat, and, barely vouchsafing the poor girl a fugitive and indifferent glance, he dropped down on the ground.

THE TRYST

“Well,”—he began, continuing to gaze off somewhere to one side, dangling his foot and yawning:—“hast thou been here long?”

The girl could not answer him at once.

“A long time, sir, Viktór Alexándrovitch,”—she said at last, in a barely audible voice.

“Ah!” (He removed his cap, passed his hand majestically over his thick, tightly curled hair, which began almost at his very eyebrows, and after glancing around him with dignity, he carefully covered his precious head again.) “Why, I came pretty near forgetting all about it. And then, there was the rain, you know!” (He yawned again.)—“I have a lot of things to do: I can’t attend to them all, and he scolds into the bargain. To-morrow we are going away. . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“To-morrow?”—ejaculated the girl, and fixed a frightened glance on him.

“Yes, to-morrow. . . . Come, come, come, pray,”—he interposed hastily and with vexation, seeing that she was beginning to tremble, and had softly drooped her head:—“Pray, don’t cry, Akulína. Thou knowest that I cannot endure that.” (And he wrinkled up his stubby nose.)—“If thou dost, I’ll go away instantly. . . . How stupid it is to whimper!”

“Well, I won’t, I won’t,”—hastily articulated Akulína, swallowing her tears with an effort.—“So you are going away to-morrow?”—she added after a short silence:—“When will God grant me to see you again, Viktór Alexándrovitch?”

“We shall see each other again, we shall see each other again. If not next year, then later on. I think the master intends to enter the government service in Petersburg,”—he went on, uttering his words carelessly and somewhat through his nose:—“and perhaps we shall go abroad.”

“You will forget me, Viktór Alexándrovitch,”—said Akulína sadly.

“No, why should I? I will not forget thee: only, thou must be sensible, don’t make a fool of thyself, heed thy father. . . . And I won’t forget thee—no-o-o.” (And he calmly stretched himself and yawned again.)

THE TRYST

“Do not forget me, Viktór Alexándrovitch,” she continued, in a tone of entreaty. “I think that I have loved you to such a degree, it always seems as though for you, I would . . . . you say, I must obey my father, Viktór Alexándrovitch. . . . But how am I to obey my father. . . .”

“But why not?” (He uttered these words as though from his stomach, as he lay on his back, with his arms under his head.)

“But what do you mean, Viktór Alexándrovitch . . . you know yourself. . . .”

She stopped short, Viktór toyed with the steel chain of his watch.

“Thou art not a stupid girl, Akulína,”—he began at last:—“therefore, don’t talk nonsense. I desire thy welfare, dost understand me? Of course, thou art not stupid, not a regular peasant, so to speak; and thy mother also was not always a peasant. All the same, thou hast no education—so thou must obey when people give thee orders.”

“But I’m afraid, Viktór Alexándrovitch.”

“I-i, what nonsense, my dear creature! What hast thou to be afraid of? What’s that thou hast there,”—he added, moving toward her:—“flowers?”

“Yes,”—replied Akulína, dejectedly.—“I have been plucking some wild tansy,”—she went on, after a brief pause:—" 'T is good for the calves. And this here is a good remedy for scrofula. See, what a wonderfully beautiful flower! I have never seen such a beautiful flower in my life. Here are forget-me-nots, and here is a violet. . . . And this, here, I got for you,"— she added, drawing from beneath the yellow tansy a small bunch of blue corn-flowers, bound together with a slender blade of grass:—" Will you take them? "

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Viktór languidly put out his hand, took the flowers, smelled of them carelessly, and began to twist them about in his fingers, staring pompously upward. Akulína glanced at him. . . . [In her sorrowful gaze there was a great deal of devotion, of adoring submission to him. And she was afraid of him also, and did not dare to cry, and was bidding him farewell and gloating upon him for the last time; but he lay there, sprawling out like a sultan, and tolerated her adoration with magnanimous patience and condescension.] I must confess, that I gazed with indignation at his red face, whereon, athwart the feignedly-scornful indifference, there peered forth satisfied, satiated self-conceit. Akulína was so fine at that moment: her whole soul opened confidingly, passionately before him, reached out to him, fawned upon him, and he . . . . he dropped the corn-flowers on the grass, pulled a round monocle in a bronze setting from the side-pocket of his pale-tot, and began to stick it into his eye; but try as he would to hold it fast with his frowning brows, the monocle kept tumbling out and falling into his hand.

THE TRYST

“What is that?”—inquired the amazed Akulína at last.

“A lorgnette,”—he replied pompously.

“What is it for?”

“To see better with.”

“Pray let me see it.”

Viktór frowned, but gave her the monocle.

“Look out, see that thou dost not break it.”

“Never fear, I won’t break it.” (She raised it timidly to her eye.) “I can see nothing,”—she said innocently.

“Why, pucker up thine eye,”—he retorted in the tone of a displeased preceptor. (She screwed up the eye in front of which she was holding the glass.)

“Not that one, not that one, the other one!”—shouted Viktór, and without giving her a chance to repair her mistake, he snatched the lorgnette away from her.

Akulína blushed scarlet, smiled faintly, and turned away.

“Evidently, it is not suited to the like of me,”—said she.

“I should say not!”

The poor girl made no reply, and sighed deeply.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Akh, Viktór Alexándrovitch, what shall I do without you!”—she suddenly said. Viktór wiped the lorgnette with the tail of his coat, and put it back in his pocket.

“Yes, yes,”—he said at last:—“thou wilt really find it very hard at first.” (He patted her condescendingly on the shoulder; she softly removed his hand from her shoulder, and kissed it timidly.)—“Well, yes, yes, thou really art a good girl,”—he went on, with a conceited smile; “but what can one do? Judge for thyself! the master and I cannot remain here; winter will soon be here, and the country in winter—thou knowest it thyself—is simply vile. ’T is quite another matter in Petersburg! There are simply such marvels there as thou, silly, canst not even imagine in thy dreams. Such houses, such streets, and society, culture—simply astounding! . . .” (Akulína listened to him with devouring attention, her lips slightly parted, like those of a child.)—“But what am I telling thee all this for?”—he added, turning over on the ground. “Of course, thou canst not understand!”

“Why not, Viktór Alexándrovitch? I have understood—I have understood everything.”

“Did any one ever see such a girl!”

Akulína dropped her eyes.

“You did not use to talk to me formerly in that way, Viktór Alexándrovitch,"—she said, without raising her eyes.

THE TRYST

"Formerly? . . . formerly! Just see there, now! . . . Formerly!"—he remarked, as though vexed.

Both maintained silence for a while.

"But I must be off,"—said Viktór, and began to raise himself on his elbow. . . .

"Wait a little longer,"—articulated Akulína, in a beseeching voice.

"What's the use of waiting? . . . I have already bade thee farewell, have n't I?"

"Wait,"—repeated Akulína.

Viktór stretched himself out again, and began to whistle. Still Akulína never took her eyes from him. I could perceive that she had grown somewhat agitated: her lips were twitching, her pale cheeks had taken on a faint flush. . . .

"Viktór Alexándrovitch,"—she said at last, in a broken voice:—" 't is sinful of you . . . sinful of you, Viktór Alexándrovitch: by heaven, it is!"

"What's sinful?"—he asked, knitting his brows, and he half rose and turned toward her.

"'T is sinful, Viktór Alexándrovitch. You might at least speak a kind word to me at parting; you might at least say one little word to me, an unhappy orphan. . . ."

"But what am I to say to thee?"

"I don't know; you know that better than I do,

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Viktór Alexándrovitch. Here you are going away, and not a single word. . . How have I deserved such treatment?"

"What a queer creature thou art! What can I do?"

"You might say one little word. . . ."

"Come, thou 'rt wound up to say the same thing over and over,"—he said testily, and rose to his feet.

"Don't be angry, Viktór Alexándrovitch,"—she added hurriedly, hardly able to repress her tears.

"I 'm not angry, only thou art so stupid. . . . What is it thou wantest? I can't marry thee, can I? I can't, can I? Well, then, what is it thou dost want? What?" (He turned his face toward her, as though awaiting an answer, and spread his fingers far apart.)

"I want nothing . . . . nothing,"—she replied, stammering, and barely venturing to stretch out to him her trembling arms:—"but yet, if you would say only one little word in farewell. . . ."

And the tears streamed down her face in a torrent.

"Well, there she goes! She 's begun to cry," said Viktór coldly, pulling his cap forward over his eyes.

"I want nothing,"—she went on, sobbing, and covering her face with both hands;—"but how do I stand now with my family, what is my position? and what will happen to me, what will become of me, unhappy one? They will marry off the poor deserted one to a man she does not love. . . . Woe is me!”

THE TRYST

“O, go on, go on,”—muttered Viktór in an undertone, shifting from foot to foot where he stood.

“And if he would say only one word, just one. . . . such as: ‘Akulína, I . . . .’”

Sudden sobs, which rent her breast, prevented her finishing her sentence—she fell face downward on the grass, and wept bitterly, bitterly. . . . Her whole body was convulsively agitated, the back of her neck fairly heaved. . . . Her long-suppressed woe had burst forth, at last, in a flood. Viktór stood over her, stood there a while, and shrugged his shoulders, then wheeled round, and marched off with long strides.

Several minutes elapsed. . . . She quieted down, raised her head, glanced around, and clasped her hands; she tried to run after him, but her limbs gave way under her—she fell on her knees. . . . I could not restrain myself, and rushed to her; but no sooner had she glanced at me than strength from some source made its appearance,—she rose to her feet with a faint shriek, and vanished behind the trees, leaving her flowers scattered on the ground.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I stood there for a while, picked up the bunch of corn-flowers, and emerged from the grove into the fields. (The sun hung low in the palely-clear sky, its rays, too, seemed to have grown pallid, somehow, and cold: they did not beam, they disseminated an even, almost watery light.) Not more than half an hour remained before night-fall, and the sunset glow was only just beginning to kindle. A gusty breeze dashed swiftly to meet me across the yellow, dried-up stubble-field; small, warped leaves rose hastily before it, and darted past, across the road, along the edge of the woods; the side of the grove, turned toward the field like a wall, was all quivering and sparkling with a drizzling glitter, distinct but not brilliant; on the reddish turf, on the blades of grass, on the straws, everywhere around, gleamed and undulated the innumerable threads of autumnal spiders' webs. I halted. . . . (I felt sad: athwart the cheerful though chilly smile of fading nature, the mournful terror of not far-distant winter seemed to be creeping up.) High above me, cleaving the air heavily and sharply with its wings, a cautious raven flew past, cast a sidelong glance at me, soared aloft and, floating on outstretched wings, disappeared behind the forest, croaking spasmodically; a large flock of pigeons fluttered sharply from the threshing-floor and, suddenly rising in a cloud, eagerly dispersed over the fields—a sign of autumn! Some one was driving past behind the bare hill, his empty cart rumbling loudly. . . .

THE TRYST

I returned home; but the image of poor Akulina did not leave my mind for a long time, and her corn-flowers, long since withered, I have preserved to this day. . . .

VII

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY COUNTY

DURING one of my excursions, I received an invitation to dine with a wealthy landed proprietor, who was also a sportsman, Alexánder Mikhaílovitch G * * *. His large village was situated five versts distant from the tiny hamlet where I had settled down at that time. I donned my dress-suit, without which I would not advise any one to leave home, even on a hunting-expedition, and set off for Alexánder Mikhaílovitch's house. The dinner was appointed for six o'clock; I arrived at five, and found a large number of nobles, in uniforms, civilian garb, and other arrays, already there. The host received me cordially, but immediately ran off to the butler's pantry. He was expecting an important dignitary and felt a certain perturbation, which was entirely incompatible with his independent position in the world and his wealth. Alexánder Mikhaílovitch had never married, and did not like women; it was bachelor society which assembled at his house. He lived on a grand scale, had augmented and refitted his ancestral mansion in magnificent style, imported every year from Moscow fifteen thousand rubles' worth of wine, and, altogether, enjoyed the greatest respect. Alexánder Mikhaílovitch had long since resigned from the service, and aspired to no honours. . . . . What, then, induced him to invite the dignitary to be his guest, and agitate himself from daybreak on the day of the ceremonious dinner? That is a point which remains shrouded in the gloom of obscurity, as a certain attorney of my acquaintance was wont to say when asked whether he accepted bribes from willing givers.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

On parting from my host, I began to stroll through the rooms. Almost all the guests were entire strangers to me; a dozen men were already seated at the card-tables. Among the number of these devotees of preference were two military men with noble but somewhat worn countenances; several civilians in tight, tall stocks and with pendent, dyed moustaches, such as are possessed only by decided but well-intentioned persons (these well-intentioned persons were pompously gathering up their cards, and casting sidelong glances at those who approached them, but without turning their heads); and five or six officials of the district with rotund paunches, plump, perspiring hands, and discreetly-impassive feet (these gentlemen were talking in low tones, smiling benignantly on all sides, holding their cards tightly against their shirt-fronts, and, when they trumped, they did not bang the table, but, on the contrary, dropped their cards, with an undulating movement on the green cloth, and when they gathered in their tricks they produced a light, extremely courteous and decorous grating noise). The rest of the nobles were sitting on the divans and huddling in groups round the doors and windows; one landed proprietor, no longer young but of effeminate appearance, was standing in a corner, quaking and blushing, and twisting his watch-chain on his stomach with perturbation, although no one was paying any attention to him; other gentlemen, in round-tailed dress-coats and checked trousers, the work of a Moscow tailor, the perpetual member of the guild and master, Firs Kliúkhin, were chatting with unwonted ease of manner and alertness, freely turning their fat and bare napes; a young man of twenty, mole-eyed and fair-haired, clad in black from head to foot, was evidently intimidated, but smiled spitefully. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I was beginning to be somewhat bored, however, when suddenly I was joined by a certain Voinítzyn, a young man who had not completed his studies, and who lived in Alexánder Mikhaílovitch's house in the capacity . . . . it would be difficult to say in precisely what capacity. He was a capital shot, and knew how to train dogs. I had known him previously, in Moscow. He belonged to the category of young men who, at every examination, "played the dumb game,"— that is to say, did not answer the professors' questions by a single word. These gentlemen were also called sidewhiskerites, by way of fine language. (This happened long ago, as you can easily see.) This is the way it was done: Voinítzyn, for example, was called up. Voinítzyn—who, up to that moment, had been sitting motionless and bolt upright on his bench, bathed from head to foot in boiling-hot perspiration, and rolling his eyes about slowly but stupidly—rose, hastily buttoned his undress uniform up to the throat, and stole sideways to the table of the examiners.—“Please take a ticket,” the professor said to him, pleasantly. Voinítzyn stretched out his hand, and tremulously touched the package of tickets with his fingers.—“Be so good as not to pick and choose,”—remarked some irritable old man who had nothing to do with the matter, a professor from some other faculty, who had conceived a sudden hatred for the unlucky sidewhiskerite. Voinítzyn yielded to his fate, took a ticket, showed the number, and went off and took his seat near the window, while the man ahead of him answered his question. At the window, Voinítzyn never took his eyes from the ticket, unless it was to gaze about him slowly, as before, and otherwise he did not move a limb. But now the man ahead of him has answered his question, and the professors say to him: “Good, you may go,” or even: “Good, sir, very good, sir,” according to his capacities. Then they call up Voinítzyn;—Voinítzyn rises, and approaches the table with firm steps.—“Read your ticket,” they say to him. Voinítzyn lifts the ticket to his very nose with both hands, slowly reads it, and slowly lowers his hands.—“Well, sir, please give the answer,” languidly articulates the same professor, throwing back his body, and folding his arms on his chest. A profound silence reigns.—“What have you to say?”—Voinítzyn maintains silence. He begins to get on the nerves of the old man who is not concerned.—“Come, say something!”—My Voinítzyn remains silent, just as though he had expired. His closely-clipped nape rears itself up in front of the curious glances of all his comrades. The eyes of the meddling old man are ready to pop out of his head: he has finally arrived at detestation of Voinítzyn.—“But this is strange,”—remarks the other examiner:—“Why do you stand there like a dumb man? come now, don’t you know? if you do, then speak.”—“Allow me to take another ticket,” articulates the unlucky wight dully. The professors exchange glances.—“Well, do so,”—replies the head-examiner, with a wave of the hand. Again Voinítzyn takes a ticket, again he goes off to the window, again he returns to the table, and again he maintains silence like that of a dead man. The unconcerned old man is ready to devour him alive. At last they drive him off, and place a cipher against his name. You think: "Now he will go away, at least?" Nothing of the sort! He returns to his place, sits there in the same impassive manner until the end of the examination, and as he takes his departure he exclaims: "Well, that was like a hot bath! what a tough job!"—And he roams about Moscow all that day, from time to time clutching at his head, and bitterly upbraiding his unhappy lot. As a matter of course, he does not touch a book, and the next morning the same story is repeated. So then, this Voinítzyn joined me. We chatted together about Moscow, about sport.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

"Would n't you like to have me introduce you to the leading wit of these parts?"—he suddenly whispered to me.

"Pray do."

Voinítzyn led me to a man of short stature, with a lofty curled crest and a moustache, in a cinnamon-brown dress-coat and a flowered neckerchief. His bilious, mobile features really did exhale cleverness and malice. His lips curled incessantly in a fleeting, caustic smile; his small black eyes, which he kept screwed up, peered forth audaciously from beneath uneven lashes. By his side stood a landed proprietor, a broad, soft, sweet man,—a regular Sugar-Honey,—and with only one eye. He laughed in advance at the witticisms of the little man, and seemed to be fairly rapturous with delight. Voinítzyn presented me to the wit, whose name was Piótr Petróvitch Lupíkhin. We made acquaintance, and exchanged the preliminary greetings.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“And allow me to introduce to you my best friend,”—said Lupíkhin suddenly, in a sharp voice, seizing the sweet proprietor by the hand.—“Come now, don’t hang back, Kiríla Selifánitch,”—he added:—“nobody is going to bite you. Here, sir,”—he went on, while the disconcerted Kiríla Selifánitch bowed as awkwardly as though his paunch were falling off:—“Here, sir, I recommend him to you, sir, a splendid noble. He enjoyed excellent health up to the age of fifty, and all of a sudden took it into his head to put himself through a course of treatment for his eyes, in consequence of which he has lost the sight of one of them. Ever since then, he has been treating his peasants with like success. . . . Well, and they, of course, with the same devotion . . . .”

“What a fellow he is!”—muttered Kiríla Selifánitch—and burst out laughing.

“Speak out, my friend—ekh, finish what you were about to say,”—interpolated Lupíkhin.—“Why, the first you know, you may be elected judge, and you will be elected, see if you are n’t. Well, of course the assessors will do your thinking for you, I suppose; for, you know, ’t is necessary, in case of need, to understand how to enun-

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

ciate other people's ideas, at least. Perhaps the Governor will drop in;—he will ask: 'What makes the judge stammer?' Well, let us assume that they tell him: 'He has had a stroke of paralysis.'—'Then bleed him,' he will say. And that is unseemly in your position, you must admit yourself."

The sweet landed proprietor fairly roared with laughter.

"There, you see, he's laughing,"—pursued Lupíkhin, with a vicious glance at Kiríla Selifánitch's heaving paunch.—"And why should n't he laugh?"—he added, addressing me:—"he's full-fed, healthy, has no children, his serfs are not mortgaged, and he gives them medical treatment,—his wife is rather crack-brained." (Kiríla Selifánitch turned somewhat aside, as though he had not heard, and went on roaring with laughter.)—"I laugh also, and my wife eloped with a surveyor." (He grinned.)

"Why, did n't you know that? Certainly! She just took and ran away, and left a letter for me: 'My dear Piótr Petróvitch,' says she, 'excuse me: carried away by passion, I am departing with the friend of my heart. . . .' And the surveyor fascinated her simply because he did n't cut his finger-nails, and wore trousers like tights. You are surprised? Here's a frank man, you say.—I-i, good heavens, we steppe-dwellers speak the truth straight out. But let us step aside. . . . Why should we stand by the future judge? . . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

He took my arm, and we walked off to the window.

“ I bear the reputation of a wit here,”—he said to me in the course of our conversation:—“ don’t you believe it. I am simply an embittered man, and I am swearing aloud: that is why I am so free and easy. And, as a matter of fact, why should I stand on ceremony? I don’t care a copper for anybody’s opinion, and am not in quest of anything; I am spiteful,—what of that! A spiteful man stands in no need of brains, at least. And you would n’t believe how refreshing it is. . . . Here, now, for example,—here now, just look at our host! Now why is he rushing about, for mercy’s sake, constantly looking at his watch, smiling, perspiring, assuming a pompous mien, torturing us with hunger? A pretty thing, truly, a dignitary! There, there he is rushing about again,—he has even begun to limp,—just look!”

And Lupíkhin laughed shrilly.

“ ’T is a great pity that there are no ladies,”—he went on, with a deep sigh:—“ it is a bachelor dinner,—and there’s no profit for the likes of us in that. Look, look,”—he suddenly exclaimed:—“ yonder comes Prince Kozélsky—that tall man with the beard, in yellow gloves. It is immediately evident that he has been abroad . . . .

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

and he always arrives so late. I'll tell you one thing, though: he's as stupid as a pair of merchant's horses; and you just ought to see how condescendingly he talks to men like me, how magnanimously he deigns to smile at the amiable attentions of our hungry wives and daughters! . . . . And he sometimes makes a joke, although he lives here only temporarily;—but what jokes! Precisely as though he were sawing at a hawser with a dull knife. He can't endure me. . . . I'll go and make my bow to him."

And Lupíkhin hastened to meet the Prince.

"And yonder comes my personal foe,"—he said, suddenly returning to me:—"do you see that fat man, with the dark-brown face, and the brush on his head,—yonder,—the one who has his cap clutched in his hand, and is making his way along the wall, and darting glances on all sides, like a wolf? I sold him for four hundred rubles a horse which was worth one thousand rubles, and that dumb beast now has a perfect right to despise me; but he is so devoid of capacity for thinking, especially of a morning, before tea, or immediately after dinner, that if you say to him: 'Good morning,' he will reply: 'what, sir?' And yonder comes the General," went on Lupíkhin:—"a civilian general on the retired list, a bankrupt general. He has a daughter made of beet-root sugar and a scrofula factory. . . . Excuse me, I did n't mean to say that . . . . well, you understand.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Ah! and the architect has got here! A German, and with a moustache, and does n't know his business,—astounding!—But why should he know his business? all he has to do is to take bribes, and set up as many columns and pillars as possible for our ancient nobility.”<sup>1</sup>

Again Lupíkhin began to laugh violently. . . . But suddenly a breathless agitation spread all over the house. The dignitary had arrived. The host fairly flew headlong to the anteroom. Behind him scurried several devoted domestics and zealous guests. . . . The noisy conversation was converted into a soft, agreeable murmur, resembling the humming of bees in their native hive in springtime. The irrepressible wasp, Lupíkhin, and the magnificent drone, Kozélsky, alone did not lower their voices. . . . And now, at last, the queen-bee entered—the dignitary entered. Hearts flew to greet him, heavy seated bodies rose; even the landed proprietor who had bought Lupíkhin's horse cheap, even that proprietor thrust his chin into his chest. The dignitary preserved his dignity to perfection: nodding his head backward, as though bowing, he uttered a few words of approval, each one of which began with the letter a, enunciated with a drawl through the nose;—with indignation which reached the pitch of biting, he stared at

<sup>1</sup> A pun is here intended. Stolb, a pillar or post, stolboví dvo-ryanín (column-noble), a nobleman of ancient family.—TRANSLATOR.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

Prince Kozélsky's beard, and gave the ruined civil General with the factory and the daughter the forefinger of his left hand. After a few moments, during the course of which the dignitary had managed to remark twice that he was very glad he had not arrived late for dinner, the whole company wended their way to the dining-room, big-wigs at the head.

Is it necessary for me to describe to the reader how the dignitary was given the principal seat, between the civil General and the Marshal of Nobility for the Government, a man with a free and dignified expression of countenance, which thoroughly matched his starched shirt-front, his capacious waistcoat, and his circular snuff-box filled with French snuff;—how the host fussed and ran about, and bustled, and urged the guests to eat, bestowed a smile in passing on the dignitary's back, and, standing in one corner, like a school-boy, hurriedly swallowed a plate of soup, or a bit of roast beef;—how the butler served a fish an arshín and a half<sup>1</sup> in length, and with a nosegay in its mouth;—how the liveried servants, surly of aspect, gruffly plied each nobleman now with Malaga, now with dry Madeira, and how almost all the noblemen, especially the elderly ones, drank glass after glass, as though resigning themselves to a sense of duty:—how, in conclusion, bottles of champagne were cracked, and they began to drink toasts to the health of various persons? All this is, probably, but too familiar to the reader. But what struck me as especially noteworthy was an anecdote, related by the dignitary himself amid universal joyous silence.

<sup>1</sup> Forty-two inches.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Some one—the ruined General I think it was, a man acquainted with the newest literature—aluded to the influence of women in general, and upon young men in particular.—“Yes, yes,”—put in the dignitary:—“that is true; young men should be kept under strict discipline, otherwise they are likely to go out of their heads over every petticoat.” (A smile of childlike mirth flitted across the faces of all the guests; the gratitude of one landed proprietor even glistened in his glance.)—“For young men are foolish.” (The dignitary, probably with a view to increasing their importance, sometimes altered the generally-received accentuation, of words.)—“Now, there’s my son Iván, for instance,” he continued: “the fool is only twenty years of age, and all of a sudden he says to me: ‘Dear little father, permit me to marry.’ I say to him: ‘Serve first, thou fool!’ . . . . Well, then came despair, tears . . . . but I’m . . . you know . . . .” (The words “you know” the dignitary uttered with his belly rather than with his lips; then he remained silent a little while, and cast a majestic glance at his neighbour the General, at the same time elevating his eyebrows more than one might have expected from him. The civilian General bowed his head pleasantly somewhat on one side, and winked the eye which was turned toward the dignitary with extreme rapidity.)—"And what do you think,"—began the dignitary again, "now he writes to me, saying: 'Thanks, father, for having taught the fool a lesson.' . . . That's the way one must proceed."—All the guests entirely agreed with the narrator, as a matter of course, and seemed to brighten up as a result of the pleasure and instruction which they had received. . . . After dinner, the whole company rose and withdrew to the drawing-room with great but decorous uproar, as though it were permitted on this occasion. . . . They sat down to play cards.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

I managed to while away the evening, and having enjoined my coachman to have my calash ready at five o'clock on the following morning, I retired to rest. But it was my lot to make acquaintance on that same day with still another remarkable man.

In consequence of the multitude of guests who had arrived, no one had a bedroom to himself. In the small, greenish, and rather damp chamber to which Alexánder Mikhaílovitch's butler conducted me, there was already another guest, completely undressed. On catching sight of me, he briskly dived under the coverlet, covered himself up with it to his very nose, nestled about a little in the spongy feather-bed, and quieted down, peering forth keenly from beneath the round border of his cotton nightcap. I stepped up to the other bed (there were only two in the room), undressed, and lay down in the damp sheets. My neighbour turned over in his bed. . . . . I wished him good night.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Half an hour elapsed. Despite my efforts, I could not get to sleep; useless and ill-defined thoughts followed one another in endless succession, persistently and monotonously, like the buckets of a pumping-machine.

“You are not sleepy, apparently,”—remarked my neighbour.

“As you see,”—I replied.—“And you’re not sleepy, either?”

“I’m never sleepy.”

“Why so?”

“Because I fall asleep I don’t know why; I lie and lie, and then get to sleep.”

“But why do you go to bed before you feel like sleeping?”

“Why, what would you have me do?”

I made no answer to my neighbour’s question.

“I’m surprised,” he went on, after a brief pause:—“that there are no fleas here. I thought they were everywhere.”

“You seem to regret them,”—I remarked.

“No, I don’t regret them; but I like logical sequence in everything.”

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

“ You don’t say so,”—I remarked to myself:
“ what words he uses! ”

Again my neighbour was silent for a while.

“ Would you like to make a bet with me? ”— he suddenly said, in quite a loud voice.

“ What about? ”

I was beginning to find my neighbour amusing.

“ H’m . . . . what about? Why, about this:
I ’m convinced that you take me for a fool.”

“ Good gracious,”—I murmured in amazement.

“ For a steppe-dweller, an ignoramus.—Confess. . . . ”

“ I have not the pleasure of knowing you,”—
I returned.—“ How have you arrived at the conclusion? . . . . ”

“ How? Why, from the mere sound of your voice: you answer me so carelessly. . . . But I ’m not in the least what you think. . . . ”

“ Permit me . . . . ”

“ No, do you permit me. In the first place, I speak French quite as well as you do, and German even better; in the second place, I have spent three years abroad: I have lived eight months in Berlin alone. I have studied Hegel, my dear sir, I know Goethe by heart; more than that, I was for a long time in love with the daughter of a German professor, and married at home a consumptive young gentlewoman,—a bald, but very remarkable individual. Consequently, I am a berry from the same field as yourself; I 'm not a rustic steppe-dweller, as you suppose. . . . I also am bitten with reflex action, and there 's nothing direct about me. . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN.

I raised my head, and looked at the eccentric with redoubled attention. In the dim light of the night-lamp I could barely distinguish his features.

“ There now, you are staring at me,”—he went on, adjusting his nightcap,—“ and, probably, you are asking yourself: ‘ How comes it that I did not notice him to-day?’ I will tell you why you did not notice me:—because I do not raise my voice; because I hide behind other people, stand behind doors, converse with no one; because the butler, as he passes me with a tray, elevates his elbow in advance on a level with my breast. . . . And whence does all this proceed? From two causes: in the first place, I am poor, and in the second, I am resigned. . . . Speak the truth, you did n’t observe me, did you? ”

“ I really did not have the pleasure. . . .”

“ Well, well, yes,”—he interrupted me:—“ I knew it.”

He raised himself half-way, and folded his arms; the long shadow of his nightcap flitted from the wall to the ceiling.

“ Come now, confess,”—he suddenly added, casting a sidelong glance at me:—“ I must seem to you a great eccentric, an original, as they say, or, perhaps, even something still worse; perhaps you think that I pretend to be an eccentric?"

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

"I must repeat to you, once more, that I do not know you. . ."

He cast down his eyes for a moment.

"Why I have so unexpectedly set to talking with you,—with a man who is an entire stranger to me,—the Lord—the Lord only knows!" (He sighed.) "'T is not in consequence of the affinity of our souls! Both you and I are respectable persons, egoists; you have nothing to do with me, neither have I the slightest thing to do with you; is n't that so? But neither of us is sleepy. . . . Why not have a chat? I'm in the mood, and that rarely happens with me. I'm timid, you see, and not timid in virtue of the fact that I am a provincial, without official rank, a poor man, but in virtue of the fact that I am a frightfully conceited man. But sometimes, under the influence of propitious circumstances, accidents, which I am unable, however, either to define or foresee, my timidity disappears completely, as on the present occasion, for instance. You might set me face to face with the Dalai-Lama himself now,—and I'd ask him for a pinch of snuff. But perhaps you want to go to sleep?"

"On the contrary,"—I hastily returned:—"I find it very agreeable to chat with you."

"That is, I amuse you, you mean to say. . . ."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

So much the better. . . . So then, sir, I must inform you, that I am called an original in these parts; that is to say, I am so called by those from whose tongues my name chances, accidentally, to fall, along with other trifling things. ‘No one is greatly concerned as to my fate.’ . . . They think to wound me. . . . O my God! if they only knew . . . why, I’m perishing precisely because there is positively nothing original about me, nothing except such sallies as my present conversation with you, for example; but, you see, those sallies are n’t worth a copper coin. That’s the very cheapest and most vulgar sort of originality.”

He turned his face toward me and waved his hands.

“My dear sir!”—he exclaimed:—“My opinion is, that the originals are the only people who enjoy life on earth; they alone have the right to live. Mon verre n’est pas grand, mais je bois dans mon verre, some one has said.—You see,”—he added in an undertone:—“what pure French I speak. What care I if a man has a great and capacious head, and understands everything, knows a great deal, and keeps abreast of the times,—but has nothing special of his own! It merely makes one storehouse for commonplaces more in the world,—and who derives any satisfaction out of that? No, be stupid if you will, only do it in your own way! Have an odour of your own, that’s what!—And do not imagine that my demands with respect to that odour are great. . . . . God forbid! There 's a mass of such originals: no matter in what direction you look, you behold an original; every living man is an original, but for some reason I have n't fallen into their category! . . .

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

“And yet,”—he went on, after a brief pause:—“what expectations I aroused in my youth! what a lofty opinion I cherished of myself before I went abroad, and during the early days after my return thence! Well, while I was abroad, I kept on the alert, I always made my way about alone, as is fitting for a fellow like me, who understands everything, is up to everything; and in the end, lo and behold,—he has n't understood the first thing! . . .

“An original, an original!”—he resumed, shaking his head reproachfully. . . . “They call me an original . . . . as a matter of fact, it appears that there is n't a less original man in the world than your most humble servant. I must have been born in imitation of some one else. . . . By heaven, I must! I exist as though in imitation of the writers I have studied, I exist in the sweat of my brow; and I have studied, and fallen in love, and married, in conclusion, just as though it were not of my own volition, just as though I were performing some duty, executing some lesson,—who can explain it!”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

He tore the nightcap from his head and flung it on the bed.

“ Shall I tell you the story of my life? ”—he asked me in a spasmodic voice:—“ or, rather, a few incidents of my life? ”

“ Pray do.”

“ Or—no, I had better tell you how I came to marry. For marriage is an important affair, the test-stone of every man; in it, as in a mirror, is reflected . . . . But that comparison is too hackneyed. . . . If you permit, I will take a pinch of snuff.”

He pulled a snuff-box from under his pillow, opened it, and began to talk again, waving the open box.

“ Put yourself in my position, my dear sir.—Judge for yourself, what profit,—come now, for mercy’s sake, tell me,—what profit could I extract from Hegel’s encyclopædia? Tell me, what has that encyclopædia in common with Russian life? And how would you have me apply it to our existence—and not that encyclopædia alone, but German philosophy in general . . . . I will say more—German science? ”

He leaped up in his bed, and muttered in an undertone, viciously setting his teeth:

“ Ah, that ’s the point, that ’s the point! . . . . Then why didst thou trot off abroad? Why didst not thou stay at home, and study the life which surrounded thee on the spot? Thou wouldst have learned its requirements and its future, and thou wouldst have become clear concerning thine own vocation, so to speak. . . . But good gracious,"—he continued, again altering his voice, as though defending himself and quailing:—"how is a man like me to inform himself about a thing concerning which not a single wiseacre has written anything in a book! I would be glad to take lessons from it, from that same Russian life,—but it maintains silence, my dear little dove. 'Understand me,' it says, 'as I am;' but that is beyond my power: give me the deductions, present to me the conclusion of the matter. . . . The conclusion?—'Here is the conclusion for thee,' people say: 'just listen to our Moscow folks—they're nightingales, are n't they?'—And precisely therein lies the calamity, that they warble like Kursk nightingales, but don't talk like human beings. . . . So I meditated and meditated,—you see, science is the same everywhere, apparently, and is the only genuine thing,—and took and set off, with God's aid, to foreign parts, to infidels. . . . What would you have,—I was besotted with youth, with pride. I was n't willing, you know, to swim in fat before my time, although 't is healthy, they say. However, the person who has not been endowed by nature with flesh, will never behold fat on his body!

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

"But I believe,"—he added, after reflecting a while,—"that I promised to narrate to you how

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

I came to get married. Listen, then. In the first place, I must inform you that my wife is no longer in the world; in the second place . . . but in the second place, I perceive that I must tell you about my youth, otherwise you will not understand anything. . . . You are sure you don't want to go to sleep?"

"No, I don't."

"Very good. Just listen . . . how vulgarly Mr. Kantagriúkhin is snoring yonder, in the next room!—I am the son of poor parents,—parents, I say, because, in addition to a mother, there is a tradition that I had a father also. I do not remember him; they say that he was a man of limited capacity, had a huge nose and freckles, and took snuff up one nostril; in my mother's bedroom hung his portrait, in a red uniform with a black collar reaching up to his ears, and remarkably hideous. They used to lead me past it on my way to a whipping, and on such occasions my mother always pointed it out to me, with the remark: 'Thou wouldst have fared still worse at his hands.' You can imagine how greatly this encouraged me. I had neither brothers nor sisters; that is to say, to tell the truth, I did have a sort of wretched little brother, who was afflicted with the rickets, but he died very soon. . . . And why should the rickets perch in the Zhígyr district of the Kursk government? But that is not the point. My mother busied herself over my education with the headlong zeal of a landed proprietress of the steppes; she busied herself with it from the very magnificent day of my birth until I had attained the age of sixteen. . . . Do you follow the thread of my story? ”

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY.

“ Certainly, proceed.”

“ Well, good. So then, when I had attained the age of sixteen, my mother without delay took and dismissed my French tutor and the German Philipóvitch from the Greeks of Nyézhin: <sup>1</sup> she took me to Moscow, entered me in the university, and surrendered her soul to the Almighty, leaving me in the hands of my own uncle, the pettifogger Koltún-Babúr, a bird who was known to more than the Zhígrý district. This own uncle of mine, the pettifogger Koltún-Babúr, robbed me of my last penny, as is the custom. . . . But again, that is not the point. I entered the university, to do my mother justice, tolerably well prepared; but the lack of originality was discernible in me even then. My childhood had differed in no respect from the childhood of other youths: I had grown up as stupid and drowsy as though I had been under a feather-bed, and began just as early to commit verses to memory, and to languish under the pretext of an inclination to dreaminess . . . . and all the rest of it. In the university I did not travel along a new road: I immediately fell into a circle. Times were different then. . . . But perhaps you do not know what a circle is?—I remember that Schiller says somewhere:

<sup>1</sup> A Greek colony in Little Russia.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Gefährlich ist's, den Leu zu wecken,
Und schrecklich is des Tigers Zahn,
Doch das schrecklichste der Schrecken—
Das ist der Mensch in seinem Wahn!

“He did not mean to say that, I assure you; he meant to say: ‘Das is ein circle . . . . . in der Stadt Moskau!’”

“But what is it that you find dreadful in a circle?”—I inquired.

My neighbour snatched up his nightcap, and pulled it down on his nose.

“What is it that I find dreadful?”—he shouted.—“Why, this: a circle—why, that is the perdition of all independent development; a circle is a hideous substitute for society, women, life; a circle. . . . O, but wait; I will tell you what a circle is! A circle is that sluggish and drowsy dwelling together, side by side, to which the significance and aspect of a sensible deed is attached; a circle substitutes arguments for conversation, trains men to fruitless jabbering, diverts you from solitary, beneficent work, infects you with the literary itch; it robs you, in short, of your freshness and virginal firmness of soul. A circle—why, it is staleness and boredom under the name of brotherhood and friendship, a concatenation of misunderstandings and cavillings under the pretext of frankness and sympathy; in a circle—thanks to the right of every friend to thrust his unwashed fingers, at all seasons, at all hours, straight into the interior of a comrade—no one has a pure, untouched spot in his soul; in a circle, men bow down before an empty, fine talker, a conceited clever fellow, a premature old man; they bear aloft in their arms the talentless scribbler of verses, but with ‘hidden’ thoughts; in a circle, young fellows of seventeen discourse craftily and wisely of women, or talk with them just as in a book,—and what things they talk about! In a circle cunning eloquence flourishes; in a circle, men watch each other in a way not at all inferior to police officials. . . . O circle! thou art not a circle: thou art an enchanted ring, in which more than one honest man has gone to destruction!”

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

“Come, you are exaggerating, allow me to observe to you,”—I interrupted him.

My neighbour stared at me in silence.

“Perhaps,—the Lord knows,—perhaps I am. But, you see, only one pleasure is left to fellows like me—to exaggerate. So, sir, in this manner I spent four years in Moscow. I am not able to describe to you, my dear sir, with what rapidity, with what frightful rapidity, that time passed; it even makes me sad and vexed to recall

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

it. 'T is as though you rose in the morning and went coasting down hill on a sled. . . . The first you know, lo! you have reached the end; and already it is evening; here 's the sleepy servant pulling off your coat,—and you change your dress, and wend your way to your friend, and set to smoking a pipe, and drinking glasses of weak tea, and discussing German philosophy, love, the eternal sun of the spirit, and other remote objects. But there also I met original, independent people; no matter how capricious one of them might be, no matter how much he hid himself in a corner, still nature would assert her rights; I alone, unhappy wight, moulded myself like soft wax, and my miserable nature did not display the slightest resistance! In the meantime, I had reached the age of one and twenty. I entered into possession of my inheritance, or, to speak more accurately, of that portion of my inheritance which my guardian had graciously seen fit to leave me, gave a power of attorney to manage all my hereditary estates to an emancipated house-serf, Vasíly Kudryásheff, and went abroad to Berlin. I remained abroad, as I have already had the honour to inform you, three years. And what came of that? There, abroad, also, I remained the same un-original being. In the first place, there 's no disputing the fact, that I did not make acquaintance with the actual Europe, with European existence, not the least bit; I listened to the German professors, and read German books on the very spot of their birth . . . . . that is all the difference there was. I led an isolated life, just as though I had been a monk; I consorted with retired lieutenants who were oppressed, like myself, with a thirst for knowledge, but were very dull of understanding, and not endowed with the gift of words; I frequented the society of dull-witted families from Pénza and other grain-producing governments; I lolled in the cafés, read the newspapers, went to the theatre in the evenings. I had little acquaintance with the natives of the country, I talked with them in a constrained sort of way, and never saw a single one of them at my own quarters, with the exception of two or three intrusive young fellows of Jewish extraction, who kept incessantly running to me and borrowing money from me,—luckily, der Russe was confiding. A strange freak of chance at last took me into the house of one of my professors; and this was the way it came about: I went to him to enter myself in his course, and the first I knew he suddenly invited me to spend the evening with him. This professor had two daughters, twenty-seven years of age, such buxom girls—God bless them!—such magnificent noses, curls in papers, pale-blue eyes, and red hands with pallid nails. One was named Linchen, the other Minchen. I began to frequent the professor's house. I must tell you that that professor was not exactly stupid, but cracked as it were; he talked quite coherently on the lecture-platform, but at home he lisped, and kept his spectacles always on his forehead; moreover, he was an extremely learned man. . . . And what came of it? All of a sudden, I took it into my head that I had fallen in love with Linchen,—and for six whole months I thought so. I talked very little to her, it is true,—I chiefly stared at her; but I read aloud to her divers affecting compositions, pressed her hand on the sly, and of an evening meditated by her side, gazing intently at the moon, or simply into the air. Moreover, she did make such capital coffee! . . . ‘What more do I want?’ I thought to myself. One thing troubled me: at the very moments of inexpressible bliss, as the saying is, I always had a pain in the lower part of my chest, for some reason or other, and an acute, cold chill coursed through my stomach. At last, I could endure such happiness no longer, and I fled. I spent two whole years abroad after that: I was in Italy, in Rome I stood in front of the ‘Transfiguration,’ in Florence in front of the ‘Venus’; all at once, I went into exaggerated raptures, as though seized with a fit of ferocity; in the evenings I scribbled verses, and started a diary; in a word, I conducted myself there as everybody does. And yet, just see how easy it is to be original. I understand nothing about painting and sculpture, for example.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

. . . I might simply have said that aloud . . . . .
no, impossible. I engage a cicerone, and run and look at the frescoes. . . .”

Again he dropped his eyes, and again flung off his nightcap.

“ So, at last, I returned to my native land,”— he went on, in a weary tone:—“ I arrived in Moscow. In Moscow I underwent an amazing change. Abroad I had chiefly held my tongue, but here, all of a sudden, I began to talk with unexpected boldness, and at the same time, conceived God knows what lofty opinion of myself. Indulgent people turned up, to whom I appeared something very like a genius; but I was not able to maintain myself at the height of my glory. One fine morning a calumny sprang into existence with regard to me (who brought it forth into the light of God, I know not: some old maid of the male sex, it must have been,—there ’s a lot of such old maids in Moscow),—sprang into existence, and began to put forth shoots and runners, just as though it had been a strawberry-plant. I got confused, tried to jump out of it, to break asunder the adhesive threads,—but it could n’t be done. . . . I went away. In that case also, I proved myself an absurd man; I ought to have quite quietly awaited the attack, waited for this misfortune to run its course, just as one awaits the end of nettlerash, and those same indulgent persons would again have opened

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

their arms to me, those same ladies would again have smiled at my speeches. . . . But there's the pity of it: I'm not an original man. Conscientiousness, you will be pleased to observe, suddenly awoke in me: for some reason, I became ashamed to chatter, chatter without ceasing, to chatter—yesterday on the Arbát, to-day on the Trubá, to-morrow at the Sivtzevóy-Vrázhek.<sup>1</sup> And forever about the selfsame thing. . . . And was it wanted? Just look at the genuine warriors in that career: that is a matter of no consequence to them; on the contrary, that is all they require; some of them will toil twenty years with their tongues, and always in the same direction. . . . That's what confidence in one's self and self-conceit will do for a man! And I had it, too,—self-conceit,—and it has not entirely quieted down even yet. . . . But the fatal point, I will repeat it once more, is, that I am not an original man, I stopped short in mid-career: nature should have allotted to me a great deal more conceit, or not given me any at all. But, at first, I really did have a pretty hard time: in addition to this, my trip abroad had completely exhausted my resources, and I did not wish to marry a merchant's widow, with a youthful but already flabby body, in the nature of jelly, and so I withdrew to my estate in the country. I think,"—added my neighbour, casting another sidelong glance at me,—“that I may pass over in silence my first impressions of country life, allusions to the beauty of nature, the tranquil charm of solitude, and so forth. . . .”

<sup>1</sup>Squares and streets in MOSCOW.—TRANSLATOR.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

“You may, you may,”—I replied.

“The more so,”—pursued the narrator,—“as all that is nonsense,—at least, so it seems to me. I got as bored in the country as a locked-up puppy, although I admit that, as I passed, for the first time, in springtime, on my homeward journey, through the familiar birch-grove, my head began to swim and my heart to beat with confused, sweet anticipation. But these sweet anticipations, as you yourself know, never are realised, but, on the contrary, other things come to pass, which you are not in the least expecting, such as: murrain, tax-arrears, sales at public auction, and so forth, and so forth. I made shift to live from day to day, with the assistance of the peasant overseer Yákoff, who had superseded the former manager, and proved, later on, to be as great a thief as he, if not even greater than he, and who poisoned my existence, into the bargain, with the odour of his tarred boots. . . . I one day called to mind a neighbouring family, with whom I was acquainted, consisting of the widow of a retired Colonel and her two daughters, ordered my drozhky harnessed, and drove off to my neighbours. That day must forever remain memorable to me; six months later, I married the Coloneless' second daughter. . . ."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

The narrator hung his head, and raised his arms to heaven.

"And yet,"—he went on with fervour:—"I do not wish to inspire you with a bad opinion of my deceased wife. God forbid! She was the noblest, kindest creature, a loving creature, and capable of every sacrifice, although I must confess, between ourselves, if I had not had the misfortune to lose her, I probably should not have been in a position to chat with you to-day, for there still exists, in the cellar of my cherry-shed,<sup>1</sup> a beam on which I repeatedly made preparations to hang myself!

"Some pears,"—he began again, after a brief pause,— "must be allowed to lie for a certain time in the cellar, in order, as the saying is, to acquire their real savour; my deceased wife, evidently, also belonged to that sort of products of nature. Only now do I do her full justice. Only now, for example, do the memories of certain evenings, which I spent with her before the wedding, fail to arouse in me the slightest bitterness, but, on the contrary, affect me almost to tears. They were not wealthy people; their house, very old, of wood, but comfortable, stood on a hill between a neglected park and an overgrown yard. At the foot of the hill flowed a river, which was barely visible through the dense foliage. A large veranda led from the house to the garden; in front of the veranda flaunted a long flower-bed, covered with roses; at each end of the bed grew two acacias, which in their youth had been interwoven in the form of a spiral by the deceased owner. A little further off, in the very thickest part of the neglected raspberry-plot, which had run wild, stood an arbour, very artfully painted inside, but so aged and decrepit outside, that it made one uncomfortable to look at it. A glazed door led from the veranda into the drawing-room; and in the drawing-room this is what presented itself to the curious gaze of the observer: in the corners, tiled stoves; a discordant piano on the right, loaded down with manuscript music; a divan, upholstered in faded sky-blue material with whitish patterns; a circular table; two étagères, with trifles of porcelain and glass beads dating from the time of Katherine II; on the wall, the familiar portrait of a fair-haired young girl with a dove on her bosom and her eyes rolled heavenward; on the table, a vase filled with fresh roses. . . . You see how minutely I describe. In that drawing-room and on that terrace the entire tragicomedy of my love was enacted. My neighbour's wife herself was a spiteful woman, with a permanent hoarseness of malice in her throat,—a nagging and quarrelsome person; one of her daughters, Véra, was in no way different from ordinary young country gentlewomen; the other was Sófyá,—and I fell in love with Sófyá. The two sisters had still another room, their common bedroom, with two innocent little wooden beds, yellowish albums, mignonette, and portraits of their friends, male and female, drawn in pencil, and pretty badly done; among them one was especially noteworthy,—that of a gentleman with a remarkably energetic expression of countenance and a still more energetic signature, who in his youth had aroused incommensurable expectations, and had ended, like all the rest of us, in—nothing; with busts of Goethe and Schiller, with German books, withered wreaths, and other objects which had been preserved in commemoration. But I entered this room rarely and unwillingly: for some reason or other, my breathing was oppressed there. Moreover—strange to say!—I liked Sófyá best of all when I was sitting with my back to her, or still more, probably, when I was thinking or meditating about her, especially in the evening, on the veranda. Then I gazed at the sunset glow, at the trees, at the tiny green leaves, which had already grown dark but were still distinctly discernible against the rosy sky; in the drawing-room, at the piano, sat Sófyá, uninterruptedly playing some favourite, passionately pensive passage from Beethoven; the spiteful old woman snored regularly, as she sat on the divan; in the dining-room, illuminated by a flood of crimson light, Véra busied herself with the tea; the samovár hissed sportively, as though rejoicing over something; the cracknels broke with a merry snap, the teaspoons rattled resonantly against the cups; the canary-bird, which had been trilling ruthlessly all day long, had suddenly quieted down, and only now and then gave vent to a chirp, as though making an inquiry about something; sparse rain-drops fell from a light, transparent little cloud as it swept past. . . . And I sat and sat, and listened and listened, and my heart swelled, and again it seemed to me that I was in love. So, under the influence of an evening of this sort, I one day asked the old woman for her daughter's hand, and two months later I was married. It seemed to me that I loved her. . . . And even now, though it is time for me to know, yet, by heaven, I don't know even now whether I loved Sófyá. She was a good-natured, clever, taciturn creature, with a warm heart; but, God knows why, whether from having lived so long in the country, or from some other causes, at the bottom of her soul (if there be such a thing as a bottom to the soul) she had a hidden wound, or, to express it better, she had a running sore, which nothing could heal, and neither she nor I was able to put a name to it. The existence of this wound I divined, of course, only long after the wedding.

<sup>1</sup>In districts where the winter is too severe for unprotected cherry-trees, they are planted in a roughly-roofed, deep trench.—

TRANSLATOR.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And what efforts I made over her—all was to no avail! In my childhood I had a finch which the cat once held in her paws for a while: the finch was rescued and nursed, but it never recovered; it sulked, pined away, and ceased to sing. . . . The end of it was, that one night a mouse got into its open cage, and gnawed off its bill, in consequence of which, at last, it made up its mind to die. I know not what cat had held my wife in its claws, but she sulked and pined in exactly the same way as my unhappy finch. Sometimes it was evident that she herself wanted to shake her wings, to rejoice in the fresh air, in the sunshine, and at liberty; she would make the effort—and curl up in a ball! And yet she loved me: how many times did she assure me that she had nothing more to wish for,—whew, damn it!—and her eyes would darken the while. I thought to myself: ‘Is n’t there something in her past?’ I made inquiries: I found that there had been nothing. Well, so now then, judge for yourself: an original man would have shrugged his shoulders, heaved a couple of sighs, and taken to living in his own way; but I ’m not an original being, I began to stare at the rafters. My wife had become so thoroughly corroded with all the habits of an old maid,—Beethoven, nocturnal rambles, mignonette, correspondence with her friends, albums, and so forth,—that it was utterly impossible for her to get used to any other mode of life, especially to the life of the mistress of the house; and yet, it is ridiculous for a married woman to languish with a nameless woe, and sing in the evening: 'Wake thou her not at dawn!'

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

"So, sir, after this fashion we enjoyed felicity for three years; in the fourth year Sófyá died in childbed with her first child,—and, strange to say, I seemed to have had a presentiment that she would not be capable of giving me a daughter or a son, a new inhabitant for the earth. I remember her funeral. It was in the spring. Our parish church is small and old, the ikonostásis has turned black, the walls are bare, the brick floor is broken in places; on each side of the choir is a large, ancient holy picture. The coffin was brought in, and placed in the very centre, in front of the Imperial Door,<sup>1</sup> draped in a faded pall, and three candlesticks were set around it. The service began. The decrepit lay-reader, with his little pig-tail behind, girt low on the hips with a green girdle, mumbled mournfully in front of the folding reading-desk; the priest, also aged, with a kindly and sightless face, in a lilac cope with yellow patterns, did his own part of the service and the deacon's also. The fresh young foliage of the weeping birches fluttered and whispered to the full extent of the open windows; the fragrance of the grass was wafted in from out of doors; the red flame of the wax candles paled in the cheerful light of the spring day; the sparrows fairly filled the church with their twittering; and now and then, up under the cupola, resounded the ringing cry of a swallow which had flown in. The reddish-brown heads of a few peasants, who were zealously praying for the dead woman, rose and fell in the golden dust of the sun's rays; the smoke escaped from the orifice of the censer in a slender, bluish stream. I looked at the dead face of my wife. . . . My God! even death, death itself, had not released her, had not healed her wound: there was the same painful, timid, dumb expression,—as though she were not at her ease even in the grave. . . . My blood surged bitterly within me. She was a good, good creature, but she did a good thing for herself when she died!”

<sup>1</sup>The double central door in the ikonostásis (image-screen), which corresponds to the chancel-rail in the Western Church.—

TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

The narrator's cheeks reddened and his eyes grew dim.

“Having, at last, got rid of the heavy depression which took possession of me after the death of my wife,”—he began again,—“I conceived the notion of taking to business, as the saying is. I entered government service in the capital of the Government,<sup>1</sup> but the huge rooms of the governmental establishment made my head ache, and my eyes worked badly; and other causes presented themselves also, by the way. . . . I retired. I wanted to go to Moscow, but, in the first place, I lacked the money; and, in the second place . . . . I have already told you that I have become resigned. This resignation came upon me both suddenly and not suddenly. In spirit I had long since become resigned, but my head still refused to bend. I ascribed the modest frame of my feelings and thoughts to the influence of country life, of unhappiness. . . . On the other hand, I had already long before noticed that almost all my neighbours, old and young, who had been frightened at first by my learning, by my trip abroad, and by the other opportunities of my education, had not only succeeded in becoming thoroughly accustomed to me, but had even begun to treat me, if not rudely, at least with sneering condescension, did not listen to me to the end when I was arguing, and in speaking with me no longer used the 'sir.'<sup>1</sup> I have also forgotten to tell you that during the course of the first year after my marriage I had tried my hand at literature, out of tedium, and had even sent an article to a newspaper,—a story, if I mistake not; but some time afterward I received a polite letter from the editor, in which, among other things, he said that while it could not be denied that I had brains, it could be denied that I had talent, and in literature talent was necessary. In addition to <sup>1</sup>The addition of the letter s to words, here indicated, is not precisely "sir" or "madam," but a courteous, lesser equivalent, which must be rendered thus.—TRANSLATOR.

<sup>1</sup> Corresponding to a State in the United States.—TRANSLATOR.

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

this, it came to my knowledge that a man from Moscow, who chanced to be passing through,—an extremely amiable young fellow, by the way,—had referred to me in passing as an extinct and empty man, at an evening party at the Governor's. But my semi-voluntary blindness still continued: I did n't want to 'box my own ears,' you know; at last, one fine morning, I opened my eyes. This is the way it came about. The chief of rural police dropped in to see me, with the purpose of calling my attention to a ruined bridge on my domains, which I positively had not the means of mending. As he washed down a bit of dried sturgeon with a glass of vódka, this patronising guardian of order reproved me in a paternal way for my thoughtlessness, but entered into my situation, and merely recommended me to order my peasants to throw on a little manure, lighted his pipe, and began to talk about the approaching elections. A certain Orbassánoff, an empty swashbuckler, and a bribe-taker to boot, was at that time a candidate for the honourable post of Marshal of the Nobility for the Government. Moreover, he was not noteworthy either for his wealth or for his distinction. I expressed my opinion concerning him, and rather carelessly at that: I must confess that I looked down upon Mr. Orbassánoff. The chief of police looked at me, tapped me affectionately on the shoulder, and said good-naturedly:—' Ekh, Vasíly Vasílievitch,

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

't is not for you and me to judge of such persons;—how can we? . . . . Let every one keep his proper place.'<sup>1</sup>—'Why, good gracious!'—I retorted with vexation, 'what difference is there between me and Mr. Orbassánoff?'—The chief took his pipe out of his mouth, opened his eyes very wide, and fairly burst with laughter.—'Come, you funny man,'—he said at last, through his tears: 'what a joke you have got off . . . . . ah! was n't that a good one!'—and he never stopped making fun of me until he departed, now and then nudging me in the ribs with his elbow and even addressing me as 'thou.' He went away at last. That was the last drop: the cup overflowed. I paced up and down the room a few times, halted in front of the mirror, stared for a long, long time at my disconcerted countenance, and, slowly sticking out my tongue, shook my head with a bitter smile. The veil fell from my eyes; I saw clearly, more clearly than I saw my face in the mirror, what an empty, insignificant, and useless, unoriginal man I was!"

The narrator made a brief pause.

"In one of Voltaire's tragedies,"—he went on dejectedly,—“a certain gentleman is delighted that he has reached the extreme limits of ill luck. Although there is nothing tragic in my fate, yet I must confess that I have tasted something of <sup>1</sup> In Russian, literally: "Let the cricket know his hearth."—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

that sort. I have learned to know the venomous raptures of cold despair; I have learned by experience how sweet it is to lie, without haste, in bed for an entire morning and curse the day and hour of my birth;—I could not resign myself all at once. And, in fact, judge for yourself: my lack of money fettered me to my detested country-place; I was fit for nothing,—neither agriculture, nor the service, nor literature; I avoided the landed proprietors, books revolted me; for the dropsical and sickly-sentimental young ladies, who shook their curls and feverishly reiterated the word ‘life,’ I had ceased to be in the least attractive as soon as I ceased to chatter and go into ecstasies; I did not know how to isolate myself completely, neither could I do so. . . . I began to—what do you think?—I began to haunt my neighbours. As though intoxicated with scorn for myself, I purposely subjected myself to all sorts of petty humiliations. They passed me over at the table, they greeted me coldly and haughtily; at last, they took no notice whatever of me; they did not even allow me to mingle in the general conversation, and I myself used deliberately to back up from a corner some extremely stupid babbler, who at one time, in Moscow, would have kissed my feet, the hem of my cloak, in rapture. . . I did not even permit myself to think that I was surrendering myself to the bitter satisfaction of irony. . . . Good heavens, what is irony in solitude! This, sir, is the way I behaved for several years in succession, and the way I am behaving up to the present time. . . .”

HAMLET OF SHSHTCHÍGRY

“Why, this is outrageous,” growled the sleepy voice of Mr. Kantagriúkhin, from the adjoining room:—“What fool has taken it into his head to prate by night?”

The narrator briskly dived down under his coverlet and, timidly peering out, shook his finger at me.

“Sh . . . . . sssssh!”—he whispered; and, as though apologising and bowing in the direction of Mr. Kantagriúkhin’s voice, he said respectfully:—“I obey, sir; I obey, sir; excuse me, sir. . . . It is permissible for him to sleep, he has a right to sleep,”—he went on again in a whisper: “he must gather fresh strength, well, if only in order that he may eat with his usual satisfaction to-morrow. We have no right to disturb him. Moreover, I think I have told you all I wished; probably, you would like to go to sleep also. I wish you a good night.”

The narrator turned over with feverish haste, and buried his head in his pillows.

“Permit me at least to inquire,”—I asked:—“with whom have I the honour . . . .”

He raised his head alertly.

“No, for God’s sake,”—he interrupted me:—“don’t ask my name of me or of others. Let me remain for you an unknown being, Vasíly Vasílievitch, bruised by fate. Moreover, as an unoriginal man, I do not deserve to have a name of my own. . . . But if you absolutely insist upon giving me some appellation, then call me . . . . call me the Hamlet of Shshtchígry County. There are lots of such Hamlets in every county, but perhaps you have not encountered any others. . . . Herewith, farewell.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Again he buried himself in his feather-bed, and on the following morning, when they came to wake me, he was no longer in the room. He had departed at daybreak.

VIII

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF AND NEDOPIÚSKIN

ONE hot summer day I was returning from the hunt in a peasant cart; Ermolái was dozing as he sat beside me, and bobbing his head forward. The slumbering hounds were jolting about like dead bodies under our feet. The coachman kept incessantly flicking the gadflies off the horses with his whip. The white dust floated in a light cloud after the cart. We drove into the bushes. The road became more full of pits, the wheels began to come in contact with the branches. Ermolái gave a start, and glanced around him. . . . "Eh!"—said he:—"why, there ought to be black-cock here. Let's alight."—We halted and entered the tract of second growth and bushes. My dog hit upon a covey of birds. I fired, and was beginning to reload my gun when, suddenly, behind me, a loud crash made itself heard, and, parting the bushes with his hands, a man on horseback rode up to me.—"Pér-mit me to inquire,"—he said, in an arrogant voice, "by what right you are shooting here, m' d'r s'r." <sup>1</sup>

The stranger spoke with unusual rapidity, ab-

<sup>1</sup> His pronunciation is indicated as affected.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

ruptly, and through his nose. I looked him in the face: never in my life had I beheld anything like him. Figure to yourself, dear readers, a tiny, fair-haired man with a little red snub-nose and a long red moustache. An octagonal Persian cap with a crimson cloth top covered his forehead to his very brows. He was clad in a long, thread-bare, yellow Caucasian coat with black velveteen cartridge-sheaths on the breast and faded silver galloon on all the seams; across his shoulder hung his hunting-horn, a dagger projected from his belt. His emaciated, roman-nosed, sorrel horse staggered beneath him, like a drunken creature; two greyhounds, gaunt and wry-footed, pranced about between its legs. The face, the glance, the voice, every movement, the whole person of the stranger exhaled mad hardihood and boundless, unprecedented pride; his pale-blue, glassy eyes were shifty and squinting, like those of a tipsy man; he flung his head back, puffed out his cheeks, snorted and quivered all over, as though with excess of pride—for all the world like a turkey-cock. He repeated his question.

“I did not know that shooting here was forbidden,”—I replied.

“You are on my land here, my dear sir,”—he went on.

“Very well, I will go.”

“But pér-mit me to inquire,”—he returned:

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“have I the honour to explain myself with a noble?”

I mentioned my name.

“In that case, pray go on shooting. I am a noble myself, and am very glad to be of service to a noble. . . . My name is Tchertop-khánoff, Panteléi.”

He bent forward, gave a whoop, lashed his horse on the neck with his whip, shook his head, dashed aside, and crushed the paw of one of his dogs. The dog began to whimper shrilly. Tchertopkhánoff began to seethe and hiss, smote his horse on the head between the ears, sprang to the earth quicker than a flash of lightning, scrutinised the dog's paw, spat on the wound, kicked the animal in the side with his foot to stop its outcries, grasped the horse's forelock, and thrust his foot into the stirrup. The horse tossed its muzzle, elevated its tail, and darted sideways into the bushes; he went hopping after it on one leg, but vaulted into the saddle at last; he flourished his kazák whip like a man in a frenzy, blew a blaring blast on his horn, and galloped off. Before I could recover myself from this unexpected apparition of Tchertopkhánoff, suddenly, almost without a sound, a rather corpulent man of forty rode out of the bushes on a small, black nag. He drew up, removed from his head a green leather cap of military shape, and in a shrill, soft voice asked me whether I had seen a rider on a sorrel horse. I replied that I had.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“In what direction did they<sup>1</sup> deign to ride?”—he went on, in the same tone, and without putting on his cap.

“In that direction, sir.”

“I am greatly obliged to you, sir.”

He chirruped, joggled his feet against the horse's ribs, and rode off at a trot,—jog-trot,—in the direction indicated. I watched him until his peaked cap vanished among the boughs. This new stranger did not in the least resemble his predecessor, so far as his external appearance was concerned. His face, round and puffy as a ball, expressed bashfulness, good-nature, and gentle resignation; his nose, which was also round and puffy and speckled with blue veins, betrayed the sensualist. Not a single hair remained on his head in front; at the back, thin red hair stuck out; his small eyes, which seemed to have been cleft with a cutting sedge, blinked amiably; his red, lush lips smiled sweetly. He wore a surtout with a standing collar and brass buttons, extremely threadbare, but clean; above the yellow tops of his boots, his fat calves were visible.

“Who is that?”—I inquired of Ermolái.

“That? Nedopiúskin, Tíkhon Ivánitch. He lives with Tchertopkhánoff.”

<sup>1</sup>The respectful form of “he” or “she,” according to the context.—TRANSLATOR.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“What is he,—a poor man?”

“He is n't rich; but then, Tchertopkhánoff has n't a brass cent.”

“Then why has he taken up his abode with him?”

“Why, they have struck up a friendship, you see. The friend never goes anywhere without his friend. . . . 'T is a regular case of whithersoever the steed goes with his hoofs, thither also goes the crab with his claws. . . .”

We emerged from the bushes; all at once, the two huntsmen began to “give the view-haloo” alongside of us, and a huge grey hare rolled over the oats, which were already fairly tall. In their wake, the harriers and harehounds leaped out of the edge of the woods, and in the wake of the dogs forth flew Tchertopkhánoff himself. He was not shouting nor urging them on, nor hallooing; he was panting and gasping; from his gaping mouth abrupt, unintelligible sounds broke forth from time to time; he dashed onward, with protruding eyes, and flogging his unhappy horse frantically with his kazák whip. The harehounds “overshot”; . . . . the hare squatted, turned sharply back on its track, and dashed past Ermolái into the bushes. . . . The hounds swept by.—“L-l-l-look o-o-out, l-l-l-look o-o-out!” faltered the fainting sportsman, with an effort, as though stammering:—“look out, my good man!” Ermolái fired . . . . the wounded hare rolled like a spinning-top over the smooth, dry grass, gave a leap upward, and began to scream pitifully in the teeth of the dog which was rending him asunder; the harriers immediately dashed up.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tchertopkhánoff flew off his horse like a tumbler pigeon, jerked out his dagger, ran up, straddling his legs far apart, to the dogs, with wrathful exclamations wrested from them the tortured hare, and with his face all twisted awry, plunged his dagger up to the very hilt into the creature's throat . . . . plunged it in, and began to cackle. Tíkhon Ivánitch made his appearance on the edge of the woods. "Ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho!" roared Tchertopkhánoff a second time. . . . "Ho-ho-ho-ho," repeated his comrade quietly.

"But, you know, it is n't the proper thing to hunt in the summer,"—I remarked, indicating the flattened oats to Tchertopkhánoff.

"'T is my field,"—replied Tchertopkhánoff, barely breathing.

He ripped up the hare, disembowelled it, and distributed the paws to the dogs.

"Charge the cartridge to me, my dear fellow,"—he said, according to the rules of sport, addressing Ermolái.—"And as for you, my dear sir,"—he added in the same abrupt and cutting voice:—"I thank you."

He mounted his horse.

"Pér-mit me to inquire . . . I forgot about that . . . your name and surname."

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

Again I introduced myself.

“Very glad to make your acquaintance. If you happen to come my way, pray drop in to see me. . . . But where’s that Fómka, Tíkhon Ivánitch?”—he went on testily:—“the hare has been run down in his absence.”

“His horse tumbled down under him,” replied Tíkhon Ivánitch, with a smile.

“Tumbled down? Orbassán tumbled down! Phew, pshaw! . . . . Where is he, where is he?”

“Yonder—the other side of the wood.”

Tchertopkhánoff lashed his horse on the muzzle with his kazák whip,<sup>1</sup> and galloped off at a breakneck pace. Tíkhon Ivánitch made me a couple of bows,—one for himself, one on his comrade’s account,—and again set off at a trot through the bushes.

These two gentlemen had strongly excited my curiosity. . . . What could unite in the bonds of indestructible friendship two beings so utterly different? I began to make inquiries. This is what I learned.

Tchertopkhánoff, Pantelói Eremyéitch, bore the reputation throughout the whole countryside of being a dangerous and crackbrained man, an arrogant man and bully of the worst sort. He <sup>1</sup>This nagáika is a cruel—a deadly—implement. It consists of a short, thick handle, jointed to a stiff “lash” of nearly the same length (both of rawhide), terminating in a small, flat disk, also of rawhide.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

had served for a very brief period in the army, and had retired from it, “in consequence of unpleasantnesses,” with that rank concerning which there exists a wide-spread opinion that a “chicken is not a bird”—that is, too insignificant to be considered as rank at all. He was descended from an ancient house which had once been wealthy; his ancestors had lived luxuriously after the manner of the steppes; that is to say, they welcomed bidden and unbidden guests and fed them to satiety, as though for slaughter; provided strange coachmen with half a dozen bushels of oats for their tróika horses; kept musicians, singers, buffoons and hounds; travelled to Moscow in the winter in their own ponderous ancient coaches; on festival days supplied the populace with liquor and home-made beer; and sometimes were without a penny for months at a stretch, and subsisted on horse-provender.<sup>1</sup> Panteléi Eremyéitch’s father inherited the property in a ruined condition; he, in his turn, also “caroused,” and, dying, left to his only son and heir, Panteléi, the mortgaged hamlet of Bezsónovo, with thirty-five souls of the male sex and seventy-six of the female sex, together with fourteen desyatínas and an eighth of inconvenient land in the Kolobród waste, to which, however, the deceased possessed no documentary proofs of his ownership. The deceased had ruined himself

<sup>1</sup> Oatmeal and cornmeal (which last is known in the south of Russia) would come under this head.—TRANSLATOR.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

in a very strange manner, it must be confessed —“domestic economy” had been his perdition. According to his ideas, a nobleman ought not to depend upon the merchants, the town-dwellers, and such-like “brigands,” as he expressed it; he set up on his estate all sorts of handicrafts and workshops: “’T is both more seemly and cheaper,”—he was wont to say: “’t is domestic economy!” He never got rid of that pernicious idea to the end of his life; and it ruined him. On the other hand, how he did enjoy himself! He never denied himself a single whim. Among other caprices, he once had constructed, according to his own designs, such a huge family carriage that, in spite of the vigorous efforts of the peasants’ horses, which had been impressed from the entire village, along with their owners, it tumbled down at the first declivity, and went to pieces. Eremyéi Lúkitch (that was the name of Pantelí’s father) caused a monument to be erected on the hill, but was not in the least disconcerted. He also took it into his head to build a church, on his own responsibility, of course, without the aid of an architect. He burned a whole forest to bake the bricks, he laid an enormous foundation, as though for the cathedral of a government capital, reared the walls, and began to construct the arch for the cupola: the cupola caved in. He rebuilt it,—again the cupola fell; he did it a third time, and for the third time the cupola fell to pieces. My Eremyéi Lú-kitch reflected. "There's something wrong," he thought . . . . "some damned witchcraft is mixed up with it . . . ." and all of a sudden he ordered that all the old peasant women in the village should be flogged. The women were flogged,—but the cupola refused to be constructed, nevertheless. He began to rebuild the peasants' cottages on a new plan, and all at his own expense; he built three cottages together in a triangle, and in the centre he erected a pole surmounted by a painted starling-house and a flag. He was in the habit of devising a fresh freak every day: now he made soup of burdock, again he shaved off the tails of the horses to make caps for his house-serfs, next he made preparations to replace flax with nettles, or to feed his pigs on mushrooms. . . . One day he read in The Moscow News an article by a landowner of the Khárkhoff Government, named Khryák-Khrupyórsky, concerning the advantages of morality in the life of the serfs, and on the very next day he issued an order to all the serfs that they should forthwith learn the Khárkhoff squire's article by heart. The serfs learned the article; their noble master asked them: "Did they understand what was written therein?" The overseer replied: "How could they fail to understand?" About the same time he commanded all his subjects, on the score of order and domestic economy, to be numbered, and each one to have his number sewn on his collar. Each person, on meeting the master, used to call out: "Such-and-such a number is coming!" and the master would reply amiably: "Go thy way, and God protect thee!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

But, in spite of order and domestic economy, Eremyéi Lúkitch gradually got into very difficult straits: first he began to mortgage his estates, then he proceeded to sell them, and the last one, the ancestral nest, the large village with the unfinished church, was sold by the treasury, fortunately not during the lifetime of Eremyéi Lúkitch,—he could not have borne that blow,—but two weeks after his death. He managed to expire in his own house, in his own bed, surrounded by his own people, and under the supervision of his own medical man, but poor Panteléi inherited nothing except Bezsónovo.

Panteléi was already in the service, in the very thick of the above-mentioned "unpleasantnesses," when he heard of his father's death. He had recently attained the age of eighteen. From his very childhood, he had never quitted the parental roof, and under the guidance of his mother, an extremely amiable, but thoroughly dull-witted woman, Vasilísa Vasílievna, he had grown up a spoiled child, and a regular little country squire. She alone took charge of his education; Eremyéi Lúkitch, absorbed as he was in his experiments in domestic economy, had no time for that. To tell the truth, he did once chastise his son with his own hands for pronouncing the letter Rtzy,<sup>1</sup> artzy; but that day, Eremyéi Lúkitch was profoundly and secretly afflicted; his best hound had been killed against a tree. However, Vasilísa Vasílievna's anxieties in regard to the education of Pantiúsha were confined to torturing effort alone; in the sweat of her brow she hired for him as governor an ex-soldier, an Alsatian, a certain Birchhoff (and to the day of her death, she trembled like a leaf before him: "Well," she said to herself, "if he resigns—I am lost! What shall I do? Where shall I find another teacher? Even this one I lured away from a neighbour with the greatest difficulty!"). And Birchhoff, like the shrewd man he was, immediately took advantage of his exceptional position: he drank himself dead drunk, and slept from morning till night. At the conclusion of his "course of sciences," Panteléi entered the service. Vasilísa Vasílievna was no longer living. She had died six months previous to this important event, from fright; in her dreams she had beheld a vision of a white man riding a bear. Eremyéi Lúkitch speedily followed his better half.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Panteléi, at the first news of his illness, gal-

<sup>1</sup>The Slavonic name of the letter R. Russian children are taught a certain amount of Old Church Slavonic, to enable them to understand the services of the Church, which are conducted exclusively in that language.—TRANSLATOR.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

loped home at breakneck speed, but did not find his parent alive. But what was the amazement of the respectful son, when he suddenly found himself converted from a wealthy heir into a pauper! Few are able to endure so abrupt a change. Pantelí grew unsociable and hard. From an honourable, lavish, amiable, though harebrained and hot-tempered fellow, he changed into an arrogant man and a bully, and ceased to hold intercourse with his neighbours,—he was ashamed before the wealthy, despised the poor, and behaved with unheard-of insolence to everybody—even to the constituted authorities; as much as to say: “I’m a nobleman of ancient lineage.” Once he came near shooting the commissary of rural police, who had entered his room with his cap on his head. The powers, of course, on their side, did not pardon his attitude, and, on occasion, made themselves felt; yet, all the same, he was feared, because he was a frightfully hot-tempered man, and at the second word proposed a duel with knives. At the slightest opposition, Tchertopkhánoff’s eyes began to grow wild, his voice began to break. . . . “Ah, va-va-va-va-va!” he stammered, “damn my head!” . . . And bang it would go against the wall! And more than that, he was a clean man, and not mixed up in anything. Of course no one went to his house. . . . And, nevertheless, his was a kind, even a great soul, in its way: he would not tolerate injustice or oppression even toward a stranger; he stood up for his peasants by every means in his power.—“What?” he said, frantically slapping his own head:—“touch my people, my people? Not while I am Tchertopkhánoff! . . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Unlike Panteléi Eremyéitch, Tíkhon Ivánitch Nedopiúskin could not cherish pride in his extraction. His father had come of the petty freeholder class, and only by dint of forty years of service had he acquired nobility. Mr. Nedopiúskin Senior had belonged to the category of people whom ill-luck pursues with an obduracy which resembles personal hatred. For the space of sixty whole years, from his very birth to his very death, the poor man had contended with all the poverty, infirmities, and calamities which are peculiar to petty people; he floundered like a fish on the ice, never had food or sleep enough, cringed, toiled, grieved, and languished, trembled over every kopék, actually suffered in the service, though innocent, and died, at last, in a garret or a cellar, without having succeeded in amassing either for himself or his children a bit of daily bread. Fate had shaken him as a dog shakes a hare in the chase. He had been a good and honest man, but had taken bribes—ranging from a twenty-kopék piece to two rubles, inclusive. Nedopiúskin had had a wife, a thin, consumptive woman; and he had had children: luckily, they had all died soon, with the exception of Tíkhon and a daughter Mitrodóra, by profession a “dandy of the merchant class,” who, after many sorrowful and ridiculous adventures, had married a retired pettifogger. Mr. Nedopiúskin Senior had managed, during his lifetime, to get Tíkhon appointed as supernumerary official in a chancellery; but immediately after his parent’s death, Tíkhon resigned. The eternal trepidations, the torturing battle with cold and hunger, the melancholy dejection of his mother, the toilsome, anxious despair of his father, the rough oppressions of landlords and shopkeepers,—all this daily, unintermittent woe had bred in Tíkhon inexpressible timidity: at the very sight of his superior official he would begin to quake and turn faint, like a captured bird. He abandoned the service. Indifferent, and perhaps derisive, nature imbues people with various capacities and inclinations, which are not at all in accordance with their position in society and with their means; with the care and love peculiar to her, she had moulded Tíkhon, the son of the poverty-stricken official, into a sensitive, indolent, soft, impressionable being, addicted exclusively to enjoyment, gifted with an excessively delicate sense of smell and taste . . . . had moulded him, carefully put on the finishing touches, and had left her production to grow up on sour cabbage and putrid fish. But he did grow up, that product of hers, and began, as the saying goes, to “live.” Then the fun began. Fate,

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

which had unremittingly tormented Nedopiúskin Senior, began on his son: evidently, she had acquired a taste. But with Tíkhon she adopted a different course: she did not torture him,—she amused herself with him. She never once drove him to despair, never made him experience the mortifying torture of hunger, but she drove him all over Russia, from Velíky-Ustiúg to Tzárevo-Koksháisk, from one humiliating and ridiculous employment to another: now she promoted him to be “majordomo” to a vixenish and splenetic benefactress of noble birth; then appointed him at the head of the domestic chancellery of a mole-eyed nobleman with his hair clipped in the English fashion; then made him half-butler, half-jester to a master of the hounds. . . . In a word, Fate forced poor Tíkhon to drain drop by drop, and to the last drop, the whole bitter and venomous potion of an inferior existence. He served, in his time, the ponderous caprice, the sleepy and spiteful tedium, of idle gentlefolk. . . . How many times, alone in his chamber, dismissed at last with the words “God be with thee”<sup>1</sup> after a horde of guests had amused themselves with him to their fill, had he vowed, all flushed with shame, with cold tears of despair in his eyes, to run away secretly that very day, to try his luck in the town, to find himself some petty place, if only that of a copying-clerk; or, once for all, to die of hunger in the street. But, in the first place, God did not give him the strength for that; in the second place, timidity began to torment him; and, in the third place, in conclusion,—how was he to obtain a place for himself, whom was he to ask? “They won’t give me one,” the unhappy man would whisper, as he tossed dejectedly on his bed: “they won’t give me one!” On the following day, he would begin to bear the yoke again. His position was all the more painful, in that nature had not troubled herself to endow him with even a small modicum of those capacities and gifts without which the part of jester is almost impossible. For example, he could not dance until he dropped with fatigue in a bear’s skin worn wrong side out; neither could he play the buffoon and the courtier in the immediate vicinity of freely used dog-whips; when put out of doors naked at a temperature of twenty degrees below zero, he sometimes caught cold; his stomach could digest neither wine mixed with ink and other filth, nor toadstools and poison-mushrooms crumbled up in vinegar. The Lord knows what would have become of Tíkhon, if the last of his benefactors, a distiller who had acquired wealth, had not taken it into his head, in a jovial hour, to add a codicil to his will: “And to Zyóza (also called Tíkhon) Nedopiúskin I bequeath for eternal and hereditary possession my village of Bezselendyéevka, acquired by myself, together with all its dependencies." Several days later, the benefactor died of a stroke of paralysis, over a sterlet soup. There was a commotion; the officers of the law made a descent and affixed seals to the property in the regular form. The relatives assembled; the will was opened; they read it, and demanded Nedopiúskin. Nedopiúskin presented himself. The majority of the assembly were aware of the post which Tíkhon Ivánitch had occupied under his benefactor; deafening exclamations, jeering congratulations, were showered upon him on his appearance. "The landed proprietor, there he is, the new landed proprietor!"—yelled the other heirs.—"Well, now you know,"—put in one well-known jester and wit: "Now, really, you know, one may say . . . . really, you know . . . . that . . . . is what is called . . . . that's . . . . the heir." And all fairly burst with laughter. For a long time, Nedopiúskin would not believe in his good fortune. They showed him the will,—he turned scarlet, screwed up his eyes, began to brandish his arms, and fell to weeping in torrents. The noisy laughter of the assembly changed into a thick and unanimous roar. The village of Bezselyéndyéevka consisted, in all, of two-and-twenty serfs; no one greatly begrudged it; therefore, why not have some sport out of it? One heir only, a man from Petersburg, a pompous man with a Grecian nose and the most noble expression of countenance, Rostisláff Adámitch Schtoppel, could not endure it, moved up sideways to Nedopiúskin, and stared at him arrogantly over his shoulder. "So far as I can see, my dear sir,"—he said, in a scornfully-careless manner, "you have been living with the respected Feódor Feódorovitch in the capacity of jester, or servant, so to speak?" The gentleman from Petersburg expressed himself in insufferably clear, bold, and regular language. The flustered, agitated Nedopiúskin did not catch the words of the strange gentleman, but all the others immediately fell silent; the wit smiled condescendingly. Mr. Schtoppel rubbed his hands and repeated his question. Nedopiúskin raised his eyes in amazement, and opened his mouth. Rostisláff Adámitch narrowed his eyes venomously.

<sup>1</sup> Equivalent to polite dismissal.—TRANSLATOR.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

"I congratulate you, my dear sir, I congratulate you,"—he went on:—"truth to tell, not every one would have consented to earrrrn his daily bread in that manner; but de gustibus non est disputandum, that is to say, every one to his taste. . . . Is n't that so?"

Some one in the rear ranks gave a swift but decorous squeal of surprise and delight.

"Tell me,"—pursued Mr. Schtoppel, greatly encouraged by the smiles of the assembly:—"to which talent in particular are you indebted for your good fortune? No, be not ashamed, speak out; we are all of the family here, so to speak,

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

en famille. We are here en famille, are we not, gentlemen?"

The heir to whom Rostisláff Adámitch chanced to appeal with this question did not know French, unfortunately, and therefore confined himself to emitting a faint grunt of approval. On the other hand, another heir, a young man with yellowish blotches on his brow, made haste to put in: "Voui, vous, of course!"

"Perhaps,"—began Mr. Schtoppel again, "you can walk on your hands, with your feet elevated, so to speak, in the air?"

Nedopiúskin cast a sorrowful glance around him—all faces wore a spiteful smile, all eyes were covered with the moisture of satisfaction.

"Or, perchance, you can crow like a cock?"

A guffaw of laughter ran the round, and immediately ceased, quelled by expectation.

"Or, perchance, you can balance things on your nose. . . ."

"Stop!"—a sharp, loud voice suddenly interrupted Rostisláff Adámitch:—"are n't you ashamed to torment the poor man!"

All glanced round. At the door stood Tcher-topkhánoff. In his quality of nephew thrice removed of the deceased distiller, he also had received a note of invitation to the family gathering. During the whole time of the reading, he—as always—had held himself haughtily apart from the rest.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Stop!”—he repeated, throwing his head back arrogantly.

Mr. Schtoppel turned swiftly round, and, beholding a man poorly clad, not good-looking, he asked his neighbour in a low tone (caution is never amiss):

“Who is that?”

“Tchertopkhánoff, a person of no importance,” the latter replied in his ear.

Rostisláff Adámitch assumed an arrogant mien.

“How came you to be commander?”—he said through his nose, puckering up his eyes.—“What sort of a bird are you, permit me to inquire?”

Tchertopkhánoff flared up, like powder at a spark. Rage stopped his breath.

“Dz-dz-dz-dz,”—he hissed, like a choking man, and suddenly thundered out:

“Who am I? who am I? I am Panteléi Tchertopkhánoff, a noble of ancient lineage,—my great-great-grandfather’s grandfather served the Tzar,—but who art thou?”

Rostisláff Adámitch turned pale, and retreated a pace. He had not anticipated such resistance.

“I am a bird, I—I a bird! . . . Oo . . . o! . . .”

Tchertopkhánoff darted forward; Schtoppel sprang aside in great perturbation, the guests flew at the irritated squire.

“Exchange shots, exchange shots this very moment, across a handkerchief!”—shouted the thoroughly infuriated Panteléi:—" or thou must beg my pardon, and his . . . . ."

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

" Beg his pardon, beg his pardon,"—murmured the startled heirs round about Schtoppel: " he 's a regular madman, you know,—quite ready to cut your throat."

" Excuse me, excuse me, I did not know,"—stammered Schtoppel:—" I did not know. . . . ."

" And do thou ask his pardon also!"—roared the irrepressible Panteléi.

" And do you pray excuse me also,"—added Rostisláff Adámitch, turning to Nedopiúskin, who was shaking as though with fever.

Tchertopkhánoff calmed down, went up to Tíkhon Ivánitch, took him by the hand, cast a challenging glance around, and, without meeting any one's eye, left the room in triumph, accompanied by the new owner of the village of Bezselyendyéevka.

From that day forth, they never parted company again. (The village of Bezselyendyéevka was only eight versts distant from Bezsónovo.) Nedopiúskin's unbounded gratitude speedily passed into servile adoration. The weak, soft, not altogether clean Tíkhon bowed down in the dust before the fearless and disinterested Panteléi. " 'T is no small matter," he sometimes thought to himself:—" he talks with the Governor, he looks him straight in the eye. . . . Christ is my witness,—he looks him in the eye, that he does!"

He admired him to the point of perplexity, to the enfeeblement of his mental powers; he regarded him as a remarkable, a wise, a learned man. And, truth to tell, bad as Tchertopkhánoff's education had been, still, in comparison with that of Tíkhon, it might be considered brilliant. Tchertopkhánoff, it is true, read little in Russian, understood French imperfectly,—so imperfectly that one day, in reply to the question of a Swiss tutor: "Vous parlez français, Monsieur?" he answered: "je ne understand," and after reflecting a while, he added: "pas";—but, nevertheless, he remembered that there had existed in the world a very witty writer, Voltaire, and also that Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, had distinguished himself in the military line. Among Russian writers he respected Derzhávin, but loved Márlinsky, and named his best dog Ammalat-Beg. . . .

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

A few days after my first encounter with the two friends, I set off for the hamlet of Bezsónovo, to call upon Panteléï Eremyéitch. His tiny house was visible from afar; it reared itself up on a bare spot, half a verst from the village, "in an exposed site," as the saying is, like a hawk hovering over ploughed fields. Tchertopkhánoff's entire manor consisted of four ancient log edifices of various sizes, namely: a wing, a stable, a carriage-house, and a bath-house.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The bath-house is always separated from the house, and consists generally of an anteroom and the main chamber, with shelves of different heights. The steam is generated by throwing cold

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Each log-house stood apart by itself: neither fence round about nor gate was visible. My coachman halted in perplexity at the half-rotten and choked-up well. Near the carriage-house, several gaunt and shaggy hare-hounds were tearing a dead horse,—probably Orbassán; one of them raised his bloody muzzle, gave a hurried yelp, and began again to gnaw at the bared ribs. Beside the horse stood a young fellow of seventeen, with a bloated and sallow face, dressed as a page, and with bare feet: he was pompously watching the dogs, which were entrusted to his oversight, and now and then he lashed the most greedy of them with a long whip.

“Is the master at home?”—I asked.

“Why, the Lord only knows!”—replied the young fellow.—“Knock.”

I sprang out of my drozhky and walked to the porch of the wing.

The dwelling of Mr. Tchertopkhánoff presented a very sorry aspect: the beams had turned black, and protruded themselves forward “in a paunch,” the chimney had tumbled down, the corners were ruined with dampness, and were tottering, the tiny, dim, dark-blue windows gazed forth with indescribable sourness from beneath the shaggy roof, which sagged forward: some aged street-walkers have eyes like that. I water on stones heated to a glow when a bath is wanted. Peter the Great, in some of his baths, appropriately used cannon-balls.—

TRANSLATOR.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

knocked; no one responded. But I heard these words sharply uttered on the other side of the door:

“A, B, V;<sup>1</sup> come now, you fool,”—said a hoarse voice;—“A, B, V, G. . . . Not that way! G, D, E, E! . . . . Come now, you fool!”

I knocked again.

The same voice shouted:—“Come in,—who’s there? . . . .”

I entered a bare little anteroom, and through the open door I descried Tchertopkhánoff himself. Clad in a dirty Bukhará dressing-gown and full trousers, with a red fez on his head, he was sitting at a table, gripping the muzzle of a young poodle with one hand, and with the other holding a bit of bread directly above his nose.

“Ah!”—he said with dignity, without stirring from his seat:—“I am very glad of your visit. Pray take a seat. I’m bothering over Vénzor<sup>2</sup> here, as you see. . . . Tíkhon Ivánitch,”—he added, raising his voice:—“please come hither. A visitor has arrived.”

“Immediately, immediately,”—replied Tíkhon Ivánitch from the adjoining room.—“Másha, give me my neckerchief.”

Tchertopkhánoff again turned his attention to Vénzor, and laid the bit of bread on his nose. I

<sup>1</sup>The Russian alphabet runs in the order here indicated.—
TRANSLATOR.

<sup>2</sup>Probably intended for Windsor.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

glanced about me. There was absolutely no furniture in the room, with the exception of a warped extension-table on thirteen legs of unequal length, and four dilapidated straw-seated chairs; the walls, which had been whitewashed long, long ago, with blue spots in the shape of stars, had peeled off in many places; between the windows hung a cracked and dimmed little mirror in a huge frame of imitation mahogany. In the corners stood Turkish pipes and guns; from the ceiling depended thick, black spiders' webs.

“A, B, V, G, D,”—enunciated Tchertopkhánoff slowly, then suddenly cried fiercely:—“E! E! E! . . . . What a stupid beast! . . . . E!”

But the ill-starred poodle only trembled, and could not make up his mind to open his mouth; he continued to sit there, with his tail painfully tucked between his legs, and, contorting his muzzle, blinked dejectedly and screwed up his eyes, as though he were saying to himself: “As you like, of course!”

“Come, eat, dost hear! Take!”—repeated the irrepressible squire.

“You have frightened him,”—I remarked.

“Well, then away with him!”

He gave him a kick. The poor animal rose quietly, dropped the bread from his nose, and went off, on tiptoe as it were, to the anteroom, deeply wounded. And, in fact, a strange man had arrived for the first time, and that was the way he was being treated!

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

The door from the adjoining room creaked cautiously, and Mr. Nedopiúskin entered, amiably bowing and smiling.

I rose and made my bow.

“Don’t disturb yourself, don’t disturb yourself,”—he stammered.

We took our seats. Tchertopkhánoff withdrew into the next room.

“Have you been long in our parts?”—said Nedopiúskin in a soft voice, discreetly coughing behind his hand, and, out of a sense of propriety, keeping his fingers in front of his lips.

“This is the second month.”

“Just so, sir.”

We were silent for a while.

“We are having fine weather just now,”—went on Nedopiúskin, and looked at me with gratitude, as though the weather depended upon me:—“the grain is thriving wonderfully, one may say.”

I inclined my head, in token of assent. Again we were silent for a space.

“Pantelí Eremyéitch ran down two grey hares yesterday,”—began Nedopiúskin again, with an effort, being obviously desirous of enlivening the conversation:—“Yes, sir, two extremely large grey hares.”

“Has Mr. Tchertopkhánoff good dogs?”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Very remarkable dogs, sir!”—returned Nedopiúskin, with pleasure:—“the best in the Government, I may say.” (He moved up closer to me.) “But it’s a fact, sir! Panteléi Eremyéitch is that sort of a man! No sooner does he wish for a thing—no sooner does he take a thing into his head—the first you know, there it is accomplished, everything is fairly seething, sir. Panteléi Eremyéitch, I must tell you . . . .”

Tchertopkhánoff entered the room. Nedopiúskin grinned, fell silent, and indicated him to me with his eyes, as much as to say: “There, convince yourself.” We began to chat about hunting.

“Would you like to have me show you my leash of hounds?”—Tchertopkhánoff asked me, and, without waiting for an answer, he called Karp.

There entered the room a robust young fellow in a nankeen kaftan green in hue with a sky-blue collar and livery buttons.

“Order Fómka,”—said Tchertopkhánoff abruptly:—“to fetch in Ammalat and Sáïga (Gazelle), and in proper order, dost understand?”

Karp grinned to the full extent of his mouth, emitted a vague sound, and left the room. Fomá made his appearance, with his hair brushed, his belt drawn tight, booted, and with the dogs. I, out of propriety, admired the stupid animals (all hare-hounds are extremely stupid). Tchertop-khánoff spat straight into Ammalat's nostrils, which, however, apparently, did not afford the dog the slightest pleasure. Nedopiúskin caressed Ammalat from behind also. Again we began to chat. Tchertopkhánoff gradually grew thoroughly mild, and ceased to bear himself like a cock and to snort; the expression of his face underwent a change. He glanced at me and at Nedopiúskin.

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Eh!”—he suddenly exclaimed:—“Why should she sit there alone? Másha! hey there, Másha! come hither!”

Some one stirred in the adjoining room, but there was no reply.

“Má-a-asha,”—repeated Tchertopkhánoff caressingly:—“Come hither. There's nothing wrong, have no fear.”

The door opened softly, and I beheld a woman of twenty, tall and slender, with a swarthy gipsy face, yellowish-brown eyes, and hair as black as pitch; her large, white teeth fairly glittered from beneath her full red lips. She wore a white gown; a light blue shawl, fastened close around the throat with a golden pin, half covered her slender, high-bred hands.

“Here, let me commend her to your favour,”—said Panteléi Eremyéitch:—“she's not exactly my wife, but the same as a wife.”

Másha flushed slightly and smiled in confusion. I made her a very low bow. She pleased me greatly. Her thin, aquiline nose, with its open, half-transparent nostrils, the bold line of her arching eyebrows, her pale, slightly sunken cheeks,—all the features of her face, expressed wayward passion and reckless daring. From beneath the coils of her hair, down upon her broad neck, ran two small tufts of shining little hairs—a token of good blood and of strength.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

She walked to the window and sat down. I did not wish to heighten her confusion, and began to talk to Tchernopkhánoff. Másha turned her head slightly, and began to dart sidelong, stealthy, wild, swift glances at me. Her gaze flashed out like the sting of a serpent. Nedopiúskin sat down beside her and whispered something in her ear. She smiled again. When she smiled, she slightly wrinkled up her nose and elevated her upper lip, which imparted to her face an expression which was not exactly that of a cat, nor yet that of a lion. . . .

“Oh yes, thou art a ‘touch-me-not,’”—I thought, in my turn stealthily inspecting her willowy form, her sunken chest, and angular, agile movements.

“Well, now, Másha,”—asked Tchernopkhánoff:—“Must the visitor be treated to some sort of refreshments, hey?”

“We have some preserves,”—she replied.

“Well, fetch hither the preserves, and some

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

vódka too, by the way. And listen, Másha,"—he shouted after her:—"fetch thy guitar also."

"What 's the guitar for? I won't sing."

"Why not?"

"I don't feel like it."

"Eh, nonsense, thou wilt feel like it, if . . ."

"If what?"—asked Másha, swiftly contracting her brows.

"If thou art asked,"—Tchertopkhánoff completed his phrase, not without confusion.

"Ah!"

She left the room, speedily returned with the preserves and the vódka, and again seated herself by the window. The furrow was still visible on her forehead; both her eyebrows kept rising and falling, like the feelers of a wasp. . . . Have you observed, reader, what a vicious face the wasp has? "Well," I said to myself, "there 's going to be a thunderstorm." The conversation would not go. Nedopiúskin became absolutely dumb and smiled constrainedly; Tchertopkhánoff puffed, and flushed, and protruded his eyes; I was preparing to take my departure . . . . when, suddenly, Másha rose to her feet, threw open the window with one movement, thrust out her head, and screamed angrily to a passing peasant-woman: "Aksínya!" The woman gave a start, tried to turn round, but slipped and fell heavily to the ground. Másha threw herself backward, and burst into a ringing laugh; Tcher-topkhánoff also began to laugh; Nedopiúskin squealed with delight. We shook out our feathers. The thunderstorm had dissolved in one flash of lightning . . . . the air had cleared.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Half an hour later, no one would have recognised us: we were chattering and frolicking like children. Másha was playing the maddest pranks of all, Tchertopkhánoff was fairly devouring her with his eyes. Her face had grown pale, her nostrils were dilated, her glance blazed and darkened at one and the same time. The savage was beginning to rise in her. Nedopiúskin waddled after her on his short, thick legs, like a drake after a duck. Even Vénzor crawled out from under the wall-bench in the anteroom, stood for a while on the threshold, gazed at us, and suddenly began to leap and bark. Másha fluttered out into the adjoining room, brought her guitar, flung the shawl from her shoulders, briskly took a seat, raised her head, and struck up a gipsy song. Her voice tinkled and quivered like a tiny cracked glass bell, it flared up and died away. . . . It produced a pleasing yet painful sensation in one's heart.—“Aï, burn away, spread out!” . . . Tchertopkhánoff began to dance. Másha writhed all over, like a piece of birch-bark in the fire; her slender fingers flew rapidly over the guitar, her swarthy neck heaved slowly under her necklace consisting of a double row of amber beads. Then, all of a sudden, she stopped short, merely shrugged her shoulders, and fidgeted about on her seat, while Nedopiúskin wagged his head like a porcelain Chinaman;—then she began to warble ~~u~~gain, like a madwoman, drawing up her figure and protruding her chest, and again Tchertopkhánoff began to squat down to the ground and leap up to the very ceiling,<sup>1</sup> spinning round like a peg-top and shouting: “Faster!” . . . .

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Faster, faster, faster, faster!”—chimed in Nedopiúskin, volubly.

Late at night I took my departure from Bezónovo. . . .

<sup>1</sup>These are figures, so to speak, in the favourite Russian dance.—TRANSLATOR.

IX

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

I

Two years after my visit, Panteléi Eremyéitch's calamities—precisely that, calamities—began. He had experienced unpleasantnesses, failures, and even misfortunes before that, but he had paid no attention to them, and had “reigned” as hitherto. The first calamity which overtook him was for him the most acute of all: Másha left him.

What it was that made her abandon his roof, to which, apparently, she had become so thoroughly accustomed, it would be difficult to say. Tchertopkhánoff, to the end of his days, cherished the conviction that the cause of Másha's treachery was a certain youthful neighbour, a retired captain of uhlans, nicknamed Yaff, who, according to Panteléi Eremyéitch's assertion, had fascinated her merely by incessantly twirling his moustache, using pomatum in excessive quantities, and smiling affectedly to a very decided degree; but we must assume, rather, that the roving gipsy blood which flowed in Másha's veins had asserted itself. At any rate, one fine summer evening, Másha took herself off from Tchertopkhánoff's house, after having made up a small bundle of some rags of clothing.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

For three days before that she had sat in a corner, bent double and huddling closely against the wall, like a wounded fox,—and not a word would she utter to any one, but merely rolled her eyes about, and mused, and twitched her brows, and displayed her teeth in a faint grin, and moved her hands about as though she were wrapping herself up. This “quiet fit” had come over her on previous occasions, but had never lasted long; Tchertopkhánoff was aware of this,—and consequently was not worried himself, neither did he worry her. But when, on his return from his kennels,—where, according to the statement of his whipper-in, his last two greyhounds were “moulting,”—he met a maid-servant, who in a trembling voice announced to him that Márya Akínfiévna had ordered her to present her compliments to him, and to say that she wished him everything that was good, but would never return to him again—Tchertopkhánoff, after spinning round a couple of times on the spot where he stood and emitting a hoarse roar, immediately dashed off in pursuit of the fugitive, catching up his pistol by the way.

He overtook her a couple of versts from his house, beside a birch coppice, on the highway leading to the county town. The sun hung low above the horizon, and everything round about—the trees, the grass, and the earth—suddenly turned crimson.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“To Yaff! to Yaff!”—moaned Tchertopkhánoff, as soon as he espied Másha:—“to Yaff!”—he repeated, as he rushed up to her, stumbling at almost every step.

Másha halted and turned her face toward him. She stood with her back to the light, and appeared completely black, as though carved out of dark wood. Only the whites of her eyes stood out like silver almonds, while the eyes themselves—the pupils—grew darker than ever.

She tossed her bundle aside, and folded her arms.

“She has set off for Yaff, the good-for-nothing hussy!”—repeated Tchertopkhánoff, attempting to seize her by the shoulder;—but the glance he encountered from her intimidated him, and made him stop short on the spot.

“I have not started for Mr. Yaff, Panteléi Eremyéitch,”—replied Másha in a quiet, even tone:—“only, I cannot live with you any longer.”

“Why canst not thou live with me? Why so? Have I offended thee in any way?”

Másha shook her head.—“You have not offended me in any way, Panteléi Eremyéitch, only I have begun to languish at your house. . . . I thank you for the past, but stay I cannot—no!”

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

Tchertopkhánoff was dumfounded; he even smote his lips with his hands, and gave a leap.

“How so? Thou hast lived on and on, and hast experienced nothing but pleasure and tranquillity—and, all of a sudden, thou hast taken to pining! ‘Herewith,’ says she, ‘I’ll abandon him!’ She takes and throws a kerchief on her head—and off she goes. She has received every respect, just as much as a born lady. . . .”

“I could have dispensed with that, at least,”—interrupted Másha.

“Why couldst thou have dispensed with it? From a gipsy stroller, thou hast got into the station of a born lady—yes: thou didst not care for it? Why not, thou base-born miscreant? Is that credible? There’s treachery concealed here,—treachery!”

Again he began to foam at the mouth.

“There is no treachery whatever in my thoughts, and there has been none,”—said Másha in her drawling, distinct voice;—“but I have already told you: I was seized with a pining.”

“Másha!”—cried Tchertopkhánoff, and smote his breast with his clenched fist:—“come, stop it, enough, thou hast tortured me . . . . come, enough of this. And by God! only think what Tísha will say; thou mightest, at least, have pity on him!”

“Give my regards to Tíkhon Ivánitch, and tell him . . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tchertopkhánoff brandished his arms.—“But no, thou art lying—thou wilt not go away! Yaff shall wait for thee in vain!”

“Mr. Yaff—” Másha made an effort to say. . . .

“‘Mis-ter Yaff,’ forsooth,”—Tchertopkhánoff mimicked her.—“He’s a sly dog, if ever there was one, a swindler—and he has the phiz of an ape.”

For full half an hour did Tchertopkhánoff contend with Másha. Now he stepped up close to her, again he sprang away, now he brandished his hands at her, again he made her reverences to her girdle, weeping and cursing. . . .

“I can’t,”—Másha kept reiterating:—“I’m so dejected. . . . I’m tortured with boredom.”

Little by little her face assumed such an indifferent, almost sleepy expression, that Tchertopkhánoff asked her whether she had been drugged with stramonium.

“’T is boredom,”—she said, for the tenth time.

“Well, now, what if I kill thee?”—he suddenly shouted, and pulled the pistol from his pocket.

Másha smiled; her face became animated.

“What then? Kill me, Pantelói Eremyéitch: as you please; but as for returning,—I simply won’t do it.”

“Thou wilt not return?”—Tchertopkhánoff cocked his pistol.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“I will not, my dear little dove. I won't return as long as I live. My word is firm.”

Tchertopkhánoff suddenly thrust the pistol into her hand, and squatted down on the ground.

“Well, then do thou kill me! without thee I do not wish to live. I have become abhorrent to thee,—and everything has become abhorrent to me.”

Másha bent down, picked up her bundle, threw the pistol on the grass, with the muzzle turned away from Tchertopkhánoff, and moved up close to him.

“Ekh, my dear little dove, why dost thou grieve without cause? Dost not thou know us gipsy women? 'T is our character, our custom. If the yearning for departure begins to breed, and summons the soul to distant, foreign parts,—why remain? Do thou remember thy Másha,—such another friend thou wilt never find,—and I shall not forget thee, my falcon;—but my life and thine together is at an end!”

“I have loved thee, Másha,”—murmured Tchertopkhánoff into his fingers, wherewith he had covered his face. . .

“And I have loved thee, dear friend, Panteléi Eremyéitch!”

“I have loved thee, I do love thee madly, unboundedly,—and when I think now that thou art abandoning me thus, for no cause, without rhyme or reason, and art setting out to wander about the world,—well, then I begin to imagine that were I not an unhappy beggar, thou wouldst not have cast me off!”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Másha merely laughed at these words.

“Why, I was a penniless vagrant myself when thou didst take me in!”—she said, and gave Tchertopkhánoff a flourishing slap on the shoulder.

He sprang to his feet.

“Well, at least take some money from me,—how canst thou go off so, without a farthing? But best of all: kill me! I’m talking sense to thee: kill me on the spot!”

Again Másha shook her head.—“Kill thee? But what are people sent to Siberia for, my dear little dove?”

Tchertopkhánoff shuddered.—“So ’t is only for that, out of fear of the galleys, that thou wilt not.” . . . . .

Again he fell prone on the grass.

Másha stood over him in silence.—“I’m sorry for thee, Panteléi Eremyéitch,”—she said, with a sigh:—“thou art a good man . . . . . but there’s no help for it: farewell!”

She turned away, and took a couple of steps. Night had already begun to close in, and dim shadows were beginning to glide up from all quarters. Tchertopkhánoff rose briskly to his feet and grasped Másha by both elbows from behind.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“So thou art going, serpent? To Yaff!”

“Farewell!”—repeated Másha significantly and sharply, wrenched herself free, and walked away.

Tchertopkhánoff stared after her, ran to the spot where the pistol lay, seized it, took aim, and fired. . . . But before he pulled the trigger he threw his hand upward; the bullet whistled past over Másha’s head. She darted a glance at him over her shoulder, without pausing,—and proceeded on her way, swaying her hips as she walked, as though to provoke him.

He covered his face—and set off on a run. . . .

But before he had run fifty paces, he came to a sudden halt, as though rooted to the spot. A familiar, a too-familiar voice reached his ears. Másha was singing. “Life young, life charming,”—she sang; every sound seemed prolonged in the evening air—wailing and resonant. Tchertopkhánoff lent an ear. The voice retreated further and further; now it died away, again it floated to him in a barely audible, but still burning wave. . . .

“She’s doing that to irritate me,” thought Tchertopkhánoff; but immediately added, with a groan: “Okh, no! she is taking leave of me forever;”—and burst into a flood of tears.

ON the following day, he presented himself at the quarters of Mr. Yaff, who, like a true man of the world, not liking the solitude of the country, had removed to the county town,—“nearer to the young ladies,” as he expressed it. Tchertopkhánoff did not find Yaff; the latter, according to the statement of his valet, had set out for Moscow on the preceding day.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Exactly so!”—exclaimed Tchertopkhánoff in a fury:—“it was a plot between them; she has eloped with him . . . . but wait a bit!”

He forced his way into the study of the young cavalry captain, despite the valet’s opposition. In the study, over the divan, hung a portrait of the master of the house, in his uhlan uniform, painted in oils.—“Ah, there thou art, thou tailless ape!”—thundered Tchertopkhánoff, as he sprang upon the divan,—and smiting the tightly-stretched canvas with his fist, he broke a huge hole in it.

“Say to thy rascally master,”—he said, addressing the valet,—“that in default of his own disgusting phiz, nobleman Tchertopkhánoff has disfigured his painted phiz; and if he desires satisfaction from me, he knows where to find nobleman Tchertopkhánoff!—If he does not, I will find him! I’ll hunt out the dastardly ape at the bottom of the sea!”

As he uttered these words, Tchertopkhánoff sprang from the divan and withdrew in triumph.

But Captain Yaff did not demand any satisfaction from him,—he did not even encounter him anywhere,—and Tchertopkhánoff did not dream of looking up his enemy, and no scandal resulted from this affair. Másha herself soon afterward disappeared without leaving a trace. Tchertopkhánoff would have liked to take to drink; he “saw the error of his ways,” however. But at this point, a second calamity overtook him.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

II

NAMELY: his bosom friend, Tíkhon Ivánitch Nedopiúskin, expired. The latter's health had begun to fail two years previous to his death: he had begun to suffer from asthma, was incessantly falling asleep, and, on waking, he was slow in coming to himself: the county physician declared that he had had slight strokes of apoplexy. During the three days which preceded the departure of Másha,—those three days when she had been “pining,”—Nedopiúskin had been lying in bed at his own home in Bezselyéevka: he had caught a heavy cold. The shock of Másha's behaviour was all the more unexpected to him: he was almost more deeply affected by it than even Tchertopkhánoff himself. Thanks to the gentleness and timidity of his character, he displayed no emotion, save tender sympathy for his friend, and pained surprise . . . . but everything within him broke and relaxed. “She has taken the soul out of me,” he whispered to himself, as he sat on his favourite little couch covered with oiled cloth, and twiddled his fingers. Even when Tchertopkhánoff recovered, he, Nedopiúskin, did not recover,—and continued to feel that “there was a void within him.”—“Right here,”—he was wont to say, pointing to the centre of his breast, above the stomach. He dragged on thus until the winter. His asthma was relieved by the first cold weather, but on the other hand, he was visited not by a small shock of apoplexy, but by a real one. He did not immediately lose consciousness; he could still recognise Tchertopkhánoff, and even to his friend’s despairing cry: “How comes it that thou, Tísha, art leaving me without my permission, just like Másha?” replied with faltering tongue:—“But, P . . . . a . . . . léi E . . . . e . . . . yéitch . . . . I al . . . . ays . . . . have . . . . mind . . . . ed . . . . you . . . .” This did not prevent his dying the same day, however, before the arrival of the county physician, for whom, at the sight of his corpse, which was barely cold, there was nothing left to do except, with melancholy consciousness of the transitoriness of all things earthly, to request “a little vódka and dried sturgeon.” Tíkhon Ivánitch had bequeathed his property, as might have been expected, to his “most respected benefactor, Panteléi Eremyéitch Tchertopkhánoff”; but it did not do his most respected benefactor much good, for it was speedily sold at public auction,—partly in order to defray the expenses of a mortuary monument, a statue, which Tchertopkhánoff—(evidently, a characteristic of his father's was making itself felt!)—had taken it into his head to erect over the ashes of his friend. This statue, which was intended to represent an angel in prayer, he had ordered from Moscow; but the commissioner who had been recommended to him, taking into consideration the fact that expert judges of sculpture are rare in the rural districts, had sent him, instead of the angel, a statue of the goddess Flora, which for many years had adorned one of the neglected parks in the vicinity of Moscow of the Empress Katherine II's day;—as he, the agent, had obtained the said statue—which was an elegant one, in the rococo taste, with plump little hands, curling locks, and a garland of roses around its bare bosom and curved figure—for nothing. Consequently, to this day, the mythological goddess stands, with one foot gracefully uplifted, over the grave of Tíkhon Ivánitch, and, with a genuine Pompadour-like grimace, surveys the calves and sheep, those inevitable visitors of our cemeteries, which roam round about her.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

III

AFTER losing his faithful friend, Tchertopkhánoff again took to drink, and this time far more seriously. His affairs were completely on the downward path. There was nothing left to hunt, his last slender resources were exhausted, his last wretched serfs had fled. A reign of absolute isolation set in for Panteléi Eremyéitch: there was not a soul with whom he could exchange a word, much less any one to whom he could unburden his mind. The only thing in him which was not diminished was his pride. On the contrary: the worse his circumstances became, the more arrogant and haughty and unapproachable did he become. At last, he grew thoroughly wild. One consolation, one joy, alone remained to him: a marvellous grey saddle-horse of Don breed, which he had named Malek-Adel, and was, really, a remarkable animal.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

He had acquired the horse in the following manner:

As he was passing one day, on horseback, through a neighbouring village, Tchertopkhánoff heard an uproar among the peasants, and the shouting of a crowd around the dram-shop. In the centre of this crowd, robust arms kept incessantly rising and falling.

“What’s going on there?”—he inquired, in the imperious tone peculiar to him, of an old peasant-woman, who was standing on the threshold of her cottage.

Leaning against the lintel of the door, and seemingly in a doze, the woman was staring in the direction of the dram-shop. A tow-headed little boy in a calico shirt, with a small cypress-wood cross on his bare breast,<sup>1</sup> was sitting, with his feet wide apart and his little fists clenched, between her plaited bast-slippers; in the same place a small chicken was pecking at a crust of rye bread as hard as wood.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“The Lord only knows, dear little father,”—replied the old woman,—and, bending forward, she laid her dark, wrinkled hand on the head of the little boy: “I’ve heard say that our lads are beating a Jew.”

“A Jew? What Jew?”

“The Lord knows, dear little father. Some Jew or other made his appearance among us; and whence he came—who knows? Vása, my little gentleman, come to mamma: ’ssh, ’ssh, thou good-for-nothing!”

The woman frightened off the chicken, and Vása clutched hold of her plaid petticoat of homespun.

“And so, sir, they ’re thrashing him yonder.”

“Thrashing him? What for?”

“Why, I don’t know, dear little father. For cause, it must be. And how could they fail to thrash him? For he crucified Christ, dear little father!”

Tchertopkhánoff gave a view-halloo, lashed his horse with his kazák whip on the neck, dashed headlong straight into the crowd, and, having penetrated it, began with the said whip to deal blows to right and left, without discrimination, on the peasants, crying as he did so, in a very abrupt voice:—"Ta . . . . king the law . . . . into your own hands! Ta . . . . king the law . . . . into your own hands! The law ought to chastise—but the un . . . hap . . . . py peo . . . . ple! The law! The law! the la . . . . a . . . . aw! !"

<sup>1</sup>The cross placed there during the baptismal ceremony by the priest and worn during life. The material of the cross varies, naturally, according to circumstances.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Two minutes had not elapsed before the whole crowd had dispersed in various directions; and on the ground, in front of the dram-shop, there appeared a small, thin, swarthy-visaged being in a nankeen kaftan, dishevelled and mauled. . . . The pallid face, the eyes rolled up, the mouth agape . . . . What was it? the swoon of terror, or death itself.

"Why have you killed the Jew?"—shouted Tchertopkhánoff loudly, as he brandished his whip menacingly.

The throng buzzed faintly in reply. One peasant was clutching his shoulder, another his side, a third his nose.

"'T was a hearty thrashing!" was heard from the rear ranks.

"With a kazák whip, too!" said another voice.

"Why have you killed the Jew? I ask you,

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

you damned Asiatics!”—repeated Tchertopkhánoff.

At this point, the being who was lying on the ground sprang alertly to his feet, and running after Tchertopkhánoff, convulsively grasped the edge of his saddle.

A hearty laugh thundered through the throng.

“He’s alive!” proceeded a voice once more from the rear ranks. “He’s just like a cat!”

“Defend me, save me, Your Vell-Born!”—the unhappy Jew stammered, the while pressing himself, with his whole breast, against Tchertopkhánoff’s foot: “or they vill kill me, they vill kill me, Your Vell-Born!”

“What did they do that to you for?”—inquired Tchertopkhánoff.

“Vy, God ees my vitness, I cannot tell!—Zeir cattle begin to die . . . . and zey suspect me . . . . but, as God ees my vitness, I . . . .”

“Well, we’ll look into that later on!”—interrupted Tchertopkhánoff—“but now, do you lay hold of my saddle, and follow me.—And as for you!”—he added, turning to the crowd,—“you know me?—I’m landed proprietor Panteléi Tchertopkhánoff, and I live in the village of Bezónovo,—well, and that means that you can complain of me whenever you see fit,—and of the Jew also, by the way!”

“Why should we complain?”—said a stately, grey-bearded peasant, a perfect patriarch of the olden days, in a low tone.—(He had not been worrying the Jew with the rest, by the way.)—“We know thy grace well, dear little father, Panteléi Eremyéitch; we are greatly indebted to thy grace for the lesson thou hast given us!”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Why complain!”—joined in others:—“but we will have our will with that pagan! He shall not escape us!—We’ll hunt him like a hare in the fields. . .”

Tchertopkhánoff twitched his moustache, snorted, and rode off at a foot-pace to his own village, accompanied by the Jew whom he had rescued from his oppressors, as he had formerly rescued Tíkhon Ivánitch.

IV.

A FEW days later, Tchertopkhánoff’s sole remaining page announced to him that some man or other had arrived on horseback, and wished to speak to him. Tchertopkhánoff went out on the porch, and beheld his acquaintance the little Jew, mounted on a fine horse of the Don, which was standing motionless and proudly in the middle of the court-yard.—The Jew wore no cap—he was holding it under his arm; he had not put his feet into the stirrups themselves, but into the stirrup-straps; the tattered tails of his kaftan hung down on each side of the saddle. On catching sight of Tchertopkhánoff he began to make a smacking noise with his lips and to twitch his elbows and jerk his legs about. But Tchertopkhánoff not only did not reply to his greeting, but even flew into a rage; he suddenly flared up all over: a scabby Jew had the audacity to sit on such a magnificent horse . . . . how indecent!

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Hey there, thou Ethiopian phiz!”—he shouted:—“dismount this instant, if thou dost not wish to be hauled off into the mud!”

The Jew immediately obeyed, tumbled in a heap out of the saddle like a sack, and holding the bridle with one hand, moved toward Tchertopkhánoff, smiling and bowing.

“What dost thou want?”—asked Panteléi Eremyéitch, with dignity.

“Your Vell-Born, please to look,—is n’t dis a fine little horse?”—said the Jew, continuing to bow.

“H’m . . . . yes . . . . ’t is a good horse. Where didst thou get it? Stole it, I suppose?”

“No, indeed I deed n’t, Your Vell-Born!—I’m an honest Jew, I deed n’t steal it, but I got it for Your Vell-Born, really I deed! And vat trouble I have, vat trouble! And vat a horse eet ees! You can’t find such anoder horse in all ze Don Proveence. See, Your Vell-Born, vat a horse eet ees! Blease to gome here! Whoa there . . . . . whoa . . . . . turn round, stand side-ways!—And ve vill take off ze saddle.—Vat do you zink of heem, Your Vell-Born?”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“T is a good horse,”—repeated Tchertopkhánoff, with feigned indifference,—but his heart began fairly to thump in his breast. He was a passionate lover of “horse-flesh,” and was a fine judge of it.

“But zhust inspect heem, Your Vell-Born! Stroke hees naick, hee, hee, hee! That’s right!”

Tchertopkhánoff, as though unwillingly, laid his hand on the horse’s neck, administered a couple of pats, then ran his fingers down the animal’s back, beginning with his forelock, and on reaching a certain place above the kidneys, he exerted a slight pressure on the spot, in expert fashion.—The steed instantly arched his back, and darting a sidelong glance round at Tchertopkhánoff from his haughty black eye, he snorted and shifted his forefeet.

The Jew burst out laughing, and clapped his hands softly.—“He recognises hees master, Your Vell-Born, hees master!”

“Come now, don’t lie,”—interposed Tchertopkhánoff, testily.—“I have n’t the means where-with to buy this horse of thee . . . and I have never yet accepted a gift from the Lord God Himself, much less from a Jew!”

“And how zhould I dare to gif you anyzing, good gracious!”—exclaimed the Jew:—“Buy it, Your Vell-Born . . . . and as for ze money, I wait for heem.”

Tchertopkhánoff reflected.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“What wilt thou take?”—he said at last, through his teeth.

The Jew shrugged his shoulders.

“Vat I pay myzself—two hundred rubles.”

The horse was worth double,—probably even thrice that sum.

Tchertopkhánoff turned away, and yawned feverishly.

“And when dost thou want the money?” he asked, contracting his brows with an effort, and without looking at the Jew.

“Venever Your Vell-Born likes.”

Tchertopkhánoff threw back his head, but did not raise his eyes.—“That’s not an answer, Talk sense, thou Herod’s race!—Am I to run into debt to thee, pray?”

“Vell, zen, let us zay zo,”—said the Jew hastily,—“in seex monts . . . ees eet a bargain?”

Tchertopkhánoff made no reply.

The Jew tried to get a look at his eyes.—“Do you agree? Vill you order ze horse to be taken to ze stable?”

“I don’t want the saddle,”—articulated Tchertopkhánoff, abruptly.—“Take off the saddle—dost hear me?”

“Zertainly, zertainly, I vill take eet, I vill take eet,”—stammered the delighted Jew, and threw the saddle over his shoulder.

“And the money,”—went on Tchertopkhánoff . . . “is to be paid six months hence.—And not two hundred rubles, but two hundred and fifty. Hold thy tongue! Two hundred and fifty, I tell thee! Follow me.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tchertopkhánoff still could not bring himself to raise his eyes. Never had his pride suffered so.—“ Obviously, ’t is a gift,”—he said to himself: “ this devil is offering it to me out of gratitude!” And he would have liked both to embrace the Jew and to murder him. . . .

“ Your Vell-Born,”—began the Jew, gaining courage, and displaying his teeth in a grin:—“ you ought, after ze Russian custom, to receive heem from ze coat-tail to ze coat-tail.” . . . .

“ Well, here ’s a pretty thing thou hast taken into thy head!—A Jew . . . . and Russian custom!—Hey, who ’s there? Take the horse, lead him to the stable.—And give him some oats. I ’ll be there directly myself, and look him over. And understand: his name is Malek-Adel!”

Tchertopkhánoff started to ascend the porch-steps, but wheeled sharply round on his heels, and running up to the Jew, he shook him warmly by the hand.—The latter bent forward, and had already thrust out his lips—but Tchertopkhánoff sprang back and, saying in an undertone: “ Don’t tell anybody!” he disappeared through the door.

v

FROM that day forth, Malek-Adel became Tchertopkhánoff’s chief business, his chief care, his

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

greatest joy in life. He came to love him as he had not loved even Másha, he became more attached to him than to Nedopiúskin.—And what a horse it was! Fire, regular fire, simply powder—and stately as a boyár!—Indefatigable, with great power of endurance, turn him whithersoever you would, he obeyed implicitly; and it cost nothing to feed him: if there was nothing else, he would eat the earth under his hoofs. When he went at a foot-pace, his rider felt as though he were being borne in arms; when he trotted,—as though he were being rocked on the surge of the sea; and when he galloped, the very wind could not overtake him. He never got blown, for his lungs were fine. His legs were of steel; and as for stumbling—there was never even a hint of such a thing! It was a mere nothing for him to leap over a ditch or a paling. And what a clever beast he was! He would run in answer to a call, tossing back his head; order him to stand still, and go away yourself—and he would not stir; as soon as you started to return, he would whinny almost inaudibly, as much as to say: “Here am I!”—And he was afraid of nothing: he would find his road in pitch-darkness, or in a blinding snow-storm; and he would not let a stranger touch him on any account whatsoever: he would bite him. And let no dog sneak about him: he would smite the dog instantly on the brow with his hoof, whack! and that was the last of the dog.—He was a spirited steed: you might flourish a whip over him by way of display—but God preserve the person who should touch him with it! But what is the use of going into lengthy details?—He was a perfect treasure, not a horse!

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

When Tchertopkhánoff undertook to describe his Malek-Adel, he could not find words to do him justice. And how he caressed and petted him!—The creature's coat shone with the gleam of silver—and not of old, but of new silver, which has a dark gloss; pass your hand over it and it was like velvet! The saddle, the horse-cloth, the bit,—all his trappings were accurately adjusted, and burnished to such a degree that you might take a pencil and make sketches on them! Tchertopkhánoff—and what more can one say?—personally, with his own hands, plaited his pet's forelock, and washed its mane and tail with beer, and even anointed its hoofs with salve. . . .

He used to mount Malek-Adel and ride off—not to call on his neighbours,—for, as in the past, he had no intercourse with them,—but across their fields, past their manor-houses. . . . As much as to say: “Admire from a distance, you fools!” And if he heard that a hunt was on hand anywhere,—that a wealthy gentleman was preparing to set off for remote fields,—he immediately betook himself thither, and pranced about at a distance, on the horizon, astounding all beholders with the beauty and swiftness of his steed, but permitting no one to approach close to him.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

On one occasion, a sportsman, accompanied by his whole suite, pursued him; perceiving that Tchertopkhánoff was escaping him, he began to shout at him at the top of his lungs, galloping at top-speed the while: “Hey, there! Listen! I’ll pay thee whatever thou askest for thy horse! I won’t begrudge a thousand rubles! I’ll give my wife, my children! Take my last farthing!”

Tchertopkhánoff suddenly reined Malek-Adel up short. The sportsman dashed up to him.—“Dear little father!” he cried: “tell me, what wilt thou take? My own father!”

“If thou wert the Tzar,”—said Tchertopkhánoff, enunciating each word distinctly (and never in his life had he heard of Shakespeare),—“and if thou wert to give me thy whole kingdom for my horse,—I would n’t accept it!”—So saying, he gave a guffaw, made Malek-Adel rear up on his hind legs, wheeled him round in the air, on his hind legs alone, just as though the animal had been a peg-top or a teetotum,—and off he flew! He fairly flashed in sparks over the stubble-field. And the sportsman (they say that he was a very wealthy prince) “dashed his cap on the ground,”—and then flung himself, face down, on his cap! And there he lay for the space of half an hour.

And how could Tchertopkhánoff fail to prize his horse? Was it not thanks to him that he again became superior to all his neighbours—indubitably, definitively superior to all his neighbours?

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

VI

IN the meanwhile, time passed, the term for payment drew near—and Tchertopkhánoff had not fifty rubles, much less two hundred and fifty. What was to be done, how was the situation to be redeemed?—"Never mind,"—he decided at last, "if the Jew will not show mercy, if he will not wait a little longer,—I'll hand over to him my house and my land,—and I myself will ride off on the horse in some direction, at random! I'll perish with hunger,—but Malek-Adel I will not surrender!" He became greatly agitated, and even grew pensive; but at this point Fate—for the first and last time—showed pity on him, smiled on him: some distant aunt, whose very name Tchertopkhánoff did not know, left him in her will what was a huge sum in his eyes—two thousand rubles!—And he received this money just in time, so to speak: the day before the Jew's arrival. Tchertopkhánoff nearly went out of his senses for joy—but the thought of vódka did not enter his head: he had not taken a drop into his mouth since the day Malek-Adel had come to him. He hastened to the stable, and kissed his friend on both sides of his muzzle above the nostrils, in the spot where a horse's skin is so soft.—"Now we shall not be parted!"—he cried, patting Malek-Adel's neck, beneath the well-combed mane. On his return to the house, he counted out and sealed up in a packet two hundred and fifty rubles. Then he mused, as he lay on his back and smoked his pipe, as to how he should dispose of the remaining money—in fact, as to what sort of hounds he should get,—genuine Kostromá hounds, and they must, without fail, be the red-spotted variety! He even had a chat with Perfíshka, to whom he promised a new kazák coat with yellow galloon on all the seams—and went to bed in the most blissful mood possible.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

He had a bad dream: he thought he had ridden out to a hunt; only, not on Malek-Adel, but on some strange animal, in the nature of a camel; a white fox, white as snow, came running to meet him. . . . He tried to swing his whip, he tried to set the dogs on it—but in his hand, instead of a whip, he found a wisp of bast,<sup>1</sup> and the fox kept trotting on in front of him, and sticking out its tongue at him in mockery. He sprang from his camel, stumbled, fell . . . . and fell straight into the arms of a gendarme, who summoned him to the Governor-General, in whom he recognised Yaff. . . .

Tchertopkhánoff awoke. The room was dark; the cocks had just crowed for the second time. . . .

Somewhere, far, far away, a horse was neighing.

<sup>1</sup> Bunches of shredded bast from the inner bark of the linden tree form the favorite bath-sponges.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tchertopkhánoff raised his head. . . . Again a faint, faint neighing was audible.

“That’s Malek-Adel neighing!”—he said to himself. . . . “That’s his neigh! But why is it so far away? Good heavens! . . . It cannot be . . . .”

All at once, Tchertopkhánoff turned cold all over, leaped from his bed on the instant, found his boots, his clothing, by groping, dressed himself, and, snatching the key to the stable from beneath his pillow, he rushed out into the court-yard.

VII

THE stable was situated at the very end of the yard; one of its walls abutted on the open fields. Tchertopkhánoff did not immediately insert the key into the lock—his hands were trembling—and did not immediately turn the key. . . . He stood motionless, holding his breath, to see if anything were stirring behind the door. “Máleshka! Máletz!” he called in an undertone: deathly silence! Tchertopkhánoff involuntarily pulled out the key: the door creaked on its hinges, and opened. . . . That meant, that the door had not been locked. He stepped across the threshold and again called his horse—this time by his full name: “Malek-Adel!” But his faithful comrade did not respond, only a mouse rustled in the straw. Then Tchertopkhánoff flung himself into that one of three stalls in which Malek-Adel had been lodged. He went straight to that stall, although such darkness reigned all around that it was impossible to see a hand's-breadth in front of one. . . . It was empty! Tchertopkhánoff's head reeled; a bell seemed to be booming under his skull. He tried to say something—but merely hissed, and groping with his hands above, below, on all sides, panting, with knees bending under him, he made his way from one stall to the second . . . . to the third, which was filled with hay almost to the top, hit against one wall, then the other, fell, rolled heels over head, rose to his feet, and suddenly rushed headlong through the half-open door into the court-yard. . . .

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“They have stolen him! Perfíshka! Perfíshka! They have stolen him!”—he roared, at the top of his lungs.

Perfíshka the page flew out of the garret in which he slept, topsy-turvy, clad in nothing but his shirt. . . .

The two crashed together like drunken men—the gentleman and his solitary servant—in the middle of the yard; they spun round like madmen in front of each other. The gentleman could not explain what the matter was; neither could the servant comprehend what was wanted of him.—“Alas! alas!”—stammered Tchertopkhánoff.—“Alas! alas!” the page repeated after him.—“A lantern! give me the lantern, light the lantern! A light! A light!" burst forth, at last, from Tcher-topkhánoff's exhausted breast. Perfíshka flew to the house.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

But it was no easy matter to light the lantern, or to get a light: sulphur matches were considered a rarity in Russia at that epoch; the last embers in the kitchen had long since died out; flint and steel were not speedily to be found, and worked badly. Gnashing his teeth, Tcher-topkhánoff snatched them from the hands of the panic-stricken Perfíshka, and began to strike a light himself; sparks showered forth in abundance, oaths and even groans showered forth in still greater abundance—but the tinder either did not take fire at all, or went out, despite the strenuous efforts of four inflated cheeks and lips! At last, at the end of five minutes, no sooner, the morsel of tallow candle was burning in the bottom of the broken lantern, and Tcher-topkhánoff, accompanied by Perfíshka, precipitated himself into the stable, elevated the lantern above his head, looked about him. . . . Completely empty!

He rushed out into the yard, traversed it in all directions at a run—the horse was nowhere to be found! The wattled fence surrounding Pantélei Eremyéitch's manor had long since fallen to decay, and in many places it was bent over and hanging close to the ground. . . . Alongside the stable it had tumbled down completely for a space more than two feet in width. Perfíshka pointed out this place to Tchertopkhánoff.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Master! look here: this was not so to-day. Yonder, the posts are sticking out of the ground, too; some one must have pulled them out.”

Tchertopkhánoff dashed up with his lantern, passed it along the ground. . . .

“Hoofs, hoofs, the prints of a horse’s shoes, prints, fresh prints!”—he muttered rapidly.—“Here is where they led him through, here, here!”

He instantly leaped over the hedge, and with the cry: “Malek-Adel! Malek-Adel!” he ran straight off across the fields.

Perfíshka remained standing in bewilderment by the wattled fence. The bright circle cast by the lantern speedily vanished from his eyes, swallowed up by the thick darkness of the starless and moonless night.

Tchertopkhánoff’s despairing cries resounded with ever-increasing faintness. . . .

VIII

DAY was dawning when he returned home. He no longer bore the semblance of a man: his entire clothing was covered with mud, his face had assumed a strange and savage aspect, his eyes had a morose and stupid look. In a hoarse whisper he drove Perfíshka away from him, and locked himself up in his own room. He could scarcely stand, so exhausted was he,—yet he did not go to bed, but sat down on a chair near the door, and clasped his head in his hands.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“They have stolen him! . . . . stolen him!”

But how had the thief contrived to steal Malek-Adel by night from the fast-locked stable? Malek-Adel, who by day would not allow a stranger to come near him—to steal him without noise, without a sound? And how is it to be explained that not a single yard-dog barked? To tell the truth, there were only two of them, two young puppies, and even they had buried themselves in the ground, with cold and hunger—but notwithstanding. . . .

“And what am I to do now without Malek-Adel?” thought Tchertopkhánoff. “I have now been deprived of my last joy—it is time for me to die. Shall I buy another horse, seeing that I am now provided with money? But where am I to find another horse like that?”

“Pantelí Eremyéitch! Pantelí Eremyéitch!”—a timid call made itself audible outside the door.

Tchertopkhánoff sprang to his feet.

“Who is it?”—he shouted in an unnatural voice.

“’T is I, your page, Perfíshka.”

“What dost thou want? Has he been found, has he run home?”

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Not at all, sir, Panteléi Eremyéitch; but that little Jew who sold him . . . .”

“Well?”

“He has arrived.”

“Ho-ho-ho-ho-ho!”—Tchertopkhánoff guffawed with laughter,—and flung the door open with a bang.—“Drag him hither, drag him, drag him!”

At the sight of the savage, disordered figure of his “benefactor,” which thus suddenly presented itself, the Jew, who was standing behind Perfíshka, made an attempt to take to his heels; but Tchertopkhánoff overtook him in two bounds, and seized him by the throat like a tiger.

“Ah! thou hast come for thy money! for thy money!”—he yelled hoarsely, as though he were being strangled, instead of himself doing the strangling; “thou hast stolen him by night, and by day hast come for thy money? Hey? Hey?”

“Have mercy, Yo . . . ur Ve-ell-Bo-orn!” groaned the Jew.

“Tell me, where is my horse? What hast thou done with him? To whom hast thou disposed of him? Tell me, tell me, tell me!”

The Jew could no longer groan; even the expression of terror had vanished from his face, which had turned blue. His hands dropped and swung limply; his whole body, vehemently shaken by Tchertopkhánoff, swayed back and forth like a reed.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“I’ll pay thee thy money, I’ll pay thee thy money in full, to the uttermost kopék,”—yelled Tchertopkhánoff—“only I’ll strangle thee, like the meanest of chickens, if thou dost not instantly tell me. . . .”

“But you have strangled him, master,”—remarked the page Perfíshka submissively.

Only then did Tchertopkhánoff come to his senses.

He relinquished his hold on the Jew’s throat; the latter fell in a heap on the floor. Tchertopkhánoff picked him up, seated him on a bench; poured a glass of vódka down his throat—and restored him to consciousness. And having restored him to consciousness, he entered into conversation with him.

It appeared that the Jew had not the slightest comprehension as to the theft of Malek-Adel. And why should he steal the horse which he himself had obtained for “his most respected Pantelí Eremyéitch”?

Then Tchertopkhánoff led him to the stable.

Together they inspected the stall, the manger, the lock on the door; they rummaged in the hay, the straw, and then went into the yard; Tchertopkhánoff pointed out to the Jew the imprints of hoofs beside the wattled fence—and all at once smote himself on the thigh.

“Stop!”—he cried.—“Where didst thou buy the horse?”

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“ In Maloarkhángel district, at the Verkhosén-skoe horse-fair,”—replied the Jew.

“ From whom? ”

“ From a kazák.”

“ Stay! Was that kazák a young man or an old one? ”

“ A sedate man, of middle age.”

“ And what was he like? How did he look? A sly rascal, I suppose.”

“ He must have been a rascal, Your Vell-Born.”

“ And what did that rascal say to you,—had he owned the horse long? ”

“ I remember that he said he had.”

“ Well, then, no one but himself could have stolen it! Judge for thyself, listen, stand here . . . what's thy name? ”

The Jew gave a start, and turned his little black eyes on Tchertopkhánoff.

“ What is my name? ”

“ Well, yes; what art thou called? ”

“ Moshel Leiba.”

“ Well, judge for thyself, Leiba, my friend,—thou art a clever man,—into whose hands, save those of his former master, would Malek-Adel have surrendered himself? For he saddled him, and bridled him, and took his blanket off him—yonder it lies on the hay! . . . He simply behaved as though he were at home! Malek-Adel would certainly have crushed under his hoofs any one who was not his master! He would have raised such an uproar that he would have thoroughly alarmed the whole village! Dost thou agree with me?"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"I do, I do, Your Vell-Born. . . ."

"Well, then, first of all, we must find that kazák!"

"But how are ve to find him, Your Vell-Born? I have never seen him except vun little time—and vere ees he now—and vat is hees name? Aï, vai, vai!"—added the Jew, dolefully shaking his earlocks.

"Leiba!"—shouted Tchertopkhánoff suddenly,—“Leiba, look at me! I have lost my mind, I am not myself! . . . . I shall lay violent hands on myself, if thou wilt not help me!”

"But how can I? . . ."

"Come with me—and we will find that thief!"

"But vere zhall ve go?"

"Among the fairs, on the big highways, on the little highways, to the horse-thieves, the towns, the villages, the farms—everywhere, everywhere! And as for money, thou needst not worry: I have received an inheritance, brother! I'll squander the last kopék—but I'll get my friend. And the kazák, that villain, shall not escape us! Whithersoever he goes, thither will we go also! If he is under the earth—we, too, will go under the earth! If he goes to the devil—we'll go to Satan too!"

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“ Vell, but vy to Zatan? ”—remarked the Jew, —“ ve can get along vizout heem.”

“ Leiba! ” — interposed Tchertopkhánoff, — “ Leiba, although thou art a Jew, and thy faith is accursed—yet thou hast a soul better than that of many a Christian! Thou hast taken pity on me! there is no use in my setting off alone, I cannot deal with this affair alone. I am hot-headed—but thou hast a good head, a head of gold! That ’s the way with thy race: it has attained to everything without science! Perhaps thou hast thy doubts, and sayest to thyself: ‘ Whence has he the money?’ Come into my room with me—I ’ll show thee all the money. Take it, take my cross, from my neck—only give me Malek-Adel, give him to me, give him to me! ”

Tchertopkhánoff shook as though in fever: the perspiration poured down his face in streams, and mingling with his tears, became lost in his moustache. He pressed Leiba’s hands, he entreated him, he almost kissed him. . . He had got into a transport. The Jew tried to reply, to convince him that it was impossible for him to absent himself from his business. . . . In vain! Tchertopkhánoff would not listen to anything. There was no help for it: poor Leiba was forced to consent.

On the following day, Tchertopkhánoff, accompanied by Leiba, drove away from Bezsónovo in a peasant-cart. The Jew wore a somewhat disconcerted aspect, clung to the rail with one hand, and his whole wizened body jolted about on the quaking seat; the other hand he pressed to his breast, where lay a package of bank-notes, wrapped up in a bit of newspaper. Tchertopkhánoff sat like a statue, merely turned his eyes about him, and took the air into his lungs in deep breaths; a dagger projected from his belt.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Look out for thyself now, thou villain-separator!” he muttered, as they emerged upon the highway.

He had entrusted his house to Perfíshka, the page, and to the peasant who acted as his cook, a deaf old woman, whom he had taken under his protection out of compassion.

“I shall return to you on Malek-Adel,”—he shouted to them in farewell,—“or I shall not return at all!”

“Thou mightest, at least, marry me, I think!”—jested Perfíshka, nudging the old woman in the ribs with his elbow.—“Anyhow,—we shall never see the master again, and otherwise, thou wilt certainly expire with tedium!”

IX

A YEAR passed . . . . . a whole year: no news arrived of Panteléi Eremyéitch. The old woman died; Perfíshka himself was preparing to abandon the house and betake himself to the town, whither he was being lured by his cousin, who was living there as assistant to a hair-dresser,—when, suddenly, a rumour became current that the master was coming back! The deacon of the parish had received a letter from Panteléi Eremyéitch himself, in which the latter informed him of his intention to come to Bezsónovo, and requested him to notify his servants, in order that the proper reception might be made ready. These words Perfíshka understood in the sense that he must wipe off a little of the dust; he had not much faith in the accuracy of the news, however; but he was forced to the conviction that the deacon had told the truth when, a few days later, Panteléi Eremyéitch himself, in person, made his appearance in the court-yard of the manor-house, mounted on Malek-Adel.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

Perfíshka rushed to his master, and, holding his stirrup, attempted to assist him in alighting from his horse; but the latter sprang off unaided, swept a triumphant glance around him, and exclaimed in a loud voice: “ I said that I would find Malek-Adel, and I have found him, to the discomfiture of my enemies and of Fate itself!” Perfíshka advanced to kiss his hand, but Tchertopkhánoff paid no heed to his servant’s zeal. Leading Malek-Adel after him by the bridle he wended his way with long strides to the stable. Perfíshka scrutinised his master with more attention—and quailed:—“ Okh, how thin and old he has grown in the course of the year—and how stern and grim his face has become!" Yet it would have seemed fitting that Panteléi Eremyéitch should rejoice, in view of the fact that he had accomplished his object; and he did rejoice, as a matter of fact . . . . and, nevertheless, Perfíshka quailed and even felt afraid. Tchertopkhánoff placed the horse in his former stall, slapped him gently on the crupper, and said: "Now, then, thou art at home again! Look out! . . . ." On that same day he hired a trustworthy watchman, an untaxable, landless peasant, established himself once more in his own rooms, and began to live as of yore. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

But not altogether as of yore. . . . Of this, however, later on.

On the day following his return, Panteléi Eremyéitch summoned Perfíshka to his presence, and, in the absence of any other companion, began to narrate to him—without losing the sense of his own dignity, of course, and in a bass voice—in what manner he had succeeded in finding Malek-Adel. While the story was in progress, Tchertopkhánoff sat with his face to the window, smoking the pipe of a long Turkish tchibúk, while Perfíshka stood on the threshold of the door, with his hands clasped behind him, and gazing respectfully at the back of his master's head, listened to the story of how, after many fruitless efforts and peregrinations, Panteléi Eremyéitch had, at last, arrived at the fair in Rómny, alone, without the Jew Leiba, who, through weakness of character, had not held out and had deserted him; how, on the fifth day, when he was already on the point of departing, he had passed, for the last time, along the rows of carts, and had suddenly espied, among three other horses hitched to the canvas feed-trough—had espied Malek-Adel! How he had recognised him on the instant,—and how Malek-Adel had also recognised him, had begun to whinny and paw the earth with his hoof.—“ And he was not with the kazák,”—pursued Tchertopkhánoff, still without turning his head, and in the same bass voice as before,—“ but with a gipsy horse-dealer; naturally, I immediately seized on my horse, and tried to recover it by force; but the beast of a gipsy set up a howl, as though he were being scalded, and began to swear, in the hearing of the whole market-place, that he had bought the horse from another gipsy, and wanted to produce his witnesses. . . . I spat—and paid him money: devil take him! For me the chief thing, the precious thing, was that I had found my friend, and had recovered my spiritual peace. But, seest thou, I had grabbed a kazák, as the Jew Leiba put it, in the Karatchévoe district,—I had taken him for my thief,—and had smashed in his whole ugly phiz; but the kazák turned out to be the son of a priest, and was infamous enough to wring one hundred and twenty rubles from me. Well, money is a thing that can be acquired; but the principal point is, that Malek-Adel is with me

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

once more! Now I am happy—I shall enjoy tranquillity. And here are thy instructions, Porfiry: just as soon as thou shalt behold a kazák in the neighbourhood—which God forbid!—run and fetch me my gun that very second, without uttering one word, and I shall know how to act!”

Thus spake Panteléi Eremyéitch Tchertopkhánoff; this was what his lips expressed; but he was not so tranquil at heart as he asserted.

Alas! in the depths of his soul he was not fully convinced that the horse he had brought home was really Malek-Adel.

X

A DIFFICULT time began for Panteléi Eremyéitch. Tranquillity was precisely the thing which he enjoyed least of all. Good days did come, it is true: the doubt which had assailed him seemed to him nonsense, he thrust from him the awkward thought as he would an importunate fly, and even laughed at himself; but he had his bad days also: the persistent thought began again to prey stealthily on his heart and to gnaw at it, like a mouse under the floor,—and he tormented himself keenly, and in secret. In the course of that memorable day on which he had found Malek-Adel, Tchertopkhánoff had felt only blissful joy . . . . but on the following morning, when, under the low penthouse of the posting-station, he began to saddle his treasure-trove, close to which he had passed the night—something stung him for the first time. . . . He merely shook his head—but the seed was sown. In the course of his homeward journey (it lasted for about a week), doubts awoke rarely within him: they became more powerful and distinct as soon as he had reached his Bezónovo, as soon as he found himself in the place where the former, the indubitable Malek-Adel had dwelt. . . . On the road he had ridden mainly at a foot-pace, at a jog-trot, gazing about him on all sides, had smoked his tobacco from a short pipe, and had indulged in no meditations, unless it were to say to himself, “Whatever the Tchertopkhánoff’s want, that they get!” and grin; but when he got home, it was quite a different matter. All this, of course, he kept to himself: his pride alone forbade his displaying his inward trepidation. He would have “rent asunder” any one who had even distantly hinted that Malek-Adel did not appear to be the former horse; he accepted congratulations on his “lucky find” from the few persons with whom he chanced to come in contact; but he did not seek these congratulations, and avoided intercourse with people more assiduously than ever—which is a bad sign! He was almost constantly putting Malek-Adel through his examination, if one may so express it; he would ride off on him to some extremely distant spot in the fields, and put him to the test; or he would creep stealthily into the stable, lock the door behind him, and, placing the horse's head before him, would gaze into his eyes, asking in a whisper: "Art thou he? Art thou he? Art thou he? . . ." or he would stare at him in silence, and so intently, for whole hours at a stretch, now rejoicing and muttering: "Yes! 'T is he! Of course, 't is he!"—again perplexed and disconcerted.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And Tchertopkhánoff was perturbed not so much by the physical dissimilarity between that Malek-Adel and this one—it was not so very great: that one's mane and tail seemed to have been thinner, his ears more pointed, his cannon-bones shorter, and his eyes brighter,—moreover, that might only seem to be the case; but what troubled Tchertopkhánoff was, so to speak, the moral dissimilarity. That one had different habits, his whole moral nature was unlike. For example: that Malek-Adel had been wont to glance round and whinny slightly every time Tchertopkhánoff entered the stable; but this one went on munching his hay, as though nothing were happening—or dozed with drooping head. Neither of them stirred from the spot when their master sprang from the saddle; but that one, when he was called, immediately advanced toward the voice,—while this one continued to stand stock-still. That one galloped with equal swiftness, but jumped higher and further; this one had a more undulating gait when walking, but jolted more on a trot, and sometimes interfered with his shoes—that is to say, struck the hind shoe against the fore shoe; that one never had such a disgraceful trick—God forbid! This one, so it seemed to Tchertopkhánoff, was forever twisting his ears,—while with the other the contrary was the case: he would lay one ear back, and keep it so,—watching his master! That one, as soon as he saw that there was dirt around him, would immediately tap on the wall of his stall with his hind foot; but this one did not mind if the manure accumulated up to his very belly. That one, if he were placed head on to the wind, for example,—would immediately begin to inhale with all his lungs, and shake himself, but this one would simply snort; that one was disturbed by dampness foreboding rain—this one cared nothing for it. . . . This one was coarser, coarser! And this one had no charm, as that one had, and was hard-mouthed—there was no denying it! The other was a pleasing horse—while this one . . . .

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

This was the way things sometimes seemed to Tchertopkhánoff, and these reflections bred bitterness in him. On the other hand, there were times when he would launch his steed at full gallop over some unploughed field or make him leap to the very bottom of a ravine washed out by the rains and leap back again straight up the steep, and his heart would swoon within him for rapture, a thunderous halloo would burst from his lips, and he knew for a certainty that he had under him the genuine, indubitable Malek-Adel, for what other horse was capable of doing what this one did?

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

But even so, errors and calamities were not lacking. The prolonged search for Malek-Adel had cost Tchertopkhánoff a great deal of money: he no longer dreamed of the Kostromá hounds, and rode about the country-side in solitude, as of yore. And lo, one morning, about five versts from Bezsónovo, Tchertopkhánoff ran across that same princely hunting-train before which he had pranced in so dashing a manner a year and a half before. And this incident must needs happen: precisely as on that other day, so now, a grey hare leaped out in front of the hounds from under the hedge on the slope of a hill!

“Tallyho! tallyho!”—The whole hunt fairly dashed onward, and Tchertopkhánoff dashed on also—only not with them, but a couple of hundred paces to one side of them—precisely as on the former occasion. A tremendous gully intersected the declivity on a slant, and, rising higher and higher, gradually contracted, intercepting Tchertopkhánoff’s road. At the point where he was obliged to leap it—and where he actually had leaped it eighteen months previously—it was still eight paces in width, and a couple of fathoms in depth. In anticipation of a triumph,—of a triumph so miraculously repeated,—Tchertopkhánoff began to cackle victoriously, brandishing his kazák whip; the huntsmen galloped on, never taking their eyes from the bold horseman,—his horse was flying forward like an arrow,—and now, the gully is right in front of his nose! Come, come, at a bound, as before! . . . .

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

But Malek-Adel balked abruptly, wheeled to the left, and galloped along the brink, jerk his head to the side as Tchertopkhánoff might, in the direction of the gully. . . .

The fact was, he had turned cowardly, he had no confidence in himself!

Then Tchertopkhánoff, all glowing with shame and wrath, almost in tears, dropped the reins and urged the horse straight ahead, up-hill, away, away from those sportsmen, if only that he might avoid hearing how they jeered at him, if only that he might escape as speedily as possible from their accursed eyes!

With flanks covered with stripes, all bathed in foam, Malek-Adel galloped home, and Tchertopkhánoff immediately locked himself up in his own room.

“No, it is not he, it is not my friend! That one would have broken his neck,—but he would not have betrayed me!”

XI

THE following incident definitively “finished” Tchertopkhánoff, as the saying is. Mounted on

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Malek-Adel, he was one day making his way through the back-yards of the ecclesiastical settlement surrounding the church to whose parish the hamlet of Bezsonovo pertained. With his kazák cap pulled well down over his eyes, bending forward, and with both hands resting on the saddle-bow, he was slowly advancing; everything was cheerless and perturbed in his soul. All at once, some one called him by name.

He drew up his horse, raised his head, and beheld his correspondent the deacon. With a dark-brown three-cornered hat on his dark-brown locks plaited in a small pig-tail, arrayed in a kaftan of yellowish nankeen girt considerably lower than the waist with a fragment of sky-blue stuff, the servitor of the altar had come out to visit his "little granary," and, catching sight of Pantelí Eremyéitch, considered it his duty to express his respects to him,—and, incidentally, to get something out of him. It is a well-understood fact that ecclesiastical persons never enter into conversation with laymen without some ulterior motive of that sort.

But Tchertopkhánoff was in no mood to attend to the deacon; he barely returned his salutation, and, grumbling something through his teeth, he was already flourishing his kazák whip.

"But what a superb horse you have!"—the deacon hastened to add:—"really, you may congratulate yourself on it. Of a truth, you are a man of wonderful mind; simply, like unto a lion!"—The deacon was renowned for his eloquence—which greatly vexed the father-priest, whom Fate had not endowed with the gift of words: even vódka did not loosen his tongue.—“ You have been deprived of one animal, through the machinations of evil-doers,”—went on the deacon,—“ and, not in the least discouraged, but, on the contrary, relying still more firmly on Divine Providence, you have procured for yourself another quite as good, and even better, I think . . . . . for . . . . .”

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“ What nonsense art thou prating? ”—broke in Tchertopkhánoff angrily: “ What dost thou mean by another horse? This is the identical one: this is Malek-Adel. . . . I hunted him up. Thou art babbling at random. . . . ”

“ Eh! eh! eh! eh! ”—ejaculated the deacon, with pauses between, and as though prolonging his words, running his fingers through his beard, and surveying Tchertopkhánoff with his bright, greedy eyes.—“ What do you mean by that, sir? Your horse was stolen, if God gives me memory, a couple of weeks after the Feast of the Intercession <sup>1</sup> last year, and now we are at the end of November.”

“ Well, then, and what of that? ”

The deacon still continued to play with his beard.—“ It means that more than a year has elapsed since that time, and your horse was then a dappled grey as he is now; he has even grown darker. How about that? Grey horses turn very white in one year.”

<sup>1</sup> October 1, O. S.; 14, N. S.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Tchertopkhánoff shuddered . . . . it was just as though some one had pricked his heart with a spear. And, in fact, grey horses do change colour! How was it that so simple a thought had not entered his head up to that moment?

“Thou damned pig-tail!<sup>1</sup> Get out!”—he yelled suddenly, his eyes flashing with fury—and instantly vanished from the sight of the astounded deacon.

Well! All was at an end!

Everything was really at an end now, everything had burst, the last card was trumped! Everything had crashed into ruin at that one phrase: “They turn white!”

Grey horses turn white!

Gallop, gallop, thou accursed one! Thou canst not gallop away from that word!

Tchertopkhánoff dashed home, and again locked himself up.

XII

THAT this wretched nag was not Malek-Adel; that not the slightest likeness existed between him and Malek-Adel; that any man who had the least <sup>1</sup> Ecclesiastics in Russia all wear their hair long, and, as described in this story, often braid it to keep it out of the way, in private life.

—TRANSLATOR.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

sense must have perceived this at the very first glance; that he, Pantelói Tchertopkhánoff, had deceived himself in the most vulgar manner—no! That he had deliberately, with premeditation cheated himself, had lowered that haze over himself—there now remained not the faintest doubt! Tchertopkhánoff paced back and forth in his room, wheeling on his heels as he reached each wall, exactly as a wild beast does in a cage. His pride was suffering intolerably; but it was not wounded pride alone which was harrying him: despair had taken possession of him, fury was choking him, the thirst for vengeance was kindled within him. But against whom? On whom was he to revenge himself? The Jew, Yaff, Másha, the deacon, the thieving kazák, all his neighbours, the whole world, himself in conclusion? His mind became confused. His last card had been trumped! (This comparison pleased him.) And again he was the most insignificant, the most despised of men, a general laughing-stock, a ridiculous fool, a thorough-going idiot, an object of derision to—the deacon!! . . . He imagined that he could picture clearly to himself how that vile pig-tail would take to telling about the grey horse, about the stupid gentleman. . . . O damn it! . . . In vain did Tchertopkhánoff strive to suppress the rising bile; in vain did he strive to convince himself that that horse, . . . although not Malek-Adel, was every whit as good as he, and might serve him for many years: he immediately repelled this thought with vehemence, as though it contained a fresh insult for that Malek-Adel toward whom he already, and without that, felt himself to blame. . . . The idea! Like a blind man, like a dolt, he had placed that carrion, that jade, on a level with him, with Malek-Adel! And as for the service which that vile nag might still render him . . . why, would he ever deign to mount it? Not for anything on earth! Never!! . . . He would give it to a Tatár,<sup>1</sup> to the dogs to eat—that was all it was good for. . . . Yes! that would be best of all!

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

For more than two hours Tchertopkhánoff wandered about his room.

“Perfíshka!”—he suddenly issued his command. “Go to the dram-shop this very instant; bring hither a gallon and a half of vódka! Dost hear me? A gallon and a half of vódka, and be quick about it! Let the vódka be here instantly, and standing on my table!”

The vódka made its appearance without delay on Panteléi Eremyéitch’s table, and he began to drink!

XIII

ANY one who had looked at Tchertopkhánoff then, any one who could have witnessed the grim viciousness wherewith he drained glass after glass, <sup>1</sup> The Tatárs are extremely fond of horseflesh. In St. Petersburg and Moscow (where they pursue the avocations of old-clothes men and waiters) horse-meat shops exist for their benefit.—TRANSLATOR.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

would certainly have felt an involuntary terror. Night came; a tallow candle burned dimly on the table. Tchertopkhánoff had ceased to rove from corner to corner; he sat, all red in the face, with dimmed eyes, which he sometimes lowered to the floor, sometimes riveted persistently on the dark window; he would rise to his feet, pour himself out some vódka, drink it off, then sit down again, again fix his eyes on one point, and never stir—except that his breathing grew quick, and his face more scarlet. It seemed as though some decision were ripening within him, which daunted him, but to which he was gradually accustoming himself; one and the same thought importunately and unintermittently moved up ever closer and closer, one and the same image delineated itself ever more and more clearly ahead; and in his heart, under the inflaming pressure of heavy intoxication, the irritation of wrath was replaced by a feeling of fierceness, and a grin which boded no good made its appearance on his lips.

“Well, all the same, ’t is time!”—he said, in a businesslike, almost bored tone:—“’t is time to stop taking my ease!”

He drank off the last glass of the vódka, got his pistol from under his bed,—the same pistol from which he had fired at Másha,—loaded it, put several percussion-caps in his pocket, “in case of need,” and set off for the stable.

The watchman started to run to him when he began to open the door, but he shouted at him:

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“It is I! Dost not thou see? Begone!” The watchman withdrew a little to one side. “Go off to thy bed!” Tchertopkhánoff shouted at him: “there’s no need for thee to stand on guard here! A fine wonder, what a treasure!” He entered the stable. Malek-Adel . . . . the false Malek-Adel, was lying on the litter. Tchertopkhánoff gave him a kick, saying: “Get up, thou crow!” Then he untied the halter from the manger, took off the blanket and flung it on the ground, and roughly turning the obedient horse round in the stall, he led it forth into the yard, and from the yard into the open fields, to the intense amazement of the watchman, who could not possibly comprehend where the master was going by night with the bridleless horse in tow. He was afraid to ask him, of course; so merely followed him with his eyes until he disappeared at the turn of the road which led to the neighbouring forest.

XIV

TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF walked with huge strides, neither halting nor looking behind him. Malek-Adel—we shall call him by that name to the end—followed submissively in his wake. The night was fairly light; Tchertopkhánoff could distinguish the indented outline of the forest, which rose blackly in front of him, like a dark blotch. Thus embraced by the nocturnal chill, he certainly would have felt the intoxicating effects of the vódka he had drunk, had it not been . . . . had it not been for another, a more powerful intoxication, which had taken complete possession of him. His head grew heavy, the blood throbbed with a roar in his throat and ears, but he walked on firmly, and knew where he was going.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

He had decided to kill Malek-Adel; all day long he had thought of nothing else. . . . . Now he had reached a decision!

He proceeded to this deed, not precisely with composure, but with confidence, irrevocably, as a man proceeds who is obeying a sense of duty. It seemed to him a very "simple matter" to annihilate this pretender, he would thereby be quits with "everybody," would also punish himself for his stupidity, justify himself to his genuine friend, and demonstrate to the whole world (Tchertopkhánoff was greatly concerned about "the whole world") that no one could jest with him. . . . But the principal thing was,—that he meant to annihilate himself along with the pretender, for what was there now left for him to live for? How all this had stowed itself away in his head, and why it seemed to him so simple, it is not easy, although it is not utterly impossible, to explain: wounded, solitary, without a single human soul who was near to him, without a copper farthing, and with his blood heated by liquor, to boot, he was in a condition bordering on insanity, and there can be no doubt that, in the most absurd freaks of insane people, there is a sort of logic and even right in their eyes. As to the right, Tchertopkhánoff was, at any rate, fully convinced; he did not hesitate, he made haste to execute the sentence on the criminal, without, however, clearly rendering himself an account as to whom, precisely, he was calling by that name. . . . Truth to tell, he had reflected very little on what he was about to do. "I must make an end of it—I must," was what he kept repeating to himself, dully and sternly: "I must make an end of it!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And the innocent culprit trotted obediently behind him. . . . But there was no pity in Tchertopkhánoff's heart.

XV

NOT far from the edge of the forest, whither he was leading his horse, stretched a small ravine, half overgrown with oak bushes. Tchertopkhánoff descended into it. . . . Malek-Adel stumbled and came near falling on him.

"Dost want to crush me, damn thee!"—shouted Tchertopkhánoff—and, as though defending himself, he jerked the pistol out of his pocket.

He no longer felt hardness, but that peculiar wooden rigidity of the emotions which is said to take possession of a man before the perpetration of a crime. But his own voice frightened him—so savagely did it resound beneath the canopy of the dark boughs, in the decaying and stifling dampness of the forest ravine! Moreover, in reply to his exclamation, some large bird or other suddenly began to rustle in the crest of the tree over his head. . . . Tchertopkhánoff shuddered. It was as though he had aroused a witness to his deed—and where? In this remote spot, where he should not have encountered a single living creature! . . .

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“Begone, devil, to the four winds!”—he said through his teeth—and relinquishing Malek-Adel’s bridle, he dealt him a flourishing blow on the shoulder with the butt of the pistol. Malek-Adel immediately turned back, scrambled out of the ravine . . . . and set off at a gallop. But the sound of his hoof-beats was not audible long. The rising wind interfered and shrouded all sounds.

Tchertopkhánoff, in his turn, slowly made his way out of the ravine, gained the edge of the forest, and trudged homeward. He was dissatisfied with himself: the heaviness which he felt in his head and in his heart diffused itself over all his limbs; he strode onward—angry, gloomy, dissatisfied, hungry, exactly as though some one had insulted him, had robbed him of his booty, his food. . . .

A suicide who has been prevented from carrying out his intentions is acquainted with such sensations.

All at once, something touched him from behind, on the shoulder. He glanced round. . . . Malek-Adel was standing in the middle of the road. He had followed his master, he had touched him with his muzzle, he had announced his presence. . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Ah!” — screamed Tchertopkhánoff, — “so thou hast come thyself, of thine own accord, to thy death! Then take that!”

In the twinkling of an eye he pulled out his pistol, cocked it, placed the muzzle to Malek-Adel’s forehead, and fired. . . .

The poor horse sprang to one side, reared up on his hind legs, leaped back half a score of paces, and suddenly fell heavily to the ground and began to rattle hoarsely in his throat, as he writhed convulsively on the ground. . . .

Tchertopkhánoff stopped up his ears with both hands and set off on a run. His knees gave way beneath him. Intoxication, and fury, and blind self-confidence—all deserted him on the instant. Nothing remained but a feeling of shame and disgust, and the consciousness, the indubitable consciousness, that this time he had done for himself also.

XVI

SIX weeks later, Perfíshka the page considered it his duty to stop the commissary of rural police as the latter was passing Bezsónovo manor-house.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

“What dost thou want?”—inquired the guardian of order.

“Please, Your Well-Born, come into our house,”—replied the page, with a low bow: “Panteléi Eremyéitch seems to be on the point of death; and so, I ’m afraid.”

“What? He is dying?” questioned the commissary.

“Exactly so, sir. At first he drank vódka every day, but now, you see, he has taken to his bed, and has got very ill. I don’t suppose he can understand anything now. He’s perfectly speechless.”

The commissary alighted from his cart.—“Well, hast thou not been to summon the priest, at least? Has thy master made his confession? Has he received the Sacrament?”

“No, sir, he has not.”

The commissary of police frowned.—“How comes that, my good fellow? Is that the proper way to behave—hey? Or dost not thou know . . . that the responsibility for it is very great—hey?”

“But I asked him the day before yesterday, and yesterday, too,” put in the intimidated page, —“‘Do not you command me,’ says I, ‘Panteléi Eremyéitch, to run for the priest?’—‘Hold thy tongue, fool,’ says he. ‘Don’t meddle in what is n’t thy business.’ And to-day, when I began to report—he merely stared at me—and twitched his moustache.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“And has he drunk much vódka?”—asked the commissary.

“An awful lot!—But be so good, Your Well-Born, as to come to his room.”

“Well, lead the way!”—growled the commissary, and followed Perfíshka.

An astonishing sight awaited him.

In the rear room of the house, dark and damp, on a miserable pallet, covered with a horse-blanket, with a shaggy kazák felt cloak in place of a pillow, lay Tchertopkhánoff, no longer pale, but of a yellowish-green hue, like a corpse, with eyes sunken beneath glossy lids, with a sharpened but still crimson nose above his dishevelled moustache. He was lying arrayed in his inevitable kazák coat, with the cartridge-cases on his breast, and full Circassian trousers. A kazák fur cap with a deep crimson top covered his forehead to his very eyebrows. In one hand Tchertopkhánoff held his kazák hunting-whip, in the other an embroidered tobacco-pouch, Másha's last gift. On the table by the bedside stood an empty liquor-bottle; and at the head of the bed, fastened to the wall with pins, two water-colour drawings were visible: one, so far as could be discerned, represented a fat man with a guitar in his hands—probably, Nedopiúskin; the other depicted a galloping horseman. . . . The horse resembled those fabulous animals which children draw on walls and fences; but the carefully shaded dapples on its flanks and the cartridge-cases on the rider's breast, the pointed toes of his boots, and his huge moustache left no room for doubt: the sketch was intended to depict Pantelái Eremyéitch mounted on Malek-Adel.

THE END OF TCHERTOPKHÁNOFF

The astonished commissary of police did not know what to do. Deathly silence reigned in the room. "Why, he has already expired," he said to himself, and, raising his voice, he said:—"Pantelái Eremyéitch! Hey there, Pantelái Eremyéitch!"

Then something remarkable took place. Tchertopkhánoff's eyes slowly opened, the extinguished pupils moved first to the right, then to the left, came to a rest on the visitor, and saw him. . . . Something glimmered in their dull whiteness, the semblance of a glance made its appearance in them;—the lips, already blue, gradually parted, and a hoarse, already sepulchral voice made itself heard.

"Pantelái Tchertopkhánoff, nobleman of ancient lineage, is dying; who can hinder him?—He is indebted to no one, he demands nothing. . . . Leave him, ye people! Begone!"

The hand which held the kazák whip made an effort to rise. . . . In vain! The lips again adhered to each other, the eyes closed, and Tchertopkhánoff lay as before on his hard pallet, stretched out flat and with his feet drawn close together.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Let me know when he is dead,”—whispered the commissary of police to Perfíshka, as he left the room;—“and I think thou mightest go for the priest now. Due order must be observed,—he must receive Holy Unction.”<sup>1</sup>

That same day Perfíshka went for the priest; and on the following morning he had to notify the commissary of police that Panteléi Eremyéitch had died that night.

At his funeral, his coffin was escorted by two men: Perfíshka, the page, and Moshel Leiba. The news of Tchertopkhánoff's demise had, in some manner, reached the Jew; and he had not failed to pay his last debt to his benefactor.

<sup>1</sup>This unction in the Eastern Catholic Church is not Extreme Unction in the sense of those words in the Roman Church, although it is generally administered before death. In the true spirit of James v, 14-15 it may be administered any number of times during life, when a person is ill and not expected to die. The full rite calls for seven priests, but one priest can administer it.—TRANSLATOR.

X

LIVING HOLY RELICS

O native land of patient fortitude—
Land of the Russian folk art thou!

—F. TRÚTCHEFF.

A FRENCH saying runs: “A dry fisherman and a wet sportsman are sorry sights.” As I have no partiality for fishing, I am not able to judge of a fisherman’s feelings in fine, clear weather, and to what degree the satisfaction afforded him in stormy weather by an abundant catch outweighs the unpleasantness of being wet. But for the sportsman rain is a veritable calamity. To precisely such a calamity were Eremyéi and I exposed during one of our excursions after woodcock in the Byélovœ district. The rain had not ceased falling since daybreak. What did not we do to escape from it! We drew our rubber coats up almost over our heads, and stood under trees, so that there might be less dripping. . . . The waterproof coats let the water through in the most shameless manner, not to mention the fact that they interfered with our shooting; while, although at first it did not appear to drip under the trees, yet later on the moisture, which had been gradually accumulating on the foliage, suddenly broke through, every branch showered down on us water as though from a rain-spout, a chilly stream made its way under my neckerchief and trickled down my spine. . . . Well, this was "the last straw"! as Ermolái was wont to express himself.—"No, Piótr Petróvitch,"—he exclaimed at last. "This is unendurable! . . . . We cannot hunt to-day. The dogs' scent will be drowned out; the guns will miss fire. . . . Phew! What a mess!"

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

"What is to be done?"—I asked.

"Why, this.—Let us go to Alexyéevka. Perhaps you do not know that there is a farm there which belongs to your mother; it is eight versts from here. We can pass the night there, and tomorrow . . . ."

"We can return here?"

"No, not here. . . . I know some places the other side of Alexyéevka . . . . much better places for woodcock."

I did not interrogate my faithful companion as to why he had not guided me straight to those places and that same day we reached my mother's farm, whose existence, I must confess, I had not hitherto suspected. At the farm there turned out to be a small, detached building, very old, but not inhabited, and therefore clean; in it I passed a fairly quiet night.

On the following morning I awoke very early. The sun had only just risen; there was not a single cloud in the sky; everything round about was glistening with a powerful double gleam: the gleam of the young morning rays, and of the heavy rain of the day before.—While my two-wheeled cart was being harnessed, I went off for a stroll in the small garden, which had formerly been a fruit orchard, and was now utterly run wild, surrounding the little wing on all sides with its fragrant, succulent thickets. Akh, how good it was in the open air, beneath the clear sky, where the larks were trilling, whence the silver notes of their ringing voices showered down! They had, probably, borne off drops of dew on their wings, and their songs seemed besprinkled with dew. I even took my hat from my head, and inhaled joyously, to the full extent of my lungs. . . . On the slope of a small ravine, close beside the wattled fence, a collection of beehives was visible; a narrow path led to it, winding in serpentine fashion between dense walls of tall steppe-grass and nettles, over which hung, brought God knows whence, the sharp-tipped stalks of dark-green hemp.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

I wended my way along this path, and reached the beehives. Alongside them, stood a small shed with wattled walls,<sup>1</sup> a so-called amshánik, where coals are stored for winter use. I glanced in at the half-open door; it was dark, still, dry;

<sup>1</sup> In the centre and south of Russia, where wood is scarce, fences and walls are made of tree-boughs interwoven.—TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

there was an odour of mint and sweet-clover. In one corner a platform had been fitted, and on it, covered with a quilt, lay a tiny figure. . . . I was on the point of beating a retreat . . . .

“Master, hey, master! Piótr Petróvitch!”—I heard a voice, weak, slow, and hoarse, like the rustling of marsh sedges.

I stopped.

“Piótr Petróvitch! Come hither, please!”—repeated the voice. It was wafted to me from the corner with the platform which I had noticed.

I approached—and grew rigid with amazement. Before me lay a living human being; but what did it mean?

The head was completely dried up, all of one bronze hue,—precisely like a holy picture painted in ancient times; the nose was as narrow as the blade of a knife; the lips were hardly visible,—only the teeth and the eyes gleamed white, and from beneath the kerchief thin strands of yellow hair escaped upon the forehead. Two tiny hands, also bronze in colour, were moving by the chin, at the fold of the coverlet, the fingers like little sticks intertwining slowly. I looked more attentively: the face was not only not hideous, it was even beautiful,—but terrible, remarkable. And the face seemed all the more terrible to me, because I saw that a smile was striving . . . . striving to spread over it,—over its metallic cheeks,—and could not.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

“Don’t you recognise me, master?”—whispered the voice again; it seemed to evaporate from the barely-moving lips.—“But how should you!—I am Lukérya. . . . You remember, the one who used to lead the choral songs and dances at your mother’s, at Spásskoe? . . . I was the leader of the singers, as well; don’t you remember?”

“Lukérya!”—I exclaimed.—“Art thou she? Is it possible?”

“Yes, it is I, master,—I am Lukérya.”

I did not know what to say, and stared like one stunned at that dark, motionless face with the clear and deathly eyes riveted upon me. Was it possible? That mummy was Lukérya, the greatest beauty among all our domestics,—tall, plump, white, and red,—the giggler, the dancer, the singer! Lukérya, the clever Lukérya, to whom all our young men had paid court, for whom I myself had sighed in secret,—I, a lad of sixteen!

“Good heavens, Lukérya,”—I said at last:—“what has happened to thee?”

“Why, such a calamity has befallen me! But do not look at me with aversion, master, do not loathe my misfortune,—sit down on that small tub yonder,—come nearer, or you will not be able to hear me. . . . I have become so loud-voiced, you see! . . . Well, and how glad I am to see you! How comes it that you are in Alexyéevka?”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Lukérya spoke very softly and feebly, but without any breaks.

“Ermolái the hunter brought me hither. . . But tell me . . . .”

“I am to tell you about my misfortune?—Certainly, master. It happened to me long since,—six or seven years ago. They had just betrothed me to Vasíly Polyakóff,—do you remember, he was such a stately, curly-haired fellow,—he used to serve in your mother’s house as butler? But you were no longer in the country at that time; you had gone away to Moscow to study.—Vasíly and I were very much in love with each other; I thought of him continually; and it happened in the spring. So, one night . . . it was not long before dawn . . . and I could not sleep: the nightingale in the garden was singing with such wonderful sweetness! . . . . I could bear it no longer, so I got up, and went out on the porch to listen to it. It warbled and warbled . . . and suddenly it seemed to me that some one was calling me in Vása’s voice, softly, so: ‘Lúsha!’ . . . . I glanced aside, and not being fully awake, you know, I made a misstep, straight from the landing, and flew down—bang! on the ground. And I did not appear to have hurt myself badly, for I soon rose and returned to my chamber. Only, it was as though something inside me—in my belly—had been broken. . . . Let me take breath . . . . for just a minute . . . . master.”

LIVING HOLY RELICS

Lukérya stopped speaking, and I stared at her in amazement. What particularly astounded me was, that she told her story almost cheerily, without any groans and sighs, without making the slightest complaint, and without any appeal for sympathy.

“From the moment of that accident,”—went on Lukérya,—“I began to wither, to pine away; I began to turn black; it became difficult for me to walk, and I had not full control of my legs; I could neither stand nor sit; I wanted to lie down all the time. I did n’t feel like either eating or drinking: I grew worse and worse. Your mother, in her goodness, showed me to the doctors, and sent me to the hospital. But I obtained no relief. And not a single doctor could even tell what sort of malady I had. They did all sorts of things to me: they burned my back with red-hot irons, they laid me in cracked ice—but it did no good. At last, I got perfectly ossified. . . . Then the gentlemen decided that it was useless to treat me any longer, and it was n’t fitting that a cripple should be kept in the gentry’s manor-house . . . . well, and so they transferred me hither,—I have relatives here. And so I live as you see.”

Again Lukérya ceased speaking, and again she tried to smile.

“But thy condition is frightful!”—I exclaimed . . . and, without knowing what more to say, I inquired:—"And what about Vasily Polyakóff?"—It was a very stupid question.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Lukérya turned her eyes aside.

"What about Polyakóff?—He grieved and grieved,—and then he married another, a girl from Glínnoe. Do you know Glínnoe? It lies not far from us. Her name was Agraféna. He was very fond of me,—but he was a young man, you see,—he could not remain a bachelor. And how could I be his dear friend? But he has found for himself a good, kind wife,—and he has children. He lives there as manager to a neighbour; your mother gave him his passport, and he's doing very well, thank God!"

"And so thou liest here always like this?"—I put another question.

"And so I lie here like this, master, this is the seventh year. In summer I lie here in this wattle-d shed, and when cold weather comes on they carry me to the anteroom of the bath-house. There I lie."

"But who tends on thee? Does any one look after thee?"

"Why, there are kind people here also. They do not desert me. And I do not need much looking after. As for eating—I eat hardly anything, and as for water—yonder it is, in that jug: it always stands filled with pure spring water. I can reach the jug for myself: I can still use one of my hands. And then there is a little girl, an orphan; she always gives me what I need, thanks to her. She was here a little while ago. . . . Did n't you meet her? She 's such a pretty, white little thing. She brings me flowers; I 'm very fond of them,—of flowers, I mean. We have no garden-flowers here,—there were some, but they have run out. But the wild flowers are nice too, you know; they smell even better than the garden-flowers. Take lilies of the valley, for instance . . . what can be more agreeable!”

LIVING HOLY RELICS

“Dost thou never feel bored or afraid, my poor Lukérya?”

“But what is one to do? I will not lie—at first I found it very tiresome; but afterward I got used to it, I grew patient,—'t is nothing, some people are still worse off.”

“How so?”

“Why, one person has no shelter! Another is blind or deaf! But I, thank God, can see splendidly, and hear everything, everything. If a mole is burrowing underground, I hear it. And I can detect every odour, no matter how faint it is! If the buckwheat in the fields comes into bloom, or the linden in the garden,—it is not necessary to tell me about it: I am the first of all to perceive it, if only the breeze blows from that quarter. No, why anger God?—many people are worse off than I. Take this, for example: a healthy man can very easily fall into sin; but from me sin has departed of itself. A while ago,

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Father Alexyéi undertook to give me the Sacrament, and he said: 'There's no use in confessing thee: is it possible for thee to sin in thy condition?'—But I answered him:—'And how about sin of thought, bátiushka?'<sup>1</sup>—'Well,' says he, and begins to laugh, 'that's no great sin.'

"And it must be that I am not very guilty of that same,—that mental sin,"—went on Lukérya,—"because I have trained myself so: not to think, and—most of all—not to remember. The time passes more quickly so."

I must confess that I was astonished.—"Thou art always entirely alone, Lukérya? Then how canst thou prevent thoughts from coming into thy head? Or dost thou sleep all the time?"

"Oï, no, master! I am not always able to sleep. Although I do not suffer great pain,—yet there is a gnawing there inside me, and in my bones also; it will not let me sleep as I should. No. . . . I just lie here by myself, and lie and lie—and don't think; I am conscious that I am alive, I breathe—and that is all. I see, I hear. The bees hum and drone among the hives; a pigeon alights on the roof and begins to coo; a mother-hen comes along with her chicks and begins to peck up the crumbs; or a sparrow or a butterfly flutters in—which pleases me very much. The year before last the swallows built themselves a nest yonder in the corner, and raised their brood. How interesting it was! One would fly to the nest, alight on it, and feed the babies—and off it would go again. And lo, the other one would take its place. Sometimes the bird would not fly in, but merely dash across the open door—but the nestlings would immediately begin to squeak, and open their bills. . . . I watched for them the next year, but I was told that one of the sportsmen in the neighbourhood had shot them. And why did he covet them? For, altogether, a swallow is no bigger than a beetle. . . . How wicked you sportsmen are!”

<sup>1</sup>"Dear little father," literally; used in respectfully-affectionate address to a man of any rank, from the Emperor down, but especially the prerogative of the priesthood.—TRANSLATOR.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

“I do not shoot swallows,”—I hastened to remark.

“And then, once, what a good laugh I had!”—began Lukérya again.—“A hare ran in,—it really did! The dogs were chasing it, I suppose,—only it seemed just to roll in through the door! . . . . It squatted down quite close to me, and sat there for a long time,—and kept moving its nose and twitching its moustache, just like an officer! And it stared at me. It understood, probably, that I was not dangerous to it. At last it got up, went hop-hop to the door, glanced round on the threshold—and vanished from sight! It was so funny!”

Lukérya cast a glance at me . . . . as much as to ask: “Was n’t it funny?” I laughed to please her. She bit her withered lips.

“Well, and in winter, I am not so well off, of course: because it is dark; one hates to light a candle, and what 's the use of it? Although I can read and write, and was always fond of reading, what is there for me to read? There are no books whatever here, and even if there were any, how could I hold a book? Father Alexyéi brought me a calendar to divert me, but saw that it was useless, so he took and carried it away again. But although it is dark, there is always something to listen to: a cricket will begin to chirp or a mouse to gnaw somewhere.—And under such circumstances it is a good thing not to think!

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“And then I recite prayers,”—continued Lukérya, after resting a while.—“Only I don't know many of them,—of those same prayers. And why should I worry the Lord God? What can I ask of Him? He knows better than I do what I need. He has sent me a cross—which signifies that He loves me. We are commanded to understand it so. I repeat the Our Father, the Hail Mary, the acathistus<sup>1</sup> to the Virgin of Sorrows,—and then I go on lying here without any thought at all. And I don't mind it!”

A couple of minutes passed. I did not break the silence, and did not stir on the narrow tub which served me as a seat. The stiff, stony im-

<sup>1</sup> A service of hymns and prayers to the Saviour, the Virgin Mother, or a Saint. The congregation stands throughout.—TRANSLATOR.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

mobility of the living, unhappy being who lay there before me had communicated itself to me: I also seemed to have become petrified.

“Hearken, Lukérya,” — I said at last. — “Hearken to the proposition which I am about to make to thee. I will have thee taken to a hospital, to a good hospital in the town: wouldst thou like that? Perhaps they can cure thee—who knows? At any rate, thou wilt not be alone. . . .”

Lukérya contracted her brows almost imperceptibly.—“Okh, no, master,”—she said, in an anxious whisper,—“don’t transfer me to the hospital, don’t touch me. I shall only undergo more tortures there.—Cure me indeed! Why, a doctor once came here, and wanted to examine me. I begged him: ‘Do not disturb me, for Christ’s sake!’ It was no use! He began to turn me about, he kneaded and bent my arms and legs, and says he: ‘I’m doing this in the interests of science; that’s what I’m a learned man in the service for! And thou,’ says he, ‘canst not oppose me, because I have been given an Order to wear on my neck for my labours, and I exert myself for the benefit of you fools!’ He mauled me, and mauled me, and told me the name of my ailment,—such a hard name,—and then he went away. And all my bones ached for a whole week afterward. You say that I am alone, always alone. No, not always. People come to me. I am quiet, I do not disturb them. The young peasant girls drop in, and chatter; a pilgrim strays in, and begins to tell me about Jerusalem, about Kíeff, about the holy cities. And I am not afraid to be alone. I even like it better so, truly I do! . . . . Don't touch me, master, don't take me to the hospital. . . . . I thank you,—you are kind,—only don't touch me, my dear little dove.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Well, as thou wilt, as thou wilt, Lukérya. I meant it for thy good, seest thou. . . .”

“I know, master, that it was for my good. But, master dear, who can help another? Who can enter into this soul? A man must help himself! Now, you will not believe it—but I sometimes lie here alone like this . . . . and it seems as though there were not another person in all the world except myself. I alone am living! And I feel as though something were blessing me. . . . Thoughts come to me—even wonderful thoughts.”

“What dost thou think about at such times, Lukérya?”

“’T is utterly impossible to tell thee that, master: it can't be explained. And one forgets it afterward, too. It is as though a little cloud descended, and spread abroad, and everything becomes so cool and pleasant,—but what has happened you can't understand. Only, I think to myself: ‘If there were people about me, nothing of this sort would take place, and I should feel nothing, except my own misfortune.’”

LIVING HOLY RELICS

Lukérya drew breath with difficulty. Her lungs did not obey her, any more than the rest of her members.

“When I look at you, master,”—she began again,—“I feel very sorry for you. But you must not pity me too much, really! I’ll tell you something, for example: sometimes, even now, I . . . . Of course, you remember what a merry girl I was in my day? A dashing maid! . . . So, do you know what? I sing songs even now.”

“Songs? . . . . Thou?”

“Yes, songs, ancient ballads, choral songs,<sup>1</sup> Christmas carols, all sorts of songs! I knew a great many, you see, and have not forgotten them. Only I don’t sing any dance-songs. It is n’t fitting,—in my present condition.”

“But how dost thou sing them . . . . to thyself?”

“Both to myself and with my voice. I can’t sing loudly, but they are audible, nevertheless. There now, I have told you that a little maid comes to me. She’s a quick-witted orphan, you see. So I have taught her; she has already learned four songs from me. Don’t you believe it? Wait,—in a minute I’ll . . . .”

Lukérya mustered her forces. . . . The thought that this half-dead being was preparing <sup>1</sup>The choral songs which accompany the games of the peasant girls. Many of these games consist of slow, circling movements.—

TRANSLATOR.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

to sing aroused in me involuntary terror. But before I could utter a word, a prolonged, barely audible, but pure and true sound trembled on my ears . . . followed by a second, a third. Lukérya was singing "In the Meadows." She sang without altering the expression of her petrified countenance, even fixing her eyes in a stare. But so touchingly did that poor, forced little voice ring forth, like a wreath of undulating smoke, so greatly did her soul long to pour itself out . . . that I no longer felt terror: unutterable pity gripped my heart.

"Okh, I cannot!"—she said suddenly,—“I have not the strength. . . . It has given me great pleasure to see you.”

She closed her eyes.

I laid my hand on her tiny, cold fingers. . . . She darted a glance at me—and her dark eyelids, fringed with golden lashes, as in an ancient statue, closed again. A moment later, they began to gleam in the semi-darkness. . . . They were wet with tears.

As before, I did not stir.

"What a goose I am!"—said Lukérya suddenly, with unexpected force, and opening her eyes wide, she tried to wink the tears from them.—“Is n't it shameful? What ails me? 'T is a long time since anything of this sort happened with me . . . not since the day when Vasíly Polyakóff came to me, last spring. As long as he was sitting and talking with me, it was all right; but when he went away, I just cried all by myself! I can't tell what made me do it! . . . . Tears come easy to us women, you know. Master,"—added Lukérya,—“you have a handkerchief, I suppose. . . . Don't disdain to wipe my eyes. . . .”

LIVING HOLY RELICS

I hastened to comply with her request—and left her the handkerchief. At first she tried to refuse . . . . saying: “Why should you make me such a gift?” The handkerchief was a very plain one, but clean and white. Then she seized it in her feeble fingers, and did not relax them again. Having become accustomed to the gloom in which we both were, I could distinctly discern her features, could even detect a faint flush which flitted across the bronze of her face, could discover in that face—at least so it seemed to me—traces of its former beauty.

“You were asking me, master,”—Lukérya again began to speak,—“whether I sleep? As a matter of fact, I sleep rarely; but when I do, I have such fine dreams! I never see myself as ill: in my dreams I am always so healthy and young. . . . One thing is unfortunate: I wake up, and want to stretch myself well, and lo! I am as though fettered all over. Once I had a wonderful dream! I'll tell you about it, shall I?—Well then, listen.—I seem to be standing in a field, and all around is rye, so tall and ripe and golden! . . .

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And I seem to have with me a small, reddish dog, a very, very vicious beast—it is continually trying to bite me. And there seems to be a reaping-hook in my hands—not an ordinary hook, but exactly like the moon when it resembles a reaping-hook. And with that moon I am to reap the rye clean. But I am greatly fatigued with the heat, and that moon dazzles me, and languor comes upon me; and all around corn-flowers are growing, and such big ones! And they have turned their little heads toward me. And I think to myself: ‘I will pluck those corn-flowers; Vása has promised to come—so I will first weave myself a wreath; I shall have time to do the reaping.’ I begin to pluck corn-flowers, but they begin to melt away,—melt away between my fingers,—I never saw anything like it! And I cannot weave myself a wreath. But, in the meantime, I hear some one coming toward me, so close, and calling: ‘Lúsha! Lúsha!’ . . . . ‘Aï,’ thinks I to myself, ‘woe is me, I have n’t got through the reaping! Nevertheless, I will place the moon on my head instead of the corn-flowers.’ I put on the moon exactly like a kokóshnik,<sup>1</sup> and immediately I myself began to beam all over, and lighted up the whole field. And lo! over the very crests of the rye-ears, there comes swiftly advancing toward me—not Vása, but Christ Himself! And how I knew that it was Christ, I cannot tell.—He is not painted in that way,—but it was no one else but He! Beardless, tall, young, clad all in white,—only His girdle was of gold,—and He stretches out His hand to me.—‘Fear not, my bride adorned for my coming,’—He says, ‘follow me: thou shalt lead the chorals in my heavenly kingdom, and play the songs of paradise!’—And how I glue my lips to His hand!—My dog instantly falls at my feet . . . . but then we soared upward! He in front . . . . His wings spread out over all the sky, as long as those of a sea-gull,—and I after Him. And the little dog was forced to leave me. Only then did I understand that that dog was my malady, and that in the kingdom of heaven there will be no room for it.”

<sup>1</sup> The coronet-shaped head-dress of the peasant maidens.—TRANSLATOR.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

Lukérya paused for a moment.

“And I saw something else in a dream,”—she began anew,—“or perhaps it was a vision—really, I do not know. It seemed to me that I am lying in this same wattled shed, and my dead parents come to me,—my father and my mother,—and bow low before me, but say nothing. And I ask them: ‘Why do you do reverence to me, dear father and mother?’—‘Because,’—they say to me, ‘in that thou sufferest great torture in this world, thou hast not only lightened thine own soul, but hast removed from us also a great burden. And things have become much more propitious for us in the other world. Thou hast already finished with thine own sins; now thou art conquering our sins.' And having spoken thus, my parents did me reverence again—and became invisible; only the walls were visible. I was greatly perplexed afterward as to what had happened to me. I even told the priest about it in confession. But he thinks that it was not a vision, because only persons of the ecclesiastical profession have visions.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“And then, here is another dream I had,”—pursued Lukérya.—“I see myself sitting, apparently, on the highway, under a willow-tree, holding a peeled staff in my hand, with a wallet on my shoulders, and my head enveloped in a kerchief—a regular tramp! And I have to go somewhere very, very far off, on a pilgrimage. And tramps keep passing me; they are walking softly, as though unwillingly, and all in one direction; all their faces are dejected, and they all resemble one another greatly. And I see that a woman is winding in and out, darting about among them; and she is a whole head taller than all the rest, and she wears a peculiar garb, not like ours, not Russian. And she has a peculiar face, too,—a fasting, stern face. And all the others seem to draw away from her, and, all of a sudden, she wheels round, and makes straight toward me. She comes to a halt and gazes, and her eyes are like those of a falcon, yellow, large, and bright, very bright. And I ask her: ‘Who art thou?'—And she says to me: 'I am thy death.' I suppose I ought to have felt afraid; but, on the contrary, I am glad, so very glad, and I cross myself! And the woman says to me: 'I am sorry for thee, Lukérya, but I cannot take thee with me.—Farewell!'—O Lord! how sad I became then! . . . . 'Take me,' I say, 'dear little mother, my dear little dove, take me!'—And my death turned round to me, and began to reprimand me. . . . I understand that she is appointing me my hour, but so unintelligibly, indistinctly. . . . 'After the fast of St. Peter,' says she. . . Thereupon I awoke. . . . I do have such wonderful dreams!"

LIVING HOLY RELICS

Lukérya raised her eyes upward . . . . became pensive. . . .

"Only, this is my misfortune: it sometimes happens that a whole week will pass without my getting to sleep a single time. Last year a lady passed by, and saw me, and gave me a phial with medicine to prevent sleeplessness; she ordered me to take ten drops at a time. It helped me a great deal, and I slept; only the phial was emptied long ago. . . . Don't you know what medicine it was, and how I could get some?"

The passing lady had, evidently, given Lukérya opium. I promised to procure for her another such phial, and again could not help expressing aloud my amazement at her patience.

"Ekh, master!"—she returned.—"What makes you say that? What do you mean by patience? There was Simeon the Stylite, he had great patience: he stood for thirty years on a pillar! And another saint ordered them to bury him in the earth up to his very chest, and the ants devoured his face. . . . And here is something which a well-read person once told me: there was a certain country, and Agarians<sup>1</sup> conquered that country, and they tortured and slew all the inhabitants; and do what the inhabitants would, they could not possibly free themselves. And then a holy, chaste virgin woman made her appearance among those inhabitants; she took a great sword, put on armour eighty pounds in weight, went against the Agarians, and drove them all beyond the sea. Then, after she had driven them out, she said to the people: ‘Now do you burn me, for such was my vow, that I would die a death by fire for my people.’—And the Agarians took her and burned her, and that people set themselves free, from that time forth forever! That was a feat! But what have I done!”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Thereupon, I marvelled inwardly, at the place and the form which the legend of Jeanne d’Arc had attained, and, after preserving silence for a few moments, I asked Lukérya how old she was.

“Twenty-eight . . . . or nine. . . . I am not yet thirty. But what is the use of reckoning

<sup>1</sup>In Russian, Englishmen is Anglitcháne. Lukérya says Agaryáne.—TRANSLATOR.

LIVING HOLY RELICS

the years! Here's something else I must tell you. . . ."

Suddenly Lukérya gave a dull cough, and groaned. . . .

"Thou art talking a great deal,"—I remarked to her,—“it may injure thee.”

"That is true,"—she whispered in a barely audible tone,—“our conversation must end; but never mind! Now, when you are gone I can keep silent to my heart's content. At all events I have eased my soul. . . .”

I began to take leave of her, repeated my promise to send her the medicine, requested her to think it over once more thoroughly, and tell me whether she did not want something.

"I want nothing; I am content with everything, thank God!"—she articulated with a tremendous effort, but with emotion.—“May God grant health to all men! And see here, master, you ought to persuade your mother to reduce the quit-rent of the peasants here a little, at least—for they are very poor. They have not sufficient land, they have no pasture-land. . . . They would pray to God for you if you did it. . . . But I need nothing.—I am content with everything.”

I gave Lukérya my word that I would comply with her request, and was already at the door—when she called to me again.

"Do you remember, master," she said,—and something wonderful flitted through her eyes and over her lips,—“what magnificent hair I had? It reached my very knees,—you remember! For a long time, I could not bring myself to . . . . Such hair as it was!—But how could I comb it? In my condition!—So I cut it off. . . . Yes. . . . Well, good-bye, master! My strength is gone. . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

That same day, before I set out on my hunt, I had a conversation about Lukérya with the assistant manager of the farm. From him I learned that she was called in the village “The Living Holy Relics”; that no one ever beheld her uneasy: neither murmuring nor complaint was to be heard from her.—“She asks for nothing herself, but, on the contrary, she is thankful for everything; she’s the quietest of the quiet, I must say. She has been smitten by God,”—wound up the assistant manager,—“for her sins, it must be; but we don’t go into that. And as for condemning her,—no, we do not condemn her. Leave her in peace!”

A FEW weeks later, I heard that Lukérya was dead. Death had come for her, after all . . . . and “after St. Peter’s Day.” The people narrated how, on the day of her death, she had heard uninterruptedly the chiming of bells, although it is reckoned more than five versts from Alexyéevka to the church, and it was a week-day. Moreover, Lukérya had said that the ringing did not proceed from the church, but "from up above." Probably she had not dared to say "from heaven."

LIVING HOLY RELICS

XI

THE RATTLING

“ I MUST tell you something,”—said Ermolái, as he entered my cottage: I had just eaten my dinner, and had lain down on the camp-bed, with a view to resting a little after a fairly successful, but fatiguing hunt for woodcock—it was about the tenth of July, and the heat was frightful. . . . “ I must tell you something: we are completely out of bird-shot.”

I sprang from the bed.

“ Out of bird-shot? How is that? Why, we took about thirty pounds with us when we started from the village—a whole sackful!”

“ That ’s so; and it was a big sack: it ought to have been enough for a fortnight. But who knows! There may have been a hole in it; . . . anyhow, there is n’t any . . . there ’s enough left for about ten shots.”

“ What are we to do now? The very best places are ahead of us—we were promised six coveys for to-morrow. . . . ”

“ Send me to Túla.—It is n’t far off: forty-five versts in all. I ’ll fly like the wind and bring a whole pud <sup>1</sup> of bird-shot if you command me.”

<sup>1</sup> About thirty-six pounds.—TRANSLATOR.

THE RATTLING

“ But when wilt thou go? ”

“ Why, this very instant, if you like. What’s the use of putting it off? Only, here’s one thing: I must hire horses.”

“ What dost thou mean by hiring horses?—And what are our own for? ”

“ Our own can’t be used.—The shaft-horse has gone lame . . . . awfully! ”

“ When did that happen? ”

“ Why, a little while ago,—the coachman took him to be shod. Well, and they shod him. He must have hit on a bad blacksmith.—Now the horse can’t even step on that foot—his fore foot. So he carries it . . . . like a dog.”

“ What then? Have n’t they removed the shoe, at least? ”

“ No, they have n’t; but he certainly ought to have the shoe taken off. . . I think the nail must have been driven into the very flesh.”

I ordered the coachman to be summoned. It turned out that Ermolái had told the truth: the shaft-horse really could not stand on his foot.—I immediately took measures for having the shoe removed and the horse placed on damp clay.

“ Well? Do you order me to hire horses for Túla? ”—Ermolái pressed me for an answer.

“ Why, is it possible to find any horses in this remote wilderness? ”—I exclaimed with involuntary irritation. . . .

The village in which we found ourselves was out of the way, in the wilds; all its inhabitants appeared to be poverty-stricken; it was with difficulty that we had hunted up one cottage which, if not clean, was at least tolerably spacious.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“It is,”—replied Ermolái with his customary imperturbability.—“You have spoken truly about this village; only, in this same place there used to live one peasant.—Such a clever fellow! So rich! He had nine horses. He is dead, and his eldest son now administers everything. He’s a man—the stupidest of the stupid, but he has n’t yet managed to get rid of all the paternal goods.—We’ll get some horses from him.—If you command, I will bring him here.—His brothers are lively lads, I’m told . . . nevertheless, he is their head.”

“Why is that?”

“Because he’s the eldest!—That means,—Younger lads, obey!”—At this point, Ermolái expressed himself in strong and unprintable language about younger brothers in general.—“I’ll bring him.—He’s simple-minded.—You can make your own terms with him.”

While Ermolái went in search of his “simple-minded” man, the idea occurred to me: “Would it not be better for me to go to Túla myself?” In the first place, taught by experience, I had not much confidence in Ermolái; I had once sent him to town to make some purchases, he had promised to execute my commissions in the space of one day —and had disappeared for a whole week, had drunk up all the money, and had returned on foot, although he had set out in a racing-drozhky. In the second place, I was acquainted with a horse-dealer in Túlá; I might buy from him a horse to take the place of the lame shaft-horse.

THE RATTLING

“That settles it!”—I thought.—“I’ll go myself; and I can sleep on the road—luckily, the tarantás is comfortable.”

“I’ve brought him!”—exclaimed Ermolái, a quarter of an hour later, tumbling into the cottage.—In his wake there entered a tall peasant, in a white shirt, blue trousers, and plaited linden-bark slippers,—a man with white eyelashes, blear-eyed, with a small, red, wedge-shaped beard, a long, thick nose, and a gaping mouth. He really did look like a “weak-minded” person.

“Here, if you please,”—said Ermolái,—“he has horses, and he consents.”

“This you see,—I . . . .” the peasant began in a husky voice and with a stutter, tossing back his thin hair, and fingering the rim of his cap, which he held in his hands.—“I, you see . . . .”

“What is thy name?”—I inquired.

The peasant dropped his eyes and seemed to be meditating.—“What is my name, did you say?”

“Yes; what is thy name?”

“Why, my name will be Filoféi.”

“Well, see here now, my good Filoféi; I hear

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

that thou hast horses.—Bring hither a tróika,—we will hitch them to my tarantás,—it is a light one,—and do thou drive me to Túla. It is a moonlight night, the trip will be light and cool. What sort of a road have you thither?”

“Road? The road’s all right.—It’s twenty versts, all told, to the highway. There’s one small stretch . . . . which is bad; otherwise, it’s all right.”

“What is that bad stretch?”

“Why, the river must be forded.”

“But are you going to Túla yourself?”—inquired Ermolái.

“Yes, I am.”

“Well!”—said my faithful servitor, and shook his head.—“We-e-ell!”—he repeated, spat, and left the room.

The trip to Túla, evidently, no longer had any attractions; it had become for him an empty and uninteresting matter.

“Dost thou know the road well?”—I said, addressing Filoféi.

“Why should n’t we know the road!—Only, you see, I can’t go anyhow . . . . it’s so sudden. . . . .”

It turned out that Ermolái, in hiring Filoféi, had announced to him that he had no doubt that he, the fool, would be paid . . . . and nothing more! Filoféi, although he was a fool, according to Ermolái’s statement, was not satisfied with that announcement alone. He demanded from me fifty rubles,—a huge sum; I offered him ten rubles,—a low price.—We began to haggle; at first, Filoféi was obdurate—then he began to yield, but slowly. Ermolái, who came in for a minute, began to assure me that “this fool”— (“Evidently, he has taken a fancy to the word!”—commented Filoféi in an undertone)—“this fool does n’t know the value of money”—and, incidentally, reminded me how, twenty years previously, the posting-station erected by my mother on a fine site, at the intersection of two highways, had sunk into utter decay, owing to the fact that the old house-serf, who had been placed there to manage the establishment, really did not know how to reckon money, and judged of it according to its quantity,—that is, he would give, for instance, a silver quarter-ruble for six copper five-kopék pieces, swearing roundly the while.

THE RATTLING

“Ekh, thou, Filoféi, art a regular Filoféi!”—ejaculated Ermolái at last,—and quitting the room in a rage, he banged the door behind him.

Filoféi made him no reply, as though conscious of the fact that to be named Filoféi was, in reality, not quite expedient, and that a man may be upbraided for it, although, properly speaking, the person to blame in the matter is the priest, who has not been as benignant to him as he should have been.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

But, at last, we agreed upon twenty rubles.—He went off to get the horses, and an hour later led up five from which I was to make my choice. The horses seemed to be pretty good, although their manes and tails were tangled, and their bellies were big and taut as a drum.—With Filoféi came two of his brothers, who bore not the slightest resemblance to him. Small, black-eyed, sharp-nosed, they really did produce the impression of being “lively lads”; they talked much and fast,—“cackled,” as Ermolái expressed it,—but rendered obedience to their elder brother.

They rolled the tarantás from beneath the shed, and worked over it and the horses for an hour and a half; now they loosened the rope traces, again they hitched them up very tight! Both brothers insisted upon harnessing the “roan” in the shafts, because “you kin let that critter full-tilt down hill”;<sup>1</sup>—but Filoféi decided in favour of a very shaggy horse.—So the shaggy horse was put in the shafts.

They stuffed the tarantás full of hay, and thrust under the seat the lame horse’s collar—in case it should prove necessary to fit it to the newly-purchased horse in Túla. . . . Filoféi, who had contrived to run home and return thence in a long, white peasant-coat which had belonged to his father, a tall conical cap, and oiled boots, clambered solemnly to the driver’s box.—I took my seat, and looked at my watch:—it was a quarter past ten.—Ermolái did not even take leave of me, having set about thrashing his Valétka; Filoféi jerked the reins, shouted in an extremely shrill little voice: “Ekh, you tiny beasts!”—his brothers sprang up on each side, lashed the trace-horses under the belly, and the tarantás rolled off, and turned through the gate into the street. The shaggy horse made an attempt to dash to his place in the yard,—but Filoféi brought him to his senses by a few blows of his whip,—and we had soon left the village behind and were bowling along a tolerably level road, between dense thickets of nut-bushes.

<sup>1</sup> Russians drive at full speed down and up hills.—TRANSLATOR.

THE RATTLING

The night was calm and magnificent, the most convenient sort for driving.

At times, the breeze would rustle among the bushes, rocking the branches; at times it would die away completely: but here and there in the sky motionless silvery clouds were visible; the moon rode high, brilliantly illuminating the countryside.—I stretched myself out on the hay, and was already beginning to fall into a doze . . . . when the “bad stretch” suddenly recurred to my memory, and I started up.

“How now, Filoféi? Is it far to the ford?”

“To the ford, you say? It will be about eight versts.”

“‘Eight versts,’”—I thought to myself.—“We shall not get there under an hour.—I can take a nap.”—“Dost thou know the road well, Filoféi?”—I asked another question.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“Why, how could I help it, knowing the road? ’T is n’t the first time I’ve been over it.”

He added something more, but I was no longer listening to him. . . . I was asleep.

WHAT aroused me was not my intention to awake precisely an hour later, as is often the case,—but a strange, though faint dragging through mud and gurgling directly under my ear.—I raised my head. . . .

What marvel was this?—I was lying, as before, in the tarantás; but around the tarantás,—and about fourteen inches—not more—from its rim, a watery expanse, lighted up by the moon, was dimpling and undulating in small, distinct ripples. I cast a glance ahead: on the box, with drooping head and bowed back, sat Filoféi, like a statue,—and further away still, over the purling water,—the curving line of the shaft-arch and the heads and backs of the horses were visible.—And everything was so motionless, so noiseless,—exactly as in the realm of enchantment: in a dream, a fantastic dream. . . . What did it mean?—I darted a glance backward from beneath the hood of the tarantás. . . . Why, we were in the very middle of the river . . . . the shores were more than thirty paces distant from us!

THE RATTLING

“ Filoféi! ”—I shouted.

“ What? ”—he replied.

“ What dost thou mean by ‘ what ’? Good gracious! Where are we? ”

“ In the river. ”

“ I see that we are in the river.—But if we go on like this, we shall drown.—Dost mean to say that thou art traversing the ford in this manner? Hey?—Why, thou art fast asleep, Filoféi! Come, answer me! ”

“ I ’ve got a trifle astray, ”—said my driver:—
“ I ’ve gone to one side, you know, more ’s the pity; but now we must wait. ”

“ What dost thou mean by ‘ must wait ’?—
What are we to wait for? ”

“ Why, here, let the shaggy horse look about him: wherever he turns, there the ford will be, you see, and we must drive in that direction. ”

I half sat up on the straw.—The head of the shaggy horse hung motionless over the water.—The only thing that could be seen by the clear light of the moon was, that one of its ears was moving backward and forward almost imperceptibly.

“ Why, he ’s fast asleep also, thy shaggy horse! ”

“ No, ”—replied Filoféi:—“ he ’s sniffing the water now. ”

Again everything relapsed into silence, and, as

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

before, there was no sound save the purling of the water.—I also grew benumbed.

The moonlight, and the night, and the river, and we in it . . . .

“What’s that making such a hoarse sound?”—I asked Filoféi.

“That?—Ducklings in the reeds . . . . or snakes.”

All at once the head of the shaft-horse began to shake, he pricked up his ears, he began to snort, and turned round.—“No-no-no-noo!” Filoféi suddenly roared at the top of his lungs, and, half-rising, he brandished his whip. The tarantás immediately moved from its stand, dashing forward at an angle across the current of the river—and advanced, quivering and swaying. . . . At first it seemed to me that we were sinking, plunging into the depths; but after two or three jolts and dives, the watery expanse seemed suddenly to grow shallower. . . . It kept sinking lower and lower, the tarantás kept rising higher and higher out of it,—lo! the wheels and the horses’ tails had already made their appearance,—and now, with mighty and violent splashings, raising sheaves of diamonds,—no, not of diamonds, but of sapphires, which dispersed in the full gleam of the moon,—the horses dragged us cheerily and with a final effort on to the sandy shore, and proceeded along the road, up-hill, vying with each other in trotting along with their shining, wet hoofs.

THE RATTLING

“What will Filoféi say now?”—flashed through my mind: “‘You see I was right!’—or something of that sort?” But he said nothing at all. Consequently, I did not consider it necessary to upbraid him for his lack of caution, and stretching myself out again upon the hay, I tried to get to sleep.

But I could not get to sleep, not because I was fatigued with hunting, and not because the trepidation I had undergone had driven slumber from me,—but probably because we were obliged to pass through very beautiful places. Now there were spacious, luxuriant, grassy water-meadows, with a multitude of small pools, lakes, brooks, creeks overgrown at their extremities with willows and vines, genuine Russian spots, beloved of the Russian folk, similar to those whither the heroes of our ancient epic songs<sup>1</sup> were wont to go to shoot white swans and grey ducks. The well-beaten road wound in a yellowish ribbon, the horses ran lightly—and I could not close an eye,—to such a degree was I admiring things! And all this glided past me so softly and sedately, beneath the friendly moon.—Even Filoféi was affected.

“Those are what are called among us the Saint-George meadows,”—he said, turning to me;—“and next come the Grand-Prince meadows; there are no other meadows like them in all Russia. . . . They are very beautiful!"—The shaft-horse snorted and shook himself. . . . "Lord bless thee!" . . . . said Filoféi, staidly and in an undertone.—"Are n't they beautiful?" he repeated, with a sigh, and then indulged in a prolonged groan. "The mowing-lands begin pretty soon, now, and what a lot of hay they get from them—an awful lot!—And there are quantities of fish in the creeks, too.—Such bream!"—he added in a drawl. "In a word: there is no need of dying from hunger!"

<sup>1</sup> See “The Epic Songs of Russia,” by Isabel F. Hapgood.
Charles Scribner’s Sons.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Suddenly he raised his hand.

"Ehva!—just look yonder! over yonder lake . . . . is n't it a heron standing there? can it be possible that it is catching fish by night? Ekh-ma! 't is a stump, not a heron. I was fooled that time! but the moon always deceives."

Thus did we drive on and on. . . . But now the meadows came to an end, small tracts of forest made their appearance, and tilled fields; a hamlet on one side twinkled with two or three lights,—not more than five versts remained to the highway.—I fell asleep.

Again I did not wake of my own accord. This time Filoféi's voice aroused me.

"Master . . . . hey, master!"

I raised myself on my elbow.—The tarantás was standing still on a level spot, in the very middle of the highway; turned round toward me on the box, full face, with his eyes widely opened (I was even astonished, not having supposed that he had such large eyes), Filoféi whispered significantly and mysteriously:

THE RATTLING

“There ’s a rattling! . . . . There ’s a rattling!”

“What ’s that thou ’rt saying?”

“I say there ’s a rattling!—Just bend down and listen. Do you hear?”

I thrust my head out of the tarantás, and held my breath:—and, in fact, I did hear somewhere in the distance, far away from us, a faint, spasmodic rattling, as though of rumbling wheels.

“Do you hear?”—repeated Filoféi.

“Well, yes,”—I replied. “Some equipage is driving on the road.”

“But you don’t hear it . . . . . hist! There it is . . . . harness-bells . . . . . and a whistle too. . . . . Do you hear? Come, take off your cap . . . . . you will hear more distinctly.”

I did not take off my cap, but lent an ear.—“Well, yes . . . . . perhaps I do.—But what of that?”

Filoféi turned his face toward his horses.

“A peasant-cart is rolling swiftly . . . . . unladen, the wheels have tires,” he said, as he gathered up his reins.—“It means, master, that evil people are driving yonder; for here, in the vicinity of Túla, there ’s a lot of . . . . . frolicking.”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“What nonsense! Why dost thou assume that they must, infallibly, be wicked people?”

“I’m telling you truly.—With bells . . . and in an unladen cart. . . Who can it be?”

“Well, and is it very far to Túla still?”

“It must be a good fifteen versts, and there’s not a sign of a dwelling.”

“Well, then, drive on as rapidly as possible; we must make no delay.”

Filoféi flourished his whip, and again the tarantás rolled on.

ALTHOUGH I did not believe Filoféi, still I could no longer sleep.—And what if, in reality . . . ? An unpleasant sensation began to stir within me.—I sat up in the tarantás—up to that time I had been lying down—and began to gaze on all sides. While I had been asleep, a thin mist had gathered—not over the earth, but over the sky; it lay high up,—the moon hung in it like a whitish spot, as though veiled in crape. Everything had grown dull and confused, although below things were more visible.—All around lay flat, melancholy places; fields, and more fields, here and there a few bushes, ravines—and then more fields, and chiefly fallow land, with sparse, weedy grass. Empty . . . dead! Not even a quail was calling.

We drove on for half an hour.—Filoféi was continually cracking his whip and chirruping with his lips, but neither he nor I uttered a word. Now we ascended a hillock. . . . Filoféi stopped the tróika, and immediately said:

THE RATTLING

“There ’s a rattling . . . . a rattling, master!”

Again I hung out of the tarantás; but I might as well have remained under the hood, so clearly, though distinctly, was there now borne to my ears the sound of cart-wheels, men whistling, the jingling of the harness-bells, and the trampling of horses’ hoofs; I even fancied I heard singing and laughter. The breeze, it is true, was blowing from that quarter, but there was no doubt of the fact that the unknown travellers had drawn nearer to us by a whole verst—possibly, even, by two versts.

Filoféi and I exchanged glances,—he merely moved his cap from the back of his head over his brow, and immediately, bending over the reins, began to lash the horses. They set out at a gallop, but could not keep up the pace long, and again dropped into a trot.—Filoféi continued to belabour them. We must make our escape!

I could not account to myself for the fact that this time I, who had not at first shared Filoféi’s suspicions, had suddenly acquired the conviction that it was really evil-doers who were driving in pursuit of us. . . . I had heard nothing new: there were the same bells, there was the same rattling sound of an unloaded cart, the same whis-

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

ting, the same confused uproar. . . . But I now no longer cherished any doubt. . Filoféi could not be mistaken!

And thus twenty more minutes passed. . . . In the course of these last twenty minutes, athwart the rattling and rumbling of our own equipage, we could hear another rattling, another rumbling. . . .

“Halt, Filoféi!”—I said: “it makes no difference—there can be but one end to this?”

Filoféi uttered a faint-hearted “Whoa!” The horses stopped instantly, as though delighted at the possibility of taking a rest!

Good heavens! the bells were simply roaring behind our backs, the cart was thundering on with a rattle, men were whistling, shouting, and singing, the horses were neighing and pounding the earth with their hoofs. . . .

They had overtaken us!

“Ca-la-mee-ty!”—said Filoféi brokenly, in an undertone—and, with an irresolute chirrup, he began to urge on his horses. But at the same moment, something seemed suddenly to give way with a crash and a roar and a groan,—and a very large, broad peasant-cart, drawn by three emaciated horses, overtook us abruptly, like a whirlwind, dashed past us, and immediately slowed down to a walk, blocking the road.

“A regular brigand trick!”—whispered Filoféi.

THE RATTLING

I must admit that my heart began to beat wildly. . . . I began to stare intently into the semi-gloom of the moonlight veiled in vapours. In the cart, in front of us, half-sitting, half-lying, were six men in shirts, with their peasant-coats wide open on the breast; two of them were bare-headed; huge feet in boots dangled, jolting, over the rail; hands rose and fell at random . . . . bodies heaved to and fro. . . . It was plain that the whole gang was drunk. Some were yelling hoarsely whatever happened to come into their heads; one was whistling in a very clear and piercing manner, another was swearing; on the driver's seat sat a sort of giant in a short, sheepskin coat, driving. They drove on at a foot-pace, as though paying no attention to us.

What was to be done? We drove after them, also at a foot-pace.

For a quarter of a verst we proceeded in this manner.—Anticipation was torturing. . . . What chance was there of saving ourselves, defending ourselves! There were six of them: and I had not even a stick with me! Should we turn back on our course?—but they would immediately overtake us. I recalled a verse of Zhukóvsky (where he is speaking of the murder of Field-Marshal Kámensky):

“The despised axe of the brigand . . .”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

If not that, they would strangle us with a filthy rope . . . . and fling us into the ditch . . . . and there we might rattle in the throat and struggle like a hare in a snare. . . . .

Ekh, we were in a bad plight!

But they continued to drive at a walk, as before, and pay no attention to us.

“Filoféi!”—I whispered,—“pray try to turn more to the right. Endeavour to pass them.”

Filoféi made the attempt,—and turned out to the right . . . . but they immediately drove to the right also; . . . . evidently, it was impossible to pass them.

Filoféi tried again: he turned out to the left. . . . . But they did not let him pass on that side, either. They even burst out laughing. Which meant, that they would not let us pass.

“Regular brigands!”—whispered Filoféi to me over his shoulder.

“But what are they waiting for?”—I asked, also in a whisper.

“Why, yonder—ahead, in the ravine, over the stream—is a small bridge. . . . They’re going to attack us there! They always do like that . . . . near a bridge. We’re done for, master!”—he added, with a sigh:—“it is n’t likely that they will release us alive; because the principal thing with them is—to hide all traces.—I’m sorry for one thing, master: my tróika-team will be lost, and my brothers will not get it!”

THE RATTLING

I was surprised that Filoféi could worry about his horses at such a moment,—and I must confess that I did not think much of him just then. . . .

“Is it possible that they will kill us?” I kept reiterating mentally.—“What for? I will give up to them everything I have about me. . . .”

And the bridge drew nearer and nearer, became more and more clearly visible.

Suddenly a sharp yell rang out, the tróika in front of us seemed to soar into the air, dashed off, and having galloped to the bridge, came to an abrupt halt, as though rooted to the spot, a little to one side of the road. My heart fairly sank into my boots.

“Okh, brother Filoféi,”—said I:—“thou and I are driving to our death.—Forgive me, if I have destroyed thee.”

“How is it thy fault, master! No one can escape his fate! Come on, shaggy, my faithful nag,”—said Filoféi, addressing the shaft-horse, —“go ahead, brother! Render us the last service!—All together now! . . . . Lord, give us thy blessing!”

He launched his tróika at a gentle trot.

We began to approach the bridge,—to approach that motionless, menacing cart. . . . All had grown silent in it, as though of set purpose. Not a sound was to be heard! Thus does the pike, the hawk, every beast of prey grow silent when its prey is approaching.—And now we came alongside the cart. . . . Suddenly the giant in the short sheepskin coat gave a great leap from it, and dashed straight at us!

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

Not a word did he say to Filoféi, but the latter immediately drew rein. . . . The tarantás came to a standstill.

The giant laid his hands on the carriage-door—and bending forward his shaggy head, and grinning broadly, he uttered the following words in a quiet, even voice, with the accent of a factory-hand:

“Respected sir, we are on our way from an honourable carouse, from a wedding-feast; we have been marrying off our fine young fellow, you know; we have just put the young pair to bed; we lads are all young, reckless,—we’ve drunk a lot,—but there was n’t enough for us to get drunk on;—so, will not you do us a favour, will not you contribute to us just the least little bit of money,—so that we may buy a dram of liquor for each brother of us?—We would drink your health, we would remember Your Stateliness;<sup>1</sup>—but if you will not do us the favour,—well, then, we beg that you will not be angry.”

“What’s the meaning of this?”—I said to

<sup>1</sup>Stepénstvo, the title given by the populace to respected persons of their own and of the burgher class. In Siberia, Orenburg, and the Caucasus, the title is applied to Asiatic sultans, murzas, petty princes, and elders, while it is decreed by law to the Kirghiz sultans. But Khans are called “Your High-Stateliness.”—TRANSLATOR.

THE RATTLING

myself. . . . "Is it raillery? . . . Is he jeering at me?"

The giant continued to stand there, with bowed head. At that instant the moon emerged from the mist, and illuminated his face. It was smiling, was that face—both with eyes and lips. And no menace was perceptible in it . . . . only, it seemed to be all alert . . . . and his teeth were so white, and so large. . .

"I will contribute with pleasure. . . . Here, take this. . ." I said hastily—and drawing my purse from my pocket, I took from it two silver rubles: at that time, silver money was still current in Russia.—"Here, if this is enough."

"We're very grateful!"—bawled the giant, in soldier fashion—and his thick fingers instantly snatched from me—not my whole purse—but only those two rubles. "We're very grateful!"—He shook back his hair, and ran to the cart.

"My lads!"—he shouted: "The gentleman-traveller contributes two rubles to us!"—They all instantly began to yell. . . . The giant clambered to the box. . . .

"May you be happy!" . . .

The horses started off, the cart thundered up hill,—once more it flashed through the dark streak which separated earth from heaven, sank into it, and vanished.

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

And now the rattling, and the shouting, and the bells were no longer to be heard. . . .

Deathlike silence reigned.

FILOFÉI and I did not speedily recover ourselves.

“Akh, curse thee, what a jester thou art!”—said Filoféi at last—and taking off his cap, he began to cross himself.—“Really, he is a joker,”—he added, and turned to me, all radiant with delight.—“But he must be a good man—really!—No-no-noo, my little ones! bestir yourselves!—You’re safe and sound! We’re all safe and sound!—That’s why he would n’t let us pass; he was driving the horses. What a joker of a lad.—No-no-no-noo!—proceed, with God’s blessing!”

I held my peace,—but I also felt relieved in soul. “We’re safe and sound!”—I repeated to myself, and stretched myself out on the hay.—“We got off cheaply!”

I even felt a little conscience-stricken at having recalled Zhukóvsky’s lines.

All at once an idea occurred to me:

“Filoféi!”

“What?”

“Art thou married?”

“Yes.”

“And hast thou children?”

“I have.”

“How was it that thou didst not think of them?”

THE RATTLING

Thou wert sorry about the horses—but not about thy wife and children?”

“But why should I feel sorry for them? They would n't have fallen into the hands of thieves, you see.—And I kept them in my thoughts all the while,—and I'm keeping them there now . . . . so I am.”—Filoféi stopped.—“Perhaps . . . . it was for their sakes that the Lord God had mercy on you and me.”

“But supposing they were not brigands?”

“And how do we know?—Is it possible to crawl into another man's soul, I'd like to know?—Another man's soul is . . . . darkness . . . everybody knows that. But 't is always better to have God's blessing.—No . . as for my family, I always . . . . Now-now-now, little ones, Go-d be with us!”

It was almost daybreak when we began to enter Túla. I was lying in the semi-forgetfulness of slumber. . . .

“Master,”—said Filoféi suddenly to me, “look yonder: there it stands, yonder by the dram-shop . . . . their cart.”

I raised my head . . . . it was they, in fact, and their cart, and their horses. On the threshold of the drinking-establishment the familiar giant in the short sheepskin coat suddenly made his appearance. “Sir!” he exclaimed, waving his cap, “We're drinking up your money!—Well, and your coachman,”—he added, nodding his head toward Filoféi,—“ I fancy that fellow was pretty well scared,—was n't he? ”

MEMOIRS OF A SPORTSMAN

“ A very jolly fellow, ”—remarked Filoféi, when we had driven about twenty fathoms from the dram-shop.

We arrived in Túla at last; I bought the bird-shot, and wine and tea also, by the way,—and even took a horse from the horse-dealer.—At mid-day we set off on our return journey. As we drove past the spot where, for the first time, we had heard the rattling of the cart behind us, Filoféi, who had drunk considerable liquor in Túla, showed himself to be a very loquacious man,—he even narrated stories to me,—as we drove past that spot, Filoféi suddenly burst out laughing.

“ But dost thou remember, master, how I kept saying to thee: ‘ There 's a rattling ’ . . . . ‘ there 's a rattling, ’ I said . . . . ‘ there 's a rattling! ’ ”

He brandished his hand several times. . . . These words struck him as very amusing.

That same evening we reached his village again.

I imparted our adventure to Ermolái. As he was sober, he expressed no sympathy, and merely grinned,—whether approvingly or reprovingly, is more than he himself knew, I suppose. But a couple of days later he informed me, with much satisfaction, that on that same night when Filoféi and I had driven to Túla,—and on that selfsame road,—a merchant had been robbed and murdered. At first I did not believe this news; but afterward I was compelled to: the commissary of rural police confirmed its veracity to me, as he galloped by to the inquest.—Was it not from that “wedding-feast” that our bold lads were returning, and was not he that “dashing young fellow” whom, according to the expression of the giant-jester, they had “put to bed”? I remained for five days longer in Filoféi’s village.—And on every occasion that I chanced to meet him, I said to him:—“Hey! There’s a rattling!”

THE RATTLING

“A jolly fellow,”—he replied to me every time, and began to laugh.

EPILOGUE

FOREST AND STEPPE

. . . . .
. . . . . And backward, gradually, longing him to draw
Began; to the country, to the dusky park,
Whose lindens are so vast, so dense with shade,
And lilies of the valley are so virginally sweet,
Where globe-shaped willows from the dam
In serried ranks over the water bend,
Where grows the luxuriant oak upon the luxuriant mead,
Where hemp and nettle their perfume emit . . . .
Thither, thither away, to the abundant fields,
Where, like unto velvet black the earth lies duskily,
Where,—turn your eyes whichever way you will,—
The rye streams gently on in billows soft,
And from behind transparent, round, white clouds
A heavy ray of yellow light falls down
So beautifully . . . .

(From a poem consigned to the flames.)

PERCHANCE, the reader is already bored with my memoirs; I hasten to reassure him with the promise to confine myself to the fragments which have been printed; but in taking my leave of him, I cannot refrain from saying a few words about hunting.

Hunting with gun and hound is very fine in itself, für sich, as people used to say in days of old; but, supposing you were not born a sportsman: nevertheless, you are a lover of nature; consequently, you cannot but envy huntsmen like us. . . . Listen.

EPILOGUE

Do you know, for example, what a delight it is to sally forth in springtime before the dawn? You step out on the porch. . . . In the dark-blue sky stars are twinkling here and there; a damp breeze sweeps past, from time to time, in light gusts; the repressed, ill-defined whispering of the night is audible; the trees are rustling, as they stand enveloped in shadow. Now they lay a rug in the peasant-cart, and place a box with the samovár at your feet. The trace-horses fidget, neigh, and shift coquettishly from foot to foot; a pair of white geese, which have just waked up, waddle silently and slowly across the road. Beyond the wattled hedge, in the garden, the watchman is snoring peacefully; every sound seems to hang suspended in the chilly air,—to hang and not pass on. Now you have taken your seat; the horses have set off on the instant, the cart has begun to rattle loudly . . . . you drive on and on . . . . past the church, down-hill to the right, across the dam. . . . . The pond is barely beginning to smoke. You feel a little cold, you cover up your face with the collar of your cloak; you sink into a doze. The horses plash their hoofs sonorously through puddles; the coachman begins to whistle. But now, you have got four versts from home . . . . the rim of the sky is beginning to flush crimson; the daws scatter over the birch-trees, flying awkwardly from tree to tree; the sparrows are chirping around the dark ricks. The air grows clearer, the road becomes visible, sleepy voices make themselves heard behind the gates. And in the meantime, the dawn is kindling; and lo, already golden streaks have flung themselves athwart the sky, the mists are swirling in the ravines; the larks are warbling loudly; the breeze which precedes the dawn has begun to blow,—and the crimson sun glides softly up. The light fairly gushes forth in a flood; your heart flutters within you, like a bird. All is bright, cheerful, agreeable! For a long distance round about everything is visible. There, behind the grove, lies a village; yonder, further away, is another, with a white church; yonder is a small birch-coppice, on the hill; behind it lies the marsh whither you are directing your course. . . . Faster, ye steeds, still faster! Advance at a smart trot! . . . . Only three versts remain, not more. The sun is rising swiftly; the sky is clear. . . . . The weather will be magnificent. A flock of sheep is advancing in a long line, from the village, to meet you. You have ascended the hill. . . . What a view! The river winds about for ten versts, gleaming dully blue through the mist; beyond it lie watery-green meadows; beyond the meadows are sloping hillocks; far away, lapwings are hovering and calling over the marsh; athwart the moist gleam diffused in the air, the distance stands forth clearly . . . not as in summer. How boldly the bosom heaves, how swiftly the limbs move, how strong the whole man becomes, thus seized in the embrace of the fresh breath of the spring! . . .

EPILOGUE

EPILOGUE

And the summer—July—morning! Who, save the sportsman, has experienced the joy of wandering at dawn among the bushes? The trace of your footsteps leaves a green line on the dewy, whitened grass. You thrust aside the wet bushes,—you are fairly drenched with the warm perfume which has accumulated over night; the air is all impregnated with the fresh bitterness of wormwood, the honey of buckwheat and clover; far away, like a wall, stands an oak forest, glittering and crimsoning in the sun; it is still chilly, but the approaching heat can be felt. The head swims with the excess of perfume. There is no end to the thicket. . . . Here and there, perchance, in the distance, the ripening rye gleams yellow, and the narrow strips of buckwheat shine with a reddish glint. Now a cart creaks; a peasant is making his way along at a foot-pace, to put his horse in the shade as soon as possible. . . . You have exchanged greetings with him, and have gone on, when the ringing whine of the scythe resounds behind you. The sun rides higher and higher. The grass will soon be dry. It is already hot. One hour passes, then another. . . . The sky grows dark along the rim; the motionless air is blazing with stinging heat.—“Where can I get a drink, brother?”—you ask a mower.—“Yonder, in the ravine, is a well.” You descend to the bottom of the ravine, through the dense hazel-bushes, all intertwined with tenacious grass. And, in fact, beneath the very cliff a spring is concealed; an oak-bush has eagerly thrown over the water its claw-like branches; great, silvery bubbles rise, dimpling, from the bottom covered with fine, velvety moss. You throw yourself down on the ground, you drink, but languor is beginning to stir within you. You are in the shade, you are inhaling the fragrant moisture, you are comfortable, while opposite you the bushes are getting red-hot, and seem to be turning yellow in the sun. But what is this? A breeze has suddenly flown up and dashed past; the surrounding air has quivered; is not that a clap of thunder? You emerge from the ravine . . . what is yon leaden streak on the horizon? Is the sultry heat growing more intense? Is it a thunder-cloud coming up? . . . But now comes a faint flash of lightning. . . . Eh, yes, it is a thunder-storm! The sun is still shining brilliantly round about you; it is still possible to hunt. But the cloud waxes: its front edge throws out a branch, it bends over into a vault. The grass, the bushes, everything round about has grown dark of a sudden. . . . Be quick! yonder, methinks, a hay-barn is visible . . . . be quick! . . . . You have fled to it, have entered. . . . What rain! what lightning! Here and there the water has dripped through upon the fragrant hay. . . . But now the sun has broken forth again. The thunder-storm has passed over; you step out. Heavens, how merrily everything round about is sparkling, how fresh and thin the air is, what a strong scent of strawberries and mushrooms is abroad! . . .

EPILOGUE

EPILOGUE

But now evening is drawing on. The sunset glow has embraced half the sky in its conflagration. The sun is setting. The air close at hand seems somehow peculiarly translucent, like glass; far away a soft mist is spreading, and is warm in aspect; along with the dew a crimson glow falls upon the fields, so recently flooded with streams of liquid gold; long shadows have begun to run out from the trees, from the bushes, from the lofty ricks of hay. . . . The sun has set; a star has kindled and is trembling in the fiery sea of the sunset. . . . Now it waxes pale; the sky grows blue; separate shadows disappear; the air is permeated with vapour. 'T is time to go home to the village, to the cottage where you are to spend the night. Throwing your gun over your shoulder, you walk briskly on, in spite of the distance. . . . And, in the meantime, night has come; you can no longer see twenty paces in front of you; the dogs are barely visible as white spots in the gloom; yonder, above the black bushes, the rim of the sky is confusedly perceptible. . . . .

EPILOGUE

What is that?—a fire? . . . No, it is the moon rising. And yonder, down below, to the right, the tiny lights of a village are twinkling. . . . Now, at last, you reach your cottage. Through the tiny window you descry the table, covered with a white cloth, a burning candle,—supper. . . .

Or you order your racing-drozhky to be harnessed up, and set out in quest of hazel-hens. 'T is jolly to make your way along the narrow path, between two walls of lofty rye. The ears slap you gently in the face, the corn-flowers cling about your feet, the quail utter their calls all around you, your horse runs on in a lazy trot. And now here is the forest. Shade and silence. The stately aspens are whispering high overhead; the long, pendent branches of the birch-trees are barely stirring; a mighty oak stands, like a warrior, by the side of a handsome linden. You drive along the green pathway flecked with shadows; huge yellow flies hang motionless in the golden air and suddenly fly away; gnats circle in a column, gleaming brightly in the shadow, darkling in the sunlight; birds warble peacefully. The golden voice of the hedge-sparrow rings with innocent, loquacious joy; it fits in with the perfume of the lilies of the valley. Further, further yet, into the depths of the forest. . . . The forest grows dense. . . . Inexpressible tranquillity falls upon the soul; and all round is so dreamy and quiet! But now a breeze has sprung up, and the crests of the trees have begun to ripple, like falling waves. Here and there tall blades of grass are springing up through last year's brown foliage; mushrooms stand apart beneath their caps. A hare suddenly leaps out, a dog dashes in pursuit with a ringing bark. . . .

EPILOGUE

And how fine is the same forest in late autumn, when the woodcock are flying! They do not harbour in the very densest parts: they must be sought along the edges. There is no wind, there is neither sun, nor light, nor shadow, nor movement, nor noise; the autumnal scent, akin to the smell of wine, is disseminated through the soft air; a thin mist stands far off above the yellow fields. The motionless sky gleams peacefully white between the brown, naked branches of the trees; here and there on the lindens hang the last golden leaves. The damp earth is springy under foot; the tall, dry grass-blades do not stir; long threads glisten on the whitened grass. The breast rises and falls in quiet breathing, and a strange disquietude descends upon the soul. You stroll along the skirt of the forest, you glance at your dog, and, meanwhile, beloved images, beloved faces, both dead and living, come to mind, impressions long since sunk to sleep unexpectedly wake up; your imagination flutters and soars like a bird, and everything moves along and stands before the eyes so clearly. The heart suddenly begins to quiver and throb, dashes passionately ahead, or is irrevocably submerged in memories. The whole of life unfolds lightly and swiftly, like a scroll; the man is in full possession of his past, his feelings, his whole soul. And nothing round about him hinders—there is no sun, no wind, no noise. . . .

EPILOGUE

And the clear, somewhat chilly autumnal day, which has been cold in early morning, when the birch, like a fabulous tree, all gold, is beautifully outlined against the pale-blue sky, when the low-hanging sun no longer warms, but shines more brilliantly than in summer, the small aspen grove is all glittering through and through, as though it found it a merry and easy thing to stand naked, the hoar-frost is still lying white on the bottom of the ravine, and the fresh breeze is softly stirring and driving along the fallen, withered leaves,—when blue waves dash gaily down the river, rocking the scattered geese in regular measure, and far away a mill is clattering, half-hidden by willows, and pigeons circle swiftly above it, flashing in motley hues through the bright air. . . .

Beautiful also are the cloudy summer days, although the sportsman does not love them. On such days shooting is impossible: a bird, after fluttering up from under your very feet, instantly disappears in the whitish mist of the motionless haze. But how quiet, how inexpressibly quiet is everything around! Everything is awake, and everything is silent. You walk past a tree—it is not rustling; it is taking its ease. A long streak lies blackly before you, spread out evenly in the air, like a thin vapour. You take it for the forest hard by; you approach—the forest turns into a tall bed of wormwood on the grass-strip between the tilled fields. Above you, around you,—everywhere, lies the mist. . . . But now the breeze is beginning to stir lightly.—A scrap of pale-blue sky stands forth confusedly through the thinning, smoke-like vapour, a golden-yellow ray of sunlight suddenly breaks forth, begins to stream in a long flood, beats upon the fields, rests upon the grove,—and now, everything is again shrouded in clouds. For a long time does this conflict last; but how unutterably magnificent and clear does the day become, when the light at last triumphs, and the last waves of heated mist roll away and spread out like a table-cloth, or wreath about and vanish in the deep, tenderly-radiant heights of heaven! . . .

EPILOGUE

But now you have betaken yourself to the remote fields, to the steppes. You have driven ten versts along country roads,—and here, at last, is the highway. For a long, long time, you drive past endless trains of freight-wagons, past tiny posting-stations with a hissing samovár under the shed, wide-open gates and a well, from one church-village to another, through boundless fields, along green hemp-patches. Magpies flutter from willow to willow; peasant women, with long rakes in their hands, roam about the fields; a wayfarer, in a threadbare nankeen kaftan, with a wallet on his back, trudges wearily along; the heavy carriage of a landed proprietor rolls smoothly toward you, drawn by six well-grown and broken-winded horses. From the window projects the corner of a pillow, and on the foot-board, clinging to a cord, sits a footman sideways, wrapped in a cloak, and mud-bespattered to the very eyebrows. Here is a wretched little county town, with wooden houses all askew, interminable fences, uninhabited stone buildings belonging to merchants, and an ancient bridge over a deep ravine. . . . Further, further! . . . The steppe regions have begun. You cast a glance from the crest of a hill—what a view! Round, low hillocks, ploughed and planted to their very summits, spread out in broad waves; ravines overgrown with bushes wind about between them; small groves are scattered about, like long islands; from village to village run narrow paths; churches gleam white; between the sides of the cliffs a little river glitters, traversed in four places by dams; far away in the fields bustards stand up prominently in goose file; an ancient manor-house, with its offices, its fruit-orchard and threshing-floor, is nestled down beside a tiny pond. But you drive further and further. The hills grow smaller and smaller, hardly a tree is to be seen. Here it is, at last,—the boundless, limitless steppe! . . .

EPILOGUE

EPILOGUE

And on a winter day to roam among the tall snow-drifts in search of hares, to inhale the keen, frosty air, involuntarily to narrow the eyes from the dazzling, fine glitter of the soft snow, to admire the green hue of the sky above the reddish forest! . . . . And the first spring days, when everything round about is glittering and falling; athwart the heavy steam of the melting snow there is already an odour of the warming earth; on the thawed spots, beneath the slanting rays of the sun, the larks are warbling with confidence; and, with merry noise and roar, the floods gather from ravine to ravine. . . .

But it is time to end. By the way,—I have mentioned the spring: in spring it is easy to part, in spring the happy long to rove afar. . . . Farewell, reader: I wish you permanent good fortune.

2381 4

0

PG Turgenev, Ivan Sergeevich
3421 The novels and stories of A15H36 Ivan Turgenieff
v.2

Searching the Internet

Resources

KET

SEEN BY PRESERVATION
SERVICES
NOV 20 1987
DATE.....

